This did ſhée, to the intent that by the open declaration of theſe fained phantaſies, the people might be perſuaded to giue credit, and beléeue that he was the true begotten ſonne of hir brother king Edward. And after this, ſhée aſſigned to him a gard of thirtie perſons in murrie and blew, and highlie honoured him as a great eſtate, and called him the white roſe of England. The nobilitie of Flanders did to him all reuerence. [All which port and pompe exhibited in moſt ſolemne ſort, he was well content to take vpon him, forgetting the baſeneſſe of his birth, and glorieng in the counterfeit title of honour: much like the iay that would be called a ſwan, or like the crow that trimming hir ſelfe with the ſtolne feathers of a pecocke, would ſéeme Iunos bird; as the poet ſaith:

But to returne to Perkin: the brute of whome in England, blowne throughout the realme, ſore diſquieted the people, inſomuch that not onelie the meaner ſort, but alſo manie of the nobles and worſhipfull perſonages beléeued and publiſhed it abroad, that all was true which was reported of him. And not onelie they that were in ſanctuaries, but alſo manie other that were fallen in debt, aſſembled in a companie, and paſſed ouer the ſeas into Flanders, to their counterfeit duke of Yorke, otherwiſe rightlie named Perkin Warbecke. Truelie the realme of England was in maner diuided (with the rumor and vaine fable ſpred abroad of this twiſe borne duke) into partakings and contrarie factions. And ſome of the noble men conſpired togither, purpoſing to aid the foreſaid Perkin, as the man whome they reputed to be the verie ſonne of king Edward; and that the matter was not feigned, but altogither true, iuſt, and not imagined of anie malicious pretenſe or euill purpoſe.

Anno Reg. 8.

And bicauſe the thing was weightie, and required great aid and aſſiſtance, therefore they determined to ſend meſſengers vnto the ladie Margaret, to know when Richard duke of Yorke might conuenientlie come into England; to the intent that they being thereof certified, might be in a readineſſe to helpe and ſuccour him at his arriuall. So by the common conſent of the conſpirators, ſir Robert Clifford knight, and William Barleie, were ſent into Flanders, which diſcouered to the duches all the ſecret intents and priuie meanings of the fréends and fautors of the new found duke. The duches gladlie receiued this meſſage, and after ſhée had heard their errand, ſhée brought the meſſenger to the ſight of Perkin, who ſo well counterfeited the geſture, countenance, and maner of Richard duke of Yorke, that ſir Robert Clifford beléeued verelie, that he was the ſecond ſonne of king Edward; and therefore wrote a letter of credit into England to his complices: and to put them out of doubt, he affirmed that he knew him to be king Edwards ſonne by his face, and other lineaments of his bodie.

Perkin counterfeiteth the duke of Yorke verie cunninglie.

Vpon this letter, the chéefe dooers in this buſineſſe ſpred the ſignification thereof abroad through the realme, to the intent to ſtirre the people to ſome new tumult and commotion: but it was doone by ſuch a ſecret craft, that no man could tell who was the author of that rumor. The king perceiued that this vaine fable was not vaniſhed out of the mad brains of the common people. To prouide therefore againſt all perils that might thereby inſue, he ſent certeine knights that were ſkilfull men of warre, with competent bands of ſoldiers, to kéepe the ſea coaſts and hauens, to vnderſtand who came in and went out of the realme; doubting leaſt ſome great conſpiracie were in brewing againſt him. He alſo ſent into the low countries certeine perſons, to learne the truth of this forged dukes progenie, where ſome of them that were ſo ſent, comming to Tournie, got knowlege that he was borne in that citie, of baſe linage, and named Perkin Warbecke.

Perkins true linage.

The king then aduertiſed not onelie by his eſpials vpon their returne, but alſo from other his truſtie fréends, determined with all ſpéed to haue the fraud publiſhed, both in England and forren parts: and for the ſame cauſe ſent ſir Edward Poinings knight, & ſir William Warram doctor of the laws vnto Philip archduke of Burgognie, and to his councellors (bicauſe he was not of age able to gouerne of himſelfe) to ſignifie to him and them, that the yong man, being with the ladie Margaret, had falſelie and vntruelie vſurped the name of Richard duke of Yorke, which long before was murthered with his brother Edward in the Tower of London, by the commandement of their vncle king Richard, as manie men then liuing could teſtifie.

Ambaſſadors ſent to Philip archduke of Burgognie.

The ambaſſadors comming to the court of Philip the archduke, were honorablie interteined of him and of his councell, and willed to declare the effect of their meſſage. William Warram made to them an eloquent oration, and in the later end ſomewhat inueihed againſt the ladie Margaret, not ſparing to declare, how ſhe now in hir later age had brought forth (within the ſpace of a few yeares togither) two deteſtable monſters, that is to ſaie, Lambert (of whom yée heard before) and this ſame Perkin Warbecke, and being conceiued of theſe two great babes, was not deliuered of them in eight or nine moneths as nature requireth; but in one hundred and eightie moneths, for both theſe at the leſt were fiftéene yéers of age, yer ſhe would be brought in bed of them, and ſhew them openlie; and when they were newlie crept out of hir wombe, they were no infants but luſtie yonglings, and of age ſufficient to bid battell to kings. Although theſe tawnts angred the ladie Margaret to the hart, yet Perkin was more vexed with the things declared in this oration, and eſpeciallie bicauſe his cloaked iuggling was brought to light.

The ſum of D. Warrams ſpéech to the archduke.

The duches intending to caſt hot ſulphur into the new kindled fire, determined with might and maine to arme and ſet forward prettie Perkin againſt the king of England. When the ambaſſadors had doone their meſſage, and that the archdukes councell had long debated the matter; they made anſwer, that to haue the king of Englands loue, the archduke and they would neither aid nor aſſiſt Perkin nor his complices in anie cauſe or quarrell. Yet notwithſtanding if the ladie Margaret, perſiſting in hir roted malice towards the king of England, would be to him aiding and helping, it was not in their power to withſtand it; for bicauſe in the lands aſſigned to hir for hir dower, ſhe might franklie and fréelie order all things at hir will and pleaſure, without contradiction of anie other gouernour.

Anno Reg. 9. Eſpials ſent into Flanders from the king for a ſubtill policie.

After that the ambaſſadors were returned with this anſwer, the king ſtreight ſent forth certeine eſpials into Flanders, which ſhould feigne themſelues to haue fled to the duke of Yorke; and thereby ſearch out the whole intent of the conſpiracie, and after what ſort they meant to procéed in the ſame. Others were ſent alſo to intiſe ſir Robert Clifford and William Barleie, to returne into England, promiſing to them pardon of all their offenſes, and high rewards, for obeieng the kings requeſt. They that were ſent, did ſo earneſtlie and prudentlie applie their buſineſſe, that they brought all things to paſſe at their owne deſires. For firſt they learned who were the chéefe conſpirators, and after perſuaded ſir Robert Clifford to giue ouer that enterpriſe, which had no grounded ſtaie to reſt vpon. Albeit William Barleie at the firſt would not leaue off, but continued his begun attempt; till after two yeares, he repenting him of his follie, & hauing pardon granted him of the king, returned home into his natiue countrie.

When the king had knowledge of the chiefe capteins of this conſpiracie (by the ouerture of his eſpials which were returned) he cauſed them to be apprehended, and brought to London before his preſence. Of the which the chiefe were Iohn Ratcliffe, lord Fitz-Water, ſir Simon Montford, ſir Tho. Thwaits knights, William Daubeneie, Robert Ratcliffe, Thomas Creſſenor, and Thomas Aſtwood. Alſo certeine préeſts & religious men, as ſir William Richford doctor of diuinitie, and ſir Thomas Poines, both friers of ſaint Dominikes order, doctor William Sutton, ſir William Worſeleie deane of Paules, Robert Laiborne, and ſir Richard Leſſeie. Other which were guiltie, hearing that their fellowes were apprehended, fled and tooke ſanctuarie. The other that were taken were condemned, of the which ſir Simon Montford, Robert Ratcliffe, and William Daubenie were beheaded.

The conſpiring fautors of the counterfeit duke of Yorke.

Some had their pardons, and the préeſts alſo for their order ſake; but yet few of them liued long after. The lord Fitz-Water pardoned of life, was conueied to Calis, and there laid in hold, & after loſt his head; bicauſe he went about to corrupt his kéepers with rewards, that he might eſcape, intending (as was thought) to haue gone to Perkin. Yet notwithſtanding, as women will not (to die for it) giue ouer an enterpriſe, which of an enuious purpoſe they attempt; ſo ſhe put hir irons afreſh into the fier to ſet hir hatred forward: whome a while we will leaue at worke, and ſhew ſome doings betwéene England and Flanders.]

Flemiſh wares forbidden.

The mart kept at Calis.

Engliſh commodities baniſhed out of Flanders.

King Henrie taking diſpleaſure with the king of Romans, for that he kept not touch in aiding him againſt the French king, and partlie diſpleaſed with the Flemings, but ſpeciallie with the ladie Margaret, for kéeping and ſetting forward Perkin Warbecke, not onelie baniſhed all Flemiſh wares and merchandizes out of his dominions, but alſo reſtreined all Engliſh merchants from their repaire and traffike into anie of the lands and territories of the king of Romans, or of the archduke Philip, ſonne to the ſame king of the Romans; cauſing the mart to be kept at Calis, of all Engliſh merchandizes and commodities. Wherefore the ſaid king and his ſonne baniſhed out of their lands and ſeigniories all Engliſh clothes, yarne, tin, lead, and other commodities of this realme. The reſtreint made by the king ſore hindered the merchants aduenturers; for they had no occupieng to beare their charges, and to ſupport their credit withall.

A riot made vpon the Eaſterlings.

And that moſt greeued them, the Eaſterlings being at libertie, brought to the realme ſuch wares as they were woont, & ſo ſerued their cuſtomers throughout the realme. Wherevpon there inſued a riot by the ſeruants of the mercers, haberdaſhers, & clothworkers in the citie of London, the tueſdaie before ſaint Edwards day. For they perceiuing what hinderance grew to their maiſters, in that they were not able ſo well to kéepe them as before they had doone, aſſembled togither in purpoſe to reuenge their malice on the Eſterlings, & ſo came to the Stilliard, & began to rifle & ſpoile ſuch chambers & warehouſes as they cold get into. So that the Eaſterlings had much adoo to withſtand them, & kéepe them back out of their gates, which with helpe of carpenters, ſmiths, and other that came to them by water out of Southwarke, they ſhored & ſo fortified, that the multitude of the ſeruants and prentiſes, being aſſembled, could not preuaile.

At length came the maior with a number of men, defenſiblie weaponed, to remooue the force; at whoſe approch thoſe riotous perſons fled awaie like a flocke of ſhéepe. But diuerſe of them were apprehended, and vpon inquirie made before the kings commiſſioners, aboue foure ſcore ſeruants & apprentiſes were found to be conſpired togither, and ſworne not to reueale it; of whome ſome of the chiefe beginners were committed to the Tower, and there long continued. But in concluſion, bicauſe none of their maiſters, nor anie one houſholder was found culpable, the king of his clemencie pardoned their offenſe, and reſtored them to libertie. [For he thought it no credit to his crowne to take vengeance of ſuch ſillie ſoules by ſeueritie of death, whom in clemencie pardoning he might reſtore to a reformed life.]

Policie of K. Henrie againſt Robert Clifford.

Shortlie after ſir Robert Clifford, partlie truſting on the kings promiſe, and partlie miſtruſting the deſperat begun enterpriſe, returned ſuddenlie againe into England. The king certified before of his comming, went ſtreight to the Tower of London the morow after the day of Epiphanie, & there taried till ſuch time as ſir Robert Clifford was there preſented to his perſon. This was doone for a policie, that if ſir Robert accuſed anie of the nobilitie, they might be called thither without ſuſpicion of anie euill, and their attached and laid faſt. Some thought alſo, that for a policie king Henrie ſent ſir Robert Clifford ouer as an eſpie, or elſe he would not ſo ſoone haue receiued him into fauour againe. Neuertheleſſe, there were great preſumptions that it was nothing ſo, for both was he in great danger after his begun attempt, and neuer was ſo much eſtéemed with the king afterward as he was before.

Sir william Stanleie a fauourer of Perkin.

But this is true, vpon his comming to the kings preſence, he beſought him of pardon, and obteined it; and therewith opened all the maner of the conſpiracie, ſo far as he knew, and who were aiders, fautors, and chiefe beginners of it; amongſt whome he accuſed ſir William Stanleie, whome the king had made his chiefe chamberleine, and one of his priuie councell. The king was ſorie to heare this, and could not be induced to beléeue that there was ſo much vntruth in him, till by euident proofes it was tried againſt him. Then the king cauſed him to be reſtreined from his libertie in his owne chamber within the quadrat tower, and there appointed him by his priuie councell to be examined, in which examination he nothing denied, but wiſelie and ſagelie agréed to all things laid to his charge, if he were faultie therein.

Coniectures of ſir william Stanleies alienated mind from king Henrie.

The report is, that this was his offenſe. When communication was had betwixt him, and the aboue mentioned ſir Robert Clifford, as concerning Perkin, which falſelie vſurped the name of K. Edwards ſonne; ſir William Stanleie ſaid, that if he knew certeinlie that the yoong man was the indubitate heire of king Edward the fourth, he would neuer fight or beare armour againſt him. This point argued, that he bare no hartie good will toward king Henrie as then. But what was the cauſe that he had conceiued ſome inward grudge towards the king; or how it chanced that the king had withdrawen his ſpeciall fauor from him, manie haue doubted. Some indéed haue geſſed, that ſir William Stanlie, for the ſeruice which he ſhewed at Boſworth field, thought that all the benefits which he receiued of the king to be farre vnder that which he had deſerued, in preſeruing not onelie the kings life; but alſo in obteining for him the victorie of his enimies, ſo that his aduerſarie was ſlaine in the field.

Wherfore deſiring to be created earle of Cheſter, and therof denied, he began to diſdeine the king. And one thing incouraged him much, which was the riches and treaſure of king Richard, which he onlie poſſeſſed at the battell of Boſworth; by reaſon of which riches and great power of men, he ſet naught by the king his ſoueraigne lord and maiſter. The king hauing thus an hole in his coat, doubted firſt what he ſhould doo with him; for loth he was to loſe the fauour of his brother the earle of Derbie: and againe to pardon him, he feared leaſt it ſhould be an euill example to other, that ſhould go about to attempt the like offenſe. And ſo at length, ſeueritie got the vpper hand, & mercie was put backe, in ſo much that he was arreigned at Weſtminſter and adiudged to die, and (according to that iudgement) was brought to the Tower hill the ſixteenth daie of Februarie, and there had his head ſtriken off.

[This was the end of ſir William Stanleie the chiefeſt helper of king Henrie to the crowne at Boſworth field againſt king Richard the third, and who ſet the ſame crowne firſt vpon the kings head, when it was found in the field trampled vnder féet. He was a man (while he liued) of great power in his countrie, and alſo of great wealth; in ſomuch as the common fame ran, that there was in his caſtell of Holt found in readie coine, plate, and iewels, to the value of fortie thouſand markes or more, and his land and fées extended to thrée thouſand pounds by yeare. Neuerthéleſſe all helped not; neither his good ſeruice in Boſworth field, neither his forwardneſſe (euen with the hazard of life) to prefer K. Henrie to the crowne, neither his faithfulneſſe in cleauing to him at all brunts, neither the bond of aliance betwixt them, neither the power that he was able to make, neither the riches which he was worth, neither interceſſion of fréends, which he wanted not; none of theſe, nor all theſe could procure the redemption of his loſt life:

Anno Reg. 11.

Lord Daubenie the kings chéefe chamberleine.

Sir Edward Poinings ſent into Ireland with an armie.

About this ſame time, diuerſe men were puniſhed that had vpon a preſumptuous boldneſſe ſpoken manie ſlanderous words againſt the kings maieſtie; hoping ſtill for the arriuall of the feigned Richard duke of Yorke. After the death of ſir William Stanleie, Giles lord Daubenie was elected and made the kings chéefe chamberleine. Alſo, the K. ſent into Ireland (to purge out the euill & wicked ſéeds of rebellion amongeſt the wild & ſauage Iriſh people, ſowed there by the craftie conueiance of Perkin Warbecke) ſir Henrie Deane, late abbat of Langtonie (whome he made chancellor of that Ile) & ſir Edward Poinings knight, with an armie of men. The fauourers of Perkin, hearing that ſir Edward Poinings was come with a power to perſecute them, withdrew ſtreightwaies, and fled into the woods and mariſhes for the ſafegard of themſelues.

Sir Edward Poinings according to his commiſſion, intending to puniſh ſuch as had aided and aduanced the enterpriſe of Perkin, with his whole armie marched forward againſt the wild Iriſhmen, bicauſe that all other being culpable of that offenſe, fled and reſorted to them for ſuccour. But when he ſaw that his purpoſe ſucceeded not as he would haue wiſhed it; both bicauſe the Iriſh lords ſent him no ſuccour according to their promiſes; and alſo for that his owne number was not ſufficient to furniſh his enterpriſe, bicauſe his enimies were diſperſed amongſt woods, mounteins, and mariſhes: he was conſtreined to recule backe, ſore diſpleaſed in his mind againſt Gerald earle of Kildare, being then the kings deputie.

Gerald earle of Kildare deputie of Ireland apprehended.

Now, the cauſe of this his diſcontentment was, for that the ſaid earle was ſuſpected to be the meane that he had no ſuccours ſent him, and was ſo informed in déed by ſuch as bare the earle no good will. And therefore ſuddenlie he cauſed the earle to be apprehended, and as a priſoner brought him in his companie into England. Which earle being examined, and ſundrie points of treaſon laid to him, he ſo auoided them all, & laid the burthen in other mens necks, that he was diſmiſſed, and ſent into Ireland againe, there to be deputie and lieutenant as he was before. The king being now in ſome better ſuertie of his eſtate, did take his progreſſe into Lancaſhire the fiue & twentith daie of June, there to make merrie with his mother the counteſſe of Derbie, which then laie at Lathome in the countrie.

King Henries progreſſe into Lancaſhire.

In this meane while, Perkin Warbecke, being in Flanders, ſore troubled that his iuggling was diſcouered, yet he determined not to leaue off his enterpriſe, in hope at length to atteine the crowne of England: and ſo gathering a power of all nations, ſome bankrupts, ſome falſe Engliſh ſanctuarie men, ſome théeues, robbers, and vagabunds, which deſiring to liue by rapine, were glad to ſerue him. And thus furniſhed, he tooke ſuch ſhips as his fréends had prouided for him: and departing from Flanders towards England, he arriued vpon the Kentiſh coaſt, & there caſt anchor, purpoſing to prooue how the people there were affected towards him: and therefore he ſent certeine of his men to land, to ſignifie to the countrie his arriuall with ſuch power, that the victorie muſt incline to his part.

Perkin attempteth to land in Kent in hope of victorie.

The Kentiſhmen vnderſtanding that Perkin was but Perkin, and had none with him (to make account of) but ſtrangers borne, like faithfull ſubiects determined to fall vpon thoſe that were thus new come to land, and to trie if they might allure the whole number out of their ſhips, ſo to giue them battell. But Perkin wiſelie conſidering that the maner of a multitude is not to conſult, and ſagelie to aduiſe with themſelues in anie deliberate ſort, but ſuddenlie and raſhlie to run headlong into rebellion, would not ſet one foot out of his ſhip, vntill he ſaw all things ſure. Yet he permitted ſome of his ſouldiers to go on land, which being trained forth a pretie waie from their ſhips, were ſuddenlie compaſſed about and beſet of the Kentiſhmen, and at one ſtroke vanquiſhed and driuen backe to their ſhips.

Of theſe diſcomfited ſoules were taken priſoners an hundred and fortie perſons, whereof fiue, Montfort, Corbet, White, Belt, Quintin (or otherwiſe Genin) being capteins were brought to London by ſir John Pechie, ſhiriffe of Kent, railed in ropes like horſſes drawing in a cart, & after vpon their arreignment confeſſed their offenſe, and were executed, ſome at London, and other in the townes adioining to the ſea coaſt. And thus Perkin, miſſing of his purpoſe, Sir Richard Gilford.

The king being aduertiſed that his enimies were landed, leauing off his progreſſe, purpoſed to haue returned to London; but being certified the next day of the luckie ſpeed of his faithfull ſubiects, continued his progreſſe, & did ſend ſir Richard Gilford both to commend the fidelitie and manhood of the Kentiſhmen, and alſo to render to them moſt hartie thanks for the ſame. He alſo cauſed order to be taken for the erecting of beacons, and watching of them. Perkin then perceiuing that he ſhould not be receiued into England, ſailed into Ireland, truſting there to augment his numbers, and then to returne towards the coaſt of England againe, and to take land in the Weſt countrie, if occaſion ſerued; but if not, then he determined to ſaile ſtreight into Scotland, to ſeeke freendſhip there.

Perkin ſaileth into Ireland and is in ſundrie opinions.

Katharine daughter to the earle of Huntleie maried to Perkin.

After he had therefore ſtaid a while in Ireland, and perceiued that the hope of victorie conſiſted not in the Iriſh nation, being naked people, without furniture of armour or weapon, he tooke the ſea againe at Corke, and ſailed into Scotland; where comming to the preſence of king Iames, he forged ſuch a painted proceſſe to mooue him to beleeue that he was the verie ſonne of king Edward: that the Scotiſh king, whether blinded with errour, or vſing diſſimulation, that he might vnder a colourable pretext make war againſt England, began to haue Perkin in great honour, and cauſed him openlie to be called duke of Yorke. And to perſuade the world that ſo he was indeed, he cauſed the ladie Katharine, daughter to Alexander earle of Huntleie, his nigh kinſman, to be eſpouſed to him. [But yer we paſſe anie further, you ſhall ſee and peruſe (if you will) the ſaid painted proceſſe of Perkin, as it is left in record by Edward Hall for an example what working force is in words (ſpeciallie where the hearers are eaſie to be ſeduced) and not to be ouer haſtie to giue them too quicke & haſtie credit. Abr.Flem.ex Edw. Hall fol.xxxviij, xxxix.

Perkin ſaith that he is Edward the fourths lawfull ſonne.

I Thinke it is not vnknowne vnto you (moſt noble king and puiſſant prince) into what ruine the ſtocke, houſe, and familie of Edward the fourth, of that name king of England, is now of late brought to and fallen in, either by Gods permiſſion, or by diuine puniſhment; whoſe indubitate ſonne (if you know not alreadie) I am, and by the power of almightie God, preſerued aliue to this houre from the mightie hand of a tyrant. For my father king Edward (when he died) appointed his brother Richard duke of Gloceſter to be our gouernour, protector, and defendor; whome the more that he loued & ſtudied to aduance and promote, the better he thought that he would loue, fauour, and tender his children. But alas my vnfortunate chance I may ſay! how hath his truſt beene turned into treaſon, and his hope into hinderance, all men know and I feele. Our vncle was not the tutor and preſeruer of our ſtocke and linage, but the confounder & deſtroier of our bloud and progenie. For that tyrant, blinded and glutted with the deſire of ruling and ſoueraigntie, commanded Edward my brother & me to be ſlaine and diſpatched out of this mortall life. Wherevpon that perſon, to whome the weightie and cruell charge was committed and giuen to oppreſſe and deſtroie vs poore innocent infants and giltleſſe babes, the more that he abhorred this heinous and butcherlie offenſe, the more he feared to commit it.

Perkin telleth the king how he was preſerued and kept aliue.

And ſo wauering in mind and doubtfull what to doo, at the length willing in part to ſtanch the bloudie thirſt of the vnnaturall tyrant, and in part to abſteine from ſo heinous & deteſtable homicide, he deſtroied my brother and preſerued me; like the good preeſt Ioiada, who ſaued little Ioas, when all the children of the bloud roiall were commanded by Athalia the queene to be ſlaine and vtterlie deſtroied. And further, to the intent that my life might be in ſuertie, he appointed one to conueie me into ſome ſtrange countrie; where when I was furtheſt off, and had moſt need of comfort he forſooke me ſuddenlie (I thinke he was ſo appointed to doo) and left me deſolate alone without freend or knowlege of anie releeſe or refuge. And ſo king Richard did obteine the crowne as a preie miſcheeuouſlie gotten by the diſpatching awaie of my brother and me. So that I thus eſcaping, by reaſon of my tender infancie, forgat almoſt my ſelfe, and knew not well what I was. But after long wandering from countrie to countrie, and from citie to citie, I perceiued and learned by little and little what was my eſtate & degree; and ſo in concluſion came to mine owne aunt the ladie Margaret lieng in Flanders, which was ſometime married to Charles duke of Burgognie, which as ioifullie receiued and welcomed me, as if I had come out of hell into heauen, as the onelie type and garland of hir noble ſtirpe and linage. But forſomuch as ſhe being onelie Dowager of the duchie of Burgognie, and hauing nothing but hir dowrie proper to hir ſelfe, was not of power to helpe me with men and munitions of warre, as ſhe would gladlie haue doone for the recouerie of my fathers relme & rightfull inheritance: I therefore am driuen to ſeeke further aid and ſuccour.

Perkin calleth the ladie Margaret ducheſſe of Burgognie his owne aunt.

Perkin craueth aid of the Scotiſh king toward the recouerie of the crowne of England from king Henrie the ſeuenth.

And therefore by hir counſell and aduertiſement, with this ſmall handfull of men of warre and ſouldiers, I am repaired to your preſence for ſuccours; of whome (as the publike fame is ſpred ouer the whole world) there was neuer man by wrong or iniurie chaſed or driuen out of his countrie, region, or inheritance, or by extort power and tyrannie kept out of the ſame (as I my ſelfe from mine infancie haue beene) whoſe requeſt was fruſtrate and denied at your hand. Therefore, by the maieſtie of your realme & countrie I deſire, & heartilie with praier as I can, I beſéech and exhort you to helpe and reléeue me now in my extreame neceſſitie. And if it chance me by your aid and ſuccour to recouer & poſſeſſe my fathers realme and dignitie; not onelie I, but all the kings of our linage, which hereafter ſhall obteine the ſame, ſhall be ſo much obliged and bound vnto you; that they muſt néeds thinke, that dooing to you all the pleaſure and benefits that they can, yet with all thanks that can be giuen your great kindneſſe can neuer in full meaſure be recompenſed.

When he had thus ſaid, the king bad him be of good comfort, and promiſed him that whatſoeuer he were, it ſhould neuer repent him of his comming to him.] Shortlie after, hauing this Perkin with him in companie, he entered into England with a puiſſant armie, and cauſed proclamation to be made, to ſpare all thoſe that would ſubmit themſelues vnto Richard duke of Yorke. Héerewith they began the warre in moſt cruell maner, with ſlaughter of men, burning of townes, ſpoiling of houſes, and committing of all other deteſtable enormities; ſo that all the countrie of Northumberland was by them in maner waſted, and deſtroied. At length, when the ſouldiers were laden with ſpoiles, and ſaciate with bloud, perceiuing that no ſuccoures came out of England vnto the new inuented duke, contrarie to that which he had made them to beléeue would come to paſſe; they determined to retire rather with aſſured gaine, than to tarrie the vncerteine victorie of that counterfeit duke, and ſo therevpon they withdrew backe into Scotland inriched with preies and booties.

The Scotiſh king inuadeth Englãd with a great armie in Perkin his behalfe.

It is ſaid, that Perkin Warbecke, being returned into Scotland with the king of Scots, vnder a cloked pretenſe ſhould ſore lament the great ſlaughter, ſpoile, and damage, which had béene doone at this laſt roade made into England; and therefore as one that bare a naturall loue toward his natiue countrie, beſought the king of Scots, that from thenſeforth, he would no more ſo deface his naturall relme, and deſtroie his ſubiects with ſuch terrible fire, flame and hauocke; as who ſhould ſaie, he being ouercome now with compaſſion, did bewaile the cruell deſtruction of his naturall countrie of England. But the Scotiſh K. told him, that he ſéemed to take thought for that which appeared to be none of his, ſith that not ſo much as one gentleman or yeoman (for ought he could ſée) would once ſhew themſelues readie to aid him in the warre begun for his cauſe, & in his name, within that realme which he pretended ſo cléerelie to apperteine to him.

The counterfeit compaſſion of Perkin.

Anno Reg. 12.

The king of England being certified of this inuaſion, prepared an armie with all diligence to haue reſiſted the Scots: but they were returned yer the Engliſh power could aſſemble togither. Now when the king was truelie certified that the Scotiſh king was returned home, he ſtaied all the preparations made at that time to go againſt him. But yet meaning to be reuenged of the wrongs doone to him by king Iames and his people; he firſt called a parlement, and in that aſſemblie of thrée eſtates of the realme, he declared the cauſe of the inſtant warre, and how neceſſarie it ſhould be for the ſuertie and wealth of the realme of England to haue that warre purſued againſt thoſe enimies that had begun it. To this motion all the nobilitie wholie agréed. And to the maintenance of that warre, a ſubſidie was by whole aſſent of the parlement fréelie giuen and granted. Which paiment though it was not great, yet manie of the common people ſore grudged to pay the ſame, as they that euer abhorre ſuch taxes and exactions. At the ſame parlement were diuerſe acts and ſtatutes made, neceſſarie & expedient (as was thought) for the publike weale of the realme.

A parlement of the thrée eſtates of the realme.

A ſubſidie.

In the meane ſeaſon the king of Scots, perceiuing that the Engliſhmen would ſhortlie go about to reuenge the iniuries doone to them by him and his people, aſſembled eftſoones a puiſſant armie, that he might either defend his realme againſt the Engliſh power, attempting to inuade his countrie, or elſe afreſh to enter into the Engliſh borders. And thus theſe two mightie princes minded nothing more than the one to indamage the other. But the king of England would not deferre one houre by (his good will) till he were reuenged, and therefore prepared a mightie armie to inuade Scotland, and ordeined for chéefteine thereof the lord Daubeneie. But as this armie was aſſembled, and that the lord Daubenie was forward on his iournie towards Scotland, he was ſuddenlie ſtaid and called backe againe, by reaſon of a new commotion begun by the Corniſhmen for the paiment of the ſubſidie which was granted at the laſt parlement.

The king of England and Scotlãd prepare for mutuall warre.

These vnrulie people the Corniſhmen, inhabiting in a barren countrie and vnfruitfull, at the firſt ſore repined that they ſhould be ſo gréeuouſlie taxed, and burdened the kings councell as the onelie cauſe of ſuch polling and pilling: and ſo being in their rage, menaced the chéefe authors with death and preſent deſtruction. And thus being in a rore, two perſons of the ſame affinitie, the one called Thomas Flammocke, a gentleman, learned in the lawes of the realme; and the other Michaell Ioſeph, a ſmith, men of ſtout ſtomachs and high courages, tooke vpon them to be capteins of this ſeditious companie. They laid the fault and cauſe of this exaction vnto Iohn Morton archbiſhop of Canturburie, and to ſir Reginald Braie; bicauſe they were chéefe of the kings councell. Such rewards haue they commonlie that be in great authoritie with kings and princes.

A rebellion in Cornewall for the paiment of a ſubſidie.

The two capteins in this commotion.

The capteins Flammocke and Ioſeph exhorted the common people to put on harneſſe, and not to be afeard to follow them in that quarrell, promiſing not to hurt anie creature, but onelie to ſée them puniſhed that procured ſuch exactions to be laid on the people, without anie reaſonable cauſe, as vnder the colour of a little trouble with the Scots, which (ſith they were withdrawne home) they tooke to be well quieted and appeaſed. So theſe capteins bent on miſchéefe, (were their outward pretenſe neuer ſo finelie coloured) perſuaded a great number of people to aſſemble togither, and condeſcended to doo as their capteins would agrée and appoint. Then theſe capteins praiſing much the hardines of the people, when all things were readie for their infortunate iournie, ſet forward with their armie, and came to Taunton, where they ſlue the prouoſt of Perin, which was one of the commiſſioners of the ſubſidie, and from thence came to Welles, ſo intending to go to London, where the king then ſoiourned.

The prouoſt of Perin ſlaine by the rebels.

When the king was aduertiſed of theſe dooings, he was ſomewhat aſtonied, and not without cauſe; being thus troubled with the warre againſt the Scots, and this ciuill commotion of his ſubiects at one inſtant. But firſt meaning to ſubdue his rebellious ſubiects; and after to procéed againſt the Scots, as occaſion ſhould ſerue, he reuoked the lord Daubenie which (as you haue heard) was going againſt the Scots, and increaſed his armie with manie choſen and piked warriors. Alſo miſtruſting that the Scots might now (hauing ſuch opportunitie) inuade the relme againe; he appointed the lord Th. Howard erle of Surrie (which after the death of the lord Dinham was made high treaſuror of England) to gather a band of men in the countie Palatine of Durham, that they with the aid of the inhabitants adioining, and the borderers, might keepe backe the Scots if they chanced to make anie inuaſion. The nobles of the realme hearing of the rebellion of the Corniſhmen, came to London, euerie man with as manie men of warre as they could put in a readineſſe, to aid the king if need ſhould be. In the which number were the earle of Eſſex, and the lord Montioy, with diuerſe other.

Iames Twichet lord Audelie cheefe capteine of the Corniſh rebels.

In the meane time, Iames Twichet lord Audeleie being confederate with the rebels of Cornewall ioined with them, being come to Welles, and tooke vpon him as their cheefe capteine to lead them againſt their naturall lord and king. From Welles they went to Saliſburie, and from thence to Wincheſter, and ſo to Kent, where they hoped to haue had great aid, but they were deceiued in that their expectation. For the erle of Kent, George lord of Aburgauenie, Iohn Brooke, lord Cobham, ſir Edward Poinings, ſir Richard Gilford, ſir Thomas Bourchier, Iohn Peche, William Scot, and a great number of of people, were not onelie preſt and readie to defend the countrie, to keepe the people in due obedience, but bent to fight with ſuch as would lift vp ſword, or other weapon againſt their ſoueraigne lord: inſomuch that the Kentiſhmen would not once come neere the Corniſhmen, to aid or aſſiſt them in anie maner of wiſe.

Manie of the Corniſhmen take their heels by night.

Which thing maruelouſlie diſmaid the hearts of the Corniſhmen, when they ſaw themſelues thus deceiued of the ſuccours which they moſt truſted vpon, ſo that manie of them (fearing the euill chance that might happen) fled in the night from their companie, and left them, in hope ſo to ſaue themſelues. The capteines of the rebels, perceiuing they could haue no helpe of the Kentiſhmen, putting their onelie hope in their owne puiſſance, brought their people to Blacke heath, a foure miles diſtant from London, and there in a plaine on the top of an hill, they ordered their battels, either readie to fight with the king if he would aſſaile them, or elſe to aſſault the citie of London: for they thought the king durſt not haue encountred with them in battell. But they were deceiued: for the king although he had power inough about to haue fought with them before their comming ſo neere to the citie; yet he thought it beſt to ſuffer them to come forward, till he had them farre off from their natiue countrie, and then to ſet vpon them being deſtitute of aid in ſome place of aduantage.

The citie of London ſore afraid of the rebels.

The citie was in a great feare at the firſt knowledge giuen, how the rebels were ſo neere incamped to the citie, euerie man getting himſelfe to harneſſe, and placing themſelues, ſome at the gates, ſome on the walles, ſo that no part was vndefended. But the king deliuered the citie of that feare: for after that he perceiued how the Corniſhmen were all daie readie to fight, and that on the hill; he ſent ſtraight Iohn Earle of Oxenford, Henrie Bourchier, earle of Eſſex, Edmund de la Poole, earle of Suffolke, ſir Riſe ap Thomas, and ſir Humfreie Stanleie, noble warriors, with a great companie of archers and horſſemen, to enuiron the hill on the right ſide, and on the left, to the intent that all bywaies being ſtopped and forecloſed, all hope of flight ſhould be taken from them. And incontinentlie he himſelfe, being as well incouraged with manlie ſtomachs as furniſhed with a populous armie and plentie of artillerie, ſet forward out of the citie, and incamped himſelfe in ſaint Georges field, where he on the fridaie at night then lodged.

On the ſaturdaie in the morning, he ſent the lord Daubeneie with a great companie to ſet on them earlie in the morning, which firſt got the bridge at Dertford Strand, which was manfullie defended by certeine archers of the rebels, whoſe arrowes (as is reported) were in length a full cloth yard. While the earles ſet on them on euerie ſide, the lord Daubenie came into the field with his companie, and without long fighting, the Corniſhmen were ouercome; and firſt they tooke the lord Daubenie priſoner: but whether it were for feare, or for hope of fauour, they let him go at libertie, without hurt or detriment. There were ſlaine of the rebels which fought and reſiſted, aboue two thouſand men (as Edward Hall noteth) and taken priſoners an infinite number, & amongſt them the blacke ſmith, and other the cheefe capteins, which were ſhortlie after put to death. When this battell was ended, the king wanted of all his numbers but three hundred, which were ſlaine at that conflict.

Blackheath field.

Three hundred ſlaine, & a thouſand fiue hundred taken priſoners, as Iohn Stow ſaith.

Some affirme, that the king appointed to haue fought with them not till the mondaie, and preuenting the time ſet on them on the ſaturdaie before, taking them vnprouided, and in no arraie of battell; and ſo by that policie obteined the field and victorie. The priſoners as well capteins as other, were pardoned, ſauing the cheefe capteins and firſt beginners, to whome he ſhewed no mercie at all. The lord Audeleie was drawne from Newgate to the Tower hill in a coate of his owne armes, painted vpon paper reuerſed and all to torne, and there was beheaded the foure and twentith of Iune. Thomas Flammocke & Michaell Ioſeph were hanged, drawne, and quartered after the maner of traitors, & their heads and quarters were pitched vpon ſtakes, and ſet vp in London, and in other places: although at the firſt, the king meant to haue ſent them into Cornewall, to haue béene ſet vp there for a terror to all others. But hearing that the Corniſhmen at home were readie to begin a new conſpiracie, leaſt he ſhould the more irritate and prouoke them by that diſpleaſant ſight, he changed his purpoſe, for doubt to wrap himſelfe in more trouble than needed.

Iames lord Audeleie ignominiouſlie drawne to execution and beheaded.

Anno Reg. 13.

The Scots inuade the Engliſh borders.

While theſe things were adoing in England, the king of Scots being aduertiſed of the whole matter and rebellion of the Corniſhmen, thought not to let paſſe that occaſion: and therefore he eftſoones inuaded the frontiers of England, waſting the countrie, burning townes, and murthering the people, ſparing neither place nor perſon: and while his light horſmen were riding to forraie and deſtroie the biſhoprike of Durham, and there burned all about, he with an other part of his armie did beſiege the caſtell of Norham. The biſhop of Durham Richard Fox, being owner of that caſtell, had well furniſhed it both with men and munitions aforehand, doubting leaſt that would follow which came now to paſſe. The biſhop, after that the Scots made this inuaſion, aduertiſed the king (as then being at London) of all things that chanced in the North parts; and ſent in all poſt haſt to the earle of Surrie, to come to the reſcue. The earle being then in Yorkeſhire, and hauing gathered an armie, vpon knowledge giuen to him from the biſhop, with all diligence marched forward, and after him followed other noble men out of all the quarters of the North, euerie of them bringing as manie men as they could gather, for defenſe of their countrie.

Fox biſhop of Durham owner of Norham caſtell.

What lords & knights with their companies went to the reſcue of the caſtell againſt the Scots.

Amongſt theſe, the cheefe leaders were, Raſe earle of Weſtmerland, Thomas lord Dacres, Raſe lord Neuill, George lord Strange, Richard lord Latimer, George lord Lumleie, Iohn lord Scroope, Henrie lord Clifford, George lord Ogle, William lord Coniers, Thomas lord Darcie. Of knights, Thomas baron of Hilton, ſir William Perſie, ſir William Bulmer, ſir William Gaſcoigne, ſir Raſe Bigod,

ſir

Raſe Bowes, ſir Thomas a Parre, ſir Raſe Ellecker, ſir John Conſtable, ſir John Ratcliffe, ſir John Sauill, ſir Thomas Strangweis, and a great number of other knights and eſquiers beſides. The whole armie was little leſſe than twentie thouſand men, beſide the nauie, whereof the lord Brooke was admerall.

When the Scots had diuerſe waies aſſaulted and beaten the caſtell of Norham, but could make no batterie to enter the ſame, they determined of their owne accord to raiſe the ſiege, and returne; and that ſo much the ſooner in verie déed, bicauſe they heard that the earle of Surrie was within two daies iournie of them, with a great puiſſance. Wherefore king James raiſed his ſiege, and returned home into his owne realme. When the earle knew of the kings returne, he followed him with all haſt poſſible, truſting ſuerlie to ouertake him, and to giue him battell. When the earle was entred Scotland, he ouerthrew and defaced the caſtell of Cawdcſtreimes, the tower of Hetenhall, the tower of Edington, the tower of Fulden: and he ſent Norreie king at armes to the capteine of Haiton caſtell, which was one of the ſtrongeſt places betwixt Berwike and Edenburgh, to deliuer him the caſtell. Which he denied to doo, affirming that he was ſure of ſpéedie ſuccours.

The earle of Surrie entreth Scotland defacing caſtels and towers.

The earle héerevpon laid his ordinance to the caſtell, and continuallie beat it, from two of the clocke till fiue at night, in ſuch wiſe, that they within rendered vp the place, their liues onelie ſaued. The earle cauſed his minors to raſe & ouerthrow the fortreſſe to the plaine ground. The Scotiſh king was within a mile of the ſiege, and both knew it, and ſaw the ſmoke, but would not ſet one foot forward to the reſcue. While the erle laie at Haiton, the king of Scots ſent to him Machemont, and an other herald, deſiring him at his election, either to fight with whole puiſſance againſt puiſſance, or elſe they two to fight perſon to perſon; requiring that if the victorie fell to the Scotiſh king, that then the earle ſhould deliuer for his ranſome, the towne of Berwike, with the fiſhgarths of the ſame.

The valiant hart of the erle of Surrie reioiſing at his hap likelie to fight hand to hand with the K. of Scots.

The earle made anſwer hereto, that the towne of Berwike was the king his maiſters, and not his, the which he neither ought nor would laie to pledge, without the king of Englands aſſent; but he would gage his bodie, which was more pretious to him than all the townes of the world, promiſing on his honour, that if he tooke the king priſoner in that ſingular combat, he would releaſe to him all his part of the fine and ranſome; and if it chanced the king to vanquiſh him, he would gladlie paie ſuch ranſome as was conuenient for the degrée of an earle, and thanked him greatlie for the offer: for ſuerlie he thought himſelfe much honored, that ſo noble a prince would vouchſafe to admit ſo poore an earle to fight with him bodie to bodie. When he had rewarded and diſmiſſed the heralds, he ſet his armie in a readineſſe, to abide the comming of the king of Scots, and ſo ſtood all daie.

But king James not regarding his offers, would neither performe the one nor the other; fearing to cope with the Engliſh nation in anie condition; and ſo therevpon fled in the night ſeaſon with all his puiſſance. When the earle knew that the king was reculed, and had béene in Scotland ſix or ſeuen daies, being dailie and nightlie vexed with continuall wind and raine, vpon good and deliberate aduiſe returned backe to the towne of Berwike, and there diſſolued his armie, tarieng there himſelfe, till he might vnderſtand further of the kings pleaſure. In the meane time there came an ambaſſadour to the K. of Scots from the K. of Spaine, one Peter Hialas, a man of no leſſe learning than wit & policie, to mooue & intret a peace betwéene the two kings of England & Scotland [that their people might fall to their neceſſarie trades of aduantage with quietneſſe, and friend with friend, huſband with wife, father with children, and maiſters with ſeruants dwell and accompanie: a diſſolution and ſeparation of whome one from another is procured by bloudie warre, wherein as there is no pitie, ſo is there is no pietie, as one ſaith full trulie:

An ambaſſadour from the K. of Spaine to treat a peace betwixt England and Scotland.

Nulla fides pietáſque viris qui caſtra ſequuntur,
Nulla ſalus bello.]

Luc. lib. 10.

This Spaniſh ambaſſadour ſo earneſtlie trauelled in his meſſage vnto the king of Scots, that at length he found him conformable to his purpoſe: and therefore wrote to the king of England, that it would pleaſe him to ſend one of his nobilitie or councell, to be aſſociat with him in concluding of peace with the Scotiſh king. The king of England was neuer dangerous to agrée to anie reaſonable peace, ſo it might ſtand with his honour; and therefore appointed the biſhop of Durham doctor Fox, to go into Scotland about that treatie which Peter Hialas had begun. The biſhop (according to his commiſſion) went honorablie into Scotland, where he and Peter Hialas at the towne of Jedworth, after long arguing and debating of matters with the Scotiſh commiſſioners, in ſtéed of peace concluded a truce for certeine yeares; vpon condition, that James king of Scots ſhould conueie Perkin Warbecke out of his realme, ſeigniories, and dominions.

About the ſame time, king Henrie receiued the ambaſſadors that were ſent to him from the French king, and had béene ſtaied at Douer, till the Corniſh rebels were vanquiſhed and ſubdued. Alſo the lord of Camphire, and other oratours of Philip archduke of Auſtrich, and duke of Burgognie came to him for the concluſion of amitie, and to haue the Engliſh merchants to reſort againe to their countrie. Which requeſt being verie agréeable to the quietneſſe and wealth of his realme, and eſpeciallie at that time, he did fauourablie grant and agrée vnto. And ſo did the Engliſhmen reſort againe into the archdukes dominions, and were receiued into Antwerpe with generall proceſſion: ſo glad was that towne of their returne. Shortlie after the concluding of the truce betwéene England and Scotland, Perkin Warbecke being willed of the king of Scots to depart out of the Scotiſh dominions, failed with his wife and familie into Ireland, there determining with himſelfe either to repaire into Flanders to his firſt ſetter vp the duches of Burgognie, or elſe ioine and take part with the Corniſhmen.

The Engliſh merchants receiued into Antwerpe with generall proceſſion.

Perkin is faine to pack & out of Scotland.

But howſoeuer it came to paſſe, whileſt he laie in Ireland, he had knowledge from the Corniſhmen, that they were readie to renew the warre againe. Wherevpon he minding not to let paſſe ſo faire an occaſion, hauing with him foure ſmall ſhips, and not aboue ſix ſcore men, ſailed into Cornewall; and there landed in the moneth of September, and came to a towne called Bodman, and there did ſo prouoke the wauering people, what with faire words and large promiſes, that he gathered to him aboue thrée thouſand perſons, which immediatlie called him their capteine, promiſing to take his part, and follow him to the death. Then Perkin well incouraged, made proclamations in the name of king Richard the fourth, as ſonne to king Edward the fourth. And by the aduiſe of his thrée councellors, John Heron mercer a bankrupt, Richard Skelton a tailor, and John Aſtelie a ſcriuener determined firſt of all to aſſaie the winning of Exceſter.

Perkin Warbeck arriueth in Cornwall.

Another rebellion by the Corniſhmen.

Perkins thrée councellors.

Then haſting thither, he laid ſiege to it, and wanting ordinance to make batterie, ſtudied all waies poſſible how to breake the gates, and what with caſting of ſtones, heauing with iron barres, and kindling of fire vnder the gates, he omitted nothing that could be deuiſed for the furtherance of his purpoſe. The citizens, perceiuing in what danger they ſtood, firſt let certeine meſſengers downe by cords ouer the wall, that might certifie the king of their neceſſitie & trouble. And herewith taking vnto them boldneſſe of courage, determined to repell fire with fire, and cauſed fagots to be brought and laid to the inward parts of the gates, and ſet them all on fire; to the intent that the fire being inflamed on both ſides the gates, might as well keepe out their enimies from entring, as ſhut in the citizens from fleeing out, and that they in the meane ſeaſon might make trenches and rampires to defend their enimies in ſteed of gates and bulworks. Thus by fire was the citie preſerued from fire.

The citie of Exceſter preſerued from fire by fire.

Then Perkin of verie neceſſitie compelled to forſake the gates, aſſaulted the towne in diuerſe weake and vnfortified places, and ſet vp ladders to take the citie. But the citizens, with helpe of ſuch as were come forth of the countrie adioining to their aid, ſo valiantlie defended the walles, that they ſlue aboue two hundred of Perkins ſouldiers at that aſſault. The king hauing aduertiſement of this ſiege of Exceſter, haſted forth with his hoſt, in as much ſpeed as was poſſible, and ſent the lord Daubeneie with certeine bands of light horſſemen before, to aduertiſe all men of his comming at hand. But in the meane ſeaſon, the lord Edward Courtneie earle of Deuonſhire, and the valiant lord William his ſonne, accompanied with ſir Edmund Carew, ſir Thomas Trenchard, ſir William Courtneie, ſir Thomas Fulford, ſir John Halewell, ſir John Croker, Water Courtnie, Peter Edgecombe, William ſaint Maure, with all ſpeed came into the citie of Exceſter, and holpe the citizens, and at the laſt aſſault was the earle hurt in the arme with an arrow, and ſo were manie of his companie but verie few ſlaine.

The king maketh out his power againſt Perkin.

When Perkin ſaw that he could not win the citie of Exceſter, ſith he ſawe it was ſo well fortified both with men and munitions, he departed from thence, and went vnto Taunton, and there the twentith day of September he muſtered his men; as though he were readie to giue battell: but perceiuing his number to be miniſhed, by the ſecret withdrawing of ſundrie companies from him, he began to put miſtruſt in all the remnant. In deed when the people that followed him, in hope that no ſmall number of the nobilitie would ioine with him, ſaw no ſuch matter come to paſſe, they ſtale awaie from him by ſecret companies. When the king heard that he was gone to Taunton, he followed after him with all ſpeed. And by the way there came to him Edward duke of Buckingham, a yoong prince of great towardneſſe; and him followed a great companie of noble men, knights and eſquiers, as ſir Alexander Bainam, ſir Maurice Barkleie, ſir Robert Tame, ſir John Guiſe, ſir Robert Pointz, ſir Henrie Vernon, ſir John Mortimer, ſir Thomas Tremaile, ſir Edward Sutton, ſir Amiſe Paulet, ſir John Birkneill, ſir John Sapcotes, ſir Hugh Lutterell, ſir Francis Cheineie, and diuerſe other.

Edward the yoong duke of Buckingham and his companie ioine with the king.

At the kings approching to the towne of Taunton, he ſent before him Robert lord Brooke lord ſteward of his houſe, Giles lord Daubeneie his chiefe chamberleine, and ſir Rice ap Thomas. But as ſoone as Perkin was informed that his enimies were readie to giue him battell, he that nothing leſſe minded than to fight in open field with the kings puiſſance, diſſembled all the daie time with his companie, as though nothing could make him afraid: and about midnight, accompanied with three ſcore horſſemen, he departed from Taunton in poſt to a ſanctuarie towne beſide Southampton, called Beaudlie, & there he and John Heron with other regiſtred themſelues as perſons priuileged. When as king Henrie knew that Perkin was thus fled, he ſent after him the lord Daubeneie with fiue hundred horſſemen toward the ſea ſide, to apprehend him before he ſhould get away. Although Perkin eſcaped (as I haue ſaid) vnto ſanctuarie, yet manie of his chiefe capteins were taken and preſented to the king.

Perkin fleeth and taketh Beaudlie ſanctuarie.

Alſo the horſſemen that were ſent, without anie ſtop or ſtaie came to ſaint Michaels mount, and there (as chance was) found the ladie Katharine Gordon wife to Perkin, and brought hir ſtreight to the king. At whoſe beautie and amiable countenance the king much maruelled, and thought hir a preie more meet for a prince, than for the meane ſouldiers, and ſent hir incontinentlie vnto London to the queene, accompanied with a ſort of ſage matrones and gentlewomen, bicauſe ſhe was but yoong. The common people that had followed Perkin, after that their cheefeteine was fled, threw awaie their armour as people amazed, and ſubmitted themſelues to the king, humblie beſeeching him of mercie, which he moſt gentlie granted, and receiued them to his fauour. After this the king road to Exceſter, and there not onelie commended the citizens, but alſo hartilie thanked them for dooing ſo well their duties in defending their citie from their enimies. He alſo put there to execution diuerſe Corniſhmen, which were the authors and principall beginners of this new conſpiracie and inſurrection. Neuertheleſſe, he vſed maruellous clemencie alſo in pardoning a great number of the rebels.

The beautifull ladie Katharine (Perkins wife) preſented to the king.

¶ For when king Henrie was come to Exceſter with a great armie, mooued thereunto (as you haue heard) by reaſon of the rebellion of Perkin Warbecke, who was fled before the kings comming, he ſtaied a few daies about the examination of the ſaid rebellion, and the executing of the chiefe and principall capteins. In the end, the multitude of the offendors being great, and moſt humblie crauing for pardon, the king cauſed them all to be aſſembled in the churchyard of ſaint Peters, where they all appeared bare headed, in their ſhirts, and with halters about their necks. His grace was then lodged in the treaſurors houſe, lieng faſt vpon the churchyard, and out of a faire and large window (made for the purpoſe) he tooke the view of them, who ſhouted and cried out for pardon. At length, when the king had pauſed, hee made a ſpeach vnto them, exhorting them to obedience, and in hope he ſhould thenceforth find them dutifull, he pardoned them all: whereat they all made a great ſhout, gaue the king thanks, and hurled awaie their halters. Yet neuertheleſſe, ſome returned againe, and ioined themſelues with the Corniſh people, which had not all ſubmitted themſelues, nor ſought for pardon.]

John Hooker, alias Vowell.

All Perkins partakers in their ſhirts with halters about their necks appeare before the king.

Now while he remained at Exceſter, he conſidered with himſelfe, that he had doone nothing, if he could not get into his hands the chiefe head of this trouble and ſeditious buſineſſe. Wherefore he cauſed the ſanctuarie wherein Perkin was incloſed, to be inuironed with two bands of light horſſemen, to watch diligentlie, that Perkin ſhould not eſcape by anie meanes forth of that place vntaken: and withall attempted by faire promiſes of pardon and forgiuenes, if Perkin would ſubmit himſelfe to him and become his man. Perkin perceiuing himſelfe ſo ſhut vp, that he could no waie eſcape, of his owne free will came out of the ſanctuarie, and committed himſelfe to the kings pleaſure. When the king had thus atchiued his purpoſe, he returned to London, and appointed certeine keepers to attend on Perkin, which ſhould not (the bredth of a naile) go from his perſon; leaſt he ſhould conueie himſelfe by anie meanes out of

After this, the king cauſed inquiries to be made, of all ſuch as had aided with men or monie the Corniſh rebels, ſo that diuerſe perſons as well in Summerſetſhire as Deuonſhire were detected of that offenſe, which he minded for example ſake ſhould taſt ſome part of due puniſhments for their crimes, according to the qualitie thereof. And therefore he appointed Thomas lord Darcie, Amiſe Paulet knight, and Robert Sherborne deane of Poules (that was after biſhop of Chicheſter) to be commiſſioners for aſſeſſing of their fines that were found culpable. Theſe commiſſioners ſo beſtirred themſelues, in toſſing the coffers and ſubſtance of all the inhabitants of both thoſe ſhires, that there was not one perſon imbrued or ſpotted with the filth of that abhominable crime, that eſcaped the paine which he had deſerued: but to ſuch yet as offended rather by conſtreint than of malice, they were gentle and fauourable, ſo that equitie therein was verie well and iuſtlie executed.

Gardens in More field laid waſt to make archers game.

Price of haie doubled.

Sebaſtian Gabato his diſcouerie of an Iland of rich commodities.

¶In this yeare all the gardens which had béene continued time out of mind, without More gate of London, were deſtroied, and of them was made a plaine field for archers to ſhoot in. Alſo this yéere was a great drought, by reaſon whereof a load of haie, which was before ſold at London at fiue ſhillings, was this yeare ſold for ten or twelue more. Alſo this yeare, one Sebaſtian Gabato, a Genoas ſonne, borne in Briſtow, profeſſing himſelfe to be expert in knowledge of the circuit of the world, and Ilands of the ſame, as by his charts and other reaſonable demonſtrations he ſhewed, cauſed the king to man and vittell a ſhip at Briſtow, to ſearch for an Iland which he knew to be repleniſhed with rich commodites. In the ſhip diuerſe merchants of London aduentured ſmall ſtocks, and in the companie of this ſhip ſailed alſo out of Briſtow thrée or foure ſmall ſhips fraight with ſlight and groſſe wares, as courſe cloath, caps, laſes, points, and ſuch other.

Sir Humfrie Gilbert knight, in his booke intituled, A diſcouerie for a new paſſage to Cataia, writeth thus; Sebaſtian Gabato, by his perſonall experience and trauell, hath deſcribed and ſet forth this paſſage in his charts, which are yet to be ſéene in the quéenes maieſties priuie gallerie at White hall, who was ſent to make this diſcouerie by king Henrie the ſeuenth, and entered the ſame fret, affirming that hée ſailed verie farre weſtward, with a quarter of the north, on the north ſide of terra de Labrador, the eleuenth of June, vntill he came to the ſeptentrionall latitude of 67½ degrées, and finding the ſeas ſtill open, ſaid, that he might & would haue gon to Cataia, if the enmitie of the maiſter and mariners had not béene. Neuertheleſſe, he went verie farre, euen to a nation inhabited with people more like beaſts than men, as appeareth in the yeare 1502, and the ſeuentéenth of this kings reigne, when the ſaid traueller was returned, and preſented himſelfe to the kings maieſtie.]

Anno Reg. 14.

England and Scotland like to go togither by the eares afreſh.

In this yeare the warre had like to haue béene reuiued betwixt the realmes of England and Scotland by a ſmall occaſion, as thus. Certeine yongmen of the Scots came arriued before Norham caſtell, & beheld it wonderous circumſpectlie, as though they would faine haue béene of counſell to know what was doone therein. The kéepers not perceiuing anie damage attempted againſt them for the firſt time, determined not to moue anie queſtion to them, or once to ſtirre out. But when they came againe the next day, and viewed it likewiſe, the kéepers of the caſtell ſuſpecting ſome euill meaning, demanded of them what their intent was, and why they viewed and aduiſed ſo the caſtell. The Scots anſwered them roughlie with diſdainfull words, ſo that the Engliſhmen fell to and replied with ſtrokes; and after manie blowes giuen and receiued, diuerſe Scots were wounded, and ſome ſlaine; and the reſidue ouermatched with multitude of the Engliſhmen, fled as faſt as their horſſes could carie them.

The Scotiſh king hereof aduertiſed, was highlie diſpleaſed, and in all haſt ſignified to king Henrie by his herald Marchemont, in what ſort his people (to the breach of the truce) were abuſed and handled. King Henrie being not in will to breake with anie of his neighbours, excuſed the matter, affirming that he was not of knowledge to the miſdemeanor of thoſe that had the caſtell in kéeping; requiring the king of Scots not to thinke the truce broken for anie thing doone without his conſent; promiſing in the word of a king to inquire of the truth, and if the offenſe were found to be begun on the partie of the kéepers of the caſtell, he aſſured him that they ſhould for no méed nor fauour eſcape due correction and puniſhment.

The biſhop of Durham aſſwageth the kings diſpleaſure by leters.

This anſwer (though it was more than reaſonable) could not pacifie the king of Scots, till the biſhop of Durham (that was owner of the caſtell of Norham) who ſore lamented, that by ſuch as he appointed kéepers there, the warre ſhould be renewed) with ſundrie letters written to the Scotiſh king, at length aſſwaged his diſpleaſure, ſo that the ſaid king wrote courteouſlie to the biſhop againe, ſignifieng that bicauſe he had manie ſecret things in his mind, which he would communicate onelie with him touching this matter now in variance; therefore he required him to take the paine to come into his countrie, truſting that he ſhould thinke his labor well beſtowed. The biſhop was glad, and ſent word hereof to the king his maſter, who willed him to accompliſh the deſire of the Scotiſh king, which he tooke to bée reaſonable.

The biſhop of Durham goeth into Scotland.

At his comming into Scotland, he was courteouſlie receiued of the king himſelfe at the abbeie of Melroſſe. And there, after the king had (for a countenance) complained much of the vniuſt ſlaughter of his men late committed at Norham: vpon the biſhops gentle anſwers thervnto, he forgaue the ſame, and after began to talke ſecretlie without witneſſes alone with the biſhop. And firſt he declared what iuſt cauſes moued him in times paſt to ſéeke amitie with the king of England: which now he deſired much more to haue confirmed, for further maintenance & increaſe thereof. Which he doubted not but ſhould ſort to a fortunate concluſion, if the king of England would vouchſafe to giue to him in matrimonie his firſt begotten daughter the ladie Margaret, vpon which point he purpoſed latelie to haue ſent his ambaſſadors into England, which thing he would the ſooner doo if he knew the biſhops mind therein to bée readie to further his ſute. The biſhop anſwered but few words, ſauing that when he were returned to the king his maiſter, he would doo the beſt in the matter that he could.

The Scotiſh king deſireth the ladie Margaret eldeſt daughter of K. Henrie the ſeuenth to be his wife.

When the biſhop was returned into England, and come to the king, he declared to him all the communication had betwéene king James and him, from point to point in order. The king liked well thereof, as he to whom peace was euer a ſouereigne ſolace and comfort. In this meane time Perkin Warbecke, diſappointed of all hope to eſcape out of the Engliſhmens hands (which was the onelie thing that he moſt deſired) found meanes yet at length to deceiue his keepers, & took him to his heels. But when he came to the ſea coaſts, and could not paſſe, he was in a maruellous perplexitie: for euerie byway, lane, and corner was laid for him, and ſuch ſearch made, that being brought to his wits end, and cut ſhort of his pretenſed iournie, he came to the houſe of Bethlem, called the priorie of Sheene beſide Richmond in Southerie, and betooke himſelfe to the prior of that monaſterie, requiring him for the honour of God, to beg his pardon of life of the kings maieſtie.

The prior, which for the opinion that men had conceiued of his vertue, was had in great eſtimation, pitieng the wretched ſtate of that caitife, came to the king, and ſhewed him of this Perkin, whoſe pardon he humblie craued, and had it as freelie granted. Incontinentlie after was Perkin brought to the court againe at Weſtminſter, and was one day ſet fettered in a paire of ſtocks, before the doore of Weſtminſter hall, and there ſtood a whole day, not without innumerable reproches, mocks and ſcornings. And the next daie he was caried through London, and ſet vpon a like ſcaffold in Cheape by the ſtandard, with like ginnes and ſtocks as he occupied the daie before, and there ſtood all daie, and read openlie his owne confeſſion, written with his owne hand, the verie copie whereof here inſueth.

Perkin maketh an anatomie of his deſcent or linage.

IT is firſt to be knowne, that I was borne in the towne of Turneie in Flanders, and my fathers name is Iohn Oſbecke, which ſaid Iohn Oſbecke was controllor of the ſaid towne of Turneie, and my moothers name is Katharine de Faro. And one of my grandſires vpon my fathers ſide was named Diricke Oſbeck, which died. After whoſe death my grandmoother was maried vnto Peter Flamin, that was receiuer of the forenamed towne of Turneie, & deane of the botemen that row vpon the water or riuer called le Scheld. And my grandſire vpon my moothers ſide was Peter de Faro, which had in his keeping the keies of the gate of S. Iohns within the ſame towne of Turneie. Alſo I had an vncle called maiſter Iohn Stalin, dwelling in the pariſh of S. Pias within the ſame towne, which had maried my fathers ſiſter, whoſe name was Ione or Iane, with whome I dwelt a certeine ſeaſon.

Perkins education or bringing vp.

And after I was led by my moother to Antwerpe for to learne Flemiſh, in a houſe of a couſine of mine, an officer of the ſaid towne, called Iohn Stienbecke, with whome I was the ſpace of halfe a yeare. And after that I returned againe to Turneie, by reaſon of warres that were in Flanders. And within a yeare following I was ſent with a merchant of the ſaid towne of Turneie, named Berlo, to the mart of Antwerpe, where I fell ſicke, which ſickeneſſe continued vpon me fiue moneths. And the ſaid Berlo ſet me to boord in a ſkinners houſe, that dwelled beſide the houſe of the Engliſh nation. And by him I was from thenſe caried to Barow mart, and I lodged at the ſigne of the old man, where I abode for the ſpace of two moneths.

After this, the ſaid Berlo ſet me with a merchant of Middleborow to ſeruice for to learne the language, whoſe name was Iohn Strew, with whome I dwelt from Chriſtmaſſe to Eaſter, and then I went into Portingall in companie of ſir Edward Bramptons wife, in a ſhip which was called the queens ſhip. And when I was come thither, then was I put in ſeruice to a knight that dwelled in Luſhborne, which was called Peter Vacz de Cogna, with whome I dwelled an whole yeare, which ſaid knight had but one eie. And bicauſe I deſired to ſee other countries, I tooke licence of him, and then I put my ſelfe in ſeruice with a Britan, called Pregent Meno, which brought me with him into Ireland. Now when we were there arriued in the towne of Corke, they of the towne (bicauſe I was arraied with ſome cloths of ſilke of my ſaid maiſters) came vnto me, & threatned vpon me that I ſhould be the duke of Clarences ſonne, that was before time at Dublin.

Perkin a notable landloper.

But forſomuch as I denied it, there was brought vnto me the holie euangeliſts, and the croſſe, by the maior of the towne, which was called Iohn Leweline, and there in the preſence of him and others, I tooke mine oth (as the truth was) that I was not the foreſaid dukes ſonne, nor none of his bloud. And after this came vnto me an Engliſhman, whoſe name was Stephan Poitron, and one Iohn Water, and ſaid to me in ſwearing great oths, that they knew well that I was king Richards baſtard ſonne: to whome I anſwered with like oths, that I was not. Then they aduiſed me not to be afeard, but that I ſhould take it vpon me boldlie: and if I would ſo doo, they would aid and aſſiſt me with all their power againſt the king of England; & not onelie they, but they were well aſſured, that the earle of Deſmond & Kildare ſhould doo the ſame.

The Iriſh would haue Perkin take vpon him to be the duke of Clarences ſonne.

They beare Perkin downe with oths that he is king Richards baſtard.

For they forced not what part they tooke, ſo that they might be reuenged on the king of England: and ſo againſt my will made me to learne Engliſh, and taught me what I ſhould doo and ſaie. And after this they called me duke of Yorke, ſecond ſonne to king Edward the fourth, bicauſe king Richards baſtard ſonne was in the hands of the king of England. And vpon this the ſaid Water, Stephan Poitron, Iohn Tiler, Hughbert Burgh, with manie others, as the foreſaid earles, entered into this falſe quarell, and within ſhort time others. The French K. ſent an ambaſſador into Ireland, whoſe name was Loit Lucas, and maiſter Stephan Friham, to aduertiſe me to come into France. And thenſe I went into France, and from thenſe into Flanders, & from Flanders into Ireland, and from Ireland into Scotland, & ſo into England.

They call him duke of Yorke.

Then

When the night of the ſame daie (being the fiftéenth of June) was come, after he had ſtood all that daie in the face of the citie, he was committed to the Tower, there to remaine vnder ſafe kéeping, leaſt happilie he might eftſoones run awaie, and eſcape out of the land, to put the king and realme to ſome new trouble. For he had a wonderfull dexteritie and readineſſe to circumuent, a heart full of ouerreaching imaginations, an aſpiring mind, a head more wilie (I wiſſe) than wittie; bold he was and preſumptuous in his behauiour, as forward to be the inſtrument of a miſchéefe, as anie deuiſer of wickedneſſe would wiſh; a féend of the diuels owne forging, nurſed and trained vp in the ſtudie of commotions, making offer to reach as high as he could looke; ſuch was his inordinate ambition, wherewith he did ſwell as coueting to be a princes péere: much like the tode that would match the bull in drinking, but in the end ſhe burſt in péeces and neuer dranke more; as the poet telleth the tale (by the imitation of the fabler) ſaieng:

Anno Reg. 15. Patrike an Auguſtine frier.

In this yeare was an Auguſtine frier called Patrike in the parties of Suffolke, the which hauing a ſcholer named Rafe Wilford (a ſhoomakers ſonne of London as Stow noteth) had ſo framed him to his purpoſe, that in hope to worke ſome great enterpriſe, as to diſappoint the king of his crowne and ſeat roiall, tooke vpon him to be the earle of Warwike, inſomuch that both the maiſter and ſcholer hauing counſelled betwéene themſelues of their enterpriſe, they went into Kent, & there began the yoong mawmet to tell priuilie to manie, that he was the verie earle of Warwike, and latelie gotten out of the Tower, by the helpe of this frier Patrike. To which ſaiengs when the frier perceiued ſome light credence to be giuen, he declared it openlie in the pulpit, and deſired all men of helpe. But the danger of this ſeditious attempt was ſhortlie remooued and taken awaie, the maiſter and ſcholer being both apprehended and caſt into priſon and atteinted.

Rafe wilford the counterfeit earle of warwike.

The counterfeit earle is executed.

The ſcholer was hanged on Shroouetueſdaie at ſaint Thomas Waterings, and the frier condemned to perpetuall priſon. For at that time ſo much reuerence was attributed to the holie orders, that to a préeſt (although he had committed high treaſon againſt his ſoueraigne lord) his life was ſpared, in like caſe as to anie other offendor in murther, rape, or theft, that had receiued anie of the thrée higher holie orders. [The chéefe cauſe (ſaith Edward Hall) of this fauour was this, bicauſe biſhops of a long time and ſeaſon did not take knowledge, nor intermix themſelues with the ſearch & puniſhment of ſuch heinous and deteſtable offenſes: by reaſon whereof they did not diſgrade and depriue from the holie orders ſuch malefactors and wicked perſons, which without that ceremonie by the canon lawes could not be put to death.

Abr. Fl. ex Edw. Hall. in Hen.7.fol lj. The cauſe why the clergie neuer ſo heinouſlie offending was ſo fauoured.

Furthermore, what ſhould a man ſaie, it was alſo vſed, that he that could but onelie read (yea although he vnderſtood not what he read) how heinous or deteſtable a crime ſo euer he had committed (treaſon onelie excepted) ſhould likewiſe as affines & alies to the holie orders be ſaued, and committed to the biſhops priſon. And to the intent that if they ſhould eſcape, and be againe taken, committing like offenſe, that their liues be no more to them pardoned: it was ordeined that murtherers ſhould be burnt on the brawne of the left hand with an hot iron ſigned with this letter M. and théeues in the ſame place with this letter T. So that if they, which were once ſigned with anie of theſe marks or tokens did reiterate like crime & offenſe againe, ſhould ſuffer the paines and puniſhments which they had both merited and deſerued. Which decrée was enacted and eſtabliſhed in a ſeſſion of parlement kept in the time of this kings reigne, and taken (as I coniecture) of the French nation, which are wont, if they take anie ſuch offendor, to cut off one of his eares, as a ſure token and marke hereafter of his euill dooing.]

Burning in the hand when enacted.

Perkin corrupted his kéepers.

Perkin Warbecke (as before ye haue heard) being now in hold, by falſe perſuaſions and great promiſes corrupted his kéepers, Stranguiſh, Blewet, Aſtwood, and long Roger, ſeruants to ſir John Digbie lieutenant of the Tower. Inſomuch that they (as it was at their arreignment openlie prooued) intended to haue ſlaine their maiſter, and to haue ſet Perkin and the earle of Warwike at large. Which earle of Warwike had béene kept in priſon within the Tower almoſt from his tender yeares, that is to ſaie, from the firſt yeare of the king, to this fiftéenth yeare, out of all companie of men & ſight of beaſts, inſomuch that he could not diſcerne a gooſe from a capon, and therefore by common reaſon and open apparance could not of himſelfe ſéeke his owne death and deſtruction. But yet by the drift and offenſe of an other he was brought to his death and confuſion.

Edward Plantagenet earle of Warwike a verie innocent.

For being made priuie of this enterpriſe deuiſed by Perkin and his complices, therevnto (as all naturall creatures loue libertie) he aſſented and agréed. But this craftie deuiſe and ſubtill imagination being reuealed, ſorted to none effect, ſo that Perkin and John Awater ſometime maior of Corke in Ireland, one of his chéefe founders, and his ſonne, were on the ſixtéenth daie of Nouember arreigned and condemned at Weſtminſter. And on the thrée and twentith daie of the ſame moneth, Perkin and John Awater were drawne to Tiburne, where Perkin ſtanding on a little ſcaffold, read his confeſſion (as before he had doone in Cheape ſide) taking it on his death to be true. And ſo he and John Awater aſked the king forgiueneſſe, and died patientlie.

Perkin and John Awater executed at Tiburne.

This was the reward of the feined gloſe and counterfeit comment of Perkin Warbecke, the which as by his falſe ſurmiſes in his life time had brought manie honourable perſonages to their deaths, and vndoone manie an honeſt man: ſo now at his death he brought other of the ſame ſort to their not altogither vndeſerued puniſhment. And amongeſt others Edward Plantagenet the forenamed erle of Warwike, which (as the fame went) conſented to breake priſon, and to depart out of the realme with Perkin (which in priſoners is high treaſon) was the one and twentith daie of the ſaid moneth arreigned at Weſtminſter before the earle of Oxenford then high ſteward of England of the ſaid treaſon, which (whether it were by intiſement and perſuaſion of other, or of his owne frée will manie doubted, bicauſe of his innocencie) confeſſed the fact, and ſubmitted himſelfe to the kings mercie; and vpon his confeſſion had his iudgement, and according therevnto the eight and twentith daie of Nouember in the yeare 1499, was brought to the ſcaffold on the Tower hill, and there beheaded.

Edward Plantagenet the yoong earle of warwike beheaded.

The fame after his death ſprang abroad, that Ferdinando king of Spaine would make no full concluſion of the matrimonie to be had betwéene prince Arthur and the ladie Katharine daughter to the ſaid Ferdinando, nor ſend hir into England as long as this earle liued. For he imagined that ſo long as anie earle of Warwike liued, England ſhould neuer be purged of ciuill warre and priuie ſedition; ſo much was the name of Warwike in other regions had in feare and gealouſie. The next yeare after there was a great plague, whereof men died in manie places verie ſore; but ſpeciallie and moſt of all in the citie of London, where died in that yeare thirtie thouſand. The king, whether to auoid the danger of ſo great and perilous ſickeneſſe, then raging, or to take occaſion to commen with the duke of Burgognie, did perſonallie take his ſhip at Douer in the beginning of Maie, and ſailed to Calis, whither the duke of Burgognie ſent to him honourable perſonages in ambaſſage to welcome him into thoſe parties, and to declare that the ſaid duke would gladlie repaire perſonallie to his preſence with ſuch a number as the king ſhould appoint, ſo that it were within no walled towne nor fortreſſe. For hauing denied the French king to enter into anie of his fortreſſes to talke with him, he would be loth now to giue a preſident to him to deſire the like méeting. The king interteining the ambaſſadours, and thanking the duke of his courteous offer, appointed the place at ſaint Peters church without Calis.

Vpon tueſdaie in Whitſunwéeke the archduke Philip came thither with a conuenient companie. The king and the quéene with manie a luſtie lord and ladie rode thither to welcome him. [And when the king approched, the duke at his lighting offered to hold his ſtirrupe, which the king in no wiſe would ſuffer to be doone. When the king was deſcended from his horſſe, he and the archduke imbraced each other with moſt princelie familiaritie, and then the quéene and all the nobls ſaluted him.] And after moſt louing interteinments, bankettings, mirth, and paſtime ſhewed amongeſt them, there was communication of marriages, treating of further ſtrengthening of leagues, requeſts of tolles in Flanders to be miniſhed: with manie other things touching the commoditie and traffike of both their countries. And when all things were ſet in order, the two princes tooke their leaue, and departed; the king to Calis, and the archduke to S. Omers. After his departing, there came as ambaſſadors from the French king, the lord Gronthouſe gouernour of Picardie, and the lord Meruelliers bailiffe of Amiens, which declared to the king the getting of Millaine and taking of the duke. The king highlie feaſted them, and rewarded them princelie at their departing.

Anno Reg. 16.

Soone after, when the death was ſlaked, the king returned againe into England about the end of Iune. Shortlie after there came to him one Gaſper Pons a Spaniard, a man of excellent learning and moſt ciuill behauiour, ſent from Alexander the biſhop of Rome to diſtribute the heauenlie grace (as he termed it) to all ſuch as (letted by anie forceable impediment) could not come to Rome that yeare to the Iubile, which was there celebrate, being the yeare after the birth of our Sauiour, 1500. This beneuolent liberalitie was not altogither fréelie giuen. For Alexander looking to the health of mens ſoules, thought to doo ſomewhat for his owne priuat commoditie, & therefore he ſet a certeine price of that his grace and pardon. And to the end that the king ſhould not hinder his purpoſe, he offered part of his gaines to the king.

A yeare of Iubile.

Pope Alexander maketh profit of his great pardon or heauenlie grace, as he termeth it.

And to colour the matter with ſome fauourable pretext, and to make men the better willing, & more readie to giue franklie, he promiſed with that monie to make warre againſt the Turke. By this meanes the pope got a great maſſe of monie, which he had conueied ouer vnto him by ſuch truſtie meſſengers (doubt you not) as he had appointed; and yet nothing doone againſt the Turks, which in the meane ſeaſon did much hurt to the chriſtians. [For it was no part of his meaning (what colourable ſhew ſoeuer he made of tendering the ſuccourleſſe people) to impart anie portion thereof to ſo good a vſe; but rather for the ſupportation of him and his ſwarme, who before they will bate an ace of their gorgeous gallantneſſe, the whole world ſhalbe couſened. Such is the colluſion of the pope, ſuch be the ſhameleſſe ſhifts of him and his cleargie for the maintenance of their owne courtlie brauerie, which is wicked vanitie; farre paſſing the pompe of anie prince, were the ſame of neuer ſo rare magnificence; as he well noteth that ſaid full trulie:

About this time died thrée biſhops in England, Iohn Morton archbiſhop of Canturburie, Thomas Langton biſhop of Wincheſter, and Thomas Rotheram archbiſhop of Yorke. After him ſuccéeded Thomas Sauage biſhop of London, a man of great honour and worthineſſe: in whoſe place ſuccéeded William Warham, of whome before is made mention. And Henrie Deane biſhop of Saliſburie, was made archbiſhop of Canturburie, and Richard Fox was remooued from Durham to the ſée of Wincheſter. Alſo this yeare two notable mariages were concluded, but not conſummate till afterwards, as you ſhall heare in place conuenient. For king Henrie granted his daughter ladie Margaret to Iames the fourth king of Scots. And Ferdinando king of Spaine gaue his daughter ladie Katharine to Arthur prince of Wales, ſonne and heire apparant to the king of England.

Thrée biſhops dead in one yeare.

Two notable mariages.

Katharine daughter to Ferdinando K. of Spaine affied to Arthur prince of wales.

Among other articles of the mariage concluded with the Scotiſh king this was one, that no Engliſhmen ſhould be receiued into Scotland without letters commendatorie of their ſoueraigne lord, or ſafe conduct of his warden of the marches; and the ſame prohibition was in like maner giuen to the Scots. This yeare the ladie Katharine of Spaine was ſent by hir father king Ferdinando with a puiſſant nauie of ſhips into England, where ſhe arriued in the hauen of Plinmouth the ſecond daie of October then being ſaturdaie. Vpon the twelfe of Nouember ſhe was conueied from Lambeth through London with all triumph and honour that might be deuiſed to the biſhops palace, the ſtréets being hanged, and pageants erected after the maner as is vſed at a coronation: which ſolemnitie Edward Hall deſcribeth with the ſumptuous ſhewes then gliſtering in the beholders eies.

Anno Reg. 17.

The fourth of October as Stow hath noted.

¶ I paſſe ouer (ſaith he) the wiſe deuiſes, the prudent ſpéeches, the coſtlie works, the cunning portratures, practiſed and ſet forth in ſeuen goodlie beautifull pageants, erected and ſet vp in diuerſe places of the citie. I leaue alſo the goodlie ballades, the ſwéet harmonie, the muſicall inſtruments, which ſounded with heauenlie noiſe on euerie ſide of the ſtréets. I omit further, the coſtlie apparell both of goldſmiths worke and imbroderie, the rich iewels, the maſſie chaines, the ſtirring horſſes, the beautifull bards and the glittering trappers, both with belles and ſpangels of gold. I pretermit alſo the rich apparell of the princeſſe, the ſtrange faſhion of the Spaniſh nation, the beautie of the Engliſh ladies, the goodlie demeanure of the yong damoſels, the amorous countenance of the luſtie bachelers. I paſſe ouer alſo the fine ingrained clothes, the coſtlie furs of the citizens, ſtanding on ſcaffolds, raiſed from Gracechurch to Paules. What ſhould I ſpeake of the odoriferous ſcarlets, the fine veluets, the pleaſant furres, the maſſie chaines, which the maior of London with the ſenat, ſitting on horſſebacke at the little conduit in Cheape, ware on their bodies and about their necks? I will not ſpeake of the rich arras, the coſtlie tapeſtrie, the fine clothes both of gold and ſiluer, the curious veluets, the beautifull ſattens, nor the pleaſant ſilkes which did hang in euerie ſtréet where ſhe paſſed, the wine that ran continuallie out of the conduits, and the graueling of the ſtréets néedeth not to be remembred.]

Whileſt this ladie ſoiourned for hir recreation in the biſhops palace of London, being in the meane time viſited of the king, the quéene, and the kings mother, there was erected in the bodie of S. Paules church a long bridge made of timber, extending from the weſt doore of the church to the ſtep at the entring into the quéere, which was ſix foot from the ground. On the ſaid bridge or ſtage, euen directlie before the conſiſtorie of the church, was a place raiſed like a mount for eight perſons to ſtand vpon, compaſſed round about with ſteps to aſcend and deſcend, which was couered with fine red worſted, and in likewiſe were all the railes of the ſaid ſtage. On the north ſide of this mount was a place decked and trimmed for the king and quéene, and ſuch other as they appointed to haue. On the ſouth ſide of the ſame mount ſtood the maior and the magiſtrates of the citie.

When all things were prepared and ſet in order, vpon the fouretéenth of Nouember then being ſundaie, the foreſaid ladie was led to the ſaid mount, and there prince Arthur openlie eſpouſed hir, both being clad in white, both luſtie and amorous, he of the age of fiftéene and more, and ſhe of the age of eightéene or thereabouts, the king and quéene ſtanding priuily on their ſtage. After the matrimonie celebrated, the prince and his wife went vp into the quéere, and there heard a ſolemne maſſe ſoong by the archbiſhop of Canturburie, aſſociat with ninetéene prelats mitred. And after the maſſe finiſhed, the bride was led homewards to the biſhops palace by the duke of Yorke being then a goodlie yoong prince, and the legat of Spaine. Next after followed the ladie Cicilie ſiſter to the quéene, ſupporting the traine of the ſpouſe.

The ſolemnization of the mariage betwéene Arthur prince of wales & Katharine daughter to the king of Spaine.

But to ſpeake of all the ſolemne pompe, noble companie of lords and ladies, and what a ſumptuous feaſt and plentifull was kept, with danſing and diſguiſings, words might ſooner faile than matter worthie of rehearſall. Howbeit euerie daie endeth and night inſueth, and ſo when night was come, the prince and his beautifull bride were brought and ioined togither in one bed, where they laie as man and wife all that night. ¶ Now when the morning appéered, the prince(as his familiar ſeruitors, which had then neither cauſe nor reward to lie or faine, openlie told the tale)called for drinke, which he before times was not accuſtomed to doo. At which thing one of his chamberleines maruelling, aſked the cauſe of his drouth. To whome the prince anſwered merilie, ſaieng; I haue this night béene in the middeſt of Spaine, which is a hot region, and that iournie maketh me ſo drie: and if thou haddeſt béene vnder that hot climat, thou wouldeſt haue béene drier than I.]

Edw. Hall fol. liij.

Shortlie after the king and the quéene, with the new wedded ſpouſes went from Bainards caſtell by water to Weſtminſter, on whom the maior and communaltie of London in barges gorgeouſlie trimmed gaue their attendance. And there in the palace were ſuch martiall feats, valiant iuſts, vigorous turneis, and ſuch fierce fight at the barriers, as before that time was of no man had in remembrance. Of this roiall triumph lord Edward duke of Buckingham was chiefe chalenger, and lord Thomas Greie marqueſſe Dorſet chiefe defender, which with their aids and companions bare themſelues ſo valiantlie, that they got great praiſe and honour, both of the Spaniards, and of their owne countriemen. During the time of theſe iuſts and triumphs, were receiued into London, an earle, a biſhop, and diuerſe noble perſonages ſent from the king of Scots into England, for concluſion of the mariage betwéene the ladie Margaret and him; which earle by proxie, in the name of king Iames his maiſter, affied and contracted the ſaid ladie. Which affiance was publiſhed at Paules croſſe, the daie of the conuerſion of ſaint Paule: in reioiſing whereof Te Deum was ſoong, and great fiers made through the citie of London.

Margaret eldeſt daughter to king Henrie affied to Iames king of Scots.

Theſe things being accompliſhed, the ambaſſadors as well of Spaine as Scotland tooke their leaue of the king, & not without great rewards returned into their countries. When the ambaſſadors were departed, he ſent his ſonne prince Arthur againe into Wales, to kéepe that countrie in good order; appointing to him wiſe and expert councellors, as ſir Richard Poole his kinſman, which was his chiefe chamberleine, alſo ſir Henrie Vernon, ſir Richard Crofts, ſir Dauid Philip, ſir William Vdall, ſir Thomas Englefield, ſir Peter Newton knights; Iohn Walleſton, Henrie Marion, & doctor William Smith, preſident of his councell, and doctor Charles; of the which two doctors, the one was after biſhop of Lincolne, and the other biſhop of Hereford.

Prince Arthur is ſent into wales.

¶ This yeare Iohn Shaw (who was maior of London) cauſed his brethren the aldermen to ride from the Guildhall vnto the water ſide, when he went to Weſtminſter to be preſented in the excheker. He alſo cauſed the kitchens and other houſes of office to be builded at the Guildhall, where ſince that time the maiors feaſts haue béene kept, which before had béene in the groſers or tailors hall. About Eaſter, all the Greie friers in England changed their habit, for whereas of long time before they had vſed to weare browne ruſſet of foure ſhillings, ſix ſhillings, and eight ſhillings the yard; now they were compelled to weare ruſſet of two ſhillings the yard and not aboue, which was brought to paſſe by the friers of Gréenewich. This yeare, the dike called Turnemill brooke, with all the courſe of Fléet dike, were ſo ſcowred downe to the Thames, that boates with fiſh and fewell were rowed vp to Holborne bridge, as they of old time had béene accuſtomed: which was a great commoditie to all the inhabitants in that part of London. Alſo the tower néere to the Blacke friers was taken downe by the commandement of the maior. Alſo this yeare were brought vnto the king thrée men taken in the new found Ilands, by Sebaſtian Gabato, before named in Anno 1468. Theſe men were clothed in beaſts ſkins, and eat raw fleſh, but ſpake ſuch a language as no man could vnderſtand them, of the which thrée men, two of them were ſéene in the kings court at Weſtminſter two yeares after, clothed like Engliſhmen, and could not be diſcerned from Engliſhmen.]

A few moneths before the mariage of prince Arthur, Edmund de la Poole earle of Suffolke, ſonne to Iohn duke of Suffolke, and ladie Elizabeth ſiſter to king Edward the fourth, being bold and raſh withall, was indicted of murther, for ſleaing of a meane perſon in his rage & furie. And although the king pardoned him whome he might iuſtlie haue put to death for that offenſe; yet bicauſe he was brought to the barre before the kings Bench, and arraigned (which fact he tooke as a great blemiſh to his honour) ſhortlie after vpon that diſpleaſure he fled into Flanders vnto his aunt the ladie Margaret, the king not being priuie to his going ouer. Neuertheleſſe, whether he was perſuaded by his fréends therevnto, whom the king had willed to deale with him therein; or whether vpon truſt of his innocencie: true it is that he returned againe, and excuſed himſelfe to the king, ſo that he thought him to be giltleſſe of anie crime that might be obiected againſt him.

But when the mariage betwixt the prince & the ladie Katharine of Spaine was kept at London, this erle either for that he had paſſed his compaſſe in exceſſiue charges and ſumptuouſneſſe at that great triumph and ſolemnitie, and by reaſon thereof was farre run into debt; either elſe through the procurement of his aunt the foreſaid ladie Margaret; or pricked with ſome priuie enuie, which could not patientlie with open eies behold king Henrie (being of the aduerſe faction to his linage) ſo long to reigne in wealth and felicitie: in concluſion with his brother Richard fled againe into Flanders. This departure of the earle ſore vexed the king, doubting of ſome new trouble to inſue thereof.

The diſcontented mind of the earle of Suffolke.

But yet to vnderſtand the full meaning of the ſaid earle, the king vſed his old fetch: for immediatlie after the earle was fled, he appointed ſir Robert Curſon, whome he had aduanced to the order of knighthood, and made capteine of Hammes caſtell, a valiant man and a circumſpect, to diſſemble himſelfe one of that conſpiracie; who went into Flanders, to eſpie what was doone there by the ladie Margaret, and hir nephue the earle of Suffolke. After that the ſaid ſir Robert Curſon was thus gone into Flanders, the king to put him out of all ſuſpicion with the ſaid ladie Margaret and the earle, cauſed the ſaid earle, and ſir Robert Curſon, and fiue perſons more to be accurſſed at Paules croſſe, the firſt ſundaie of Nouember, as enimies to him and his realme.

The kings woonted policie now againe practiſed.

To be bréefe, the king by his meanes, and other ſuch diligent inquiſition as he made, tried out ſuch as he ſuſpected, partlie to be deuiſers of miſchéefe againſt him, and partlie to beare no ſincere affection towards his perſon, ſo that he could readilie name them: whereof a great part were within few daies apprehended and taken. And amongſt them William lord Courtneie, ſonne to the earle of Deuonſhire, which maried the ladie Katharine, daughter to king Edward the fourth; lord William de la Poole, brother to the foreſaid earle of Suffolke, ſir Iames Tirrell, & ſir Iohn Windam. Both the Williams were rather taken of ſuſpicion, bicauſe they were ſo néere of kin to the conſpirator, than for anie prooued matter. But ſir Iames Tirrell and Iohn Windam, bicauſe they were traitors, and ſo attainted, the firſt daie of Maie after their apprehenſion, they were on the Tower hill beheaded.

Tirrell and Windam beheaded.

When the earle of Suffolke heard what fortune thus happened to his fréends, as one in vtter deſpaire to haue anie good ſucceſſe in his pretenſed enterpriſe, wandred about all Germanie and France, to purchaſe ſome aid and ſuccour, if by anie means he might. But when he perceiued no ſtedfaſt ground to catch anchor hold vpon, he ſubmitted himſelfe vnder the protection of Philip archduke of Auſtrich. But his brother Richard, being a politike man, ſo wiſelie ordered himſelfe in this ſtormie tempeſt, that he was not intrapped either with net or ſnare. The king not yet out of all doubt of ciuill ſedition, bicauſe a great number of euill diſpoſed perſons partakers of this conſpiracie, were fled into ſundrie ſanctuaries, deuiſed to haue all the gates of ſanctuaries and places priuileged ſhut and locked vp, ſo that none ſhould iſſue out from thence to perturbe and diſquiet him.

And for that intent he wrote vnto pope Alexander, deſiring him by his authoritie to adiudge all Engliſhmen, being fled to ſanctuarie for the offenſe of treaſon as enimies to the chriſtian faith, interdicting and prohibiting the refuge and priuilege of ſanctuarie to all ſuch, as once had enioied the libertie and protection of the ſame, and after that fled out, and eftſoones returned againe. Which thing after that the pope had granted, turned to the great quietneſſe of the king and his realme. For manie that had offended, for feare to fall into danger, returned to the due ſubiection of their prince; and other that were yet frée from perill, durſt not hazard themſelues ſo boldlie as they durſt haue doone before, vpon hope of ſuch ſtarting holes.

Sanctuaries reſtrained.

When the king had thus ſetled things to his owne contentation and pleaſure, there ſuddenlie happened to him a lamentable chance. For that noble prince Arthur, the kings firſt begotten ſonne, after he had béene maried to the ladie Katharine his wife, the ſpace of fiue moneths, departed out of this tranſitorie life, in his caſtell of Ludlow, and with great funerall obſequie was buried in the cathedrall church of Worceſter. His brother the duke of Yorke was ſtaied from the title of Prince by the ſpace of a moneth, till to women it might appeare whether the ladie Katharine wife to the ſaid prince Arthur was conceiued with child or not. [It is reported that this ladie Katharine thought and feared ſuch dolorous chance to come: for when ſhe had imbraced hir father, and taken hir leaue of hir noble and prudent mother, and ſailed towards England, ſhe was continuallie ſo toſſed and tumbled hither and thither with boiſterous winds, that what for the rage of the water, and contrarietie of the winds, hir ſhip was prohibited diuerſe times to approach the ſhore and take land.]

The death of Arthur prince of wales.

Edw. Hall in Hen. 7. fol. lv.

In this eightéenth yeare, the twentie fourth daie of Ianuarie, a quarter of an houre afore thrée of the clocke at after noone of the ſame daie, the firſt ſtone of our ladie chapell within the monaſterie of Weſtminſter was laid, by the hands of Iohn Iſlip abbat of the ſame monaſterie, ſir Reginald Braie knight of the garter, doctor Barnes maiſter of the rolles, doctor Wall chapleine to the kings maieſtie, maiſter Hugh Oldham chapleine to the counteſſe of Darbie and Richmond the kings mother, ſir Edward Stanhope knight, and diuerſe others. Vpon the ſame ſtone was this ſcripture ingrauen: Illuſtriſſimus Henricus ſeptimus rex Angliæ & Franciæ, & dominus Hiberniæ, poſuit hanc petram in honore beatæ virginis Mariæ, 24. die Ianuarij; anno Domini 1502. Et anno dicti regis Henrici ſeptimi, decimo octauo. The charges whereof amounted (as ſome report, vpon credible information as they ſaie) to fouretéene thouſand pounds.

King Henrie the ſeauenths chapell at weſtminſter firſt builded.

Quéene Elizabeth lieng within the Tower of London, was brought a bed of a faire daughter on Candlemaſſe daie, which was there chriſtened and named Katharine; and the eleuenth of the ſame moneth the ſaid quéene there deceaſed, and was buried at Weſtminſter, whoſe daughter alſo liued but a ſmall ſeaſon after hir mother. [King Henrie the ſeauenth being himſelfe a brother of the tailors companie in London, as diuerſe other his predeceſſors kings before him had béene (to wéet Richard the third, Edward the fourth, Henrie the ſixt, Henrie the fift, Henrie the fourth, and Richard the ſecond; alſo of dukes eleuen, earles eight and twentie, and lords eight and fortie) he now gaue to them the name and title of merchant tailors, as a name of worſhip to indure for euer. This yeare, about the later end of March, the prior of the Charterhouſe of Shene was murthered in a cell of his owne houſe, by meanes of one Godwine, a monke of the ſame cloiſter, and his adherents artificers of London. The eightéenth of Februarie, the king at his palace of Weſtminſter created his onelie ſonne Henrie prince of Wales, earle of Cheſter, &c: who afterward ſucceeded his father in poſſeſſion of the regall crowne of this realme. Moreouer, this yeare alſo, after the deceaſſe of that noble queene, for hir vertue commonlie called good queene Elizabeth, departed out of this world alſo ſir Reginald Braie knight of the garter, a verie father of his countrie, for his high wiſedome and ſingular loue to iuſtice well worthie to beare that title. If anie thing had beene doone amiſſe contrarie to law and equitie, he would after an humble ſort plainelie blame the king, and giue him good aduertiſement, that he ſhould not onelie reforme the ſame, but alſo be more circumſpect in anie other the like caſe. Of the ſame vertue and faithfull plainneſſe was Iohn Morton archbiſhop of Canturburie, which died (as is ſhewed aboue) two yeares before.

Sir Reginald Braie his death.

Iuſt commendations of Morton archbiſhop of Canturburie and ſir Reginald Braie.

So theſe two perſons were reſtrainers of the kings vnbrideled libertie; whereas the common people (ignorant altogither of the truth in ſuch matters) iudged and reported, that the counſell of thoſe two worthie perſonages corrupted the kings cleane and immaculate conſcience, contrarie to his princelie diſpoſition and naturall inclination; ſuch is euer the errour of the common people. ¶About this time died Henrie the archbiſhop of Canturburie, whoſe roome doctor William Warham biſhop of London ſupplied. And to the ſee of London William Barnes was appointed, and after his death ſucceeded one Richard fitz Iames. This yeare alſo the lord Caſſimire marqueſſe of Brandenburgh, accompanied with an earle, a biſhop, and a great number of gentlemen well apparrelled, came in ambaſſage from the emperor Maximilian, and were triumphantlie receiued into London, and lodged at Croſbies place.

Caſſimire ambaſſadour from the emperour Maximilian.

Their meſſage was for three cauſes, one to comfort the king in his time of heauineſſe for the loſſe of his wife. The ſecond for the renewing of amitie, and the old league. The third (which was not apparant) was to moue the king to marie the emperours daughter, the ladie Margaret, ducheſſe Dowager of Sauoie. The two firſt tooke effect: for the king vpon Paſſion ſundaie road to Paules in great triumph, the ſaid marqueſſe riding on his left hand. And there the biſhop made to the king an excellent conſolatorie oration concerning the death of the queene. And there alſo the king openlie ſware to keepe the new reuiued league and amitie during their two liues. But the third requeſt (whether the let was on the mans ſide, or on the womans) neuer ſorted to anie concluſion.

The ladie Margaret the kings daughter, affied (as yee haue heard) to the king of Scots, was appointed to be conueied into Scotland, by the earle of Surrie: and the earle of Northumberland, as warden of the marches, was commanded to deliuer hir at the confines of both the realmes. And ſo heere vpon, after hir comming to Berwike, ſhe was conueied to Lamberton kirke in Scotland, where the king of Scots, with the flower of all the nobles and gentlemen of Scotland, was readie to receiue hir: to whome the earle of Northumberland (according to his commiſſion) deliuered hir. The ſaid earle of Northumberland that daie, what for the riches of his coat being goldſmithes worke, garniſhed with pearle and ſtone, and what for the gallant apparell of his Henchmen, and braue trappers of his horſſe, beſide foure hundred tall men well horſſed and apparelled in his colours, was eſteemed both of the Scots and Engliſhmen more like a prince than a ſubiect.

The ſumptuous araie of the earle of Northumberland.

The mariage betweene the k. of Scots & ladie Margaret king Henries eldeſt daughter.

From Lamberton, the foreſaid ladie was conueied to Edenburgh, and there the daie after, king Iames the fourth, in the preſence of all his nobilitie, eſpouſed hir, and feaſted the Engliſh lords, and ſhewed iuſts and other paſtimes verie honourablie, after the faſhion of that countrie. And after all things were finiſhed according to their commiſſion, the erle of Surrie with all the Engliſh lords and ladies returned into their countrie. In this yeare the king kept his high court of parlement, in the which diuerſe acts eſteemed neceſſarie for the preſeruation of the common-wealth were eſtabliſhed: and amongſt other, it was enacted, that theeues and murtherers duelie conuicted by the law to die, and yet ſaued by their books, ſhould be committed to the biſhops cuſtodie. After this, a ſubſidie was granted, both of the temporaltie, and ſpiritualtie, and ſo that parlement ended.

But the king now drawing into age, and willing to fill his cheſts with aboundance of treaſure, was not ſatiſfied with this onelie ſubſidie, but deuiſed an other meane how to inrich himſelfe, as thus. He conſidered that the Engliſhmen little regarded the keeping of penall lawes, and pecuniall ſtatutes, deuiſed for the good preſeruation of the common-welth. Wherefore he cauſed inquiſition to be made of thoſe that had tranſgreſſed anie of the ſame lawes, ſo that there were but few noble men, merchants, farmers, huſbandmen, graſiers, or occupiers, that could cleerlie proue themſelues faultleſſe, but had offended in ſome one or other of the ſame lawes. At the firſt, they that were found giltie were eaſilie fined. But after, there were appointed two maiſters and ſurueiors of his forfeits, the one ſir Richard Empſon, and the other Edmund Dudleie.

Richard Empſon & Edmund Dudleie.

Theſe two were learned in the lawes of the realme, who meaning to ſatiſfie their princes pleaſure, and to ſee their commiſſion executed to the vttermoſt, ſeemed little to reſpect the perill that might inſue. Wherevpon they being furniſhed with a ſort of accuſers, commonlie called promoters, or (as they themſelues will be named) informers, troubled manie a man, whereby they wan them great hatred, and the king (by ſuch rigorous proceedings) loſt the loue and fauour which the people before time had borne towards him; ſo that he for ſetting them a worke, and they for executing of it in ſuch extreame wiſe, ran into obloquie with the ſubiects of this realme.

Sergeants feaſt whereat were the king and all his nobles at dinner.

¶On the thirteenth of Nouember was holden within the palace of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, at Lambeth, the ſergeants feaſt, where dined the king and all his nobles. And vpon the ſame day, Thomas Granger, newlie choſen ſhiriffe of London, was preſented before the barons of the kings exchequer, there to take his oth, and after went with the maior vnto the ſame feaſt, which ſaued him monie in his purſſe; for if that day that feaſt had not beene kept, he muſt haue feaſted the maior, aldermen, and others, worſhipfull of the citie. This feaſt was kept at the charge of ten learned men, newlie admitted to bee ſergeants to the kings law, whoſe names were, Robert Bridnell, William Greuill, Thomas Marow, George Edgore, Iohn Moore, Iohn Cutler, Thomas Eliot, Lewes Pollard, Guie Palmis, William Fairefax. On the one and twentith of Nouember at night, began a perillous fier at the ſigne of the panier vpon London bridge, neere to ſaint Magnus church; where ſix tenements were burned yer the ſame could be quenched. On the ſeuenth of Ianuarie, were certeine houſes conſumed with fire againſt ſaint Butolphes church in Thames ſtreet. About Chriſtmas, the more part of the priſoners of the Marſhalſeie in Southwarke brake out, and manie of them being ſhortlie after taken, were put to execution, ſpeciallie thoſe which had laine for felonie or treaſon. On the fifteenth of Aprill, a monie maker, one of the coiners of the Tower, was drawne to Tiburne, and there hanged.

Cages and ſtockes ordeined.

A beneuolence put into the kings heed to be leuied ouer the whole land.

¶ In this twentith yeare (ſaith one of Exceſter) the king (hauing ſome need of monie) was by his councell aduiſed (by way of beneuolence) to leuie the ſame vpon the whole realme, as well of the cleargie as of the laitie. And for the ſame, commiſſioners were aſſigned accordinglie. For the cleargie, Richard Fox, ſometime biſhop of Exceſter, but now of Wincheſter, a verie wiſe, graue, and truſtie councellor, was appointed chiefe commiſſioner, and had the chiefeſt dealing therein. He at daies and times appointed, aſſembled the cleargie before him, and (according to the truſt committed vnto him) he perſuaded them by all the meanes he could, to be liberall contributors to the king, conſidering his preſent need, and who (for their cauſes, & the ſafetie of all the common-wealth) was now to vſe and imploie ſome monie.

The cleargie of two ſorts, and both deſirous to ſpare their purſſes.

The cleargie was of two ſorts, the one ſhewing themſelues as they were wealthie, ſeemelie, & comelie; the other pretending that which was not, pouertie, bareneſſe, and ſcarſitie: but both were of one mind, and deuiſed all the waies they could to ſaue their purſſes. The firſt being called, alledged that they were dailie at great charges and expenſes in keeping of hoſpitalitie, in mainteining themſelues, their houſe and familie; beſides extraordinaries which dailie did grow and increaſe vpon them: and by that meanes they were but bare and poore, and praied that they might be borne withall, and pardoned for that time.

The other ſort alledged, that their liuings were but ſmall and ſlender, and ſcarſe able to mainteine themſelues withall, which compelled them to go bare, and to liue a hard and a poore life, and therefore (they hauing nothing) praied that they might be excuſed. The biſhop when he had heard them at full, and well conſidered thereof, verie wittilie, and with a pretie dilemma anſwered them both, ſaieng to the firſt: It is true, you are at great charges, and are well beſeene in your apparell, well mounted vpon your faire palfreies, and haue your men waiting vpon you in good order; your hoſpitalitie is good, and your dailie expenſes are large, and you are for the ſame well reported amongſt your neighbours; all which are plaine demonſtrations of your wealth and abilitie, otherwiſe you would not be at ſuch voluntarie charges. Now hauing ſtore to ſpend in ſuch order, there is no reaſon, but that to your prince you ſhould much more be well willing & readie to yeeld your ſelues contributorie and dutifull, and therefore you muſt paie. To the other ſort he ſaid: Albeit your liuings be not of the beſt, yet good, ſufficient, and able to mainteine you in better eſtate than you doo imploie it: but it appeareth that you are frugall and thriftie men; and what others doo voluntarilie ſpend in apparell, houſe, and familie, you warilie doo keepe, and haue it to lie by you; and therefore it is good reaſon that of your ſtore you ſhould ſpare with a good will and contribute to your prince; wherefore be contented, for you ſhall paie. And ſo by this pretie dilemma he reduced them to yeeld a good paiment to the king.]

The wiſdome of biſhop Fox in procuring theſe cleargie men to be contributors to this beneuolence.

They are perſuaded to contribute.

The king after he had gotten a great maſſe of monie togither, hauing pitie on the people, which oppreſſed with the ſharpe proceedings of his greedie officers, cried daily to God for vengeance, ment to haue depriued them of their offices (as ſome write) & that ſuch monie as had beene violentlie exacted, ſhould haue beene reſtored and deliuered againe, if he had not bene preuented by death. And yet by his laſt will he commanded that it ſhould be dulie and trulie performed, but in the meane ſeaſon many mens coffers were emptied. [¶ Thomas Kneiſworth maior of London for this yeare, of his owne goods, builded the conduit at Biſhops gate. He gaue to the fiſhmongers certeine tenements, for the which they be bound to find foure ſcholers that ſtudie art; two at Oxford, and two at Cambrige, euerie of them foure pounds the yeare. They be bound alſo to giue to twelue aged poore people of their companie, to euerie one of them at Bartholomew tide a winter garment for euer. Alſo to giue to the priſoners of Ludgate and Newgate euerie yeare fortie ſhillings, &c. The fift of Ianuarie in the night, the kings chamber was fired at Richmond, the which might not be quenched, till manie curteins, carpets, rich beds, and much other ſtuffe was conſumed.

1506

In this verie ſeaſon, and the yeare of our Lord 1506, Elizabeth queene of Caſtile died without iſſue male, by reaſon whereof the inheritance of Caſtile (bicauſe that kingdome is not partible) deſcended to ladie Iane hir eldeſt daughter by king Ferdinando, the which was maried to Philip archduke of Auſtrich. Wherefore the yeare following, about the ſixt day of Ianuarie, hauing a great nauie prepared, he intituled now king of Caſtile, ſailed out of Flanders with his wife towards Spaine; but by a mightie tempeſt of wind and foule weather, the whole nauie was diſperſed and ſparkled abroad in diuerſe places on the coaſts of England. The kings ſhip with two other veſſels were blowne by tempeſt on the weſt part of the realme, to the port of Weimouth in Dorſetſhire. The king being wearied with the toſſing of the ſeas, as one not accuſtomed thereto, contrarie to the mind of his councellors, came on land to refreſh him ſelfe.

Philip archduke of Auſtrich landeth in the weſt parts of England.

When it was knowne that ſtrange ſhips were arriued in that place, there came thither a great number, as well of gentlemen as commons of the countrie, to beat them backe if they proued to be enimies. But when they perceiued that the king of Spaine was there driuen on land by force of weather, ſir Thomas Trenchard knight, cheefe of that companie, went with great humbleneſſe vnto him, and did what he could to haue him to his houſe, being not farre off, and ſo to cauſe him to ſtay, till ſuch time as king Henrie might be certified of his arriuall; to whome with all ſpeed he ſent diuerſe poſts to aduertiſe him of king Philips landing. In this meane while came people in from all ſides, vpon knowlege of this ſtrange princes comming. And among other there came ſir Iohn Carew, with a goodlie band of piked men. Which ſir Iohn and ſir Thomas Trenchard intreated the king of Caſtile not to depart, vntill ſuch time as he had ſpoken with the king.

The king of Caſtile excuſed him by neceſſitie of his weightie enterpriſe: but when he perceiued that if he would proffer to go once aboord to his ſhips againe, he might be letted, and was like ſo to bee; hee thought good rather to aſſent to their humble requeſt and ſo ſeeme to gratifie them; than by denieng it to procure their euill willes, and yet neuer the neerer of his purpoſe. When king Henrie was informed of his landing, he was right glad therof, and wrote vnto ſir Iohn Carew, and to ſir Thomas Trenchard, that they ſhould interteine him in the moſt honorable ſort they could deuiſe, till he might come himſelfe in perſon to welcome him. Beſide this, he ſent the earle of Arundell with manie lords and knights to attend vpon him. Which earle (according to the kings letters) receiued him with thrée hundred horſſes, all by torchlight, to the great admiration of the ſtrangers.

The king of Caſtile interteined honorablie.

King Philip ſéeing no remedie but that he muſt néeds tarie, would no longer gaze after king Henries comming, but tooke his iournie toward Windſore caſtell, where the king laie: and fiue miles from Windſore the prince of Wales, accompanied with fiue earles, and diuerſe lords and knights, and other to the number of fiue hundred perſons gorgiouſlie apparelled, receiued him after the moſt honorable faſhion. And within halfe a mile of Windſore, the king, accompanied with the duke of Buckingham, and a great part of the nobilitie of this realme, welcomed him, & ſo conueied him to the caſtell of Windſore, where he was made companion of the noble order of the garter. After him came to Windſore his wife quéene Iane, ſiſter to the princeſſe Dowager, late wife to prince Arthur.

After the two kings had renewed & confirmed the league and amitie betwixt them, king Henrie deſired to haue Edmund de la Poole earle of Suffolke to be deliuered into his hands. To whome the king of Caſtile anſwered, that he verelie was not within his dominion: and therefore it laie not in him to deliuer him. In déed he was loth to be the authour of his death that came to him for ſuccour, and was receiued vnder his protection: yet vpon the earneſt requeſt and aſſured promiſe of king Henrie (that he would pardon him of all executions and paines of death) he granted to king Henries deſire; and ſo incontinentlie cauſed the ſaid earle ſecretlie to be ſent for. After this, to protract time till he were poſſeſſed of his preie, king Henrie conueied the king of Caſtile vnto the citie of London, that he might ſée the head citie of his realme.

King Henrie deſireth to haue Edmund de la Poole earle of Suffolke deliuered into his hands.

Then he led him from Bainards caſtell by Cheape to Barking; and ſo returned by Watling ſtréet againe: during which time there was ſhot out of the Tower a woonderfull peale of ordinance. But he would not enter into the Tower, bicauſe (as ye haue heard before) he had aduowed not to enter the fortreſſe of anie forren prince, in the which a garriſon was mainteined. From London the king brought him to Richmond, where manie notable feates of armes were prooued both of tilt, turnie, and barriers. In the meane ſeaſon the erle of Suffolke, perceiuing what hope was to be had in forreine princes, and truſting that after his life to him once granted, king Henrie would bréeflie ſet him at his full libertie, was in maner contented to returne againe into his natiue countrie.

The king of Caſtiles vow inuiolablie kept.

When all pacts and couenants betwéene the kings of England and Caſtile were appointed, concluded, and agréed; king Philip tooke his leaue of king Henrie, yéelding to him moſt heartie thanks for his high chéere and princelie interteinement. And being accompanied with diuers lords of England, he came to the citie of Exceſter, and ſo to Falmouth in Cornewall, and there taking ſhip ſailed into Spaine, where ſhortlie after he died being thirtie yeares of age. He was of ſtature conuenient, of countenance amiable of bodie ſomewhat groſſe, quicke witted, bold and hardie ſtomached. The tempeſt that he ſuffered on the ſea was huge, and woonderfull alſo vpon the land, inſomuch that the violence of the wind blew downe an eagle of braſſe, being ſet to ſhew on which part the wind blew, from a pinacle or ſpire of Paules church, and in the falling, the ſame eagle brake and battered an other eagle that was ſet vp for a ſigne at a tauerne doore in Cheapeſide.

The death & deſcription of Philip king of Spaine.

Herevpon men that were giuen to geſſe things that ſhould happen by marking of ſtrange tokens, déemed that the emperour Maximilian, which gaue the eagle, ſhould ſuffer ſome great miſfortune: as he did ſhortlie after by the loſſe of his ſonne, the ſaid king Philip. ¶And ſuerlie theſe prodigious accidents are not to be omitted as matter of courſe; for they haue their weight, and ſhew their truth in the iſſue. Examples in this booke be diuerſe, among which one is verie memorable, mentioned in the thirtie & ninth yeare of Henrie the ſixt. At what time the duke of Yorke making an oration to the lords of the parlement, for the iuſtifieng of his title to the crowne, it chanced that a crowne which hoong in the middle of the nether houſe (to garniſh a branch to ſet lights vpon) without touch of man or blaſt of wind ſuddenlie fell downe. About which ſeaſon alſo fell downe the crowne which ſtood on the top of Douer caſtell. Which things were conſtrued to be ſignes that the crowne of the realme ſhould ſome waie haue a fall; and ſo it came to paſſe.

Prodigious tokens or accidents haue their iſſue in truth.

Sée pag. 651.

And bicauſe the euents of theſe foreſhewes had their truth, as manie more of the like nature; it ſhall not be amiſſe here to ad (by waie of digreſſion) what hath béene obſerued in former ages by forren writers in and about ſuch foretokens. The conſent of the heauens and of men, pronounced to Italie their calamities to come: for that ſuch as made profeſſion to haue iudgement either by ſcience or diuine inſpiration in the things to come, aſſured with one voice that there were in preparing, both more great mutations and more ſtrange and horrible accidents, than for manie worlds before had béene diſcerned in anie part or circuit of the earth. There were ſéene in the night in Pouille thrée ſuns in the middeſt of the firmament, but manie clouds about them, with right fearefull thunders and lightnings. In the territorie of Aretze, were viſiblie ſéene paſſing in the aire, infinit numbers of armed men vpon mightie horſſes, with a terrible noiſe of drums and trumpets. The images & figures of ſaints did ſweat in manie parts of Italie.

Abr. Flem. ex Guic. pag. 40.

Thrée ſunnes ſéene at once in the night.

In euerie place of the countrie were brought foorth manie monſters of men and other creatures, with manie other things againſt the order of nature concurring all at one time, but in diuerſe places: by means wherof the people were caried into incredible feares, being alreadie amazed with the brute of the French powers & furie of that nation, with which (according to the teſtimonie of hiſtories) they had aforetime run ouer all Italie, ſacked and made deſolate with fire and ſword the citie of Rome, and ſubdued in Aſia manie prouinces; and generallie no part of the world which had not felt the vertue of their armes. But albeit theſe iudgements are oftentimes fallible, and rather coniectures vncerteine, than effects happening: yet the accidents that drew on, brought to them, in the ſpirits of fraile men, an abſolute faith, credit, & religion. So that there is in foreſhewes matter of moment worthie to be obſerued, howſoeuer the world lulled aſléep in the lap of ſecuritie is touched with no feare of change. But alas the Heathen could ſée the contrarie, and therefore ſaid:

Omnia mortali mutantur lege creata,
Nec ſe cognoſcunt terræ veteribus annis
Exutas variam faciem per ſecula gentes.]

Manil. lib. Aſtr. 1.

But to returne to our owne ſtorie. Shortlie after the departing of king Philip, the king of England began to ſuſpect ſir George Neuill lord of Aburgauennie, and ſir Thomas Gréene of Gréenes Norton, as partakers in the beginning of the conſpiracie with the earle of Suffolke; and ſo vpon that ſuſpicion they were commanded to the Tower. But ſhortlie after, when they had béene tried and purged of that ſuſpicion, he commanded them both to be ſet at libertie. But ſir Thomas Gréene fell ſicke before, and remained in the Tower, in hope to be reſtored to his health as well as to his libertie, but by death he was preuented. [And here bicauſe it is good to ſée the conſent of hiſtories in the report of accidents, it ſhall not be amiſſe to repeat the entier relation of a late writer ſtranger touching this caſualtie which befell to king Philip, in ſuch ſort to be caſt vpon the Engliſh coaſts; as alſo the promiſe of the ſaid king to deliuer the duke of Suffolke into the hands of king Henrie, with the cauſe (as it is ſuppoſed) why the king deſired to haue him within his owne reach.

King Philip ſaileth out of Flanders into Spaine.

¶King Philip was imbarked to ſaile out of Flanders into Spaine with a great armie by ſea; and to reduce his going to a more facilitie and ſafetie (for he feared leaſt his father in law by the aid of the French would hinder his paſſage) he practiſed the Spaniſh ſubtilties, and agréed with him to leaue vnto him the managing and policie of the moſt part of affaires, and that they ſhuld take in common the title of king of Spaine, according to the example in the quéenes time: and laſtlie, that the reuenues and tributes ſhould be diuided in an order certeine & indifferent. By reaſon of which accord, his father in law, notwithſtanding he was not aſſured of the obſeruation, ſent him into Flanders manie ſhips to furniſh his voiage: with the which, hauing imbarked his wife, and Ferdinand his ſecond ſonne, he tooke his courſe into Spaine with forward winds, which, within two dais turning cleane contrarie, after his nauie had runne a dangerous fortune, and made a wearie reſiſtance againſt the furie of the ſea, his ſhips were caſt vpon ſundrie coaſts of England and Britaine; his owne perſon with two or thrée ſhips being driuen with manifeſt perill vpon England into the hauen of Southhampton.

King Philip caſt by caſualtie of ſea vpon the coaſts of England.

Whereof Henrie the ſeuenth then king of that nation being aduertiſed, ſent to him with ſpéed manie barons to doo him honour, and deſire him to come to his court, then at London: a requeſt which Philip could not denie, the king of Englands demand béeing no leſſe honourable, than his owne eſtate full of neceſſitie and nakedneſſe. He remained in the court of England, vntill all his nauie was reaſſembled, and eftſoones rigged, making in the meane while betwéene them new capitulations: wherein albeit Philip in all other things held himſelfe vſed as a king, yet in this one thing complained, that he was conſtreined as a priſoner, to conſent to redeliuer to K. Henries hands the duke of Suffolke, whom he held priſoner within the caſtell of Namur, and whom the king of England deſired much to haue in his power, for that he quarrelled the title of the crowne, pretending the right of the kingdome to apperteine to him: onelie the king of England aſſured Philip by the faith and word of a king, that he would not put him to death. Which he did as iuſtlie performe, as he had honorablie promiſed, kéeping him in priſon ſo long as he liued, and afterwards was beheaded vnder the reigne and commandement of his ſonne.]

Philip promiſeth to redeliuer to king Henrie the duke of Suffolke.

Anno Reg. 22.

This yeare the king began to be diſeaſed of a certeine infirmitie, which thriſe euerie yeare, but ſpecially in the ſpringtime ſore vexed him. And bicauſe for the moſt part the harme that chanceth to the prince, is parted with his ſubiects, the ſweating ſickneſſe, which (as ye haue heard) in the firſt yeare of the king firſt afflicted the people of this realme, now aſſailed them againe; howbeit by the remedie found at the begining of it, nothing the like number died thereof now this ſecond time, as did at the firſt time till the ſaid remedie was inuented. But now the third plage equall to the peſtilence inſued, by the working of the maiſters of the forfeitures, and ſuch informers as were appointed thereto. By whoſe meanes manie a rich & wealthie perſon by the extremitie of the lawes of the realme were condemned and brought to great loſſe and hinderance.

The ſweting ſickneſſe eftſoones returneth.

A great part of which their vndooings procéeded by the inconuenience of ſuch vnconſcionable officers, as by the abuſe of exigents outlawed thoſe that neuer heard, nor had knowledge of the ſutes commenſed againſt them, of which hard and ſharpe dealing (the harme that thereof inſueth conſidered) if the occaſion might be taken awaie by ſome other more reaſonable forme and order of law deuiſed, whereby the parties might haue perſonall warning, it would both preſerue manie an innocent man from vndeſerued vexation, and danger of vnmercifull loſſe of goods; and alſo redound highlie to the commendation of the prince, and ſuch other as chanced to be reformers of that colourable law, where they be called onelie in the counties without other knowledge giuen to them or theirs at their dwelling houſes.

But now to returne. Such maner of outlawries, old recogniſances of the peace, and good abearings, eſcapes, riots, & innumerable ſtatutes penall, were put in execution, and called vpon by Empſon and Dudleie; ſo that euerie man, both the ſpiritualtie and temporaltie, hauing either lands or ſubſtance, were inuited to that plucking banket. For theſe two rauening woolues had a gard of falſe periured perſons apperteining to them, which were impanelled in euerie queſt. Learned men in the law, when they were required of their aduiſe, would ſay; To agrée is the beſt counſell that I can giue you. By this vndue meanes, theſe couetous perſons filled the kings coffers, and inriched themſelues. And at this vnreaſonable and extort dooing, noble men grudged, meane men kicked, poore men lamented, preachers openlie at Poules croſſe and other places exclamed, rebuked, and deteſted. Howbeit the good king in his laſt daies conſerued and pardoned his poore ſubiects of ſuch vncharitable yokes and ponderous burdens as they were laden withall.

Sir Gilbert Talbot knight, and Richard Bere abbat of Glaſtenburie, and doctor Robert Sherborne deane of Poules, were ſent as ambaſſadors from the K. to Rome, to declare to Pius the third of that name newlie elected pope in place of Alexander the ſixt deceaſed, what ioy and gladneſſe had entered the kings heart for his preferment. But he taried not the comming of thoſe ambaſſadors, for within a moneth after that he was inſtalled, he rendered his debt to nature, and ſo had ſhort pleaſure of his promotion [not beguiling the hopes which the cardinals conceiued of him at the time of his creation, the ſix & twentith day after his election, which was in ſhort time to die. This popes name was Francis Piccolomini cardinall of Sienna, in whom was no expectation of long life, both for his extreame age, and preſent ſickeneſſe: a cardinall ſure of vnſpotted report, and for his other conditions not vnworthie that degrée; who to renew the memorie of Pius ſecundus his vncle, tooke vpon him the name of Pius the third.

He ſuccéeded Alexander the ſixt, who went to ſupper in a vineyard néere the Vatican to reioiſe in the delight & pleſure of the freſh aire, & was ſuddenlie caried for dead to the biſhops palace; his ſonne alſo communicating in the ſame accident, but with better fortune. For the day folowing, which was the eightenth day of Auguſt, the dead corps of the pope (according to cuſtome) was borne into the church of ſaint Peter, blacke, ſwolne, and moſt deformed; moſt manifeſt ſignes of poiſon. But Valentinois, what by the vigour and ſtrength of his youth, and readie helpe of ſtrong medicines and counterpoiſons, had his life ſaued, remaining notwithſtanding oppreſſed with long and gréeuous ſickeneſſe: it was aſſuredlie beléeued that the accident procéeded of poiſon, the diſcourſe whereof (according to common report) was in this ſort.

A practiſe of cuſtome by poiſon to an ill purpoſe vſed.

The duke Valentinois, who was to be preſent at that ſupper, had determined to poiſon Adrian cardinall of Cornette, reſeruing that time and place to execute his bloudie reſolution: for it is moſt certeine that in his father and him were naturall cuſtomes to vſe poiſon, not onelie to be reuenged of their enimies, or to be aſſured of ſuſpicions; but alſo vpon a wicked couetouſneſſe, to deſpoile rich men of their goods, whether they were cardinals or courtiers, although they had neuer doone them wrong, as hapned to the cardinall ſaint Ange, who was verie rich. This maner of rage they would vſe alſo againſt their greateſt friends ⁊ familiars, and ſuch as had bin their moſt faithfull ſeruants, ſuch as were the cardinals of Capua and Modeno: a recompenſe vnworthie the merits of good men, and not diſagréeable to the diſpoſition of ſuch a father and ſonne, whereof the one made all things lawfull by vile diſpenſation; and with the other nothing was diſhoneſt wherein was opportunitie to his purpoſes. The duke Valentinois ſent before certeine flagons with wine infected with poiſon, which he gaue to a ſeruant that knew nothing of the matter, commanding that no perſon ſhould touch them.

A commandemeent preiudiciall to his maiſter, as the ignorance of the ſeruant was the inſtrument in the euill that happened both to the father and ſon. Such is the ſufferance of God, who in the execution of his iudgements raiſeth one murtherer to kill another, ⁊ breaketh the brands of the fire vpon the head of him that firſt kindled it: for the pope comming by aduenture ſomewhat before ſupper, and ouercome with the drought and immoderate heat of the time, called for drinke. And bicauſe his owne prouiſion was not yet brought from the palace, he that had the infected wine in charge, thinking it to be recommended to his kéeping for a wine moſt excellent, gaue the pope to drinke of the ſame wine which Valentinois had ſent; who arriuing while his father was drinking drunke alſo of the ſame wine, being but iuſt that they both ſhould taſt of the ſame cup which they had brued for the deſtruction of others. All the towne of Rome ran with great gladneſſe to ſaint Peters about the dead bodie of the pope, their eies not ſatiſfied to ſée ded and deſtroied a ſerpent, who with his immoderate ambition and poiſoned infidelitie, togither with all the horrible examples of crueltie, luxurie, and monſtruous couetouſneſſe, ſelling without diſtinction both holie things and prophane things, had infected the whole world.

The pope poiſoned with the wine that his owne ſon had ſent to poiſon the cardinall of Cornette.

And yet was he accompanied with a moſt rare, ⁊ almoſt perpetuall proſperitie euen from his yoong age, to the end of his life; deſiring alwaies great things, and obteining moſt often that he deſired. An example of much importance, to confound the arrogancie of thoſe men, who preſuming to know and ſée perfectlie with humane eies the depth of Gods iudgements, doo aſſure, that what happeneth either good or ill to mortall men, procéedeth either of their merits or faults: as though we ſaw not dailie manie good men vniuſtlie tormented, ⁊ wicked perſons aboue their deſeruings liue in eaſe and honour: wherein who makes an other interpretation, derogates the iuſtice and power of God, the greatneſſe of which being not to be conteined within any ſcripts or tearms preſent, knoweth how well and largely to diſcerne in an other time and place the iuſt from the vniuſt, and that with rewards and eternall puniſhments. In the meane time he powreth out his vengeance vpon the imaginers of miſchéefe in this life; ſo prouiding, as that they are caught in their owne ſnares, and ouertaken with ſuch deſtruction as they had prepared for others, according to that ſaieng of the Pſalmiſt:

Effodit puteum, foueámque eduxit ab imo,
Et miſer in latebras incidit ipſe ſuas.
In verticem ipſius recurrit
Pernicies, recidúntque fraudes.]

The lord Daubenie dieth.

At the ſame time died Giles lord Dawbenie the kings chéefe chamberleine, whoſe office Charles, baſtard ſonne to Henrie laſt duke of Summerſet occupied and enioied; a man of good wit, and great experience. Soone after, the king cauſed Guidebald duke of Vrbine to be elected knight of the order of the garter, in like maner as his father duke Frederike had béene before him, which was choſen and admitted into the order by king Edward the fourth. Sir Gilbert Talbot, and the other two ambaſſadors being appointed to kéepe on their iournie vnto pope Iulie the ſecond, elected after the death of the ſaid Pius the third, bare the habit and collar alſo vnto the ſaid duke Guidebald; which after he had receiued the ſame, ſent ſir Balthaſar Caſtalio, knight, a Mantuan borne, as his orator vnto king Henrie, which was for him inſtalled, according to the ordinances of the order.

Anno Reg. 23. Guidebald duke of Vrbin in Italie made knight of the garter.

Thomas Sauage archbiſhop of Canturburie deceaſſed.

This yeare that worthie prelate Thomas Sauage archbiſhop of Yorke departed this life at his caſtell of Cawood: a man beſide the worthineſſe of his birth highlie eſtéemed with his prince for his faſt fidelitie and great wiſedome. He beſtowed great coſt in repairing the caſtell of Cawood and the manor of Scrobie. His bodie was buried at Yorke, but he appointed by his teſtament, that his hart ſhould be buried at Macclesfield in Cheſhire, where he was borne, in a chapell there of his foundation, ioining to the ſouth ſide of the church, meaning to haue founded a college there alſo, if his purpoſe had not béene preuented by death. After him ſuccéeded doctor Benbridge in the archbiſhops ſée of Yorke, being the fiftie and ſixt archbiſhop that had ſat in that ſée.

Free ſchoole at Wilfrunehampton.

Stephan Genings merchant tailor, maior of London, founded a free grammar ſchoole at Wilfrunehampton in Staffordſhire, with conuenient lodgings for the maiſter and vſher, in the ſame place where he was borne. He gaue lands ſufficient for the maintenance, leauing the ouerſight thereof to the merchant tailors in London, who haue hitherto iuſtlie dealt in that matter, and alſo augmented the building there. Maiſter Nichols, who maried the onelie daughter and heire of the aforeſaid Stephan Genings, gaue lands to mainteine the pauements of that towne. Alſo, John Lencſon eſquier, about Anno 1556, gaue lands, whereof foure pounds ſhould be dealt euerie yeare, on good fridaie, to the poore people of Wilfrunehampton, and ſix and twentie ſhillings eight pence yeerelie, towards the reparation of the church there.

John Ligh of Wilfrunehampton, his rare example of charitie.

Moreouer, about Anno 1566, ſir John Ligh a preeſt, which had ſerued in that church there, the ſpace of threeſcore years, for fiue pounds, ſix ſhillings eight pence the yeare, without anie other augmentation of his liuing, who would neuer take anie benefice, or other preferment, gaue twentie pounds, to purchaſe twentie ſhillings the yeare lands, the ſame to be giuen yearelie for euer to the poore of Wilfrunehampton vpon good fridaie; & twelue pounds thirteene ſhillings foure pence, to purchaſe a marke a yeare lands, the ſame to be giuen to the poore of Chiſnall, in the countie of Salope, where the ſaid Ligh was borne. This man liued nigh one hundred years. He beſtowed beſides his owne labour which was great (in bearing of ſtones, &c.) aboue twentie pounds on the high waies about that towne of Wilfrunehampton.

Wilfrunehampton, corruptlie called Wolnerhampton.

Ex charta Regia

This towne of Wilfrunehampton, is now corruptlie called Wolnerhampton: for in Anno 996, in king Ethelreds time (who wrote himſelfe Rex Anglorum & princeps Northumbrorum Olympiade tertia regni ſui, for ſo he wrote the count of his reigne then, which was the fifteenth yeare) it was then called Hampton, as appeareth by an old charter written by the notarie of the ſaid king Ethelred, which charter I haue ſeene and read. And for that a noble woman named Wilfrune a widow, ſometime wife to Althelme duke of Northampton, did obteine of the ſaid king to giue lands vnto the church there which ſhe had founded, the ſaid towne tooke the addition of the ſame Wilfrune, for that charter ſo nameth hir Wilfrune, and the towne Hampton.

Hoſpitall of the Sauoie.

Rec. of Canturb. church.

In this yeare was finiſhed the goodlie hoſpitall of the Sauoie neere vnto Charing croſſe, which was a notable foundation for the poore, doone by king Henrie the ſeauenth, vnto the which he purchaſed and gaue lands for the releeuing of one hundred poore people. This was firſt named Sauoie place, by Peter earle of Sauoie, father to Boniface archbiſhop of Canturburie, about the nine and twentith yeare of king Henrie the third, who made the ſaid Peter erle of Richmond. This houſe belonged ſince to the duke of Lancaſter, and at this time was conuerted to an hoſpitall, ſtill reteining the firſt name of Sauoie. King Henrie alſo builded three houſes of Franciſcane friers, which are called obſeruants, at Richmond, Greenewich, and Newarke; and three other of the familie of Franciſcane friers which are called conuentuals, at Canturburie, Newcaſtell, and Southhampton.]

Thomas Ruthall biſhop of Durham.

The ſituation of Ciceſter.

¶This yeare was Thomas Ruthall made biſhop of Durham by Henrie the ſeauenth, touching whoſe place of birth (being at Cirenceſter now Ciceſter) and himſelfe, I will not refuſe to ſet downe what Leland (about the yeare 1542) hath written, not being vnfit heere to be recorded. Cirenceſter (ſaith he) in Latine called Corinium ſtandeth on the riuer Churne. There haue beene three pariſh churches, whereof ſaint Cicilies church is cleane downe, being of late but a chappell. Saint Laurence yet ſtandeth, but it is no pariſh church. There be two poore almes women endued with land. There is now but one pariſh church in all Cirenceſter that is verie faire, the bodie of which church is all new worke, to the which Ruthall biſhop of Durham (borne and brought vp in Cirenceſter) promiſed much, but (preuented by death) gaue nothing. One Anne Aueling aunt to doctor Ruthall by the mothers ſide, gaue one hundred markes to the building of that church. King Henrie the firſt made the hoſpitall of ſaint Johns at Cirenceſter. Thus farre Leland.

The biſhop was one of K. Henrie the eights priuie councell.

The king commandeth him to write a booke of the whole eſtate of þ kingdom.

This man thus borne at Cirenceſter in Gloceſterſhire, and made biſhop of Durham, was after the death of king Henrie the ſeauenth, one of the priuie councell to king Henrie the eight; in whoſe court he was ſo continuallie attendant, that he could not ſteale anie time to attend the affaires of his biſhoprike. But yet not altogither careleſſe (though not ſo much as he ought to haue beene) of the place and cauſe from whence and for which he receiued ſo great reuenues, as came vnto his hands from that ſee. He repaired the third part of Tine bridge next vnto the ſouth, which he might well doo; for he was accompted the richeſt ſubiect through the realme. To whome (remaining then at the court) the king gaue in charge to write a booke of the whole eſtate of the kingdome, bicauſe he was knowne to the king to be a man of ſufficiencie for the diſcharge thereof, which he did accordinglie.

Afterwards, the king commanded cardinall Wolſeie to go to this biſhop, and to bring the booke awaie with him to deliuer to his maieſtie. But ſee the miſhap! that a man in all other things ſo prouident, ſhould now be ſo negligent: and at that time moſt forget himſelfe, when (as it after fell out) he had moſt need to haue remembred himſelfe. For this biſhop hauing written two bookes (the one to anſwer the kings command, and the other intreating of his owne priuate affaires) did bind them both after one ſort in vellame, iuſt of one length, bredth, and thickneſſe, and in all points in ſuch like proportion anſwering one an other, as the one could not by anie eſpeciall note be diſcerned from the other: both which he alſo laid vp togither in one place of his ſtudie.

The biſhops booke of his priuat affaires vnaduiſedlie deliuered in ſtead of the kings.

Now when the cardinall came to demand the booke due to the king: the biſhop vnaduiſedlie commanded his ſeruant to bring him the booke bound in white vellame lieng in his ſtudie in ſuch a place. The ſeruant dooing accordinglie, brought forth one of thoſe bookes ſo bound, being the booke intreating of the ſtate of the biſhop, and deliuered the ſame vnto his maiſter, who receiuing it (without further conſideration or looking on) gaue it to the cardinall to beare vnto the king. The cardinall hauing the booke, went from the biſhop, and after (in his ſtudie by himſelfe) vnderſtanding the contents thereof, he greatlie reioiſed, hauing now occaſion (which he long ſought for) offered vnto him to bring the biſhop into the kings diſgrace.

The biſhops owne booke diſaduantageable to himſelfe.

Wherefore he went forthwith to the king, deliuered the booke into his hands, and breefelie informed the king of the contents thereof; putting further into the kings head, that if at anie time he were deſtitute of a maſſe of monie, he ſhould not need to ſeeke further therefore than to the cofers of the biſhop, who by the tenor of his owne booke had accompted his proper riches and ſubſtance to the value of a hundred thouſand pounds. Of all which when the biſhop had intelligence(what he had don, how the cardinall vſed him, what the king ſaid, and what the world reported of him)he was ſtriken with ſuch greefe of the ſame, that he ſhortlie through extreame ſorrow ended his life at London, in the yeare of Chriſt 1523. After whoſe death the cardinall, which had long before gaped after the ſaid biſhoprike, in ſingular hope to atteine therevnto, had now his wiſh in effect: which he the more eaſilie compaſſed, for that he had his nets alwaies readie caſt, as aſſuring himſelfe to take a trout: following therein a prophane mans cautelous counſell, and putting the ſame in practiſe; who ſaith:

Anno Reg. 24.

The death of king Henrie the ſeuenth.

The ſickneſſe which held the king dailie more and more increaſing, he well perceiued that his end drew neere, and therefore meaning to doo ſome high pleaſure to his people, granted of his free motion a generall pardon to all men, for all offenſes doone ⁊ committed againſt anie his lawes or ſtatutes; theeues, murtherers, ⁊ certeine other were excepted. He paied alſo the fees of all priſoners in the gaoles in and about London, abiding there onelie for that dutie. He paied alſo the debts of all ſuch perſons as laie in the counters or Ludgate for fourtie ſhillings, ⁊ vnder; and ſome he releeued that were condemned in ten pounds. Hervpon were proceſſions generallie vſed euerie daie in euerie citie and pariſh, to praie to almightie God for his reſtoring to health and long continuance of the ſame. Neuertheleſſe, he was ſo waſted with his long maladie, that nature could no longer ſuſteine his life, and ſo he departed out of this world the two and twentith of Aprill, in his palace of Richmond, in the yeere of our Lord 1509. His corpſe was conueied with all funerall pompe to Weſtminſter, and there buried by the good queene his wife in a ſumptuous chapell, which he not long before had cauſed to be builded.

What children he had.

The deſcription of king Henrie the ſeuenth.

He reigned three and twentie yeares, and more than ſeuen moneths, and liued two and fiftie yeares. He had by his queene Elizabeth foure ſonnes, and foure daughters, of the which three remained aliue behind him. Henrie his ſecond ſon prince of Wales, which after him was king, Margaret queene of Scots, and the ladie Marie promiſed to Charles king of Caſtile. He was a man of bodie but leane and ſpare, albeit mightie and ſtrong therewith, of perſonage and ſtature ſomewhat higher than the meane ſort of men, of a wonderfull beautie and faire complexion, of countenance merie and ſmiling, eſpeciallie in his communication, his eies graie, his teeth ſingle, and haire thin, of wit in all things quicke and prompt, of a princelie ſtomach and hautie courage. In great perils, doubtfull affaires, and matters of importance, ſupernaturall and in maner diuine; for he ordered all his dooings aduiſedlie and with great deliberation.

Iuſtice mingled with mercie.

Beſides this, he was ſober, moderate, honeſt, courteous, bountious, and ſo much abhorring pride and arrogancie, that he was euer ſharpe and quicke to them that were noted with that fault. He was alſo an indifferent and vpright iuſticer, by the which one thing he allured to him the hearts of manie people, and yet to this ſeueritie of his he ioined a certeine mercifull pitie, which he did extend to thoſe that had offended the penall lawes, and were put to their fines by his iuſtices. He did vſe his rigour onelie(as he ſaid himſelfe) to dant, bring low, and abate the high minds and ſtout ſtomachs of the wealthie and wild people, nouriſhed vp in ſeditious factions and ciuill rebellions, rather than for the greedie deſire of monie; although ſuch as were ſcourged with amerciaments cried out, and ſaid it was rather for the reſpect of gaine, than for anie politike prouiſion. Indeed he left his coffers well ſtuffed, for he was no waſtfull conſumer of his riches by anie inordinat meanes.

Out of the biſhop of Rocheſters funerall ſermon preached in Paules church at London.

To conclude, he had aſmuch in him of gifts both of bodie, mind and fortune, as was poſſible for anie potentate or king to haue. His politike wiſedome in gouernance was ſingular, his wit alwaie quicke and readie, his reaſon pithie and ſubſtantiall, his memorie freſh and holding, his experience notable, his counſels fortunate and taken by wiſe deliberation, his ſpeech gratious in diuerſe languages, his perſon (as before ye haue heard) right comelie, his naturall complexion of the pureſt mixture, leagues and confederations he had with all chriſtian princes. His mightie power was dread euerie where, not onelie within his realme but without. Alſo his people were to him in as humble ſubiection as euer they were to king; his land manie a daie in peace and tranquillitie, his proſperitie in battell againſt his enimies was maruellous, his dealing in time of perils and dangers was cold and ſober, with great hardineſſe. If anie treaſon were conſpired againſt him, it came out wonderfullie. His buildings moſt goodlie, and after the neweſt caſt, all of pleaſure.

And ſo this king liuing all his time in fortunes fauour, in high honour, wealth and glorie, for his noble acts and prudent policies is worthie to be regiſtred in the booke of fame, leaſt time (the conſumer of all worthie things) ſhould blot out the memorie of his name here in earth, whoſe ſoule we truſt liueth in heauen, enioieng the fruition of the godhead, ⁊ thoſe pleaſures prepared for the faithfull. [In memorie of whome, his manifold vertues, with the fortunat ſucceſſe of his affaires, and the gratious deſcent of his loines, as they procured a famous report in nations farre and neere; ſo haue ſome at the contemplation of his princelineſſe, and euerie waie crowned with felicitie, made memorials of his magnificence; to the immortalitie of his high praiſe and vnblemiſhable renowme: among whome (for the truth of the report iuſtifiable by the contents of this hiſtorie) one commeth to mind, which may well ſerue for an epitaph:

Septimus Henricus factis eſt nomen adeptus
Præclarum claris ventura in ſecula famæ:
Ciuibus ille ſuis fuerat chariſſimus, hoſtes
Omnes iure ipſum metuebant: numinis almi
Relligioſus erat cultor, pietatis & æqui,
Verſutos hominéſque malos vehementiùs odit.
Viginti totos charus tréſque ampliùs annos
Regibus externis in ſummo vixit honore:
Magnanimus, iuſtus rex, prudens atque modeſtus,
Henrico hæredi moriens ſua regna reliquit,
Diuitiáſque, immenſum argenti pondus & auri.

Executors to Henrie the ſeuenth.

¶ The altar and ſepulture of the ſame king Henrie the ſeuenth, wherein he now reſteth, in his new chappell at Weſtminſter, was made and finiſhed in the yeare of our Lord 1519, by one Peter T. a painter of the citie of Florence, for the which he receiued one thouſand pounds ſterling for the whole ſtuffe and workemanſhip, at the hands of the kings executors, Richard biſhop of Wincheſter, Richard Fitz Iames biſhop of London, Thomas biſhop of Dureſme, Iohn biſhop of Rocheſter, Thomas duke of Norfolke treaſuror of England, Edward earle of Worceſter the king chamberleine, Iohn F. knight, chiefe iuſtice of the kings Bench, Robert R. knight, chiefe iuſtice of the common plees, ⁊c.]

Of learned men that liued in this kings daies(as maiſter Bale noteth them) theſe are recorded. Firſt George Rippeleie a Carmelite frier at Boſton, ſeene in the mathematikes, he wrote diuerſe treatiſes, and after his deceaſe was accounted a nekromancer; Iohn Erghom borne in Yorke, a blacke frier, a doctor of diuinitie profeſſed in Oxford, ſtudious of propheſies, as by the title of the works which he wrote it may appeare; Iohn Perſiuall a Chartreux monke; Thomas Maillorte a Welſhman borne, he wrote (I wote not what) of king Arthur, and of the round table; Iohn Rouſſe borne in Warwikeſhire, a diligent ſearcher of antiquities, wherupon few libraries were any where to be ſeene in England and Wales, where he made not ſearch for the ſame, and wrote ſundrie treatiſes of hiſtoricall arguments. He deceaſſed at Warwike the fourteenth of Ianuarie in the yeare 1491, and was buried in our ladie church there.

Thomas Scrope, otherwiſe ſurnamed Bradleie, deſcended of the noble familie of the Scrops, profeſſed ſundrie kinds of religions, as that of the order of ſaint Benet, and ſaint Dominike, and likewiſe he became a Carmelite, and laſt of all he fell to and preached the goſpell in haire and ſackecloth, till he vnderſtood himſelfe to be in the diſpleaſure of Walden and other, that could not alwais with ſuch ſingularitie in him or other, ſounding (as they tooke it) to the danger of bringing the doctrine of the Romiſh church in miſliking with the people; for then he withdrew himſelfe to his houſe againe, and there remained twentie yeares, leading an anchors life, but yet after that time he came abroad, and was aduanced to be a biſhop in Ireland, and went to the Roades in ambaſſage, from whence being returned, he went barefooted vp and downe in Norffolke, teaching in townes and in the countrie abroad the ten commandements, he liued till he came to be at the point of an hundred yeares old, & departed this life the fifteenth day of Ianuarie in the yeare of our Lord 1491, and was buried at Leſtolfe in Suffolke.

Dromorenſis epiſcopus.

Iohn Conneis a diuine and an Auguſtine frier in Norwich, wrote certeine rules of grammar, and other things printed by Richard Pinſon; Gefferie ſurnamed the Grammarian; Iohn Alcocke biſhop of Elie, changed a nunrie at Cambridge into a college named Ieſus college, about the yeere of Chriſt 1496. The chiefe cauſe of ſuppreſſing the nunrie is noted to be, for that the abbeſſe and other of the conuent liued diſſolute liues; Stephan Hawes a learned gentleman, and of ſuch reputation, as he was admitted to be one of the priuie chamber to king Henrie the ſeuenth; William Bintree, ſo called of a towne in Norffolke where he was borne, by profeſſion a Carmelite frier in Burnham, a great diuine; William Gallion an Auguſtine frier in Lin, and at length became prouinciall of his order.

Robert Fabian a citizen and merchant of London, an hiſtoriographer, he was in his time in good eſtimation for his wiſedome and wealth in the citie, ſo that he bare office and was ſhiriffe in the yeare 1493; William Celling, borne beſide Feuerſham in Kent, a monke of Canturburie; Thomas Bourchier deſcended of the noble linage of the earles of Eſſex, was firſt biſhop of Elie, and after remoued from thenſe to Canturburie, ſucceeding Iohn Kemp in that archbiſhops ſee, at length created by pope Paule the ſecond a cardinall; Philip Bromierd a Dominicke frier, a diuine; Iohn Miles a doctor of both the lawes, ciuill and canon, he ſtudied in Oxenford in the college of Braſen noſe, newlie founded in the daies of this king Henrie the ſeuenth by William Smith biſhop of Lincolne; Richard Shirborne biſhop of Chicheſter, and imploied in ambaſſage to diuerſe princes, as a man moſt meet thereto for his ſingular knowledge in learning and eloquence.

Robert Viduus vicar of Thakeſteed in Eſſex, and a prebendarie canon of Welles, an excellent poet; Peter Kenighall a Carmelit frier, but borne of worſhipfull linage in France, hauing an Engliſhman to his father, was ſtudent in Oxenford, and became a notable preacher; Iohn Morton firſt biſhop of Elie, and after archbiſhop of Canturburie the ſixtie and fourth in number that ruled that ſee, he was aduanced to the dignitie of a cardinall, and by king Henrie the ſeuenth made lord chancellor, a worthie councellor and a modeſt, he was borne of worſhipfull parents in Cheſhire, & departed this life in the yeare of our Lord 1500; Henrie Medwall chapleine to the ſaid Morton; Edmund Dudleie borne of noble parentage, ſtudied the lawes of this land, and profited highlie in knowledge of the ſame, he wrote a booke intituled Arbor rei publicæ, the tree of the common wealth: of this man ye haue heard before in the life of this king, and more (God willing) ſhall be ſaid in the beginning of the next king, as the occaſion of the hiſtorie leadeth; Iohn Wokingham an excellent ſcholeman; William Blackeneie a Carmelit frier, a doctor of diuinitie, and a nekromancer.

Thus farre Henrie the ſeuenth, ſonne to Edmund earle of Richmond.

Henrie the eight, ſonne and ſucceſſor to Henrie the ſeuenth.

AFter the death of the noble prince Henrie the ſeauenth, his ſonne Henrie the eight began his reigne the two and twentith daie of Aprill in the yeare of the world 5475, after the birth of our ſauiour 1509, and in the eightéenth yeare of his age, in the ſixtéenth yeare of Maximilian then being emperour, in the eleuenth yeare of Lewes the twelfe that then reigned in France, and in the twentith yeare of king James the fourth as then ruling ouer the Scots. Whoſe ſtile was proclamed by the ſound of a trumpet in the citie of London, the thrée and twentith daie of the ſaid moneth, with much gladneſſe and reioiſing of the people. And the ſame daie he departed from his manour of Richmond, to the Tower of London, where he remained cloſelie and ſecret with his councell, till the funerals of his father were finiſhed.

1509 Anno Reg.1.

Henrie the eight proclamed king.

Although this king now comming to the crowne, was but yong (as before is ſaid) yet hauing béene in his firſt yeares trained vp in learning, did for reſpect of his owne ſuertie and good gouernement of his people, prudentlie (by the aduiſe of his grandmother the counteſſe of Richmond and Derbie) elect & chooſe forth of the moſt wiſe and graue perſonages to be of his priuie councell, namelie ſuch as he knew to be of his fathers right déere and familiar fréends, whoſe names were as followeth. William Warham archbiſhop of Canturburie and chancellor of England, Richard Fox biſhop of Wincheſter, Thomas Howard earle of Surrie, and treaſuror of England, George Talbot earle of Shreweſburie, and lord ſteward of the kings houſhold, Charles Summerſet lord chamberleine, ſir Thomas Louell, ſir Henrie Wiat, doctor Thomas Ruthall, and ſir Edward Poinings.

Polydor.

Councellors to king Henrie the eight.

Theſe graue and wiſe councellors, fearing leaſt ſuch abundance of riches and welth as the king was now poſſeſſed of, might moue his yong yeares vnto riotous forgetting of himſelfe (for vnto no king at anie time before, was left greater or the like riches, as well in readie coine, as in iewels and other moueables, as was left to him by his father) they therefore his ſaid councellors trauelled in ſuch prudent ſort with him, that they got him to be preſent with them when they ſat in councell; ſo to acquaint him with matters perteining to the politike gouernment of the realme, that by little and little he might applie himſelfe to take vpon him the rule and adminiſtration of publike affaires, with the which at the firſt he could not well indure to be much troubled, being rather inclined to follow ſuch pleaſant paſtimes as his youthfull yong yeares did more delite in, and therefore could be verie well contented, that other graue perſonages ſhould take paines therein.

King Henries riches.

His councellors good meaning.

The ſame daie alſo that the king came to the Tower, the lord Henrie Stafford brother to the duke of Buckingham was arreſted, and committed to the Tower: and the ſame daie alſo doctor Ruthall was named biſhop of Durham. The fiue and twentith daie of Aprill was proclamed, that the kings grace ratified all the pardons granted by his father, and alſo pardoned all ſuch perſons as were then in ſute for anie offenſe whatſoeuer it was; treaſon, murther, and fellonie onelie excepted. And now, whereas the performance of the deceaſſed kings will was thought right expedient with all ſpéed to be performed, a proclamation was alſo ſet forth and publiſhed thorough the realme, that if anie man could proue himſelfe to be hurt, and depriued of his goods wrongfullie by the commiſſioners of the forfeitures; he ſhould come and preſent his plaint to the king, being readie to ſatiſfie euerie one of all iniuries ſuſteined.

A proclamation.

After this proclamation was notified abroad, all ſuch as had béene conſtreined either by right or by wrong (as Polydor ſaith) to paie anie thing for anie forfeitures of lawes and cuſtomes by them tranſgreſſed, came flocking to the court, & there declared their gréefs, in what ſort they had wrongfullie béene compelled (as they ſurmiſed) to paie this or that ſumme. The councell heard euerie mans complaint, and ſuch as were found to haue paid anie thing without plaine proofe of iuſt cauſe, they tooke ſuch order for them, that they had their monie againe. Which being once knowne, it was a ſtrange thing to ſée how thicke other came in; yea euen thoſe that had béene worthilie fined & puniſhed for their diſorderlie tranſgreſſions, making earneſt ſute for reſtitution, feining and forging manie things to make their cauſe ſéeme good, and to ſtand with equitie.

Multitudes of ſuters what ſhifts they made to be heard.

And the better to be heard in their ſute, they made friends as well with bribes and large gifts as otherwiſe, leauing no waies vnaſſaied to compaſſe their deſires. Which gréedines in ſuch multitude of ſuters, brought the commiſſioners, and others that had delt in the forfeitures into danger, and did themſelues no good: for the councell perceiuing that it was not poſſible to ſatiſfie them all, refuſed to heare anie further complaints or ſutes for reſtitution: but thought it beſt to commit thoſe to priſon, by whom the complainants pretended themſelues to haue béene wronged. And herevpon was ſir Richard Empſon knight, and Edmund Dudleie eſquier, great councellors to the late king attached, and brought to the Tower, thereby to quiet mens minds, that made ſuch importunate ſute to haue their monie againe reſtored, which in the late kings daies they had béene compelled to diſburſe, thorough the rigorous proceedings, as they alleged, of the ſaid two councellors, and others.

Empſon and Dudleie committed to the Tower.

Promoters puniſhed.

I.S. pag.893.

Trulie great exclamation was made againſt them, as often happeneth; that where anie thing is doone contrarie to the liking of the people, thoſe that be dealers vnder the prince, and by his commandement proceed in the execution thereof, run in hatred of the multitude. But how ſo euer it was, their apprehenſion and committing to priſon was thought by the wiſe to be procured by the malice of them that in the late kings daies were offended with their authoritie. Shortlie after (as Edward Hall ſaith) were apprehended diuerſe other perſons, that were called promoters, as Canbie, Page, Smith, Derbie, Wright, Simſon, and Stocton; of which the more part ware papers, and ſtood on the pillorie. [And (as an other ſaith, who termeth them ringleaders of falſe queſts in London) they rode about the citie with their faces to the horſſes tailes, and papers on their heads, and after they had beene ſet on the pillorie in Cornehill, they were brought againe to Newgate, where they died all within ſeauen daies after for verie ſhame.]

The funerall pompe and ſolemnitie of Henrie the ſeuenth.

When all things were prepared readie for the funerall of the late king, his corps with all ſumptuous pompe and ſolemne ceremonies, was conueied from Richmond to ſaint Georges field, where the clergie of the citie met it: and at the bridge the maior and his brethren with manie commoners all clothed in blacke likewiſe met it, and gaue their attendance on the ſame thorough the citie, to the cathedrall church of ſaint Paule, where was ſoong a ſolemne dirige and maſſe, and a ſermon made by the biſhop of Rocheſter Iohn Fiſher. The next daie the corps was had to Weſtminſter, and there the daie following, put into the earth with all due ſolemnities as apperteined. [Notwithſtanding this breefe remembrance of king Henries ſolemne funerall, might ſeeme ſufficient in the iudgement of ſome, without further amplification; yet bicauſe it is good in others opinion (and thoſe not of meaneſt wit) to ſet downe things of ſtate at large, if conuenient helps thereto maie be had: therefore you ſhall haue the whole ſolemnitie of the ſaid roiall funerall, as it is found recorded by Edward Hall.

Edw.Hall, in Hen.8.fol j.

After that all things (ſaith he) neceſſarie for the interrement and funerall pompe of the late king, were ſumptuouſlie prepared and doone: the corps of the ſaid deceaſſed king was brought out of his priuie chamber into the great chamber, where he reſted three daies, and euerie daie had there dirige and maſſe ſoong by a prelat mitred. From thenſe he was conueied into the hall, where he was alſo three daies, and had like ſeruice there; and ſo three daies in the chappell. And in euerie of theſe three places, was a hearſe of wax garniſhed with baners, and nine mourners giuing their attendance all the ſeruice time: and euerie daie they offered, and euerie place hanged with blacke cloth. Vpon Wedneſdaie the ninth daie of Maie, the corps was put into a charriot, couered with blacke cloth of gold, drawne with fiue great courſers all couered with blacke veluet, garniſhed with cuſhins of fine gold: and ouer the corps was an image or repreſentation of the late king, laied on cuſhins of gold, and the ſaid image was apparelled in the kings rich robes of eſtate, with a crowne on the head with ball and ſcepter in the hands: the charriot was garniſhed with baners and pencels of the armes of his dominions, titles and genealogies.

The corps put into a charriot ſumptuouſlie garniſhed.

The order of the pompe and mourners.

When the charriot was thus ordered, the kings chappell, and a great number of prelats ſet forward praieng. Then followed all the kings ſeruants in blacke, then followed the charriot: and after the charriot nine mourners, and on euerie ſide were caried long torches & ſhort, to the number of ſix hundred, & in this order they came to ſaint Georges field, from Richmond. There met with them all the preeſts and clerks and religious men within the citie & without, which went formoſt before the K. chappell. The maior and his brethren with manie commoners all clothed in blacke, met with the corps at London bridge, and ſo gaue their attendance on the ſame through the citie. And in good order the companies paſſed thorough the citie, whereof the ſtreets on euerie ſide were ſet with long torches, and on the ſtals ſtood yoong children holding tapers; & ſo with great reuerence the charriot was brought to the cathedrall church of S. Paule, where the bodie was taken out and caried into the quire, and ſet vnder a goodlie hearſe of wax garniſhed with baners, pencels, and cuſhins, where was ſoong a ſolemne dirige and a maſſe with a ſermon made by the biſhop of Rocheſter. During which time, the kings houſhold and the mourners repoſed them in the biſhops palace.

The charriot brought into Paules church.

Deſcription of the curious hearſe at Weſtminſter.

The next daie the corps in like order was remoued towards Weſtminſter: ſir Edward Howard bearing the kings baner on a courſer trapped in the armes of the deceaſed king. In Weſtminſter was a curious hearſe, made of nine principals, all full of lights, which were lighted at the comming of the corps, which was taken out of the charriot by ſix lords and ſet vnder the hearſe; the image or the repreſentation lieng vpon the cuſhin on a large pall of gold. The hearſe was double railed; within the firſt railes ſat the mourners, and within the ſecond raile ſtood knights bearing baners of ſaints, and without the ſame ſtood officers of armes. When the mourners were ſet, Gartier king at armes, cried; For the ſoule of the noble prince king Henrie the ſeauenth late king of this realme: then the quire began Placebo, and ſo ſoong dirige: which being finiſhed, the mourners departed into the palace, where they had a void, and ſo repoſed for that night. The next daie were three maſſes ſolemnelie ſoong by biſhops, and at the laſt maſſe was offered the kings baner and courſer, his coat of armes, his ſword, his target, and his helme: and at the end of maſſe the mourners offered vp rich palles of cloath of gold and baudekin: and when the quire ſang, Libera me; the bodie was put into the earth.

The bodie of the dead king interred.

Then the lord treaſuror, lord ſteward, lord chamberleine, the treaſuror and comptrollor of the kings houſhold, brake their ſtaues and caſt them into the graue. Then Gartier cried with a lowd voice; Viue le roy Henrie le huicteſme, roy d'Angleterre, & de France, ſire d'Irland. Then all the mourners, and all other that had giuen their attendance on this funerall obſequie, departed to the palace, where they had a great and a ſumptuous feaſt. Wonder it were to write of the lamentation that was made for this prince amongſt his ſeruants, and other of the wiſeſt ſort; and the ioie that was made for his death by ſuch as were troubled by rigour of his law: yet the toward hope which in all points appeared in the yoong king did both repaire and comfort the heauie hearts of them, which had loſt ſo wiſe and ſage a prince: and alſo did put out of the minds of ſuch as were releeued by the ſaid kings death, all their old grudge and rancor, and confirmed their new ioie by the new grant of his pardon.

After that the funerals of the ſaid late king were once ended, great preparation was made for the coronation of the new king, which was appointed on Midſummer daie next inſuing. During the time of which preparation, the king was aduiſed by ſome of his councell to take to wife the ladie Katharine, late wife to his brother prince Arthur, leaſt ſhe hauing ſo great a dowrie as was appointed to hir, might marrie out of the realme, which ſhould be to his hinderance. The king being hereto perſuaded, eſpouſed the ſaid ladie Katharine the third daie of Iune, the which marriage was diſpenſed with by pope Iulie, at the ſute of hir father king Ferdinando. On the eleuenth daie of this moneth of Iune, the king came from Gréenewich to the Tower ouer London bridge and ſo by Grace church, with whome came manie a gentleman richlie apparelled, but ſpeciallie the duke of Buckingham, which had a gowne all of goldſmiths worke, verie coſtlie.

The duke of Buckinghams rich arraie.

On fridaie the two and twentith day of Iune, the king with the quéene being in the Tower of London, made foure and twentie knights of the Bath. And the morow following, being ſaturdaie the foure and twentith of Iune, his grace with the quéene departed from the Tower through London, the ſtréets being hanged with tapeſtrie and cloth of arras, verie richlie; and a great part of the ſouth ſide of Cheape with cloth of gold, & ſo was ſome part of Cornehill. The ſtréets were railed & barred on the one ſide, from ouer againſt Grace church to Bredſtréet in Cheapeſide, where euerie occupation ſtood in their liueries in order, beginning with baſe and meane occupations, and ſo aſcending to the worſhipfull crafts. Higheſt and laſtlie ſtood the maior with the aldermen. The goldſmiths ſtals vnto the end of the Old change, being repleniſhed with virgins in white, with branches of white wax: the prieſts and clearkes in rich copes, with croſſes and cenſers of ſiluer, with cenſing his grace and the quéene alſo, as they paſſed. The features of his bodie, his goodlie perſonage, his amiable viſage, princelie countenance, with the noble qualities of his roiall eſtate, to euerie man knowen, néedeth no reherſall, conſidering that (for lacke of cunning) I cannot expreſſe the gifts of grace and of nature that God indued him with all.

K. Henries apparell at his coronatiõ.

Yet partlie to deſcribe his apparell, it is to be noted, his grace ware in his vppermoſt apparell, a robe of crimſin veluet, furred with ermins, his iacket or coat of raiſed gold, the placard imbrodered with diamonds, rubies, emerauds, great pearles, and other rich ſtones, a great bauderike about his necke of great balaſſes. The trapper of his horſſe damaſke gold, with a déepe purfle of ermins. His knights and eſquiers for his bodie in crimſin veluet; and all the gentlemen, with other of his chappell, and all his officers and houſhold ſeruants were appareled in ſcarlet. The barons of the fiue portes bare the canopie or cloth of eſtate. For to recite vnto you the great eſtates by name, the order of their going, the number of the lords ſpirituall & temporall, knights, eſquiers, and gentlemen, and their coſtlie and rich apparell of ſeuerall deuiſes and faſhions, who tooke vp his horſſe beſt, or who was richeſt beſéene; it would aſke long time, and yet I ſhould omit manie things, and faile of the number, for they were verie manie: wherefore I paſſe ouer. But this I dare well ſaie, there was no lacke or ſcarſitie of cloth of tiſſue, cloth of gold, cloth of ſiluer, broderie, or of goldſmiths works: but in more plentie and aboundance than hath béene ſéene or read of at anie time before, and thereto manie and great numbers of chaines of gold, & bauderikes both maſſie and great.

The kings traine and the pompe of the ſame.

Alſo before the kings highneſſe rode two gentlemen richlie apparelled, and about their bodies ouerthwart, they bare two robes, the one of the duchie of Guien, and the other for the duchie of Normandie, with hats on their heads powdered with ermins, for the eſtate of the ſame. Next followed two perſons of good eſtate, the one bearing his cloke, the other his hat, apparelled both in goldſmiths worke and broderie, their horſſes trapped in burned ſiluer, drawen ouer with cordes of gréene ſilke and gold, the edges and borders of their apparell being fretted with gold of damaſke. After them came ſir Thomas Brandon maſter of the kings horſſe, clothed in tiſſue, brodered with roſes of fine gold, and ouerthwart his bodie a great bauderike of gold, great and maſſie; his horſſe trapped in gold, leading by a raine of ſilke; the kings ſpare horſſe trapped bard wiſe, with harneſſe brodred with bullion gold, curionſlie wrought by goldſmiths. Then next followed the nine children of honor vpon great courſers, appareled on their bodies in blue veluet, powdered with floure delices of gold, & chaines of goldſmiths worke, euerie one of their horſſes trapped with a trapper of the kings title, as of England and France, Gaſcoigne, Guien, Normandie, Angiou, Cornewall, Wales, Ireland, &c: wrought vpon veluets, with imbroderie, and goldſmiths worke.

The quéenes traine and the ſumptuouſneſſe of the ſame.

Then next following in order, came the quéenes retinue, as lords, knights, eſquiers, and gentlemen in their degrées, well mounted, and richlie apparelled in tiſſue, cloth of gold, of ſiluer, tinſels, and veluets imbrodered, freſh and goodlie to behold. The quéene then by name Katharine, ſitting in hir litter borne by two white palfries, the litter couered and richlie appareled, and the palfries trapped in white cloth of gold; hir perſon apparelled in white ſatin imbrodered, hir haire hanging downe to hir backe of very great length, beautifull and goodlie to behold, & on hir head a coronall ſet with manie rich orient ſtones. Next after, ſix honorable perſonages on white palfries all apparelled in cloth of gold, and then a chariot couered, and the ladies therein all apparelled in cloth of gold. And another ſort of ladies, and then another chariot, then the ladies next the chariot, and ſo in order, euerie one after their degrées in cloth of gold, cloth of ſiluer, tinſels, and veluet, with imbroderies. Euerie couplement of the ſaid chariots, and the draught harneſſes were powdered with ermins mixt with cloth of gold: & ſo with much ioy & honour they came to Weſtminſter, where was high preparation made, aſwell for the ſaid coronation, as alſo for the ſolemne feaſts and iuſts therevpon to be had and doone

The coronation of king Henrie and quéene Katharine.

The morrow following being ſundaie, and alſo Midſummer daie, this noble prince with his quéene at time conuenient, vnder their canopies borne by the barons of the fiue ports, went from the ſaid palace to Weſtminſter abbaie vpon cloth, called vulgarlie cloth of raie; the which cloth was cut and ſpoiled by the rude and common people, immediatlie after their repaire into the abbaie; where, according to the ſacred obſeruance & ancient cuſtome, his grace with the quéene were annointed and crowned by the archbiſhop of Canturburie, with other prelats of the realme there preſent, and the nobilitie, with a great multitude of commons of the ſame. It was demanded of the people, whether they would receiue, obeie, and take the ſame moſt noble prince for their king? Who with great reuerence, loue, and deſire, ſaid and cried; Yea yea. After the which ſolemnitie and coronation finiſhed, the lords ſpirituall and temporall did to him homage, and returned to Weſtminſter hall with the quéenes grace, euerie one vnder their canopies; where, by the lord Marſhall & his tipped ſtaues was made roome, and euerie lord, and other noble men, according to their tenures, before claimed and viewed, ſéene and allowed by the lords, and other of his graces councell, entred into ſuch roome and office that daie, to execute their ſeruices accordinglie.

Homage doone to the king at his coronatiõ both of the lords ſpirituall & temporall.

The kings eſtate on the right hand, & the quéenes on the left hand, the cupboord of nine ſtages, their noble perſonages being ſet: firſt, at the bringing of the firſt courſe, the trumpets ſounded. And in came the duke of Buckingham, mounted vpon a great courſer, richlie trapped and imbrodered, and the lord ſteward in likewiſe on an horſſe trapped in cloth of gold, riding before the ſeruice, which was ſumptuous, with manie ſubtilties, ſtrange deuiſes, with ſeuerall poſes, and manie deintie diſhes. At the kings feet vnder the table were certeine gentlemen; and in likewiſe with the queene, who there continued, during that long and roiall feaſt. What ſhould I ſpeake or write of the ſumptuous, fine, and delicate meats prepared for this high and honorable coronation, prouided for aſwell in the parties beyond the ſeas, as in manie and ſundrie places within this realme, where God ſo aboundantlie hath ſent ſuch plentie and foiſon? Or of the honorable order of the ſeruices, the cleane handeling and breaking of meats, the ordering of the diſhes, with the plentifull abundance? So that none of anie eſtate being there did lacke, nor no honorable or worſhipfull perſon went vnfeaſted.

Sir Robert Dimmocke the kings champion.

The knights anſwer to the king of heralds.

The ſecond courſe being ſerued: in at the hall doore entered a knight, armed at all points, his baſes rich tiſſue embrodered, a great plume and a ſumptuous of oſtrich feathers on his helmet, ſitting on a great courſer, trapped in tiſſue, and embrodered with the armes of England, and of France, and an herald of armes before him. And paſſing through the hall, he preſented himſelfe with humble reuerence before the kings maieſtie, to whome Gartier king of heralds cried and ſaid with a lowd voice; Sir knight from whence come you, and what is your pretenſe? This knights name was ſir Robert Dimmocke, champion to the king by tenure of his inheritance, who anſwered the ſaid king of armes in effect after this maner: Sir, the place that I come from is not materiall, nor the cauſe of my repaire hither is not concerning anie matter of anie place or countrie, but onelie this: and therewithall commanded his herald to make an O yes. Then ſaid the knight to the king of armes; Now ſhall ye heare the cauſe of my cōming and pretenſe. Then he commanded his owne herald, by proclamation to ſaie; If there be anie perſon, of what eſtate or degree ſoeuer he be, that will ſaie or proue, that king Henrie the eight is not the rightfull inheritor and king of this realme, I ſir Robert Dimmocke here his champion, offer my gloue, to fight in his quarell with any perſon to the vtterance. Which proclamation was made in ſundrie places of the hall: and at euerie time his gantlet caſt downe, in the maintenance thereof.

The maner of the ſame knights tenure.

After theſe ſeuerall proclamations doone, and offers made, the ſaid knight or champion eftſoones repaired to the kings preſence, demanding drinke; to whome the kings grace ſent a cup of gold with wine, whereof after this knight had drunke, he demanded the couer of the ſaid cup, which to him alſo was deliuered: that doone he departed out of the hall, with the ſaid cup and couer as his owne. The maner of his tenure is this, that at the coronation of the king, he ſhall go to the armorie, and there take the kings beſt harneſſe ſaue one, the beſt and rich baſes ſauing one, then of the plumes or other things for the garniſhing of his creaſt or helme; and ſo to the ſtable, there taking the next courſer or horſſe to the beſt, with like trappers, & ſo furniſhed, to enter (as afore) and his office doone, to haue all theſe things with the cup of gold and couer to his owne vſe. After the departure of the ſaid champion, the king of armes with all the heralds and other officers of armes, made proclamations in ſeuerall places of the hail, crieng largeſſe. Brieflie I paſſe ouer this high and long ſolemnitie of this honorable coronation and feaſt, more honorable than of the great Ceſar, whome manie hiſtoriographers ſo highlie ſet out and magnifie.

Sir Stephā Genings maior of London.

Now when the tables were voided, the wafers were brought. Then ſir Stephan Genings that time maior of London, whome the king before he ſat downe to dinner had dubbed knight, which began the earles table that daie, aroſe from the place where he ſat, to ſerue the king with ipocras in a cup of gold: which cup, after his grace had dronken thereof, was with the couer giuen vnto the ſaid ſir Stephan, like as other his predeceſſors, maiors of the ſaid citie, were wont to haue at the coronation of the king. Then after the ſurnap laied, and that the kings grace and the queene had waſhed, euerie of them vnder their cloths of eſtate, the tables being auoided, went vnto their chambers. For the more honour and innobling of this triumphant coronation, there were prepared both iuſts and turneis to be doone in the palace of Weſtminſter, where, for the kings grace and the queene, was framed a faire houſe, couered with tapeſtrie, and hanged with rich clothes of arrais, and in the ſaid palace was made a curious founteine and ouer it a caſtell, on the top therof a great crowne imperiall, all the imbatelling with roſes and pomegranats gilded.

Iuſts and turnements.

Vnder and about the ſaid caſtell, a curious vine, the leaues and grapes thereof gilded with fine gold, the walles of the ſame caſtell coloured white & greene loſengis, and in euerie loſing either a roſe or a pomegranat, and a ſheafe of arrowes, or elſe H. and K. gilded with fine gold, with certeine arches and turrets gilded, to ſupport the ſame caſtell. And the targets of the armes of the defendants, appointed for the ſaid iuſts, therevpon ſumptuouſlie ſet. And out at ſeuerall places of the ſame caſtell, aſwell on the daie of the coronation, as on the ſaid daies of the iuſts & turneies, out of the mouthes of certeine beaſts or gargels did run red, white, and claret wine. The enterpriſers of theſe iuſts, was Thomas lord Howard, heire apparant to the earle of Surrie, ſir Edward Howard admerall his brother, the lord Richard brother to the Marques Dorſet, ſir Edmund Howard, ſir Thomas Kneuet, and Charles Brandon eſquier. The trumpets blew to the field, the freſh yoong galants and noble men gorgeouſlie apparrelled, with curious deuiſes of cuts and of embroderies, as well in their coates as in trappers for their horſſes, ſome in gold, ſome in ſiluer, ſome in tinſels, and diuerſe other in goldſmithes worke, goodlie to behold.

The enterpriſers of the ſaid iuſts.

Goodlie ſhews & delightfull.

Theſe firſt entred the field, in taking vp & turning their horſſes, netlie and freſhlie. Then followed a deuiſe (caried by ſtrength of men and other prouiſion) framed like a caſtell, or a turret, wrought with fine cloth of gold: the top whereof was ſpred with roſes and pomegranats, hanging downe on euerie ſide of the ſaid deuiſe; wherein was a ladie, bearing a ſhield of chriſtall named Pallas. After whom the ſaid lord Howard with his companions followed, armed at all points, their baſes and bards, or trappers, were of greene veluet, beaten with roſes and pomegranats of gold, brodred with fringes of damaſke gold. The ſaid deuiſe or turret, being brought before the king, the ladie Pallas preſented the ſaid perſons, whom ſhe named hir ſcholers, to the kings highnes, beſeeching the ſame to accept them as hir ſcholers, who were deſirous to ſerue him, to the increaſe of their honours; which ſaid ſcholers had about them on foot to the number of an hundred perſons, freſhlie apparrelled, in veluets of ſundrie colours, with hoſe & bonets according to the ſame. And further, the ſaid ladie deſired the king, that it might pleaſe his grace, that hir ſaid ſcholers might be defendants to all commers, which requeſt was granted.

Pallas knights the defendants.

Another band of horſſemen richlie arraied.

Then came in an other band of horſſemen, freſhlie and well apparelled in cloth of gold, in ſiluer, in goldſmithes worke, & broderie, to the number of three ſcore, with trappers according to their garments, with great bauderikes, collars, and chaines of gold about their necks and trauerſe their bodies, euerie man with a coife of gold on his head, and a great plume of feathers thervpon, ſome of one colour and ſome of an other, entering before into the field with drums and fifes a great number, euerie man taking vp his horſſe in his beſt maner, as well for their ladies, as alſo for laud or praiſe to be giuen them. After whome followed a good number of footmen, in veluets and other ſilkes, cut and embrodered, with hoſe to the ſame accordinglie, and bonets and other furniture, after a freſh and luſtie faſhion. Next to them came on horſſebacke eight perſons, whoſe names were, ſir Iohn Pechie, ſir Edward Neuill, ſir Edward Guildeford, ſir Iohn Carre, ſir William Parre, ſir Giles Capell, ſir Griffith Dun, and ſir Rouland, armed alſo at all points, with ſhields of their owne armes, with rich plumes, and other deuiſes on their head péeces, their baſes and trappers of tiſſue, cloth of gold, ſiluer and veluet; and next before them, a gentleman on horſſebacke, in a coat of blue veluet, embrodered with gold, and his horſſe trapped in the ſame ſute, with a ſpeare of gold on his thigh, and the ſame preſented to the quéene: ſaieng, that it was informed thoſe knights of his companie, how that dame Pallas had preſented ſix of hir ſcholers to the king, but whether they came to learne, or to teach feats of armes they knew not.

Eight knights armed at all points.

He further declared, that his knights were come to doo feats of armes, for the loue of ladies. Wherfore he beſought hir grace, to licence thoſe knights to prooue themſelues againſt dame Pallas ſcholers: and that in caſe hir ſcholers brake more ſpeares on the ſaid knights, by the view of the iudges, and the report of the heralds, than the ſame knights ſhould doo on them; then the ſaid ſcholers of Pallas knights to haue the ſpeare of gold for their priſe. And if the knights brake more ſpeares than dame Pallas ſcholers, the ſaid knights to haue the chriſtall ſhield. The which requeſt to them granted, the iuſts began, where euerie man did acquite himſelfe well and valiantlie: but who had the priſe of other, I know not. The night cōming on, the iuſts ended. The next daie approached the foreſaid defenders, ſcholers to Pallas on horſſebacke, armed * cape a pie, the one ſide of their baſes and bards of their horſſes white veluet, embrodered with roſes of gold and other embroderies; the other ſide gréene veluet embrodered with pomegranats of gold, euerie one of them on his head péece had an heare of flat gold of damaſke, and ſo preſented themſelues before the king readie to tourneie.

* From head to foot.

Dianas knights.

Then immediatlie on the other part came in the forenamed eight knights, readie armed, their baſes and bards of their horſſe gréene ſattin, embrodered with freſh deuiſes of bramble branches, of fine gold curiouſlie wrought, powdered all ouer. And after them a great number of hornes blowne, by men apparelled in gréene cloth, with caps and hoſen of like ſute, as foreſters or kéepers; & a pagent made like a parke, paled with pales of white and greene, wherein were certeine fallow deare, and in the ſame parke curious trées made by craft, with buſhes, fernes, and other things in likewiſe wrought, goodlie to behold. The which parke or deuiſe, being brought before the quéene, had certeine gates thereof opened, the deare ran out therof into the palace, the greiehounds were let ſlip and killed the deare: the which deare ſo killed, were preſented to the quéene and the ladies by the foreſaid knights.

A conceipt or deuiſe of a parke with deare, &c.

Crocheman, which the daie before brought in the ſpeare of gold, there declared, that the ſame knights were ſeruants to Diana, and being in their paſtime of hunting, newes were brought vnto them, that dame Pallas knights were come into thoſe parts, to doo déeds of armes: wherefore they had left their hunting and chaſe, and repaired alſo thither, to encounter with the knights of Pallas, and ſo to fight with them for the loue of ladies, to the vtterance: ſaieng, that if Pallas knights vanquiſhed the other, or made them to leaue the field, then they to haue the deare killed, and the greiehounds that ſlue them. And in caſe Dianas knights ouercame the other, they to haue their ſwords, and none other thing more. Wherevpon the queene and ladies ſent to the king to haue his aduiſe and pleaſure in this behalfe. His grace conceiuing that there was ſome grudge and diſpleaſure betwéene them, thinking if ſuch requeſt were to them granted ſome inconuenience might inſue, would not therevnto agrée: ſo that for the appeaſing thereof it was awarded, that both parties ſhould tourneie togither, giuing but ſome certeine ſtrokes, which doone they departed: and ſo theſe iuſts brake vp, and the priſes giuen to euerie man after his deſerts.]

The kings wiſedome in preuenting an inconuenience

The king pardoned the lord Henrie brother to the duke of Buckingham, committed to the Tower (as yée haue heard) vpon ſuſpicion of treaſon: but when nothing could be prooued againſt him, he was ſet at libertie, and at the parlement after created earle of Wilſhire. Alſo this yeare the king ordeined fiftie gentlemen to be ſpeares, euerie of them to haue an archer, a demilance, and a cuſtrell; and euerie ſpeare to haue thrée great horſſes to be attendant on his perſon, of the which band the earle of Eſſex was lieutenant, and ſir Iohn Pechie capteine. This ordinance continued but a while, the charges was ſo great; for there were none of them, but they and their horſſes were apparelled and trapped in cloth of gold, ſiluer & goldſmithes worke. This yeare alſo was a great peſtilence in the towne of Calis, ſo that the king ſent one ſir Iohn Pechie with thrée hundred men to tarrie there vpon the defenſe of that towne till the ſickneſſe was ceaſſed. Furthermore, this yeare the king ſummoned his parlement in the moneth of Nouember, to begin in the moneth of Ianuarie next enſuing: whereof ſir Thomas Inglefield was choſen ſpeaker.

Henrie ÿ duke of Buckinghams brother created erle of Wilſhire.

A great plague in Calis.

A parlement.

At this parlement ſir Richard Empſon knight, and Edmund Dudleie eſquier late councellors vnto king Henrie the ſeauenth, were atteinted of high treaſon. They were charged with manie offenſes committed in the late kings daies, as partlie before yée haue heard; who being brought before the councell, as they were graue and wiſe perſonages, and both of them learned and ſkilfull in the lawes of the realme: ſo had they vtterance verie readie whereby to deliuer the conceipts of their minds with ſingular dexteritie, ſpeciallie in a caſe of importance; in ſo much that when the ſaid parties were conuented before the aſſemblie of the lords, they alleged for themſelues right conſtantlie (in their owne defenſes) much good and ſufficient matter, of whome Empſon (being the elder in yeares) had theſe words.

Empſon and Dudleie atteinted of treaſon.

A ſpeech vttered by Empſon to the lords of the councell to find fauour.

I know (right honorable) that it is not vnknowne to you, how profitable and neceſſarie lawes are for the good preſeruation of mans life: without the which neither houſe, towne, nor citie can long continue or ſtand in ſafetie. Which lawes héere in England, thorough negligence of magiſtrates, were partlie decaied, and partlie quite forgotten and worne out of vſe; the Moſt of the lords of the councell againſt Empſon.

Manie of the councell thought that he had ſpoken well, and ſo as ſtood with great reaſon: but yet the greater number (ſuppoſing that the reuiuing of thoſe lawes had proceeded rather of a couetous meaning in the king and them, than of anie zeale of iuſtice, and hauing alſo themſelues felt the ſmart latelie before for their owne offenſes and tranſgreſſions) had conceiued ſuch malice towards the men, that they thought it reaſon, that ſuch as had beene dealers therein, were worthie to loſe their heads, in like ſort as they had cauſed others to loſe their monie. Hereupon, their accuſors were mainteined, and manie od matters narrowlie ſought out againſt them, as by two ſeuerall inditements framed againſt ſir Richard Empſon (the copies whereof I haue ſeene) it may well appeare.

Matters obiected againſt Empſon.

In the one he is charged, that to win the fauour and credit of the late king, not weieng his honor nor the proſperitie of him, or wealth of his realme, hee had (in ſubuerſion of the lawes of the land) procured diuerſe perſons to be indicted of diuerſe crimes and offenſes ſurmiſed againſt them, and thervpon to be committed to priſon, without due proces of law; who not ſuffered to come to their anſwers, were kept in durance, till they had compounded for their fines, to their great importable loſſes, and vtter impoueriſhment. Alſo diuerſe vntrue offices of intruſions and alienations, made by ſundrie the late kings liege people, into manors, lands, and tenements were found; it being vntrulie alleged, that they held the ſame of the king In capite. And when ſuch perſons as were thus vexed, offered to trauerſe thoſe offices, they could not be admitted thereto, in ſuch due and lawfull forme as in ſuch caſes the law prouideth, till they had compounded to paie great fines and ranſomes.

Wrong mainteined againſt the kings liege people.

Iniurie doone to the kings wards.

Moreouer the kings wards, after they had accompliſhed their full age, could not be ſuffered to ſue their liueries, till they had paied exceſſiue fines and ranſomes, vnto their great annoiance, loſſe, and diſquieting, and to no leſſe contempt of the ſaid king. And further, whereas diuerſe perſons had beene outlawed, as well at the ſute of their aduerſaries, as of the ſaid late king; they could not be allowed to purchaſe their charters of pardon out of the chancerie, according to the law of the realme, till they were driuen to anſwer halfe the iſſues and profits of all their lands and tenements by the ſpace of two yeares, which the king receiued to his vſe, by the ſaid Richard Empſons procurement, who informed him that hee might lawfullie take the ſame, although he knew that it was contrarie to the lawes and cuſtomes of the realme. Wherevpon the people, vexed and moleſted by ſuch hard dealings, ſore grudged againſt the ſaid late king, to the great perill and danger of his perſon and realme, and ſubuerſion of the lawes and ancient cuſtomes thereof.

A charge of manifeſt oppreſſion and extortion.

Alſo it was alleged againſt the ſaid Empſon, that he had ſent foorth precepts directed vnto diuerſe perſons, commanding them, vpon great penalties, to appeare before him, and other his aſſociats, at certeine daies and times within his houſe in S. Brides pariſh, in a ward of London, called Farringdon without: where they making their appearances, according to the ſame precepts, were impleaded afore him and other his ſaid aſſociats, of diuerſe murthers, felonies, outlawries, and of the articles in the ſtatute of prouiſors conteined; alſo of wilfull eſcapes of felonies, and ſuch like matters and articles apperteining to the plees of the crowne, and common lawes of the realme. And that doone, the ſaid perſons were committed to diuerſe priſons, as the Fleet, the Tower, and other places, where they were deteined, till they had fined at his pleaſure, as well for the commoditie of the ſaid late king, as for the ſingular aduantage of the ſaid ſir Richard Empſon.

Empſon ſomtime recorder of Couentrie.

Moreouer, whereas the ſaid Empſon, being recorder of Couentrie, and there ſate with the maior and other iuſtices of the peace, vpon a ſpeciall gaole deliuerie within that citie, on the mondaie before the feaſt of ſaint Thomas the apoſtle, in the ſixteenth yeare of the late kings reigne; a priſoner that had beene indicted of felonie, for taking out of an houſe in that citie, certeine goods to the value of twentie ſhillings, was arreigned before them. And bicauſe the iurie would not find the ſaid priſoner giltie, for want of ſufficient euidince (as they after alleged) the ſaid ſir Richard Empſon, ſuppoſing the ſame euidence to be ſufficient, cauſed them to be committed to ward, wherein they remained foure daies togither, till they were contented to enter bond in fortie pounds a peece, to appeare before the king and his councell, the ſecond returne of the tearme then next inſuing, being Quindena Hilarij. Wherevpon they keeping their daie, and appearing before the ſaid ſir Richard Empſon, and other of the kings councell, according to their bonds, were adiudged to paie euerie of them eight pounds for a fine, and accordinglie made paiment thereof, as they were then thought well worthie ſo to doo. But now this matter ſo long paſt, was ſtill kept in memorie, and ſo earneſt ſome were to inforce it to the vttermoſt againſt the ſaid Empſon, that in a ſeſſions holden at Couentrie now in this firſt yeare of this kings reigne, an indictment was framed againſt him for this matter, and thereof he was found giltie, as if therein he had committed ſome great and heinous offenſe againſt the kings peace, his crowne and dignitie.

Empſon indicted & found giltie.

Thus haue I thought good to ſhew what I find hereof, to the end ye may perceiue how glad men were to find ſome colour of ſufficient matter, to bring the ſaid ſir Richard Empſon, and maiſter Edmund Dudleie, within danger of the lawes; whereby at length they were not onelie condemned by act of parlement, through malice of ſuch as might ſeeme to ſeeke their deſtruction for priuat grudges; but in the end alſo, they were arreigned: as firſt the ſaid Edmund Dudleie in the Guildhall of London, the ſeuenteenth of Iulie; and ſir Richard Empſon at Northampton in October next inſuing: and being there condemned, was from thence brought backe againe to the Tower of London, where he remained till the time of his execution; as after yee ſhall heare.

This yeare the plague was great, and reigned in diuerſe parts of this realme. The king kept his Chriſtmas at Richmond. The twelfe of Ianuarie, diuerſe gentlemen prepared to iuſt, and the king and one of his priuie chamber called William Compton, ſecretlie armed themſelues in the little parke of Richmond, & ſo came into the iuſtes, vnknowne to all perſons. The king neuer ran openlie before, and did exceeding well. Maiſter Compton chanced to be ſore hurt by Edward Neuill eſquier, brother to the lord of Aburgauennie, ſo that he was like to haue died. One perſon there was that knew the king, and cried; God ſaue the king: and with that, all the people were aſtonied, and then the king diſcouered himſelfe, to the great comfort of the people. The king ſoone after came to Weſtminſter, and there kept his Shrouetide with great bankettings, danſings, and other iollie paſtimes.

The king runneth at tilt in his owne perſon.

Edw. Hall in H.8. fol. vj.
The king with other nobles diſguiſed like Robin hoods men for diſport.

And on a time the king in perſon, accompanied with the earles of Eſſex, Wilſhire and other noble men, to the number of twelue, came ſuddenlie in a morning into the queenes chamber, all apparelled in ſhort coates of Kentiſh Kendall, with hoodes on their heads & hoſen of the ſame, euerie one of them his bow and arrowes, and a ſword and a buckler, like outlawes, or Robin Hoods men. Whereat the queene, the ladies, and all other there were abaſhed, as well for the ſtrange ſight, as alſo for their ſudden comming, and after certeine danſes and paſtime made, they departed. On Shroueſundaie the ſame yeare, the king prepared a goodlie banket in the parlement chamber at Weſtminſter, for all the ambaſſadors, which then were here out of diuerſe realmes and countries. The banket being readie, the king leading the queene, entered into the chamber, then the ladies, ambaſſadours, and other noble men followed in order.

The king and others diſguiſed after the Turkiſh faſhion.

The king cauſed the queene to keepe the eſtate, and then ſate the ambaſſadours and ladies, as they were marſhalled by the K. who would not ſit, but walked from place to place, making cheare to the queene and the ſtrangers: ſuddenlie the king was gone. And ſhortlie after, his grace, with the earle of Eſſex, came in apparelled after the Turkie faſhion, in long robes of baudekin, powdered with gold, hats on their heds of crimſin veluet, with great rolles of gold, girded with two ſwords called cimiteries, hanging by great bauderiks of gold. Then next came the lord Henrie earle of Wilſhire, and the lord Fitzwater, in two long gownes of yellow ſattin, trauerſed with white ſattin, and in euerie band of white was a band of crimſin ſattin after the faſhion of Ruſſia or Ruſland, with furred hats of graie on their heads, either of them hauing an hatchet in their hands, and boots with pikes turned vp.

And after them came ſir Edward Howard then admerall, and with him ſir Thomas Parre, in doublets of crimſin veluet, voided low on the backe, and before to the chanell bone, laſed on the breaſts with chaines of ſiluer, and ouer that ſhort cloakes of crimſin ſattin, and on their heads hats after danſers faſhion, with feaſants feathers in them: they were apareled after the faſhion of Pruſia or Spruce. The torchbearers were apparelled in crimſin ſattin and greene, like Moreſkoes, their faces blacke: and the king brought in a mummerie. After that the queene, the lords, & ladies (ſuch as would) had plaied, the ſaid mummers departed, and put off the ſame apparell, and ſoone after entered into the chamber in their vſuall apparell. And ſo the king made great cheere to the queene, ladies and ambaſſadours. The ſupper or banket ended, and the tables voided, the king in communication with the ambaſſadours, the queene with the ladies tooke their places in their degrees.

A maſke wherein the king was an actor.

Then began the danſing, and euerie man tooke much heed to them that danſed. The king perceiuing that, withdrew himſelfe ſuddenlie out of the place, with certeine other perſons appointed for that purpoſe. And within a little while after there came in a drum and a fife apparelled in white damaſke & greene bonnets, and hoſen of the ſame ſute. Then certeine gentlemen followed with torches, apparelled in blue damaſke, purfelled with amis greie, faſhioned like an albe, and hoods on their heads, with robes and long tippets to the ſame of blue damaſke, in viſards. Then after them came a certeine number of gentlemen, whereof the king was one, apparelled all in one ſute of ſhort garments, little beneath the points, of blue veluet and crimſin, with long ſleeues, all cut and lined with cloth of gold. And the vtter part of the garments were powdered with caſtels and ſheafes of arrowes of fine ducket gold; the vpper parts of their hoſen of like ſute and faſhion, the nether parts were of ſkarlet, powdered with timbrels of fine gold, on their heads bonnets of damaſke, with ſiluer flat wouen in the ſtole, & therevpon wrought with gold, and rich fethers in them, all with viſors.

Certeine ladies richlie attired and after a ſtrange faſhion.

After them entered ſix ladies, whereof two were apparelled in crimſin ſattin and purple, embrodered with gold, and by viniets ran floure delices of gold, with maruellous rich & ſtrange tiers on their heads. Then two ladies in crimſin and purple, made like long ſlops embrodered and fret with gold after antike faſhion: and ouer that garment was a ſhort garment of cloth of gold ſcant to the knee, faſhioned like a tabard all ouer, with ſmall double rolles, all of flat gold of damaſke, fret with friſed gold, and on their heads ſkarfs and wrappers of damaſke gold, with flat pipes, that ſtrange it was to behold. The other two ladies were in kirtels of crimſin & purple ſattin, embrodered with a viniet of pomegranats of gold, all the garments cut compaſſe wiſe, hauing but demie ſleeues, naked downe from the elbowes, and ouer their garments were vochets of pleaſants, rolled with crimſin veluet, and ſet with letters of gold like characts, their heads rolled in pleaſants and tipets like the Aegyptians, embrodered with gold. Their faces, necks, armes, and hands, couered in fine pleaſants blacke: ſome call it Lumbardines, which is maruellous thin; ſo that the ſame ladies ſeemed to be Nigers or blacke Mores. Of theſe foreſaid ſix ladies, the ladie Marie ſiſter vnto the king was one, the other I name not. After that the kings grace and the ladies had danſed a certeine time, they departed euerie one to his lodging.

The ladie Marie ſiſter to the king.

Edw. Hall in Hen. 8. fol. vij.
Running at the ring.

The king verie roiallie arraied runneth at the ring in the ſight of the ambaſſadours & beareth the priſe awaie.

In this yeare alſo came ambaſſadors, not onelie from the king of Arragon and Caſtile, but alſo from the kings of France, Denmarke, Scotland, and other places, which were highlie welcomed, and noblie interteined. It happened on a daie, that there were certeine noble men made a wager to run at the ring and parties were taken, and which partie atteined or tooke awaie the ring oftneſt with certeine courſes, ſhould win the wager. Whereof the kings grace hearing, offered to be on the one partie with ſix companions. The ambaſſadors hearing thereof, were much deſirous to ſee this wager tried, and ſpeciallie the ambaſſadours of Spaine, who had neuer ſeene the king in harneſſe. At the daie appointed, the king was mounted on a goodlie courſer, trapped in purple veluet cut, the inner ſide whereof was wrought with flat gold of damaſke in the ſtole, and the veluet on the other ſide cut in letters: ſo that the gold appeared as though it had beene embrodered with certeine reaſons or poſies. And on the veluet betweene the letters were faſtened caſtels and ſheafs of arrowes of ducket gold, with a garment, the ſléeues compaſſed ouer his harneſſe, and his baſes of the ſame worke, with a great plume of feathers on his head péece, that came downe to the arſon of his ſaddle, and a great companie of freſh gentlemen came in with his grace richlie armed and decked, with manie other right gorgeouſlie apparelled, the trumpets before them goodlie to behold, whereof manie ſtrangers (but ſpeciallie the Spaniards) much reioiſed; for they had neuer ſéene the king before that time armed.

On the other ſide came in another band of gentlemen freſhlie apparelled, and pleaſant to behold, all apparelled in cloth of gold, checkered with flat gold of damaſke, & poudered with roſes; and ſo euerie man ran: but to conclude, the priſe was giuen vnto the king. Euerie man did run twelue courſes, the king did beare away the ring fiue times, and atteined it thrée. And theſe courſes thus finiſhed, the Spaniſh ambaſſadours deſired to haue ſome of the badges or deuiſes, which were on the kings trapper. His grace therof knowing, commanded euerie of them to take thereof what it pleaſed them, who in effect tooke all or the more part; for in the beginning they thought they had béene counterfeit, and not of gold; as they were. On Maie day then next folowing in the ſecond yeare of his reigne, his grace being yoong, and willing not to be idle, roſe in the morning verie earlie to fetch maie or gréene boughs, himſelfe freſh & richlie apparelled; and clothed all his knights, ſquiers and gentlemen in white ſattin, and all his gard and yeomen of the crowne in white ſarcenet: and ſo went euerie man with his bow and arrowes ſhooting to the wood, and ſo repaired againe to the court, euerie man with a gréene bough in his cap.

King Henrie goeth a maieng with other of his courtiers.

Now at his returning, manie hearing of his going on maieng, were deſirous to ſée him ſhoot, for at that time his grace ſhot as ſtrong and as great a length as anie of his gard. There came to his grace a certeine man with bow and arrowes, and deſired his grace to take the muſter of him, and to ſée him ſhoot; for at that time his grace was contented. The man put the one foot in his boſome, and ſo did ſhoot, and ſhot a verie good ſhoot, and well towards his marke: whereof, not onelie his grace, but all other greatlie maruelled. So the king gaue him a reward for his ſo dooing; which perſon afterwards of the people, and of them in the court, was called, Foot in boſome. The ſame yeare in the feaſt of Pentecoſt, holden at Gréenwich, that is to ſay, the thurſdaie in the ſame wéeke, his grace with two other with him, chalenged all commers, to fight with them at the barriers with target, and caſting the ſpeare of eight foot long; and that doone, his grace with the ſaid two aides to fight euerie of them twelue ſtrokes with two handed ſwordes, with and againſt all commers, none excepted being a gentleman; where the K. behaued himſelfe ſo well, and deliuered himſelfe ſo valiantlie by his hardie proweſſe and great ſtrength, that the praiſe and laud was giuen to his grace, and his aides: notwithſtanding that diuerſe and ſtrong perſons had aſſailed him and his aides.

The king a good archer.

The king chalengeth all commers at ſundrie exerciſes of actiuitie

From thenſe the whole court remoued to Windſor, then begining his progreſſe, & exerciſing himſelfe dailie in ſhooting, ſinging, danſing, wreſtling, caſting of the barre, plaieng at the recorders, flute, virginals, in ſetting of ſongs, and making of ballads; he did ſet two full maſſes, euerie of them fiue parts, which were ſoong oftentimes in his chappell, and afterwards in diuerſe other places. And when he came to Oking, there were kept both iuſtes and turneies: the reſt of this progreſſe was ſpent in hunting, hawking, and ſhooting. ¶ Doctor Colet deane of Poules erected a frée ſchoole in Poules church yard in London, and committed the ouerſight thereof to the maſters and wardens of the mercers, bicauſe himſelfe was borne in London, & was ſonne to Henrie Colet mercer, ſometime lord maior of the citie of London. On Midſummer night, the king came priuilie into Cheape, in one of the cotes of his gard; and on ſaint Peters night, the king and quéene came riding roiallie to the kings hed in Cheape, there to behold the watch of the citie.]

The king apparelled like one of the gard.

Now when the ſaid progreſſe was finiſhed, his grace, the quéene, with all their whole traine, in the moneth of October following, remooued to Gréenewich. The king not minded to ſée yoong gentlemen vnexpert in martiall feates, cauſed a place to be prepared within the parke of Gréenwich, for the quéene and the ladies to ſtand & ſée the fight with battle axes that ſhould be doone there, where the king himſelfe armed, fought with one Giot a gentleman of Almaine, a tall man, and a good man of armes. And then after they had doone, they marched alwaies two and two togithers, and ſo did their feats and enterpriſes euerie man verie well. Albeit, it happened the ſaid Giot to fight with ſir Edward Howard, which Giot was by him ſtriken to the ground. The morow after this enterpriſe doone, the king with the quéene came to the Tower of London. And to the intent that there ſhould no diſpleaſure nor malice be borne by anie of thoſe gentlemen, which fought with the ax againſt other; the king gaue vnto them a certeine ſumme of gold, valued at two hundred markes, to make a banket among themſelues withall. The which banket was made at fiſhmongers hall in Thames ſtréet, where they all met to the number of foure and twentie, all apparelled in one ſute or liuerie, after Almaine faſhion; that is to ſay, their vtter garments all of yellow ſattin, yellow hoſen, yellow ſhooes, girdels, ſcabberds, and bonnets with yellow feathers, their garments and hoſen all cut & lined with white ſattin, and their ſcabberds wound about with ſattin. After their banket ended, they went by torchlight to the Tower, & preſented themſelues before the king, who tooke pleaſure to behold them.

The king fighteth with a battle axe againſt an Almaine.

From thence the eight day of Nouember, his grace remooued to Richmond, and willed to be declared to all noble men and gentlemen, that his grace with two aides, that is to wit, maiſter Charles Brandon, and maiſter Compton, during two daies would anſwer all commers; with ſpeare at the tilt one daie, and at turneie with ſwords the other. And to accompliſh this enterpriſe, on the thirtéenth day of Nouember, his grace armed at all péeces with his two aides entered the field, their baſes and trappers were of cloth of gold, ſet with red roſes, wrought with gold of broderie. The counterpart came in freſhlie apparelled, euerie man after his deuiſe. At theſe iuſtes the king brake more ſtaues than anie other, & therefore had the priſe. At the turneie in likewiſe, the honour was his. The ſecond night were diuerſe ſtrangers of Maximilian the emperours court and ambaſſadors of Spaine with the king at ſupper. When they had ſupped, the king willed them to go into the quéenes chamber, who ſo did.

The king (with his aſſiſtants) chalengeth all commers at tilt.

In the meane ſeaſon, the king with fiftéene other, apparelled in Almaine iackets of crimſin and purple ſattin, with long quartered ſléeues, and hoſen of the ſame ſute, their bonnets of white veluet, wrapped in flat gold of damaſke, with viſards and white plumes, came in with a mummerie; and after a certeine time that they had plaied with the quéene and the ſtrangers, they departed. Then ſuddenlie entered ſix minſtrels richlie apparelled, plaieng on their inſtruments; and then followed fourtéene perſons, gentlemen, all apparelled in yellow ſattin, cut like Almains, bearing torches. After them came ſix diſguiſed in white ſattin and gréene, embrodered and ſet with letters and caſtels of fine gold in bullion, the garments were of ſtrange faſhion, with alſo ſtrange cuts, euerie cut knit with points of fine gold, and taſſels of the ſame, their hoſen cut and tied in likewiſe, their bonnets of cloth of ſiluer woond with gold. The firſt of theſe ſix was the king, the earle of Eſſex, Charles Brandon, ſir Edward Howard, ſir Thomas Kneuet, and ſir Henrie Guilford.

Then part of the gentlemen bearing torches departed, and ſhortlie returned, after whom came in ſix ladies, apparelled in garments of crimſin ſattin embrodered and trauerſed with gloth of gold, cut in pomegranats and yokes, ſtringed after the faſhion of Spaine. Then the ſaid ſix men danſed with theſe ſix ladies: and after that they had danſed a ſeaſon, the ladies tooke off the mens viſors, whereby they were knowen: whereof the quéene and the ſtrangers much praiſed the king, and ended the paſtime. It is to be noted, that at this time the quéene was great with child, & ſhortlie after this paſtime, ſhe tooke hir chamber at Richmond, for the which cauſe the king kept his Chriſtmaſſe there. And on Newyeares daie the firſt daie of Ianuarie the quéene was deliuered of a prince to the great gladneſſe of the realme, for the honour of whome fiers were made, and diuerſe veſſels with wine ſet for ſuch as would take thereof in certeine ſtréets in London, and generall proceſſions therevpon to laud God. As touching the preparation of the princes chriſtening, I ouerpaſſe, which was honorablie doone, whoſe godfathers at the font were the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and the earle of Surreie, & godmother the ladie Katharine counteſſe of Deuonſhire, daughter to king Edward the fourth: his name was Henrie.

The birth of the firſt begotten ſonne of king Henrie the eight.

Againſt the twelfe daie or the daie of the Epiphanie at night, before the banket in the hall at Richmond, was a pageant deuiſed like a mounteine, gliſtering by night as though it had béene all of gold and ſet with ſtones, on the top of which mounteine was a trée of gold, the branches and boughes friſed with gold, ſpreading on euerie ſide ouer the mounteine with roſes and pomegranats, the which mounteine was with vices brought vp towards the king, and out of the ſame came a ladie apparelled in cloth of gold, and the children of honour called the henchmen, which were freſhlie diſguiſed, and danſed a morice before the king; and that doone, reentred the mounteine, which then was drawen backe, and then was the waſſaill or banket brought in, and ſo brake vp Chriſtmaſſe. Shortlie after and before the quéenes churching, the K. rode to Walſingham. The quéene being churched or purified, the king and ſhe remooued from Richmond to Weſtminſter, where was preparation for ſolemne iuſts in the honor of the quéene; the king being one, and with him thrée aides: his grace being called Cure loial, the lord William erle of Deuonſhire called Bon voloire, ſir Thomas Kneuet named Bon eſpoir, ſir Edward Neuill called Valiant deſire, whoſe names were ſet vpon a goodlie table, & the table hanged in a trée curiouſlie wrought, and they were called Les quater cheualiers de la forreſt ſaluigne, theſe foure to run at the tilt againſt all commers, with other certeine articles compriſed in the ſaid table.

A goodlie deuiſe of a moueable pageant.

A ſolemne iuſts at Weſtminſter.

A place in the palace was prepared for the king and quéene, richlie hanged, the inner part with cloth of gold, & the vtter with rich cloth of arras. Theſe iuſts began the thirtéenth daie of Februarie. Now after that the quéene with hir traine of ladies had taken their places, into the palace was conueied a pageant of a great quantitie, made like a forreſt with rockes, hils, and dales, with diuerſe ſundrie trées, floures, hathornes, ferne, and graſſe, with ſix foreſters ſtanding within the ſame forreſt, garniſhed in cotes and hoods of gréene veluet, by whome laie a great number of ſpeares; all the trées, hearbs, and floures of the ſame forreſt were made of gréene veluet, gréene damaſke, & ſilke of diuerſe colours, as ſattin & ſarcenet. In the middeſt of this forreſt was a caſtell ſtanding made of gold, and before the caſtell gate ſat a gentleman freſhlie apparelled, making a garland of roſes for the priſe. This forreſt was drawen as it were by ſtrength of two great beaſts, a lion and an antelop; the lion floriſhed all ouer with damaſke gold, the antelop was wrought all ouer with ſiluer of damaſke, his beames or hornes and tuſkes of gold.

A pageant made like a wild forreſt verie cunninglie.

Theſe beaſts were led with certeine men apparelled like wild men, or woodhouſes, their bodies, heads, faces, hands, and legs couered with gréene ſilke floſſhed: on either of the ſaid antelop and lion ſat a ladie richlie apparelled, the beaſts were tied to the pageant with great chaines of gold, as horſſes be in the cart. When the pageant reſted before the quéene, the forenamed foreſters blew their horns, then the deuiſe or pageant opened on all ſides, and out iſſued the foreſaid foure knights armed at all péeces, euerie of them a ſpeare in his hand on horſſebacke with great plumes on their heads, their baſes and trappers of cloth of gold, euerie of them his name embrodered on his baſe and trapper. On the other part with great noiſe aſwell of trumpets as of drums entered into the field, the erle of Eſſex, the lord Thomas Howard with manie other cleane armed, their trappers and baſes all of crimſin ſatin embrodered with branches of pomegranats of gold and poſies; with manie a freſh gentleman riding before them, their footmen well apparelled: and ſo the iuſts began and endured all that daie.

The foure knights iſſue out of the pageant all armed.

The morrow, being the thirtéenth of Februarie after dinner, at time conuenient, the quéene with the ladies repaired to ſée the iuſts, the trumpets ſounded, and in came manie a noble man and gentleman richlie apparelled, taking vp their horſſes; after whom followed certeine lords apparelled, they and their horſſes in cloth of gold and ruſſet tinſell: knights in cloth of gold and ruſſet veluet; and a great number of gentlemen on foot in ruſſet ſattin and yellow, and yeomen in ruſſet damaſke and yellow, all the nether part of euerie mans hoſen ſcarlet and yellow caps. Then came the king vnder a pauilion of cloth of gold and purple veluet embrodered, and powdered with H. and K. of fine gold, the compaſſe of the pauilion aboue embrodered richlie, and balanſed with flat gold, beaten in wire, with an imperiall crowne in the top of fine gold, his baſes and trappers of cloth of gold, fretted with damaſke gold, the trapper pendant to the taile. A crane and chafron of ſtéele, in the front of the chafron was a goodlie plume ſet full of muſers or trembling ſpangles of gold. After followed his thrée aids, euerie of them vnder a pauilion of crimſin damaſke and purple, powdered with H. and K. of fine gold, balanſed and fringed with gold of damaſke: on the top of euerie pauilion a great K. of goldſmiths worke.

The king vnder a pauilion of cloth of gold and purple veluet, &c.

The number of the gentlemen and yeomen attending on foot, apparelled in ruſſet and yellow, was an hundred thréeſcore and eight. Then next theſe pauilions came twelue children of honour, ſitting euerie of them on a great courſer richlie trapped and embrodered in ſeuerall deuiſes and faſhions, where lacked neither broderie nor goldſmiths worke, ſo that euerie child and horſſe in deuiſe and faſhion was contrarie to other, which was goodlie to behold. Then on the contrarie part entered ſir Charles Brandon, firſt on horſſebacke in a long robe of ruſſet ſattin, like a recluſe or religious perſon, and his horſſe trapped in the ſame ſute, without drum or noiſe of minſtrelſie, putting a bill of petition to the quéene, the effect whereof of was, that if it would pleaſe hir to licence him to run in hir preſence, he would doo it gladlie; and if not, then he would depart as he came. After that his requeſt was granted, then he put off his ſaid habit, and was armed at all peeces with rich baſes and horſſe alſo richlie trapped, and ſo did run his horſſe to the tilt end, where diuerſe men on foot apparelled in ruſſet ſattin waited on him.

Henrie Guilford eſquier in ruſſet cloth of gold, with his deuiſe.

Next after came in alone yoong Henrie Guilford eſquier, himſelfe and his horſſe in ruſſet cloth of gold and cloth of ſiluer, cloſed in a deuiſe, or a pageant made like a caſtell or a turret, wrought of ruſſet ſarcenet Florence, wrought and ſet out in gold with his word or poſie, and all his men in ruſſet ſattin & white, with hoſen to the ſame, and their bonets of like colours, demanding alſo licence of the queene to run; which to him granted, he tooke place at the tilts end. Then came next the marqueſſe Dorſet and ſir Thomas Bullen like two pilgrims from ſaint Iames, in taberds of blacke veluet, with palmers hats on their helmets, with long Iacobs ſtaues in their hands, their horſſe trappers of blacke veluet, their taberds, hats, and trappers ſet with ſcalop ſhels of fine gold, and ſtrips of blacke veluet, euerie ſtrip ſet with a ſcalop ſhell, their ſeruants all in blacke ſattin with ſcalop ſhels of gold in their breaſts. Soone after came in the lord Henrie of Buckingham earle of Wilſhire, himſelfe and his horſſe apparelled in cloth of ſiluer, embrodered with his poſie or word, and arrowes of gold in a poſie, called La maiſon du refuge, made of crimſin damaſke brodered with roſes & arrowes of gold, on the top a greihound of ſiluer, bearing a tree of pomegranats of gold, the branches whereof were ſo large that it ouerſpred the pageant in all parts.

The marqueſſe Dorſet and ſir Thomas Bullen like pilgrims.

Then entered ſir Giles Capell, ſir Rouland with manie other knights richlie armed and apparelled. And thus began the iuſts, which was valiantlie atchiued by the king and his aids, among whom his grace atteined the priſe. Theſe iuſts finiſhed, euerie man withdrew, the king was diſarmed, and at time conuenient he and the queene heard euenſong, and that night all the ambaſſadors ſupped with the king and had a great banket. After ſupper, his grace with the queene, lords & ladies came into the White hall within the ſaid palace, which was hanged richlie, the hall was ſcaffolded and railed on all parts. There was an enterlude of the gentlemen of his chapell before his grace, and diuerſe freſh ſongs: that doone, his grace called to him a great man, or a lord of Ireland called O neall, whome in the preſence of the ſaid ambaſſadors he made knight: then the minſtrels began to plaie, the lords & ladies began to danſe. Now in the midſt of this paſtime, when all perſons were moſt attentiue to behold the danſing, the king was ſuddenlie gone, vnknowen to the moſt part of the people there, vnleſſe it were of the queene and certeine other. Within a little while after his departing, the trumpets at the end of the hall began to ſound.

The great O neall made knight.

A pageant deuiſed to run vpon wheeles.

Then was there a deuiſe or a pageant vpon wheels brought in, out of the which pageant iſſued out a gentleman richlie apparelled, that ſhewed how in a garden of pleaſure there was an arbor of gold, wherin were lords and ladies, much deſirous to ſhew paſtime to the queene & ladies, if they might be licenced ſo to doo: who was anſwered by the queene, how ſhe & all other there were verie deſirous to ſee them and their paſtime. Then a great cloth of arras that did hang before the ſame pageant was taken awaie, and the pageant brought more neere. It was curiouſlie made and pleſant to behold, it was ſolemne and rich; for euerie poſt or piller thereof was couered with friſed gold, therin were trees of hathorne, eglantine, roſiers, vines, and other pleaſant floures of diuerſe colours, with gillofers, and other hearbs all made of ſattin, damaſke, ſiluer and gold, accordinglie as the naturall trees, hearbs, or floures ought to be.

In this arbor were ſix ladies, all apparelled in white ſatin and greene, ſet and embrodered full of H. and K. of gold, knit togither with laces of gold of damaſke, and all their garments were repleniſhed with glittering ſpangels gilt ouer, on their heads were bonets all opened at the foure quarters, ouerfriſed with flat gold of damaſke, the orrellets were of rolles, wrethed on lampas doucke holow, ſo that the gold ſhewed through the lampas doucke; the faſſis of their head ſet full of new deuiſed faſhions. In this garden alſo was the king and fiue with him apparelled in garments of purple ſattin, all of cuts with H. and K. euerie edge garniſhed with friſed gold, and euerie garment full of poſies, made of letters of fine gold in bullion as thicke as they might be, and euerie perſon had his name in like letters of maſſie gold. The firſt Cure loial, the ſecond Bon voloire, the third Bon eſpoir, the fourth Valiant deſire, the fift Bon foy, the ſixt Amour loial, their hoſen, caps, and coats were full of poſies, with H. & K. of fine gold in bullion, ſo that the ground could ſcarſe appeere, & yet was in euerie void place ſpangles of gold. When time was come, the ſaid pageant was brought foorth into preſence, and then deſcended a lord and a ladie by couples, and then the minſtrels which were diſguiſed alſo danſed, and the lords and ladies danſed, that it was a pleaſure to behold.

A goodlie ſhew of the king & fiue other with him.

In the meane ſeaſon the pageant was conueied to the end of the palace, there to tarie till the danſes were finiſhed, & ſo to haue receiued the lords & ladies againe; but ſuddenlie the rude people ran to the pageant, and rent, tare, and ſpoiled the pageant, ſo that the lord ſteward nor the head officers could not cauſe them to abſteine, except they ſhould haue foughten and drawen bloud, and ſo was this pageant broken. Then the king with the queene and the ladies returned to his chamber, where they had a great banket, and ſo this triumph ended with mirth & gladnes. At this ſolemnitie a ſhipman of London caught certeine letters, which he ſold to a goldſmith for three pounds fourteene ſhillings & eight pence; by reaſon wherof it appeered that the garments were of a great value. After this great ioy came a ſorowfull chance, for the yoong prince which was borne vpon Newyeares day laſt paſt, vpon the two and twentith daie of Februarie, being then the euen of ſaint Matthie, departed this world at Richmond, and from thence was caried to Weſtminſter and buried. The king like a wiſe prince tooke this dolorous chance wonderous wiſelie; and the more to comfort the queene he diſſembled the matter, and made no great mourning outwardlie: but the queene, like a naturall woman, made much lamentation; howbeit, by the kings good perſuaſion and behauiour, hir ſorow was mitigated, but not ſhortlie.

The rudenes of the people aſſembled to ſee the ſhewes.

The departure of the kings yoong ſonne out of this life.

Embaſſadors from the king of Spaine for aid againſt the Moores.

In the moneth of Februarie this yeare came ambaſſadors from the king of Arragon and Caſtile, to require an aid of fifteene hundred archers to be ſent to the ſame king, hauing at that time war againſt the Moores, enimies of the chriſtian faith. The king hearing their meſſage gentlie granted their requeſt. And bicauſe the lord Thomas Darcie a knight of the garter, made humble ſute to the king to be generall of the crue that ſhould be thus ſent into Spaine, the king vpon truſt of his approued valiancie granted his deſire. There were appointed to go with him the lord Anthonie Greie brother to the marqueſſe Dorſet, Henrie Guilford, Weſton Browne, and William Sidneie eſquiers of the kings houſe, ſir Robert Conſtable, ſir Roger Haſtings, and ſir Raſe Elderton, with other gentlmen to be capteins.

Anno reg. 2.

In this ſecond yeare, the king being forth on his progreſſe, heard euerie daie more & more complaints of Empſon and Dudleie, ſet forth and aduanced no doubt by the drift of their deadlie enimies. Wherefore, he ſent writs to the ſhiriffes of London, to put them to execution, and ſo the ſeuentéenth daie of Auguſt, they were both beheaded at the Tower hill, and both their bodies and heads buried, the one at the White friers, and the other at the Blacke friers. The king about this ſeaſon was much giuen to plaie at teniſſe, and at the diſe, which appetite certeine craftie perſons about him perceiuing, brought in Frenchmen and Lombards to make wagers with him, & ſo loſt much monie; but when he perceiued their craft, he eſchued their companie and let them go.

Anno. Reg. 3. Ed. Hall in Hen. 8. fol. xj. xij.

¶ On the firſt daie of Maie the king accompanied with manie luſtie batchelers, on great and well dooing horſſes rode to the wood to fetch Maie, where a man might haue ſéene manie a horſſe raiſed on high with carrier, gallop, turne, and ſtop, merueſlous to behold: where he & thrée other, as ſir Edward Howard, Charles Brandon, and Edward Neuill, which were challengers with the king, ſhifted themſelues into coats of gréene ſattin garded with crimſin veluet. On the other part the earles of Eſſex, of Deuonſhire, the marqueſſe Dorſet, & the lord Howard were all in crimſin ſatin, garded with a pounced gard of gréene veluet. And as they were returning on the hill, a ſhip met with them vnder ſaile: the maiſter hailed the king and that noble companie, and ſaid that he was a mariner, and was come from many a ſtrange port, and came thither to ſée if anie déeds of armes were to be doone in the countrie, of the which he might make true report in other countries. An herald demanded the name of his ſhip; he anſwered ſhe is called Fame, & is laden with good Renowme: then ſaid the herald, If you will bring your ſhip into the baie of Hardineſſe, you muſt double the point of Gentleneſſe, and there you ſhall ſée a companie that will meddle with your merchandize. Then ſaid the king, Sithens Renowme is their merchandize, let vs buie it if we can. Then the ſhip ſhot a peale of guns, and ſailed forth before the kings companie, full of flags and banners, till it came to the tilt yard.

The king and thrée other courtiers challengers.

A deuiſe of a ſhip vnder ſaile.

At after noone, the king and his thrée fellowes entered into the field, their bards and baſes of crimſin and blue veluet, cut in quadrant cuts, embrodered full of pomegranats, and all the waiters in ſilke of the ſame colour. The other partie were in crimſin ſattin and gréene veluet. Then began the trumpets to ſound, and the horſſes to run, that manie a ſpeare was burſt, and manie a great ſtripe giuen: and for a truth the king excéeded in number of ſtaues all other euerie daie of the thrée daies. Wherefore on the third daie, the quéene made a great banket to the king and all them that had iuſted: and after the banket doone, ſhe gaue the chiefe priſe to the king, the ſecond to the earle of Eſſex, the third to the earle of Deuonſhire, and the fourth to the lord marqueſſe Dorſet. Then the heralds cried; My lords, for your noble feats in armes, God ſend you the loue of your ladies that you moſt deſire. The king euer deſirous to ſerue Mars, began another iuſts the fiftéenth daie of the ſaid moneth. The king & his band were all in gréene ſilke, and the earle of Eſſex and his band in blue, garded with gold, and all the ſpeares were painted of the ſame colours. There was good running and manie a ſpeare bruſt: but for all the ſport euerie man feared leaſt ſome ill chance might happen to the king, and faine would haue had him a looker on rather than a dooer, and ſpake thereof as much as they durſt: but his courage was ſo noble that he would euer be at the one end.]

The king brake more ſtaues than the reſt and had the priſe giuen him.

The lord Darcie and his companie readie at Plimmouth.

In this meane time, the lord Darcie and other appointed to the viage againſt the Mores, made ſuch diligence, that they and all their people were readie at Plimmouth by the middes of Maie, and there muſtered their ſouldiers before the lord Brooke, and other the kings commiſſioners. The lord Darcie as capteine generall, ordeined for his prouoſt marſhall Henrie Guilford eſquier, a luſtie yoong man, & welbeloued of the king, for his manifold good ſeruice. On the mondaie in the Rogation wéeke, they departed out of Plimmouth hauen with foure ſhips roiall, and the wind was ſo fauourable to them, that the firſt daie of Iune, being the euen of the feaſt of Pentecoſt, he arriued at the port of Calis in ſouth Spaine; and immediatlie by the aduiſe of his councell, he diſpatched meſſengers to the king, whom they found beſide the citie of Ciuill where he then laie, and declared to him, how the lord Darcie by the king their maiſters appointment, was come thither with ſixtéene hundred archers, and laie ſtill at Calis to know his pleaſure. The king of Caſtile anſwered them gentlie, that the lord Darcie and all other that were come from his louing ſonne were welcome, and hartilie thanked them of their paines, requiring the meſſengers to returne to their capteine, and tell him that in all haſt he would ſend certeine of his councell to him.

Abr. Fl. ex Edw. Hall in Hen. 8. fol. xij.

¶ Hereupon they departed from the king, and made report to the lord Darcie, which kept his ſhip in great eſtate, and would not land, but onelie ſuffered ſuch as were ſicke and féeble, and few other to go aland. The Engliſhmen which went aland, fell to drinking of hot wines, & were ſcarſe maiſters of themſelues, ſome ran to the ſtewes, ſome brake hedges and ſpoiled orchards and vineyards, and orenges before they were ripe, and did manie outragious déeds: wherefore the chiefe of the towne of Calis came to complaine to the lord Darcie in his ſhip, which ſent forth his prouoſt marſhall, who ſcarſelie with paine refrained the yeoman archers, they were ſo hot and wilfull, yet by commandement & policie they were all brought on bord to their ſhips.]

The vnrulie behauiour of the Engliſhmen.

Then vpon ſaturdaie, the eight of Iune, a biſhop and other of the kings councell came to Calis, and there abode till wedneſdaie, being the euen of Corpus Chriſti; at which daie, the lord capteine tooke land, and was honorablie receiued of the king of Aragons councell, and on the morrow was highlie feaſted at dinner and ſupper. And at after ſupper, the biſhop declared the king his maiſters pleaſure, giuing to the lord capteine as heartie thankes for his pains and trauell, as if he had gone forward with his enterpriſe againſt the Mores. But whereas by the aduiſe of his councell, circumſpectlie conſidering the ſuertie of his owne realme, vpon perfect knowledge had that the Frenchmen meant to inuade his dominions in his abſence, he had altered his former determination, and taken an abſtinence of war with the Mores, till an other time.

The lord Darcie honorablie receiued of the K. of Aragons councell.

He therefore required the lord Darcie to be contented to returne home againe, promiſing him wages for all his ſoldiers; and if it ſhould pleaſe him to come to the court, he ſhould receiue high thanks of the king, and ſuch chéere as there could be made him, The lord Darcie was nothing pleaſed with this declaration, but ſith he ſaw there was no remedie, he ſaid, that whatſoeuer the king had concluded, he could not be againſt it, conſidering he was ſent to him: but ſuerlie it was againſt his mind to depart home, without dooing anie thing againſt Gods enimies, with whome he had euer a deſire to fight. And as for his comming to court, he ſaid, he could not leaue his men whome he had brought out of their countrie, without an head; and as for the kings banket, it was not the thing that he deſired.

The lord Darcie diſcontented at the biſhops declaration.

A ſhrewd fraie begun vpon a ſmall occaſion.

Edw. Hall.

On the next daie in the morning, monie was ſent to paie the ſouldiers their wages for their conduction againe into England, with diuerſe gifts giuen to the lord Darcie, and other gentlemen; yet notwithſtanding, he was highlie diſpleaſed: howbeit, like a wiſeman he diſſembled the matter. The ſame daie, being the fourteenth daie of Iune, and fridaie, there chanced a fraie to be begun in the towne of Calis, betwixt the Engliſhmen, and them of the towne; by reaſon that an Engliſhman would haue had for his monie a loafe of bread from a maid that had beene at the bakers to buie bread, not to ſell, but to ſpend in hir miſtreſſe houſe. Howbeit the Engliſhman followed hir, as making proffer not to be denied, in ſo much that the maid perceiuing what he went about, cried out; A force, a force. Then was the common bell rong, and all the towne went to harneſſe, and thoſe few Engliſhmen that were a land, went to their bowes. The Spaniards caſt darts, and the Engliſhmen ſhot. But the capteins of England, and the lords of the councell for their part, tooke ſuch paine, that the fraie was ceaſſed, and but one Engliſhman ſlaine, though diuerſe were hurt: and of the Spaniards diuerſe were ſlaine. Thus of a ſparkle was kindled a flame to the ſpoiling of manie; which is no rare thing to ſee, according to the ſcriptum eſt:

Concitat ingentes flammas ſcintilla minuta.

The Engliſhmen deſire to ſee the Spaniſh court.

After this, vpon requeſt made by the lords of Spaine, the lord Darcie and all his men the ſame night went abord their ſhips, but Henrie Guilford, Weſton Browne, and William Sidneie, yoong and luſtie eſquiers, deſired licence to ſee the court of Spaine: which being granted, they went thither, where they were of the king highlie interteined. Henrie Guilford and Weſton Browne were made knights by the king, who alſo gaue to ſir Henrie Guilford a canton of Granado, and to ſir Wolſton Browne an egle of Sicill on a chefe, to the augmentation of their armes. William Sidneie ſo excuſed himſelfe, that he was not made knight. When they had ſoiourned there a while, they tooke their leaue of the king and queene, and returned through France into England.

The lord Darcie returneth out of Spaine.

The ducheſſe of Sauoie ſendeth to king Henrie for aid againſt the duke of Gelders.

During which ſeaſon, the lord Darcie made ſaile toward England, and arriuing at Plimmouth, came to the king at Windſore, and ſo this iourneie ended. During the time that the lord Darcie was in Spaine, the ladie Margaret duches of Sauoie, and daughter vnto Maximilian the emperour, and gouernour of Flanders, Brabant, Holland, Zeland, & other the low countries apperteining to Charles the yoong prince of Caſtile, ſent in the end of Maie to the king of England, to haue fifteene hundred archers, to aid hir againſt the duke of Gelders, which ſore troubled the countries aforeſaid. The king tenderlie regarding the requeſt of ſo noble a ladie, moſt gentlie granted hir requeſt, and appointed ſir Edward Poinings, knight of the garter, and comptroller of his houſe, a valiant capteine and a noble warriour, to be lieutenant and leader of the ſaid fifteene hundred archers.

This gentleman accompanied with his ſonne in law the lord Clinton, ſir Matthew Browne, ſir Iohn Digbie, Iohn Werton, Richard Wethrill, & Shrelleie eſquiers, with other gentlemen and yeomen, to the foreſaid number of fifteene hundred, tooke their ſhips a mile beſide Sandwich, the eighteenth daie of Iulie, and landed at Armew the nineteenth daie, not without ſome trouble, by reaſon of a little ſtorme. From thence they were conducted to Barowe, whither the ladie Regent came to welcome them. On the ſundaie, being the ſeuen & twentith of Iulie, they departed to Roſſindale, and on thurſdaie the laſt of Iulie they came to Bulduke. And the next daie the whole armie of the Almans, Flemings, and other apperteining to the ſaid ladie, met with the Engliſhmen without Bulduke, where they ſet forth in order; the ladie Regent being there preſent, which tooke hir leaue of all the capteins, and departed to Bulduke.

Thom. Hert gouernour of the Engliſh ordinance. The fort is wonne.

The armie, to the number of ten thouſand, beſide the fifteene hundred Engliſh archers, paſſed forward; and the tenth daie of Auguſt, being ſaint Laurence daie, came before a little caſtle, ſtanding on the higher ſide of the Maze, called Brimnoiſt, belonging to the baſtard of Gelderland. The ſame night, Thomas Hert, cheefe gouernour of the ordinance of the Engliſh part, made his approach; and in the morning, made batterie ſo, that the aſſault there vpon being giuen, the fortreſſe was wonne, and the capteine with eightie and od men were ſlaine, and nineteene taken; of the which, eleuen were hanged. Iohn Morton, capteine of one hundred Engliſhmen, and one Guiot an eſquier of Burgognie, crieng ſaint George, were the firſt that entered; at which aſſault, there was but one Engliſhman ſlaine. On thurſdaie, the fourteenth of Auguſt, the armie feried ouer the riuer of Maze into Gelderland. The next daie, they came to a little towne called Aiſke.

The towne of Aiſke burned.

The people were fled; but there was a little caſtell raſed, and caſt downe, which was newlie built vp on the ſide of the ſaid riuer. Vpon the twentith daie of Auguſt, they burnt the foreſaid towne of Aiſke, and all the countrie about it, and came at the laſt to a towne called Straulle, being verie ſtrong, double diked and walled. Within it were three hundred & ſixtie good men of war, beſide the inhabitants. At the firſt, they ſhewed good countenance of defenſe but when they ſaw their enimies approach neere vnto them with rampiers and trenches, they yeelded by compoſition, ſo that the ſouldiers might depart with a little ſticke in their hands. But the towneſmen reſted priſoners, at the will of the prince of Caſtile. And ſo on S. Bartholomews day the admerall of Flanders, and ſir Edward Poinings entred the towne with great triumph.

Venlow beſieged by the Engliſh.

On the ſix and twentith daie, the armie came before Venlow, and ſent an herald called Arthois, to ſummon the towne; but they within would not heare but ſhot guns at him. On the eight and twentith daie, the armie remooued vnto the north ſide of Venlow, and part went ouer the water, and made trenches to the water, & ſo beſieged the towne as ſtreictlie as their number would giue them leaue; but yet for all that they could doo without, they within kept one gate euer open. At length, the Engliſh capteins perceiuing that they laie there in vaine, conſidering the ſtrength of the towne, and alſo how the armie was not of number ſufficient to enuiron the ſame on each ſide, wrote to the king, who willed them with all ſpeed to returne, and ſo they did. Sir Edward Poinings went to the court of Burgognie, where he was receiued right honorablie of the yoong prince of Caſtile and of his aunt the ladie Margaret.

The ducheſſe of Sauoie beſtoweth new coats on the Engliſh ſoldiors.

Iohn Norton, Iohn Fog, Iohn Scot, and Thomas Linde, were made knights by the prince. And the ladie Margaret perceiuing the ſoldiers coates to be worne and foule with lieng on the ground (for euerie man laie not in a tent) gaue to euerie yeoman a coate of woollen cloth of yeallow, red, white, and greene colours, not to hir little laud & praiſe among the Engliſhmen. After that ſir Edward Poinings had beene highlie feaſted and more praiſed of all men for his valiantneſſe and good order of his people, he returned with his crue into England, and had loſt by war and ſickneſſe not fullie an hundred perſons. When the Engliſhmen were departed, the Gelders iſſued out of the gates of Venlow, dailie ſkirmiſhed with the Burgognions, and aſked for their archers, and héerewith winter began ſharplie to approach, and the riuer of Maze by aboundance of raine roſe ſo high, that it drowned vp the trenches: ſo that all things conſidered, the capteins without determined to raiſe their ſiege, and ſo they did, and after they had waſted all the countrie about Venlow, they returned euerie man to his home.

Andrew Barton a Scotiſh pirat.

In Iune the king being at Leiceſter, heard tidings, that one Andrew Barton a Scotiſhman and pirat of the ſea, ſaieng that the king of Scots had warre with the Portingals, robbed euerie nation, and ſtopped the kings ſtreames, that no merchant almoſt could paſſe. And when he tooke Engliſhmens goods, he bare them in hand that they were Portingals goods, and thus he hanted and robbed at euerie hauens mouth. The king diſpleaſed herewith, ſent ſir Edward Howard lord admerall of England, and lord Thomas Howard, ſonne and heire to the earle of Surrie in all haſt to the ſea, which haſtilie made readie two ſhips, and taking ſea, by chance of weather were ſeuered. The lord Howard lieng in the downes, perceiued where Andrew was making toward Scotland, and ſo faſt the ſaid lord chaſed him, that he ouertooke him; and there was a ſore battell betwixt them. Andrew euer blew his whiſtle to incourage his men, but at length the lord Howard and the Engliſhmen did ſo valiantlie, that by cleane ſtrength they entered the maine decke. The Scots fought ſore on the hatches: but in concluſion Andrew was taken, and ſo ſore wounded, that he died there. Then all the remnant of the Scots were taken with their ſhip called the Lion.

A cruell fight on the ſea, betwéene the ſaid pirat and the lords Howards.

Andrew Bartõ ſlaine.

All this while was the lord admerall in chaſe of the barke of Scotland, called Iennie Pirwine, which was wont to ſaile with the Lion in companie, & ſo much did he with other, that he laid him aboord: and though the Scots manfullie defended themſelues, yet the Engliſhmen entered the barke, ſlue manie, and tooke all the reſidue. Thus were theſe two ſhips taken, and brought to Blackewall the ſecond of Auguſt [and all the Scots were ſent vnto the biſhop of Yorkes place, where they remained at the kings charge, till other direction was taken for them. After this, the king ſent the biſhop of Wincheſter, and certeine of his councell, to the archbiſhop of Yorkes place, where the Scots were priſoners: and there the biſhop rehearſed to them, whereas peace was yet betwéene England and Scotland, that they contrarie to that, as théeues & pirats, had robbed the kings ſubiects within his ſtreames. Wherefore they had deſerued to die by the law, and to be hanged at the low water marke. Then ſaid the Scots; We acknowledge our offenſe, and aſke mercie and not the law. Then a préeſt which was alſo a priſoner, ſaid; My lords we appeale from the kings iuſtice to his mercie.

Abr. Fl. ex Edw. Hall in H8. fol. xvj.

The Scots priſoners in the biſhop of Yorks place.

Then the biſhop aſked him if he were authoriſed by them to ſaie ſo, and they cried all; Yea, yea. Then (ſaid he) you ſhall find the kings mercie aboue his iuſtice. For where you were dead by the law, yet by his mercie he will reuiue you; wherefore you ſhall depart out of this realme within twentie daies, vpon paine of death, if you be found after the twentith daie; and praie for the king: and ſo they paſſed into their countrie.] Thus was their captiuitie conuerted into libertie, and their liues ſaued by the kings mercie. The king of Scots hearing of the death of Andrew Barton, and the taking of the two ſhips, was wonderfull wroth, and ſent letters to the king requiring reſtitution, according to the league and amitie. The king wrote to the king of Scots againe with brotherlie ſalutation, of the robberies doone by the ſaid Andrew, and that it became not a prince to laie breach of peace to his confederat, for dooing iuſtice vpon a pirat and théefe: and that all the Scots that were taken, had deſerued to die by iuſtice, if he had not extended his mercie. And with this anſwer the Scotiſh herald departed.

About this ſeaſon, the French king made ſharpe warre againſt pope Iulie: wherefore the king of England wrote to the French king, that he ſhould leaue off to vex the pope in ſuch wiſe, being his fréend and confederat. But when the French king ſéemed little to regard that requeſt, the king ſent him word to deliuer him his lawfull inheritance both of the duchie of Normandie and Guien, and the countries of Anjou & Maine, and alſo of his crowne of France; or elſe he would come with ſuch a power, that by fine force he would obteine his purpoſe: but notwithſtanding thoſe writings, the French king ſtill purſued his warres in Italie. Wherevpon the king of England, ioining in league with Maximilian the emperour, and Ferdinando king of Spaine, with diuerſe other princes, was reſolued by aduiſe of his councell to make warre on the French king and his countries, and made preparation both by ſea and land, ſetting foorth ſhips to the ſea for ſafegard of his merchants.

King Henrie the eight taketh the popes part againſt the French king.

¶ The foreſaid pope Iulie, the kings confederat, was (before his aduancement to the popedome) cardinall of ſaint Petri ad Vincula, a man mightie in fréends, reputation, and riches, who had drawne to him the voices of ſo manie cardinals, that entering the conclaue, he was with an example all new and without ſhutting the conclaue, elected pope the verie ſame night following the deceaſſe of his predeceſſor pope Pius (thoſe that were of the contrarie opinion not daring to oppoſe againſt him.) He, either hauing regard to his firſt name Iulie, or (as coniectures were made) to ſignifie the greatneſſe of his conceptions, or laſtlie bicauſe he would not giue place to Alexander, no not in the excellencie of name, tooke vpon him the name of Iulie, the ſecond of that name. Amongeſt all the popes that had paſſed, it was wondered that by ſo great conſent, they had created for pope, a cardinall who was knowne to be of a diſpoſition rigorous and terrible, and in whome was no expectation of reſt and tranquillitie, hauing conſumed his youth in continuall trauels, offended manie by neceſſitie, and exerciſed hatreds againſt manie great perſonages; a man to whoſe wit nothing was more more familiar, than the inuention of trouble, faction, and conſpiracie.

Cardinall S. Petri ad vincula made pope.

Pope Iulie a factious fellow and an enimie to peace.

But on the other ſide, the cauſes of his election to that degrée appeared cléerelie, and ſurmounted all other difficulties: for he had béene of long time a cardinall of great power and might; & with his magnificence, wherein he had alwaies excéeded the reſidue, and with the greatneſſe of his ſpirit, by the which he did great things, he had not onelie made himſelfe mightie in opinion and fréends; but by times and degrées had erected high his authoritie in the court of Rome, bearing the name, title, and dignitie of the principall defendor of the eccleſiaſtike libertie. But that which ſerued moſt to his aduancement, was the promiſes immoderate and infinite which he made to the cardinals, princes, and barons, and to all others whome he might make profitable to him in that action. Beſides, he had the meane to diſtribute monie, benefices, and ſpirituall dignities, as well ſuch as were his owne, as thoſe that were the rights of others; for that ſuch was the brute & renowme of his liberalitie, that manie made willing offers to him to diſpoſe as he beſt liked of their treaſures, their names, their offices, and benefices.

Indirect meanes to atteine the popedome.

¶ They conſidered not that his promiſes were farre to great, than that being pope he was either able or ought to obſerue, for that he had of ſo long continuance inioied the name of iuſt and vpright, that pope Alexander himſelfe (his greateſt enimie) ſpeaking ill of him, in all other things could not but confeſſe him to be true of his word. A praiſe which he made no care to defile and ſtaine, to the end to become pope; knowing that no man more eaſilie beguileth an other, than he that hath the cuſtome and name neuer to deceiue anie. Which practiſe of diſſimulation was much frequented of thoſe that aſpired & poſſeſſed the popedom; inſomuch that the ſame was in Alexander the ſixt ſo notable, that it was a prouerbe ordinarilie in Rome, that the pope did neuer the thing which he ſaid, and his ſonne the duke of Valentinois ſeldome ſpake that which he ment. Which kind of people (pretend they what they will) are excluded from the reſt of Sion, as the pſalmiſt ſaith;

Chriſtmaſſe paſtimes or delights at Gréenwich.

In this yeare the king kept his Chriſtmaſſe at Gréenewich, where was ſuch abundance of viands ſerued to all comers of anie honeſt behauiour, as hath béene few times ſéene. And againſt Newyéeres night was made in the hall a caſtell, gates, towers, and dungeon, garniſhed with artillerie and weapon after the moſt warlike faſhion: and on the front of the caſtell, was written Le fortereſſe dangereux, and within the caſtell were ſix ladies, cloathed in ruſſet ſattin, laid all ouer with leaues of gold, and euerie one knit with laces of blew ſilke and gold. On their heads, coifs, and caps all of gold. After this caſtell had béene caried about the hall, and the quéene had beheld it, in came the king with fiue other, apparelled in coats, the one halfe of ruſſet ſattin, ſpangled with ſpangles of fine gold, the other halfe of rich cloth of gold, on their heads caps of ruſſet ſattin, embrodered with works of fine gold bullion.

The king & fiue other aſſaile the caſtell.

Theſe ſix aſſaulted the caſtell. The ladies ſéeing them ſo luſtie and couragious, were content to ſolace with them, & vpon further communication, to yéeld the caſtell and ſo they came downe & danſed a long ſpace. And after the ladies led the knights into the caſtell, and then the caſtell ſuddenlie vaniſhed out of their ſights. On the daie of the Epiphanie at night, the king with eleuen other were diſguiſed, after the maner of Italie, called a maſke, a thing not ſéene before in England: they were apparelled in garments long and broad, wrought all with gold, with viſors and caps of gold. And after the banket doone, theſe maſkers came in, with ſix gentlemen diſguiſed in ſilke, bearing ſtaffe torches, and deſired the ladies to danſe; ſome were content, and ſome refuſed. And after they had danſed, and communed togither, as the faſhion of the maſke is, they tooke their leaue and departed, and ſo did the quéene, and all the ladies.]

A parlement.
The ſumme of the biſhop of Canturburies oration in the parlement.

The fiue and twentith daie of Ianuarie began the parlement, where the biſhop of Canturburie began his oration with this verſe Iuſtitia & pax oſculatæ ſunt. Upon which words he declared how iuſtice ſhould be miniſtred, and peace ſhould be nouriſhed, and by what meanes iuſtice was put by, and peace turned into warre. And therevpon he ſhewed how the French king would doo no iuſtice in reſtoring to the king his right inheritance: wherfore for lacke of iuſtice, peace of neceſſitie muſt be turned into warre. In this parlement was granted two fiftéens of the temporaltie, and of the clergie two tenths. After that it was concluded by the whole bodie of the realme in the high court of parlement aſſembled, that warre ſhould be made on the French king and his dominions. Wherevpon was wonderfull ſpéed made in preparing all things neceſſarie both for ſea and land.

Abr. Fl. ex I.S. pag. 896.

In this parlement was ſir Robert Sheffeld knight, ſometime recorder of London, ſpeaker for the commons. During this parlement, in the moneth of March, a yeoman of the crowne, one of the kings gard, named Newbolt, ſlue within the palace of Weſtminſter a ſeruant of maiſter Willoughbies, for the which offenſe the king commanded to be ſet vp a new paire of gallowes in the ſame place where the ſaid ſeruant loſt his life; and vpon the ſame the ſaid Newbolt was hanged, and there remained on the gallowes by the ſpace of two daies. A notable example of iuſtice, whereby the king verefied the report that was commonlie noiſed abroad of him; namelie that he could not abide the ſhedding of mans bloud, much leſſe wilfull murther. Wherein he ſhewed how tender he was ouer his ſubiects, and alſo how ſeuere againſt malefactors, ſpeciallie mankillers; whome he thought vnworthie of life, that had béene the inſtruments of others death; according to the law:

Newbolt a yeoman of the gard hanged.

Ierome Bonuiſe the popes collector and proctor in England a falſe knaue.

¶ In this ſeaſon one Ierome Bonuiſe, which was borne in Luke, and was factor in London for merchants of that nation, and had plaied bankerupt, and was conueied out of the realme for debt, was now in ſuch fauour with pope Iulie, that he made him his collector and proctor in England: & ſo he kept a great port, and reſorted to the king and his councell for the popes affaires (which then was ſore troubled by the French king) ſo that he knew both the popes councell and the kings, and falſelie and vntrulie reſorted by night to the French ambaſſadours lieng in London, and to them diſcouered what the king and the pope intended, which was not ſo cloſelie doone, but the king knew it: and ſo he was laid for, & was taken communing with one of the ſaid ambaſſadours vpon London wall at midnight, and brought to the Tower, where he remained vntill by the ſute of his fréends he was deliuered, and ſhortlie for ſhame voided the realme.]

The French king hath his hands full of troubles.

The king of Aragon alſo, hauing at that time warre with the French king, wrote to his ſonne in law king Henrie, that if he would ſend ouer an armie into Biſkaie, and ſo to inuade France on that ſide, for the recouerie firſt of his duchie of Guien; he would aid them with ordinance, horſſemen, beaſts, and cariages, with other neceſſaries apperteining to the ſame. The king and his councell putting their affiance in this promiſe of king Ferdinando, prepared a noble armie all of footmen, and ſmall artillerie, appointing the noble lord Thomas Greie marqueſſe Dorſet to be chéefe conductor of the ſame. The king daylie ſtudieng to ſet forth his warre which he had begun againſt the French king, cauſed ſir Edward Howard his admerall with diligence to make readie diuerſe goodlie tall ſhips, as the Soueraigne and others, to the number of eightéene, beſide other ſmaller veſſels.

Anno Reg. 4.
Sir Edmund Howard lord admerall.

Noblemen appointed for the voiage to Biſkaie.

Therewith hauing in his companie ſir Weſton Browne, Griffith Downe, Edward Cobham, Thomas Windham, Thomas Lucie, William Pirton, Henrie Shirbourne, Stephan Bull, George Witwange, Iohn Hopton, William Gunſton, Thomas Draper, Edmund Coke, Iohn Burdet, and diuerſe others, he tooke the ſea, and ſcowring the ſame, about the middeſt of Maie he came before Porteſmouth. About the verie ſelfe time the lord marqueſſe Dorſet, and other noblemen appointed for the iournie of Biſkaie, as the lord Howard ſonne and heire to the earle of Surrie, the lord Brooke, the lord Willoughbie, the lord Ferrers, the lord Iohn, the lord Anthonie, and the lord Leonard Greies, all thrée brethren to the marqueſſe, ſir Griffith ap Rice, ſir

Morris Berkeleie, ſir William Sands, the baron of Burford, ſir Richard Cornewall brother to the ſaid baron, William Huſſeie, Iohn Melton, William Kingſton eſquiers, ſir Henrie Willoughbie, and diuerſe others, with ſouldiers to the number of ten thouſand.

Amongſt theſe were fiue hundred Almans clad all in white, vnder the leading of one Guiot a gentleman of Flanders, all which (with the reſidue abouenamed) came to Southampton, and there muſtered their bands which were appointed and trimmed in the beſt maner. On the ſixtéenth daie of Maie they were all beſtowed abord in Spaniſh ſhips furniſhed with vittels, and other neceſſaries for that iournie. The wind ſerued ſo well for their purpoſe, that they came all in ſafetie on the coaſt of Biſkaie at the port of Paſſagh ſouthweſt of Fonterabie; and ſo the third daie of Iune they landed, and tooke the field, imbatteling themſelues for their ſafegard right ſtronglie. Within thrée daies after that the armie was thus aland, there came to the marqueſſe an earle and an other noble man, to welcome him and his companie.

The Engliſh nobles arriue on the coaſt of Biſkaie.

Then the lord capteine remooued his field, & tooke an other place néerer to Fonterabie, where he laie a long time, looking euerie daie to haue aid of horſſemen and artillerie of the king of Aragon, but none came. Sir Iohn Stile cauſed to be bought two hundred mulets and aſſes of ſuch price as the Spaniards gained greatlie, and when they were put to carie and draw, they would not ſerue the turne, for they were not exerciſed thereto before that time; and ſo for want of beaſts to draw ſuch ordinance as the Engliſhmen had there with them, they loſt the dooing of ſome great exploit againſt the Frenchmen on the frontiers of Gaſcoigne, for they might haue run a great waie into that countrie, being as then deſtitute and vnpurueied of men and munitions.

The Engliſh campe greatlie hindered for want of beaſts to draw their ordinance.

On a daie the Frenchmen made a ſkrie toward the Engliſh campe, but the Engliſhmen perceiuing them, paſſed the riuer that was betwixt them, and with arrowes chaſed the Frenchmen; ſo that for haſt manie of their horſſes foundered, and fell, yer they came to Baion: if there had béene anie horſſemen amongſt the Engliſhmen, they had ſore indamaged their enimies. The king of Nauarre doubting leaſt the Engliſhmen were come into thoſe parties for no good meaning towards him, ſent to the lord marqueſſe a biſhop, and diuerſe other, offering to miniſter vittels vnto the Engliſhmen for their monie, if it ſhould ſtand ſo with his pleaſure. The lord marqueſſe thanked him for the offer, and promiſed that if they of Nauarre would vittell his people, they ſhould paie them well and trulie for the ſame.

A gentle offer by the king of Nauarre to yͤ Engliſhmen.

He ſaid alſo that he would warrant their paſſing and repaſſing in ſafetie, and that by the Engliſhmen no preiudice ſhould be doone to his realme. Herevpon were the Engliſhmen vittelled out of Nauarre, to their great comfort. After that the armie had laine thirtie daies in the ſecond campe, there came from the king of Aragon a biſhop and other nobles of his councell. This biſhop was the ſame that made the anſwer to the lord Darcie at Calis the laſt yeare. The effect of his meſſage was, to deſire the lord capteine and his people to take patience for a while, and they ſhould ſée that ſuch preparation ſhould be made for the furniſhing of their enterpriſe, as ſhould ſtand with the honour of his maiſter and their aduancements.

The effect of the biſhops meſſage ſent from the king of Aragon to the lord marqueſſe.

The Engliſhmen ſore diſcontented with their idle lieng ſtill in the field, miſliked with his excuſes, ſuppoſing the ſame (as they prooued in déed) to be nothing but delaies. In the meane time that the Engliſhmen thus lingered without attempting any exploit, their vittels were much part garlike, & they eating thereof with all their meats, and drinking hot wines, & féeding alſo on hot fruits, procured their bloud to boile within their bellies, that there fell ſicke thrée thouſand of the flix: & thereof died an eightéene hundred perſons. The lord marqueſſe perceiuing this miſchéefe, ſent to the king of Spaine certeine of his capteins to know his pleaſure. The king told them that ſhortlie the duke of Alua ſhould ioine with them, bringing with him a mightie power; ſo that they might the more aſſuredlie procéed in their enterpriſe. With this anſwer they returned to the lord marqueſſe, who liked it neuer a deale; bicauſe he iudged that the king meant but to driue time with him, as after it prooued.

Great death of the flix by vnwoonted diet.

The lord marqueſſe ſendeth to the K. of Spaine to performe promiſe.

In the meane time there began a mutinie in the Engliſh campe thorough a falſe report, contriued by ſome malicious perſon; which was, that the capteins ſhould be allowed eight penſe for euerie common ſouldier; where the truth was, that they had allowed to them but onelie ſix penſe. The lord generall aduertiſed that the ſouldiers began to gather in companies, found meanes to apprehend the chéefe beginner, and deliuered him vnto William Kingſton eſquier, then prouoſt marſhall; and ſo was he put to death to the terrour of all other. Whileſt the Engliſhmen laie thus in campe on the borders of Biſkaie towards Guien, the archers went oftentimes a forraging into the French confines almoſt to Baion, and burnt manie prettie villages. The king of Spaine raiſed an armie, and ſent forth the ſame vnder the leading of the duke of Alua, which came forward as though he meant to haue come to the Engliſhmen; who being aduertiſed of his approch, were maruellouſlie glad thereof, in hope that then they ſhould be imploied about the enterpriſe for the which they were come.

The king of Spaines armie vnder the conduct of the duke of Alua.

But the duke intending an other thing, when he was aduanced forth within a daies iournie of them, ſuddenlie remooued his armie toward the realme of Nauarre, and entering the ſame, chaſed out of his realme the king of that land, and conquered the ſame to the king of Spains vſe, as in the hiſtorie of Spaine more plainelie it dooth appeare. After that the king of Spaine was thus poſſeſſed of the kingdome of Nauarre, he ſent vnto the lord marqueſſe, promiſing to ioine with him ſhortlie, and ſo to inuade the borders of France; but he came not. Wherefore the Engliſhmen thought themſelues not well vſed: for it gréeued them much, that they ſhould lie ſo long idle, ſith there was ſo great hope conceiued at their ſetting forth, that there ſhould be ſome great exploit atchiued by them, thorough the aid that was promiſed by the king of Spaine.

The kingdom of Nauarre gotten to the K. of Spains.

Thus whileſt the armie lingered without remoouing, there chanced an affraie to riſe betwixt the Engliſhmen and the townes-men of Sancta Maria, a village ſo called, wherevnto ſuch Engliſhmen as fell ſicke, had their reſort; and therevpon the alarms brought into the campe, the Engliſhmen and Almans ran in great furie to the ſuccour of their fellowes: and notwithſtanding all that the capteins could doo to ſtaie them, they ſlue and robbed the people without mercie. The Biſkaines that could get awaie, fled ouer that water into Guien. The capteins yet ſo ordered the matter, that all the pillage was reſtored, and one and twentie ſouldiers were condemned, which were apprehended as they were fléeing awaie with a bootie of ten thouſand duckats into Gaſcoigne; ſeauen of them were executed, and the reſidue pardoned of life, at the ſute of certeine lords of Spaine, which were as then preſent.

A fraie betwéene the Engliſhmen & the towneſmen of Sancta Maria.

The Frenchmen hearing of this riot came forth of Baion, to ſee and vnderſtand the maner thereof: but perceiuing that the Engliſhmen had deſcried them, ſuddenlie they returned. The Engliſhmen followed, & comming to the towne of S. Iehan de Lucie, they burnt and robbed it, & ſlue the inhabitants. Diuerſe other villages they ſpoiled on the borders of Guien; but bicauſe they wanted both horſſes of ſeruice, and horſſes to draw forth their ordinance, they could not doo anie ſuch damage as they might and would haue doone, if they had béene furniſhed according to their deſires in that point. Thus continued the Engliſh armie in ſuch weariſome ſort till the moneth of October, and then fell the lord marqueſſe ſicke, and the lord Howard had the chéefe gouernance of the armie.

S. Iehans burnt by the Engliſh.

Then were ſent from the king of Spaine diuerſe lords of his priuie councell vnto the ſaid lord Howard, to excuſe the matter for that he came not according to his promiſe, requiring them, that ſith the time of the yeare to make warre was paſt, it might pleaſe them to breake vp their campe, and to diuide themſelues abroad into the townes and villages of his realme till the ſpring time of the yeare, that they might then go forward with their firſt pretended enterpriſe. The lord Howard ſhewed well in words that the Engliſhmen could not thinke well of the king of Spaines fained excuſes, and vnprofitable delaies, to his ſmall honor & their great hinderance & loſſe, hauing ſpent the king their maiſter ſo much treaſure, and doone ſo little hurt to his aduerſaries. The Spaniards gaue faire words; and ſo in courteous maner departed.

The Engliſh campe in Biſkaie breaketh vp.

The armie diſperſed into ſundrie villages.

Then about the end of October it was agréed amongeſt all the lords of the Engliſh hoaſt that they ſhould breake vp their campe, and ſo they did. The lord marqueſſe and his people went to ſaint Sebaſtian, the lord Howard and his retinue to Rendre, the lord Willoughbie to Garſchang, and ſir William Sands with manie other capteins repaired to Fonterabie, and ſo euerie capteine with his retinue was placed in one towne or other. The king of England aduertiſed of the king of Spaine his meaning, ſent an herald called Windſor with letters vnto his armie, willing his men there to tarie, & promiſing to ſend ouer to them right ſhortlie a new ſupplie, vnder the guiding of the lord Herbert his chamberleine.

Vnappeaceable rage amongeſt the Engliſh ſouldiers.

When this letter was read, and the contents thereof notified, the ſouldiers began to be ſo highlie diſpleaſed; and ſpake ſuch outragious words, as it was maruell to heare: & not contented with words, they were bent to haue doone outragious déeds; inſomuch that in their furie they had ſlaine the lord Howard and diuerſe others, if they had not followed their intents: and herevpon they were glad to hire ſhips, and ſo imbarked themſelues in the moneth of Nouember. When the lord marqueſſe was brought aboord, he was ſo weake and féeble of remembrance thorough ſickeneſſe, that he aſked where he was. In the beginning of December they landed here in England, and were glad to be at home, and got out of ſuch a countrie, where they had little health, leſſe pleaſure, and much loſſe of time. The king of Spaine ſéemed to be ſore diſcontented with their departure, openlie affirming, that if they had taried vntill the next ſpring, he would in their companie haue inuaded France.

The Engliſh armie returneth out of Biſkaie.

The lord admerall in Britaine.

About the ſame time that the marqueſſe went into Spaine, that is to wit, about the middeſt of Maie, ſir Edward Howard lord admerall of England, being on the ſea afore Porteſmouth, made forth againe to the ſea, and directing his courſe towards Britaine on Trinitie ſundaie arriued at Berthram baie with twentie great ſhips, and ſuddenlie ſet his men on land, and there wan a bulworke, which the Britains kept and defended a while; but being ouercome, fled out of their hold, & left it to the Engliſhmen. Then the lord admerall paſſed ſeauen miles into the countrie, burning and waſting townes and villages, and in returning, ſkirmiſhed with diuerſe men of ames, and ſlue ſome of them: and notwithſtanding that the Britains fought valiantlie in defenſe of their countrie; yet they were put to the worſſe, and ſo the lord admerall returned to his ſhips.

Conquet and diuerſe other places burnt by ſir Edward Howard lord admerall of England.

On the thrée & twentith daie of Maie being mondaie, he landed in the morning, and commanded to burne the houſe of the lord Piers Moguns, with the towne of Conquet, & diuerſe other places, and chaſed the Britains into the caſtell of Breſt: and notwithſtanding all the aſſemblies and ſhewes that the Britains made, yet they ſuffered the Engliſh peaceablie to returne with their preies and booties. The firſt of Iune the Engliſhmen tooke land in Croiton baie, and then the lords of Britaine ſent word to the lord admerall, that if he would abide, they would giue him battell. The admerall rewarded the meſſenger, and willed him to ſay to them that ſent, that all that day they ſhould find him in that place tarieng their comming.

Diuers gentlemen knighted by the lord admerall.

Then to incourage diuerſe gentlemen the more earneſtlie to ſhew their valiancie, he dubbed them knights; as ſir Edward Brooke, brother to the lord Cobham, ſir Griffith Downe, ſir Thomas Windham, ſir Thomas Lucie, ſir Iohn Burdet, ſir William Pirton, ſir Henrie Shirborne, and ſir Stephan Bull. When the lord admerall ſaw the Frenchmen come, he comforted his men with pleaſant words, therby the more to incourage them. The whole number of the Engliſhmen was not much aboue 25 hundred, where the Frenchmen were at the leaſt ten thouſand; and yet when they ſaw the order of the Engliſhmen, they were ſuddenlie aſtonied.

Then a gentleman of good experience and credit amongeſt them, aduiſed the other capteins not to fight; but to retire a little and take a ſtrong ground, there to remaine till the Engliſhmen returned toward their ſhips: and then to take the aduantage. And ſo the capteins began to retire, which when the commons ſaw, they all ran awaie as faſt as they might, ſuppoſing that the capteins had ſéene or knowne ſome great perill at hand, bicauſe they were not priuie to the purpoſe of their capteins. The lord admerall ſéeing what happened, when the night came departed to his ſhips. After this the gentlemen of Britaine ſent to the admerall for a ſafeconduct for diuerſe perſons, which they ment to ſend to him about a treatie. The lord admerall was of his gentleneſſe content to grant their requeſt. Then certeine lords of Britaine tooke a bote, and came to the ſhip of the lord admerall, where he was ſet with all his councell of the armie about him.

The requeſt of the lords of Britaine to the lord admerall.

The requeſt of the Britains was, that it might pleaſe him to ſurceaſe his cruell kind of warre, in burning of townes and villages: but the admerall plainlie told them, that he was ſent to make warre and not peace. Then they required a truce for ſix daies, which would not be granted; and to their reproofe, the admerall told them, that gentlemen ought to defend their countrie by force, rather than to ſue for peace. And thus (making them a banket) he ſent them awaie. And after hearing that there was ſhips of warre on the ſeas, he coaſted from thence alongſt the countrie of Normandie, ſtill ſcowring the ſea, ſo that no enimie durſt appeare. And at length he came and laie by the Ile of Wight, to ſée if anie enimies would appéere. During which time, diuers ſhips were kept in the north ſeas, vnder the conduct of ſir Edward Ichingham, Iohn Lewes, Iohn Louedaie, and others.

A truce required for ſix daies.

Iuſtes at Greenewich.

Abr. Fl. ex Edw. Hall fol.xxj.

A deſcription of the ſhewes and triumphs then ſolemnlie held.

This yeare alſo in Iune, the king kept a ſolemne iuſtes at Greenewich, the king & ſir Charles Brandon taking vpon them to abide all commers. ¶ Firſt came the ladies all in white and red ſilke, ſet vpon courſers trapped in the ſame ſute, freated ouer with gold; after whom followed a founteine curiouſlie made of ruſſet ſattin, with eight gargils ſpowting water: within the founteine ſat a knight armed at all peeces. After this founteine followed a ladie all in blacke ſilke dropped with fine ſiluer, on a courſer trapped in the ſame. Then followed a knight in a horſſelitter, the courſers & litter apparelled in blacke with ſiluer drops. When the fountein came to the tilt, the ladies rode round about, and ſo did the founteine, and the knight within the litter. And after them were brought two goodlie courſers apparelled for the iuſts: and when they came to the tilts end, the two knights mounted on the two courſers abiding all commers. The king was in the founteine, and ſir Charles Brandon was in the litter. Then ſuddenlie with great noiſe of trumpets entred ſir Thomas Kneuet in a caſtell of cole blacke, and ouer the caſtell was written, The dolorous caſtell, and ſo he and the earle of Eſſex, the lord Howard, and other ran their courſes with the king and ſir Charles Brandon, and euer the king brake moſt ſpeares, and likelie was ſo to doo yer he began, as in former time; the priſe fell to his lot: ſo luckie was he and fortunat in the proofe of his prowes in martiall actiuitie, whereto from his yong yeers he was giuen, as the poet ſaith:

Huic erat à teneris annis ars bellica cordi.]

After this, the king hauing prepared men and ſhips readie to go to the ſea vnder the gouernance of ſir Anthonie Oughtred, ſir Edward Ichingham, William Sidneie, and diuerſe other gentlemen, appointed them to take the ſea, and to come before the Ile of Wight, there to ioine with the lord admerall, which they did, but in their paſſage a gallie was loſt by negligence of the maiſter. The king hauing a deſire to ſee his nauie togither, rode to Porteſmouth, and there appointed capteins for one of his chiefeſt ſhips called the Regent, ſir Thomas Kneuet maſter of his horſſes, & ſir Iohn Carew of Deuonſhire; and to the Souereigne he appointed for capteins, ſir Charles Brandon, and ſir Henrie Gilford; and with them in the Souereigne were put threeſcore of the talleſt yeoman of the kings gard. Manie other gentlemen were ordeined capteins in other veſſels. And the king made them a banket before their ſetting forward, and ſo commited them to God. They were in number fiue and twentie faire ſhips of great burden, well furniſhed of all things neceſſarie.

The king riding to Portſmouth appointeth capteins ouer his ſhips.

The kings nauie ſetteth out.

The French king in this meane while had prepared a nauie of thirtie nine ſaile in the hauen of Breſt; and for chiefe he ordeined a great Carrike of Breſt, apperteining to the queene his wife, called Cordelier a verie ſtrong ſhip, and verie well appointed. This nauie ſet forward out of Breſt the tenth of Auguſt, and came to Britaine baie, in the which the ſame day was the Engliſh fleet arriued. When the Engliſhmen perceiued the Frenchmen to be iſſued foorth of the hauen of Breſt, they prepared themſelues to battell, and made foorth towards their enimie, which came fiercelie forward; and comming in ſight ech of other, they ſhot off their ordinance ſo terriblie togither, that all the ſea coaſt ſounded of it. The lord admerall made with the great ſhip of Deepe, and chaſed hir; ſir Henrie Gilford and alſo ſir Charles Brandon made with the great Carrike of Breſt, being in the Souereigne, and laid ſtem to ſtem to the Carrike; but by negligence of the maſter, or elſe by ſmoke of the ordinance, or otherwiſe, the Souereigne was caſt at the ſterne of the Carrike, with which aduantage the Frenchmen ſhouted for ioy.

The Engliſh nauie incountereth with the French vpon the coaſt of Britaine.

But when ſir Thomas Kneuet, who was readie to haue boorded the great ſhip of Deepe, ſaw that the Souereigne miſſed the Carrike, ſuddenlie he cauſed the Regent (in the which he was aboord) to make to the Carrike, and to grapple with hir a long boord And when they of the Carrike perceiued they could not depart, they let ſlip an anchor, and ſo with the ſtreame the ſhips turned, and the Carrike was on the weather ſide, and the Regent on the lie ſide. The fight was cruell betwixt theſe two ſhips, the archers on the Engliſh ſide, & the croſſebowes on the French part dooing their vttermoſt to annoie each other: but finallie the Engliſhmen entered the Carrike, which being perceiued by a gunner, he deſperatlie ſet fire in the gunpowder, as ſome ſay; though there were that affirmed, how ſir Anthonie Oughtred folowing the Regent at the ſterne, bowged hir in diuerſe places, and ſet hir powder on fire.

A cruell fight betwixt the two nauies.

The Engliſh Regent, and the French Carrik burnt togither.

But howſoeuer it chanced, the whole ſhip by reaſon of the powder was ſet on fire, & ſo both the Carrike and the Regent being grappled togither, ſo as they could not fall off, were both conſumed by fire at that inſtant. The French nauie perceiuing this, fled in all haſt, ſome to Breſt, and ſome to the Iles adioining. The Engliſhmen made out boats to helpe them in the Regent: but the fire was ſo terrible, that in maner no man durſt approch; ſauing that by the Iames of Hull certeine Frenchmen that could ſwim were ſaued. Capteine of this Carrike was ſir Piers Morgan, and with him he had in the ſame nine hundred men: and with ſir Thomas Kneuet and ſir Iohn Carew were ſeuen hundred; but all drowned and burnt. The Engliſhmen that night laie in Berthram baie, for the French fleet was diſperſt (as ye haue heard.) The lord admerall after this miſchance thus happened to theſe two worthie ſhips, made againe to the ſea, and ſcowred all alongeſt the coaſts of Britaine, Normandie, and Picardie, taking manie French ſhips, and burning ſuch as they could not well bring away with them.

The French nauie flieth.

The king of England hearing of the loſſe of the Regent, cauſed a great ſhip to be made, ſuch a one as the like had neuer beene ſeene in England, and named it Henrie grace de Dieu. The French king about the ſame time ſent to a knight of the Rhodes called Priour Iehan, a Frenchman borne, of the countrie of Guien, requiring him to come by the ſtreicts of Marrocke into Britaine: the which he did, bringing with him three gallies of force, with diuerſe foiſts and row-gallies, ſo well ordinanced and trimmed, as the like had not beene ſeene in theſe parties before his comming. He had laine on the coaſts of Barbarie to defend certeine of the religion, as they came from Tripolie. This yeare in the moneth of Nouember the king called his high court of parlement, in the which it was concluded, that the king himſelfe in perſon with an armie roiall ſhuld inuade France; wherevpon notice being giuen to ſuch as ſhuld attend, they made their puruciance with all diligence that might be. In this parlement was granted to the king two fifteens, and foure demies; and head monie, of euerie duke ten markes, an earle fiue pounds, a lord foure pounds, a knight foure marks, & euerie man rated at eight hundred pounds in goods, to paie foure marks, and ſo after that rate, till him that was valued at fortie ſhillings, paied twelue pence, and euerie man that tooke fortie ſhillings wages twelue pence, and euerie man and woman of fifteene yeares or vpward foure pence. The ſteeple and lanterne of Bow church in Cheape was this yeare finiſhed. By fire this yeare a great part of the kings palace of Weſtminſter, and the chappell in the Tower of London, and manie other places in England were burned. In Aprill, the king ſent a great nauie of twelue

The deſcription of a rich mount being a Chriſtmaſſe ſhew.

After this parlement was ended, the king kept a ſolemne Chriſtmaſſe at Gréenwich, with danſes and mummeries in moſt princelie maner. And on the Twelfe daie at night came into the hall a mount, called the rich mount. The mount was ſet full of rich flowers of ſilke, and eſpeciallie full of broome ſlips full of cods, the branches were gréene ſattin, and the flowers flat gold of damaſke, which ſignified Plantagenet. On the top ſtood a goodlie beacon giuing light, round about the beacon ſat the king and fiue other, all in cotes and caps of right crimſin veluet, embrodered with flat gold of damaſke, their cotes ſet full of ſpangles of gold. And foure woodhouſes drew the mount till it came before the quéene, and then the king and his companie deſcended and danſed. Then ſuddenlie the mount opened, and out came ſix ladies all in crimſin ſattin and plunket, embrodered with gold and pearle, with French hoods on their heads, and they danſed alone. Then the lords of the mount tooke the ladies and danſed togither: and the ladies reentered, and the mount cloſed, and ſo was conueied out of the hall. Then the king ſhifted him, and came to the quéene, and ſat at the banket which was verie ſumptuous.

Sir Charles Brandon created vicount Liſle.

The nauie ſet out againe.

After Candlemaſſe, the king created ſir Charles Brandon vicount Liſle. In March following was the kings nauie of ſhips roiall & other ſet forth to the number of fortie and two, beſide other balangers vnder the conduct of the lord admerall, accompanied with ſir Walter Deuereux, lord Ferrers, ſir Wolſtan Browne, ſir Edward Ichingham, ſir Anthonie Pointz, ſir John Wallop, ſir Thomas Windam, ſir Stephan Bull, William Fitz Williams, Arthur Plantagenet, William Sidneie eſquiers, and diuerſe other noble and valiant capteins. They ſailed to Porteſmouth, and there laie abiding wind, and when the ſame ſerued their turne, they weied anchor, & making ſaile into Britaine, came into Berthram baie, and there laie at anchor in ſight of the French nauie, which kept it ſelfe cloſe within the hauen of Breſt, without proffering to come abroad.

The Engliſh nauie purpoſing to ſet vpon the French in the hauen, are defeated by a miſchãce.

The Engliſh perceiuing the maner of the Frenchmen, determined to ſet on them in the hauen, and making forward in good order of battell, at their firſt entrie one of their ſhips, whereof Arthur Plantagenet, was capteine, fell on a blind rocke, and burſt in ſunder, by reaſon whereof, all the other ſtaied: and ſo the Engliſh capteins perceiuing that the hauen was dangerous to enter without an expert lodeſman, they caſt about, and returned to their harborough at Berthram baie againe. The Frenchmen perceiuing that the Engliſhmen meant to aſſaile them, moored their ſhips ſo néere to the caſtell of Breſt as they could, and placed bulworks on the land on euerie ſide, to ſhoot at the Engliſhmen. Alſo they trapped togither foure and twentie great hulkes that came to the baie for ſalt, and ſet them on a row, to the intent that if the Engliſhmen had come to aſſault them, they would haue ſet thoſe hulks on fire, and haue let them driue with the ſtreame amongſt the Engliſh ſhips.

The lord admerall would haue the king preſent in perſon at the encounter, and is rebuked.

Prior Jehan alſo laie ſtill in Blanke ſable baie, and plucked his gallies to the ſhore, ſetting his baſiliſkes and other ordinance in the mouth of the baie, which baie was bulworked on euerie ſide, that by water it was not poſſible to be wonne. The lord admerall perceiuing the French nauie thus to lie in feare, wrote to the king to come thither in perſon, and to haue the honour of ſo high an enterpriſe: which writing the kings councell nothing allowed, for putting the king in ieopardie vpon the chance of the ſea. Wherefore the king wrote to him ſharplie againe, commanding him to accompliſh that which apperteined to his duetie: which cauſed him to aduenture things further than wiſedome would he ſhould (as after yée ſhall heare) to his vtter vndooing and caſting awaie, God hauing ordeined the means by his prouidence, which the pagans implied (though wanting the light of grace) in the name of deſtinie, of them counted ineuitable. [A deſtinie lamentable conſidering the qualitie of the perſon, with the maner of his dieng. Wherein although manie vainlie diſpute, that fortune led him to ſo miſerable an accident: yet if we will lift vp our conſiderations to God, we ſhall find that he hath reſerued ſuch a prerogatiue ouer all things which he hath created, that to him onelie belongeth the authoritie to diſpoſe all things by the ſame power wherewith he hath created them of nothing.] And yet the fooliſh world (doting in blind ignorance, but pretending a ſingular inſight in matters of ſecrecie) bluſheth not to talke or rather to aſſeuere, caſualtie, chancemedlie, miſfortune, and ſuch like fooliſh imaginations: whereas (indéed) the prouidence of God compaſſeth all things whatſoeuer, for nothing can be priuileged from the ampleneſſe of the ſame.

Anno Reg.5.

Prior Jehan kéeping him ſtill within his hold, as a priſoner in a dungeon, did yet ſometime ſend out his ſmall foiſts to make a ſhew before the Engliſh nauie, which chaſed them to the baie. But bicauſe the Engliſh ſhips were mightie veſſels, they could not enter the baie: and therefore the lord admerall cauſed certeine boats to be manned forth, which tooke one of the beſt foiſts that Prior Jehan had, and that with great danger: for the gallies and bulworks ſhot ſo freſhlie all at one inſtant, that it was maruell how the Engliſhmen eſcaped. The lord admerall perceiuing that the Frenchmen would not come abroad, called a councell, wherein it was determined, that firſt they would aſſaile Prior Jehan and his gallies lieng in Blanke ſable baie, and after to ſet on the reſidue of the French fléet in the hauen of Breſt. Then firſt it was appointed, that the lord Ferrers, ſir Stephan Bull, and other, ſhould go aland with a conuenient number to aſſault the bulworkes, while the admerall entered with row barges and little gallies into the baie, and ſo ſhould the Frenchmen be aſſailed both by water and land.

A conſultatiõ about the aſſaulting of Prior Jehan.

The lord admerall by the counſell of a Spaniſh knight called ſir Alfonſe Charant, affirming that he might enter the baie with little ieopardie, called to him William Fitz Williams, William Coke, John Colleie, and ſir Wolſtan Browne, as his chéefe and moſt truſtie fréends, making them priuie to his intent; which was to take on him the whole enterpriſe, with their aſſiſtance. And ſo on S. Markes daie, which is the fiue and twentith of Aprill, the ſaid admerall put himſelfe in a ſmall row barge, appointing thrée other ſmall rowing ſhips, and his owne ſhip bote to attend him; and therewith vpon a ſudden rowed into the baie, where Prior Jehan had moored vp his gallies iuſt to the ground: which gallies with the bulworkes on the land, ſhot ſo terriblie, that they that followed were afraid. But the admerall paſſed forward, & as ſoone as he came to the gallies, he entered & droue out the Frenchmen. William Fitz Williams within his ſhip was ſore hurt with a quarell. The baie was ſhallow, and the other ſhips could not enter, for the tide was ſpent.

The admerall roweth into the baie where the Prior laie.

Which thing the Frenchmen perceiuing, they entered the gallies againe with moris pikes, and fought with the Engliſh in the gallies. The admerall perceiuing their approch, thought to haue entred againe into his row barge, which by violence of the tide was driuen downe the ſtreame, and with a pike he was throwne ouer the boord, and ſo drowned, and alſo the forenamed Alfonſe was there ſlaine: all the other boates and veſſels eſcaped verie hardlie awaie: for if they had taried, the tide had failed them, and then all had béene loſt. The lord Ferrers and the other capteins were right ſorowfull of this chance: but when there was no remedie, they determined not to attempt anie further, till they might vnderſtand the kings pleaſure, and ſo they returned into England.

The French gallies land in Suſſex, and burne certeine cotages.

The Frenchmen perceiuing that the Engliſh fléet departed from the coaſts of Britaine and drew towards England, did come forth of their hauens, and Prior Iehan ſet forth his gallies and foiſts, and drawing alongſt the coaſts of Normandie and Britaine, coaſted ouer to the borders of Suſſex with all his companie, and there landed, and ſet fire on certeine poore cotages. The gentlemen that dwelt néere, raiſed the countrie, and came to the coaſt, and droue Prior Iehan to his gallies. The king was right ſorie for the death of his admerall; but ſorrow preuaileth not when the chance is paſt. Therefore the king hearing that the French nauie was abroad, called to him the lord Thomas Howard eldeſt brother to the late admerall, and ſonne and heire apparant to the earle of Surrie, whome he made admerall, willing him to reuenge his brothers death. The lord Howard humblie thanked his grace of the truſt that he put in him, and ſo immediatlie went to the ſea, and ſcowred the ſame, that no Frenchman durſt ſhew himſelfe on the coaſt of England, for he fought with them at their owne ports.

The lord Thomas Howard made admerall.

The king hauing all his prouiſions readie for the warre, and meaning to paſſe the ſea in his owne perſon, for the better taming of the loftie Frenchmen, appointed that worthie councellor and right redoubted chéefteine, the noble George Talbot earle of Shreweſburie, high ſteward of his houſhold, to be capteine generall of his fore-ward; and in his companie were appointed to go, the lord Thomas Stanleie earle of Derbie, lord Decowreie prior of ſaint Iohns, ſir Robert Ratcliffe lord Fitzwater, the lord Haſtings, the lord Cobham, ſir Rice ap Thomas, ſir Thomas Blunt, ſir Richard Sacheuerell, ſir Iohn Digbie, ſir Iohn Aſkew, ſir Lewes Bagot, ſir Thomas Cornewall, and manie other knights, eſquiers, and ſouldiers; to the number of eight thouſand men. Theſe paſſed the ſea, and came all to Calis about the middle of Maie.

The earle of Shreweſburie ſent into France with an armie.

The lord Herbert called ſir Charles Summerſet, lord chamberleine to the king, in the end of the ſame moneth followed the ſaid earle of Shreweſburie, with ſix thouſand men: in whoſe companie were the erls of Northumberland Percie, of Kent Greie, of Wilſhire Stafford, the lord Dudleie, the lord Delaware, and his ſonne ſir Thomas Weſt, ſir Edward Huſſeie, ſir Edward Dimmocke, ſir Dauid Owen, with manie other knights, eſquiers, and gentlemen. After they had ſoiourned certeine daies in Calis, and that all their neceſſaries were readie, they iſſued forth of the towne, ſo to begin their campe. And firſt the earle of Shreweſburie and his companie tooke the field, and after him the lord Herbert with his retinues in manner of a rere-ward. Then followed that valiant knight ſir Rice ap Thomas, with fiue hundred light horſſemen and archers on horſſebacke, who ioined himſelfe to the fore-ward, a gentleman of ſuch ſpirit and hardineſſe, that he is named the floure of the Welſhmen, as the poet ſaith:

——Ricius Thômas flos Cambrobritannûm.

Theſe two lords thus imbattelled did remoue the ſeuentéenth of Iune to Sandifield, & on the eightéenth they came to Marguiſon, on the further ſide of the water, as though they would haue paſſed ſtreight waies to Bullongne. But they meaning an other thing, the next daie tooke an other waie, and ſo coaſted the countrie with ſuch diligence, that the two and twentith of Iune they came before the ſtrong citie of Terrouan, and pight their tents a mile from the towne. The ſame night (as certeine capteins were in councell within the lord Herberts tent) the baron Carew was ſlaine with a bullet ſhot out of the towne; which ſudden aduenture much diſmaied the aſſemblie, but the lord Herbert comforted them with manlie words, and ſo his death was paſſed ouer. All the countrie of Artois and Picardie fortified their holds, and made ſhewes as the Engliſh armie paſſed, but they durſt not once aſſaile them.

The Engliſh armie marcheth vnto Terwine.

The baron of Carew ſlaine.

The citie of Terrouan was ſtronglie fortified with walles, rampiers, bulworks, and large ditches. The lord Pontremie was gouernour within it, hauing with him ſix hundred horſſemen, and 2500 Almans, beſides the inhabitants. The walles & towers were full of ordinance, which oftentimes did much diſpleaſure to the Engliſhmen. The earle of Shreweſburie planted his ſiege on the northweſt ſide of the towne, and the lord Herbert on the eaſt ſide, cauſing great trenches to be made to couer his people withall: for on that ſide there was no hill to ſuccour or defend him. The Frenchmen and Almans would diuerſe times iſſue out, but the archers were euer readie to beat them into the citie againe. The earle of Shreweſburie got into an hollow ground or vallie néere to the citie, and likewiſe the lord Herbert (by reaſon of his trenches) approched likewiſe verie néere to the ditches.

The lord Pontremie capteine of Terwine.

Terwine beſieged.

The ſeuen and twentith daie of Iune being mondaie, ſir Nicholas Vaux and ſir Edward Belknap, hauing with them foure hundred and thrée ſcore men ſet from Guiſnes to conduct foure and twentie carts laden with vittels towards the ſiege at Terrouan; but the duke of Vandoſme lieutenant of Picardie with eight hundred horſſemen ſet on them as they paſſed through Ard, and found them ſo out of order, that notwithſtanding all that the Engliſh capteins could doo to bring men into arraie, it would not be: for the Frenchmen ſet on ſo readilie, that they kept the Engliſhmen in ſunder. Yet the horſſemen of Guiſnes, being not paſt foure and twentie in all, tooke their ſpeares and ioined with the Frenchmen right manfullie, and likewiſe thrée ſcore archers ſhot freſhlie at their enimies; but the Frenchmen were ſo manie in number, that they obteined the place, ſlue eight gentlemen, and diuerſe archers. Sir Nicholas Vaux and ſir Edward Belknap fled toward Guiſnes.

Thus were the vittels loſt, and yet the Frenchmen went not awaie with cléere hands: for thoſe few archers that cloſed togither, ſhot ſo egerlie, that they ſlue and hurt diuerſe Frenchmen; and on the field laie foure ſcore and ſeuen great horſſes, which died there in the place, and neuer went further. On the fiftéenth day of Iune the K. departed from Gréenewich, taking his iourneie towards Douer, whither he came by eaſie iournies, and the quéene in his companie. After he had reſted a ſeaſon in the caſtell of Douer, and taken order for the rule of the realme in his abſence, he tooke leaue of the quéene, and entring his ſhip the laſt daie of Iune, being the daie of ſaint Paule: he ſailed ouer to Calis, where he was receiued with great ioy by the deputie ſir Gilbert Talbot and all other there. At his entring into Calis, all the baniſhed men entred with him, and were reſtored to the libertie of the towne. The king laie in Calis a certeine time, till all his prouiſions were readie, but the armie laie in campe at Newnham bridge.

The king in perſon paſſeth ouer into France.

On the one and twentith of Iulie, the kings maieſtie paſſed forth of Calis, and tooke the field, diuiding the armie which he had there with him into thrée battels. The lord Liſle marſhall of the hoſt was capteine of the fore-ward, and vnder him thrée thouſand men: ſir Richard Carew with thrée hundred kept on the right ſide of the ſame fore-ward as a wing thereto: and the lord Darcie with other thrée hundred men was a wing on the left hand. The fore-riders of this battell were the Northumberland men on light geldings. The earle of Eſſex was lieutenant generall of the ſpeares, and ſir Iohn Pechie was vicegouernour of all the horſſemen, and ſir Iohn Burdet ſtandard-bearer to the kings ſpears. An eight hundred Almans went on a plumpe by themſelues before the kings battell, and the duke of Buckingham with ſix hundred men was on the kings left hand, equall with the Almans, in like maner as ſir Edward Poinings was on the right hand, with other ſix hundred men equall with the Almans.

* This man was afterward cardinall.

In the kings battell, where was the ſtandard of the armes of England borne by ſir Henrie Guilford, there were thrée thouſand; & the lord of Aburgauenie with eight hundred men was wing on the right hand, and ſir William Compton with the retinue of the biſhop of Wincheſter, and of maiſter * Wolſeie the kings almoner, being in number eight hundred was in manner of a rere-gard. Sir Anthonie Oughtred and ſir Iohn Neuill with the kings ſpeares that followed were foure hundred, and ſo the whole armie conteined eleuen thouſand and thrée hundred men. The number of the cariages were thirtéene hundred, and the number of them that attended the ſame were ninetéene hundred men, and all theſe were reckoned in the battell: but of good fighting men & ſouldiers appointed for the purpoſe, there were not full nine thouſand. In this order the king with his armie marched forward through the confines of his enimies to the ſiege of Terrouan, entring into the French ground the fiue and twentith of Iulie being mondaie. On the morrow after as the armie marched forward, by negligence of the carters that miſtooke the waie, a great curtall (called the Iohn Euangeliſt) was ouerthrowne in a déepe pond of water and could not quicklie be recouered.

The French armie approcheth, & their number.

The king being aduertiſed that the Frenchmen approched to fight with him, left the gun (bicauſe the maiſter carpenter vndertooke to weie it ſhortlie out of the water) & ſet forward, paſſing on by Tornohan, which he left on his right hand, and a little beyond pitched downe his field abiding for his enimies, the which (as he was informed) were not far off. On the morrow after being wedneſdaie, the Reliefe of the ſpeares brought word that they had aſcried the French armie comming forward in order of battell, to the number of eleuen thouſand footmen, and foure thouſand horſſemen. Capteins of this armie were the lord de la Palice, the lord de Priennes, the duke of Longuile, the earle of S. Paule, the lord of Floringes, the lord of Cleremont, & Richard de la Poole a baniſhed man, ſon to Iohn duke of Suffolke. They came within two miles of the kings armie, and there the footmen ſtaled, and came no further.

The northern prickers plaie the men.

But certeine of the horſſemen to the number of thrée thouſand came forward, and at the end of a wood ſhewed themſelues in open ſight of the Engliſh armie. And thus they ſtood countenancing the Engliſhmen. Some of the northerne prickers made to them, and in ſkirmiſhing with them, tooke ſome of them priſoners. About noone the ſame daie, that valiant Welſh knight ſir Rice ap Thomas with his retinue of horſſemen being departed from the ſiege of Terrouan came to the king, and ſtreightwaies was ſent to the earle of Eſſex, which with two hundred ſpeares was laid in a ſtale, if the Frenchmen had come nerer. When they were ioined togither, they drew about the hill, hauing with them ſir Thomas Guilford, with two hundred archers on horſſebacke, meaning to ſet on the Frenchmen: which perceiuing that, and doubting leaſt more companie had followed, they ſuddenlie drew backe, and ioined them with their great battell.

Then the earle of Eſſex and the Engliſh horſſemen followed them, till they came néere to the armie of France, and then ſcaled and ſent forth light horſſemen to view the demeanor of the Frenchmen. When the Frenchmen of armes were returned to their battell, then both the horſſemen and footmen withdrew in order of battell, and ſtill the Engliſh currors followed them for the ſpace of thrée leagues, and then returned to the earle, making report to him of that they had ſéene, who then brake vp his ſtale, and came to the king, declaring to him how the Frenchmen were gone backe. This was called the drie wedneſdaie; for the daie was wonderfull hot, and the king with his armie ſtood in order of battell, from ſix of the clocke in the morning till thrée of the clocke in the after noone. And ſome died for lacke of moiſture, and generallie euerie man was burned about the mouth with heat of the ſtomach; for drinke lacked, and water was not neere.

The bombard called the red gun ouerthrowne.

After this the king remooued toward Terrouan, and as he was ſetting forward, the lord Walon of Flanders came to him with his horſſemen, which were alreadie in the kings wages. As the armie paſſed, by negligence the ſame daie in a lane was ouerthrowne one of the kings bombards of iron, called the red gun, and there left. The king lodged that night two miles from ſaint Omers on the north ſide of the towne. On the thurſdaie, being the eight and twentith of Iulie, the maiſter carpenter with an hundred carpenters and labourers, without knowledge of the marſhall, went to weie vp the great gun that was in the pond (as ye haue heard) and by force of engins drew it vp, and carted it readie to bring awaie: but ſuddenlie there came an eight hundred Frenchmen with ſpeares, croſſebowes, and handguns, which ſet on the labourers ſo fiercelie, that notwithſtanding their manfull defenſe, the moſt part of them were ſlaine and the reſidue taken, and both they and the péece of ordinance conueied to Bullongne.

The great gun gotten by the French, by the foliſh hardineſſe of the maiſter carpenter.

The Frenchmen glad of this chance, aſſembled a great number to fetch the other gun, which laie yet in the lane. But the lord Berners being capteine of the pioners, and hearing all theſe things, prepared to recouer that gun; and ſo in the morrow went to fetch it. There were appointed to go backe to ſee him ſafe conducted, the earle of Eſſex with his companie of ſpeares, ſir Rice ap Thomas with his retinue, and ſir Iohn Neuill with the Northumberland men. The Almans alſo were commanded to retire backe to the ſuccours of them that were gone for the gun. The Almans went forth, till they came within two miles of the place where the gun laie, and further they would not go. The Frenchmen to the number of nine or ten thouſand men (as ſome eſtéemed) were abroad, and came toward the place where the Engliſhmen were carting the péece of ordinance.

The Northumberland horſſemen hauing eſpied them, gaue knowledge to the reſidue of the Engliſhmen, who prepared themſelues to defend their ground againſt the enimies: and the earle of Eſſex ſent to the lord Walon, willing him with his companie to come to his aid: but the lord Walon ſent word againe, that he was come to ſerue the king of England more than for one daie, and therefore he wiſhed that all the Engliſhmen would returne, ſith that with the great power of France they were not able to match. This anſwer was much diſpleaſant to the earle of Eſſex and the other capteins. In this meane time the foreriders of the French part were come to the hands of the Engliſhmen, and ſo they fell in ſkirmiſh very hotlie: but at length all things conſidered, and ſpeciallie the ſmall number of the Engliſhmen, being not aboue ſeuen hundred horſſemen, it was thought beſt that they ſhould returne and follow the gun, which they had ſent forward.

Herevpon they retreited in order, and not in anie flieng manner, ſtill following the gun. The Frenchmen perceiuing that, pricked forward to the number of two thouſand horſſemen, & came iuſt to the backs of the Engliſhmen, who therewith caſt about, and made returne to the Frenchmen. Sir William Tiler and ſir Iohn Sharpe were the firſt that charged, and after all the other Engliſhmen. The Frenchmen fled immediatlie ſo faſt backe, that happie was he that might be formoſt. The whole hoſt ſéeing their horſſemen thus had in chaſe, ſuddenlie returned. The earle of Eſſex withdrew to an hill, and there cauſed his trumpet to blow to the ſtandard for feare of ſubtile dealing; and when his men were come in, and gathered togither, he returned. On the ſame daie being fridaie, the nine and twentith of Iulie, the king came to Arkes, & there incamped; whither the earle of Eſſex came to him, and declared what had béene done that daie, the king thanking him and other the capteins for their paines and diligence.

The king incampeth to Arkes.

The king laie here at Arkes till mondaie the firſt of Auguſt, and then remooued to a village midwaie betwixt Terwine and ſaint Omers, where he lay till thurſdaie the fourth of Auguſt, and came that daie in good order of battell before the citie of Terwine, & there pight vp his tents and pauillions in moſt roiall manner, fenſing his campe right ſtronglie with ordinance and other warlike deuiſes. [The king for himſelfe had a houſe of timber with a chimnie of iron, and for his other lodgings he had great and goodlie tents of blew water worke garniſhed with yellow and white, diuerſe roomes within the ſame for all offices neceſſarie. On the top of the pauillions ſtood the kings beaſts holding fanes, as the lion, the dragon, the greihound, the antelope, the dun cow: all within the lodging was pointed full of the ſunnes riſing, the lodging was one hundred and fiue and twentie foote in length.]

The king commeth to the ſiege.

Edw. Hall in Hen. 8. fol. 28.

The king lieng before Terwine, his great ordinance did ſore beat the towne walles, & they within likewiſe ſhot ordinance out of the towne, and ſlue diuerſe Engliſhmen in the trenches, among which ſhots they had one gun that euerie daie and night was ordinarilie ſhot at certeine houres without faile: this gun was of the Engliſhmen called the whiſtling gun, but it neuer did harme in the kings field. The ſiege thus lieng before the citie of Terwine, ſir Alexander Bainam a capteine of the miners, cauſed a mine to be enterpriſed to enter into the towne: but the Frenchmen perceiuing that, made a countermine, and ſo deſtroied the other mine, and diuerſe miners ſlaine within the ſame. The French armie houered euer a farre to take the Engliſhmen at aduantage, as they went a forraging; and manie a ſkirmiſh was doone, and manie good feates of armes atchiued on both ſides, and diuerſe priſoners taken. Among the Frenchmen were certeine light horſſemen called Stradiots, with ſhort ſtirrops, beuer hats, ſmall ſpeares, and ſwords like cimiteries of Turkie: diuerſe times the northerne light horſſmen vnder the conduct of ſir Iohn Neuill ſkirmiſhed with theſe Stradiots and tooke diuerſe of them priſoners, and brought them to the king.

Stradiots deſcribed and incountered of the Engliſh light horſſemen.

While the king laie thus before Terwine, the capteine of Bullongne knowing by his eſpials, that manie of the garriſon of Calis were with the king at the ſiege, and alſo that vittels were dailie brought out of England to Calis to ſuccour the campe, imagined a great enterpriſe, and ſent for all the men of warre vnder his dominion and rule, and declared to them what honour they ſhould obteine if they hurted or ſpoiled the out parts of Calis, the king of England on that ſide of the ſea. The men of warre perceiuing the good courage of the capteine, aſſented to his purpoſe, and ſo with all diligence they, to the number of a thouſand men, in the euening ſet forward, & came to Newnam bridge by thrée of the clocke in the morning, and found the watchmen that kept the bridge aſléepe, & ſo entred the bulworke and ſlue the watchmen, and tooke the ordinance of the bridge, and then let the bridge fall, ſo that all entred that would.

The capteine of Bullongne kept ſix hundred men for a ſtale at the bridge, & ſent the other into the mariſhes and meddows to fetch awaie the beaſts and cattell which they ſhould find there. This was doone, and ſome of them came ſo néere the walles of Calis, that they were eſcried. And about a ſix ſcore coupers, bakers, ſhipmen & other which laie without the towne, hearing the alarme, got togither, & ſetting on theſe Frenchmen which were aduanced ſo néere the towne, ſlue them downe that abode, chaſed them that fled euen into Newnam bridge, and recouered the ſame, and put backe their enimies. About fiue of the clocke in the morning, the gate of Calis called Bullongne gate was opened, and then by permiſſion of the deputie, one Culpeper the vnder-marſhall with two hundred archers vnder a banner of ſaint George iſſued forth.

Culpeper vnder-marſhall of Calis.

All theſe in great haſt came to Newnam bridge, where they found the other Engliſhmen that had woone the bridge of the Frenchmen, and ſo altogither ſet forward to aſſaile the Frenchmen that kept the ſtale, and taried till the reſidue of their companie which were gone a forraging vnto Calis walles were come: for the other that had ſpoiled the mariſhes were returned with a great bootie. At the firſt, when the Frenchmen ſaw the Engliſhmen approch, they thought they had bene their owne fellowes. But when they ſaw the banner of ſaint George, they perceiued how the matter went, & ſo determined to defend themſelues againſt their enimies; but the Engliſhmen ſet ſo fiercelie on, that finallie the Frenchmen were diſcomfited, and foure and twentie of them ſlaine, beſide twelue ſcore that were taken priſoners, and all the ordinance and bootie againe recouered.

Theſe priſoners were brought to Calis, & there ſold in open market. [Among all other, a couper of the towne of Calis bought a priſoner of this bootie that dwelt in Bullongne, and had of the priſoner an hundred crowns for his ranſome. When the monie was paied, the Frenchman praied the couper to ſée him ſafe deliuered, and to conduct him out of danger. The couper gentlie granted, and without anie knowledge of his friends, all alone went with the Frenchman till he came beyond the cauſeie, & there would haue departed: but the Frenchman perceiuing that the couper was aged, and that no reſkue was nie, by force tooke the couper priſoner, and caried him to Bullongne, & made him paie two hundred crowns for his ranſome: thus through follie was the poore couper deceiued. Wherefore it is wiſedome for a man to hold faſt his poſſeſſion, and to ſupplie his want of ſtrength by ſubtiltie; imitating therein the fox, which although in force he be inferior to the lion, as not able to beare the yerking of his taile, or a pelt of his paw; yet in craft he goeth beyond that boiſterous beaſt, and ſo eſcapeth danger, which otherwiſe he might ſuſteine.]

Abr. Fl. ex Ed. Hall in H 8. fol. xxviij.

The follie of a couper.

On the eleuenth day of Auguſt, being thurſday, the king lieng at the ſiege of Terwine, had knowledge that Maximilian the emperour was in the towne of Aire.

The emperor Maximilian and the king of England méet.

Aire. The king prepared all things neceſſarie to méet with the emperour in triumph. The noble men of the kings campe were gorgeouſlie apparelled, their courſers barded with cloth of gold, of damaſke and broderie, their apparell all tiſſue, cloth of gold and ſiluer, and goldſmiths worke, great chains of bauderikes of gold, and belles of bullion: but in eſpeciall the duke of Buckingham, he was in purple ſattin, his apparell and his bard full of antelops and ſwans of fine gold bullion, and full of ſpangles, & little bels of gold maruellous coſtlie and pleaſant to behold. The K. was in a garment of great riches in iewels and ſtone, he was armed in a light armour. The maſter of his horſſe followed him with a ſpare horſſe, the henchmen followed bearing the kings péeces of harneſſe, euerie one mounted on a great courſer.

The kings harneſſe and forniture.

The one bare his helmet, the ſecond his grangard, the third his ſpeare, the fourth his axe, and ſo euerie one had ſomething belonging to a man of armes. The apparell of the nine henchmen were white cloth of gold, and crimſin cloth of gold, richlie embrodered with goldſmithes worke, the trappers of the courſers were mantell harneſſe coulpened, and in euerie bent a long bell of fine gold, and on euerie pendent a déepe taſſell of fine gold in bullion, which trappers were verie rich. The king and the emperour met betwéene Aire and the campe, in the fouleſt weather that lightlie hath béene ſéene. The emperour gentlie interteined the king, and the king likewiſe him, and after a little communication had betwene them, bicauſe the weather was foule, they parted for that time. The emperour & all his men were at that daie all in blacke cloth, for the empreſſe his wife was latelie deceaſed.

A letter of defiance ſent by the Scotiſh king to king Henrie.

Within a day or two after this interuiew, and that the king was returned to his campe, thither came a king at armes of Scotland called Lion, with his cote of armes on his backe, who within ſhort time was by Gartier king of armes brought to the kings preſence, where he being almoſt diſmaid to ſée the king ſo noblie accompanied, with few words & méetlie good countenance, deliuered a letter to the king, which his grace receiued and read it himſelfe; and therewith hauing conceiued the whole contents thereof, made this anſwer immediatly to the herald.

The king of Englands ſpeach to the Scotiſh kings herald vttered without premeditation.

Now we perceiue the king of Scots our brother in law, and your maſter to be the ſame perſon whom we euer tooke him to be, for we neuer eſtéemed him to be of anie truth: and ſo now we haue found it. For notwithſtanding his oth, his promiſe in the word of a king, and his owne hand and ſeale; yet now he hath broken his faith & promiſe to his great diſhonour and infamie for euer, and intendeth to inuade our realme in our abſence, which he durſt not once attempt, our owne perſon being preſent. But he ſheweth himſelfe not to be degenerat from the conditions of his forfathers, whoſe faiths (for the moſt part) haue euer béene violated, and their promiſes neuer obſerued, further than they liſt. Therefore tell thy maſter, firſt, that he ſhall neuer be compriſed in anie league wherein I am a confederat; and alſo that I ſuſpecting his truth (as now the déed prooueth) haue left an earle in my realme at home, which ſhall be able to defend him and all his power. For we haue prouided ſo, that he ſhall not find our land deſtitute of people as he thinketh to doo: but this ſaie to thy maſter, that I am the very owner of Scotland, & that he holdeth it of me by homage. And inſomuch as now, contrarie to his bounden dutie, he being my vaſſall, dooth rebell againſt me, with Gods helpe I ſhall at my returne expell him his realme, and ſo tell him.

Sir ſaid the king of armes, I am his naturall ſubiect, and he is my naturall lord, and that he commandeth me to ſay, I may boldlie ſay with fauour, but the commandements of other I may not, nor dare ſay to my ſouereigne: but your letters, with your honor ſent, may declare your pleaſure, for I may not ſay ſuch words of reproch to him, to whom I owe onelie mine allegiance and faith. Then ſaid the king, Wherfore came you hither? will you receiue no anſwer? Yes ſaid Lion, but your anſwer requireth dooing and no writing, that is, that immediatlie you ſhould returne home. Well ſaid the king; I will returne to your damage, and not at thy maiſters ſummoning. Then the king commanded Gartier to take him to his tent, and to make him good cheare, which ſo did, and cheriſhed him well: for he was ſore abaſhed.

The effect of the Scotiſh kings letter to K. Henrie. Sée hiſtorie of Scotland, pa. 295, and Edw. Hall, in H.8. fol. xxix, xxx.

After he was departed, the king ſent for all the capteins, and before them and his councell cauſed the letter to be read, the contents wherof were, that king Henrie had not dealt with him vprightlie in ſundrie points, as in mainteining of thoſe which had ſlaine his people of Scotland by ſea, and alſo in ſuccouring baſtard Heron with his complices, which had (vnder truſt of daies of méeting for iuſtice) ſlaine his warden. Alſo his wiues legacie was by him withholden: & moreouer, where firſt he had deſired him in fauour of his dere couſin the duke of Gelder, not to attempt anie thing againſt him; yet had he ſent his people to inuade the ſaid dukes countrie, which did what in them lay to deſtroie and diſhinherit the ſaid duke, that had nothing offended againſt him.

And now againe, where he had made the like requeſt for his brother & couſine the moſt chriſtian king of France: yet notwithſtanding, had the king of England cauſed him to loſe his duchie of Millaine, and at this preſent inuaded his realme with all his puiſſance, to deſtroie him and his ſubiects, whereas yet the ſaid king of France had béene euer fréend to him, & neuer giuen him occaſion thus to doo. In conſideration of which iniuries receiued in his owne perſon, and in his friends, he muſt néeds ſéeke redreſſe, and take part with his brother and couſine the ſaid king of France. Wherefore he required him to deſiſt from further inuaſion and deſtruction of the French dominions, which to doo if he refuſed, he plainlie declared by the ſame letters, that he would doo what he could to cauſe him to deſiſt from further purſute in that his enterpriſe, & alſo giue letters of marque to his ſubiects for the deniall of iuſtice made to them by the king of England.

King Henrie his anſwere to the Scotiſh kings letters. Sée hiſtorie of Scotland pag. 297, and Edw. Hall in He.8. fol. 30, 31.

The letters thus ſent to the king of England, were dated at Edenburgh the ſix and twentith daie of Iulie, and giuen vnder the ſignet of the ſaid Scotiſh king. When the king had thus cauſed theſe letters to be read, and throughlie conſidered of them as apperteined, he ſent them ſtraight to the earle of Surrie, which then laie at Pomfret, and cauſed other letters to be deuiſed to the king of Scots, the effect whereof was; that although he well perceiued by the kings letters, which he had receiued from him, in what ſort, vnder colour of contriued occaſions and feined quarrelles, he meant to breake the peace, he did not much maruell thereat, conſidering the ancient accuſtomed manners of ſome his progenitors.

An euill déed to breake the league of peace.

Howbeit, if loue and dread of God, nighneſſe of blood, honour of the world, law and reaſon had bound him, it might be ſuppoſed, that he would neuer ſo farre haue procéeded; wherein the pope and all princes chriſtned might well note in him diſhonorable demeanor, which had diſſembled the matter, whileſt he was at home in his realme; and now in his abſence thus went about vpon forged cauſes to vtter his old rancor, which in couert manner he had long kept ſecret. Neuertheleſſe, vpon miſtruſt of ſuch vnſtedfaſtneſſe, he had put his realme in a readineſſe to reſiſt his enterpriſes, as he doubted not through Gods fauour, and the aſſiſtance of his confederats, he ſhould be able to reſiſt the malice of all ſchiſmatikes, and their adherents, being by generall councell expreſlie excommunicated & interdicted, truſting in time conuenient to remember his friends, & requite his foes.

The king of Nauarre a king without a realme, and why.

Moreouer, he willed him to ſet before his eies the example of the king of Nauarre, who for aſſiſtance giuen to the French king was now a king without a realme. And as touching anſwere to be made to the manifold griefs in the Scotiſh kings letters ſurmiſed, if law or reaſon could haue remoued him from his ſenſuall opinions, he had béene manie times alreadie anſwered ſufficientlie to the ſame; vnleſſe to the pretended griefs therein amongſt other compriſed, for denieng of a ſafe conduct to the Scotiſh ambaſſadour to haue béene laſtly ſent vnto him. Wherevnto thus he anſwered; that the ſame ſafe conduct had béene granted, if the Scotiſh herald would haue taken it with him.

The king of Englands anſwere to the laſt clauſe of the Scotiſh kings letter.

And finallie, as touching the Scotiſh kings requeſt, to deſiſt from further attempting againſt the French K. he ſignified to him, that he knew him for no competent iudge of ſo high authoritie, as to require him in that behalfe, and therefore God willing he ment with the aid and aſſiſtance of his confederats & alies to proſecute his begun attempt. And as the Scotiſh king ſhould doo to him, & to his realme, ſo it ſhould be hereafter remembred and acquited. Theſe letters were written in the campe before Terwine the twelfe of Auguſt, and giuen vnder the kings ſignet, and therewith deliuered to Lion king of armes, who had of the king 100 angels in reward.

An hundred angels to a Scotiſh herald for a reward.

Then departed he with his letters into Flanders, there to take ſhip to ſaile into Scotland, but yer he could haue a veſſell and wind for his purpoſe, his maiſter was ſlaine, as after ye ſhall heare. In this meane while the Frenchmen being aſſembled and lodged in campe at Blangie on this ſide Amiens, the French king appointed that all the horſſmen to the number of eight thouſand (as Paulus Iouius recordeth) ſhould go with vittels vnto Terwine, and put the ſame into the towne, if by anie meanes they might, for that thoſe within ſtood as then in great neceſſitie for want of vittels.

Monſieur de Piennes appointed by the French king to vittell Terwine.

The charge of this conueie was committed vnto Monſieur de Piennes, becauſe he was lieutenant of thoſe marches: notwithſtanding there were amongſt the number, other noble men of more high degrée in honor, and alſo of great proweſſe, fame, and experience, furniſhed with ſundrie bands of men at armes of long approoued valiancie, and vſed to go awaie with victorie in manie a dangerous conflict and battell, wanting at this preſent nothing but their old accuſtomed good fortune. Whileſt the Frenchmen were thus prepared to come with vittels to Terwine, the emperour Maximilian came from Aire to the kings campe before Terwine the twelfe of Auguſt, wearing a croſſe of ſaint George as the kings ſouldier, & receiuing of him ſalarie for ſeruice; which Anglorum prælia noteth as noteworthie, ſaieng:

The emperor Maximilian weareth a croſſe of ſaint George as ſouldier to the king of England.

Sub rege Anglorum magnus meret induperator.

The emperour was honourablie receiued, and lodged in a rich tent of cloth of gold prepared for him, according as was conuenient for his eſtate. He taried vntill ſundaie being the fouretéenth of Auguſt, and then returned to Aire: and on the morrow after came againe being mondaie the fiftéenth of Auguſt, on which daie there chanced a great fraie betwixt the Almans of the kings campe, and the Engliſhmen, inſomuch that manie were ſlaine. The Almans ran to the kings ordinance and tooke it, and imbattelled themſelues, and bent the ordinance againſt the king and his campe. The Engliſh prepared their bowes, and the Almans made redie their pikes: but the capteins tooke ſuch paines in the matter, that the fraie was appeaſed.

A fraie betwéene the Almans of the kings campe, and the Engliſhmen well appeaſed by the diſcretion of the capteins.

Now as this trouble was in hand, the emperour came from Aire, and ſaw all the demeanour of both parts, and was glad to behold the diſcréet behauiour of the capteins. After that the emperour was thus come to the kings field, the king called a councell, at the which the emperour was preſent, where it was debated, by what meanes they might beſt conſtreine them within to deliuer vp the towne, and eſpeciallie how to kéepe them from vittels & other ſuccours, which the French armie (as it was knowne) meant verie ſhortlie to miniſter vnto them. Some were of this mind, and namelie the emperour; that bridges ſhould be made ouer the riuer, to paſſe ouer a part of the armie to beſiege the towne on that ſide; where otherwiſe the French armie might vittell the towne at their pleaſures.

The king and the emperour conſult which waies were beſt to beſiege Terwine, to preuent the vittelling of it.

Others were of a contrarie mind, doubting what might happen, if the armie ſhould be ſo diuided, leaſt the Frenchmen ſetting on the backe of the one part of the armie, and they within the towne to ſallie out in their faces, ſome miſfortune might happen yer the other part could paſſe the riuer to the ſuccour of their fellowes. Yet at length the former purpoſe was allowed as moſt neceſſarie; and therefore commandement was giuen to the maiſter of the ordinance, that in all haſt he ſhould cauſe fiue bridges to be made ouer the water for the armie to paſſe. The carpenters ſo applied their worke that night, that the bridges were made by the next morow, and all the horſſemen firſt paſſed ouer, and then the king with his whole battell, and the great ordinance followed and paſſed ouer to the other ſide of the water. This was on the ſixtéenth daie of Auguſt being tueſdaie.

Fiue bridges made in one night for the armie to paſſe ouer the riuer at Terwine.

On the ſame morning the Frenchmen were comming with their conueie of vittels to refreſh the towne, hauing appointed one part of their troops to kéepe on that ſide the riuer where the Engliſh armie was firſt incamped, and where the earle of Shrewſburie ſtill kept his field; that in offering the ſkirmiſh on that ſide, the reſidue of the horſſemen might with more eaſe and ſafetie put the vittels and other neceſſarie things into the towne on the other ſide. Here might a man haue ſéene of what force in wars ſudden chance is oftentimes. For the king thus with his battell paſſing the riuer, meaning to beſiege the towne on euerie ſide, and the Frenchmen at that ſame inſtant hauing alſo paſſed the riuer with other carriages laden with vittels, purpoſing to reléeue the towne on that ſide, cauſed no ſmall doubt to be conceiued of ech others meaning, on both parts, leaſt that the one, hauing knowlege of the others purpoſe, had béene prepared for to hinder the ſame.

Polydor.

The force of ſudden chance in warre.

And yet was it nothing ſo, for neither the king knew of the Frenchmens approch that daie, neither they of his paſſing ouer the water. But when the king had aduertiſement giuen him (by the light horſſemen that were ſent abroad to diſcouer the countrie) how the Frenchmen were at hand; he prepared himſelfe to the battell, and firſt ſet forth his horſſemen, and then followed himſelfe with his battell of footmen. The French capteins being hereof aduiſed, determined not to fight without their footmen; and therefore with all ſpéed ſent backe their carriages, and ſtaied with their horſſemen, vntill the carriages might haue leaſure to get out of danger. In the meane time the Engliſhmen aduanced forward, and their horſſemen mounted vp the hill, where the French horſſemen were in troope, with thirtie and thrée ſtandards ſpred, & might ſée the Engliſhmen comming, and the kings battell marching forward with the Almans.

Edw. Hall. Polydor.

The king with his battell of footmen.

There were amongeſt the Frenchmen certeine companies of Eſtradiots, which being placed before the French hoaſt, as they came downe the hill to ſkirmiſh with the Engliſhmen ſaw where the banners of the Engliſh horſſemen were comming, and the kings battell following vpward, wéening verelie that all had béene horſſemen, wherevpon they caſt themſelues about and fled. The Frenchmen were ſo faſt in arraie, that the Eſtradiots could not enter; and ſo they ran ſtill by the ends of the Frenchmens ranks. Herewith the Engliſh horſſemen ſet on, and about an hundred archers on horſſe-backe, being lighted beſide their horſſes, and ſet by an hedge all alongeſt a village ſide called Bomie, ſhot freſhlie at their enimies; & alſo certeine culuerings being placed on the top of an hill were diſcharged amongeſt the thickeſt preaſe of the Frenchmen; ſo that finallie the French were diſcomfited: for thoſe that were behind ſaw the fall of ſome of their ſtandards, which the Engliſhmen ouerthrew, and their Eſtradiots alſo (in whome they had great confidence) returne.

The Eſtradiots miſtaking footmen for horſſemen fled firſt.

A great ouerthrow giuen to the French, king Henrie in perſon being preſent.

They that were furtheſt off fled firſt, and then the Engliſhmen & Burgognian horſſemen, which were with them, egerlie followed the chaſe, in the which were taken the duke of Longuile, brother to the earle of Dunois that had married the daughter and heire to the marqueſſe of Rothlois, the lord of Cleremont, capteine Baiard, monſieur de Buſie, and other, to the number of twelue ſcore priſoners, and all brought to the kings preſence with ſix ſtandards, which were likewiſe taken. The Burgognians brought not their priſoners to ſight. Monſieur de la Palice, and monſieur de Imbrecourt being taken of them and knowne, were put to their ranſomes, and licenced maintenantlie to depart vpon their word. Thus was the power of the French horſſemen by the ſharpe incounter of the Engliſh horſſemen, and full flight of the battels of the footmen, following in arraie at the backs of the horſſemen, and the diſcharging of certeine culuerings amongſt them, quickelie put to flight without anie great reſiſtance.

The emperor incourageth his Almans to plaie the men.

The emperour Maximilian was preſent with the king, and ware ſaint Georges croſſe, greatlie incouraging the Almans to ſhew themſelues like men, ſith the place was fortunate to him and them, to trie the chance of battell in: as they might call to remembrance by the victorie there obteined againſt the Frenchmen a foure and twentie yeares paſt. This incounter chancing thus on the ſixtéenth daie of Auguſt, being tueſdaie, in this fift yeare of king Henries reigne, which was the yeare after the incarnation 1513, was called the battell Des eſprons, by the Frenchmen themſelues, that is to ſaie, the battell of ſpurres: forſomuch as they in ſtéed of ſword and lance vſed their ſpurres, with all might and maine to pricke foorth their horſſes to get out of danger; ſo that in them was verefied the old prouerbe, One paire of héeles is worth two paire of hands.

The battell of ſpurres.

That wing of the horſſemen alſo, which was appointed to ſkirmiſh with the Engliſhmen on the other ſide the riuer, whileſt the other might haue conueied the vittels into the towne, was fiercelie beaten backe by the martiall proweſſe of the valiant erle of Shreweſburie, ſir Rice ap Thomas, and other worthie capteins, which laie on that ſide the water. The duke of Alanſon, the earle of ſaint Paule, and monſieur de Florenges, had the leading of thoſe Frenchmen. They within the towne were in great hope of ſuccour this daie, and when they ſaw the French power approch, they ſallied foorth on that ſide where the lord Herbert laie, and ſkirmiſhed with his people verie proudlie, but they were repelled to the gates of their towne, and manie of them ſlaine by the high valiancie of the ſaid lord Herbert and his capteins.

Sir John Pechie made baneret, and John Carre knight.

After that the Engliſhmen were returned from the chaſe of the Frenchmen, whome they had followed a thrée long miles from the field, the king made ſir John Pechie a baneret, and John Carre knight, which was ſore hurt: ſir John Pechie had his guidon taken, and diuerſe of his men hurt, they followed ſo farre in the chaſe. After this ouerthrow of the French horſſemen, the K. compaſſed the towne more ſtreictlie on ech ſide, and the batterie was brought ſo nigh the wals as might be, wherwith breaches were made in ſundrie places, by meanes whereof the lord Pontremie deſpairing any long time to kéepe the towne, fell to a compoſition, and yéelded it vp to the kings hands. This incounter and ouerthrow, with the giuing vp of Terwine, is extant to the knowledge of forren nations (to be read) recorded as followeth:

Terwine yéelded vp to king Henrie.

Francorum pugnax equitatus prælia miſcet,
Succurrúntque ſuis, ſed fruſtra infirmior arma
Turba capit; palmam bellando potentior Anglus
Aufert, læthifera transfoſſus hoſtilibus haſta.
Diruta turrifragis bombardis mœnia præbent
Brutigenæ ingreſſum facilem, Galliſque timorem
Inijciunt, tandem Terrouana deditur Anglo.

Howbeit this yéelding vp of the ſaid towne was with condition, that the ſouldiers might depart with horſſe and armour, & that ſuch towneſmen as would there remaine, might haue their liues and goods ſaued. Thus (I ſaie) was the citie of Terwine deliuered vp to the king of England, with all the ordinance and munitions then being found within the ſame. This was on the eightéenth of Auguſt. The earle of Shreweſburie entered the ſame night, and cauſed the banner of ſaint George to be ſet vp in the higheſt place of the towne in ſigne of victorie. When the lord Pontremie, and all the ſouldiers were departed, and that the earle of Shreweſburie had ſearched all the towne to ſée that euerie thing was ſure, he called the towneſmen afore him, and ſware them to be true to the king of England. The foure and twentith of Auguſt the king himſelfe entered the towne with great and roiall triumph, and dined in the biſhops palace. At after noone he returned to his campe, and on the ſix and twentith daie of Auguſt he remooued againe to Guingate, where he firſt incamped after the chaſe of the French horſſemen.

The citizens of Terwine ſworne to king Henrie.

The king entereth into Terwine.

Here it was determined in councell, that the wals and fortifications of Terwine ſhould be raſed, which was doone, and the towne burned; except the cathedrall church and the palace. All the ordinance was ſent to Aire to be kept there to the kings vſe. After this, it was concluded that the king ſhould laie ſiege to the citie of Tornaie; wherevpon he ſet forward in thrée battels; the earle of Shreweſburie leading the va-ward, the king and the emperour gouerning the battell, and the lord Chamberleine following with the rere-ward. The firſt night they incamped beſide Aire. Diuerſe Engliſhmen tarieng behind at Terwine for pillage, were ſurpriſed by the Frenchmen, which ſlue ſome of them, & caſt ſome into the fire. Thoſe that fled eſcaped verie narrowlie. The king with his armie paſſed forward towards Tornaie, and by the waie viſited the yoong prince of Caſtile and the ladie Margaret, gouernor of the prince, in the towne of Liſlie, whileſt his armie laie abroad in the fields beyond Pont Auandien.

Terwine burnt.

King Henrie marcheth on with his armie to beſiege Tornaie.

The king goeth to Liſle to viſit the yoong prince of Caſtile.

There was appointed to attend the king vnto Liſlie the duke of Buckingham, the lord marqueſſe Dorſet, the earle of Eſſex, and the lord Liſle, with diuerſe other; the charge of his campe he committed for the time to his councell. Then mounted the king vpon a courſer, his apparrell & bard were cloth of ſiluer of ſmall quadrant cuts trauerſed and edged with cut cloth of gold, and the border ſet full of red roſes, his armour freſh & ſet full of iewels. The maiſter of his horſſe ſir Henrie Guilford, and the henchmen followed (as you haue heard before) and the courſers richlie apparelled, and ſo were manie capteins that waited on the king: by the waie met the king the lord Raueſten with manie noble men. And a mile without the towne there met with him the burgeſſes of Liſle, and preſented to him the keies of the towne, ſaieng, that the emperor their ſouereigne lord had ſo commanded them to doo.

Sir Henrie Guilford maiſter of the kings horſſe.

The Palſgraue of Rhene & his traine come to receiue the K. of England.

The king praiſed their obedience to their ſouereigne, and thanked the emperour and them for ſo high a preſent as the keies of ſuch a towne. Neuertheleſſe, he had ſuch confidence in them, that he truſted them no leſſe than his owne ſubiects, and ſo deliuered the keies to the prouoſt of the towne, which was well accompanied. Then met the king a great number of nobles of Flanders, Brabant, Holland, and Henaud, which noblie receiued him. After them came the countie Palatine or Palſgraue, one of the electors of the empire, with thirtie horſſes, all his men gorgiouſlie apparelled after the faſhion of his countrie, and humblie ſaluted the king. At the gate of Liſle the capiteine of the towne ſtood with a garriſon in armor well appointed, all the ſtréets were ſet on both ſides with burning torches and diuerſe goodlie pageants pleaſant to behold. Thus he paſſed thorough the towne with his ſword and maces borne before him, and alighted at the hall doore with his ſword borne, where met with him the emperour, the prince of Caſtile, and the ladie Margaret, and humblie ſaluted him.

A falſe rumor of the kings death.

Then for reuerence of the emperour, the king cauſed his ſword to be put vp, and his maces to be laid downe; & ſo was the king and all other nobles lodged and feaſted according to their degrées. In the towne of Liſle was a noiſe that thrée gunners with handguns ſhould haue ſlaine the king: for which rumor manie were attached, but nothing prooued. But when theſe tidings came to the campe, they were neuer merrie till they ſaw the king againe. Great was the chéere, with bankets, plaies, comedies, maſkes, and other paſtimes that were ſhewed to the king in the court of Burgognie, and ſo in ſolace he ſoiorned there ſundaie and mondaie the ninetéenth daie of September. On the twentith daie he ſent word that his armie ſhould remooue toward Tornaie, and ſo they remooued to a place conuenient betwéene Tornaie and Liſle, and certeine capiteins were appointed to kéepe the paſſage at the bridge of Auandien.

After that the king had taried at Liſle thrée daies, and had well repoſed himſelfe, he tooke his leaue, and thanked the emperour and the yoong prince, the ladie Margaret & all the ladies for all his high chéere and ſolace; and about ſix of the clocke at night, he departed out of Liſle, and the noble men brought the king forth and ſo returned, and then the capteine ſhut the gates. When the king was a mile and more out of the towne, he aſked where his campe laie? And no man there could tell the waie, and guide had they none, the night was ſo darke & miſtie. Thus the king taried a long while, and wiſt not whither to go; at laſt they met with a vitteler comming from the campe, which was their guide and brought them thither. The maiſter of the ordinance ſhot diuerſe péeces of ordinance, but they were not heard; but in ſafetie the king with all his companie returned.

The king and his traine ignorant of the waie to his campe by meanes of a miſt.

On the one and twentith daie of September the king remooued his campe toward Tornaie, and lodged within thrée miles of the citie, on a corne ground by the riuer. On which night came to the king the emperour and the Palſgraue, which were lodged in rich tents, and noblie ſerued of all viands and things neceſſarie. The people about Tornaie were with their goods fled to the citie, and yet the citie had no men of warre to defend it, but with multitude of inhabitants the ſame was well repleniſhed. The king commanded ſir Rice and his horſſemen to view one quarter, and the earle of Eſſex and his companie another quarter; and the lord Wallon and the lord Lignie the other quarters. Then the two and twentith daie of September, theſe foure capteins at one time were ſéene openlie with banners diſplaied before the towne, and there made a long ſtale, and returned.

Tornaie ſummoned by Gartier king of armes.

Then the king ſent Gartier king of armes to ſummon them to yéeld it ouer into his hands, to whome they made anſwer, that they receiued no citie of the king of England to kéepe, nor anie would they render him, with which anſwer he departed. Then they fortified their wals, and made prouiſion for vittels, corne, wine, and artillerie, and for all fortifications that might be gotten. And the citie of it ſelfe was ſtrong, well walled, and turrited with good bulworks and defenſes. But when they ſaw the king with ſuch a puiſſance draw néere the citie, they were ſore abaſhed, and called a generall councell. Then the prouoſt ſaid; Brethren, you know how that the king of England ſent an herald to ſummon vs to render vp to him this citie, or elſe he would put it and vs to the ſword, fier, and bloud. We anſwered we would be at defenſe. Now he is come in our ſight to fulfill the meſſage ſent by the herald, & now is come the time of our defenſe.

The prouoſt of Tornaies words to the diſtreſſed townesmen.

Howbeit in this matter ſtandeth thrée miſchéefs, one is our bounden duetie and allegiance that we owe to our ſouereigne lord king Lewes of France; the ſecond the liues of vs, our wiues, children, and neighbors; the third how to defend the finall deſtruction of this ancient citie, now likelie to fall, which citie was neuer conquered. Now our citie is whole, your liues in ſafetie, your goods your owne; determine whether you will haue war or peace. Then the common people cried all; War, war, war. Then ſaid the prouoſt, Take compaſſion of wiues and children and of the old folke; conſider if you haue no quicke reſcue, you cannot continue againſt yonder puiſſance, although your courages were neuer ſo great, this the wiſeſt of the citie and I haue conſidered. Then ſuddenlie was there in the councell a vauntparler, a botcher, which hearing this, called a great number of his affinitie, and went out of the councell and ſo out of the gates, and ſet fire of the ſuburbs on all ſides. When the councell ſaw the minds of the commons, and that their waies might not be followed, they comforted the people, and mainteined them for their defenſe.

After this the king approched the citie with his whole armie, and they of the citie iſſued forth to proffer the ſkirmiſh: but the archers beat them backe. Alſo the carriage men that came with the herbingers, ſaw where certeine wagons were entring the citie, vnto the which they ran, and tooke ſome of them. At this ſkirmiſh the horſſe of the lord Iohn Graie was ſlaine vnder him, as he came to defend the carriage men; but he himſelfe had no hurt. The king with his battell planted his ſiege on the north ſide the citie. The earle of Shrewſburie with the foreward lodged toward the ſouth ſide of the riuer, and there laie that night. The lord Herbert with the rereward incamped himſelfe on the weſt ſide, and beat the wals and towers of the citie with the great ordinance. The next daie after their comming thither, being the thrée and twentith of September, the earle of Shreweſburie with the fore-ward paſſed the riuer, & planted his ſiege on the ſouthſide of the citie, ſtretching to the eaſt end, and bent his ordinance againſt the walles. And thus was the citie of Tornaie beſieged on all parts.

Tornaie beſieged by king Henrie.

On the fiue and twentith daie of September, the king receiued letters from the earle of Surrie with the Scottiſh kings gantlet, wherby he was certified of the ſlaughter of the ſaid king, and how all things had béene handled at the battell of Floddon, whereof héereafter yée ſhall find further mention. The king thanked God of the newes, and highlie commended the prowesse of the earle, and other the capteins: howbeit he had a ſecret letter, that Cheſhiremen and other fled from ſir Edmund Howard in the battell, which letter cauſed great hartburning, and manie words: but the king tooke all things in good part, and would that no man ſhould be diſpraiſed. On the ſix and twentith daie, fiers were made in the hoaſt, in token of that victorie againſt the Scots, and on the ſeauen and twentith daie being tueſdaie, maſſe was ſoong by them of the kings chappell, with Te Deum, and the biſhop of Rocheſter made a ſermon, declaring the death of the king of Scots, and lamenting his euill hap and periurie. But now to our purpoſe of the ſiege of Tornaie.

Abr. Fl. ex Edw. Hall in Hen.8.fo.xliiij, xlv.

The citie of Tornaie on all ſides beſieged.

¶ The king of England lieng afront before Tornaie, cauſed his great ordinance to be planted round about the citie, and diuerſe trenches were caſt, and rampiers made, and the lord Liſle and the lord Willoughbie were appointed to mainteine the ordinance with their bands, and the earle of Kent was lodged before the gate called port Valencien; ſo that the citizens could not iſſue out, nor no aid could come in. The ordinance dailie beat the gates, towers, & wals, which made a great batterie: and a few Engliſhmen aſſaulted the port coquerell, but they were too few in number; and if they had béene more in number, they had taken the towne, as the Tornaſins confeſſed after. The citizens of Tornaie conſidering their eſtate came togither to councell, and there the prouoſt ſaid in effect as followeth. Friends and bretheren of this noble citie, I cannot too much praiſe your truth and fidelitie to your ſoueraigne lord the king of France; conſidering how manfullie you haue defended this citie ſince the beginning of this ſiege.

The prouoſts words to the townesmen.

But alas! although it be written on the gates grauen in ſtone, Iammes ton ne a perdeu ton pucellage, that is to ſaie; Thou haſt neuer loſt thy maidenhed: yet if this citie had not béene well furniſhed and euer at the daie appointed ſure of reſcue, it could not haue continued. Now you ſée that reſcue faileth, our gates be raſed, our towers beaten downe, our chiefe tower like to fall, ſo that if this perilous ſiege continue, or elſe if our enimies aſſault vs, we be not able to defend vs: wherefore now, all theſe things conſidered, I would know whether you will treat with the king of England or abide the chance. Then they which at the laſt councell cried War, war; now cried Peace, peace: yet all were not agréed. Then one wiſe man ſaid, Sirs if the towne be aſſaulted once againe with a great number, ſuerlie it will be taken: you ſaw the experience at the laſt aſſault, and then conſider if it be taken by force, who is there that can ſaie he is ſure of his life: but by intreatie, the king of England is ſo mercifull that we may fortune to ſaue both life and goods. Then finallie all agréed to treat.

The prouoſt with eleuen more ſubmit themſelues & yéeld vp the citie to the king.

Then the prouoſt ſent to the king a trumpet, deſiring a ſafe conduct for him & certeine other to come and to ſpeake with him: which requeſt was to him granted. Then the prouoſt of the citie, accompanied with eleuen with him of the beſt of the citie, came to the armie, & ſpake with the lords of the councell, and after were led to the kings preſence. The prouoſt knéeled downe and all his companie, and ſaid: Right high and mightie prince, although the citie of Tornaie is ſtrong, well walled, well repleniſhed with people, vittels, artillerie, yea and the people in feare and dread of nothing; yet we know that againſt your great puiſſance it can not continue long, although it were ten times as ſtrong as it is. Wherefore we knowing by report your honor, your wiſedome, your iuſtice, & noble hart, are content to become your ſubiects & vaſſals, ſo that we may haue and inioy our old lawes, cuſtomes, liberties, and franchiſes, vnder you; as we haue before this doone vnder other princes.

Then ſaid the king; We haue well heard your petition, we will common with our councell & make you anſwer. And when he had communed with his councell, he anſwered ſaieng: Sirs, he that aſketh mercie of vs, ſhall not be denied; and ſéeing you come to treat, we remit you to our councell. Then they went into the tent of councell, & there the Tornaſins fell at a point, and in concluſion they yéelded the citie and ten thouſand pounds ſterling for the redemption of their liberties, and ſo departed to the citie, making relation of the king and his noble courage. On thurſdaie the nine and twentith daie of September, the king was in his rich tent of cloth of gold vnder his cloth of eſtate, to whome came the citizens of the citie, and were ſworne to him, and became his ſubiects.

The poſſeſſiō taken in the king of Englands behalfe.

Then the king appointed the lord Liſle, the lord Aburgauenie, & the lord Willoughbie to take poſſeſſion, which with ſix thouſand men entered the citie, and tooke the market place and the wals, and ſearched the houſes for feare of treaſon. Then maiſter Thomas Wolſie the kings almoner called before him all the citizens yong and old, and ſware them to the king of England, the number whereof was foure ſcore thouſand. Thus the king of England by conqueſt came to the poſſeſſion of the citie of Tornaie. On ſundaie the ſecond daie of October, the king entered the citie of Tornaie at port founteine, and foure of the chiefe of the citie ouer him bare a canopie with all the armes of England. Euerie perſon was in his beſt apparell, the ladies & gentlewomen laie in the windowes beholding the king and his nobilitie, euerie citizen had in his hand a ſtaffe torch. The king himſelfe was richlie apparelled in rich armour on a barded courſer, his henchmen bearing his péeces of war, as ax, ſpeare, and other, their courſers were barded with the armes of England, France, Ireland, and other the kings dominions all richlie brodered. Thus the king with his nobilitie all richlie apparelled with his ſword borne before him, his heralds and ſergeants of armes with trumpets and minſtrelſie entered the citie, and came to our ladie church, and there Te Deum was ſoong.

The king maketh certeine gentlemẽ (for their good ſeruice) knights.

Then the king called to his preſence, Edward Guilford, William Fitz Williams, Iohn Danſie, William Tiler, Iohn Sharpe, William Huſſe, Iohn Sauage, Chriſtopher Garniſh, and diuerſe other valiant eſquiers, and gaue to them the order of knighthood, and then went to his lodging, and at after noone he came to the market place, were was prepared for him a roome. Then he cauſed a proclamation to be made in his name king of England & France, that no man ſhould gréeue the citizens. During which proclamation the Tornaſins ſcarſe looked vp, nor ſhewed once to him any amiable countenance, which was much marked. The crie finiſhed, the king departed to his campe, leauing the citie in ſafe kéeping. This wéeke the king rode to ſée the caſtell of Morton, and there his grace tooke great pleaſure. The king remembring the great chéere that the prince of Caſtile and the ladie Margaret had made him at Liſle, which was but twelue miles Engliſh from Tornaie, deſired the ſaid prince & ladie, with diuerſe other to come to him to his citie of Tornaie, and made preparation for the ſame, and appointed a iuſts, whereof he himſelfe would be one; and cauſed a tilt to be made in the market place.

While theſe things were preparing, the king and

Sir Edward Poinings made lieutenant of Tornaie.

his councell ordered for the ſure keeping of the citie of Tornaie, and there ordeined ſir Edward Poinings knight of the order of the garter to be his lieutenant with foure hundred archers, with capteins, horſſemen, and artillerie conuenient, and to haue aid of Henaud and other the kings friends adioining; and of his gard he left there foure hundred archers, and ordinance was appointed for the defenſe of the ſame. On mondaie the eleuenth daie of October the king without the towne receiued the prince of Caſtile, the ladie Margaret, and diuerſe other nobles of their countries, and them brought into Tornaie with great triumph. The noiſe went that the lord Liſle made requeſt of mariage to the ladie Margaret duches of Sauoie, and daughter to the emperour Maximilian, which before that time was departed from the king with manie rich gifts and monie borrowed: but whether he proffered mariage or not, ſhe fauoured him highlie. There the prince and duches ſoiourned with great ſolace by the ſpace of ten daies.

Iuſtes held at Tornaie for diſport of the prince of Caſtile & the ducheſſe of Sauoie.

During which time, the eighteenth daie of October began the iuſts, the king and the lord Liſle anſwering all commers: vpon the king attended foure & twentie knights on foot in coats of purple veluet and cloth of gold. A tent of cloth of gold was ſet in the place for the armorie & Reliefe. The king had a baſe and a trapper of purple veluet both ſet full of SS of bullion, and the lord Liſle in the ſame ſuite, there were manie ſpeares broken, and manie a good buffet giuen; the ſtrangers, as the lord Walon and lord Emerie and other did right well. When the iuſts were doone, the king & all the other vnhelmed them, & rode about the tilt, and did great reuerence to the ladies, and then the heralds cried to lodging. This night the K. made a ſumptuous banket of an hundred diſhes to the prince of Caſtile and the ladie Margaret, and to all other lords and ladies; and after the banket the ladies danſed, and then came in the king and eleuen in a maſke, all richlie apparelled with bonets of gold, and when they had paſſed the time at their pleaſure, the garments of the maſke were caſt off amongſt the ladies, take who could take.

The prince & the ducheſſe returne to Liſle.

The king returneth into England.

On the twentith daie of October, the prince of Caſtile and the ladie Margaret (with manie great gifts to them giuen) returned to Liſle and all their traine. After that the king was informed that all directions were taken, and euerie thing put in an order for the ſure keeping of the citie of Tornaie, he betooke the ſame to ſir Edward Poinings knight, which valiantlie kept it in good order and iuſtice. The king & his councell before this conſidering, that the Frenchmen would giue them no battell, and that winter approched, which was no time to lie at ſiege of other townes, concluded to keepe Tornaie ſafelie, and to breake vp his campe for that winter, and to begin againe warre in the ſpring of the yeare. This was a full concluſion taken by the king and his councell, and ſo the king and all his people (except ſuch as were appointed to be with ſir Edward Poinings) departed out of Tornaie the twentith daie of September: and the king and the noble men made ſuch ſpeed, that ſhortlie they came to Calis.

A mortalitie.

Thither came the lord admerall, whome the king heartilie thanked of his paines, and there euerie man was paied his full wages and conduct monie, and ſhips prepared for the paſſage; and ſo the foure and twentith daie of September, the king with a priuie companie tooke ſhip, and the ſame day landed at Douer, and ſhortlie after all his people followed; then he with a ſmall companie rode to Richmond in poſt to the queene, where was ſuch a louing meeting, that euerie creature reioiſed. This ſeaſon began a great mortalitie in London and other places, where much people died. All this winter the kings nauie kept the ſeas, and robbed and ſpoiled the Frenchmen on their coaſts, ſo that they were euerie foot afflicted by the Engliſh, & wiſt not which way to remedie it, bearing grudge in their hearts, and wiſhing a generall deſtruction of their enimies, againſt whome they did ſwell with malignitie and indignation, both for their late ouerthrowes and loſſes aſwell of lands as liues; the ſurrender of Terwin ſticking in their ſtomachs, and the yeelding of Tornaie nipping them at the heart, which had loſt the propertie, & was now forced to obeie new lords and new lawes, as our poet ſaith:

——dominorum ſerua nouorum,
Accipit ecce nouas Henrico principe leges.*

* Vrbs Tornaci.

Lord Humes entereth the borders of England.

But now I muſt returne to ſpeake of the doings in the North parts, betweene the Engliſhmen and Scots. Whileſt the king was occupied in his warres againſt France in the ſummer of this yeare (as before is mentioned) yee haue heard how the king of Scots ſent his letters vnto the king, as then lieng at the ſiege before Terwine, and what anſwer was made thereto by the king. Immediatlie vpon the ſending of thoſe his letters conteining in effect a defiance, the king of Scots aſſembled his people to inuade the Engliſh confines: but before his whole power was come togither, the lord Humes that was lord chamberleine of Scotland, on a day in Auguſt entered England with ſeuen or eight thouſand men, and getting togither a great bootie of cattell, thought to haue returned therewith into his countrie.

Engliſhmen aſſaile the Scots.

Scots put to flight.

Lord chamberleine eſcapeth.

The ill road.

Norham caſtell beſieged.

But as he came to paſſe through a field ouergrowne with broome, called Milfield, the Engliſhmen vnder the leading of ſir William Bulmer, and other valiant capteins, hauing with them not paſt a thouſand ſouldiers, being laid within that field in ambuſhment, brake forth vpon him: and though the Scots on foot defended themſelues right manfullie, yet the Engliſh archers ſhot ſo wholie togither, that the Scots were conſtreined to giue place. There were of them ſlaine at this bickering fiue or ſix hundred, and foure hundred or more taken priſoners; the lord chamberleine himſelfe eſcaped by flight, but his banner was taken. This was called by the Scots the ill rode. In the meane time was the whole power of Scotland aſſembled, with the which king Iames approching to the borders, and comming to Norham caſtell, laid ſiege thereto, hauing there with him an hundred thouſand men.

Norham caſtell deliuered.

The earle of Surrie lieutenant of the north raiſeth an armie.

The lord admerall ioineth with the earle of Surrie his father.

After he had beaten this caſtell with his ordinance for the ſpace of ſix daies togither, the ſame was deliuered vp into his hands; for the capteine was ſo liberall of his ſhot and powder, ſpending the ſame ſo freelie before he had cauſe ſo to doo, that when it ſhuld haue ſtood him in ſtead, he had none left to aid him, ſo that in the end he yeelded himſelfe without more reſiſtance. In which meane time the earle of Surreie being lieutenant of the north parts of England, in abſence of king Henrie, had giuen order to aſſemble a power of ſix and twentie thouſand men; and comming to Alnwike the third of September being ſaturdaie, taried there all the next day till the whole number of his people were come, which by reaſon of the foule way were ſtaied, and could not come forward with ſuch ſpeed as was appointed. This fourth daie of September then being ſundaie, his ſonne the lord admerall, with a thouſand ſouldiers and able men of warre, which had beene at ſea, came to his father; whereof he greatlie reioiſed for the great wiſedome, manhood, and experience, which he knew to be in him.

The lord Howard admerall capteine of the foreward.

Then the earle and his councell, with great deliberation appointed his battels in order, with wings, and with horſmen neceſſarie. Firſt of the fore-ward was ordeined capteine the lord Howard admerall of England, as well with ſuch as came with him from the ſea, as others. Firſt the lord Clifford, the lord Coniers, the lord Latimer, the lord Scroope of Vpſall, the lord Ogle, the lord Lomlie, ſir Nicholas Appleyard maiſter of the ordinance, ſir Stephan Bull, ſir Henrie Shirburne, ſir William Sidneie, ſir Edward Ichingham, ſir William Bulmer, with the power of the biſhoprike of Durham, ſir William Gaſcoigne, ſir Chriſtopher Ward, ſir John Eueringham, ſir Thomas Metham, ſir Walter Griffith, and manie others.

Of the wing on the right hand of the fore-ward, was capteine ſir Edward Howard knight marſhall of the hoſt, & with him Brian Tunſtall, Rafe Brearton, John Laurence, Richard Bold, eſquiers: ſir John Booth, ſir Thomas Butler, knights: Richard Done, John Bigod, Thomas Fitz Williams, John Claruis, Brian Stapleton, Robert Warcop, Richard Cholmleie, with the men of Hull, and the kings tenants of Hatfield, and others. Of the wing on the left hand, was capteine ſir Marmaduke Conſtable, with his ſonnes and kinſmen, ſir William Perſie, and of Lancaſhire a thouſand men. Of the rere-ward was capteine the earle of Surreie himſelfe, and with him the lord Scroope of Bolton, ſir Philip Tilneie, ſir George Darcie, ſir Thomas Berkleie, ſir John Rocliffe, ſir Chriſtopher Pikering, Richard Tempeſt, ſir John Stanleie, with the biſhop of Elies ſeruants, ſir Brian Stapleton, Lionell Perſie, with the abbat of Whitbies tenants, Chriſtopher Clapham, ſir William Gaſcoigne the yoonger, ſir Guie Dawneie, maiſter Magnus, maiſter Dalbies ſeruants, ſir John Normanuile, the citizens of Yorke, ſir Ninian Markanuile, ſir John Willoughbie, with others.

Of the wing on the right hand, was capteine the lord Dacres with his power. Of the left hand wing, was capteine ſir Edward Stanleie knight, with the reſidue of the power of the two counties palantine of Cheſter and Lancaſter. Thus was the hoſt appointed and diuided into wards and wings at the firſt, though afterward (vpon occaſion) this order was ſomewhat altered. And now that euerie man knew what to doo, the earle of Surrie with his power comming toward the place where he thought to find the Scotiſh hoſt, was informed how king James being remooued ſix miles from Norham, laie imbattelled vpon a great mounteine called Floddon, a place of ſuch ſtrength, as it was not poſſible for the Engliſhmen to come néere him, but to their great diſaduantage: for at the foot of the ſame hill on the left hand, there was a great mariſh ground full of réed and water.

The ſtrength of the place where king James lay incamped, called Floddon.

On the right hand it was defended with a riuer called Till, the courſe whereof being ſo ſwift, and the chanell in ſome places ſo déepe, that it might not conueniently be paſſed. On the backe halfe there were ſuch craggie rocks and thicke woods, that it was not poſſible to aſſaile him to anie aduantage that waie foorth. And on the forepart of the campe, where nature had left an eaſie entrie for men to come to the ſame, all his ordinance was planted aloft vpon the ſides of ſuch trenches, as he had cauſed to be caſt for defenſe on that part. The earle of Surrie herevpon, conſidering with himſelfe, that vnleſſe he might deuiſe ſome policie to cauſe the Scotiſh armie to deſcend the hill, it were not poſſible for him to accompliſh his deſire, he called about him his councell, and with them tooke aduiſe in this point.

An herald ſent from the earle of Surrie to king James.

At length it was concluded and determined among other things, to ſend Rouge Croſſe, purſeuant at armes, with a trumpet to the king of Scots, with a meſſage and certeine inſtructions: which in ſubſtance was, to ſhew and declare vnto the ſaid king of Scots, that where he (contrarie vnto his oth and league, and vnnaturallie againſt all reaſon and conſcience) had entered and inuaded this his brothers realme of England, and doone great hurt to the ſame, in caſting downe caſtels, towers, and houſes, burning, ſpoiling, and deſtroieng the ſame, and cruellie murthering the king of England his brothers ſubiects; he the ſaid earle would be readie to trie the rightfulneſſe of the matter with the king in battell, by fridaie next comming at the furtheſt, if he of his noble courage would giue him tarieng and abode. And the ſame did the ſaid earle promiſe, as he was a true knight vnto God & the king of England his maiſter.

The lord admerals meſſage to the king of Scots.

And before Rouge Croſſe ſhould depart with the ſaid inſtructions, the lord admerall gaue him in credence to ſhew the ſaid king of his comming, and part of his companie from the ſea with him, and that he had ſought the Scotiſh nauie then being on the ſea, but he could not méet with them, bicauſe they were fled into France by the coaſt of Ireland. And in as much as the ſaid king had diuerſe and manie times cauſed the ſaid lord to be called at daies of truce, to make redreſſe for Andrew Barton a pirat of the ſea, long before that vanquiſhed by the ſame lord admerall, he was now come in his owne proper perſon, to be in the vant-gard of the field, to iuſtifie the death of the ſaid Andrew againſt him and all his people, and would ſée what could be laid to his charge the ſaid daie.

Andrew Barton, of whom mention before pag. 811.

Furthermore, that he nor none of his companie ſhould take no Scotiſh noble man priſoner, nor anie other; but they ſhould die if they came in his danger, vnleſſe it were the kings owne perſon; for he ſaid he truſted to none other courteſie at the hands of the Scots. And in this maner he ſhould find him in the vant-gard of the field, by the grace of God, and ſaint George, as he was a true knight. Yet before the departing of Rouge Croſſe, with the ſaid inſtructions and credence, it was thought by the earle & his councell, that the ſaid king would faine and imagine ſome other meſſage, to ſend an herald of his with the ſame, onelie to view and ouerſée the manner and order of the kings roiall armie, ordinance, and artillerie then being with the earle, whereby might haue inſued great danger to the ſame.

A good policie.

And for the eſchuing thereof, he had in commandement, that if anie ſuch meſſage were ſent, not to bring anie perſon comming therewith within thrée or two miles of the field at the nigheſt, where the ſaid earle would come, and heare what he would ſaie. And thus departed Rouge Croſſe, with his trumpet, apparelled in his coat of armes. On mondaie the fift daie of September, the earle tooke his field at Bolton in Glendale, as he had appointed, where all the noble men and gentlemen met him with their retinues, to the number of ſix and twentie thouſand men. And about midnight next inſuing came the trumpet which went to Rouge Croſſe, and declared how the king of Scots, after the meſſage doone to him by Rouge Croſſe, according to his inſtructions, the ſaid king deteined him, & ſent one Ilaie an herald of his with him vnto the earle, to declare to him the kings pleaſure; to whom the earle ſent Yorke herald at armes, to accompanie the ſaid Ilaie, at a village called Milo, two miles from the field, vntill the comming thither of the ſaid earle the next morow.

Ilaie and Yorke heralds.

On the ſixt daie of September, earlie in the morning, the earle accompanied with the moſt part of the lords and knights, and gentlemen of the field, euerie man hauing with him but one ſeruant to hold his horſſe, rode vnto the place: and ſo the ſaid herald met with the earle, and with blunt reuerence declared to him that he was come from his maiſter the king of Scots, which would know whether the earle ſent anie ſuch meſſage by Rouge Croſſe. The earle iuſtified the ſame, ſaieng further; that Rouge Croſſe had the ſame meſſage of him in writing, ſigned with his owne hand. Wherevnto the ſaid Ilaie ſaid: As to the abiding for battell betwéene that and fridaie then next following, the king his maiſter bade him ſhew to the earle, that he was as welcome as anie noble man of England vnto the ſaid king, and that if he had béene at home in his towne of Edenburgh, there receiuing ſuch a meſſage from the ſaid earle, he would gladlie haue come, and fulfilled the ſaid earles deſire.

The Scotiſh herald doth his errand to the earle.

And the herald aſſured the earle, on the king his maiſters behalfe, that the ſame king would abide him battel at the daie prefixed. Wherof the ſaid earle was right ioious, and much praiſed the honorable agréement of the ſaid roiall king, and eſtéemed the ſame to procéed of an high and honorable courage, promiſing the herald, that he, and good ſuertie with him ſhould be bound in ten thouſand pounds ſterling, to kéepe the ſaid daie appointed; ſo that the king would find an earle of his, and thereto a good ſuertie with him to be bound in like ſumme, for the performance of the ſame. And furthermore the earle bade the herald to ſaie vnto his maiſter the king; that if he for his part kept not his appointment, then he was content that the Scots ſhould baffull him, which is a great reproch among the Scots, and is vſed, when a man is openlie periured, and then they make of him an image painted, reuerſed, with his héeles vpward, with his name, woondering, crieng, and blowing out on him with hornes, in the moſt deſpitefull manner they can, in token that he is worthie to be exiled the companie of all good creatures. Then Ilaie deliuered to the earle a little ſchedule written with the kings ſecretaries hand vnſigned, as followeth.

Baffulling what it is among the Scots.

The tenor of the ſaid ſchedule.

AS to the cauſes alledged of our comming into England againſt our band and promiſe (as is alledged) thereto we anſwere; our brother was bound as farre to vs, as we to him. And when we ſware laſt before his ambaſſador, in preſence of our councell; we expreſſed eſpeciallie in an othe, that we would kéepe to our brother, if our brother kept to vs, and not elſe. We ſweare our brother brake firſt vnto vs. And ſince his breach we haue required diuers times him to amend; & latelie we warned our brother, as he did not vs, yer he brake. And this we take for our quarrell, and with Gods grace ſhall defend the ſame at your affixed time, which with Gods grace we ſhall abide.

The Scotiſh herald is deteined of the Engliſh.

And forſomuch as the king kept Rouge Croſſe with him, who was not yet returned, the ſame earle cauſed the ſame Ilaie to be in the kéeping of ſir Humfrie Liſle and Yorke herald in the ſame village, vntill the time that a ſeruant of the ſame Ilaie might ride in all haſt to the king of Scots, for the deliuering of the ſaid Rouge Croſſe. Then the earle ioious of the kings anſwer, returned to his campe, and ſet forward fiue miles, to a place called Woller Haugh, in ſuch order of battell, as euen then he ſhould haue fought, and there lodged for that night, thrée little miles from the king of Scots. And betwéene the king & him was a goodlie & large corne field called Milfield, which was a conuenient & faire ground for two hoſts to fight on: there either hoſt might perceiue other. The earles deſire was to procure the Scots to deſcend the hill into ſome euen ground, where he might fight with them without diſaduantage of place.

But the king, though he had a great deſire to fight, yet vpon diuerſe conſiderations, by aduiſe of his councell he ſtill kept his ground, and meant not to remooue at all out of his ſtrength. Wherevpon the earle of Surrie not able long to continue in ſuch grounds of diſaduantage, by reaſon of mires, and mariſhes, amongſt the which he lodged with his armie that was almoſt famiſhed for lacke of ſufficient vittels, which could not be recouered in ſuch a barren countrie, determined to ſéeke all waies poſſible, if he might conſtreine the Scotiſh king to come downe beſide the hill. He therefore raiſed his campe, and leauing his enimies on the left hand, and paſſing ouer the water of Till, he drew into a more commodious ground, at the end of Barmore wood; to the end he might refreſh his ſouldiers ſomewhat hereby after they had béene toiled for the ſpace of thrée daies togither in cloggie mires, and foule filthie waies, to their diſeaſe and wearineſſe.

The earle of Surrie remooueth his campe ouer the water of Till.

The earle of Surrie being thus lodged, the water of Till ran betwixt the two campes of Scots and Engliſhmen, diuiding them in ſunder: and ſtill by reaſon the one was within the ſhot of a culuering of the other, they ceaſſed not to beſtow ſhot and powder either at other, though without dooing anie great hurt at all. For the Engliſh campe on that part which laie toward the Scots, was couered with an hill riſing from the hither banke of Till water, with an eaſie ſtéepeneſſe to the height of a miles ſpace or thereabouts. Thomas lord Howard ſonne and heire to the earle of Surrie, from the top of this hill beholding all the countrie on euerie ſide about him, declared to his father, that if he did eftſoons remooue his campe, and paſſe the water of Till againe in ſome place a little aboue, and by fetching a ſmall compaſſe come & ſhew himſelfe on the backe halfe of his enimies, the Scotiſh king ſhould either be inforced to come downe forth of his ſtrength and giue battell, or elſe be ſtopped from receiuing vittels or anie other thing out of Scotland.

The lord Howard taketh view of the Scotiſh armie.

The earle of Surrie deſirous of nothing ſo much as to ioine with the Scots in battell; after he vnderſtood that his ſonne had informed him nothing but truth, he raiſed his field: and marching a thrée miles vpward by the riuer ſide, paſſed ouer his armie in two parts at two ſeuerall bridges, all at one time. King Iames when he ſaw this manner of his enimies, and perceiuing what their meaning was, by coniecture of their dooings, thought it ſtood not with his honor to ſit ſtill, and ſuffer himſelfe to be foreſtalled forth of his owne realme: and againe, that it might ſore diminiſh the opinion of his princelie power, if he ſéemed to remaine as it were beſieged within a fortreſſe, hauing more confidence in ſtrength of the place, than in the manhood of his people: wherevpon immediatlie he raiſed his campe, and got an hill, which he doubted leaſt the enimie ſhould haue taken before him.

The earle of Surrie returneth againe ouer the water of Till.

But by ſuch diligence as he vſed, and by reaſon of the great ſmoke which was raiſed and ſpred ouer all the countrie, by burning of the litter and cabbins wherein the Scots had lodged, purpoſelie ſet on fire to the ſame intent, he was got to the place whither he intended, before the Engliſhmen knew for anie certeintie that he was diſlodged, though they were as then within a mile of him. Thus king Iames kéeping the tops of the hils, the earle of Surrie with the Engliſh armie came to the foot of the ſame hils, and ſtaieng there a while, for ſo much as he ſaw how hill to the which the Scots were gotten, was neither ſtéepe nor hard to aſcend, he determined to mount the ſame, and to fight with the Scotiſh hoaſt yer they ſhould haue leaſure to fortifie their campe.

Héerewith calling his people togither, he made vnto them a bréefe oration, declaring vnto them both what neceſſitie there was for them to ſhew their manhood, and what iuſt cauſes they had alſo to fight againſt thoſe enimies, that againſt both the lawes of God and man had moſt cruellie inuaded the relme of England, in the quarrell of a ſchiſmatike, and one that was accurſſed and excommunicated by the cenſures of the church. The Engliſhmen kindled with deſire to fight, the more thorough thoſe words of the earle, required incontinentlie to be led foorth againſt the Scots, that they might ſhew what earneſt wils they had to be reuenged; not onelie of new receiued wrongs, but alſo of ancient iniuries; for there ſhould neither heigth of hill, nor anie other obſtacle hinder them, but they would either returne with victorie, or elſe loſe their liues in the paine.

The ordering of the Engliſh armie.

The earle of Surrie conceiued no ſmall hope of victorie in this chearefull readineſſe of his ſouldiors, and therevpon with all ſpéed (as the occaſion then mooued him at that inſtant) diuided his armie into thrée battels, or rather foure: vnto the vant-gard whereof, the lord Howard was capteine, his brother ſir Edmund Howard was ioined as a wing; the earle himſelfe led the midle-ward, and the rere-ward was guided by ſir Edward Stanleie, afterwards created lord Mounteagle. The lord Dacres with a number of horſſemen was ſet apart by himſelfe to ſuccor where need ſhould ſéeme to appeare. The ordinance was placed in the front of theſe battels, & in places betwéene, as was thought expedient. In this order, forward they made with manlie courages towards the Scots a good marching paſe.

The Scotiſh kings thought at the view of the Engliſh armie.

In the meane time, king Iames beholding all the demeanor of the Engliſhmen, from the heigth of the hill, thought with himſelfe, that there was offered him that daie a goodlie occaſion of victorie, if he might come to fight with the enimies at ſuch aduantage of place and number. And therfore, being haſtned forward through the ſtrenable force of deſtinie, or rather Gods ordinance, he commanded his ſtandards to be raiſed and ſpred, and euerie man to reſort to his appointed place, that they might foorthwith incounter the enimies, that preſumed thus to ſéeke battell. And héerewith turning him to the lords and capteins that ſtood about him, he ſpake vnto them manie comfortable words touching the occaſion offered them at that preſent, to gaine both a famous victorie, and to reuenge ſo manifold iniuries and diſpleaſures, as they had ſuſteined diuerſe waies foorth at the Engliſhmens hands.

King Iames and all the reſt alight from horſſebacke.

He had ſcarſe made an end of his tale, but the ſoldiers with great noiſe and clamor cried; Forward, Vpon them; ſhaking their weapons in ſigne of an earneſt deſire they had (as then they ſhewed) to buckle with the Engliſhmen. Wherevpon, without delaie, king Iames putting his horſſe from him, all other as well nobles as meane men did the like, that the danger being equall, as well to the greateſt as to the meaneſt, and all hope of ſuccour taken awaie, which was to be looked for by flight, they might be the more willing to ſhew their manhood, ſith their ſafegard onelie reſted in the edges and points of their weapons. Then was the whole armie diuided into fiue wards or regiments, to this intent, that the battell wherein the king himſelfe ſtood with his ſtandard, might be incloſed as it were with two wings, on either ſide one. In the right wing, the earles of Huntleie, Crawford, and Montroſſe, were placed as chéefe leaders thereof; and in the left were the earles of Lenox, and Argile, with the lord Hume, lord chamberleine of Scotland, being men of great ſkill in warlike affaires, as was reported.

The order of the Scotiſh hoaſt.

French capteins in the Scotiſh hoaſt.

Moreouer, in euerie band (almoſt generallie thoroughout) there was a knight appointed for capteine and guider, and amongſt them certeine French capteins, the which king Lewes had ſent ouer into Scotland latelie before, to traine the Scots in the practiſe of warres. The ordinance was lodged in places moſt conuenient; though by reaſon they marched downe the hill, their ſhot did ſmall damage to the Engliſhmen comming vpwards towards them, and yet they beſtowed it freſhlie on either ſide one vpon an other. Héerwith ſir Edmund Howard with his wing was got vp on the hill ſide, with whome the lord Hume and the two foreſaid earles of Lenox and Argile incountered with ſuch violence, that this battell of Scots with ſpeares on foot on that part, beat downe and broke that wing of the Engliſhmen, in ſuch wiſe that ſir Edmund Howard was in maner left alone, and felled to the earth, that (had not baſtard Heron come to his ſuccours at that inſtant) he had béene ſlaine there without all remedie.

The battell is begun, and ſir Edmund Howard incountred with the earles of Lenox and Argile.

Thus hath Iouius, although Hall ſaith, that the lord Dacres ſtood ſtill all day vnfoughten with.

On the other part, the lord Dacres watching to aid where need appéered, came in on the ſides of the Scots, & gaue a charge on them with his horſſemen, wherby ſir Edmund Howard being ſomewhat relieued, eſcaped to the Engliſh vant-gard, which was led (as before is mentioned) by his brother, lord Howard, who being now alſo got aloft on the hill, preaſſed ſtill forward to renew the battell, & to ſuccour thoſe whome he ſaw put to the worſe, ſo that thereby they tooke new courages, & laid about them againe. Herewith the earles of Crawford & Montroſſe came with their battell of ſpeares alſo on foot, and incountring with the ſaid lord Howard, after ſore fight on both ſides continued, with more malicious hatred than force of the parties, both the ſaid earles were ſlaine, beſides a great number of other; the whole battell which they led being put to flight and chaſed out of the field, maimed, wounded, and ſlaine. And though they did what they could to the vttermoſt reſiſtance, in hope to haue bathed their blades in Engliſh blood; yet the contrarie came to paſſe, as in ſtories is left recorded, to the honour of the Engliſh; namelie:

The Scots put to the worſſe in the right wing.

Suſtinet inſlictos duris vmbonibus ictus,
Imbuit & gladios manante cruore Britannus.

Sir Edward Stanleie and his archers breake the Scots araie.

On the left hand at the ſame inſtant, ſir Edward Stanlie hauing begun to incounter with the Scots on that ſide, forced them to come downe into a more euen ground; and brought to that point with ſuch inceſſant ſhot of arrowes as his archers beſtowed amongſt them, that to auoid the danger of that ſore and ſharpe ſtorme, the Scots were conſtreined to breake their arraie, & to fight not cloſed togither in order of battell, but inſunder one ſeparated from another, ſo that their ſtandards began to ſhrinke here and there. Which thing when ſir Edward Stanleie perceiued, foorthwith bringing about thrée bands, which he had kept in ſtore for ſuch like purpoſe; he inuaded the open ſides of his enimies by a freſh onſet, and put them in ſuch diſorder, that they were not able anie longer to abide the violence of the Engliſhmen mightilie preaſſing vpon them: ſo that taking themſelues to flight, and running headlong downe the ſtiepe deſcent of the mounteine, they eſcaped to the woods and there ſaued themſelues. But the earles of Argile and Lenox, dooing what they could to ſtaie their people from running awaie, were ſlaine in the ſame place.

The left wing of the Scots is diſcomfited.

In the meane time, the king, who a little before had ioined with the earle of Surreie, perceiuing that the wings of his battell were diſtreſſed, and that his enimies began to incloſe him on ech ſide, he baſhed nothing at the matter,but with aſſured countenance exhorted thoſe that were about him to ſticke to him, and to remember their worthie anceſtors,in committing nothing that might anie waies forth ſound to their reproch. And herewith ruſhing againſt his enimies,a new battell more egre than the firſt began to ariſe;for that battell being well appointed and armed paſſed litle for the Engliſhmens arrowes,in ſo much that perſing the earles battell,they entred well néere ſo farre within the ſame, that they were at point to haue ouerthrowne his ſtandards.

The king fighteth himſelfe right valiantlie.

There were on either part a number of tall men of bodie, choſen forth of purpoſe by the capteins, for the good opinion conceiued of their hardie valiancie, & the battell betwixt them ſéemed long time doubtfull and variable, now one while fauourable to the one part, and an other while to the other. The king himſelfe on foot euen in the formoſt ranke, fought right valiantlie, incouraging his people, as well by example as exhortation, to doo their deuoirs. Neither did the earle of Surrie for his part faile in the dutie of a right worthie generall. But while the battell was thus foughten in moſt earneſt maner about the ſtandards with doubtfull chance of victorie, the lord Howard and ſir Edward Stanleie hauing vanquiſhed the enimies in either wing, returned to the middle-ward, and finding them there thus occupied, they ſet on, in two parts ſeuerallie, with great violence.

The ſtout ſtomach of king James.

He is ſlaine.

At the ſame time, the lord Dacres came with his horſſemen vpon the backs of the Scots; ſo that they being thus aſſailed behind and before, and on either ſide, were conſtreined (as inuironed about) to fight in a round compaſſe. King James as he beheld ſir Adam Forman his ſtandard-bearer beaten downe, thought ſuerlie then, there was no waie for him but death, and that euen out of hand. Wherefore to deliuer himſelfe from ſuch deſpitefull reproch, as was like to follow,he ruſhed forth into the thickeſt preaſe of his enimies; and there fighting in moſt deſperat wiſe, was beaten downe and ſlaine. And a little beſide him, there died with like obſtinate wilfulneſſe, or (if ye liſt ſo to terme it) manhood, diuerſe honorable prelats,as the archbiſhop of ſaint Andrewes,and two other biſhops,beſides foure abbats; alſo of lords and knights of honor a ſix and thirtie.

Two battels of Scots fought not, but gaue the looking on.

Pau. Iouius. Edw. Hall.

Seuen culuerings called ſeuen ſiſters & why.

The lord Hume and the earle of Huntleie got horſſes, and eſcaped awaie togither with certeine bands, placed in two the hindermoſt wards, which of all that daie neuer came to handſtrokes,but ſtood ſtill and gaue the looking on. Thus thorough the power of God, on fridaie being the ninth of September,in the yeare 1513 was James the fourth of that name, king of Scots,ſlaine at Bramxſton, and his armie diſcomfited by the earle of Surrie, lieutenant to Henrie the eight king of England, which a little before had woone the towne of Terwine,and was then preparing to go to beſiege Tornaie. There were ſlaine in this battell on the Scotiſh part, of all ſorts, the number of eight thouſand perſons at the leaſt: ſome ſaie twelue thouſand, beſides priſoners that were taken, as ſir William Scot, chancellor to the ſaid king,and ſir John Forman his ſergeant porter, with diuerſe others. Alſo in maner, all the Scotiſh enſignes were taken, and a two and twentie péeces of great ordinance, amongeſt the which were ſeauen culuerings of a large aſſiſe, and verie faire péeces. King James named them (for that they were in making one verie like to an other) the ſeauen ſiſters. This conflict with egerneſſe on both ſides was continued thrée full houres, as Anglorum prælia ſaith:

Iam tres integras pugnatum eſt cominus horas.

Edw. Hall. The Engliſh mens ouerraſh hardineſſe turnes them to hurt.

Though the victorie thus remained with the Engliſhmen, yet they bought it déere, loſing no ſmall number of their people, as well of thoſe that were ſlaine in the field,as of others that were taken priſoners; for the Scots fought verie ſtoutlie,and gaue it not ouer for a little,inſomuch that there were taken and ſlaine about fiftéene hundred men, as appeared by the booke of wages,when the ſouldiers were paid. Manie Engliſhmen that followed ouer raſhlie in the chaſe of the Scots, went ſo farre, that they wiſt not which waie to returne, and ſo were taken of the Scots that were in the two battels that went awaie with cleare hands, and neuer fought. Alſo, diuerſe were taken by the lord chamberleine, which fought with the wing of ſir Edmund Howard,and were caried awaie by him and his companie into Scotland, as John Fitton eſquier, and others. During the time of the fight,and the night after,manie Engliſhmen loſt their horſſes, and ſuch ſtuffe as they left in their tents and pauilions, by the robbers of Tindale and Tiuidale.

The bodie of king James found hauing diuerſe deadlie wounds.

When the field was doone, and that the ſkonts brought word that there was no more appearance of the Scots, but that they were all auoided and gone, the earle gaue thanks to God, and called to him certeine lords and gentlemen,and them made knights; as ſir Edmund Howard his ſonne,the lord Scroope, ſir William Perſie,ſir Edward Gorge, and diuerſe others. The earle and the lord admerall departed to Bermar wood, & there lodged that night, leauing ſir Philip Tilneie knight and diuerſe other worthie capteins, with a conuenient power of men, to kéepe the place where the field had béene fought,for ſafegard of the ordinance. Ths bodie of the king of Scots was not found vntill the next daie, and then being found and knowne by the lord Dacres, there appeared in the ſame diuerſe deadlie wounds,and ſpeciallie, one with an arrow, and an other with a bill. But ſome ſaie he died of two, both which were inflicted vpon him to his deadlie bane (and well worthie for truce-breaking) by the ſword;as Anglorum prælia reporteth:

Vulneribus Scotus acceptis cadit enſe duobus,
Perfidiæ meritus fuſo dans ſanguine pœnas.

Scots flie at the peale of guns.

The kings thankfulneſſe ſignified to his good ſeruitors in war.

The ſame daie, there appeared ſome Scots on a hill,but one William Blackenall that had the chéefe rule of the ordinance,cauſed ſuch a peale to be ſhot off at them, that the Scots fled;or elſe the lord admerall, which was come to view the field, had béene in great danger; as was ſuppoſed. But now that the Scots were fled, and withdrawne, all the ordinance was brought in ſafetie to Eitill, and there remained for a time. After that the earle of Surrie had taken order in all things, and ſet the North parts in good quiet, he returned to the quéene with the dead bodie of the Scotiſh king cered. When the king was returned into England from his conqueſt made in France of the cities of Terwine and Tornaie, he forgat not the good ſeruice of thoſe that had béene with the earle of Surrie at the battell at Bramxton: wherefore he wrote to them his louing letters,with ſuch thanks and fauourable words,that euerie man thought himſelfe well rewarded.

Wolſie deſcribed.

On the daie of the Purification of our ladie, at Lambeth,the king created the earle of Surrie duke of Norffolke,with an augmentation of the armes of Scotland, and ſir Charles Brandon vicount Liſle he created duke of Suffolke, and the lord Howard high admerall he created earle of Worceſter: and after this,he alſo made ſir Edward Stanleie (for his good ſeruice ſhewed at Bramxſton field) lord Mounteagle: and in March following was maiſter Thomas Wolſie the kings almoner,conſecrated biſhop of Lincolne. This man was borne at Ipſwich, and was a good philoſopher, verie eloquent and full of wit; but paſſinglie ambitious, as by his doings it well appeared. In the time of king Henrie the ſeauenth uenſh it was agréed betwixt the ſaid king and Philip king of Caſtile (that Charles king Philips eldeſt ſon ſhould marrie the ladie Marie, daughter to the ſaid king Henrie, with a dower to hir appointed: but for want of ſufficient aſſurance of the dower, the reſt of couenants were made void, and yet had the king highlie prouided for the ſending of hir ouer, now after his comming from Tornaie.

Incloſures of the fields about London, caſt downe & ouerthrowne.

This yeare the citizens of London, finding themſelues gréeued with the incloſures of the common fields about Iſlington, Horton, Shorditch, and other places néere to the citie, whereby they could not be ſuffered to exerciſe their bowes, nor other paſtimes in thoſe fields, as before time they had bene accuſtomed, aſſembled themſelues on a morning, and went with ſpades and ſhouels vnto the ſame fields, and there (like diligent workemen) ſo beſtirred themſelues, that within a ſhort ſpace, all the hedges about thoſe towns were caſt downe, and the ditches filled. The kings councell comming to the graie friers, to vnderſtand what was meant by this dooing, were ſo anſwered by the maior and councell of the citie, that the matter was diſſembled: and ſo when the workemen had doone their worke, they came home in quiet maner, and the fields were neuer after hedged.

Anno Reg. 6. Abr. Fl. ex I.S. pag. 902.

George Monox for this yeare Maior of London, of his godlie diſpoſition reedified the decaied ſtéeple of the pariſh church of Walthamſtow, in the countie of Eſſex, adding therevnto a ſide Ile, with a chappell, where he lieth buried. And on the northſide of the churchyard there, he founded a faire large almeſhouſe for an almoſe prieſt or ſchoolemaiſter, and thirtéene poore almes folke, eight men, and fiue women, appointing to the ſaid almes prieſt or ſchoolmaiſter for his yearelie wages, ſix pounds thirtéene ſhillings foure pence; and to euerie one of the ſaid almes folke ſeuen pence a wéeke, and fiue pounds to be beſtowed yearelie amongſt them in coles. And ordeined that the ſaid almes prieſt ſhould on ſundaies and feſtiuall daies, be helping and aſſiſtant to the vicar or curat there in celebration of diuine ſeruice, & on the wéeke daies fréelie to applie and teach yoong children of the ſaid pariſh, to the number of thirtie, in a ſchoolehouſe by him there builded for that purpoſe. Moreouer, hée gaue to the pariſh clearke there for the time being, a yearlie ſtipend of twentie ſix ſhillings eight pence, for euer, and a chamber by the ſaid almes houſe, to the intent he ſhould helpe the ſaid ſchoolemaiſter to teach the ſaid children. And hath giuen faire lands and tenements in the citie of London, for the perpetuall maintenance of the premiſſes to Gods glorie for euer. He alſo for the great commoditie of trauellers on foot, made a continuall cauſie of timber ouer the marſhes from Walthamſtow to Locke bridge towards London.

Edw. Hall in Hen. 8. fol. 46. The king and the new duke of Suffolke defenders at the tilt againſt all commers.

In the moneth of Maie, the king and the new duke of Suffolke were defenders at the tilt againſt all commers. The king was in a ſcopelarie mantle, an hat of cloth of ſiluer, and like a white hermit, and the duke apparelled like a blacke hermit, all of blacke veluet, both their berds were of damaſke ſiluer: and when they had ridden about the tilt, & ſhewed themſelues to the quéene, then they threw off their apparell, and ſent it to the ladies for a larges. Then was the king in blacke, and the duke in white, with blacke ſtaues, on the ſtaues was written with white letters, Who can hold that will away: this poſie was iudged to be made for the duke of Suffolke, and the ducheſſe of Sauoie. At theſe iuſtes were the duke of Longuile, & the lord Clermont, and there the king & duke did ſo valiantlie, that they obteined the priſe. At theſe iuſtes were broken an hundred and fourtéene ſpeares in a ſhort ſpace. The king at this ſeaſon ſent againe into Flanders, for the performance of the mariage of the yoong prince of Caſtile, and the faire ladie Marie his ſiſter, and ſhewed how he had prepared all things neceſſarie and conuenient for ſuch an high eſtate. The councell of Flanders anſwered, that they would not receiue hir that yeare, with manie ſubtill arguments; by reaſon whereof, the perfect loue betwene England and the low countries was much ſlaked.

A cap of maintenance ſent to the king from the pope.

On the ninetéenth daie of Maie was receiued into London a cap of maintenance & a ſword, ſent from pope Iulie, with a great companie of nobles and gentlemen, which was preſented to the king on the ſundaie then next inſuing, with great ſolemnitie in the cathedrall church of ſaint Paule. Touching this pope (ſaith Guicciardine) diſappointed of ſo manie hopes, we may laie him in compariſon with that which is written by the poets of Anteus, that being tamed by the forces of Hercules, as often as he was throwne to the ground, ſo often did appeare in him a greater ſtrength and courage; ſuch wéening had the pope amidſt his aduerſities, for when he ſéemed moſt abaſed and oppreſſed, it was then that he did moſt lift vp him ſelfe with a ſpirit more conſtant and reſolute, promiſing better of his fortune than euer.

Abr. Fl. ex Guic. pag. 490. Pope Iulie compared to Anteus.

Guic. pag. 631.

After he had plaied all his troubleſome pageants, and had got by ſundrie aſpiring practiſes I wot not what péereleſſe primaſie, he fell ſicke. And happilie he was then more full of high conceipts and trauelling thoughts than at anie time before: for notwithſtanding he had brought his fortune to be equall with his deſires, & obteined the thing he aſpired vnto, yet his deuiſes and plots did nothing diminiſh, but grew increaſing by the ſame meane which ſhould haue ſatiſfied them. He had determined in the beginning of the ſpring and firſt opening of the yeare, to ſend to the enterpriſe of Ferrara which he ſo much deſired, and his opinion was, that that ſtate was able to make no reſiſtance, both for that it was naked of all ſuccours, and bicauſe the Spaniſh armie was to ioine with his companies: he had ſecretlie bought of Ceſar for the price of thirtie thouſand duckets, the citie of Sienna for the behoofe of the duke of Vrbin, to whome (except Peſera) he would neuer giue anie thing of the eſtate eccleſiaſtike, to the end to reſerue to himſelfe the whole glorie to haue ſimplie and onelie ſtudied for the exaltation of the church. He agréed to lend to Ceſar fortie thouſand duckats, receiuing Modona in gage. He threatned them of Lucquoie, who in the heat of the affaires of the duke of Ferrara, were become lords of Garſagnana, making inſtance that they would deliuer it to him.

The purpoſes of pope Iulie the ſecond and his death.

The popes mal content

He was out of conceit with the cardinall of Medicis, for that he thought him to cleaue more to the king catholike, than to him. And bicauſe he knew he was not able to diſpoſe of the citie of Florence as he thought, he ſtudied alredie new plots, and new practiſes to alter that eſtate. He was ill contented with the cardinall of Sion, from whome he tooke the name of legat, and inioined him to come to Rome, for that in the duchie of Millan he had appropriat to himſelfe a yearelie rent of more than thirtie thouſand duckats, of the eſtates and goods of diuerſe perſons. The better to aſſure the duke of Vrbin of Sienna by intelligences of his neighbours, he had of new taken into his paie Charles Baillon, to chaſe out of Perouſa Iohn Paule, who by affinitie was verie neere ioined to the ſonnes of Pandolffe Petruccio ſucceſſours to the greatneſſe of their father. He would of new create duke of Genes, Octauian Fregoſa, depoſing Ianus from that dignitie: an action whereunto did conſent the others of the houſe of Fregoſa, bicauſe for the degrée that his anceſtors held in that ſtate, it ſéemed beſt to apperteine vnto him.

He ſtudied continuallie either how he might worke out of Italie the Spaniſh armie, or cut it in peeces by the aid of the Swizzers, whome aboue all others he exalted and imbraced. In this deuiſe hee had this intention, that the kingdome of Naples being occupied by him, Italie ſhould remaine free from ſtrangers; a ſpeach that often paſſed out of his mouth: and to that end hee had hindered that the Swizzers did not confederate with the king catholike. And yet, as though it had beene in his power to batter all the world at one time, he continued his accuſtomed rigour againſt the French king. And notwithſtanding he had hard a meſſage from the queene, yet he ſtirred vp to make warre, the king of England, to whome he had transferred by publike decree of the councell of Lateran, the name of Chriſtianiſſimo, whereof there was alreadie a bull written, and in it likewiſe was conteined the priuation of the dignitie & name of the king of France, giuing his kingdome to who could occupie it.

The king of England intituled Chriſtianiſſimo by the pope.

In theſe conceptions, no leſſe ſtrange for their varietie, than great for the importance they drew, and perhaps in other thoughts more ſecret and ſingular (for in a mind ſo fierce and terrible, all ſorts of imaginations, how great and vaine ſo euer they be, are not incredible) after the continuation of his ſickneſſe for manie daies, he declined towards death: and feeling the end of his mortalitie to haſten on, and the ſame to preuent the execution of his high thoughts, he cauſed to call togither the conſiſtorie, which albeit he could not aſſiſt in perſon by reaſon of his diſeaſe; yet by the authoritie of it, he cauſed to be confirmed the bull which he had publiſhed before againſt ſuch as by ſimonie would clime vp vnto the popedome. He declared, that the election of his ſucceſſor apperteined to the college of cardinals, and not to the councell: and that the cardinals ſchiſmatikes could haue no preſence or communitie there, to whom he proteſted there to pardon the iniuries they had doone him, and praied to God to forgiue them the wrongs they had doone to his church. After this he beſought the college of cardinals, that in his fauor, and for his ſake, they would grant to the duke of Vrbin his nephew, the citie of Peſera in patronage or vicarage, alledging the conſideration, that by meane of the duke it had beene recouered to the church after the death of John Sforce. In no other matter he expreſſed anie priuate or particular affection.

Againſt climing to the popedome by ſimonie.

Inſomuch as Madame Felice his daughter (ioining with hir the petitions of manie others) beſeeching him with great importunitie, to create cardinall Guido de Montfalcon being hir brother by the mothers ſide, he anſwered roundlie, that he was not worthie of that degree. He made not his affections conformable to their deſires. In that laſt action of life he ſhewed no parcialitie in worldlie cauſes: his preſent debilitie could diminiſh nothing of his ancient reſolution, but expreſſed in all things the ſame conſtancie and ſeueritie, togither with that iudgement and force of mind which he had before his ſickneſſe: in which firme eſtate and diſpoſition of ſpirit, he receiued deuoutlie the offices of the church, and the one and twentith daie of Februarie he ended his courſe of theſe mortall and preſent paines. He was a prince of incredible conſtancie and courage, but ſo full of furie & vnrulie conceptions, that the reuerence that was borne to the church, the diſcord of princes, & the conditions of times, did more to ſtaie him from his ruine, than either his moderation or his diſcretion; worthie no doubt of great glorie, if either he had beene a prince ſecular, or if that care and intention which he had to raiſe the church into temporall greatneſſe by the meane of warre, had beene imploied to exalt it by the meane of peace in matters ſpirituall.

Madame Felice the popes daughter hir requeſt.

The deſcription of pope Julie, and his properties.

Neuertheleſſe, he was lamented aboue all his predeceſſors, & no leſſe eſteemed of thoſe, who hauing either loſt the true conſideration of things, or at leaſt ignorant how to diſtinguiſh and peiſe them rightlie, iudged it an office more duelie apperteining to popes to increaſe the iuriſdiction of the ſee apoſtolike by armes and blood of chriſtians, than by good example of holie life and due curing and correction of corrupt maners, to trauell for the ſauing of thoſe ſoules, for whom they glorie ſo much that Jeſus Chriſt hath named them his vicars in earth: and therefore it is a good conſequent that he is a branch or rather a brand of the diuell, as one concludeth againſt him, saieng:

Impius eſt igitur natus cacodæmone papa,
Turpibus & genijs eſt homicida ſatus.]

Antith.Chriſt. & Pape pag.26,28.

About the ſame time the warres yet continuing betweene England & France, Prior Jehan (of whom ye haue heard before in the fourth yeere of this kings reigne) great capteine of the French nauie, with his gallies and foiſts charged with great baſiliſks and other artillerie, came on the borders of Suſſex in the night ſeaſon, at a poore village there called Brighthelmſton, & burnt it, taking ſuch goods as he found. But when the people began to gather, by firing the becons, Prior Jehan ſounded his trumpet, to call his men abord, and by that time it was daie. Then certeine archers that kept the watch folowed Prior Jehan to the ſea, and ſhot ſo faſt, that they beat the gallie men from the ſhore; and wounded manie in the foiſt, to the which Prior Jehan was conſtreined to wade and was ſhot in the face with an arrow, ſo that he loſt one of his eies, and was like to haue died of the hurt: and therefore he offered his image of wax before our ladie at Bullongne, with the Engliſh arrow in the face for a miracle.

Brighthelmſton in Suſſex burnt.

Prior Jehan capteine of the French galies ſhot into the eie with an arrow.

The lord admerall offended with this proud part of the Frenchmen, in making ſuch attempt on the Engliſh coaſts, ſent ſir John Wallop to the ſea with diuers ſhips, which ſailing to the coaſts of Normandie, landed there, and burnt one and twentie villages and townes, with diuerſe ſhips in the hauen of Treaport, Staples, and other where. Men maruelled greatlie at the manfull doings of ſir John Wallop, conſidering he had not paſt an eight hundred men, and tooke land there ſo often. In June ſir Thomas Louell was ſent ouer to Calis with ſix hundred men to ſtrengthen that towne, and other the fortreſſes within the Engliſh pale, for doubt of anie ſudden attempt to be made by the Frenchmen; bicauſe monſieur de Pontremie, with a mightie armie and great ordinance was come downe neere to Ard: howbeit he taried not long, but raiſed his campe within a while after his comming thither, and returned without anie more doing. The French king perceiuing what loſſes he had ſuſteined by the warres againſt England; and doubting leaſt one euill lucke ſhould ſtill follow in the necke of an other, determined to make ſute for peace; and firſt agreeing with pope Leo, deſired him to be a meane alſo for the procuring of ſome agreement betwixt him and the king of England.

The French king procureth the pope to be a meane for peace betweene king Henrie and him.

¶This pope Leo, of that name the tenth, before his election, cardinall of Medicis, bare but ſeauen and thirtie yeeres of age, which albeit was ſo much the more maruellous and wonderfull, by how much the election was contrarie to cuſtome; yet the yong cardinals were the principall cauſers of it by their induſtrie, hauing long time afore ſecretlie agreed amongſt themſelues to create the firſt pope of their number. The moſt parts and nations of chriſtendome reioiſed much at this election, euerie one interteining an aſſured expectation of his vertues, as well by the preſent and gréene memorie of the valor of his late father, as for an vniuerſall reputation that went of his owne inclinations and liberalities. To this eſtimation was ioined a generall opinion of his continencie and life not atteinted, togither with a gladſome hope, that by the example of his father, he would be a furtherer of learning, and beare fauor to wits diſpoſed to ſtudie and knowledge. So that vnto theſe hopes was much helping the manner of the election, being made in his perſon ſincerelie, and without ſimonie or ſuſpicion of other corruption.

Coronation of pope Leo the tenth.

The firſt act of this new pope was his coronation, which was repreſented according to the vſage of his predeceſſors in the church of ſaint Iohn de Lateran. The pompe was ſo great both of his familie and his court, and alſo of the prelates and multitudes that were there, togither with the popular and vniuerſall aſſemblies of people, that by the opinion and iudgement of men, the pride and maieſtie of that action did farre ſurpaſſe all the celebrations doone in Rome ſince the tyrannies of the Goths and ſauage nations. In this ſame ſolemnitie the Gonfalon of the church was caried by Alfonſo de Eſte, who hauing obteined a ſuſpenſion of his cenſures & paines, was come to Rome, with great hope, that by the clemencie and facilitie of the pope, he ſhould be able to compound for his affaires. The Gonfalon of the religion of Rhodes was borne by Iulio de Medicis mounted vpon a ſtatelie courſer armed at all points: by his nature he bare an inclination to the profeſſion of armes; but by deſtinie he was drawen to the life eccleſiaſtike, in which eſtate he maie ſerue as a wonderfull example of the variation of fortune.

Pope Leo a poore priſoner the verie ſame date twelue moneth of his election and inthronization.

One matter that made the memorie of that daie wonderfull, was this conſideration; that the perſon who then in ſo high & rare pompe was honored with the moſt ſupreme and ſouereigne dignitie of the world, was the yéere before, and on the verie ſame daie miſerablie made priſoner. The great magnificence that appéered vpon his perſon, and his expenſes, confirmed in the generalitie and multitude of men, the expectation that was had of him; euerie one promiſing that Rome ſhould be happie vnder a pope ſo plentifullie indued with the vertue of liberalitie, whereof that daie he had giuen an honorable experience, his expenſes being aboue an hundred thouſand duckats. But wiſe men deſired in him a greater grauitie and moderation: they iudged that neither ſuch a maieſtie of pompe was conuenient for popes, neither did the condition of the preſent time require, that he ſhould ſo vnprofitablie diſperſe the treaſures that had béene gathered by his predeceſſour to other vſes.]

The veſſell of amitie betwéene the king of England & the French being firſt broched by this popes letters, the French king by an herald at armes ſent to the king of England, requiring of him a ſafe conduct for his ambaſſadors, which ſhould come to intreat for a peace and attonement to be concluded betwixt them and their realmes. Upon grant obteined thereof, the French king ſent a commiſſion with the preſident of Rone and others, to intreat of peace and aliance betwixt both the princes. And moreouer, bicauſe they vnderſtood that the mariage was broken betwéene the prince of Caſtile and the ladie Marie, they deſired that the ſaid ladie might be ioined in mariage with the French king, offering a great dowrie and ſuerties for the ſame. So much was offered, that the king mooued by his councell, and namelie by Wolſie the biſhop of Lincolne, conſented vpon condition, that if the French king died, then ſhe ſhould (if it ſtood with hir pleaſure) returne into England againe with all hir dowrie and riches.

A mariage concluded.

A peace concluded betwéene England & Fráce.

Polydor.

After that they were accorded vpon a full peace, and that the French king ſhould marrie this yoong ladie, the indentures were drawen, ingroſſed, & ſealed, and peace therevpon proclamed the ſeuenth daie of Auguſt; & the king in preſence of the French ambaſſadors was ſworne to kéepe the ſame: and likewiſe there was an ambaſſage ſent out of England to ſée the French king ſweare the ſame. The dowrie that was aſſigned vnto the bride to be receiued after hir huſbands deceaſſe, if ſhe ſuruiued him, was named to be 32000 crownes of yearelie reuenues, & to be receiued out of certeine lands aſſigned forth therefore during all hir naturall life. And moreouer, it was further agreed & couenanted, that the French king ſhould content and paie yearelie vnto king Henrie, during the ſpace of fiue yeares, the ſumme of one hundred thouſand crownes. By concluſion of this peace was the duke of Longuile with the other priſoners deliuered, paieng their ranſoms, and the ſaid duke affied the ladie Marie in the name of his maiſter king Lewes.

The ladie Marie affied to K. Lewes of France.

In September following, the ſaid ladie was conueied to Douer by the king hir brother & the quéene, and on the ſecond daie of October ſhe was ſhipped, and ſuch as were appointed to giue their attendance on hir, as the duke of Norffolke, the marqueſſe Dorſet, the biſhop of Durham, the earle of Surreie, the lord de la Ware, the lord Berners, the lord Monteagle, the foure brethren of the ſaid marques, ſir Maurice Berklie, ſir Iohn Pechie, ſir William Sands, ſir Thomas Bulleine, ſir Iohn Car, and manie other knights, eſquiers, gentlemen and ladies. They had not ſailed paſt a quarter of the ſea, but that the wind aroſe and ſeuered the ſhips, driuing ſome of them to Calis, ſome into Flanders, and hir ſhip with great difficultie was brought to Bullen not without great ieopardie at the entering of the hauen, for the maiſter ran the ſhip hard on ſhore.

But the boats were readie, and receiued the ladie out of the ſhip, and ſir Chriſtopher Garniſh ſtood in the water and tooke hir in his armes, and ſo caried hir to land, where the duke of Uandoſme, and a cardinall, with manie other great eſtates receiued hir with great honor. From Bullen with eaſie iournies ſhe was conueied vnto Abuile, & there entered the eighth of October [where ſhe was receiued by the Dolphin with great honour, ſhe was apparelled in cloth of ſiluer, hir horſſe was trapped in goldſmiths worke verie richlie. After hir followed 36 ladies all their palfries trapped with crimſin veluet embrodered. After them followed one chariot of cloth of tiſſue, the ſecond cloth of gold, & the third crimſin veluet embrodered with the kings armes & hirs, full of roſes. After them followed a great number of archers, and then wagons laden with their ſtuffe. Great was the riches in plate, iewels, monie, apparell, and hangings that this ladie brought into France.]

Edw. Hall in He.8 fol. xlviij.

The mariage ſolemnized betwéene the French king, and the ladie Marie ſiſter to K. Henrie.

On the morrow following being mondaie, and S. Deniſe day, the mariage was ſolemnized betwixt the French king and the ſaid ladie, with all honour, ioy, & roialtie, both apparelled in goldſmiths worke. Then a great banket and ſumptuous feaſt was made, where the Engliſh ladies were honorablie interteined, according to the dignitie of the perſons, and to the contentment of them that had no dregs of malice or miſlikinge ſettled in their harts. For vnpoſſible it is, that in a great multitude méeting togither, though all about one matter, be it of pleaſure and delight, there ſhould not be one of a repugnant diſpoſition, and (though not apparantlie perceiued traueling with grudge) malignant mind; as we ſée ſome apples vnperiſhed and otherſome wormeaten, albeit one bough beare them, and one trée giue them ſap.

Abr. Fl. ex Edw. Hall in H.8. fol. xlviij.

¶ On the tueſdaie being the tenth daie of October, all the Engliſhmen, except a few that were officers

English gentlemen diſcharged of their places and offices vnder the quéene.

cers with the ſaid quéene, were diſcharged; which was a great ſorrow for them, for ſome had ſerued hir long in hope of preferment, & ſome that had honeſt roomes left them to ſerue hir, and now they were without ſeruice, which cauſed them to take thought, in ſo much ſome died by the waie returning, and ſome fell mad, but there was no remedie. After the Engliſh lords had doone their commiſſion, the French king willed them to take no longer paine, and ſo gaue to them good rewards; and they tooke their leaue of the quéene and returned. Then the Dolphin of France called lord Francis duke of Valois, and by his wife duke of Britaine, for the more honour of this mariage before the Engliſhmen departed from Abuile, cauſed a ſolemne iuſts to be proclamed, which ſhould be kept at Paris in the moneth of Nouember next inſuing.

The Dolphin cauſeth ſolemne iuſts to be proclamed at Paris.

Namelie, that he with his nine aids ſhould anſwer all commers, being gentlemen of name and of armes. Firſt to run fiue courſes at the tilt with péeces of aduantage, & alſo fiue courſes at randon with ſharpe ſpeares, and twelue ſtrokes with ſharpe ſwords; and that doone, he and his aids to fight at the barriers with all gentlemen of name and of armes. Firſt ſix foines with hand ſpeares, and after that eight ſtrokes to the moſt aduantage if the ſpeare ſo long held, and after that twelue ſtrokes with the ſword: and if anie man be vnhorſſed or felled with fighting on foot, then his horſſe and armour to be rendered to the officers of armes: and euerie man of this chalenge muſt ſet vp his armes and name vpon an arch triumphant, which ſhalbe made at the place where the iuſtes ſhalbe, and further ſhall write to what point he will anſwer, to one or to all.

English nobilitie craue licence of the king to go ouer to the iuſts.

When this proclamation was reported in England by the noble men that returned from the mariage: the duke of Suffolke, the marqueſſe Dorſet, and his foure bretheren, the lord Clinton, ſir Edward Neuill, ſir Giles Capell, Thomas Cheneie, and other ſued to the king to be at the chalenge, which requeſt he gratiouſlie granted. Then the lords and knights prepared all things neceſſarie for their enterpriſe, and ſhipped there horſſes and harneſſe, and did ſo much by iourneie, that they came to Paris at the end of October, which were hartilie welcomed of the king and the Dolphin: but moſt of all of the French quéene which then laie at ſaint Deniſe, and was not yet crowned nor entered into Paris. The Dolphin deſired the duke of Suffolke and the lord marqueſſe Dorſet, to be two of his immediat aids, which thereto aſſented.

Decrées for the ſaid iuſts.

Therefore was erected an arch of widneſſe at the tornels beſide the ſtréet of ſaint Anthonie, directlie before the baſtell, on the which were ſet foure targets or ſcutchions, the one ſiluer, and he that ſet his name vnder that ſhield, to run at tilt according to the articles. He that put his name vnder the golden target ſhould run with the ſharpe ſpeares and fight with ſharpe ſwords. They that put their names to the blacke ſhield, ſhould fight on foot with ſpeares and ſwords for the one hand. And he that touched the tawnie ſhield ſhould caſt a ſpeare on foot with a target on his arme, and after to fight with a two hand ſword. On this arch aboue ſtood the armes of the king & the quéene, and beneath them ſtood the armes of the Dolphin and his aids, and vnderneath ſtood the foure ſcutchions that you haue heard of, and vnder them all the armes and names of ſuch as ſet their names to anie of the ſaid foure ſcutchions.

The ladie Marie crowned quéene of France.

While all theſe things were preparing, the ladie Marie of England the fift daie of Nouember, then being ſundaie, was with great ſolemnitie crowned quéene of France in the monaſterie of S. Deniſe, and the Dolphin all the ſeaſon held the crowne ouer hir head, bicauſe it was of great weight to hir gréeuance, at which coronation were the lords of England, all according to their degrées well interteined. On mondaie the ſixt daie of Nouember, the ſaid quéene was receiued into the citie of Paris after the order that followeth. Firſt the gard of the citie met with hir without ſaint Deniſe all in coats of goldſmiths worke, with ſhips gilt, and after them met hir all the prieſts and religious, eſtéemed to be thrée thouſand. The quéene was in a chaire couered about (but not ouer hir perſon) in white cloth of gold; the horſſes that drew it, in cloth of gold; on hir head a coronall all of great pearles, hir necke and breſt full of iewels.

She is receiued into Paris.

Before hir went a gard of Almans after their faſhion, and after them all noblemen, as the Dolphin, the duke of Alanſon, the duke of Burbon, the duke of Vandoſme, the duke of Longeuile, and the duke of Suffolke, the marqueſſe Dorſet, fiue cardinals, and a great number of eſtates; about hir perſon rode the kings gard, which were Scots. Thus was this quéene receiued into Paris, and ſo conueied to the cathedrall church, and there offered, & from thence to the palace, where ſhe offered at the holie chappell; and from thence ſhe went to hir lodging for that night: for whome was prouided a great ſupper, and the heralds cried a largeſſe, and had to them giuen a ſhip of ſiluer and gilt, and other plate, to the value of two hundred marks, and after ſupper began danſing and paſtime. On the morow began the iuſts, and the Dolphin with his aids entered the field, the apparell and bards were cloth of gold, cloth of ſiluer, and crimſin veluet kanteled togither all in one ſute, they ſhewed themſelues before the king and quéene, who were on a goodlie ſtage, and the quéene ſtood ſo that all men might ſée hir, and wondered at hir beautie: but the king was féeble & laie on a couch for weakeneſſe.

The heralds reward.

The time how lõg theſe iuſts laſted and the maner therof.

Then entered the counter part by a raile for combring the place. Theſe iuſts continued thrée daies, in the which were anſwered thrée hundred and fiue men of armes, and euerie man ran fiue courſes, and with ſharpe ſpeares; diuerſe were ſlaine & not ſpoken of. At the randon and turneie the duke of Suffolke hurt a gentleman, ſo that he was like to die. The Marques Dorſet ſtroke monſieur Grue an Albanois with his ſpeare, perſed his headpéece, and put him in ieopardie. The duke of Suffolke in the turneie ouerthrew a man of armes, horſſe & man; and ſo did the lord Marqueſſe another, and yet the Frenchmen would in no wiſe praiſe them. At this turneie the Dolphin was hurt in the hand, ſo that he could not performe his chalenge at the barriers, and put one of his aid in his roome. The next daie after began the fight at the barriers. And bicauſe the Dolphin was not preſent, the duke of Suffolke and the lord Marques Dorſet that daie began the field, and tooke the barriers with ſpeares in his hand abiding all commers.

The duke of Suffolke incountreth a tall and ſtrong Alman.

The Dolphin brought a man ſecretlie, which in all the court of France was the talleſt & the ſtrongeſt man, and he was an Alman, and put him in the place of an other perſon to haue had the duke of Suffolke rebuked. The ſame great Alman came to the bars fiercelie with face hid, bicauſe he would not be knowne, and bare his ſpeare to the duke of Suffolke with all his ſtrength, and the duke him receiued and for all his ſtrength put him by ſtrong ſtrokes from the barriers, and with the but end of the ſpeare ſtrake the Alman that he ſtaggered: but for all that the Alman ſtrake ſtronglie and hardlie at the duke, and the iudges ſuffered manie more ſtrokes to be foughten than were appointed; but when they ſaw the Alman réele and ſtagger, then they let fall the raile betwéene them. The lord marqueſſe Dorſet at the ſame time, euen at the ſame barre fought with a gentleman of France that he loſt his ſpeare, and in maner withdrew. When the raile was let fall, theſe two noble men put vp their viſers and tooke aire, and with ſwords, the points and edges abated, they came to the barriers.

The duke foiles the Alman.

The Alman fought ſore with the duke, which imagined that he was a perſon ſet on for the nonce, but the duke by pure ſtrength tooke him about the necke, and pomcled him ſo about the head that the bloud iſſued out of his noſe, and then they were parted, and the Alman was conueied by the Dolphin leaſt he ſhould be knowne. Theſe two noblemen of England that daie fought valiantlie diuerſe feats, and the Frenchmen likewiſe noblie them defended. But it happened the lord Marqueſſe on a time to put for his aid his yoongeſt brother called the lord Edward Greie of the age of ninteene yeare, and to him was put a gentleman of France of great ſtature and ſtrength, to the intent to plucke him ouer the barres, but yet the yoong lord was of ſuch ſtrength, power, & policie, that he ſo ſtroke his aduerſarie that he diſarmd him, all the face bare. Thus were theſe enterpriſes finiſhed to the laud of all parties, & the Engliſhmen receiued much honor and no ſpot of rebuke, yet they were priuilie ſet at & in manie ieopardies.

The yoong lord Greies proweſſe.

A deſcription of the pompe and brauerie in apparell at this ſolemne tilt.

For the declaration of this triumph, he that ſaw it can tell how goodlie the courſers trotted, bounded, and quicklie turned: how valiantlie the men of armes behaued themſelues, and how the duke of Burbons band was apparrelled and baſſed in tawnie veluet, and cloth of ſiluer cloudie, the band of the earle of ſaint Paule apparrelled and barded in purple veluet all to cut on purple ſattin, the infant of Arragon, ſonne to Frederike laſt king of Naples, and his band all in cloth of gold and ſiluer paled. This lord was but yoong, but yet verie toward. The duke of Vandoſme and his band in cloth of gold and plunket veluet. The Dolphin and his aids were euerie daie new apparrelled at his coſt, one daie in ſiluer and gold, another in crimſin veluet and yellow veluet, and another daie in white veluet and greene, ſome daie mixed with ſattin, ſome daie embrodered, ſome daie pounced with gold, and ſo euerie daie in change as the workers fantaſie could deuiſe, but the Engliſhmen had euer on their apparrell red croſſes to be knowne for loue of their countrie.

At this triumph the countie Galeas came into the place on a genet trapped in blew ſatten, and he himſelfe likewiſe apparrelled, and ran a courſe with a ſpeare, which was at the head fiue inches on euerie ſide ſquare, that is twentie inches about, and at the butt nine inches ſquare, that is ſix and thirtie inches, this ſpeare was maſſie timber, and yet for all that he ran cleane with it a long courſe and ſlightlie auoided it to his great honour. Alſo there was another gentleman called Anthonie Bounarme, which came into the field all armed, and on his bodie brought in eighteen ſpeares, that is to wit, three ſpeares ſet in euerie ſtirrop forward, and vnder euerie thigh two ſpeares vpward, and vnder his left arme was one ſpeare backward, and the tenth in his hand; and when he came before the queene, he let his horſſe run, and neuer ſtopped till he had taken euerie ſpeare after oother and broken it on the ground, and he neuer ſtopped his horſſe till all were broken. This gentleman was highlie praiſed, and ſo he was worthie. When all this great triumph was doone, the lords of England tooke their leaue, and were highlie thanked of the king, queene, Dolphin, and all the lords, and ſo departed and came into England before Chriſtmas. ¶In Nouember the queene was deliuered of a prince which liued not long after.]

Touching the accord of peace betweene England and France, you ſhall heare the report of Guicciardine, which to this place maketh paſſage to knowledge, as oile giueth maintenance of light to the lampe. [At the firſt opening of this practiſe for peace, there fell out manie difficulties, for that the king of England demanded Bullongne in Picardie, with a great ſumme of monie: but at laſt all the differences fell vpon the towne of Tornaie, the king of England ſtriuing to reteine it, and the French obiecting ſome difficultie: in ſo much as the king of England diſpatched in poſt to the French king the biſhop of Tricaro, whome he charged, without imparting in what nature of particularitie conſiſted the difficultie, to declare to the king from him, that in regard of ſo great a benefit, he ſhould not ſtand vpon ſo manie ſubtile difficulties, but to conſider that in a prince reaſon ſhuld beare more imperie than paſſion.

Abr. Fl. ex Guic. pag. 675.

Difficulties about the practiſe of peace.

The French king, bicauſe he would neither doo wrong to his crowne, nor ill content his people, the towne of Tornaie being verie noble and loiall to the crowne of France, cauſed the matter to be debated in full councell, wherein was an aſſiſtance of the principals of his court, who aduiſed him with one voice to imbrace peace, yea vnder the condition offered. And yet in that time the king catholike did what he could to breake it, offering the king manie plots and deuiſes, but ſpeciallie to miniſter to him all his means and fauours to conquer the duchie of Millan. But the anſwer being returned into England, that the French king ſtood content with the reſolution of Tornaie, the peace ſucceeded & was concluded in the beginning of Auguſt betweene the two kings during their liues, & a yeare after their death.

The French councell accord for peace.

In the capitulation it was expreſſed, that Tornaie ſhould remaine to the king of England, to whom the French king ſhould paie ſix hundred thouſand crownes, and that in ſuch ſort of diſtribution, that the French king ſhould make paiment of an hundred thouſand franks euerie yeare, vntill the full paiment was ſatiſfied: that they ſhould be bound to defend their eſtates mutuallie and reciprocallie with ten thouſand footmen if the warre went by land, and with ſix thouſand onelie if the warre were made by ſea: that the French king ſhould be bound to ſerue the king of England in all his affaires with twelue hundred lances, and the king of England likewiſe to miniſter to his ſeruices with ten thouſand footmen: the expenſes to be defraied by either of them that ſhould haue need of the men: both the one and the other of them named the Scotiſh king, the archduke, & the empire: but Ceſar and the king catholike were not named: the Swizzers had a nomination, but it bare a condition, that whoſoeuer would defend againſt the French king, the eſtate of Millan, Genes, or Aſt, ſhould be excluded out of the nomination.

The contents of the capitulation for peace.

This peace, which was made with a woonderfull readineſſe, was confirmed by the marriage of the kings ſiſter of England with the French king, vnder condition, that he ſhould acknowledge to haue receiued foure hundred thouſand crownes for hir dowrie: the contract or handfaſtings were made in England, where the king catholiks ambaſſador was not in preſence, for the great hatred the king of England bare to the king his maiſter. And euen vpon the concluſion and reſolution of this peace, came to the court of France the inſtrument of ratification which Ceſar had made, togither with his commiſſion, and the king catholiks, for concluſion of the marriage that was ſolicited betweene Ferdinando de Auſtrich and the ſecond daughter of France not yet foure yeares of age: but the practiſe of that marriage vaniſhed preſentlie by reaſon of the peace that was now eſtabliſhed: and the French king to ſatiſfie better the king of England, gaue order that the duke of Suffolke, capteine generall of the lanceknights that were in his paie, ſhould depart the dominions of France, in whome the honours and re-

Richard Hun hanged in Lollards tower. See Edw. Hall in H.8. fol. l.ij. &c.

In December, one Richard Hun a merchant tailor of London, that was laid in Lollards tower by commandement of the biſhop of London, called Richard Fitz James, and his chancellor doctor Horſſie, was found dead, hanging by the necke in a girdle of ſilke within the ſaid tower. That ye maie vnderſtand the cauſe of his impriſonment, the beginning was this. The ſame Hun had a child that died in his houſe, being an infant; the curat claimed the bearing ſhéet for a mortuarie. Hun anſwered, that the infant had no propertie in the ſhéet. Wherevpon, the préeſt aſcited him in the ſpirituall court. He taking to him counſell, ſued the curat in a premunire: and when this was knowne, meanes was found, that Hun being accuſed of hereſie, was attached, and laid in Lollards tower, where he was found dead, as ye haue heard. Much adoo was made about his death, for the biſhop and the chancellor ſaid, that he hanged himſelfe.

Huns death lamented, and for what cauſes.

But manie of the temporaltie affirmed, that he was murthered, greatlie lamenting the caſe: for he was well beloued, and namelie of the poore, which cried out againſt them that were ſuſpected to haue made him awaie. He was a good almes-man, and greatly reléeued the néedie. The queſtion of his death was ſo farre put forth, that vpon the ſuſpicion he ſhould be murthered, twelue men were charged before the coroner. After they had taken view of the bodie, the ſame was burned in Smithfield by the biſhops appointment: notwithſtanding the coroners queſt indicted doctor Horſſie, with one Iohn Spalding, otherwiſe called Belringer, and Charles Ioſeph the ſummoner of the murthered; howbeit, vpon his arreignement, through great ſute and corruption of monie (as manie iudged) the kings attorneie declared doctor Horſſie not to be giltie.

Edw. Hall. in H.8. fol. lv, vlj. A gorgious & rich maſke wherein the king was an actor.

This Chriſtmaſſe on Newyeares night, the king, the duke of Suffolke, & two other were in mantels of cloath of ſiluer lined with blew veluet, the ſiluer was pounſt in letters that the veluet might be ſéene thorough, the mantels had great capes like to the Portingall ſlops, and all their hoſen, dublets, and coats were of the ſame faſhion cut, and of the ſame ſtuffe. With them were foure ladies in gowns, after the faſhon of Sauoie, of blew veluet, lined with cloath of gold, the veluet all cut, and mantels like tipets knit togither all of ſiluer, and on their heads bonets of burned gold, the foure torch-bearers were in ſattin white and blew. This ſtrange apparell pleaſed much euerie perſon, and in eſpeciall the quéene. And thus theſe foure lords & foure ladies came into the quéenes chamber with great light of torches, and danſed a great ſeaſon, and then put off their viſors, and were all well knowne, and then the quéene hartilie thanked the kings grace for hir goodlie paſtime and diſport.

A tent of cloth of gold with a ſhew of armed men.

Likewiſe on the Twelfe night, the king and the quéene came into the hall of Gréenewich, & ſuddenlie entered a tent of cloath of gold, and before the tent ſtood foure men of armes, armed at all points with ſwords in their hands; and ſuddenlie with noiſe of trumpets entered foure other perſons all armed, and ran to the other foure, and there was a great and a fierce fight. And ſuddenlie came out of a place like a wood eight wildmen, all apparelled in gréene moſſe, made with ſleued ſilke, with ouglie weapons & terrible viſages, and there fought with the knights eight to eight; and after long fighting, the armed knights droue the wild men out of their places, and followed the chaſe out of the hall: and when they were departed, the tent opened, and there came out ſix lords and ſix ladies richlie apparelled, and danſed a great time: when they had danſed their pleaſure, they entered the tent againe, which was conueied out of the hall; then the king & the quéene were ſerued with a right ſumptuous banket.

The king and the marqueſſe Dorſet make a challenge at iuſts.

On the third day of Februarie, the king made a ſolemne iuſts, and he and the marqueſſe Dorſet would anſwer all commers, their apparell and bards were of blew veluet and cloath of ſiluer, all to cut in ſubtill knots, richlie embrodered, all the ſeruitours in white & blew ſilke. The counterpart, which were foureteene in number, richlie apparelled in veluet, cloath of gold, and embroderie, euerie man after his owne deuiſe. The king was that daie highlie to be praiſed, for he brake thrée and twentie ſpeares beſide atteints and bare downe to ground a man of armes and his horſſe: the lord marqueſſe and all other did valiantlie, and had much praiſe, for euerie man did paſſing well, which is ſeldome ſéene in ſuch a caſe. But the king for a ſuertie excéeded all other.

A parlement wherein ſir Thomas Neuill was prolocutor or ſpeaker.

On the fourth daie of October, the king remoued to Lambeth, and on the morow began the high court of parlement, ſir Thomas Neuill was then ſpeaker. In this parlement were diuerſe acts made, but in eſpeciall two, which were much ſpoken of: the one was the act of apparell, and the other act for labourers: of theſe two acts was much communing, and much buſineſſe aroſe. For the labourers would in no wiſe labour by the daie, but all by taſke & in great, and therefore much trouble fell in the countrie, and in eſpeciall in harueſt time, for then husbandmen could ſkarſe get workemen to helpe in their harueſt. This parlement continued vntill Eaſter, in the which diuerſe ſubſidies were granted to the king, toward his great coſts and charges that he had béene at in his viage roiall to France.

Doctor Benbrike archbiſhop of yorke and cardinall poiſoned at Rome.

After Eaſter the ninetéenth daie of the moneth of Aprill, the king deliting to ſet forth yoong gentlemen, called Nicholas Carew, and Francis Brian, and cauſed diuerſe other yoong gentlemen to be on the counter part, and lent to them horſſe and harneſſe to incourage all youth to ſéeke déeds of armes. This yeare died at Rome by poiſon (as was reported) the archbiſhop of Yorke and cardinall, called doctor Benbrike, who was the kings ambaſſadour there: this was a wiſeman and of a iollie courage. The king then gaue the ſaid archbiſhoprike to Thomas Wolſie, then biſhop of Lincolne, who at that time bare all the rule about the king, and what he ſaid was obeied in all places. Now when he was once archbiſhop, he ſtudied daie and night how to be a cardinall, and cauſed the king, and the French king to write to Rome for him, and at their requeſts he obteined his purpoſe, as you ſhall heare afterward.

The K. in perſon purpoſed to paſſe the ſeas to ſée the French king his brother.

At this time was much communing, and verelie (as it appeared) it was intended, that the king in perſon would paſſe the ſea to Calis, and there on the marches of the ſame, the French king and quéene to come and ſée the king their brother: and for the ſame tournie manie coſtlie works were wrought, much rich apparell prouided, and much preparation made againſt the next ſpring: but death which is the laſt end of all things let this tournie. For before the next ſpring the French king died at the citie of Paris, the firſt daie of Ianuarie, when he had béene married to the faire ladie Marie of England foure ſcore and two daies [whom he ſo feruentlie loued, that he gaue himſelfe ouer to behold too much hir excellent beautie bearing then but eightéene yeares of age, nothing conſidering the proportion of his owne yeares, nor his decaied complexion; ſo that he fell into the rage of a feauer, which drawing to it a ſudden flur, ouercame in one inſtant the life, that nature gaue ouer

The variableneſſe of his fortune.

For, riſing from a ſmall duke of Orleance with great happineſſe to the crowne, and that by the death of Charles yonger than he, and two of his ſonnes, he conquered with a verie great facilitie the duchie of Millan and the kingdome of Naples, and almoſt all the reſidue of the regions of Italie, being gouerned for manie yeares by his direction: he recouered with a verie great proſperitie, the ſtate of Genes that was in rebellion: and vanquiſhed with no leſſe glorie the armies of the Venetians, being in perſon at both thoſe victories. But on the other ſide, euen when he was in his youth and beſt diſpoſition of bodie, he was then conſtreined by king Lewes the eleuenth to marrie his daughter that was both barren and deformed; and yet could neuer get the good will nor countenance of his father in law.

And after his death, ſuch was the greatneſſe of the ladie of Burbon, that he could neuer get the inſtitution of the new king, being then in minoritie, being almoſt compelled to retire himſelfe into Britaine: where being taken in the battell of ſaint Aubin, he liued two yeares in the calamitie of a priſoner. To theſe afflictions maie be added the ſiege and famine of Nauarre, the manie diſcomfits he had in the realme of Naples, the loſſe of the eſtate of Millan, Genes, and all the townes which he had taken from the Venetians: and laſtlie the greeuous warre he had in France againſt verie mightie enimies, his eies beholding into what lamentable perils his realme was brought: neuertheleſſe, before he died it ſeemed he had conquered all his aduerſities, and fortune ſhewed good tokens of hir reconcilement, both for that he had defended his kingdome againſt mightie enimies, and alſo eſtabliſhed a perpetuall peace and aliance with the king of England, with whome by how much his amitie was great and aſſured, by ſo much it gaue him hope to be able to reconquer the duchie of Millan.]

The duke of Suffolke and others ſent into France to bring the French queene into England. Abr.Fl. ex Guic.pag.685. Francis the firſt coms to the crowne.

The king of England being aduertiſed of the French kings death, cauſed a ſolemne obſequie to be kept for him in the cathedrall church of S. Paule, with a coſtlie hearſe: at which manie nobles were preſent. After this he ſent a letter to comfort the queene his ſiſter, requiring to know hir pleaſure, whether ſhe would continue ſtill in France, or returne into England. And when he was aduertiſed of hir mind (which was to returne into England) the duke of Suffolke, ſir Richard Wingfield deputie of Calis, and doctor Weſt, with a goodlie band of gentlemen and yeomen, all in blacke, were ſent into France, and comming to Paris, were well receiued of the new French king, Francis the firſt of that name [who was the next heire male of the bloud roiall and of the ſame line of the dukes of Orleance: he was preferred to the ſucceſſion of the kingdome before the daughters of the dead king by vertue and diſpoſition of the law Salike, a law verie ancient in the realme of France, which excludeth from the roiall dignitie all women; ſo long as there is anie iſſue male of the ſame line.

His praiſeworthie properties.

The world had ſuch a hope in his vertues, and ſuch an opinion of his magnanimitie, and ſuch a conceipt of his iudgement and wit, that euerie one confeſſed, that of verie long time there was none raiſed vp to the crowne with a greater expectation. He was made the more agreeable to the fanſies of men, by the conſideration of his age bearing then but two and twentie yeares; his excellent feiture and proportion of bodie, his great liberalitie, and generall humanitie, togither with the ripe knowledge he had in manie things. But ſpeciallie he pleaſed greatlie the nobilitie, to whome he transferred manie ſingular and great fauours. Vnto this king Francis de Angouleſme did the foreſaid Engliſh nobilitie declare the effect of their commiſſion, which was to receiue the queene Dowager, according to the couenants of the marriage.]

The councell of France (by the kings appointment) aſſigned forth hir dowrie, and the duke of Suffolke put in officers, and then was the queene deliuered to the duke by indenture, who behaued himſelfe ſo towards hir, that he obteined hir good will to be hir huſband. It was thought, that when the king created him duke of Suffolke, he perceiued his ſiſters good will towards the ſaid duke; and that he meant then to haue beſtowed hir vpon him; but that a better offer came in the waie. But howſoeuer it was now, he wan hir loue; ſo as by hir conſent, he wrote to the king hir brother, meekelie beſeeching him of pardon in his requeſt, which was humblie to deſire him of his good will and contentation.

The duke of Suffolke winneth the good will of the queene Dowager of France. Polydor. Edw.Hall.

The king at the firſt ſtaid, but after long ſute, and ſpeciallie by meane of the French queene hir ſelfe, and other the dukes freends, it was agreed that the duke ſhould bring hir into England vnmarried, and at his returne to marrie hir in England: but for doubt of change he married hir ſecretlie in Paris at the houſe of Clugnie, as was ſaid. After he had receiued hir with hir dower appointed, & all hir apparell, iewels, and houſhold ſtuffe deliuered, they tooke leaue of the new French king, and ſo paſſing thorough France, came to Calis; where ſhe was honourablie interteined, and after openlie married with great honour vnto the ſaid duke of Suffolke. Doctor Weſt (as then nominated biſhop of Elie) remained behind at Paris, to go through with the full concluſion of a new league betwixt the king of England, and the new French king.

Anno Reg. 7. The French queene married to the duke of Suffolke.

¶ The court lieng at Greenewich, the king and the queene, accompanied with manie lords and ladies, road to the high ground of ſhooters hill to take the open aire; and as they paſſed by the waie, they eſpied a companie of tall yeomen, clothed all in greene with greene hoods, and bowes and arrowes, to the number of two hundred. Then one of them, which called himſelfe Robin hood, came to the king, deſiring him to ſee his men ſhoot; and the king was content. Then he whiſteled, and all the two hundred archers ſhot and loſed at once; and then he whiſteled againe, and they likewiſe ſhot againe; their arrowes whiſteled by craft of the head, ſo that the noiſe was ſtrange and great, and much pleaſed the king, the queene, and all the companie. All theſe archers were of the kings gard, and had thus apparelled themſelues to make ſolace to the king.

Edw.Hall in Hen.8.fol.lvj. Robin hood and his two hundred men preſent themſelues to the king & queene in a maigame.

Then Robin hood deſired the king and queene to come into the greene wood, and to ſee how the outlawes liued. The king demanded of the queene & hir ladies, if they durſt aduenture to go into the wood with ſo manie outlawes. Then the queene ſaid, that if it pleaſed him ſhe was content. Then the hornes blew, till they came to the wood vnder ſhooters hill, & there was an arbor made of boughes with a hall, and a great chamber; and an inner chamber verie well made and couered with floures & ſweet hearbs, which the king much praiſed. Then ſaid Robin hood; Sir, outlawes breakefaſts is veniſon, and therefore you muſt be content with ſuch fare as we vſe. Then the king and queene ſat downe, and were ſerued with veniſon and wine by Robin hood and his men, to their great contentation.

Then the king departed and his companie, and Robin hood and his men them conducted; and as they

At this maieng was a great number of people to behold it to their great ſolace and comfort.

The king and certeine nobles ran their horſſes volant.

The ſame after noone, the king, the duke of Suffolke, the marqueſſe Dorſet, and the earle of Eſſex, their bardes and baſes of greene veluet and cloth of gold, came into the field on great courſers, on whome waited diuerſe gentlemen in ſilke of the ſame colour. On the other ſide entered ſixteene lords and gentlemen, all apparelled richlie after their deuiſes, and ſo valiantlie they ran their courſes appointed: & after that, they ran volant one as faſt as he might ouertake another, which was a goodlie ſight to ſee: and when all was doone they departed, and went to a goodlie banket. This ſummer the king tooke his progreſſe weſtward, and viſited his townes and caſtels there, and heard the complaints of his poore communaltie; and euer as he road he hunted and liberallie departed with veniſon.]

The archbiſhop of Yorke elected cardinall.

A parlement at Weſtminſter.

This yeare in September, the king being at his manour of Oking, after his returne from his progreſſe which he made that yeare into the weſt parts, the archbiſhop of Yorke came thither to him. Whileſt he ſoiourned there, a letter was brought to the ſaid archbiſhop from Rome, aduertiſing him that he was elected cardinall, which letter incontinentlie he ſhewed to the king, diſabling himſelfe in words, though his intent was otherwiſe; and ſo the king did incourage him, and willed him to take that dignitie vpon him, and called him from thenſeforth my lord cardinall. But his hat, bull, nor other ceremonies were not yet come. In Nouember, the king aſſembled his high court of parlement at Weſtminſter, wherein, diuerſe acts made in the ſirt yeare were reformed and altered, and eſpeciallie the act of apparell, and the act of labourers, as by the booke of ſtatutes more plainelie appeereth.

Cardinall Wolſie made lord chancellor.

Edw. Hall in Hen. 8. fol. lvij.

At the end of this parlement, doctor Warham archbiſhop of Canturburie, and as then lord chancellour, perceiuing how the new lord cardinall medled further in his office of chancellorſhip than he could well ſuffer, except he ſhould aduenture the kings diſpleaſure; for this and for other conſiderations gaue vp his office of chancellor into the kings hands, and deliuered to him the great ſeale, which incontinentlie was deliuered by the king vnto the lord cardinall, and ſo was he made lord chancellor. He was no ſooner in that office, but he directed forth commiſſions into euerie ſhire, for the execution of the ſtatutes of apparell and labourers, and in all his dooings ſhewed himſelfe more loftie and preſumptuous than became him. ¶ And he himſelfe on a daie called a gentleman named Simon Fitz Richard, and tooke from him an old iacket of crimſin veluet and diuerſe brooches, which extreame dooing cauſed him greatlie to be hated: and by his example manie cruell officers for malice euill intreated diuerſe of the kings ſubiects, in ſo much that one Shinning, maior of Rocheſter, ſet a yong man on the pillorie for wearing of a riuen or gathered ſhirt.]

In the end of Nouember, the cardinals hat was ſent into England, which the gentlemen of Kent receiued, and brought to London with ſuch triumph, as though the greateſt prince in Europe had beene come to viſit the king [much like that of the people at Rome in the yeare 1515, when were ſeene in the ſaid citie two elephants, a nature of creatures which happilie had not beene ſeene in Italie ſince the triumphs and publike plaies of the Romans. Gu. Ha.

No leſſe adoo was there at the bringing of the cardinals hat, who on a ſundaie (in S. Peters church at Weſtminſter) receiued the ſame, with the habit, the piller, and other ſuch tokens of a cardinall. And now that he was thus a perfect cardinall, he looked aboue all eſtates, which purchaſed him great hatred and diſdaine on all ſides. For his ambition was no leſſe diſcernable to the eies of the people, than the ſunne in the firmament in a cleere and cloudleſſe ſummer daie; which procured againſt him the more hatred among the noble and popular ſort; for that his baſe linage was both noted and knowne, in ſo much that his inſatiable aſpiring to ſupereminent degrees of dignitie kindled manifeſt contempt and deteſtation among ſuch as pretended a countenance of good will and honorable dutie vnto him, though in verie deed the ſame parties (if freelie and without checke they might haue ſpoken their fanſie) would haue intituled him a proud popeling; as led with the like ſpirit of ſwelling ambition, wherwith the rable of popes haue beene bladder like puffed and blowne vp: a diuelliſh and luciferian vice, in the iudgements of men abhominable, and in the ſight of God moſt damnable; as the poet in this diſtichon trulie witneſſeth:

Dij ſuperi faſtum, faſtum mortales abhorrent,
Hæc homini leuitas diſplicet atque Deo.

The lord Mountioy made gouernour of Tornaie.

A mutinie amongſt the ſoldiers at Tornaie.

After the end of the parlement, ſir Edward Poinings laboured to be diſcharged of the keeping of Tornaie, bicauſe he could not haue health there: and ſo he was diſcharged, and ſir William Blunt lord Mountioy was ſent thither to haue that roome, and for marſhall was appointed ſir Sampſon Norton. Immediatlie vpon their comming thither chanced a great riot, raiſed by the ſouldiers, ſo that to appeaſe them, the lord Mountioy was put in ieopardie of his life. In concluſion, to quiet them ſir Sampſon Norton was baniſhed the towne for euer, but what the matter was I haue not found rehearſed by anie writer. After that the citie was appeaſed, and euerie thing thought to be forgotten, diuerſe of the offendors were executed, and diuerſe baniſhed the towne, ſome fled, and were confined both out of England and the towne.

The king kept his Chriſtmaſſe at Eltham.

Courtlie paſtime on the Twelf night.

After the parlement was ended, the king kept a ſolemne Chriſtmaſſe at his manor of Eltham; and on the Twelfe night in the hall was made a goodlie caſtell, woonderouſlie ſet out; and in it certeine ladies and knights, and when the king and queene were ſet, in came other knights and aſſailed the caſtell, where manie a good ſtripe was giuen; and at the laſt the aſſailants were beaten awaie. And then iſſued out knights and ladies out of the caſtell, which ladies were rich and ſtrangelie diſguiſed: for all their apparell was in braids of gold, fret with mouing ſpangls of ſiluer and gilt, ſet on crimſin ſattin looſe and not faſtned: the mens apparell of the ſame ſute made like Iulis of Hungarie; and the ladies heads and bodies were after the faſhion of Amſterdam. And when the danſing was doone, the banket was ſerued in of two hundred diſhes, with great plentie to euerie bodie.]

The birth of Margaret daughter to the queene of Scots, and of the earle Angus afterwards maried to the earle of Lenox.

This yeere the new league accorded betwixt king Henrie & the French king was openlie proclaimed through the citie of London by a trumpet. Margaret queene of Scots eldeſt ſiſter to the K. came this yeere into England, & at Harbottell caſtell was deliuered of a daughter, begot by hir ſecond huſband the lord Archembald Dowglaſſe earle of Angus. This daughter was called at the fontſtone after hir mother Margaret. The ſaid queene after the death of hir late huſband king Iames married the ſaid earle of Angus, without conſent of hir brother king Henrie, or other of hir friends; cheeflie (as ſome haue thought) for hir ſonnes ſake, doubting if ſhe ſhould not haue taken hir choiſe at home, ſhe ſhould haue maried in ſome other place, and ſo haue beene ſequeſtred from hir ſonne, whoſe bringing vp apperteined now cheeflie vnto hir. But ſuch contention roſe ſhortlie after in Scotland amongſt the lords, that both ſhe and hir huſband were glad to ſeeke ſuccor in England at hir brothers hand, who was contented to releeue them, aſſigning them the ſaid caſtell of Harbottell to lie in, with apparell and all other neceſſaries, till his further pleaſure ſhould be knowne. The eighteenth daie of Februarie this yeere, the ladie Marie, daughter to king Henrie the eight was borne at Greenwich. This was ſhe that afterwards was queene of this realme, & married the king of Spaine. This yeere alſo died the king of Aragon, father to the queene; for whom was kept a ſolemne obſequie in the cathedrall church of Paules.

Edw. Hall.

The queene of Scots and the earle of Angus hir huſband come into England.

1518

The birth of ladie Marie the kings daughter, afterwards queene.

Anno Reg. 8.

The king ſendeth for the queene of Scots and hir huſband to his court.

As ye haue heard the laſt yeere how the queene of Scots with hir huſband was come for ſuccor into England, and laie at Harbottell in Northumberland, till the kings pleaſure was to ſend for them; ſo now know you that he (like a naturall brother) ſent for hir and hir huſband to come to his court for their ſolace: for the which kindneſſe the earle humblie thanked the king, and promiſed to giue his attendance on the queene his wife to the court. Wherevpon the king ſent William Blacknall eſquier, clerke of his ſpicerie with ſiluer veſſell, plate, and other things neceſſarie for the conueiance of hir, and ſent to hir all manner of officers for hir eſtate conuenient. Now when ſhe was readie to depart, ſhe aſked for hir huſband, but he was departed into Scotland, and left hir alone; nothing remembring his promiſe. Which ſudden departing much made hir to muſe: howbeit, the lords of England greatlie incouraged hir to keepe hir promiſe with the king hir brother.

The queene of Scots comming to London, and ſo to Greenewich.

Three queenes in the Engliſh court at once.

Now when ſhe was ſomewhat appeaſed, ſhe ſet forward; and in euerie towne ſhe was well receiued, & ſo on the third day of Maie ſhe made hir entrie into London, riding on a white palfreie (which the queene of England had ſent vnto hir) behind ſir Thomas Parre richlie beſeene, and with a great companie of lords and ladies ſhe rode through the citie to Bainards caſtell, and from thence ſhe was conueied to Greenwich, and there receiued ioiouſlie of the king, the queene, the French queene hir ſiſter, and highlie was ſhe feaſted. And when the king heard that the earle of Angus hir huſband was departed, he ſaid it was doone like a Scot. This queene ſometime was at the court, and ſometime at Bainards caſtell, and ſo ſhe continued in England all this yeere.

The king for the honour of his ſiſter the nineteenth and twentith daie of Maie prepared two ſolemne daies of iuſts: and the king himſelfe, and the duke of Suffolke, the earle of Eſſex, and Nicholas Carew eſquier, tooke on them to anſwer all commers. The apparell of them and their horſſes was blacke veluet, couered all ouer with branches of honie-ſuckles of fine flat gold of damaſke of looſe worke, euerie leafe of the branch mouing, the embroderie was verie cunning and ſumptuous. On the king was attending in one ſute on horſſebacke, the lord marqueſſe Dorſet, the earle of Surrie, the lord Aburgauennie, the lord Haſtings, ſir Iohn Pechie, the lord Ferrers, ſir William Fitz Williams, and twelue other knights. All theſe were in frockes of blew veluet, garded with rich cloth of gold, and their horſſe trappers of blew veluet fringed with gold: and on foot were fortie perſons all in blew ſattin garded with cloth of gold. And ſo they entred the field with trumpets, drumſlades and other minſtrelſie. Then in came the counterpartie richlie apparelled, to the number of twelue: and on that daie euerie man did well, but the king did beſt, and ſo was adiudged; and ſo at night they ceaſed, and came to ſupper.

The ſecond daie of ſolemne iuſts held by the king and others againſt all commers.

The king the next daie and his companie were apparelled (horſſe and all) in purple veluet, ſet full of leaues of cloth of gold ingrailed with fine flat gold of damaſke embrodered like to roſe leaues, and euerie leafe faſtned to other with points of damaſke gold, and on all their borders were letters of gold bullion. And on the king waited fiue lords, fourteene knights in frockes of yellow veluet, garded and bound with rich cloth of gold: and thirtie gentlemen were in like apparell on foote, and fortie officers in yellow ſattin edged with cloth of gold. Thus with great triumph they entred the field. Then the counterpartie entred all clothed and barded in white ſattin trauerſed with cloth of gold richlie. This daie was manie a great ſtripe giuen. The king and ſir William Kingſton ranne togither; which ſir William Kingſton was a ſtrong and a tall knight, & yet the king by ſtrength ouerthrew him to the ground. And after that the king and his aids had performed their courſes, they ranne volant at all commers, which was a pleaſant ſight to ſee. And when night approched, they all diſarmed them, and went to the queenes chamber, where was a great banket for the welcome of the queene of Scots.

A caſtell builded by the king at Tornaie.

Iuſtice executed by cardinal Wolſie vpon offendors of ſundrie qualities and degrees.

In this moneth of Maie were ſent out of England twelue hundred maſons and carpenters, and three hundred laborers to the citie of Tornaie; for the king and his councell conſidered that the garriſon that was kept there was chargeable: and therefore it was determined that there ſhould be builded a caſtell to chaſtiſe the citie if they rebelled, and to miniſh the garriſon. And therefore theſe workemen were ſent thither, which this yeere began a ſtrong caſtell, and wrought ſtill on it. In this yeere, by the cardinall were all men called to accompt that had the occupieng of the kings monie in the warres or elſewhere, not to euerie mans contentation: for ſome were found in arrerages, and ſome ſaued themſelues by policie and briberie, and waxed rich, and ſome innocents were puniſhed. And for a truth, he ſo puniſhed periurie with open puniſhment, and open papers wearing, that in his time it was leſſe vſed. He puniſhed alſo lords, knights, and men of all ſorts, for riots bearing and mainteining in their countries, that the poore men liued quietlie: who perceiuing that he puniſhed the rich, complained without number, and brought manie an honeſt man to trouble and vexation.

Erection of new courts by the kings commiſſion.

Now when the cardinall at the laſt perceiued their vntrue ſurmiſes, and feined complaints for the moſt part, he then waxed wearie of hearing their cauſes, and ordeined by the kings commiſſion diuerſe vnder courts to heare complaints by bill of poore people. The one was kept in the White hall, the other before the kings almoner doctor Stokeſleie, a man that had more learning than diſcretion to be a iudge, the third was kept in the lord treaſurors chamber beſide the ſtarre chamber, and the fourth at the rols at the after noone. Theſe courts were greatlie haunted for a time: but at the laſt the people perceiued that much delaie was vſed in theſe courts, and few matters ended, and when they were ended, they bound no man by the law; then euerie man was werie of them and reſorted to the common law.

Edw.Hall
Polydor.

It was ſtrange to ſée the cardinall (a man not ſkilled in the laws) ſit in the ſeat of iudgement and pronounce the law, being aided at the firſt by ſuch as (according to the ancient cuſtome) did ſit as aſſociats with him: but he would not ſticke to determine ſundrie cauſes, neither rightlie decided nor adiudged by order of law. And againe, ſuch as were cleare caſes, he would ſometime prohibit the ſame to paſſe, call them into iudgement, frame an order in controuerſies, and puniſh ſuch as came with vntrue ſurmiſes afore the iudges, & ſharpelie reprooue the negligence of the iudges themſelues, which had receiued ſuch ſurmiſes, and not well conſidered of the controuerſies of the parties. And ſuch was the adminiſtration of the cardinall vnder a colour of iuſtice at the firſt: but bicauſe the ſame ſéemed at length to be but a verie ſhadow or colour in déed, it quicklie vaniſhed awaie, he taking vpon him the whole rule himſelfe, for that he ſaw the king made ſmall account of anie other but onelie of him.

Grafton is contrarie to this.

Whereby it came to paſſe, that manie of the péeres and high eſtates of the realme withdrew them from the court; as firſt the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and the biſhop of Wincheſter, which got them home into their dioceſſes. But yet before their departure (as good fathers of their countrie) they inſtantlie beſought the king that he would not ſuffer anie ſeruant to excéed and paſſe his maiſter: borrowing that ſentence out of the goſpell of ſaint Iohn, where our Sauiour ſpeaking to his diſciples, ſaith to them; Verelie, verelie, I ſay vnto you, the ſeruant is not greater than his maiſter. Hereunto the king, knowing that they meant this by the cardinall, made this anſwer, That he would diligentlie ſée, that euerie ſeruant ſhould obeie, and not command. But the cardinall notwithſtanding (during the time of his flattering felicitie) held out, thinking ſcorne to be countermanded; behauing himſelfe more like a prince, than a prelat, ſo blinded was he with vaineglorie, and drunken with the tranſitorie delights of the world: obſtinate impediments and moſt horrible hinderances to the permanent ioies of heauen, as the poet ſaith:

Gu.Ha.in Iac.4.

Delicias mundi fragiles qui mente ſequetur,
Perdidit æterni certiſsima gaudia cœli.

The duke of Suffolkes hope hindered by the cardinall.

Edw. Hall.
An ambaſſador from the emperour Maximilian.

After this, the duke of Norffolke departed home into his countrie, and laſt of all the duke of Suffolke alſo followed the other. For he hauing ſpent liberallie in his iournies when he went as ambaſſador into France, alſo in the ſolemnization of his marriage, and in houſkéeping ſince he was maried, borrowed great ſummes of monie of the king, which he hoped ſhould haue béene forgiuen him: but the cardinall would not haue it ſo, to the intent that the duke being behind hand in debt, ſhould be the more at commandement. For as wealth maketh men loftie, ſo dooth want make them lowlie. In the moneth of October, in this eight yeare of king Henrie, Mathew biſhop of Sion or Sittin, a cardinall (commonlie called the cardinall of the Swizzes) came into England from the emperour Maximilian.

At the contemplation of this cardinall, the king lent to the emperour a great ſumme of monie. But the chiefeſt matter that mooued the king to be ſo frée to Maximilian, was bicauſe the ſame monie ſhould be imploied on men of warre againſt the French king, towards whome the king (or rather cardinall Woolſeie) of late had conceiued a grudge, as thus. True it is, that the king beſtowed the reuenues of the ſée of Tornaie vpon the cardinall, at what time that ſée came into the kings hands: and therefore the cardinall being deſirous to aſſure to himſelfe the ſame, made ſute to the French king, that he would prouide Guillard the former biſhop of Tornaie of ſome other biſhoprike in France, ſo that he might reſigne the biſhoprike of Tornaie clearelie into his hands. The French king, perceiuing how much this ſhould make againſt his purpoſe, that vpon occaſion hoped euer to recouer the poſſeſſion of Tornaie, would not gratifie the cardinall herein.

The cardinall an enimie to peace.

Wherevpon the cardinall turning the kings mind at his plaſure, perſuaded him, that the next way to abate the French kings puiſſance (which in the begining of his reigne had recouered Millan, and grew euerie daie in power more than other) ſhould bée to mainteine the emperour with monie againſt him, ſo as the Frenchmen ſhould be chaſtiſed without the trauell of him or his people. Herevpon was Richard Paſe ſent firſt into Germanie with a great ſumme of monie to wage the Swizzes, which vnder the conduct of the emperor Maximilian inuaded the duchie of Millan; but without anie great gaine returned from thence, leauing Millan in the Frenchmens hands at that time. And now for a new reliefe was this cardinall of Sion ſent from Millan, at whoſe inſtance monie was aſſigned to be deliuered, and certeine Genowaies vndertooke the exchange, which made not paiment thereof at the day, although they had receiued it of the king.

Ed.Hall in Hen.8.fol.lix.
A moueable garden called the garden of Eſperance, verie coſtlie & artificiallie wrought.

In this yeare the king kept his Chriſtmaſſe at his manor of Gréenwich, & on the Twelfe night, according to the old cuſtome, he and the quéene came into the hall: and when they were ſet, and the quéene of Scots alſo, there entered into the hall a garden artificiall, called the garden of Eſperance. This garden was towred at euerie corner, and railed with railes gilt, all the bankes were ſet with flowers artificiall of ſilke and gold, the leaues cut of gréene ſattin, ſo that they ſéemed verie flowers. In the midſt of this garden was a piller of antique worke, all gold ſet with pearles and ſtones; and on the top of the piller, which was ſix ſquare, was a louer or an arch embowed, crowned with gold: within which ſtood a buſh of roſes red and white, all of ſilke and gold, and a buſh of pomegranats of like ſtuffe. In this garden walked ſix knights, and ſix ladies richlie apparelled; and then they deſcended and danſed manie goodlie danſes, and ſo aſcended the garden againe, and were conueied out of the hall, and then the king was ſerued of a great banket. After this Chriſtmaſſe the king exerciſed himſelfe much in hawking.

Iohn Hooker, aliàs Vowell.
Corpus Chriſti college in Oxford founded by Richard Fox biſhop of Wincheſter.

¶ This yeare, and about this time, Richard Fox biſhop of Wincheſter builded and founded Corpus Chriſti college in Oxford, and minded to haue appointed the ſame for a houſe of monks: but Hugh Oldom then biſhop of Exceſter changed his mind from that purpoſe by theſe meanes. This Hugh Oldom albeit hée were not the beſt learned of himſelfe, yet verie much and well affected towards learning and learned men; and was minded to haue inlarged Exceſter college. But being denied the preferment of a ſcholer, which ſtood then in election for a roome, his good will was withdrawne from that college, and he would haue ioined with William Smith biſhop of Lincolne, who then was in building of Braſen noſe college; but it tooke no effect. And then being aduertiſed that Richard Fox biſhop of Wincheſter was in hand to build Corpus Chriſti college, hée did ſend his letters vnto him, and offered to ioine with him therein, who was verrie glad thereof and well contented. Now theſe two biſhops conferring togither what maner of houſe they ſhould build, and to what end and purpoſe.

Biſhop Oldom of Exceſter is vtterlie againſt Fox's mind to found a college for moonks.

Biſhop Fox was of the mind and determination to haue made the college for religious men. But biſhop Oldom (whether it was bicauſe he fauoured not thoſe ſects of cloiſtered moonks, or whether hee foreſaw anie fall towards of thoſe ſects) diſuaded biſhop Fox what he could from that his purpoſe and opinion, and ſaid vnto him; What my lord, ſhall we “build houſes, and prouide liuelodes for a compa“nie of buſſing moonks, whoſe end and fall we our“ſelues maie liue to ſée? No, no, it is more méet a great deale, that we ſhould haue care to prouide for the increaſe of learning, and for ſuch as who by their “learning ſhall doo good in the church and commonwealth. To this biſhop Fox at length yéelded, and ſo they procéeded in their buildings. Wherin Oldom reſeruing to Fox the name of the founder, was contented with the name of a benefactor, and verie liberallie did contribute great maſſes of monie to the ſame: and ſince (according to his wiſh and deſire) the ſame college hath bene and is the nurſſe of manie notable good ſcholers.]

Oldom giueth Fox the name of founder, & contenteth himſelfe with the name of benefactor.

About this ſeaſon there grew a great hartburning and malicious grudge amongſt the Engliſhmen of the citie of London againſt ſtrangers; and namelie the artificers found themſelues ſore grieued, for that ſuch numbers of ſtrangers were permitted to reſort hither with their wares, and to exerciſe handie crafts to the great hinderance and impoueriſhing of the kings liege people. Beſides that, they ſet nought by the rulers of the citie, & bare themſelues too too bold of the kings fauor, wherof they would inſolentlie boaſt; vpon preſumption therof, & they offred manie an iniurious abuſe to his liege people, inſomuch that among other accidents which were manifeſt, it fortuned that as a carpenter in London called Williamſon had bought two ſtockdoues in Cheape, and was about to pay for them, a Frenchman tooke them out of his hand, and ſaid they were not meate for a carpenter.

Hall in H.8. fol.lix.

The inſolent ſawcineſſe of the Frenchmen againſt the Engliſh.

Well ſaid the Engliſhman I haue bought them and now paid for them, and therefore I will haue them. Naie ſaid the Frenchman I will haue them for my lord the ambaſſadour. And ſo for better or worſſe, the Frenchman called the Engliſhman knaue, and went awaie with the ſtockdoues. The ſtrangers came to the French ambaſſador, and ſurmiſed a complaint againſt the poore carpenter. And the ambaſſador came to the lord maior, and ſaid ſo much, that the carpenter was ſent to priſon: and yet not contented with this, ſo complained to the kings councell, that the kings commandement was laid on him. And when ſir John Baker knight and other worſhipfull perſons ſued to the ambaſſador for him, he anſwered by the bodie of God that the Engliſh knaue ſhould loſe his life, for he ſaid no Engliſhman ſhould denie that the Frenchmen required, and other anſwer had they none.

The diueliſh malice of the Frenchmen.

There was alſo a Frenchman that had ſlaine a man, and ſhould abiure the realme, and had a croſſe in his hand. Then ſuddenlie came a great ſort of Frenchmen about him, and one of them ſaid to the conſtable that led him; Sir is this croſſe the price to kill an Engliſhman. The conſtable was ſomewhat aſtonied & anſwered not. Then ſaid another Frenchman, On that price we ſhould be baniſhed all by the maſſe. This ſaieng was noted to be ſpoken ſpitefullie. Howbeit, the Frenchmen were not alonelie oppreſſors of the Engliſhmen. For a Lombard called Francis de Bard, entiſed a mans wife in Lombard ſtréet to come to his chamber with hir husbands plate, which thing ſhe did. After, when hir husband knew it, he demanded his wife, but anſwer was made he ſhould not haue hir: then he demanded his plate, and in like maner anſwer was made that he ſhould neither haue plate nor wife. And when he had ſued an action againſt the ſtranger in the Guildhall, the ſtranger ſo faced the Engliſhman, that he fainted in his ſute. Then the Lombard arreſted the poore man for his wiues boord, while he kept hir from hir husband in his chamber.

Strangers outface Engliſhmẽ againſt all honeſtie, equitie, and conſcience.

This abuſe was much noted, ſo that the ſame and manie other oppreſſions doone by them, increaſed ſuch a malice in the Engliſhmens harts, that at the laſt it burſt out. For amongſt other that ſore grudged at theſe matters, there was a broker in London called John Lincolne, that buſied himſelfe ſo farre in the matter, that about Palme ſundaie in this eight yeare of the kings reigne, he came to one doctor Henrie Standiſh with theſe words; Sir I vnderſtand that you ſhall preach at the ſanctuarie ſpittle on mondaie in Eaſter wéeke, and ſo it is, that Engliſhmen, both merchants and other are vndoone, for ſtrangers haue more libertie in this land than Engliſhmen, which is againſt all reaſon, and alſo againſt the common-weale of the realme. I beſéech you therefore to declare this in your ſermon, and in ſo dooing yée ſhall deſerue great thanks of my lord maior, and of all his brethren: and héerewith he offered vnto the ſaid doctor Standiſh a bill, conteining this matter more at large.

John Lincolne the author of the inſurrection vpõ ill Maie daie.

But doctor Standiſh (wiſelie conſidering that there might more inconuenience riſe thereof, than he would wiſh, if he ſhould deale in ſuch ſort) both wiſelie refuſed the bill, and told Lincolne plainlie, that he ment not to meddle with anie ſuch matter in his ſermon. Wherevpon the ſaid Lincolne went vnto one doctor Bele a chanon of the foreſaid ſpittle, that was appointed to preach likewiſe vpon the tueſdaie in Eaſter wéeke at the ſame ſpittle, whome he perſuaded to read his ſaid bill in the pulpit. Which bill in effect conteined how miſerablie the common artificers liued, and ſcarſe could get anie worke to find them, their wiues & children: there were ſuch a number of artificers ſtrangers that tooke awaie all their liuing in manner. And alſo how the Engliſh merchants could haue no vtterance, for the merchant ſtrangers bring in all ſilkes, cloth of gold, wine, oile, iron, and ſuch other merchandize, that no man almoſt buieth of an Engliſhman.

The gréefes particulariſed in Lincolns bill for the cities behalfe.

Furthermore, they carie out ſo much Engliſh wooll, tinne, and lead, that Engliſhmen who aduenture outward can haue no liuing: which things (ſaid Lincolne) hath béene ſhewed to the councell, and cannot be heard. And further (ſaid he) the ſtrangers compaſſe the citie round about, in Southwarke, in Weſtminſter, Temple barre, Holborne, ſaint Martins, ſaint Johns ſtréet, Algate, Tower hill, and ſaint Katharins, and foreſtall the market, ſo that no good thing for them commeth to the market: which is the cauſe that Engliſhmen want and ſtarue, & they liue aboundantlie in great pleaſure. Wherfore (ſaid Lincolne) maiſter doctor, ſith you were borne in London, and ſée the oppreſſion of the ſtrangers, and the great miſerie of your owne natiue countrie, exhort all the citizens to ioine in one againſt theſe ſtrangers, rauenors, and deſtroiers of your countrie. Maiſter doctor hearing this, ſaid he much lamented the caſe, if it were as Lincolne had declared.

Lincolne a great enimie to ſtrangers.

Yes ſaid Lincolne, that it is, and much more. For the Dutchmen bring ouer iron, timber, leather, and weinſcot readie wrought; alſo nailes, locks, baſkets, cupboords, ſtooles, tables, cheſts, girdles, with points, ſaddles & painted clothes, ſo that if it were wrought héere, Engliſhmen might haue ſome worke and liuing by it. And beſides this, they grow into ſuch a multitude, that it is to be looked vpon: for I ſaw on a ſundaie this Lent, ſix hundred ſtrangers ſhooting at the popingaie with croſbowes, and they kéepe ſuch aſſemblies and fraternities togither, and make ſuch a gathering to their common box, that euerie botcher will hold plée with the citie of London. Well ſaid the doctor, I will doo for a reformation of this matter as much as a préeſt maie do, and ſo receiued Lincolns bill, and ſtudied for his purpoſe. Then Lincolne verie ioious of his enterpriſe, went from man to man, ſaieng that ſhortlie they ſhould heare newes, and dailie excited yoong people and artificers to beare malice to the ſtrangers. When Eaſter came, and doctor Bele ſhould preach the tueſdaie in Eaſter wéeke, he came into the pulpit, and there declared, that to him was brought a pitifull bill, and read it in this wiſe.

Lincolne proſecuteth his information of gréeuances by ſpecialties.

The tenor of the bill of complaint which doctor Bele read in open audience at the Spitle.

Edw. Hall in Hen.8. fol. 60.

TO all you the worſhipfull lords & maiſters of this citie, that will take compaſſion ouer the poore people your neighbours, and alſo of the great importable hurts, loſſes, and hinderances, whereof procéedeth the extreame pouertie to all the kings ſubiects, that inhabit within this citie and ſuburbs of the ſame. For ſo it is, that the aliens & ſtrangers eat the bread from the fatherleſſe children, and take the liuing from all the artificers, and the intercourſe from all merchants, whereby pouertie is ſo much increaſed, that euerie man bewaileth the miſerie of other; for craftſmen be brought to beggerie, and merchants to néedineſſe. Wherfore the premiſſes conſidered, the redreſſe muſt be of the commons, knit and vnited to one part. And as the hurt and damage gréeueth all men, ſo muſt all men ſet to their willing power for remedie, & not to ſuffer the ſaid aliens ſo highlie in their wealth; & the naturall borne men of this region to come to confuſion'. ¶ Of this letter was more, but the doctor read no further.

An vndiſcreet preacher.

When he had read this letter, or the chiefeſt part thereof, comprehending (as ye haue heard) much ſeditious matter, he began with this ſentence, Cælum cæli Domino, terram autem dedit filijs hominum, and vpon this text he intreated, how this land was giuen to Engliſhmen. And as birds defend their neſts, ſo ought Engliſhmen to cheriſh and mainteine themſelues, and to hurt and grieue aliens for reſpect of their common-wealth. And vpon this text Pugna pro patria, he brought in, how by Gods law it was lawfull to fight for their countrie. And thus he ſubtilie mooued or rather vndiſcréetlie prouoked the people to rebell againſt ſtrangers. By this fooliſh ſermon, manie a light perſon tooke courage, and openlie ſpake againſt ſtrangers. And as vnhap would, there had béene diuerſe euill parts plaied of late by ſtrangers, in and about the citie of London, which kindled the peoples rancour the more furiouſlie againſt them.

Now as the diuell would, the ſundaie after at Gréenwich in the kings gallerie was Francis de Bard, who (as yée haue heard) kept an Engliſhmans wife and his goods, and yet he could haue no remedie; and with him were Domingo, Anthonie Caueler, and manie more ſtrangers, and there they talking with ſir Thomas Palmer knight, ieſted and laughed how that Francis kept the Engliſhmans wife, ſaieng that if they had the maiors wife of London they would kéepe hir. Sir Thomas ſaid; Sirs you haue too much fauour in England. There were diuerſe Engliſh merchants by, who heard them laugh, and were not content, in ſo much as one William Bolt a mercer ſaid; Well you whoreſon Lombards, you reioiſe and laugh, by the maſſe we will one daie haue a ſting at you, come when it will. And that ſaieng the other merchants affirmed. This tale was reported about London, and the yoong and euill diſpoſed people ſaid they would be reuenged on the merchants ſtrangers as well as on the artificers ſtrangers. ¶ On monday the morow after, the king remoued to his manor of Richmond.]

Note the ſaucie, brode, ſhameleſſe, and diſhoneſt boaſting of the ſtrangers in their lewdnes

On the eight and twentith daie of Aprill, diuerſe yoong men of the citie piked quarels to certeine ſtrangers as they paſſed by the ſtréets, ſome they did ſtrike, ſome they buffeted, and ſome they threw into the kennell: wherfore the maior ſent ſome of the Engliſhmen to priſon, as Stephan Studleie ſkinner, Bets, Stephanſon, and diuerſe other. Then ſuddenlie roſe a ſecret rumour, and no man could tell how it began, that on Maie daie next the citie would rebell and ſlea all the aliens, inſomuch that diuerſe ſtrangers fled out of the citie. This brute ran ſo into euerie mans eares, that it came to the knowledge of the kings councell, whervpon the lord cardinall ſent for the maior, and other of the councell of the citie, giuing them to vnderſtand what he had heard.

Anno Reg. 9. Strangers iniuriouſlie abuſed of diuerſe yonkers.

The maior, as one ignorant of the matter, told the cardinall that he doubted not but ſo to gouerne the citie, as peace ſhould be obſerued. The cardinall willed him ſo to doo; and to take good héed, that if anie ſuch riotous attempt was intended, he ſhould with good policie preuent it. The maior came from the cardinals houſe at foure of the clocke in the after noone on Maie éuen, and in all haſt ſent for his brethren to the Guildhall; yet was it almoſt ſeuen of the clocke yer the aſſemblie was ſet. Upon conference had of the matter touching the rumour that was spred abroad of the rebellion againſt the ſtrangers, ſome thought it neceſſarie that a ſubſtantiall watch ſhould be ſet, of the honeſt citizens houſholders which might withſtand the euill dooers, if they went about anie miſrule.

The cardinals aduiſe to the maior in this hurliburlie.

But other were of this opinion, that it was dangerous to raiſe men in armour, bicauſe it was hard to tell whome they might truſt; but rather they thought it beſt that commandement ſhould be giuen to euerie man through euerie ward, to ſhut in his doores, & to kéepe his ſeruants within. Before eight of the clocke the recorder was ſent to the cardinall with theſe opinions; who hearing the ſame, allowed the latter for beſt and moſt ſureſt. And then the recorder and ſir Thomas More (late vnderſhiriffe of London, and now of the kings priuie councell) came to the Guildhall halfe an houre before nine of the clocke, and there ſhewed the pleaſure of the kings councell; wherevpon euerie alderman ſent to his ward, that no man ſhould ſtirre after ſeauen of the clocke out of his houſe, but to kéepe his doores ſhut, and his ſeruants within, till nine of the clocke in the morning.

Councell taken by the maior and his brethren how to preuent the hurt at hand.

After this commandement giuen, in the euening, as ſir John Mundie (an alderman) came from his ward, and found two yoong men in Cheape plaieng at the bucklers, and a great manie of yoong men looking on them (for the commandement was then ſcarſe knowne) he commanded them to leaue of. And for that one of them aſked, why? he would haue had him to the Counter. Then all the yoong prentiſes ſtept to, and reſiſted the alderman, taking the yoong fellow from him, & cried; Prentiſes and clubs. Then out at euerie doore came clubs and weapons. The alderman fled and was in great danger. Then more people aroſe out of euerie quarter, and forth came ſeruingmen, watermen, courtiers, and others; ſo that by eleuen of the clocke, there were in Cheape, ſix or ſeuen hundred; and out of Paules churchyard came thrée hundred, which knew not of the other. So out of all places they gathered, & brake vp the counters, tooke out the priſoners that the maior had thither committed for hurting the ſtrangers, and came to Newgate, and tooke out Studleie and Petit committed thither for that cauſe.

The raging madneſſe of the mutiners.

Nicholas Downes ſore hurt.

The maior and ſhiriffes were preſent there, and made proclamation in the kings name, but nothing was obeied. Herewith being gathered in plumpes, they ran thorough ſaint Nicholas ſhambles, and at ſaint Martins gate there met with them ſir Thomas More, and others, deſiring them to go to their lodgings. And as they were thus intreating, and had almoſt perſuaded the people to depart, they within ſaint Martins threw out ſtones, bats, and hot water; ſo that they hurt diuerſe honeſt perſons that were there with ſir Thomas More, perſuading the rebellious perſons to ceaſſe, inſomuch as at length one Nicholas Downes a ſergeant of armes being there with the ſaid ſir Thomas More, & ſore hurt amongſt others, in a furie, cried; Downe with them. And then all the miſruled perſons ran to the doores and windowes of the houſes with ſaint Martins, and ſpoiled all that they found.

The rioters malicious purpoſe againſt one Mewtas.

After that, they ran headlong into Cornehill, & there likewiſe ſpoiled diuerſe houſes of the French men that dwelled within the gate of maiſter Mewtas houſe called Gréene gate. This maiſter Mewtas was a Picard borne, and reputed to be a great bearer of Frenchmen in their occupiengs and trades, contrarie to the lawes of the citie. If the people had found him, they would ſuerlie haue ſtriken off his head: but when they found him not, the watermen and certeine yoong préeſts that were there fell to rifling, and ſome ran to Blanchapelton, and brake vp the ſtrangers houſes, and ſpoiled them. Thus from ten or eleuen of the clocke, theſe riotous people continued in their outragious dooings till about thrée of the clocke, at what time they began to withdraw, and went to their places of reſort: and by the waie they were taken by the maior and the heads of the citie, and ſent ſome of them to the Tower, ſome to Newgate, and ſome to the Counters, to the number of thrée hundred.

Sir Thomas Parre informeth the king of the riot and rebellion.

Manie fled, and ſpeciallie the watermen, préeſts, & ſeruingmen, but the prentiſes were caught by the backs and had to priſon. In the meane time, whileſt the hotteſt of this ruffling laſted, the cardinall was aduertiſed thereof by ſir Thomas Parre: whervpon the cardinall ſtrengthened his houſe with men and ordinance. Sir Thomas Parre rode in all haſt to Richmond, where the king laie, and informed him of the matter; who incontinentlie ſent forth haſtilie to London, to vnderſtand the ſtate of the citie, and was truelie aduertiſed how the riot was ceaſſed, and manie of the miſdooers apprehended. The lieutenant of the Tower ſir Roger Cholmeleie (no great fréend to the citie) in a frantike furie, during the time of this vprore, ſhot off certeine péeces of ordinance againſt the citie. And though they did no great harme; yet he wan much euill will for his haſtie dooing, bicauſe men thought he did it of malice, rather than of anie diſcretion.

Certeine lords with their powers come to London about this riot.

A commiſſion of oier and determiner to inquire and puniſh the offendors.

Abr. Fl. ex Edw. Hall in H.8. fol.lxij.

The cauſe why the citie thought the duke of Norffolke bare them an old grudge.

About fiue of the clocke the earles of Shrewesburie and Surrie, Thomas Dokercie lord of ſaint Iohns, George Neuill lord of Aburgauennie, and others, which had heard of this riot, came to London with ſuch ſtrength as they could make vpon that ſudden, and ſo did the Innes of court. But before they came, whether with feare of the brute of their comming, or otherwiſe, the riotous aſſemblie was broken vp, and manie of the miſdooers taken (as ye haue heard.) Then were the priſoners examined, and the ſermon of doctor Bele called to remembrance, and he taken and ſent to the Tower. Herewith was a commiſſion of oier and determiner directed to the duke of Norffolke, and to diuerſe other lords, to the lord maior of London, and the aldermen, and to all the iuſtices of England, for puniſhment of this inſurrection. [The citie thought the duke bare them a grudge for a lewd préeſt of his, which the yeare before was ſlaine in Cheape, inſomuch that he then in his furie ſaid; I praie God I maie once haue the citizens in my danger! And likewiſe the duke thought that they bare him no good will; wherefore he came into the citie with thirtéene hundred men in harneſſe to kéepe the oier and determiner.

Sir Iohn Fineux.

Now vpon examination it could neuer be prooued of anie méeting, gathering, talking, or conuenticle, at anie daie or time before that date; but that the chance ſo happened without anie matter prepenſed of anie creature ſauing Lincolne, and neuer an honeſt perſon in maner was taken but onelie he. Then proclamations were made, that no women ſhould come togither to babble and talke, but all men ſhould kéepe their wiues in their houſes. All the ſtréets that were notable ſtood full of harneſſed men, which ſpake manie opprobrious words to the citizens, which gréeued them ſore: and if they would haue béene reuenged, the other had had the worſſe: for the citizens were two hundred to one, but like true ſubiects they ſuffred patientlie.] Now for the due correction (according to law) of this diſorder, all the iuſtices with all the kings councell learned in the lawes, aſſembled at the houſe of ſir Iohn Fineux lord chéefe iuſtice of England néere to ſaint Brides by Fléeteſtréet, to take aduiſe, and conclude vpon the order which they ſhould follow in this matter, and firſt there was read the ſtatute of the third yeare of Henrie the fift, the effect whereof inſueth in theſe words following.

The ſtatute made in anno tertio of Henrie the fift.

This ſtatute bringeth the rioters within compaſſe of treaſon.

BEcauſe that diuers nations compriſed within the truces concluded as well by our ſouereigne lord the king that now is, as by his right noble father, haue béene robbed and ſpoiled by the kings lieges and ſubiects, as well on the maine ſeas as within the ports and coaſts of England, Ireland, & Wales, by reaſon whereof, the truces and ſafe conducts haue broken and violated, to the damage, diſhonour, and ſlander of the king, and againſt his dignitie, & the manſlaiers, ſpoilers, robbers, & violaters of the ſame truces and ſafe conducts (as before is declared) haue béene recetted, procured, counſelled, vpholden, and mainteined by diuerſe of the kings liege people vpon the coaſts: our ſaid ſouereigne lord the king by the aduiſe and aſſent abouesaid, and at the praier of the ſaid commons, hath ordeined and eſtabliſhed, that all ſuch manſlaiers, robbers, ſpoilers, breakers of truces, and ſafe conducts granted by the king, and the wilfull recetters, abbetters, procurers, counſellors, ſuſteiners and mainteiners of ſuch perſons, hereafter in time to come, being anie of the lieges & ſubiects of this realme of England, Ireland, & Wales, are to be adiudged and determined as giltie of high treaſon committed againſt the crowne & dignitie of the king. And further, in euerie hauen and port of the ſea, there ſhall be from henſe-forth made and aſſigned by the king, by his letters pattents, one lawfull officer named a conſeruator of truces and ſafe conducts granted by the king, which officer ſhall diſpend at the leaſt ten pounds in land by yeare, &c: as in the ſtatute more at large is expreſſed.

Diuers truces betwéene the king and ſundrie forren princes.

The which ſtatute being read and well conſidered of, bicauſe there was diuerſe leagues of truces betwixt the king and diuerſe other princes, as one betwixt him and the French king, and another betwixt him and the archduke of Burgognie, and another betwixt him & the king of Spaine (all the which truces were violated by the ſaid inſurrection) it was determined by the whole councell there aſſembled, that the kings ſergeants and attournies ſhould go to the lord chancellor, to haue a ſight of all the ſaid leagues and charters of truces, to the intent they might frame their indictments according to the matter. And note that iudge Fineux ſaid, that all ſuch as were parties to the ſaid inſurrection, were guiltie of high treaſon, as well thoſe that did not commit anie robberie, as thoſe that were principall dooers therein themſelues, bicauſe that the inſurrection in it ſelfe was high treaſon, as a thing practiſed againſt the regall honour of our ſoueraigne lord the king.

Iudge Fineux interpreteth the ſaid ſtatute.

And the ſame law holdeth of an inſurrection (ſaid Fineux) made againſt the ſtatute of laborers. For ſo (ſaid he) it came to paſſe, that certeine perſons within the countie of Kent began an inſurrection, in diſobedience of the ſtatute of labourers, and were atteinted therfore of high treaſon, and had iudgement to be drawne, hanged, and quartered. He ſhewed where and when this chanced. It was further determined by the ſaid Fineux, and all the iuſtices of the land, that vpon the ſaid commiſſion of oier and terminer in London, the iuſtices named in the ſaid commiſſion, might not arreigne the offendors, and proceed to the triall in one ſelfe daie, no more than might the iuſtices of peace. But iuſtices in oier might ſo doo, aſwell as the iuſtices of gaole deliuerie: and as the ſufficiencie of the iurors within the citie to paſſe betwixt the king and the ſaid traitors, the iuſtices determined, that he that had lands, and goods, to the value of an hundred marks, ſhould be inabled to paſſe vpon the ſaid indictments. And this by the equitie of the ſtatute of Anno vndecimo Henrici ſeptimi, the which will, that no man be admitted to paſſe in anie inqueſt in London in a plée of lands, or other action, in which the damages ſhall paſſe the value of fourtie ſhillings, except he be worth in lands or goods the value of an hundred markes.

Order for proceeding againſt the ſaid offendors.

Manie of the offendors indicted at Guildhall.

On ſaturdaie the ſecond of Maie, in this ninth yeare, all the commiſſioners, with the lord maior, aldermen, and iuſtices, went to the Guildhall, where manie of the offendors were indicted, as well of the inſurrection, as of the robberies by them committed againſt the truces. Herevpon they were arreigned, & pleading not guiltie, had day giuen till monday next inſuing. On which daie being the fourth of Maie, the lord maior, the duke of Norffolke, the earle of Surrie and others came to ſit in the Guildhall, to procéed in their oier and terminer as they were appointed. When the lords were ſet, the priſoners were brought through the ſtréets tied in ropes, ſome men, and ſome lads of thirtéene yéeres of age. Among them were diuerſe not of the citie, ſome prieſts, ſome husbandmen, and labourers. The whole number amounted vnto two hundred thrée ſcore and eightéene perſons.

The whole number of the rebellious rout.

This daie was John Lincolne indicted as a principall procurer of this miſchieuous inſurrection, and therevpon hée was arreigned, and pleading not giltie, had daie giuen ouer till wedneſdaie, or (as Hall ſaith) till thurſday next inſuing. He was charged with ſuch matter (as before ye haue heard) concerning his ſute vnto doctor Standiſh, and doctor Bele, for the reading of this bill in their ſermons, and opening the matter (as before ye haue heard) all which matter with the circumſtances he had confeſſed on ſundaie the third of Maie, vnto ſir Richard Cholmleie, ſir John Danſie, & ſir Hugh Skeuington. Diuers other were indicted this mondaie, and ſo for that time the lords departed. The next daie the duke came againe, & the erle of Surrie with 2000 armed men, which kept the ſtréets. When the maior, the duke, the earles of Shrewesburie and Surrie were ſet, the priſoners were arreigned, and thirtéene found guiltie, and adiudged to be hanged, drawne, and quartered. For execution whereof were ſet vp eleuen paire of gallowes in diuerſe places where the offenſes were doone, as at Algate, at Blanchappelton, Gratious ſtréete, Leaden hall, and before euerie counter one, alſo at Newgate, at ſaint Martins, at Alderſgate, and at Biſhopſgate.

What was laid to Lincolnes charge.

Eleuen paire of gallows erected for the executing of the rebels.

Then were the priſoners that were iudged brought to thoſe places of execution: and executed in moſt rigorous maner, in the preſence of the lord Edmund Howard ſon to the duke of Norffolke, & knight marſhall, who ſhewed no mercie, but extreme crueltie to the poore yoonglings in their execution: and likewiſe the dukes ſeruants ſpake manie opprobrious words, ſome bad hang, ſome bad draw, ſome bad ſet the citie on fire, but all was ſuffered. On thurſdaie the ſeuenth of Maie, was Lincolne, Shirwin, and two brethren called Bets, and diuerſe other adiudged to die. Then Lincolne ſaid, My lords, I meant well: for if you knew the miſchiefe that is inſued in this realme by ſtrangers, you would remedie it, & manie times I haue complained, and then I was called a buſie fellow: now our Lord haue mercie on me. They were laid on hardels, & drawne to the ſtandard in Cheape, and firſt was John Lincolne executed. And as the other had the ropes about their neckes, there came a commandement from the king to reſpit the execution. Then the people cried, God ſaue the king, and ſo was the oier and terminer deferred till another daie, and the priſoners ſent againe to ward: the armed men departed out of London, and all things ſet in quiet.

Edw.Hall.in H.8.fol.lxii.

On the eleuenth daie of Maie, the king came to his manor of Gréenwich, where the recorder of London and diuerſe aldermen came to ſpeake with his grace, and all ware gownes of blacke colour. And when they perceiued the king comming out of his priuie chamber into his chamber of preſence, they knéeled downe, and the recorder ſaid: Our moſt naturall, benigne, and ſoueraigne lord, we know well that your grace is diſpleaſed with vs of your citie of London, for the great riot late doone: we aſcerteine your grace, that none of vs, nor no honeſt perſon were condeſcending to that enormitie, and yet wée, our wiues, and children, euerie houre lament that your fauour ſhould be taken from vs. And forſomuch as light and idle perſons were the dooers of the ſame, we moſt humblie beſéech your grace to haue mercie of vs for our negligence, and compaſſion of the offendors for their offenſe and treſpaſſe.

The recorder in the behalfe of the citie ſpeaketh humblie to the K. touching the riot.

Trulie ſaid the king, you haue highlie diſpleaſed and offended vs, and you ought to waile and be ſorie for the ſame. And where as you ſaie that you the ſub-ſtantiall perſons were not conſenting to the ſame, it appeareth to the contrarie. For you neuer moued to let them, nor ſtirred once to fight with them, which you ſay were ſo ſmall a number of light perſons. Wherefore we muſt thinke, and you can not denie, that you did winke at the matter, but at this time we will grant to you neither our fauour nor good will, nor to the offendors mercie, but reſort to the cardinall our lord chancellour, and he ſhall make you an anſwer, and declare our pleaſure. And with this anſwer the Londoners departed, and made relation to the maior.

The quéene of Scots returneth toward Scotland.

On the eightéenth day of this moneth, the quéene of Scots, which had béene at the court, and at Bainards caſtell, a whole yeare at the kings charge, and was richlie appointed of all things méet to hir eſtate, both of iewels, plate, tapiſtrie, arras, coine, horſſes, & all other things of the kings gift & liberalitie, departed out of London toward Scotland with great riches, albeit ſhe came into England with great pouertie, and ſhe entered into Scotland the thirtéenth daie of Iune, whome hir huſband receiued at Berwike, but the Engliſhmen ſmallie regarded him. All hir charges within the realme, comming to the court and returning, were of the kings purſſe.

The king commeth to Weſtminſter hall, and there ſitteth in iudgement himſelfe.

On thurſdaie the two & twentith daie of Maie, the king came into Weſtminſter hall, for whome at the vpper end was ſet a cloth of eſtate, and the place hanged with arras. With him was the cardinall, the dukes of Norffolke and Suffolke, the earles of Shrewſburie, of Eſſex, of Wiltſhire, & Surrie, with manie lords and other of the kings councell. The maior & aldermen, with all the chiefe of the citie were there in their beſt liuerie (according as the cardinall had appointed them) by nine of the clocke. Then the king commanded that all the priſoners ſhould bée brought forth, ſo that in came the poore yonglings and old falſe knaues bound in ropes all along, one after another in their ſhirts, and euerie one a halter about his necke, to the number of foure hundred men, and eleuen women. And when all were come before the kings preſence, the cardinall ſore laid to the maior and communaltie their negligence, and to the priſoners he declared that they had deſerued death for their offenſe. Then all the priſoners togither cried; Mercie gratious lord, mercie. Herewith the lords altogither beſought his grace of mercie, at whoſe ſute the king pardoned them all. Then the cardinall gaue vnto them a good exhortation, to the great gladneſſe of the hearers.

The kings gratious and generall pardon.

Now, when the generall pardon was pronounced, all the priſoners ſhowted at once, & all togither caſt vp their halters into the hall roofe, ſo that the king might perceiue they were none of the diſcréeteſt ſort. Here is to be noted, that diuerſe offendors, which were not taken, hearing that the king was inclined to mercie, came well apparelled to Weſtminſter, and ſuddenlie ſtripped them into their ſhirts with halters, and came in among the priſoners willinglie, to be partakers of the kings pardon. By which dooing, it was well knowne, that one Iohn Gelſon yeoman of the crowne was the firſt that began to ſpoile, and exhorted other to doo the ſame: and bicauſe he fled and was not taken, he came in with a rope among the other priſoners, and ſo had his pardon. This companie was after called the blacke wagon. Then were all the gallowes within the citie taken downe, and manie a good praier ſaid for the king, and the citizens tooke more héed to their ſeruants. But the kings mercie miniſtred abundant matter of communication, euerie one (ſpeciallie the pardoned and their allies) ſounding the benefit of his roiall clemencie, whereby of dead men they became liuing, and had ſuſteined the ſeuere ſentence of law, had not mercie remitted the fault and the puniſhment, which breaketh the force of iudgement, as the poet trulie ſaith:

The blacke wagon that followed ill Maie daie.

Iudicij neruos frangit miſeratio clemens.

Solemne iuſtes betwéene the king and others.

In Iune the king had with him diuerſe ambaſſadours, for ſolace of whome he prepared a coſtlie iuſtes, he himſelfe & twelue more againſt the duke of Suffolke and other twelue. His baſe and bard was the one halfe cloth of ſiluer, & the other halfe blacke tinſell. On the ſiluer was a curious loſe worke of veluet imbrodered with gold, cut on the ſiluer, and euerie cut ingrailed with gold, ſo that that ſide was gold, ſiluer, and veluet. On the blacke tinſell ſide was blacke veluet imbrodered with gold, and cut, and euerie cut was ingrailed with flat gold of damaſke. The baſe and bard were brodered with great letters of maſſie gold bullion, full of pearles and ſtones, maruellous rich: all his companie were in like ſute, ſauing that they had no iewels. The king had on his head a ladies ſléeue full of diamonds. On the king attended gentlemen, armourers, and other officers, to the number of an hundred and twentie fiue perſons, all in white veluet and white ſattin, horſſe and harneſſe for horſſemen, caps and hoſen for footmen, all white, at the kings coſt. Thus roiallie the king and his companie with his waiters came to the tilts end.

A gallant and glorious ſhew.

Then entered the duke of Suffolke, with the marques Dorſet, the earls of Eſſex and Surrie, and eight other of his band, in bards and baſes of white veluet and crimſin ſattin loſenged, ſet full of letters of C. M. of gold, for Charles and Marie, and they tooke the other end of the tilt. Then the trumpets blue, and the king and the duke ran fiercely togither, and brake manie ſpeares, and ſo did all the other, that it was hard to ſaie who did beſt. But when the courſes were run, they ran volant one at another, ſo that both by the report of ſir Edward Gilford maiſter of the armourie, and alſo of the iudges and heralds, at theſe iuſtes were broken fiue hundred and ſix ſpears: and then the king the ſame night made the ambaſſadours a ſumptuous banket, with manie riddels and much paſtime. After this great triumph, the king appointed his gheſts for his paſtime this ſummer; but ſuddenlie there came a plague of ſickeneſſe, called the ſweating ſickeneſſe, that turned all his purpoſe.

The king & the duke run perſonallie.

The ſweting ſickneſſe peremptorie and deadlie.

This maladie was ſo cruell, that it killed ſome within thrée houres, ſome within two houres, ſome merrie at dinner, and dead at ſupper. Manie died in the kings court, the lord Clinton, the lord Graie of Wilton, and manie knights, gentlemen, and officers. For this plague Michaelmaſſe tearme was adiourned. And bicauſe that this maladie continued from Iulie to the midſt of December, the king kept himſelfe euer with a ſmall companie, and held no ſolemne Chriſtmaſſe, willing to haue no reſort for feare of infection: but much lamented the number of his people, for in ſome one towne halfe the people died, and in ſome other towne the third part, the ſweat was ſo feruent and infectuous. [By the extremitie whereof, and the multitudes with ſuch ſuddenneſſe and preſent mortalitie dropping awaie: it ſhould ſéeme that they little remembred, or at leaſtwiſe neglected the preſeruatiue remedie vſed in the firſt great ſweating ſickeneſſe in * king Henrie the ſeuenths time, whereby as then manie a mans life was ſaued, ſo now the like benefit (by applieng of the ſame wholſome meanes) might haue redounded to the patients.]

Anno Reg. 1

The tearme begun at Oxford and adiourned to weſtminſter.

In the beginning of this yeare, Trinitie tearme was begun at Oxenford, where it continued but one daie, and was againe adiourned to Weſtminſter. This yeare came to Calis from pope Leo, a legat De latere, called Laurence Campeius borne in Bollogne Cardinall Campeius ſent from the pope. Polydor.

logne la Graſſe, commonlie called cardinall Campeius, to require the king of aid againſt the Turke. At the requeſt of the king of England, and alſo of the French king (which ſought now to be receiued into fréendſhip with the king of England chéeflie by cardinall Woolſies meanes) pope Leo conſtituted the ſaid cardinall Woolſie his legat in England, ioining him in commiſſion with the ſaid Campeius, the which ſtaid at Calis vntill the bulles were brought from Rome touching that matter. There was alſo an other cauſe that ſtaid Campeius at Calis, & that was a ſute which cardinall Woolſie had mooued for the obteining of the biſhoprike of Bath, which benefice cardinall Adrian Caſtalian inioied by the collation of king Henrie the ſeuenth.

Edward Hall. Cauſes of cardinall Campeius ſtaieng at Calis.

This cardinall Adrian being fallen in the popes diſpleaſure, withdrew out of the court of Rome vnto Venice: and in the meane time cardinall Campeius, at the inſtance of cardinall Woolſie, wrote to the pope, that cardinall Adrian might be depriued of that biſhoprike, to the end that cardinall Woolſie might haue the ſame. Which requeſt was accompliſhed, and the bulles ſent vnto Calis; ſo that then cardinall Campeius, after he had remained at Calis thrée moneths, came ouer into England, and was receiued with all pompe & honour that might be deuiſed. ¶ Inſomuch that cardinall Woolſie had ſent to the legat (whileſt he laie at Calis) red cloth to cloath his ſeruants, which at their comming to Calis were but meanelie apparelled. And when all things were readie, he paſſed the ſea and landed at Douer; and ſo kept forth his iournie toward London.

Abr.Fl. ex Edw.Hall in H.8.fol.lxiiij.

Cardinall Campeius receiued with great pompe.

At euerie towne as they paſſed, he was receiued with proceſſion, and accompanied with all the lords & gentlemen of Kent. And when he came to Blackeheath, there met him the duke of Norffolke, with a great number of prelats, knights, & gentlemen, all richlie apparelled. And in the waie he was brought into a rich tent of cloath of gold, where he ſhifted himſelfe into the robe of a cardinall, edged with ermins; and ſo tooke his mule riding towards London. The night before he came to London, the cardinall of Yorke, to furniſh the carriages of the cardinall Campeius, ſent to him twelue mulets with emptie coffers couered with red: which twelue mulets were led thorough London amongeſt the mulets of Campeius, which were but eight; and ſo theſe twentie mulets paſſed thorough the ſtréets, as though they had béene full of treaſures, apparell, & other neceſſaries.

What trumperie was incloſed in the lord legats cheſts.

Now when they came into Cheape, one of the mulets brake from hir kéeper, and ouerthrew the cheſts, and ouerturned two or thrée other mulets carriages, which fell with ſuch a violence, that diuerſe of them vnlocked; & out of ſome fell old hoſen, broken ſhooes, and roaſted fleſh, péeces of bread, egges, and much vile baggage. At which ſight the boies cried; Sée, ſée my lord legats treaſure: and ſo the muletters were aſhamed, and tooke vp all their ſtuffe and paſſed forth. About thrée of the clocke in the after noone on the twentie ninth day of Iulie the ſaid legat entered the citie, and in Southworke met him all the clergie of London, with croſſes, cenſors, and copes, and cenſed him with great reuerence. The maior and aldermen, with all the occupations of the citie in their beſt liueries ſtood in the ſtréets, and him highlie honoured: to whome ſir Thomas More made a bréefe oration in the name of the citie.

Now when he came to Paules, there he was receiued with biſhops mitred, and vnder a canopie entered the church: which canopie his ſeruants tooke for their fées. And when he had offered, he gaue his benediction to all the people, & tooke againe his mule, & ſo with all his traine aforeſaid was conueied to Bath place, and there reſted: where he was welcommed of the cardinall of Yorke. On ſundaie next inſuing, theſe two cardinals as legats tooke their barges, & came to Gréenewich, ech of them had beſides their croſſes two pillers of ſiluer, two little axes gilt, and two cloake-bags embrodered, & the cardinals hats borne before them. And when they came to the kings hall, the cardinall of Yorke went on the right hand: and there the king roiallie apparelled and accompanied, met them euen as though both had come from Rome and ſo brought them both vp into his chamber of preſence.

The glorious ſhewes or pompous port of the two cardinals going to the court.

Then a ſolemne oration was made by an Italian, declaring the cauſe of the legacie to be in two articles, one for aid againſt Gods enimies, and the ſecond for reformation of the clergie. And when maſſe was doone, they were had to a chamber, and ſerued of lords and knights, with much ſolemnitie: and after dinner they tooke their leaue of the king, and came to London, and rode through the citie togither, in great pompe and glorie to their lodgings.] This cardinall Campeius for his fréendſhip ſhewed in helping the cardinall of England to the biſhoprike of Bath, was conſidered (beſides other great rewards) with the biſhoprike of Saliſburie, the profits whereof he receiued, vntill the act was eſtabliſhed, that no forrenner ſhould inioie anie ſpirituall benefice within this realme. But for the chéefeſt errand that this cardinall Campeius came, he could haue no toward anſwer: which was (as you haue heard) to haue leuied a ſumme of monie by waie of tenths in this realme, to the maintenance of the warre in defenſe of the chriſtian confines againſt the Turke.

Sée after in the extract out of Guicciardine.

A craftie feare of the pope.

There were at the ſame time other legats ſent into other parts of Chriſtendome about the ſame matter, as into France, Spaine, and Germanie. For pope Leo calling to remembrance, that the feare conceiued of the Turkes had brought no ſmall gaines to diuerſe of his predeceſſors, he began to feare too. But for that ſuch feare was now too well knowne to be vſed as an ordinarie ſhift of the popes, when they ſtood in néed of monie, this practiſe was at this time vſed in vaine; ſo that Campeius hearing that it tooke not place in other parties, left off his earneſt ſute about it, and with great rewards receiued of the king and cardinall, returned to Rome, not without hope yet (by reaſon of promiſes made vnto him by his fréends) that the popes requeſt might hereafter be granted, according to his motion. There attended him to Rome one Iohn Clearke a lawier, as ambaſſadour from the king.

The court of the legat erected by the cardinall.

Examples of great ones what it doth.

This man obteined for the cardinall, authoritie to diſpenſe with all men for offenſes committed againſt the ſpirituall lawes, which part of his power legantine was verie profitable and gainefull. For then he ſet vp a court, and called it the court of the legat: in the which he prooued teſtaments, and heard cauſes, to the great hinderance of all the biſhops of this realme. He viſited biſhops, and all the cleargie exempt and not exempt, and vnder colour of reformation he got much treaſure. For thorough bribes & rewards, notorious offendors were diſpenſed with, ſo that nothing was reformed, but came to more miſchéefe. The example of his pride, cauſed préeſts and all ſpirituall perſons to wax ſo proud, that they ruffled it out in veluet and ſilks, which they ware both in gounes, iackets, doublets, and ſhooes. They vſed open lecherie, and bare themſelues ſo ſtout by reaſon of his authorities and faculties, that no man durſt reproue any thing in them. So that we ſée here verefied in proofe how forcible the examples of great men be in the inferior ſort; as the wiſe man truelie ſaith:

Qualis erit princeps, talis præfectus habetur,
Nobilitas qualis, plebs quoque talis erit.

Gu. Ha. in Eccl. cap.10.

[But before we inferre farther proceſſe of other accidents, it were good to heare a full diſcourſe, for the exact vnderſtanding of the popes affaires, whereabouts he addreſſed ſo manie cardinals into ſo manie parts of chriſtendome, as ſolicitors to obteine ſuccour againſt the Turke. ¶ Now followeth (ſaith mine author) the yeare 1518, in which the regions of Italie, contrarie to the precedent of manie yeares before, felt not the leaſt impreſſion or motion of war, yea there appeared the ſelfe ſame diſpoſition in all other princes of chriſtendome, betwéene whome by the operation of the pope, though happilie more with faire reaſon, than with ſubſtantiall counſels, was ſolicited an vniuerſall expedition of all chriſtendome aginſt the pride of Selim prince of the Turkes.

Abr. Fl. ex Guic. pag. 756.

The pope ſoliciteth all the princes of chriſtendome againſt the Turke.

This man the yeare before, had ſo inlarged and extended his greatneſſe, that comparing with his power, his ambition to be greater, puſhed on with manie helpes of nature, it was worthilie to be doubted, that if he were not preuented by the inuaſions of the chriſtians, he would in his pride lift vp his victorious hands againſt them. For Selim diſcerning that Baiſeth his father, reduced to extreme old age, ſought to eſtabliſh the ſucceſſion of the empire in the perſon of Acomath his elder brother, drew into rebellion againſt him, and by force of armes, concurring the corruption of the ſouldiors of his gard, conſtreined him to reſigne vp to him the authoritie of the gouernment: and not ſuffering his ambition to ſtaie there, it was beléeued of all men, that for his more abſolute aſſurance he tooke awaie his life by poiſon: and afterwards giuing an ouerthrow to his brother in an inconter of a battell, he confirmed fullie the ſeat of his empire, by depriuing him of his life in publike ſhew, exerciſing the like rage of crueltie vpon Corcu the yongeſt brother of all. And being not ſatiſfied according to the tyrannie of the houſe of Ottomanni, with the bloud and ſlaughter of all his nephues, or anie others that remained of that line and ſtocke, he was in thought oftentimes (by the rage and furie of his diſpoſition) to take awaie the life of Soliman his onelie ſonne.

The ambition and tyrannie of Selim againſt his father & affines.

Of theſe beginnings bréeding one warre vpon another, after he had ſubdued the Aduliti, a people of the mountaines, he paſſed ouer into Perſia againſt the Sophi, to whome he gaue battell and ouerthrew him, and in that felicitie of warre he tooke the citie of Tauris the ſoueraigne ſeat of that eſtate, togither with the greateſt part of Perſia which he was conſtreined to abandon, not through the valour of his enimies, who for their diſabilitie to ſupport their army were retired into the mounteins and places deſert, but for the vniuerſall dearth and barrenneſſe of that yeare, he fell into an extreme want of vittels: he returned ſoone after this expedition to Conſtantinople, where after he had doone execution vpon certeine ſouldiers ſeditious, and for certeine moneths had refreſhed his armie, he gaue out that he would eftſoons returne to make warre vpon Perſia. But indéed he turned his forces againſt the Soldan king of Soria and Aegypt, a prince not onelie of moſt ancient reuerence and dignitie for that religion; but moſt mightie for the amplitude of dominion, moſt rich in tributes, and verie glorious by the diſcipline of the Mammelukes, of whoſe armes and forces that ſtate was poſſeſſed with great reputation thrée hundred yeares.

Selim ouerthroweth the Sophi of Perſia.

The ſtate of the Soldan king of Soria and Aegypt.

For that empire, being ruled of the Soldans, they not by ſucceſſion but by election aſcended to it, and to the ſupreme ſeat of gouernement were not preferred but men of manifeſt vertue, and confirmed by all the degrées of warre, in the adminiſtration of prouinces and armies, and alſo the ſinewes and ſtrengthes of their forces ſtood not vpon ſouldiors mercenarie and forreine, but of men elected, who taken of children in the prouinces adioining, and trained vp by ſucceſſion of yeares in hardneſſe of fare, in ſuffering of labour and toile, and in the exerciſe of armes and all cuſtomes apperteining to the diſcipline and law of warre, they aſcribed and inrolled them in the order of the Mammelukes. There ſuccéeded from hand to hand in this order, not the ſons of the Mammelukes that were dead, but others, who being taken of children for ſlaues, had their riſing by the ſame diſcipline, and by the ſame induſtrie and artes, by the which their predeceſſours had paſſed from hand to hand.

Theſe not being in number aboue ſeuentéene or eightéene thouſand, held ſubiected vnder a moſt heauie yoke, all the people of Aegypt and Soria, whom they ſpoiled of the vſe of all armes, and practiſe to manage horſſes: yea ſuch was their fierceneſſe and valour, that oftentimes they made warre of themſelues, for that of their numbers and by their election were choſen the Soldans, and in their power reſted all authoritie to diſtribute the honours, offices, and profits of that moſt rich empire. By the opportunitie of which, hauing ſubdued manie nations adioining, and reduced to obedience the Arabians, and mainteined manie warres with the Turkes, they were manie times victorious, but verie ſeldome or neuer vanquiſhed of others. Againſt theſe people did Selim conuert his forces, whome he ouerthrew in manie battels fought in plaine field, wherein was ſlaine the Soldan, and afterwards in an other battell was taken priſoner the other Soldan his ſucceſſor, whome he cauſed to be publikelie murthered with an vnworthie kind of torment. Thus hauing ſatiſfied his bloudie humour with ſuch great ſlaughters, and alſo waſted the name of the Mammelukes, he procéeded to the inuaſion of Cairo a moſt populous citie, wherein were reſident the Soldans, and in ſhort time ſubdued vnder his iuriſdiction all Soria and Aegypt.

By whoſe election the Soldans were choſen.

The Turke ſlaieth the two Soldans and ſubdueth all Soria and Aegypt.

Theſe drew vnto him ſo great an increaſe of imperie, ſuch amplification of tribute and reuenue, and remouing the impediments of ſo mightie enimies, and of ſo great reputation, that with great reaſon hée was to be feared of the chriſtians. A feare which tooke his degrées of increaſing by this conſideration, that to ſo great a power and valour was ioined a ſettled impreſſion of ambition to beare rule, & by manie victories, to make glorious his name to all poſterities: wherein reading oftentimes the legends and actions of the great Alexander, and Iulius Ceſar, he ſéemed to ſuffer griefe and perplexitie of mind, that his actions & exploits of warre could in no wiſe hold compariſon with ſo manie great triumphs and victories. In which humour, refurniſhing continuallie his armies, and building of new a great number of ſhips, and leuieng all prouiſions neceſſarie for the warre, it was fered when his preparations were accompliſhed, that he would inuade Rhodes, the bulworke of the chriſtians in the eaſt parts, or elſe the kingdome of Hungaria, made fearefull by the valour of the inhabitants to the nation of the Turks, which at that time was in diuiſion amongſt themſelues, and made weake by the minoritie of their king, who was gouerned by the prieſts and barons of the realme.

The Turkes ambition hath no bounds of circumſcription.

Others were of opinion, that he had addreſſed all his thoughts to the inuaſion of Italie, taking his incouragement vpon the diſcord of the potentates and naturall princes, whome he knew to be much ſhaken with the long warres of thoſe regions. To this was ioined the memorie of Mahomet his grandfather, who with a power farre leſſe than his, and with a ſmall nauie ſent vpon the coaſts of the realme of Naples, had woone by aſſault the citie of Otronto: and (ſauing he was preuented by death) had both opened the way, and eſtabliſhed the meane to perſecute the regions of Italie with continuall vexations: ſo that the pope togither with the whole court of Rome being made aſtoniſhed with ſo great ſucceſſe, and no leſſe prouident to eſchew ſo great a danger, making their firſt recourſe vnto the aid and ſuccour of God, cauſed to be celebrated through Rome moſt deuout inuocations, which he did aſſiſt in preſence bare-footed.

The pope put in feare that the Turke will ouerrun the territories of Italie.

And afterwards calling vpon the helpe of men, he wrote letters to all chriſtian princes, both admoniſhing them of the perill, and perſuading them to lay aſide all ciuill diſcords and contentions, and attend ſpeedilie to the defenſe of religion & their common ſafetie, which he affirmed would more and more take increaſe of moſt grieuous danger, if with the vnitie of minds, and concordances of forces, they ſought not to transferre the warre into the empire of the Turks, & inuade the enimie in his owne countrie. Vpon this aduiſe and admonition, was taken the examination and opinion of men of warre, and perſons ſkilfull in the diſcouerie of countries, the diſpoſing of prouinces, and of the nature and vſage of the forces and weapons of that kingdome, and therevpon a reſolution was ſet downe to make great leuies of monie by voluntarie contributions of princes, and vniuerſall impoſts of all people of chriſtendome.

The pope beſtirreth him for his ſecuritie & tuition.

It was thought neceſſarie that Ceſar accompanied with the horſſemen of Hungaria and Polonia, nations warlike, and practiſed in continuall warre againſt the Turke, and alſo with the footmen of Germanie, ſhould ſaile along Danubi into Boſſina called ancientlie Miſia, and from thence to Thracia, and ſo to draw neare Conſtantinople, the ſeat of the empire of Ottomanes: that the French king with all the forces of his kingdome, the Venetians, and the other potentates of Italie, accompanied with the infanterie of Swizzerland, ſhould paſſe from the port of Brindiſi in Albania, a paſſage verie eaſie & ſhort, to inuade Greece, a countrie full of chriſtian inhabitants, and for the intollerable yoke of the Turkes, moſt readie to rebell: that the kings of Spaine, of England, and Portugall, aſſembling their forces togither in Cartagenia, and the ports thereabouts, ſhould take their courſe with two hundred ſhips full of Spaniſh footmen and other ſouldiers, to the ſtreict of Galipoli, to make rodes vp to Conſtantinople, hauing firſt of all ſubdued the caſtels and forts ſtanding vpon the mouth of the ſtreict: and the pope to take the ſame courſe, imbarking at Ancona, with an hundred ſhips armed.

Politike deuiſes to withſtand & preuẽt the Turkes purpoſes.

With theſe preparations, ſeeming ſufficient to couer the land, and ouerſpread the ſea, it was thought that of a warre ſo full of deuotion and pietie, there could not be but hoped a happie end, ſpeciallie adding the inuocation of God, and ſo manie ſeuerall inuaſions made at one time againſt the Turkes, who make their principall foundation of defenſe, to fight in the plaine field. Theſe matters were ſolicited with no ſmall induſtrie, and to ſtop all matter of imputation againſt the office of the pope, the minds of princes were throughlie ſounded, and an vniuerſall truce for fiue yeares betweene all the princes of chriſtendome, publiſhed in the conſiſtorie, vpon paine of moſt grieuous cenſure to ſuch as ſhould impugne it. So that the negociation continuing for all things apperteining to ſo great an enterpriſe, he aſſigned ambaſſadours to all princes: to the emperour he ſent the cardinall S. Siſto, to the French king he diſpatched the cardinall of S. Maria in Portico, the cardinall Giles to the king of Spaine, and the cardinall Campeius to the king of England.

Why it was generallie thought that this warre would haue luckie ſucceſſe.

This openeth the place of our Engliſh hiſtories.

All cardinals of authoritie, either for their experience in affaires, or for opinion of their doctrine, or for their familiaritie with the pope. All which things albeit they were begun with great hope and expectation, and the vniuerſall truce accepted of all men, and all men with no little oſtentation and brauerie of words, made ſhew of their readineſſe with their forces to aduance ſo good a cauſe: yet, what with the conſideration of the perill eſteemed vncerteine and farre off, and extending more to one prince than to another, and what by the difficulties and long tract of time that appeared, to introduce a zeale and vnion ſo vniuerſall, priuat intereſts and reſpects particular ſeemed to preuaile more, than the pietie of the expedition: inſomuch that the negociation ſtood not onelie naked of all hope and iſſue, but alſo it was followed verie lightlie, and as it were by ceremonie.

The popes negociation naked of all hope & iſſue.

This being one propertie in the nature of men, that thoſe things which in their beginnings appeare fearefull, doo dailie take ſuch degrees of diminution and vaniſhing, that vnles the firſt feares be reuiued by new accidents, they lead men in proceſſe of time to ſecuritie. Which propertie of negligence, both touching the affaires publike, and affection of priuate and particular men was well confirmed by the death that ſucceeded not long after to Selim, who, hauing by a long maladie ſuſpended the preparations of the warre, was in the end conſumed by the paſſions of his diſeaſe, and ſo paſſed into the other life, leauing ſo great an empire to Soliman his ſonne, yoong in yeares, and iudged to beare a wit and mind not ſo diſpoſed to the warres, although afterwards the effects declared the contrarie.

The death of Selim; and ſucceſſion of Soliman.

At this time appeared betweene the pope and the French king a moſt great and ſtreict coniuncton: for the king gaue to wife to Laurence his nephue, the ladie Magdalen noblie deſcended of the bloud and houſe of Bullognie, with a yearelie reuenue of ten thouſand crownes, whereof part was of the kings gift, and the reſidue riſing of hir owne patrimonie. Beſides, the king hauing borne to him a ſonne, the pope required that in his baptiſme, he would impoſe vpon him his name. By which occaſion Laurence making preparations to go to marrie his new wife, for his more ſpeed, performed his iournie by poſt into France, where he was receiued with manie amities and much honour of the king, to whome he became verie gratious and of deare account, the rather for that (beſides other generall reſpects) he made a dedication of himſelfe wholie to the king, with promiſe to follow in all accidents, his fortune.]

Aliance betwixt the pope & the French king.

And now to returne to cardinall Wolſie, who grew ſo into exceeding pride, that he thought himſelfe equall with the king. For when he ſaid maſſe (which he did oftener to ſhew his pompe, rather than for anie deuotion) he made dukes and earles to ſerue him of wine, with a ſay taken, and to hold to him the baſon at the lauatorie. Thus was the pride of the cardinall and other prieſts ſo paſt the compaſſe of reaſon, that in maner all good perſons abhorred and diſdeined it [as altogither degenerating from the example of Chriſt & his poore traine, of whome in name and title they ſeemed to be profeſſors, but of their maners and trade of life open defiers; yea in ſuch manifeſt ſort, both in apparell and diet, as alſo in all other reſpects, that few there were (if they perceiued anie thing by diſcretion) but ſaw the euident abuſes of their behauiours, tending greatlie to the diſhonour of the place which they poſſeſſed, as alſo to the no ſmall offenſe of the modeſter ſort of the cleargie, whereof ſome did ſo well like of this ruffling and maſking presbyterie, that they abhorred it as ſtrong poiſon in their broth.]

The exceſſiue pride of the cardinall.

It fortuned that the archbiſhop of Canturburie wrote to the cardinall, anon after that he had recei-ued his power legantine, the which letter after his old familiar maner he ſubſcribed thus: Your brother William of Canturburie. With which ſubſcription, bicauſe the archbiſhop wrote him brother, he was ſo much offended, as though the archbiſhop had doone him great iniurie, that he could not temper his mood, but in high diſpleaſure ſaid, that he would ſo worke within a while, that he ſhould well vnderſtand how he was his ſuperiour, and not his brother. When the archbiſhop (being a ſober wiſe man) heard of the meſſenger that bare the letter, how the cardinall tooke it not well, but ſo as it might ſéeme there was a great fault in the letter, and reported the tale as one that miſliked the cardinals preſumption herein: Peace (ſaid the archbiſhop) knoweſt thou not how the man is become mad with too much ioy. And thus the cardinall forgetting to hold the right path of true laud and praiſe, ſought to be feared rather than beloued of all good men.

In this meane time the French king greatlie coueting to redéeme the citie of Tornaie out of the hands of the king of England, and knowing that he muſt make waie therevnto thorough the cardinals fréendſhip, ceaſſed not with high gifts to win his good will, and moreouer in often writing to him, exalted him with titles of honor, and ſo magnified him, that the cardinall, as one tickled with vaine-glorie more than can be imagined, thought that he could not doo pleaſure enough to the French king, that did eſtéeme ſo much of him. Hervpon the French king hoping to compaſſe his deſire, after he perceiued the cardinals good will towards him, ſignified his meaning vnto the ſaid cardinall; who found meanes to breake thereof to the king, in ſuch wiſe as he was contented to heare the French kings ambaſſadors, that ſhould be ſent hither to talke of that matter.

The French king writeth to cardinall Wolſie.

Ambaſſadors from the French king.

The French king then vnderſtanding the king of England his pleaſure, ſent ouer the lord Boniuet high admerall of France, and the biſhop of Paris as chéefe ambaſſadours, accompanied with a great ſort of luſtie gentlemen of the French kings court, to the number of foure ſcore and aboue, on whome attended ſuch a companie of other of the meaner ſort, that the whole number amounted to twelue hundred one and other, which were thought to be manie for an ambaſſage. ¶ On mondaie the twentie ſeuenth daie of September, the earle of Surrie high admerall of England, in a coat of rich tiſſue cut on cloath of ſiluer, on a great courſer richlie trapped, and a great whiſtle of gold, ſet with ſtones and pearle, hanging at a great and maſſie chaine baudricke wiſe, accompanied with an hundred and ſixtie gentlemen, richlie apparelled, on goodlie horſſes came to Blackeheath, and there amiablie receiued the ambaſſadours of France. The yoong gallants of France had coats garded with one colour, cut in ten or twelue parts verie richlie to behold: and ſo all the Engliſhmen accoupled themſelues with the Frenchmen louinglie togither, and ſo road to London. After the two admerals followed foure and twentie of the French kings gard, accompanied with foure and twentie of the Engliſh gard. And after them a great numrer of archers, to the number of foure hundred. And in this order they paſſed thorough the citie to tailors hall, and there the chéefe ambaſſadours were lodged, and the remnant in merchants houſes about.

An vnreaſonable number for an ambaſſage.

Abr. Fl. ex Edw.Hall in Hen.8.fol.lxv.

The ambaſſadors of Frãce receiued on Blackeheath.

When theſe lords were in their lodgings, then the French harder men opened their wares, & made the tailors hall like the paund of a mart. At this dooing manie an Engliſhman grudged, but it auailed not. The laſt daie of September, the French ambaſſadours tooke their barge, and came to Gréenewich. The admerall was in a gowne of cloath of ſiluer raiſed, furred with rich ſables; and all his companie almoſt were in a new faſhioned garment, called a ſhemew, which was in effect a gowne cut in the middle. The gentlemen of France were brought into the kings preſence, where the biſhop of Paris made a ſolemne oration; which being ended, & anſwer made thereto, the king highlie interteined the admerall and his companie, and ſo did all the Engliſh lords and gentlemen.]

The French ambaſſadors come to the court.

The ambaſſadours after this were dailie in councell, till at length an agréement was concluded, vnder pretenſe of a marriage to be had betwéene the Dolphin of France, and the ladie Marie, daughter to the king of England: in name of whoſe marriage monie, Tornaie ſhould be deliuered vnto the French king, he paieng to the king of England for the caſtell which he had made in that citie, ſix hundred thouſand crownes, to be paid in twelue yeares ſpace, that is to ſaie, fiftie thouſand euerie yeare during that terme. And if the marriage chanced not to take effect, then ſhould Tornaie be againe reſtored to the king of England. For performance of which article, hoſtages ſhould be deliuered, that is to wit, monſieur de Montmorancie, monſieur de Montpeſac, monſieur de Moie, monſieur de Morret. Moreouer the French king ſhould paie to the lord cardinall of England a thouſand marks of yearelie penſion, in recompenſe of his reuenues before time receiued of the biſhoprike of Tornaie: and likewiſe to other of the kings councell he ſhould alſo giue certeine ſummes of monie as yearelie penſions, in like maner as his anceſtors had doone to the councellors of the kings of England before time.

Articles of agréement for the deliuerie of Tornaie.

The French K. agréed to call backe the duke of Albanie out of Scotland, that the ſuertie of K. James might the better be prouided for, and leſſe occaſion of trouble miniſtred to the king of England. And further the French king was contented that the ſaid king James ſhould be receiued as a confederat in this peace. When all things were concluded, the king and the ambaſſadours road to the cathedrall church of ſaint Paule in London from Durham place, where the cardinall of England ſang the maſſe in moſt pompous maner: and after that maſſe was ended, doctor Pace the kings ſecretarie made an eloquent oration in praiſe of peace: and that doone, the king and his nobles with the ambaſſadours went to the biſhops palace, and there dined, and after dinner, the king rode againe to Durham place. That night the cardinall of Yorke made to the ambaſſadors a ſolemne banket, and them accompanied manie lords and ladies of England. And when the banket was doone, in came ſix minſtrels, richlie diſguiſed, and after them followed thrée gentlemen in wide and long gownes of crimſin ſattin, euerie one hauing a cup of gold in their hands.

Edw.Hall.in H.8.fol.lxv.

The firſt cup was full of angels and rotals, the ſecond had diuerſe bales of dice, and the third had certeine paires of cards. Theſe gentlemen offered to plaie at mumchance, and when they had plaied the length of the firſt boord, then the minſtrels blew vp, and then entered into the chamber certeine ladies diſguiſed, on whome attended twelue knights diſguiſed bearing torches. All theſe thirtie & ſix perſons were in one ſute of fine gréene ſattin, all couered ouer with cloth of gold, vnder tied togither with laces of gold, and maſking hoods on their heads: the ladies had tiers made of braids of damaſke gold with long haire of white gold. All theſe maſkers danſed at one time, and after they had danſed, they put off their viſors, and ſo were they all knowne. The admerall and lords of France hartilie thanked the king, that it pleaſed him to viſit them with ſuch diſport. Then the king & his companie were banketted, and had high chéere; and ſo they departed euerie man to his lodging.

ging. The eight of October at Gréenewich, was ſong a ſolemne maſſe by the biſhop of Durham, and after maſſe, doctor Tunſtall, maiſter of the rolles, made an eloquent propoſition in praiſe of the matrimonie to be had betwixt the Dolphin and the ladie Marie. All that daie were the ſtrangers feaſted, and at night they were brought into the hall, where was a rocke full of all maner of ſtones, verie artificiallie made, and on the top ſtood fiue trées, the firſt an oliue trée, on which hanged a ſhield of the armes of the church of Rome; the ſecond a pineaple trée, with the armes of the emperour; the third a roſier, with the armes of England; the fourth a branch of lillies, bearing the armes of France; and the fift a pomegranat trée, bearing the armes of Spaine: in token that all theſe fiue potentats were ioined togither in one league againſt the enimies of Chriſtes faith.

A pageant verie ſumptuous and of notable deuiſe.

In and vpon the middeſt of the rocke ſate a faire ladie, richlie apparelled with a dolphin in hir lap. In this rocke were ladies and gentlemen apparelled in crimſin ſattin, couered ouer with floures of purple ſattin, embrodered vpon with wrethes of gold, knit togither with golden laces, and on euerie floure a hart of gold mouing. The ladies apparell was after the faſhion of Inde, with kerchiſes of pleaſance, hatched with fine gold, and ſet with letters of Gréeke in gold of bullion; and the edges of their kerchiſes were garniſhed with hanging perle. Theſe gentlemen and ladies ſat on the nether part of the rocke, and out of a caue in the ſaid rocke came ten knights, armed at all points, and fought togither a faire tournie. And when they were ſeuered and departed, the diſguiſors deſcended from the rocke, and danſed a great ſpace: and ſuddenlie the rocke moued and receiued the diſguiſors, and immediatlie cloſed againe.

Then entered a perſon called Report, apparelled in crimſin ſattin full of toongs, ſitting on a flieng horſſe with wings and féet of gold called Pegaſus. This perſon in French declared the mening of the rocke, the trées, and the tournie. After this paſtime ended, the king and the ambaſſadours were ſerued at a banket with two hundred and ſixtie diſhes, and after that a voidee of ſpices with ſixtie ſpice plates of ſiluer and gilt, as great as men with eaſe might beare. This night the cupbord in the hall was of twelue ſtages all of plate of gold, and no gilt plate. When that euerie man had béene plentiouſlie ſerued, the tables were taken vp, and the king with the quéene and all the ſtrangers departed to their lodgings.

A ſtatelie or roiall banket of two hundred and ſixtie diſhes.

After diuerſe iuſts & feaſts made for the ſaid ambaſſadours by the king and lords: ſir Thomas Exmew maior of London made to them a coſtlie dinner at Goldſmiths hall, which dinner they highlie praiſed, it was ſo well ordered. And when the time came, they tooke their leaue of the king, the quéene, and the kings councell, and deliuered into the kings poſſeſſion their foure hoſtages (as you haue heard before.) At which departing the king gaue to the admerall of France a garniſh of gilt veſſell, a paire of couerd baſens gilt, twelue great gilt boles, foure paire of great gilt pots, a ſtanding cup of gold, garniſhed with great pearles: and to ſome other alſo, he gaue plate, to ſome chains of gold, to ſome rich apparell, and to ſome great horſſes with rich bards, ſo that euerie gentleman was well rewarded; which liberalitie the ſtrangers much praiſed: and after that all their truſſes were readie they departed towards the ſea, and tooke ſhip and landed at Bullogne.]

The king of Englands munificence and bountifulneſſe to the French ambaſſadours & gentlemen.

Shortlie after their departure, the earle of Worceſter, lord chamberleine, the biſhop of Elie, the lord of ſaint Iohns, ſir Nicholas Vaux, ſir Iohn Pechie, ſir Thomas Bullen, as ambaſſadours from the king of England, accompanied with thrée ſcore and ten knights, gentlemen and yeomen, to the number of foure hundred and aboue, paſſed the ſea to Calis, and ſo from thenſe went to Paris, where they were noblie receiued, & being brought to the French kings preſence, the biſhop of Elie made a ſolemne oration touching the mariage and peace concluded.

Ambaſſadors ſent from king Henrie to the French king.

[To interteine the Engliſh ambaſſadours and gentlemen, the French king had made a banketting houſe in the baſtill of Paris betwéene foure old walles. This houſe was couered with cords ſtreined by craft, and euerie cord was woond about with box, and ſo laid croſſewiſe one ouer an other in fret, and at the méetings a great knop gilt with gold foile. Ouer their cords was ſtreined woollen cloaths of light blew: this roofe was foure ſcore foot high, and on euerie ſide thrée ſtages high: all the pillers of the ſtages were couered with antike works, & the breſts of the ſtages curiouſlie wrought with armes, viniets, and branches: the roofe was ſet full of ſtarres gilt & furniſhed with glaſſes betwéene the frets. In this houſe was two hundred and twelue branches gilt hanged, & on euerie branch a great number of lights of white wax.

Diuerſe ſorts of maſkes were ſhewed alſo that night: and at euerie ſide of the palace a great cupbord of maſſie plate of much greatneſſe was ſet, the French king welcomming the lords and ambaſſadours with good countenance.] Here is to be remembred, that immediatlie after the concluſion of the marriage, a rumor was raiſed, that the Dolphin was dead before, and that this marriage was but a colourable pretext, deuiſed of the Frenchmen for a policie to come by their purpoſe: and therefore, after that the Engliſh ambaſſadours had béene feaſted and interteined with banketting and princelie paſtime, the biſhop of Elie, with ſir Thomas Bullen, and ſir Richard Weſton, were appointed to go vnto Conſacke to ſée the Dolphin, where they were honorablie receiued, and brought vnto the preſence of the Dolphin, being a goodlie yoong child, whome they kiſſed and imbraced in moſt louing wiſe.

The earle of Worceſter, and with him ſir Nicholas Vaux, ſir Iohn Pechie, ſir Edward Belknap, and diuerſe others at the ſame time, tooke leaue of the French king, and rode to Tornaie to ſée the citie deliuered to the Frenchmen. Wherevpon, the eight of Februarie, the lord Chatillon came thither with one and twentie hundred men; and after ſome controuerſie moued about the deliuerie of his commiſſion, and ſealing an indenture, which the earle had there readie ingroſſed, conteining the articles of agréement, in conſideration whereof it was deliuered, the capteine ſir Richard Ierningham was diſcharged, and the Frenchmen ſuffered to enter with drumſlads and minſtrelſie, but not with ſtandards nor banners, which the Engliſhmen cauſed them to roll vp greatlie againſt their wils. Before they came to the gates, they ſealed the indenture, confeſſing how they receiued the citie as a gift, and not as a right, and deliuered their commiſſion, whereby they were authoriſed to receiue it, which at the firſt they refuſed to doo, affirming that it was ſufficient for them to ſhew it.

The maner how Tornaie was deliuered to the French king.

Thus was Tornaie deliuered in this tenth yeare of the kings reigne, on the eight daie of Februarie, & the Engliſhmen returned into England, ſore diſpleaſed in their minds. For thereby manie a tall yeoman lacked liuing, the which would not labour after their returne, but fell to robbing, pilfering, ſhifting, and other extraordinarie meanes of maintenance, whereas before they were ſtaied vpon a certeintie of hope, ſo long as they had allowance by the king. So that this reſignation of Tornaie, though it were anſwerable to the deſire of the French king, and commodious for his people, yet that benefit of theirs bred to the Engliſh ſoldiors detriment and loſſe: who wiſhed in their harts to haue left their liues behind them in defenſe of poſſeſſion, rather than it ſhould reuert into the hands of them, by whome it was ſurrendred ⁊ giuen vp to the Engliſh power, whom (bicauſe they were not able to incounter) they let in at their gates by a voluntarie motion and common conſent for their better ſafetie, as a late writer witneſſeth:

The light and miſliked demeanour of diuerſe yong gentlemen of England ⁊ the French king.

¶During this time remained in the French court diuerſe yong gentlemen of England, and they with the French king rode dailie diſguiſed through Paris, throwing egges, ſtones, and other fooliſh trifles at the people, which light demeanour of a king was much diſcommended and ieaſted at. And when theſe yong gentlemen came againe into England, they were all French, in eating, drinking, and apparell, yea, and in French vices and brags, ſo that all the eſtates of England were by them laughed at: the ladies and gentlewomen were diſpraiſed, ſo that nothing by them was praiſed, but if it were after the French turne, which after turned them to diſpleſure, as you ſhall heare.

After the kings ambaſſadours were returned, and Tornaie deliuered to the Frenchmen vpon the conditions aforeſaid, the hoſtages that were here left for the paiment of the great ſummes and performance of the conditions compriſed in the league (of the which one was, that if the marriage tooke none effect, then the citie of Tornaie ſhould be redeliuered vpon repaiment of the ſame ſummes) the ſaid hoſtages knew not in what caſe they ſtood, but when they knew it, they were verie heauie and ſorowfull: howbeit, they diſſembled the matter in the beſt wiſe they could. The king vſed familiarlie theſe foure hoſtages, and on the ſeuenth daie of Maie prepared a diſguiſing, and cauſed his great chamber at Greenwich to be ſtaged, and great lights to be ſet on pillors that were gilt, with baſons gilt, and the roofe was couered with blue ſattin ſet full of preſſes of fine gold and flowers: and vnder was written Iammes, the meaning whereof was, that the flower of youth could not be oppreſſed.

Preparation for ſolemne diſport.

Into this chamber came the king, and the queene, with the hoſtages, and there was a goodlie comedie of Plautus plaied; and that doone, there entered into the chamber eight ladies in blacke veluet bordered about with gold, with hoopes from the waſt downeward, and ſleeues ruffed and plited at the elbow, and plaine in the middeſt, full of cuts, plucked out at euerie cut with fine camerike, ⁊ tired like the Aegyptians verie richlie. And when theſe ladies had paſſed about the place, in came eight noble perſonages in long gownes of taffata ſet with flowers of gold bullion, and vnder that apparell cotes of blacke veluet embrodered with gold all to cut, and plucked out with cuts of white ſarcenet, and euerie man had buſkins of blacke veluet full of agglets of gold.

A comedie of Plautus plaied before the king.

Then the eight men danſed with the eight ladies all being viſarded, and ſuddenlie the men caſt off their large gownes, and then their vnder apparell was ſeene. And when all was doone, euerie lord and ladie put off their viſards, and then it was knowne that the king, the duke of Suffolke, and the French queene were there, which were preſent at the plaie time. On the eight daie of March was a ſolemne iuſtes, the king himſelfe, and eight yong gentlemen baſed and barded in blacke veluet embrodered with gold; againſt the duke of Suffolke, and eight of his band, all in white ſatten with drops of gold. And that daie they all ran exceeding well, which the ſtrangers highlie commended.]

A iuſtes.

About the end of March, the king ſent for all the yeomen of the gard that were come from Tornaie, and after manie good words giuen to them, he granted to euerie of them foure pence the daie without attendance, except they were ſpeciallie commanded.

The ſoldiors of Tornaie rewarded.

¶And here it ſeemeth requiſit to adde the report of a forreine chronicler touching the league of amitie and conditions of the ſame, knit vp in breuitie and good tearmes as followeth. Now (ſaith he) the differences betweene the French and Engliſh were alſo reconciled. And for the more ſtabilitie of which agreement, it was confirmed with a contract of parentage and aliance, wherein the king of England promiſed to giue his onelie daughter, to whome hauing no ſons, there was hope of the deſcending ⁊ ſucceſſion of the kingdome to the Dolphin the eldeſt ſonne of the crowne of France, adding for a portion foure hundred thouſand duckets. Both the one and the other bore yet ſo tender age, that infinit accidents might happen, before perfection of yeeres would make them able to eſtabliſh matrimonie. There was made betwene them a league defenſiue, wherin were comprehended Ceſar, and the king of Spaine, in caſe they would ratifie it in a certeine time.

The portion giuē with the kings daughter of England.

The king of England bound himſelfe to reſtore Tornaie, receiuing preſentlie for defraiments expended vpon that towne, two hundred and threeſcore thouſand duckets, and three hundred thouſand to bee defalked of the portion, and to paie three hundred thouſand more in the ſpace of twelue yeares. The French king alſo was bound, that if the peace and the parentage folowed not, to render vp againe into the hands of the Engliſh, the towne of Tornaie. Manie ambaſſadours were ſent from both the realmes to negociat this league, and to receiue the ratifications and othes, by whome in the courts of both the kings the acts of the accord were diſpatched with great ſolemnitie and ceremonie, with a reſolution of an interuiew of both the kings betweene Calis and Bullongne, immediatlie after the reſtitution of Tornaie.

About the ſame time, the daughter of the French king, appointed to be married to the king of Spaine, being dead, the former peace and capitulation was eftſoones reconfirmed betweene them, wherein was promiſed the marriage of the ſecond daughter of France. Both the kings celebrated this coniunction with moſt great demonſtrations of perfect amitie: for the king of Spaine, hauing paied in at Lions an hundred thouſand duckets, ware publikelie the order of ſaint Michaell vpon the day of the celebration of the ſame, and in recompenſe of that honour: the French king, vpon the daie dedicated to ſaint Andrew, was honorablie attired in the robes and colour of the golden fleece.

Peace and aliance betwixt the French king and the Spaniſh ſolemnlie celebrated.

About this time, John Ja. Triuulce, whome neither old age reduced almoſt to the laſt time, nor his vertue ſo oftentimes expreſſed in the ſeruice of the truce of France could anie waie aid or comfort (being both ambicious and impatient, and therefore enuied) following the French court, fell ſicke at Charters, where he gaue vp to the king, his innocencie and complaints, and made to God the laſt reckoning of his aged daies. He was a man in the iudgement of manie, and confirmed by ſundrie experiences, of ſingular valour in the diſcipline of warre, and ran a race alwaies oppoſed to the inconſtancie of fortune, who (according to hir mutabilitie) made him feele the operation of both hir humors, ſometimes reioiſing in hir fauour, and erſt againe finding hir ſowre and of a bitter taſt. By his commandement were written vpon his toome theſe words, not diſagreeable to the variable condition and courſe of his naturall life:

The death of the emperour Maximilian. Guic. pag. 763.

In this yeare the twelfe of Februarie, died the emperour Maximilian, for whome the king cauſed a ſolemne obſequie to be kept in Poules church. ¶ Hée died at Luiz, a towne vpon the marches of Auſtrich, where he remained for his delight and pleaſure in hunting the wild bore, and other chaſes of the field. He liued alwaies vnder one condition of fortune, who manie times fauoured him, in offering him manie faire occaſions, & as often wrought againſt him in not ſuffering him to take the fruit and effect of them. He was by nature inconſtant and remoueable, and had conceipts and impreſſions verie ill diſpoſed and different from the iudgement of other men, ioined to an exceſſiue prodigalitie and diſſipation of monie.

A deſcription of the emperors qualities.

Matters which cut off from him the effects and ſucceſſe of all occaſions, being otherwiſe a prince moſt perfect and inſtructed in the ordering of warre, ſecret to laie and diſpoſe a plot, diligent to follow it, of bodie able and ſuffering, of mind affable and eaſie, and repleniſhed with manie other excellent gifts and ornaments. Unto ſome of theſe properties, the good ſeruice which he did the king of England at Terwin giueth proofe, at what time both he and his people marched vnder the Engliſh enſigne, and receiued paie as ſtipendarie ſouldiors; whoſe wages the king had a care to paie, as maie appeare by his coining of ſiluer monie, whereof was ſcarſitie in his campe, in reſpect of gold, wherewith the ſouldiors were well ſtored, as one doth verie well make report, ſaieng:

Pro mercede nihil niſi fuluum ſoluitur aurum,
Auri militibus radiantis copia totis
Tanta fuit caſtris, vt rex cudiſſe coactus
Nummum ex argento fuerit.

The French king and the Spaniſh began to aſpire to the empire.

Aſſone as the emperour was dead, the French king and the king of Spaine began manifeſtlie to aſpire to the empire, the purchaſe whereof albeit was a matter of right great importance, and no leſſe the emulation running betwéene two ſo mightie princes, yet they ordered their ambition with great modeſtie, neither vſing words of iniurie, nor threats of armes; but either one labouring by his authoritie, & by his meanes, to draw on his ſide the electors. The French king ſundrie times reaſoned touching the election with great comelineſſe with the Spaniſh ambaſſadours, to whom he ſaid it was a matter both agréeable and conuenient, that either of them seuerallie ſhould ſéeke by honeſt meanes to increaſe the honour of his houſe by ſo great a dignitie: which for that in times before had bene transferred into the families of their predeceſſours, there was now the leſſe occaſion to bréed betwéene them two matter of iniurie, nor diminution of their amitie and good will.

But rather he wiſhed, that in the action of the empire, they might follow the example and order of two yoong louers, who albeit they follow the queſt of one ladie, and either one laboureth by his induſtrie to carie hir; yet they forbere to come to contention. The king of Spaine alluded with good right, that the empire apperteined to him, as hauing continued by a long ſucceſſion of time in the houſe of Auſtrich, and that it had not béene the cuſtome of the electors to depriue the iſſue of the emperour, without manifeſt cauſe of their diſabilitie, neither was there anie in Germanie of that puiſſance and authoritie to make him equall to ſtand competitor with him in that election. And leaſt of all did he hold it iuſt or likelie, that the electors would tranſport to a forreine or ſtrange prince, ſo great a dignitie continued by ſo manie ages in the nation of Germanie.

The king of Spains claim to the empire.

And albeit ſome particular amongſt them, either through the inſinuation of monie, or other propertie of corruption, might be allured to another intention, yet he hoped to ſtop him with force prepared in time conuenient, not doubting alſo but the other electors alſo would oppoſe againſt him, and the princes and frée townes of Germanie would not indure ſo vniuerſall an infamie, ſpeciallie to ſuffer it to be laid vpon the perſon of the French king, which would be no other thing than to make great the puiſſance of a king enimie vnto their nation, and from whome there was no ſuertie that the imperiall dignitie would euer returne into Germanie: he thought it would be an action eaſie to obteine and reduce to perfection, that which had bin ſolicited by his grandfather, who had alreadie compounded for recompenſes and donations, and other diuidents for euerie of the electors.

On the other ſide, the deſire of the French king was as great, and no leſſe were his hopes, which tooke their principall foundation vpon an opinion he had to corrupt the voices of the electors with his huge ſummes of monie: eſpeciallie for that there were amongeſt them both penſionaries to him, and otherwiſe aſſured by manie good offices, who incouraging him with the facilitie of the enterpriſe, puſhed him on to imbrace it. And for his part, as mortall men are apt to beléeue the thing they deſire, ſo he nouriſhed that hope with reaſons rather apparant than true: he knew that commonlie it was a matter grieuous to the princes of Germanie to haue the emperors mightie; being gealous that in ſo great a puiſſance, they would not either in part or in all, quarrell the iuriſdictions and authorities imperiall occupied by manie of them. In which reaſon he perſuaded himſelfe, that they would in no ſort conſent to the election of the Spaniard, & ſo of themſelues to ſubiect themſelues to an emperor more mightie than had béene ſince a long deſcent and race of emperors. A matter which in his perſon ſéemed to be qualified, for that hauing neither eſtates nor ancient aliances in Germanie, they had no occaſion of ſuſpicion of his greatneſſe.

The French king in hope to be emperor as well as the Spaniſh.

The ſame reaſon alſo made him beléeue well of the conformitie of the frée townes, in whome much leſſe that the regard of the glorie of the nation would carie it from him, ſéeing it would helpe to peize the ballance on his ſide, for that with moſt men the motions of proper and priuate intereſt maie doo more, than the reſpect of publike and generall profit. He knewe it was not a little grieuous to manie noble houſes of Germanie, pretending to be capable of ſuch a dignitie, to ſée the empire continue ſo long time in one houſe; but much more did it diſcontent them to ſuffer that ſo great an eſtate, which of right ought ſometimes to be giuen to one of them, and ſometime to paſſe to another, ſhould become a perpetuall deſcent and ſucceſſion in one line: inſomuch as they might call inheritance and ſucceſſion that election, which durſt not leaue the line of the emperors. That in that ſort the empire was tranſlated from Albert de Auſtrich to Frederike his brother, and from Frederike to Maximilian his ſonne; and now there was deuiſe to paſſe it from Maximilian to the perſon of Charles his grandchild.

The French king builded his hope vpon the humors of the princes of Germanie.

By theſe humors and indignations of the princes of Germanie, he tooke hope that the diſcords and gealouſies amongſt themſelues might helpe on his cauſe, the rather for that it often happeneth in the contentions of men, that he that is excluded, or the partie whome he fauoureth, runneth with a naturall raſhneſſe rather to call in, and to aduance a third, than to giue place to him that hath oppoſed againſt his intention. Moreouer, the French king was not without his hopes in the fauour of the pope, both in regard of the amitie and aliance newlie paſt betwixt them; and alſo for that he was not ignorant how inconuenient it would be to the ſée apoſtolike to haue the the imperiall crowne inueſted in Charls, nor ſo much for his owne greatneſſe, as for that by the opportunitie and neighbourhood of the realme of Naples to the eſtate of the church, and the adherencie of the barons of the Gebelins, he had a plaine and open paſſage to run vp to the gates of Rome.

But in that diſcourſe he conſidered not that the ſame reaſon, which he iudged true againſt Charles, was alſo againſt himſelfe: for that the empire being ioined to his perſon, he was no leſſe to be feared of the pope & all others, than Charles. For that though the one of them poſſeſſed happilie more realmes and ſtates; yet the other was not to be leſſe eſtéemed, hauing his power not diſperſed nor ſeparate in manie places, but was prince of a realme entierlie aſſembled and vnited, where the obedience and fidelitie of his ſubiects was no leſſe woonderfull, than his treaſure and riches infinite. Neuertheleſſe, not knowing in himſelfe that which he conſidered in an other, he had recourſe to the pope, and implored his fauor vnder the offer and proteſtation of his perſon and kingdoms, with all other deuotions of a louing ſon. Notwithſtanding all this, the French king was abuſed by his vaine hope, which fed him with fanſies of the empire, whereto he was not allotted nor elected.

Abr. Fl. ex Edw. Hall. in H.8. fol. lxviij, &c.

Charles the fift, king of Spaine choſen emperour.

For on the twentie eight of Iune was elected to be emperor Charles king of Caſtile, and nephue to the quéene, by the whole aſſent of the electors of the empire: namelie, the archbiſhop of Matence, the archbiſhop of Cullen, the count Palatine, and the duke of Saxon. Although the French king ſent his great maiſter to cauſe him to be elected to the high maieſtie of the empire; yet his ambaſſador and great maiſter of his houſhold (called Gonffier lord of Boiſie, and brother to William Gonffier lord Boneuet, admerall of France, which was ambaſſador in England the laſt yéere, as you haue heard) did not ſo his meſſage that it tooke anie effect. The king which had ſent doctor Pace his ſecretarie for the aduancement of his nephue the king of Caſtile, to the dignitie imperiall, becauſe he had the duchie of Auſtrich, and manie other ſeigniories in Almaine, was verie ioious of this election, and cauſed a ſolemne maſſe to be ſoong at Paules the ſeuenth daie of Iulie: at which maſſe was preſent the cardinall Campeius, the cardinall of Yorke, the duke of Buckingham, of Norfolke, & Suffolke, with the ambaſſadours of Spaine, France, Venice, and Scotland.

After maſſe was doone, the quier ſang Te Deum, and then all the lords departed to Bainards caſtell to dinner, and that night were ſolemne fires made thorough London, and great plentie of wine giuen by Italians, Dutchmen, and Spaniards for theſe newes. In this yeare the king with all the knights of his order being in England, rode on double horſſes, with the henchmen following the king from Colbrooke to Windſore in gorgious apparell, and there he kept with great ſolemnitie the feaſt of ſaint George, and dined in the hall. The biſhop of Wincheſter prelat of the order ſat at the boords end alone. The king was ſolemnelie ſerued and the ſurnap caſt like the feaſt of a coronation. All things were plentious to ſtrangers that reſorted thither. At the maſſe of Requiem were offered the banner & other habillements of honour belonging to Maximilian the emperour late deceaſſed.

The kings affableneſſe & familiaritie with the inferior ſort of people grudged at of the councell.

After this feaſt ended, the king came to Richmond, and ſo to Gréenewich, and there laie all Maie. In which moneth the kings councell ſecretlie communed togither of the kings gentleneſſe and liberalitie to all perſons: by the which they perceiued that certeine yoong men in his priuie chamber, not regarding his eſtate or degrée, were ſo familiar and homelie with him, that they forgat themſelues. Which things although the king of his gentle nature ſuffered, and not rebuked nor reproued it: yet the kings councell thought it not méet to be ſuffered for the kings honour, and therefore they all togither came to the king, beſéeching him to haue more regard to his roialtie.

Certeine of the priuie chamber remooued, and others in their roome appointed.

To whome the king anſwered, that he had choſen them of his councell, both for the maintenance of his honour, and for the defenſe of all things that might blemiſh the ſame: wherefore if they ſaw anie about him miſuſe themſelues, he committed it vnto their reformation. Then the kings councell cauſed the lord chamberleine to call before them diuerſe of the priuie chamber, which had béene in the French court, and baniſhed them the court for diuerſe conſiderations, laieng nothing particularlie to their charges, & they that had offices were commanded to go to their offices. Which diſcharge out of court gréued ſore the hearts of theſe yoong men, which were called the kings minions. Then was there foure ſad & ancient knights put into the K. priuie chamber, whoſe names were; ſir Richard Wingfield, ſir Richard Ierningham, ſir Richard Weſton, and ſir William Kingſton; and diuerſe officers were changed.

The king and quéene at Hauering in the Bower.

In this ſummer the quéene deſired the king to bring to hir manor of Hauering in the Bower in Eſſex the gentlemen of France being hoſtages, for whoſe welcomming ſhe purueied all things in the moſt liberall manner: and eſpeciallie ſhe made to the king ſuch a ſumptuous banket, that the king thanked hir hartilie, & the ſtrangers gaue hir great praiſe. The king lieng there did ſhoot, hunt, and run dailie with the hoſtages to their great ioy. This yéere in September the king laie at his manor of Newhall in Eſſex, otherwiſe called Beaulieu, where the king had newlie builded a coſtlie manſion, there to welcome the quéene, the lords, and the French gentlemen, he made to them a ſumptuous banket, and all along the chamber ſat a ladie & a lord, or a knight, which were plentiouſlie ſerued.

Newhall in Eſſex called Beaulieu.

A maſke of graue and ancient courtiers.

After the banket ended, with noiſe of minſtrels entered into the chamber eight maſkers with white beards, and long and large garments of blew ſattin paned with ſipers, poudered with ſpangles of bullion gold, and they danſed with ladies ſadlie, and communed not with the ladies after the faſhion of maſkers, but behaued themſelues grauelie. Wherfore the quéene plucked off their viſors, and then appeared the duke of Suffolke, the earle of Eſſex, the marqueſſe Dorſet, the lord Aburgauennie, ſir Richard Wingfield, ſir Robert Wingfield, ſir Richard Weſton, ſir William Kingſton: all theſe were ſomewhat aged, the yoongeſt man was fiftie at the leaſt. The ladies had good ſport to ſee theſe ancient perſons maſkers.

A maſke of youthfull courtiers.

When they departed, the king and the foure hoſtages of France, and the earle of Deuonſhire with ſix other yoong gentlemen entered the chamber, of the which ſix were all in yellow ſattin, hoſe, ſhooes, and caps, and ſix other were in like maner in gréene: the yelow ſattin was fretted with ſiluer of damaſke, and ſo was the gréene verie richlie to behold: then euerie maſker tooke a ladie and danſed. When they had danſed and communed a great while, their viſors were taken off, and they knowne, and the king gaue manie brooches and proper gifts where he liked.]

The king ſitteth in the Starchamber in iudgement.

In the moneth of Nouember the king came from Lambeth to Weſtminſter hall, and ſo to the Starchamber, and there were brought before him the lord Ogle, the lord Howard, ſir Matthew Browne, ſir William Bulmer, and Iohn Scot of Camerwell, for diuerſe riots, miſdemeanors, & offenſes by them committed: but the king ſpeciallie rebuked ſir William Bulmer knight, bicauſe he being his ſeruant ſworne, refuſed the kings ſeruice, and became ſer-nant to the duke of Buckingham: yet at length vpon his humble crauing of mercie, ſtill knéeling on his knées before his grace, the king pardoned him his offenſe: and likewiſe he pardoned the lord Howard, and ſir Matthew Browne, their offenſes: but bicauſe the lord Ogles matter concerned murther, he remitted him to the common law. And then he roſe and went to his barge, and by the waie made James Parford maior of the citie of London knight, and ſo returned to Lambeth.

The French king deſirous to continue the friendſhip latelie begun betwixt him and the king of England, made meanes vnto the cardinall, that they might in ſome conuenient place come to an interuiew togither, that he might haue further knowlege of king Henrie, and likewiſe king Henrie of him. But the fame went that the cardinall deſired greatlie, of himſelfe, that the two kings might méet, who meſuring by his will what was conuenient, thought it ſhould make much with his glorie, if in France alſo at ſome high aſſemblie of noble men, he ſhould be ſéene in his vaine pompe and ſhew of dignitie: hée therefore breaketh with the king of that matter, declaring how honourable, neceſſarie, and conuenient it ſhould be for him to gratifie his friend therein, and thus with his perſuaſions the K. began to conceiue an earneſt deſire to ſée the French king, and therevpon appointed to go ouer to Calis, and ſo in the marches of Guiſnes to méet with him.

Note the ambicious humor of the cardinal of Yorke.

Then were there ſent vnto Guiſnes, vnder the rule of ſir Edward Belknap thrée thouſand artificers, which builded out of the earth on the plaine before the caſtell of Guiſnes, a moſt pleaſant palace of timber, right curiouſlie garniſhed without and within. Herewith were letters written to all ſuch lords, ladies, gentlemen, and gentlewomen, which ſhould giue their attendance on the king and quéene, which incontinentlie put themſelues in a readineſſe after the moſt ſumptuous ſort. Alſo it was appointed that the king of England, & the French king, in a campe betwéene Ard and Guiſnes, with eightéene aides, ſhould in June next inſuing abide all commers being gentlemen, at the tilt, at tourneie, and at barriers, whereof proclamattion was made by Orleans king of armes of France here in the court of England, and by Clarenceaux king of armes of England in the court of France, and in the court of Burgognie, and in diuerſe other courts and places in Almanie and Italie.

Edw. Hall.

During the time of theſe preparations, newes were brought to the king, that Charles his nephue elected emperour of Almanie, would ſhortlie depart out of Spaine by ſea, and come by England to go to Acon or Air (a citie of fame and renowme in Germanie, for the ancient reſidence and ſepulchre of Charlemaine) where he receiued the firſt crowne. Wherefore the king hearing of this determination of the emperour, cauſed great prouiſions to be made at euerie hauen, for the receiuing of his welbeloued nephue and friend; & dailie prouiſions were made on all ſides for theſe noble méetings of ſo high princes: and eſpeciallie the quéene of England, and the ladie Dowager of France, made great coſt on the apparell of their ladies and gentlewomen.

Edw. Hall in H. 8. fol. lxix. Preparation for the interteining of the emperour Charles into England.

On the firſt daie of Februarie being Candlemaſſe euen, as the king and quéene were come from euenſong at there manour of Gréenwich, before the quéenes chamber there blew a trumpet ſuddenlie, and then entered into the quéens chamber foure gentlemen apparelled in long and large garments of blew damaſke bordered with gold, and brought with them a tricke waggon, in the which ſat a ladie richlie apparelled, with a canopie ouer hir head: and on the foure corners of the waggon were foure hedpéeces called armites, euerie péece being of a ſundrie deuiſe. The ſaid ladie put vp a bill to the king, the effect whereof was, that the foure gentlemen preſent would (for the loue of their ladies) anſwer all commers at the tilt at a daie by the king to be appointed: which daie was appointed at Shrouetide next inſuing. At which daie the foreſaid gentlemen valiantlie accompliſhed their enterpriſe, with great lauds of the king, the quéene, and the ladies.

A deuiſe of a waggon vpon the ſudden.

Moreouer, now that it was concluded, that the kings of England and France ſhould méet (as yée haue heard) then both the kings committed the order and manner of their méeting, and how manie daies the ſame ſhould continue, & what preheminence each ſhould giue to other, vnto the cardinall of Yorke, which to ſet all things in a certeintie, made an inſtrument, conteining an order and direction concerning the premiſſes by him deuiſed and appointed.

The whole maner of the interuiew committed to the cardinall.

The tenour of the ſaid inſtrument mad by the cardinall.

THomas archbiſhop of Yorke and cardinall, &c. Albeit that by the treatie and méeting of the right high, and right puiſſant princes, Henrie by the grace of God, king of England, and of France, lord of Ireland, my ſouereigne lord: and Francis by the ſame grace, K. of France right chriſtened, made and concluded at London the eight daie of October, the yeare of our Lord one thouſand fiue hundred and eightéene, be among other things concluded and accorded, that the ſame méeting ſhall be in place indifferent, and not ſubiect to any of the ſaid princes. Neuertheleſſe we, conſidering the honour, profit, and vtilitie, that ſhall redound by the interuiew of the ſaid two princes, and not onelie to the ſaid two princes, their realmes and ſubiects, but alſo to all chriſtendome, after declaration herevpon had with the ſaid princes.

Ab. Fl. ex Ed. Hall in H. 8. fol. lxx.

Alſo conſidering that the ſaid illuſtre king of England my ſoureigne lord, in paſſing the ſea with his retinue, ſhall ſuſteine great coſts and expenſes, and diſpoſe himſelfe to great labors and dangers, leauing his realme and puiſſance for certeine time, we haue thought & eſtéemed, that he ſhould not be wholie ſatiſfied to the honour and dignitie of the ſame, right illuſtre king of England my ſoureigne lord, and ſhould not haue in regard condigne of his labours and dangers, if the ſaid interuiew or méeting after the firſt treatie ſhuld be in place indifferent. Wherefore it is that we deſiring to weie equallie the honor and dignitie of the ſaid two kings, by vertue and power of the commiſſions to vs giuen, of whom the tenours ſhall bée hereafter declared: we haue made, declared, and ordeined certeine articles accepted & approoued by the ſame princes reſpectiuelie, which they will obſerue, and by theſe preſents we make, declare, and ordeine as followeth.

And firſt we declare and ordeine, that before the end of the moneth of Maie next comming, the ſaid illuſtre king of England ſhall come perſonallie to the caſtle of Guiſnes, with his bedfellow the quéene, and his

The firſt article of the interuiew of the two kings & their traine.

ſiſter the Dowareſſe of France: & ſemblablie the right chriſtened K. of France, ſhall come in perſon to his caſtle of Ard with the queene & his mother: and ſome day, houre, and time, within foure daies at the moſt, after the end of Maie, that ſhall be aſſigned by the commiſſioners of the one and the other partie, the ſaid king of England ſhall iſſue out of his caſtell of Guiſnes half a mile long, without that that he ſhall iſſue out of the limits of his demain of Guiſnes, and ſhall come towards the ſaid caſtell of Ard: and there within the territorie of the ſaid caſtell of Guiſnes, he ſhall reſt in ſome place not fortified nor walled, and neere the limits of France, that the ſaid commiſſioners ſhall aſſigne (as aboue ſaid.)

The maner of their meeting and mutuall greeting.

And the ſaid right chriſtened king, parting from his caſtell of Ard, ſhall come toward the ſaid king of England the ſame day, place, time, and houre, that ſhall tarie him within the demaine of Guiſnes, as is ſaid. In the which ſhall not bee ſet or dreſſed anie pauilions or tents, and there the ſaid two kings being on horſſebacke, with their retinue ſhall ſee the one the other, and ſalute each other, and ſpeake together familiarlie, and common in that ſort and maner, and ſo long as ſhall ſeeme to them good. And after the ſaid ſalutation and communication finiſhed for that time, the ſaid illuſtre king of England ſhall returne to his caſtell of Guiſnes, and the ſaid right chriſtened king to his caſtell of Ard.

What doth the kings were to doo the morrow after the firſt interuiew.

Item, for ſo much that we thinke to be ſatiſfied touching the labours, dangers, & honour of the ſaid king of England, my ſoueraigne lord of ſo much, that the ſaid right chriſtened king at the firſt ſpeaking, he ſhall come forward vnto, and within his territorie of Guiſnes, we will keepe the honour of the ſaid kings: & therefore declare and ordeine, that on the morrow after the firſt interuiew, the ſame kings ſhall meet togither in ſome fit place, indifferent betweene Ard and Guiſnes, that ſhall be aſſigned by the ſaid commiſſioners.

And after the ſalutation made on the one and the other partie, the ſaid right illuſtre king of England ſhall go to the caſtell of Ard, to ſee, ſalute, and viſit the queene of France, and alſo the ſiſter of the ſaid chriſtened king, with whome he ſhall dine priuilie. And likewiſe the ſaid right chriſtened king ſhall go to the caſtell of Guiſnes, to viſit and ſalute the queene of England, and the Dowareſſe of France, with whome he ſhall dine. In the which places the ſaid princes ſhall be receiued familiarlie and amiablie, vnto mutuall loue, and alſo to the honour of the ſaid princes.

Order for feats of cheualrie and actiuitie and the place thereto appointed.

Item, as the ſaid ſerene princes of England & France, be like in force corporall, beautie, & gift of nature, right expert & hauing knowledge in the art militant, right cheualrous in armes, & in the flower and vigor of youth, wherby ſeemed to vs a right aſſemblie, that for to adorne and honor the ſame aſſemblie, and to ſhew their forces in armes, they ſhall take counſell and diſpoſe themſelues to doo ſome faire feat of armes, as well on foot as on horſſebacke, againſt all commers: we declare and ordeine, that the place where ſhall be the ſaid fight and feat of armes, ſhall be choſen betweene Guiſnes and Ard, and aſſigned by the commiſſioners of the one and the other partie.

And for a ſuertie of the perſons of the ſaid kings & their companie, the ſaid place ſhall be apparelled, diched, fortified, and kept of the one and the other partie, by equall number of men of armes, reſpectiuelie committed and deputed that to doo. And during the time of the ſaid iuſts and feats of warre, the ſame kings and queenes with their retinue, ſhall ſee ech other familiarlie, and conuerſe and ſpeake togither. And euerie daie towards the euening, after the iuſts, triumphs, bankets, & familiar communications doone, the ſaid kings with their retinue ſhall returne into their caſtels, that is to ſay, the king of England into his caſtell of Guiſnes, & the ſaid right chriſtened king into his caſtell of Ard; and thus they ſhall doo dailie, during the ſaid fight and feat of armes.

Order for ſuperioritie to be giuen to the king of England and the queene within the French territorie.

Item, we declare and ordeine, that when the ſame king of England and the queene his bedfellow, & the Dowareſſe of France his ſiſter, with their retinue, ſhall go to the territorie and entrie of the foreſaid right chriſtened king, the ſuperioritie and preheminence ſhall be giuen to the ſaid king of England, to the queene his bedfellow, and to their retinue reſpectiuelie, during the time that they ſhall tarie and be there: and ſemblablie when the ſaid right chriſtened king, and the queene his bedfellow and his right illuſtre ladie and moother, with their retinue ſhall come to the territorie and entrie of the ſaid illuſtre king of England, the ſuperioritie and preheminence ſhall be giuen to the ſaid right chriſtened king, to the queene his bedfellow, and to his moother, and to their retinue during the time that they ſhall continue and abide there.

Order for reſtraint of aſſemblies to the places appointed for the interuiew.

Item, forſomuch as the caſtels and places where the ſaid interuiew ſhall be, be ſo little and narrow, that if entrie and licence to come thither be giuen to all them that would go thither, diuers annoiances, troubles & impechments ſhould follow: wherfore it is ſo, that we the cardinall aboue ſaid, by theſe preſents declare and ordeine, that none of the retinue of the ſaid kings, queenes, or other lords and nobles, of what eſtate, qualitie, or condition that he or they be of, ſhall not come to the ſaid aſſemblie with more great number of perſons or horſſe, than ſhall be written by letters ſubſcribed by the ſaid kings: the which ſhall conteine the eſtates and conditions of the perſons, as well men as women, and number of ſeruants and horſſe, except the common conſent and licence of the ſaid kings.

Item, forſomuch as peraduenture it ſhall come that the ſaid princes, lords, gentlemen, Order for both princes perſonall ſecuritie going and comming.

tlemen, and houſhold ſeruants, ſhall ſee and conuerſe togither familiarlie, to the end that it maie ingender betweene them an amitie more firme and ſtable, for that cauſe, and that more ſuerlie and agreeablie they may be togither, as well by day as by night without any danger or feare, which we deſire to prouide: we declare and ordeine that two gentlemen, with ſufficient companie of equall & like number, be committed and deputed, reſpectiuelie by the ſaid kings for the keeping and ſuertie of the waies and watches, that ſhall be made continuallie during the aſſemblie of the ſaid kings. The which gentlemen, with their companies, ſhall ordeine and depute exploratours and ſpies in the vallies, forreſts, woods, towns, burrowes, villages, caſtels, paſſages, and waies, and other places dangerous and ſuſpect: from time to time, and houre to houre, as well towards Flanders, as Picardie, Artois, & England, to exploit and watch there.

And if anie be found ſuſpect, them to repulſe and take awaie, to the end that not onelie the ſaid princes, their gentlemen, and houſhold-ſeruants, maie ſuerlie and without feare viſit the one the other, as ſaid is; but alſo thoſe that ſhall bring vittels neceſſarie to the ſaid aſſemblie, maie without danger, trouble, impechement, or noiſance go and come: the which exploratours ſhall be bounden euerie daie in the morning and euening, to make report to the ſaid princes or to their ſaid councellours reſpectiuelie, of that which they found, and in what eſtate the waies be. We declare further and ordeine, that all men of armes and of warre, of the one and the other partie, ſhall not approch neerer than two iournies, to the place where the ſaid interuiew ſhall be, except the retinue and men of war that be committed and deputed to keepe Bullongne and Calis: and that the ſame men of warre nor none other, during the aſſemblie of the ſaid princes, ſhall not preſume to come neerer, vnleſſe by the conſent, accord, and licence of the ſaid princes.

Order for the limiting of men in armes or garriſons.

Item, we cardinall aboue ſaid, by expreſſe authoritie and power to vs giuen, by theſe preſents, bind the ſaid princes to doo, fulfill, and accompliſh, all and euerie things aboue ſaid herein conteined. Finallie, we declare and ordeine, that ech of the ſaid kings on his partie, ſhall ratifie, confirme, and approoue all and euerie the chapters and articles aboue ſaid, by their letters pattents ſealed with their hands. And by the ſame letters of ratification they ſhall be bounden, to accompliſh with good faith and word of a king, all and euerie the things aboue ſaid: the which letters made, ſubſcribed, and ſealed, as is ſaid, they ſhall giue the one the other, and ſhall change in the citie of London, within one moneth next after the date of theſe preſents. Made the twelfe of March, the yeare of our Lord a thouſand fiue hundred and nineteene.

The laſt clauſe of this inſtrument for the ratification of the articles therein conteined.

The peeres of the realme receiuing letters to prepare themſelues to attend the king in this iournie, and no apparant neceſſarie cauſe expreſſed, why nor wherefore; ſeemed to grudge, that ſuch a coſtlie iournie ſhould be taken in hand to their importunate charges and expenſes, without conſent of the whole boord of the councell. But namelie the duke of Buckingham, being a man of a loftie courage, but not moſt liberall, ſore repined that he ſhould be at ſo great charges for his furniture forth at this time, ſaieng; that he knew not for what cauſe ſo much monie ſhould be ſpent about the ſight of a vaine talke to be had, and communication to be miniſtred of things of no importance. Wherefore he ſticked not to ſaie, that it was an intollerable matter to obeie ſuch a vile and importunate perſon.

Great hatred betweene the cardinall, and the duke of Buckingham.

The duke indeed could not abide the cardinall, and ſpeciallie he had of late conceiued an inward malice againſt him for ſir William Bulmers cauſe, whoſe trouble was onelie procured by the cardinall; who firſt cauſed him to be caſt in priſon. Now ſuch greeuous words as the duke thus vttered againſt him, came to the cardinals eare; wherevpon he caſt before hand all waies poſſible to haue him in a trip, that he might cauſe him to leape headleſſe. But bicauſe he doubted his freends, kinneſmen, and alies, and cheeflie the earle of Surrie lord admerall, which had married the dukes daughter, he thought good firſt to ſend him ſome whither out of the waie, leaſt he might caſt a trumpe in his waie. There was great enimitie betwixt the cardinall and the earle, for that on a time, when the cardinall tooke vpon him to checke the earle, he had like to haue thruſt his dagger into the cardinall.

At length there was occaſion offered him to compaſſe his purpoſe, by occaſion of the earle of Kildare his comming out of Ireland. For the cardinall knowing he was well prouided of monie, ſought occaſion to fleece him of part thereof. The earle of Kildare being vnmarried, was deſirous to haue an Engliſh woman to wife; and for that he was a ſuter to a widow contrarie to the cardinals mind, he accuſed him to the king, of that he had not borne himſelfe vprightlie in his office in Ireland, where he was the kings lieutenant. Such accuſations were framed againſt him when no bribes would come, that he was committed to priſon, and then by the cardinals good preferment the earle of Surrie was ſent into Ireland as the kings deputie, in lieu of the ſaid earle of Kildare, there to remaine rather as an exile, than as lieutenant to the king, euen at the cardinals pleaſure, as he himſelfe well perceiued.

The earle of Kildare committed to ward.

Edw. Hall.

In the beginning of Aprill, the ſaid earle paſſed ouer into Ireland, and had with him diuerſe gentlemen that had beene in the garriſon of Tornaie, and one hundred yeomen of the kings gard, and others, to the number of a thouſand men, where he by his manhood and policie brought the earle of Deſmond and diuerſe other rebels to good conformitie and order. He continued there two yeares, in which ſpace he had manie bickerings and ſkirmiſhes with the wild Iriſh. There reſted yet the earle of Northumberland, whome the cardinall doubted alſo, leaſt he might hinder his purpoſe, when he ſhould go about to wreake his malice againſt the duke of Buckingham: and therefore he picked a quarell to him, for that he had ſeized vpon certeine wards which the cardinall ſaid apperteined of right to the king. And bicauſe the earle would not giue ouer his title, he was alſo committed to priſon, & after tooke it for a great benefit at the cardinals hands, that he might be deliuered out of his danger.

Good ſeruice doone by the earle of Surrie.

Polydor.

The earle of Northumberland committed to priſon.

Now in this meane while, the cardinall ceaſſed not to bring the duke out of the kings fauour, by ſuch forged tales, and contriued ſurmiſes, as he dailie put into the kings head: inſomuch that (through the infelicitie of his fate) diuerſe accidents fell out to the aduantage of the cardinall; which he not omitting, atchiued the thing whereat he ſo ſtudiouſlie (for the ſatiſfieng of his canckered & malicious ſtomach) laid full aime. Now it chanced that the duke comming to London with his traine of men, to attend the king into France, went before into Kent vnto a manor place which he had there. And whileſt he ſtaid in that countrie till the king ſet forward, greeuous complaints were exhibited to him by his farmars and tenants againſt Charles Kneuet his ſurueiour, for ſuch bribing as he had vſed there amongeſt them. Wherevpon the duke tooke ſuch diſpleaſure againſt him, that he depriued him of his office, not knowing how that in ſo doing he procured his owne deſtruction, as after appeared.

Anno Reg.12.

The king ſetteth forward towards France.

The kings maieſtie perſeuering in purpoſe to meet with Francis the French king, remooued with the queene, and all his court, the one & twentith day of Maie being mondaie, from his manor of Greenwich towards the ſea ſide: and ſo on the fridaie the fiue and twentith of Maie, he arriued at the citie of Canturburie, intending there to keepe his Whitſuntide. On the morrow after, the emperour being on the ſea returning out of Spaine, arriued with all his nauie of ſhips roiall on the coaſt of Kent, direct to the port of Hieth the ſaid daie by noone, where hee was ſaluted by the viceadmerall of England, ſir William Fitz William, with ſix of the kings great ſhips well furniſhed, which laie for the ſafegard of paſſage betwixt Calis and Douer. Towards euening the emperour departed from his ſhips, and entered into his bote, and comming towards land, was met and receiued of the lord cardinall of Yorke with ſuch reuerence as to ſo noble a prince aperteined.

The emperor Charles the fift landeth in England.

Thus landed the emperour Charles the fift at Douer, vnder his cloth of eſtate of the blacke eagle, all ſpread on rich cloth of gold. He had with him manie noble men, and manie faire ladies of his bloud. When he was come on land, the lord cardinall conducted him to the caſtell of Douer, which was prepared for him in moſt roiall maner. In the morning, the king rode with all haſt to the caſtell of Douer to welcome the emperour, and entering into the caſtell, alighted. Of whoſe comming the emperour hauing knowledge, came out of his chamber, and met him on the ſtaires, where either of them embraced other in moſt louing maner, and then the king brought the emperour to his chamber. On Whitſundaie earlie in the morning, they tooke their horſſes, and rode to the citie of Canturburie, the more to keepe ſolemne the feaſt of Pentecoſt: but ſpeciallie to ſee the queene of England his aunt was the emperour his intent, of whome ye may be ſure he was moſt ioifullie receiued and welcomed.

The meeting of the emperor and K. Henrie at Douer caſtell.

The emperor and K. Henrie keepe whitſuntide at Canturburie.

Thus the emperour and his retinue, both of lords and ladies, kept their Whitſuntide with the king and queene of England, in the citie of Canturburie with all ioy and ſolace. The emperour yet himſelfe ſeemed not ſo much to delight in paſtime and pleaſure, but that in reſpect of his youthfull yeares, there appeared in him a great ſhew of grauitie: for they could by no meanes bring him to danſe amongſt the reſidue of the princes, but onelie was contented to be a looker on. Peraduenture the ſight of the ladie Marie troubled him, whome he had ſometime loued, and yet through fortunes euill hap might not haue hir to wife. The chiefe cauſe that mooued the emperour to come thus on land at this time, was to perſuade that by word of mouth, which he had before done moſt earneſtlie by letters; which was, that the king ſhould not meet with the French king at anie interuiew; for he doubted leaſt if the king of England & the French king ſhould grow into ſome great friendſhip and faithfull bond of amitie, it might turne him to diſpleaſure.

Polydor.

The emperor laboureth to hinder the purpoſed interuiew.

But now that he perceiued how the king was forward on his iournie, he did what he could to procure, that no truſt ſhould be committed to the faire words of the Frenchmen: and that if it were poſſible, the great friendſhip that was now in breeding betwixt the two kings, might be diſſolued. And forſomuch as he knew the lord cardinall to be woone with rewards, as a fiſh with a bait: he beſtowed on him great gifts, and promiſed him much more, ſo that hee would be his friend, and helpe to bring his purpoſe to paſſe. The cardinall not able to ſuſteine the leaſt aſſault by force of ſuch rewards as he preſentlie receiued, and of ſuch large promiſes as on the emperours behalfe were made to him, promiſed to the emperour, that he would ſo vſe the matter, as his purpoſe ſhould be ſped: onelie he required him not to diſalow the kings intent for interuiew to be had, which he deſired in anie wiſe to go forward, that he might ſhew his high magnificence in France, according to his firſt intention,

Edw.Hall.

The king landeth at Calis.

The emperour remained in Canturburie till the thurſdaie, being the laſt of Maie, and then taking leaue of the king, and of his aunt the queene, departed to Sandwich, where he tooke his ſhips and ſailed into Flanders. The ſame daie, the king made ſaile from the port of Douer, and landed at Calis about eleuen of the clocke, and with him the queene and ladies, & manie nobles of the realme. His grace was receiued into the checker, and there reſted. The fourth of Iune, the king and queene with all their traine remooued from Calis, to his princelie lodging newlie erected beſide the towne of Guiſnes, the moſt noble & roiall lodging that euer before was ſeene. ¶ For it was a palace, the which was quadrant, and euerie quadrant of the ſame palace was three hundred and twentie eight foot long of aſſiſe, which was in compaſſe thirteene hundred and twelue foot about. This palace was ſet on ſtages by great cunning & ſumptuous worke.

Ed.Hall in H8 fol.lxxiij.

The deſcriptiō of the new palace before Guiſnes.

At the entering into the palace before the gate, on the plaine greene, was builded a fountaine of imbowed worke, gilt with fine gold, and bice, ingrailed with antike works: the old god of wine called Bacchus birling the wine, which by the conduits in the earth ran to all people plentiouſlie with red, white, and claret wine, ouer whoſe head was written in letters of Romane in gold, Faicte bonne chere qui vouldra. On the other hand or ſide of the gate was ſet a piller, which was of ancient Romane worke, borne with foure lions of gold, the piller wrapped in a wreath of gold curiouſlie wrought and intrailed, and on the ſummit of the ſaid piller ſtood an image of the blind god Cupid, with his bow and arrows of loue, readie by his ſeeming to ſtrike the yong people to loue.

The foregate of the ſame palace.

The foregate of the ſame palace or place with great and mightie maſonrie by ſight was arched, with a tower on euerie ſide of the ſame port, rered by great craft, and imbattelled was the gate and tower, and in the feneſters and windowes were images reſembling men of warre, readie to caſt great ſtones. Alſo the ſame gate or tower was ſet with compaſſed images of ancient princes, as Hercules, Alexander, and other by intrailed worke, richlie limmed with gold and albine colours: and well and warilie was made ouer the gate loups, and inforced with battelments, and in the ſame gate a lodge for the porter, which there appeared, and other ſumptuouſlie apparelled like vnto kings officers. By the ſame gate all people paſſed into a large court faire and beautifull, The large court.

tifull, for in this court appeared much of the outward beautie of this place, for from the firſt water table, to the raiſing or reiſin péeces, were baie windowes, on euerie ſide mixed with cleare ſtories curiouſlie glaſed, the poſts or moinels of euerie window was gilt.

Thus the outward part of the place lumined the eies of the beholders, by reaſon of the ſumptuous worke. Alſo the tower of the gate (as ſéemed) was builded by great maſonrie, and by great engine of mans wit, for the ſundrie countenances of euerie image that there appeared, ſome ſhooting, ſome caſting, ſome readie to ſtrike, and firing of gunnes, which ſhewed verie honorablie. Alſo all the ſaid quadrants, baies, and edifices, were roiallie intrailed, as farre as vnto the ſame court apperteined. And direct againſt the gate was deuiſed a halpas, and at the entrie of the ſtaire, were images of ſore and terrible countenances, all armed in curious worke of argentine. The baie of the ſame halpas pendant by craft of timber, & vnder it antike images of gold inuironed with verdor of olifs caſt in compaſſe, mouſtring their countenances toward the entring of the palace. The ſtaire of the ſaid halpas was caſt of paſſage by the wents of brode ſteps, ſo that from the firſt foot or loweſt ſtep, anie perſon might without paine go vnto the higheſt place of the ſame halpas.

The halpas.

On euerie hand was their chamber doores and enterings into the chambers of the ſame palace, which were long and large, and well proportioned, to receiue light and aire at pleaſure: the roofes of them from place to place, and chamber to chamber were ſieled, and couered with cloth of ſilke, of the moſt faire and quicke inuention that before time was ſéene. For the ground was white ingraild, embowed, and batoned with rich clothes of ſilkes, knit and fret with cuts and braids, and ſundrie new caſts; that the ſame clothes of ſilke ſhewed like bullions of fine burned gold: and the roſes in loſenges, that in the ſame roofe were in kindlie courſe, furniſhed ſo to mans ſight, that no liuing creature might but ioy in the beholding thereof. For from the ſaw péece of the ſaid ſieling (which péece was gilt with fine gold) were workes in pane paled, all the walles to the creſt incountering the cleare ſtories, the ſame creſt which was of large déepneſſe, the worke was antike knots with boſſes caſt and wrought with more cunning than I can write, all which works and ouerages were gilt, and to ſet it the more to the glorie, the flouriſhing biſe was comparable to the rich ammell.

The chambers and lodges.

Alſo at the foot of the ſame palace was another creſt all of fine ſet gold, whereon hanged rich & maruelous clothes of arras wrought of gold and ſilke, compaſſed of manie ancient ſtories, with which clothes of arras euerie wall and chamber were hanged, & all the windowes ſo richlie couered, that it paſſed all other ſights before ſéene. In euerie chamber and euerie place conuenient were clothes of eſtate, great and large of cloth of gold, of tiſſue, and rich embroderie, with chaires couered with like cloth, with pommels of fine gold, and great cuſhins of rich worke of the Turkie making, nothing lacked of honourable furniſhment. Alſo to the ſame palace was reared a chappell with two cloſets, the quire of the ſaid chappell ſieled with cloth of gold, and thereon fret ingrailed bent clothes of ſilke, all was then ſilke and gold. The altars of this chappell were hanged with rich reueſture of cloth of gold and tiſſue, embrodered with perles. Ouer the hie altar was hanged a rich canopie of maruellous greatneſſe, the altar was apparelled with fiue paire of candleſticks of gold, and on the altar an halpas, and thereon ſtood a crucifix all of fine gold, and on the ſame halpas ſtood twelue images of the bignes of foure yeares of age, all gold.

The hangings & other ornaments.

The chappell with appurtenances.

All the copes and veſtments were ſo rich as might be prepared or bought in the citie of Florens, for they were all but of one péece, ſo wouen for the purpoſe, cloth of tiſſue and powdered with red roſes purpled with fine gold. The Orfris ſet with pearles and precious ſtones. And all the walles and deſkes of this chappell were hanged with right cloth of gold, & thrée rich great croſſes were there readie to be borne at feſtiuall times, and baſens and cenſers, goſpellers, pares, crewets, holie water veſſels, and other ornaments all of gold. Alſo in the firſt cloſet was a trauerſe for the kings perſon of cloth of gold, & in it his place & chaire, with cuſhins of cloth of gold: before the trauerſe was an altar of preſence, which altar was adorned with cloth of broderie, and rich pearles and precious ſtones, ſet in goldſmiths worke of fine gold. On the altar was a deſke or halpas, whereon ſtood a patible of the crucifix of fine gold, with an image of the Trinitie, an image of the virgine Marie, and twelue other images, all fine gold & precious ſtones, two paire of candleſticks of fine gold, with the baſens, crewets, pares, and other ornaments.

Great coſt vpō popiſh triumperie & ſuperſtitious traſh,

The kings cloſet.

The ſaid cloſet was hanged with tapets embrodered with rich worke fret with pearles and ſtones, the roofe of the ſame cloſet was ſieled with worke of inmouled, gilt with fine gold, and ſenoper, and bice. The ſecond cloſet was for the quéens perſon, in which was a trauerſe of rich cloth of gold, the altar ſo richlie apparelled, that there lacked neither pearles nor ſtones of riches. On the altar were twelue great images of gold, the cloſet hanged with cloth of gold, all other iewels miſſall I ſuppoſe neuer ſuch like were ſéene, and the roofe of the ſame cloſet was ſieled with like worke that the kings cloſet was, as is before rehearſed. And from this palace or place into the mightie & ſtrong fortreſſe & caſtell roiall of Guiſnes, was a gallerie for the ſecret paſſage of the kings perſon into a ſecret lodging within the ſame caſtell, the more for the king eaſe. Alſo to this palace was all houſes of offices, that to ſuch an honourable court ſhould apperteine, that is to wit, the lord chamberlein, lord ſteward, lord treaſuror of the houſhold, for the comptrollor, the office of gréene cloth, wardrobes, iewell houſe, and office of houſhold ſeruice, as ewrie, pantrie, cellar, butterie, ſpicerie, pitcher houſe, larder and poultrie, and all other offices ſo large and faire, that the officers might & did maruell, as in the craft of viands, by ouens, harthes, reredorſes, chimnies, ranges, & ſuch inſtrumens as there were ordeined.

The quéenes cloſet.

A priuie gallerie.

Houſes of offices both honourable and otherwiſe neceſſarie.

In this palace (as ye haue heard) was the kings grace lodged, and all the nobles after their degrées. And for that the towne of Guiſnes was little, and that all the noble men might not there be lodged, they ſet vp tents in the field, to the number of twentie and eight hundred ſundrie lodgings, which was a goodlie ſight. Thus was the king in his palace roiall at Guiſnes. Francis the French king was with all his nobles of the realme of France come to the towne of Ard, which was prepared for his comming, manie tents, halles, and pauilions were ſet and pitched in the field. On the French partie alſo there was at the ſame towne of Ard builded the French kings lodging full well, but not finiſhed. Much was the prouiſion in Picardie on euerie part thorough all. The French king commanded his lodging to bée made a little out of the towne of Ard, in the territorie of an old caſtell, which by the warre of old time had béene beaten. On the ſame place was edified a houſe of ſolace and ſport, of large and mightie compaſſe, which was chieflie ſuſteined by a great mightie maſt, whereby the great ropes and tackle ſtreined, the ſame maſt was ſtaied. All the roofe of the ſame houſe hong on the ſame maſt, and with tackle was ſtreined & borne by the ſupporters of the ſame maſt or trée, the colours of the ſame was all blew, ſet with ſtarres of gold foile, and the orbs of the heauens by the craft of colours in the roofe, were curiouſlie wrought in maner like the ſkie or firmament, and a creſſant ſtrained ſomedeale towards the towne of Ard, this creſſant was couered with frets and knots made of iuie buſhes, and box branches, and other things that longeſt would be gréene for pleaſure.

The great pompe of cardinall woolſie.

Now like as diuerſe of the French nobilitie had viſited the king of England whileſt he laie in Calis, ſo likewiſe the lord cardinall, as ambaſſadour to the king, rode with a noble repaire of lords, gentlemen, and prelates, to the towne of Ard, where he was of the French king highlie interteined, with great thanks, for that by his meanes hée had ioined in friendſhip with the king of England, to his high contentation and pleaſure, as hauing obteined the thing which he had long deſired. The noble port, ſumptuous ſhew, and great traine of gentlemen, knights, lords, and number of ſeruants, in rich apparell & ſutes of liueries attendant on the cardinall, made the Frenchmen greatlie to woonder at his triumphant dooings.

Great credit committed to the cardinall by both the kings.

The interview of the two kings in the vale of Andren.

The king of England had giuen vnto the ſaid cardinall full authoritie, power, and libertie, to affirme and confirme, bind and vnbind, whatſoeuer ſhould be in queſtion betwéene him and the French king: and the like authoritie, power, and libertie, did the French king by his ſufficient letters patents, grant to the ſame cardinall, which was accepted to be a ſigne of great loue, that he ſhould commit ſo great a truſt vnto the king of Englands ſubiect. The daie of the méeting was appointed to be on the thurſdaie the ſeauenth of Iune, vpon which daie the two kings met in the vale of Andren, accompanied with ſuch a number of the nobilitie of both realmes, ſo richlie appointed in apparell, and coſtlie iewels, as chaines, collars of SS, & other the like ornaments to ſet forth their degrées and eſtates, that a woonder it was to behold and view them in their order and roomes, which euerie man kept according to his appointment.

The French kings roiall ornaments.

The two kings méeting in the field, either ſaluted other in moſt louing wiſe, firſt on horſſebacke, and after alighting on foot eftſoones imbraced with courteous words, to the great reioiſing of the beholders: and after they had thus ſaluted ech other, they went both togither into a rich tent of cloath of gold, there ſet vp for the purpoſe, in the which they paſſed the time in pleaſant talke, banketting, and louing deuiſes, till it drew toward the euening, and then departed for that night, the one to Guiſnes, the other to Ard. At this méeting of the two kings in open ſight, I then well perceiued (ſaith Hall) the habillements roiall of the French king. His garment was a chemew, of cloath of ſiluer, culponed with cloath of gold, of damaſke, cantell wiſe, and garded on the borders with the Burgon bands.

Ouer that he had a cloake of broched ſattin, with gold of purple colour, wrapped about his bodie trauerſe, beded from the ſhoulder to the waſt, faſtned in the loope of the firſt fould: this ſaid cloake was richlie ſet with pearles and pretious ſtones. This French king had on his head a coife of damaſke gold ſet with diamonds, and his courſer that he rode on was couered with a trapper of tiſſue, brodered with deuiſe, cut in faſhion mantell wiſe, the ſkirts were embowed and fret with frized worke, and knit with corbelles & buttons taſſeled of Turkie making, raines and headſtall anſwering of like worke: and verelie of his perſon the ſame Francis the French king, a goodlie prince, ſtatelie of countenance, merie of chéere, browne coloured, great eies, high noſed, big lipped, faire breſted, broad ſhoulders, ſmall legges, & long féet.

The deſcription of the French kings perſon.

The deſcription of the two artificiall trées figuring Henrie and Francis.

On ſaturdaie the ninth of Iune, in a place within the Engliſh pale were ſet vp in a field called the campe, two trées of much honour, the one called the Aubeſpine, that is to ſaie, the hawthorne in Engliſh, for Henrie: and the other the Framboiſter, which in Engliſh ſignifieth the raſpis berie, after the ſignification in French. Theſe trées were curiouſlie wrought, the leaues of gréene damaſke, the branches, boughs, and withered leaues of cloath of gold; and all the bodies and armes of the ſame cloath of gold laid on timber: they were in height from the foot to the top thirtie foure foot of aſſize, in compaſſe about an hundred twentie and nine foot, & from bough to bough fortie thrée foot: on theſe trées were flowers and fruits in kindlie wiſe, with ſiluer and Venice gold: their beautie ſhewed farre.

The length of the campe.

The two kings make chalenge to all commers at iuſts, &c.

On the ſame daie the two kings came to thoſe trées of honour, noblie accompanied, in ſuch roiall ſort as was requiſit. The campe was in length nine hundred foot, and in bredth thrée hundred and twentie foot, ditched round about (ſauing at the entries) with broad and déepe ditches. Diuerſe ſcaffolds were reared about this campe for the eaſe of the nobles. On the right ſide of the field ſtood the quéene of England, and the quéene of France, with manie ladies. The campe was ſtronglie railed and barred on euerie end: in the entrie there were two lodgings prepared for the two kings, wherein they might arme themſelues, and take their eaſe. Alſo in the ſame compaſſe there were two great cellars couched full of wine, which was liberallie beſtowed on all men. The two kings, as brethren in armes, vndertooke to deliuer all perſons at iuſts, tournie, and barriers.

The two quéenes met at the campe.

The French kings richerate at their iuſts.

With theſe two kings were aſſociate by the order of armes, the duke of Vandoſme, the duke of Suffolke, the countie ſaint Paule, the marqueſſe Dorſet, monſieur de Roche, ſir William Kingſton, monſieur Brian, ſir Richard Ierningham, monſieur Cauaan, ſir Giles Capell, monſieur Buccall, maiſter Nicholas Carew, monſieur Montafilion, and maiſter Anthonie Kneuet. On mondaie the eleuenth of Iune, the two quéenes of England and of France came to the campe, where either ſaluted other right honourablie, and went into a ſtage for them prepared. At the houre aſſigned, the two kings armed at all péeces mounted on horſſebacke, and with their companies entered the field; the French king on a courſer barded, couered with purple ſattin, broched with gold, & embrodered with corbins fethers round and buckled, the fether was blacke and hatched with gold: on his head péece he bare a ſléeue. All the parteners of the French kings chalenge were in like apparell, euerie thing correſpondent in cloath of ſilke embrodered, on his perſon were attendant on horſſebacke noble perſons, and on foot foure perſons all apparelled in purple ſattin.

The king of Englands ſumptuous furniture at the ſame iuſts.

The king of England was vpon a freſh courſer, the trappers of cloth of gold, of tiſſue, the arſon mantell wiſe, and on the brunt of the trapper bard faſhion, cut in waues of water worke, and euerie waue raw wrought and frized with damaſke gold: this worke was laid looſe on ruſſet veluet, and knit togither with points of gold, which waues ſignified the lordſhip of the narrow ſeas. All the parteners of the kings chalenge were in the ſame ſute, their horſſes as well as their perſons. Attendant on the king on horſſebacke were ſir Henrie Guilford maiſter of the kings horſſe, ſir Iohn Pechie deputie of Calis, ſir Edward Guilford maiſter of the kings armie, and monſieur Moret of the French court. All theſe foure were apparelled in the kings liuerie, which was white on the right ſide, and the left ſide gold and ruſſet both hoſe and garment: on him were attendant on foot ſir honourable knights, twentie eſquiers, and officers to the number of an hundred and twelue perſons, of the which number all the knights and gentlemen had coats, the one halfe ſiluer, and the other cloath of gold and ruſſet veluet, and the other officers coats were of right ſattin of the ſame colour, and all their hoſen were of the ſame ſute verie coſtlie.

The two kings enter into the field.

Thus with honour and noble courage theſe two noble kings with their companies entered into the field, and them preſented vnto the quéenes. After reuerence doone, they rode round about the tilt, and ſo tooke their places appointed, abiding the anſwers: which was for the firſt the duke of Alanſon and ten men of armes on his band, on courſers barded, the bards couered with white and blacke veluet, faſtened the one within the other, garded with Burgon bands of tinſell ſattin, as well their garments as their bards. Then entered on courſers barded twelue gentlemen of the band of the lord admerall of France, their garments and bards were ruſſet ſattin, broched with gold and white and purple ſattin, after the deuiſe of their pleaſure with great plumes. When theſe bands were entred the field, they ſhewed themſelues about the tilt, and did reuerence vnto the quéenes. The band of the duke of Alanſon tooke firſt place, they made them preſt on both ſides, the French king was the firſt that ran, he did valiantlie and brake ſpeares mightilie.

The king of England runneth against Grandeuile.

Then ran the king of England to monſieur Grandeuile with great vigor; ſo that the ſpeares brake in the kings hand to the vantplate all to ſhiuers. And at the ſecond courſe he gaue the ſaid monſieur Grandeuile ſuch a ſtroke, that the charnell of his headpéece, although the ſame was verie ſtrong, was broken in ſuch wiſe that he might run no more, wherby the king wanted thrée courſes. Then ran the duke de Vandoſme, & met his counter part right noblie, and brake ſpeares right valiantlie. The noble duke of Suffolke charged his courſe, and met right valiantlie his counter part, and furniſhed the fiue courſes right noblie togither like good men of armes. And when all parties of the chalenge had right valiantlie furniſhed their courſes, then ran againe the two noble kings, who did ſo valiantlie, that the beholders had great ioy, after which courſes the heralds cried Deſarmee, and the trumpets ſounded to lodging.

Monſieur de Swies and his band.

On tueſdaie the twelfe of Iune at houre conuenient the two quéenes tooke their ſtages, and the band of chalenge in the field preſt to anſwer and deliuer all commers, to whome came ten gentlemen armed on barded horſſes of the band of monſieur de Swies, their bards and apparell cloath of veluet full of friers knots ſiluer. After they had preſented them vnto the quéenes, then they tooke the end of the tilt, and ſo courſe after courſe they ran to the chalengers right egerlie, and the chalengers of the partie of the two kings deliuered to the end of their articles of iuſts. Then entered eleuen men of armes of the band of monſieur de Tremoiell, on horſſes barded with yellow veluet, loſenged with friers knots of blacke veluet: and after they had ſaluted the quéenes, they likewiſe tooke the end of the tilt, and courſe after courſe ran vntill they were deliuered of their chalenges of iuſts. Valiantlie this daie was finiſhed.

The attire of the French king and his partners of chalenge.

On wedneſdaie the thirtéenth of Iune, the two hardie kings armed at all péeces, entered into the field right noblie apparelled. The French king and all his partners of chalenge were arraied in purple ſattin, broched with gold and purple veluet, embrodered with little rolles of white ſattin, wherein was written, Quando: their bards & garments were ſet full of the ſame, and the reſidue where was no rolles were poudered & ſet with the letter elle, as thus. L. which in French is ſhe, which was interpreted to be, Quando elle, when ſhe: and inſuing the deuiſe of the firſt daie, it ſignifieth togither, Hart faſtened in paine endles, when ſhe. The king of England with all the band or parteners of his chalenge were likewiſe on horſſebacke, apparelled in trappers of loſenges ruſſet veluet and cloath of ſiluer of damaſke, embrodered and ſet in euerie loſenge a branch of eglantine of gold, the apparell of the perſons were of the ſame correſpondent to the trapper. This eglantine trée is ſwéet, pleaſant and gréene, if it be kindlie and fréendlie handeled; but if it be rudelie dealt with, it will pricke and he that will pull vp the whole trée by the top, his hands will be hurt.

The king of England and the parteners of his chalenge.

The two kings with their companies thus apparelled, preſented themſelues to the quéenes, and ſo tooke the end of the tilt. Then entered into the field monſieur Leſkew called lord Leſkin, with him came eleuen men of armes, himſelfe the twelfe on horſſes barded and richlie apparelled, and ſo rode about the tilt and ſaluted the quéenes, and tooke the end of the tilt. Monſieur de Leſkew and his eleuen companions had their baſes and bards all of blacke cloath of gold of damaſke all cut on blacke ſattin, their garments had mantell ſléeues on the left arme, to the waſt behind iuſt to the ſhoulder, which was praiſed for the ſtrangeneſſe. The French king ran to monſieur de Ambois, one of the band of monſieur Leſkew, and the king of England charged his courſe and ran to monſieur Leſkew, and ſo furniſhed their courſes (as they ſaie) right noblie and valiantlie in breaking ſpeares that were ſtrong. Thus courſe after courſe ech with other, his counter partie did right valiantlie: but the two kings ſurmounted all the reſt in prowesſe and valiantneſſe.

Monſieur de Leſkew.

The marques de Salons & his band.

This band thus furniſhed, entered the marqueſſe de Salons and his band, twelue perſons all riding on courſers barded and apparelled in white ſattin and blacke, broched with gold and ſiluer, with cuts and culpins much after tawnie and blacke ſattin billots: & after reuerence doone to the quéenes, they tooke the end of the tilt. To the marqueſſe de Salons ran the king of England, and the king of France to an other of the ſame band, ſtill courſe after courſe ran all the noble men, till the marques de Salons and his band were deliuered, who bare them right valiantlie: then blew the trumpets the retreit, & the two kings them vnarmed and after departed, the French king vnto Ard, and the king of England to his caſtell of Guiſnes.

The two kings armed enter the field.

On thurſdaie the thirtéenth daie of Iune by the noonetide the two quéenes met in the campe & tooke their places, the people were come to behold the honour, and to ſée the two kings, who all readie armed entered the field, to receiue and deliuer all men by anſwer of iuſts. Then entered the earle of Deuonſhire, on his band the lord Montacute, lord Herbert, lord Leonard Greie, maiſter Arthur Poole, maiſter Francis Brian, maiſter Henrie Norris, and foure other all richlie apparelled, the one ſide blew veluet embrodered with a mans heart burning in a ladies hand holding a garden pot ſtilling with water on the heart: the other ſide was white ſattin embrodered with letters of gold. This companie rode about the tilt, and did reuerence to the quéenes, and ſo abode at the end of the ſame.

A deuiſe of conceipt.

The earle of Deuonſhire charged his ſpeare, and the French king likewiſe charged his courſe to méet the ſame earle, and ran ſo hard togither, that both their ſpeares brake, and ſo mainteined their courſes noblie. Then ran the king of England to monſieur Memorancie, and him encountered, & both bare togither and gaue great ſtrokes; the kings moſt noble grace neuer diſuiſored nor breathed vntill he ran the fiue courſes & deliuered his counterpartie. Dukes, marqueſſes, knights, eſquiers, and others ran as faſt as euer they might, there was none that abode when the courſes came, vntill the earle of Duonſhire and his band were deliuered of demands. Then entered the lord Howard ſonne to the duke of Norffolke and eleuen companions apparelled and barded in crimſin ſattin full of flames of gold, the borders ribbed with crimſin veluet, and with much honor (after due reuerence doone to the quéenes) were brought with heralds of armes about the tilts; and ſo tooke the place to them appointed: right rich was their apparell.

The lord Howard and his eleuen companions in armes.

Then ran the French king and incountered the ſame lord Edmund, they brake both their ſtaues valiantlie courſe after courſe, the incounter ceaſſed not till they had furniſhed their fiue courſes; ſo was the lord Edmund deliuered by the French K. Then ran the king of England to a ſtrong gentleman named Raſe Brooke and brake his ſpeare, and ran courſe after courſe, vntill he had finiſhed his courſes right noblie and like a prince of moſt valiancie. The reſidue ceaſſed not vntill they had ech deliuered other of their chalenge. On fridaie the fiftéenth daie of Iune the king of England mounted on a courſer roiall, his perſon armed at all péeces, his apparell and trappers was the one ſide rich cloath of gold of tiſſue, the other ſide cloath of tiſſue of ſiluer, and cloath of gold of tiſſue entered ound the one with the other.

The king of England and his band with their deuiſe on their apparell.

The ound is a worke wauing vp & downe, and all the borders as well trappers as other was garded with letters of fine gold, and all the other ſide that was ound was ſet with ſignes called cifers of fine gold, the which were ſet with great and orientall pearles. The cifers ſignified letters knit togither in a knot, which was to wit; God my fréend, my realme and I maie. This was the deuiſe and reaſon thereof. All the kings band were apparelled in like apparell. The French K. likewiſe armed at all points mounted on a courſer roiall, all his apparell as well bards as garments were purple veluet entered the one with the other, embrodered full of little books of white ſattin, & in the bookes were written A me. About the borders of the bards and the borders of the garments a chaine of blew like iron, reſembling the chaine of a well or priſon chaine, which was interpreted to be Liber, a booke. Within this booke was written (as is ſaid) A me. Put theſe two togither and it maketh Libera me. The chaine betokeneth priſon or bonds, and ſo maketh togither in Engliſh, Deliuer me of bonds. Then they tooke the end of the tilt.

Monſieur Florengis and his companie.

Readie was monſieur Florengis and with him twelue men of armes with courſers barded: the bards and apparell was crimſin veluet, tawnie veluet, and plunket veluet embrodered borderwiſe with ſhéepheards hookes of cloath of ſiluer. When they with honour had paſſed about the tilt (due reuerence to the quéenes and ladies doone) the two kings had their ſpeares readie, and then began the ruſhing of ſpeares. The king of England this daie ran ſo freſhlie and ſo manie courſes, that one of his beſt courſers was dead that night, this band was deliuered man after man of their pretenſe of iuſts. Then entered bands of monſieur de Rambeurs and monſieur de Puis, ech hauing eleuen perſons in number, the one band all white ſattin embrodered with blacke, and the other all blacke dropped with ſiluer drops; who after reuerence doone to the quéenes, at the end of the tilt tooke their places. Then began a new incounter hard and ſore, manie of them bare great ſtrokes of the kings, to their honour: and with ſuch violence they ran, as they ſet their horſſes in a ſweating heat, and themſelues méeting with full force made the fragments or broken péeces of their ſtaues mount aloft in the air like an arow out of a bow; as the poet ſaith;

Haſtæ ſtridentis fractæ petit æthera cuſpis.

The French king commeth to Guiſnes, & the king of England goeth to Ard.

On ſaturdaie the ſeuentéenth daie of Iune, the French king with a ſmall number came to the caſtle of Guiſnes about the houre of eight in the morning. The king being in his priuie chamber had thereof knowledge, who with glad haſt went to receiue the ſame French king, and him met and welcomed in friendlie and honorable maner; and after communication betwéene them had, the king of England departed, leauing the French king there in the ſumptuous place before named. Then was buſie the lord chamberleine, the lord ſteward, and all other officers, to make readie feaſt and cheare. It were too long to rehearſe all, for ſuch a feaſt and banket was then made, that of long time before the like had not béene ſéene. The king of England thus departing, he tooke his horſſe, and with a companie of noblemen rode to Ard, where the French quéene and other noble men receiued him with much honour.

The king of England interteined of the French quéene.

After which receiuing, he was by the ſaid quéene and lords brought into a chamber hanged with blew veluet embrodered with flowers delice of cloth of gold, wherein was a great bed of like worke, from whence he was conueied to another chamber, in the which was a kings ſtate. This chamber was hanged and ſieled with cloth of gold, embrodered with great cordels or friers knots of cloth of ſiluer. In the ſame chamber were two cupboords, on either ſide one, furniſhed with great and goodlie plate gilt. Noble feaſting and cheare was there made. After dinner the ladies dreſſed them to danſe, and certeine yoong honourable lords of England, apparelled after the maner of Ruſland or farre Eaſtland, whoſe hoſen were of rich gold ſattin called aureat ſattin, ouerrolled to the knée with ſcarlet, and on their féet ſhooes with little pikes of white nailes after the Eſtland guiſe, their dublets of rich crimſin veluet and cloth of gold, with wide ſléeues lined with cloth of gold: ouer this they had clokes of crimſin veluet ſhort, lined with cloth of gold, on euerie ſide of the clokes rings of ſiluer, with laces of Venice gold, and on their heads they had hats made in the towne of Danſke, and purſes of ſeales ſkinnes, and girdels of the ſame: all theſe yoong lords had viſards on their faces, and their hats were drawne with like hatbands full of damaſke gold.

A maſke in the French court of Engliſh lords.

Other ten lords were apparelled in long gownes of blew ſattin of the ancient faſhion, embrodered with reaſons of gold that ſaid Adieu iuneſſe, Farewell youth: they had tippets of blacke veluet, & hats hanging therby, & on their heads hie violet ſtanding caps, and girdels of ſilke, and purſes of cloth of gold after the ancient maner, with viſards on their faces of like anciencie. After all theſe triumphs and braueries, great ſtore of ſpices, fruits, iellies, & banketing viands were brought, which being doone and ended, the king tooke leaue of the French queene and ladies, to whome were brought thirtie horſſes trapped in damaſke, white and yellow, and ſo paſſed he and his traine the towne of Ard into the field and campe. Right roiallie alſo was the French K. interteined, and all other after their degrée and ſtate. Now when all this ſolemnitie was ended, the French king tooke leaue of the quéene and ladies of the court. The lord cardinall in ſtatelie attire, accompanied with the duke of Buckingham, and other great lords, conducted forward the French king, and in their way they incountered and met the king of England and his companie right in the vallie of Anderne, apparelled in their maſking apparell, which gladded the French king. After reuerence doone, the ſaid two kings departed for that night, the Engliſh to Guiſnes, and the French to Ard.

an hideous ſtorme of wind and weather, that manie coniectured it did prognoſticate trouble and hatred ſhortlie after to follow betwéene princes. On tueſdaie the nintéenth of June, the two kings came to the campe againe armed at all péeces, and there abode them that would come, ſo that then began the iuſtes afreſh. On wedneſdaie the twentith of June, the two kings began to hold tournies with all the parteners of their chalenge armed at all péeces. The quéene of France and the quéene of England were in the places for them prepared, and there was manie a goodlie battell performed: the kings doing as well as the beſt, ſo that the beholders ſpake of them honor. On thurſdaie the one and twentith of June, the two kings likewiſe kept the tourneies, ſo that all thoſe noble men that would proue their valiancies, were deliuered according to the articles of the tourneies, which this daie tooke end. On fridaie the 22 of June, the two kings with their retinue did battell on foot at the barriers, and there deliuered all ſuch as put foorth themſelues to trie their forces. On saturdaie the thrée and twentith of June, the lord cardinall ſang an high ſolemne maſſe by note, aloft vpon a pompous ſtage before the two kings & quéenes, the which being finiſhed, indulgence was giuen to all the hearers. The two kings dined in one chamber that daie, and the two quéenes in another. After dinner, the two kings with their band entered the field on foot before the barriers, & ſo began the fight, which continued battell after battell, till all the commers were anſwered. There were deliuered this day thus at the barriers by battell, an hundred and ſix perſons: the two laſt battels did the kings trie. And ſo that saturdaie the whole chalenge was performed, and all men deliuered of the articles of iuſts, tourneies, and battels on foot at the barriers, by the ſaid two kings and their aids.

Barriers.

The cardinall ſang maſſe before the two kings.

Maſkes.

After this, there followed roiall maſkes, and on the ſundaie the foure and twentith of June, the king of England with foure companies, in euerie companie ten, trimlie appointed in maſking apparell, rode to Ard: and likewiſe the French king accompanied with eight and thirtie perſons as maſkers repaired to Guiſnes. They met on the waie, & each companie paſſed by other without any countenance making or diſuiſarding. They were honorablie receiued, as well at the one place as the other. And when they had ended their paſtime, banketting, and danſes, they returned and met againe on the way homeward, and then putting off their viſards, they louinglie embraced: and after amiable communication togither, they tooke leaue each of other, & for a remembrance gaue gifts either to other verie rich and princelie.

¶ During this triumph, much people of Picardie and weſt Flanders drew to Guiſnes, to ſée the king of England & his honor, to whom vittels of the court were giuen in plentie, the conduit of the gate did run wine alwaies. There were vagabonds, plowmen, labourers, and of the bragerie, wagoners and beggers, that for drunkenneſſe laie in routs and heapes. So great reſort came thither, that knights and ladies, who were come to ſée the nobleneſſe, were faine to lie in haie and ſtraw, and held them thereof highlie pleaſed. From the court of the emperour, nor of the ladie Margarets court, nor of Flanders, Brabant, nor Burgognie came neuer a perſon to anſwer to the chalenge. By that it ſéemed that there was ſmall loue betwene the emperour & the French king. Moreouer, monſieur Faiot capteine of Bullongne with monſieur Chattelon, did their deuoir to haue taken the towne of ſaint Omer, of which doing was thought no goodneſſe to the emperour.]

Knights and ladies faine to lie in haie and ſtraw.

On mondaie the fiue and twentith of June, the king with the quéene remoued from Guiſnes to Calis, where he remained till the tenth of Julie, on which daie he rode to Graueling, and was receiued on the waie by the emperour, and ſo by him conueied to Graueling, where not onelie the king, but alſo all his traine was cheared and feaſted, with ſo louing maner, that the Engliſhmen highlie praiſed the emperours court. [When the French king and his lords had knowledge of the méeting of the emperour and the king of England in the towne of Graueling, they were therewith greatlie gréeued, as by manie things appeared. For as the Engliſhmen were in France diſdained, and in their ſutes there greatlie deferred, and had little right, and much leſſe fauour: ſo from day to day ſtill more and more began hartburning, and in concluſion open warre did ariſe betwéene the two realmes.]

King Henrie departed from Guiſnes to Calis, & from thence to Graueling to viſit the emperour.

Ed.Hall in H.8.fol.lxvj.

On Wedneſdaie the eleuenth of Julie, the emperour and his aunt the ladie Margaret ducheſſe of Sauoy came with the king of England to the towne of Calis, and there continued in great ioy and ſolace, with feaſting, banketting, danſing and maſking vntill the fouretéenth of Julie. ¶ For the interteining of theſe eſtates (the Engliſh lords and gentlemen diſplaced of their lodgings to ſerue the other and their traine) there was builded a banketting houſe eight hundred foot compaſſe, like a theatre, after a goodlie deuiſe, builded in ſuch maner as (I thinke) was neuer ſéene, with ſixtéene principals made of great maſts, betwixt euerie maſt foure and twentie foot, and all the outſides cloſed with boord and canuas.

Banketting houſe within the towne of Calis.

Ri.Turpin.

Ouer it, and within round about by the ſides, were made thrée ſcaffolds or lofts one aboue another for men and women to ſtand vpon. And in the midſt of the ſame banketting houſe, was ſet vp a great piller of timber made of eight great maſts, bound togither with iron bands, for to hold them togither: for it was an hundred and foure and thirtie foot of length, and coſt ſix pounds thirtéene ſhillings and fourepence to ſet it vpright. The banketing houſe was couered ouer with canuas, faſtened with ropes and iron as faſt as might be deuiſed. And within the ſaid houſe was painted the heauens, with ſtarres, ſunne, moone, and clouds, with diuerſe other things made aboue ouer mens heads: and there were great images of wickers couered, and made like great men of diuerſe ſtrange nations: and diuerſe reaſons were written by them of the countries that they likened to be of, with the armes of thoſe countries hanging by them.

Goodlie workmanſhip within the banketting houſe.

Alſo there was made as it were manie ſhips vnder ſaile, and windmils going, and about the high piller of timber that ſtood vpright in the middeſt, was made ſtages of timber for organs and other inſtruments to ſtand vpon, and men to plaie on them, & for other muſicians & pageants to be plaied, when the K. of England & the emperor ſhould be at their banket. But in the morning of the ſame day, the wind began to riſe, & at night blew off the canuas, and all the elements, with the ſtarres, ſunne, moone, and clouds, and the wind blew out aboue a thouſand torches, and other lights of wax, that were prepared to giue light to the banket, & all the kings ſeats that were made with great riches, beſides all other things, were all daſhed and loſt.]

Banketting houſe defaced by tempeſt.

The ſame daie at night that the ſtates were interteined, the king and fiftéene perſons were apparelled all in blacke veluet couered with cloth of gold, cut on the veluet, faſtened with knots of gold, on the which knots hong ſpangles of gold like tufts, and bonnets of the ſame, & clokes of crimſin ſattin and cloth of gold wrapped trauerſe, and their buſkins of the ſame cloth of gold. All theſe luſtie maſkers went to the emperours lodging, and were receiued, and in the chamber of preſence danſed and reuelled, the which at the emperours requeſt, the king and other diſuiſarded themſelues, whereby the king was knowne: then the king tooke his leaue, and departed for that night. On tueſdaie the twelfe of Julie, bicauſe the banketting houſe could not be finiſhed, the emperour and the ladie Margaret ſupped with the king & the queene at the checker, where the ſame night after ſupper reuelled ninetie and ſix maſkers: after the reuels was a banket, after which banket the king brought the emperour and the ladie Margaret to the ſtaple, and after withdrew him.

French gentlemen in maſkers apparell vnweeting to them that bare rule in the reuels.

This night were eight companies of maſkers, and in euerie companie twelue perſons all in gold, ſiluer and veluet, richlie apparelled, but bicauſe the roome was ſmall, the ſhew was the leſſe. In theſe reuels were put in maſkers apparell diuerſe gentlemen of the French court vnweeting to the K. or anie other that bare rule. For diuerſe yong gentlemen of the French court fauored more the French partie, than the emperours partie; through which meanes they ſaw and much more heard than they ſhould haue doone. On fridaie the thirteenth daie of Julie, the emperour did intend to haue departed from Calis, but the counſell was ſuch that he departed not that night.

The king returneth into England.

On ſaturdaie the fourteenth of Julie, the emperour tooke his leaue of the queene of England his aunt, and departed toward Graueling, being conducted on his waie by the king of England, to a village towards Flanders called Waell, and there they imbraced and tooke their leaue either of other in moſt louing maner. They did not altogither ſpend the time thus while they were togither, in vaine pleaſures, and ſporting reuels; for the charters before time concluded were read ouer, and all the articles of the league tripartite, agreed betwixt the emperour, the king of England, and the French king, were at full declared, to the which the French king had fullie condeſcended. And for the more proofe thereof, and exemplification of the ſame, he ſent monſieur de Roch with letters of credence to ſignifie to the emperour, that in the word of a prince he would obſerue, fulfill, performe and keepe all the ſame articles, for him, his realme and ſubiects. Shortlie after that the emperour and the king had taken leaue each of other, and were departed, the king ſhipped, and with the queene and all other the nobilitie returned ſafelie into England.

Polydor.

An inconuenience of turning arable ground into paſture.

The king kept his Chriſtmas at Greenwich this yeare, with much nobleneſſe and open court. And the tenth daie of Februarie, in his owne perſon, iuſted with all commers. On Twelfe daie his grace and the earle of Deuonſhire, with foure aids, anſwered at the tourneie all commers, which were ſixteene perſons: noble and rich was their apparell, but in feats of armes the king excelled the reſt. About this time the king hauing regard to the common welth of his realme, conſidered how for the ſpace of fiftie yeares paſt and more, the nobles and gentlemen of England, being giuen to graſing of cattell, and keeping of ſheepe, had inuented a meane how to increaſe their yearelie reuenues, to the great decaie and vndooing of huſbandmen of the land. For the ſaid nobles and gentlemen, after the maner of the Numidians, more ſtudieng how to increaſe their paſtures, than to mainteine tillage, began to decaie huſband tacks & tenements, and to conuert arable ground into paſture, furniſhing the ſame with beaſts and ſheepe, and alſo deere, ſo incloſing the field with hedges, ditches, and pales, which they held in their owne hands, ingroſſing wolles, and ſelling the ſame, and alſo ſheepe and beaſts at their owne prices, and as might ſtand moſt with their owne priuate commoditie.

The commonwealth hurt three waies thereby.

Hereof a threefold euill chanced to the common wealth, as Polydor noteth. One, for that thereby the number of huſbandmen was ſore diminiſhed, the which the prince vſeth chieflie in his ſeruice for the warres: an other, for that manie townes and villages were left deſolate, and became ruinous: the third, for that both wooll and cloth made thereof, and the fleſh of all maner beaſts vſed to be eaten, was ſold at far higher prices than was accuſtomed. Theſe enormities at the firſt begining being not redreſſed, grew in ſhort ſpace to ſuch force and vigour by euill cuſtome, that afterwards they gathered to ſuch an vnited force, that hardly they could be remedied. Much like a diſeaſe, which in the beginning with litle paine to the patient, and leſſe labour to the ſurgeon maie be cured; whereas the ſame by delaie and negligence being ſuffered to putrifie, becommeth a deſperate ſore, and then are medicines nothing auailable, and not to be applied, according to his opinion that ſaid:

Helleborum fruſtra (cùm iam cutis ægra tumeſcit)
Poſcentes videas: venienti occurrite morbo.

Perſ.ſat.3.

Commiſſions granted for the maintenance of tillage and laieng open of incloſures.

The king therefore cauſing ſuch good ſtatutes as had beene deuiſed and eſtabliſhed for reformation in this behalfe, to be reuiued and called vpon, tooke order by directing foorth his commiſſions vnto the iuſtices of peace, and other ſuch magiſtrats, that preſentment ſhould be had and made of all ſuch incloſures, and decaie of huſbandrie, as had chanced within the ſpace of fiftie yeares before that preſent time. The iuſtices and other magiſtrates, according to their commiſſion executed the ſame. And ſo commandement was giuen, that the decaied houſes ſhould be built vp againe, that the huſbandmen ſhould be placed eftſoones in the ſame, and that incloſed grounds ſhould be laid open, and ſore puniſhment appointed againſt them that diſobeied.

Bribes.

Theſe ſo good and wholeſome ordinances ſhortlie after were defeated by meanes of bribes giuen vnto the cardinall: for when the nobles and gentlemen, which had for their pleaſures imparked the common fields, were loth to haue the ſame againe diſparked, they redeemed their vexation with good ſummes of monie; and ſo had licence to keepe their parks and grounds incloſed as before. Thus the great expectation which men had conceiued of a generall redreſſe, proued void: howbeit, ſome profit the huſbandmen in ſome parts of the realme got by the mouing of this matter, where incloſures were alreadie laid open, yer miſtreſſe monie could preuent them; and ſo they inioied their commons, which before had beene taken from them.

The cardinall deuiſeth the deſtruction of the duke of Buckingham.

After that this matter for incloſures was thus diſpatched, the cardinall boiling in hatred againſt the duke of Buckingham, & thirſting for his bloud, deuiſed to make Charles Kneuet, that had beene the dukes ſuruei or, and put from him (as ye haue heard) an inſtrument to bring the duke to deſtruction. This Kneuet being had in examination before the cardinall, diſcloſed all the dukes life. And firſt he vttered, that the duke was accuſtomed by waie of talke, to ſaie, how he meant ſo to vſe the matter, that he would atteine to the crowne, if king Henrie chanced to die without iſſue: & that he had talke and conference of that matter on a time with George Neuill, lord of Abergauennie, vnto whome he had giuen his daughter in marriage; and alſo that he threatned to puniſh the cardinall for his manifold miſdoings, being without cauſe his mortall enimie.

The cardinall imboldeneth Kneuet againſt the duke.

The cardinall hauing gotten that which he ſought for, incouraged, comforted, and procured Kneuet, with manie comfortable words and great promiſes, that he ſhould with a bold ſpirit and countenance obiect and laie theſe things to the dukes charge, with more if he knew it when time required. Then Kneuet partlie prouoked with deſire to be reuenged, and partlie moued with hope of reward, openlie confeſſed, that the duke had once fullie determined to deuiſe meanes how to make the king awaie, being brought into a full hope that he ſhould be king, by a vaine propheſie which one Nicholas Hopkins, a monke of an houſe of the Chartreux order beſide Briſtow, called Henton, ſometime his confeſſor had opened vnto him.

The cardinall accuſeth the duke of Buckingham to the king.

The cardinall hauing thus taken the examination of Kneuet, went vnto the king, and declared vnto him, that his perſon was in danger by ſuch traitorous purpoſe, as the duke of Buckingham had conceiued in his heart, and ſhewed how that now there is manifeſt tokens of his wicked pretenſe: wherefore, he exhorted the king to prouide for his owne ſuertie with ſpeed. The king hearing the accuſation, inforced to the vttermoſt by the cardinall, made this anſwer; If the duke haue deſerued to be puniſhed, let him haue according to his deſerts. The duke herevpon was ſent for vp to London, & at his comming thither, was ſtreightwaies attached, and brought to the Tower by ſir Henrie Marneie, capteine of the gard, the ſixteenth of Aprill. There was alſo attached the foreſaid Chartreux monke, maiſter Iohn de la Car alias de la Court, the dukes confeſſor, and ſir Gilbert Perke prieſt, the dukes chancellor.

Edw. Hall.

Anno Reg. 13.

The duke of Buckingham indicted of treaſon.

After the apprehenſion of the duke, inquiſitions were taken in diuerſe ſhires of England of him; ſo that by the knights and gentlemen, he was indicted of high treaſon, for certeine words ſpoken (as before ye haue heard) by the ſame duke at Blechinglie, to the lord of Aburgauennie: and therewith was the ſame lord attached for concelement, and ſo likewiſe was the lord Montacute, and both led to the Tower. Sir Edward Neuill, brother to the ſaid lord of Aburgauennie, was forbidden the kings preſence. Moreouer, in the Guildhall, within the citie of London, before Iohn Brugge knight, then lord maior of the ſame citie, by an inqueſt whereof one Miles Gerrard was foreman, the ſaid duke was indicted of diuerſe points of high treaſon, as by the ſame indictment it appeareth.

The effect of the dukes indictement.

The duke is indicted of treſon in London.

This Hopkins had ſent one of the prior of Hentons ſeruants to the duke the daie afore, to will him to ſend ouer to him his chancellor, as by an other inditement appeareth.

Namelie, that the ſaid duke intending to exalt himſelfe, and to vſurpe the crowne, the roiall power, and dignitie of the realme of England, and to depriue the kings maieſtie thereof, that he the ſaid duke might take vpon him the ſame; againſt his allegiance, had the tenth daie of March, in the ſecond yeere of the kings maieſties reigne, and at diuerſe other times before and after, imagined and compaſſed the kings death and deſtruction at London, & at Thorneburie, in the countie of Gloceſter. And for the accompliſhment of his wicked intent and purpoſe (as in the indictment is alledged) the twentie and fourth daie of Aprill, in the fourth yeere of the kings reigne he ſent one of his chapleins called Iohn de la Court, to the priorie of Henton in Summerſetſhire, which was an houſe of the Chartreux monks. The effect or ſubſtance of whoſe meſſage was, to vnderſtand of one Nicholas Hopkins, a monke of the ſame houſe (who was vainelie reputed by waie of reuelation to haue foreknowledge of things to come) what ſhould happen concerning the matters which he had imagined. Which monke, cauſing the ſaid de la Court firſt to ſweare vnto him, not to diſcloſe his words to anie maner of perſon, but onelie to the duke his maiſter: therewith declared, that his maiſter the ſaid duke ſhould haue all, willing him for the accompliſhment of his purpoſe, to ſeeke to win the fauour of the people. De la Court came backe with this anſwer, and told it to the duke at Thorneburie the morrow after, being the twentie fift of Aprill.

The cardinall imboldeneth Kneuet againſt the duke.

Alſo the two and twentith of Iulie in the ſame fourth yeare, the duke ſent the ſame de la Court with letters vnto the ſaid monke, to vnderſtand of him further of ſuch matters: and the monke told him againe for anſwer, that the duke ſhould haue all. And being aſked as well now, as before at the firſt time, how he knew this to be true: he ſaid, By the grace of God. And with this anſwer de la Court now alſo returning, declared the ſame vnto the duke, the twentie fourth of Iulie at Thorneburie aforeſaid. Moreouer, the ſaid duke ſent the ſame de la Court againe to the ſaid monke with his letters, the ſix and twentith of Aprill, in the fift yeare of the kings reigne, when the king was to take his iournie into France; requiring to vnderſtand what ſhould become of theſe warres: and whether the Scotiſh king ſhould in the kings abſence inuade the realme or not. The monke (among other things) for anſwer of theſe letters, ſent the duke word, that the king ſhould haue no iſſue male.

The monks reuelation was peremptorie to the duke.

But herein the monke lied.

Againe, the ſaid duke the twentith daie of Februarie, in the firſt yeare of the kings reigne, being at Thorneburie, ſpake theſe words vnto Rafe earle of Weſtmerland; Well, there are two new dukes created here in England, but if ought but good come to the king, the duke of Buckingham ſhould be next in bloud to ſuceed to the crowne. After this, the ſaid duke on the ſixteenth daie of Aprill, in the ſaid firſt yeare of the kings reigne, went in perſon vnto the priorie of Henton, and there had conference with the foreſaid monke, Nicholas Hopkins, who told him, that he ſhould be king. Wherevnto the duke ſaid, that if it ſo chanced, he would ſhew himſelfe a iuſt and a righteous prince. The monke alſo told the duke, that he knew this by reuelation, and willed him in anie wiſe to procure the loue of the commons, the better to atteine his purpoſed intention.

The duke & the monke haue conference ſaith the indictment.

The duke at the ſame time gaue, and promiſed to giue yearelie vnto the ſaid priorie, ſix pounds, therewith to buie a tun of wine. And further he promiſed to giue vnto the ſame priorie, in readie monie twentie pounds, whereof ten pounds he gaue in hand, towards the conueieng of water vnto the houſe by a conduit. And to the ſaid monke Nicholas Hopkins he gaue at that preſent in reward three pounds, and at an other time fortie ſhillings, at an other time a marke, and at an other time ſix ſhillings eight penſe. After this, the twentith daie of March, in the tenth yeare of the kings reigne, he came to the ſame priorie, & eftſoones had conference with the ſaid monke, to be more fullie informed by him in the matters aboue ſpecified. At what time the monke alſo told him, that he ſhould be king. The duke in talke told the monke, that he had doone verie well, to bind his chapleine Iohn de la Court, vnder the ſeale of confeſſion, to keepe ſecret ſuch matter: for if the king ſhould come to the knowledge thereof, it would be his deſtruction.

Likewiſe, the twentith daie of October, in the ſeuenth yeare of the kings reigne, and at diuerſe other times, as well before as after, the ſaid duke had ſent his chancellor Robert Gilbert chapleine, vnto London, there to buie certeine cloathes of gold, ſiluer, and veluets, euerie time ſo much as amounted to the worth of three hundred pounds; to the intent the ſaid duke might beſtow the ſame, as well vpon knights, eſquiers, gentlemen of the kings houſe, and yeomen of his gard, as vpon other the kings ſubiects, to win their fauours and freendſhips to aſſiſt him in his euill purpoſe. Which cloathes the ſaid Gilbert did buie, and brought the ſame vnto the ſaid duke, who the twentith daie of Ianuarie, in the ſaid ſeuenth yeare, & diuerſe other daies and yeares before and after, did diſtribute and giue the ſame vnto certeine of the kings ſubiects for the purpoſe afore recited, recited, as by the indictment it was inferred.

Robert Gilbert the dukes chapleine and chancellor his errand to London.

Meanes that the duke vſed to make himſelfe ſtrong againſt the king.

Furthermore, the ſaid duke, the tenth of Iulie, in the tenth yeare of the kings reigne, and diuerſe other daies and times, as well before as after, did conſtitute more ſeuerall and particular officers in his caſtels, honours, lordſhips, and lands than he was accuſtomed to haue, to the end they might be aſſiſtant to him, vnder coulour of ſuch offices, to bring his euill purpoſe to paſſe. Moreouer, the ſame duke ſent vnto the king the tenth of Maie, in the ninth yeare of his reigne, for licence to reteine anie of the kings ſubiects, whome it ſhould pleaſe him, dwelling within the ſhires of Hereford, Gloceſter, and Summerſetſhire; and alſo, that he might at his pleaſure conueie diuerſe armors, and habillements for warre into Wales, to the intent to vſe the ſame againſt the king as the indictment imported, for the accompliſhing of his naughtie purpoſe, which was to deſtroie the king and to vſurpe the roiall gouernement and power to himſelfe.

Which ſute for licence to haue reteiners, and to conueie ſuch armors and habillements of warre, the ſaid Gilbert, the twentith daie of Maie, in the ſaid ninth yeare, and diuerſe other daies before and after, at London, and eaſt Greenewich did follow, labouring earneſtlie, both to the king and councell, for obteining the ſame. On the twentith daie of Iulie in the ſaid ninth yeare, the ſaid duke ſent the ſaid Gilbert vnto Henton aforeſaid, to vnderſtand of the ſaid moonke Nicholas Hopkins, what he heard of him: and the moonke ſent him word, that before Chriſtmas next there ſhould be a change, & that the duke ſhould haue the rule and gouernement of all England. And moreouer, the twentith of Februarie, in the eleuenth yeare of the kings reigne, at Blechingleie in the countie of Surrie, the ſaid duke ſaid vnto the ſaid Robert Gilbert his chancellor, that he did expect and tarie for a time more conuenient to atchiue his purpoſe, and that it might eaſilie be doone, if the nobles of this realme would declare their minds togither: but ſome of them miſtruſted, and feared to ſhew their minds togither: and that marred all.

A falſe propheſieng moonke.

He ſaid further at the ſame time to the ſaid Gilbert, that what ſo euer was doone by the kings father, was doone by wrong. And ſtill he murmured againſt all that the king then preſentlie reigning did. And further he ſaid, that he knew himſelfe to be ſo wicked a ſinner, that he wanted Gods fauour: and therefore he knew, that what ſo euer he tooke in hand againſt the king had the worſe ſucceſſe. And furthermore, the ſaid duke (to alienate the minds of the kings ſubiects from their dutifull obeiſance towards the ſaid king and his heires) on the twentith daie of September, in the firſt yeare of his reigne, being then at London, reported vnto the ſaid Robert Gilbert, that he had a certeine writing ſealed with the kings great ſeale, comprehending a certeine act of parlement, in the which it was enacted, that the duke of Summerſet one of the kings progenitors was made legitimate: and further, that the ſaid duke meant to haue deliuered the ſame writing vnto king Henrie the ſeuenth, but (ſaid he) I would not that I had ſo doone for ten thouſand pounds.

He was in a verie ill mind if this were true.

A certeine writing legitimating the duke of Summerſet.

And furthermore, the ſame duke on the fourth of Nouember, in the eleuenth yere of the kings reigne, at eaſt Greenwich in the countie of Kent, ſaid vnto one Charles Kneuet eſquier, after that the king had reproued the duke for reteining William Bulmer knight into his ſeruice, that if he had perceiued that he ſhould haue beene committed to the Tower (as he doubted hee ſhould haue beene) hee would haue ſo wrought, that the principall dooers therein ſhould not haue had cauſe of great reioiſing: for he would haue plaied the part which his father intended to haue put in practiſe againſt king Richard the third at Saliſburie, who made earneſt ſute to haue come vnto the preſence of the ſame king Richard: which ſute if he might haue obteined, he hauing a knife ſecretlie about him, would haue thruſt it into the bodie of king Richard, as he had made ſemblance to kneele downe before him. And in ſpeaking theſe words, he maliciouſlie laid his hand vpon his dagger, and ſaid, that if he were ſo euill vſed, he would doo his beſt to accompliſh his pretenſed purpoſe, ſwearing to confirme his word by the bloud of our Lord.

See the hiſtorie of Richard the third, pag.744.

Beſide all this, the ſame duke the tenth of Maie, in the twelfe yeare of the kings reigne, at London in a place called the Roſe, within the pariſh of ſaint Laurence Poultnie in Canwike ſtreet ward, demanded of the ſaid Charles Kneuet eſquier, what was the talke amongeſt the Londoners concerning the kings iourneie beyond the ſeas? And the ſaid Charles told him, that manie ſtood in doubt of that iourneie, leaſt the Frenchmen meant ſome deceit towards the king. Whereto the duke anſwered, that it was to be feared, leaſt it would come to paſſe, according to the words of a certeine holie moonke. For there is (ſaith he) a Chartreux moonke, that diuerſe times hath ſent to me, willing me to ſend vnto him my chancellor: and I did ſend vnto him Iohn de la Court my chapleine, vnto whome he would not declare anie thing, till de la Court had ſworne vnto him to keepe all things ſecret, and to tell no creature liuing what hee ſhould heare of him, except it were to me.

The duke diſcouereth the ſecrecie of all the matter to his owne vndooing.

And then the ſaid moonke told de la Court, that neither the king nor his heires ſhould proſper, and that I ſhould indeuour my ſelfe to purchaſe the good wils of the communaltie of England; for I the ſame duke and my bloud ſhould proſper, and haue the rule of the realme of England. Then ſaid Charles Kneuet; The moonke maie be deceiued through the diuels illuſion: and that it was euill to meddle with ſuch matters. Well (ſaid the duke) it cannot hurt me, and ſo (ſaith the indictment) the duke ſeemed to reioiſe in the moonks words. And further, at the ſame time, the duke told the ſaid Charles, that if the king had miſcaried now in his laſt ſickneſſe, he would haue chopped off the heads of the cardinall, of ſir Thomas Louell knight, and of others; and alſo ſaid, that he had rather die for it, than to be vſed as he had beene.

But the end of that ioy was heauineſſe.

Moreouer, on the tenth daie of September, in the ſaid eleuenth yere of this kings reigne, at Blechinglie, in the countie of Surrie, walking in the gallerie there with George Neuill knight, lord Aburgauennie, the duke murmuring againſt the kings councellors, and there gouernement, ſaid vnto the ſaid George; that if the king died, he would haue the rule of the realme in ſpite of who ſo euer ſaid the contrarie; and withall ſaid, that if the ſaid lord Aburgauennie would ſay, that the duke had ſpoken ſuch words, he would fight with him, and lay his ſword vpon his pate: & this he bound vp with manie great oths. Theſe were the ſpeciall articles & points compriſed in the indictment, and laid to his charge: but how trulie, or in what ſort prooued, I haue not further to ſay, either in accuſing or excuſing him, other than as I find in Hall and Polydor, whoſe words in effect, I haue thought to impart to the reader, and without anie parciall wreſting of the ſame either to or fro.

Sauing that (I truſt) I maie without offenſe ſaie, that (as the rumour then went) the cardinall chieflie procured the death of this noble man, no leſſe fauoured and beloued of the people of this realme in that ſeaſon, than the cardinall himſelfe was hated and enuied. Which thing cauſed the dukes fall the more to be pitied and lamented, ſith he was the man of all other, that chieflie went about to croſſe the cardinall in his lordlie demeanor, & headie procéedings. But to the purpoſe. Shortlie after that the duke had béene indicted (as before ye haue heard) he was arreigned in Weſtminſter hall, before the duke of Norffolke, being made by the kings letters patents high ſteward of England, to accompliſh the high cauſe of appeale of the péere or péeres of the realme, and to diſcerne and iudge the cauſe of the péeres.

The duke of Buckingham arreigned at Weſtminſter.

The names of the dukes péeres for his triall.

There were alſo appointed to ſit as péeres and iudges vpon the ſaid duke of Buckingham, the duke of Suffolke, the marques Dorſet, the earls of Worceſter, Duonſhire, Eſſex, Shreweſburie, Kent, Oxford, and Derbie, the lord of ſaint Iohns, the lord de la Ware, the lord Fitz Warren, the lord Willoughbie, the lord Brooke, the lord Cobham, the lord Herbert, and the lord Morleie. There was made within the hall at Weſtminſter a ſcaffold for theſe lords, and a preſence for a iudge, railed and counterrailed about, and barred with degrées. When the lords had taken their place, the duke was brought to the barre, and vpon his arreignement pleaded not guiltie, and put himſelfe vpon his péeres. Then was his indictment read, which the duke denied to be true, and (as he was an eloquent man) alledged reaſons to falſifie the indictment; pleading the matter for his owne iuſtification verie pithilie and earneſtlie. The kings attourneie againſt the dukes reaſons alledged the examinations, confeſſions, and proofes of witneſſes.

Polydor. Edw. Hall.

The duke deſired that the witneſſes might bée brought foorth. And then came before him Charles Kneuet, Perke, de la Court, & Hopkins the monke of the priorie of the Charterhouſe beſide Bath, which like a falſe hypocrite had induced the duke to the treaſon with his falſe forged propheſies. Diuerſe preſumptions and accuſations were laid vnto him by Charles Kneuet, which he would faine haue couered. The depoſitions were read, & the deponents deliuered as priſoners to the officers of the Tower. Then ſpake the duke of Norffolke, and ſaid: My lord, the king our ſouereigne lord hath commanded that you ſhall haue his lawes miniſtred with fauour and right to you. Wherefore if you haue anie other thing to ſay for your ſelfe, you ſhall be heard. Then he was commanded to withdraw him, and ſo was led into Paradiſe, a houſe ſo named. The lords went to councell a great while, and after tooke their places.

Edw.Hall. in H.8.fol.lxxxvj.

The duke of Buckingham conuinced of high treaſon.

Then ſaid the duke of Norffolke to the duke of Suffolke; What ſay you of ſir Edward duke of Buckingham touching the high treaſons? The duke of Suffolke anſwered; He is giltie: & ſo ſaid the marques and all the other earls and lords. Thus was this prince duke of Buckingham found giltie of high treaſon, by a duke, a marques, ſeuen earles, & twelue barons. The duke was brought to the barre ſore chafing, and ſwet maruellouſlie; & after he had made his reuerence, he pauſed a while. The duke of Norffolke as iudge ſaid; Sir Edward, you haue heard how you be indicted of high treaſon, you pleaded thereto not giltie, putting your ſelfe to the péeres of the realme, which haue found you giltie. Then the duke of Norffolke wept and ſaid; You ſhall be led to the kings priſon, and there laid on a hardle, and ſo drawne to the place of execution, and there be hanged, cut downe aliue, your members cut off and caſt into the fire, your bowels burnt before you, your head ſmitten off, and your bodie quartered and diuided at the kings will, and God haue mercie on your ſoule, Amen.

The duke of Buckinghams iudgement pronounced by the duke of Norffolke.

Rich. Grafton. Iohn Stow.

The duke of Buckingham ſaid, My lord of Norffolke, you haue ſaid as a traitor ſhould be ſaid vnto, but I was neuer anie: but my lords I nothing maligne for that you haue doone to me, but the eternall God forgiue you my death, and I doo: I ſhall neuer ſue to the king for life, howbeit he is a gratious prince, and more grace may come from him than I deſire. I deſire you my lords and all my fellowes to pray for me. Then was the edge of the axe turned towards him, and he led into a barge. Sir Thomas Louell deſired him to ſit on the cuſhins and carpet ordeined for him. He ſaid nay; for when I went to Weſtminſter I was duke of Buckingham, now I am but Edward Bohune the moſt caitife of the world. Thus they landed at the Temple, where receiued him ſir Nicholas Vawſe & ſir William Sands baronets, and led him through the citie, who deſired euer the people to pray for him, of whome ſome wept and lamented, and ſaid: This is the end of euill life, God forgiue him, he was a proud prince, it is pitie that hée behaued him ſo againſt his king and liege lord, whome God preſerue. Thus about foure of the clocke he was brought as a caſt man to the Tower.

The duke of Buckingham beheaded on a ſcaffold at Tower hill.

On fridaie the ſeuentéenth daie of Maie, about eleuen of the clocke, this duke of Buckingham, earle of Hereford, Stafford, and Northampton, with a great power was deliuered to Iohn Keime & Iohn Skeuington ſhiriffes, who led him to the ſcaffold on Tower hill, where he ſaid he had offended the kings grace through negligence and lacke of grace, and deſired all noble men to beware by him, and all men to pray for him, and that he truſted to die the kings true man. Thus méekelie with an axe he tooke his death. Then the Auguſtine friers tooke his bodie, and head, and buried them. Alas that euer the grace of truth was withdrawne from ſo noble a man, that he was not to his king in allegiance as he ought to haue béene! Such is the end of ambition, the end of falſe propheſies, the end of euill life, and euill counſell; but ſpeciallie the end of malice, which grew to ſo huge and monſtruous a fire in the hautie hart of the proud cardinall, that nothing could aſſwage it, but the bloud of this noble duke, againſt whome he had procured this proceſſe in iudgement ended with the execution of death: the torments whereof were (as it ſéemeth by the ſentence of the iudge) much diminiſhed through the mercie of the king.

For though his offenſe was traitorous, and therfore deſerued as law had prouided, and the iudge defined; yet in reſpect of the offendors perſon, the kings fauor diſpenſed with the rigor of iudgement, ſo that he was beheaded onelie, and his bodie not diſmembred. ¶ This duke had begun a great and ſumptuous building at his manor of Thornburie, but left the ſame vnfiniſhed. He made a faire parke hard by the ſame building, for the which he tooke in much and fruitfull ground. Alſo another parke at Eaſtwood, one mile off, he inlarged at two times to the compaſſe of ſix miles, for the which déed, and ſuch like, he had manie a curſſe of the poore tenants.] At the time of his death (no doubt) his conſcience (giuing in greater euidence than 10000 witneſſes) told him whether he was iuſtlie condemned or no, for a mans dieng day is as a bill of information, putting him in mind of his life well or ill ſpent, as one ſaith:

A conuenient collection concerning the high conſtables of England, which office ceaſſed and tooke end at the duke of Buckingham aboue mentioned.

The death of this duke of Buckingham, being the laſt conſtable of England, dooth preſent apt place to me wherein to inſert the names of all ſuch honorable perſons as haue béene inueſted with that title of the conſtableſhip of England, an office of great account, & ſuch as as ſometime was the cheefeſt place of a temporall ſubiect in the relme the (high ſteward excepted) whoſe power did extend to reſtreine ſome actions of the kings. Wherefore being now no ſuch office (for there was neuer anie aduanced therevnto ſince the beheading of this duke) I thinke it not vnmeet to make ſome memorie of thoſe perſons poſſeſſing ſo high a place, leaſt both they and their office might hereafter grow in vtter obliuion: theſe therefore they were.

Alfgarus Stallere.

Alfgarus Stallere, conſtable to Edward the Confeſſor, of whome thus writeth the hiſtorie of Elie in the ſecond booke written by Richard of Elie a moonke of that houſe, in the time of Henrie the ſecond, whoſe words although they be ſomewhat long, I ſhall not greeue to ſet downe in this ſort. *De famoſa villa Eſtre, alio nomine Plaſsie vocata, dicendum eſt quàm miſerè ab Elie eſt deſtracta. Alfgarus quidem Stallere, quod Latinè dux dicitur, eam inuaſit, & vſus eſt ea. Abbas verò Wolfricus & fratres, cùm ſeduló fruſtra requirerent, Edwardum Confeſſorem adeunt, cui rex mandauit, vt reſtitueret: ſed ille regijs iuſsis nequaquam obtemperauit. Illi verò hoc cognoſcentes, illi annunt, demiſerúntq; ei (quamuis ad ſuum incommodum) ita vt iureiurando poſt ipſius vitam ab omni ſuorum inquietudine libera ad eccleſiam poſſeſsio rediret. Quod quidem factum eſt, & ſcripto Anglici ſermonis deſignatum. Teſtes rex Edwardus & regina, &c. Which man (after the death of king Edward the Confeſſor and Harold the vſurper) was when the Normans entered England, as ſaith the ſaid hiſtorie In ergaſtulo plurimis alijs ferro aſtrictus vſque ad mortem.

Walter of Gloceſter.

Walter conſtable of England in the time of William the Conquerour, and of William Rufus ſucceeded Alfgarus. Here (before I ſaie anie more) I thinke it not amiſſe to ſet downe ſomewhat touching William Fitz Oſberne, or Oſbert earle of Hereford, whome manie will haue to be conſtable in the time of the Conquerour: which truelie I can not as yet be led to beleeue. For although that this William was the onelie man, who both perſuaded, incouraged, and procured aid of others to aſſiſt William Conquerour for the obteining of England; and that this man was (as we commonlie ſaie) the onelie right hand, cheefe compeller, and diſpoſer of the kingdome, after that William the Conquerour had obteined the ſame, being alſo Tribunus militum of all the armie that William Conquerour led into England, and the man that perſuaded the biſhop of Samborow to compound for the title of the king of Denmarke made vnto England: yet I ſuppoſe him not to be conſtable, but onelie marſhall of England; or at the leaſt if he were, it could not be verie long. For that this earle was extreame old, departed the realme, and diſpoſed all the affaires of the Norman baſtard beyond the ſeas, and died about the yeare of our redemption 1072, being about the eight yeare of the reigne of William Conquerour.

Milo of Hereford.

Milo the ſonne of the ſaid Walter, an enimie to king Stephan (who yet confirmed him in his fathers inheritance) was aduanced firſt to great honors by Henrie the firſt: who meeting Mawd the empreſſe at Briſtow, and taking hir for lawfull queene, did continuallie follow hir faction: for which ſhe, in the firſt yeare of king Stephan, to honour him for his good ſeruice (as appeareth by the charter thereof) gaue him the earledome of Hereford, conſtableſhip of England, the caſtell of Bironell, & the forreſt of Deane. He was lord alſo of Breckenocke. He tranſlated the chanons of the monaſterie of ſaint Iohns of Lanthonie, in the yeare of our redemption 1103, being the fourth yeare of king Henrie the firſt, to a place neere Gloceſter, then called Hide, and ſince Lanthonie; as Iohn Stow hath well noted out of other authors.

He married Sibilla the daughter of Bernard Newmarch, a nobleman of Normandie, who obteined by conqueſt the lordſhip of Breckenocke: by whome he had iſſue fiue ſonnes and three daughters. The ſonnes were Roger, Walter, Henrie, William and Mahaell. His three daughters were, Margaret, married to Humfreie Bohune; Bertha the ſecond was married to Philip Bruſe, created by king Stephan lord of Bruſe, Gower, Bauld, & Brimble, and in his wiues right lord of Breckenocke; Lucia married to Herebert the ſonne of Herebert, baſe ſonne to Henrie the firſt, who was (in hir right) lord of the forreſt of Deane: he died in the eight or (as others haue) the ninth yeare of king Stephan, being the yeare of our redemption 1143.

William Beauchampe.

William (the ſonne of Walter Beauchampe) ſhiriffe of Worceſter, was made high conſtable of England by king Stephan, in the fift yeare of his reigne, being in the yeare of our redemption 1139, when the king was at Worceſter: which honour he tooke from Miles of Gloceſter; as ſaith that painefull antiquarie Iohn Stow in his chronicle printed in the yeare of our Lord 1580, fol. 191.

Roger fitz Milo.

Roger the ſonne of Milo ſucceeded his father in all his inheritance, as well of the earledome, as otherwiſe: whereby he was in time following alſo conſtable of England, and (as it is moſt probable) reſtored to that office by Henrie the ſecond; for that he was a great enimie to king Stephan. He went amongeſt others with Henrie Fitz Empreſſe to Dauid king of Scots, who knighted the ſaid Henrie in the fourteenth yeare of king Stephan: he married Cicilie the daughter of Iohn Fitz Paine, and died without iſſue.

Walter fitz Milo.

Walter ſecond ſonne to Milo, after the death of his brother Roger was earle of Hereford, conſtable of England, and lord ouer Gwenthie or Wenthie: he builded in the time of Henrie the firſt the caſtels of Gloceſter, Briſtow, and Rocheſter, with the Tower of London: he held the land of Wenthie by long time, who hauing no heire of his bodie gaue the ſame land to Henrie of Hereford, and forſaking the world tooke monaſticall habit on him at Lanthonie, where he was buried, dieng without iſſue.

Henrie of Hereford.

Henrie of Hereford the ſonne of Milo, after the enterance of Walter his brother into religion, was earle of Hereford, conſtable of England, and lord of Breckenocke and Deane; who was in Wenthie at a conflict ſlaine by his owne men, and buried at Lanthonie with Walter the conſtable: after whoſe death Henrie the ſecond deputed Iago ap Seiſell to the cuſtodie of the land of Wenthie.

William fitz Milo.

William the ſonne of Milo, and brother to Henrie of Hereford, was conſtable of England, after the death of his brother, and died without iſſue.

Mahaell fitz Milo.

Mahaell the yoongeſt ſonne of Milo, after the death of William, was conſtable of England, who died without iſſue; whome I feare not to place as conſtable, ſince all hiſtories agree that all the ſons of Milo did ſucceſſiuelie inioie that office, after whome the inheritance comming to their ſiſter, whereof the eldeſt called Margaret (or Margerie) was married to Humfrie Bohune, which line of the Bohunes became afterwards conſtables of England by inheritance.

Humfrie de Bohune.

Humfrie de Bohune, ſteward to Henrie the firſt, (the ſonne of Humfrie de Bohune, ſteward in houſe to William Rufus, ſonne to Humfrie de Bohune that came in with the Conquerour) was (in the right of his wife Margerie one of the daughters and heire of the foreſaid Milo) conſtable of England, he had iſſue Humfrie de Bohune.

Humfrie de Bohune.

Humfrie de Bohune, conſtable of England, married Margaret ſiſter to William king of Scots and daughter to the earle of Huntington, mother to Conon earle of Britaine: he had iſſue Henrie. This Margaret died the third of king John, being the yeare of Chriſt 1201. And this Humfrie alſo died in the time of king John, as ſome haue: or rather (as others haue) in the time of king Richard the firſt.

Henrie de Bohune.

Henrie de Bohune, the ſonne of the ſaid Humfrie and Margaret, was the firſt earle of Hereford of that name of the Bohunes, contrarie to that receiued error, which hitherto hath made the other Bohunes earle of Hereford: and contrarie to the printed pedegrée of the deceaſſed father of the earle of Eſſex now liuing. For this man, being the firſt erle of the Bohunes, was made earle of Hereford in the firſt yeare of king John, as the charter dooth witneſſe. He was alſo conſtable of England, and married Mawd, the daughter and heire of Geffrie lord Ludgarſall ſometime earle of Eſſex, in whoſe right hir huſband was intituled to that honor of the earledome of Eſſex, by whome he had iſſue Humfrie his heire. He died about the fourth yeare of Henrie the third, being the yeare of our redemption 1220, in his iournie as he went to Jeruſalem with other noblemen.

Humfrie de Bohune.

Humfrie de Bohune ſonne of Henrie, being the ſecond of that name that was erle of Hereford, was alſo earle of Eſſex and conſtable of England, being by all men termed La bone counte de Hereford. He married Mawd the daughter of the earle of Orie in Normandie, he had iſſue Humfrie de Bohune that was taken in the yeare of Chriſt 1265, being the fortie & ninth of king Henrie the third at the battell of Eueſham, and died in the life of his father, leauing behind him a ſonne called Humfrie, heire to him and to his father, which Humfrie the father died in the yeare of our redemption 1275, being the third yeare of king Edward the firſt.

Humfrie de Bohune.

Humfrie de Bohune the third earle of Hereford of that name, the ſonne of Humfrie Bohune ſlaine at the battell of Eueſham, was after the death of his grandfather erle of Hereford and Eſſex, and conſtable of England, he married Mawd de Ferens, or Frenis, and had iſſue Humfrie, this earle died in the yeare of our redemption 1298, being the twentie ſirt of Edward the firſt, & was buried at Walden with his wife Mawd.

Humfrie de Bohune.

Humfrie de Bohune the fourth erle of Hereford of that name, was earle of Hereford, Eſſex, and conſtable of England, he married Elizabeth the daughter to king Edward the firſt, and widow to John earle of Holland, he had iſſue John erle of Hereford, Humfrie earle of Hereford, and William earle of Northhampton. This Humfrie taking part with Thomas earle of Lancaſter was ſlaine at Borrobridge by a Welſhman ſtanding vnder a bridge that thruſt him thorough with a ſpeare, in the fouretéenth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the ſecond, being the yeare of our redemption 1321.

John de Bohune.

John de Bohune the eldeſt ſonne of this Humfrie, being the fiſt earle of Hereford, was after the death of his father earle of Hereford, Eſſex, and conſtable of England, he married the daughter of Edmund Fitz Alen earle of Arundell, and died without iſſue in the yeare of Chriſt 1335, being the ninth yeare of king Edward the third. He was buried in the abbeie of Stratford beſides London.

Humfrie de Bohune.

Humfrie de Bohune ſirt earle of Hereford, being brother to John de Bohune, whome he ſucceeded, was after the death of his brother earle of Hereford and Eſſex, and conſtable of England, he died without iſſue in the yeare of our Lord 1361, being the thirtie fiſt of king Edward the third, and was buried at the Auguſtine friers in London.

William de Bohune.

William de Bohune ſeuenth erle of Hereford of that ſurname, being the ſonne of the other Humfrie and brother to the laſt Humfrie, was at a parlement holden in the tenth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the third, being in the yeare of our Lord 1336, created earle of Northhampton, and after the death of his brother Humfrie, he was earle of Hereford and Eſſex, and conſtable of England. He was in the eightéenth yeare of Edward the third, being the yere of Chriſt 1344, ſent into Britaine as generall ouer the Engliſh armie, to reſtore John de Montford to the dukedome of Britaine: which he did, putting Charles de Blois to flight. He married Elizabeth ſome ſaie Eleanor, one of the daughters and heires of Bartholomew Bladeſmere baron of Bedes in Kent, by whome he had iſſue Humfrie.

Humfrie de Bohune.

Humfrie de Bohune, the eight & laſt erle of Hereford of that ſurname of Bohune, was after the death of William his father earle of Hereford, Eſſex and Northampton, and conſtable of England. He augmented the caſtell of Brecnocke, firſt built by Bernard Newmarch. He in the eight and twentith yere of Edward the third (as Iohn Stow noteth) being the yeare of Chriſt 1354, reedified the frier Auguſtines church in London, in which he was buried. He maried Jone the daughter of Richard Fitz Alen erle of Arundell, by whome he had iſſue two daughters and heires, Eleanor the eldeſt, maried to Thomas of Woodſtocke; and Marie the ſecond, maried to Henrie of Bollingbrooke, after king of England, by the name of king Henrie the fourth.

Thomas of Woodſtocke.

Thomas of Woodſtocke the ſirt ſonne to king Edward the third, was created earle of Buckingham, in the firſt yeare of Richard the ſecond at his coronation, being the yeare of our Lord 1377, and after duke of Gloceſter, in the eight yeare of Richard the ſecond 1385. He maried Eleanor eldeſt daughter of Humfreie Bohune (as before) in whoſe right he was earle of Eſſex, Northampton, and conſtable of England, beſides which he was alſo lord of Brecnocke. He had iſſue one ſon & foure daughters: his ſonne was Humfreie erle of Buckingham, whom K. Richard (after the murthering of his father at Calis) ſent into Ireland, where he remained as priſoner vntill the time of king Henrie the fourth, which called him home: who returning into England, died of the plague without iſſue at Cheſter: after whome his mother liued not long. Of whoſe death thus writeth that worthie poet ſir Iohn Gower knight, liuing at that time, in his booke of the hiſtorie of Richard the ſecond, and Henrie the fourth, commonlie taken as part of his worke intituled & named, Vox clamantis:

Interea tranſit moriens nec in orbe remanſit,
Humfredus dictus reddit ille Deo benedictus,
Defuncto nato cito poſt de fine beato,
Mater tranſiuit dum nati funera ſciuit,
*Primo deceſſit * Cignus, dolor vnde repreſſit*
Matrem cum pullo, ſibi mors nec parcit in vllo.

*The duke of Glóceſter, bicauſe the ſwan was his cogniſance.

The foure daughters, heires to Thomas of Woodſtocke & their brother Humfreie, were Anne the eldeſt, married to Edmund Stafford erle Stafford, who had iſſue Humfreie erle of Stafford, Hereford, & Northampton, lord of Brecknocke, &c: which Anne after the death of erle Stafford, did the ſecond time marie William vicont Bourchier created erle of Ewe in France: the ſecond daughter was Philip, lip, which died without iſſue: the third Ione, was maried to Gilbert lord Talbot: the fourth Iſabell, was a religious perſon at the Minories in London. This duke of Gloceſter was murthered at Calis about the yeare of Chriſt 1398, being the 22 yeare of Richard the ſecond, touching whoſe life and death, with the maner thereof, thus writeth the ſaid ſir Iohn Gower, in the ſame booke intituled Vox clamantis:

O quàm fortuna ſtabilis non permanet vna,
Exemplum cuius ſtat in ordine carminis huius,
Rex agit, & Cygnus patitur de corde benignus,
Ille proſtratus non eſt de rege leuatus,
Ad Pleſſyè captus tunc eſt velut hoſtia raptus,
Rex iubet arma geri, nec eo voluit miſereri,
Cum ſponſa nati lugent quaſi morte grauati,
Plúſq; lupo ſæuit rex dummodo fœmina fleuit,
Nil pietas munit quem tunc manus inuida punit,
Rex ſtetit obliquus nec erat tunc vnus amicus,
O regale genus, princeps quaſi pauper egenus,
Turpiter attractus iacet & ſine iure ſubactus,
Sunt ibi fautores regis de ſorte priores,
Qui Cygnum pendent, vbi captum ducere tendent,
Sic ducendo ducem, perdit ſiue lumine lucem,
Anglia qui tota tenebreſcit luce remota,
Trans mare natauit, regnum qui ſemper amauit,
Flent centum mille, quia Cygnus præterit ille,
Caliſy portus petit vnde dolus latet ortus,
Error quem regis genui putredine legis,
Carcere concluſus ſubitò fuit ille recluſus,
Neſcit quo fine ſit vitæ ſiue ruinæ,
Tunc rex elatum ſumpſit quaſi falco volatum,
Vnde ſuas gentes perdit cuſtode carentes.

A little after which followeth theſe verſes, touching the deniall of buriall to be granted vnto him among the reſt of his honourable and roiall anceſtors:

Sic nece deuictum, ſic corpus ab hoſte relictum,
Clam de conclaui, ſuſceperat Anglia naui,
Per mare regreditur, corpus nec adhuc ſepelitur,
Námq; ſepulturam, defendit rex ſibi puram,
De ſuper à latere, patris loca iuſta tenere,
Dummodo quæſiuit, vix baſſa ſepulchra ſubiuit.

Of the maner alſo of whoſe death the ſaid ſir Iohn Gower hath ſet downe theſe thrée following verſes:

Heu quàm tortorum quidam de ſorte malorum,
Sic ducis electi plumarum pondere lecti,
Corpus quaſſatum iugulántq; necant iugulatum.

His wife Elenor died the third of October, in the yeare of our redemption 1399, being the firſt yeare of king Henrie the fourth, and was buried at Weſtminſter on the ſouth ſide of king Edward the third with this epitaph:

Icy giſt Elenor de Bohune ayſne fille & vn des heyres a honorable ſeigneur monſeigneour Humphrey de Bohune, countie de Hereford, & de Eſſex, & de Northampton, & conſtable d'Angliterre, femme a puiſſant & noble prince Thomas Woodſtocke, fitz a treſexcellent & treſpuiſſant ſeigneiur Edwarde roy d'Angliterre pius le cōqueſt tierce, duc de Gloceſter, que moruſt tierce ioure de October lan du grace 1399, de que alme Dieux fait mercye.

Edward Plantagenet.

Edward Plantagenet ſonne to Edmund of Langleie, was by Richard the ſecond created earle of Rutland, and duke of Albemerle, who being conſtable of England arriued in the thrée and twentith yeare of Richard the ſecond, and in the yeare of our Lord 1399 in Ireland, to bring aid to the king being there in warre. Of this man is more liberall diſcourſe in my folowing treatiſe of the dukes of England.

Henrie Perſie

Henrie Perſie lord Perſie, the firſt lord, and the firſt earle of Northumberland of that name, was aduanced to that honourable title of earle at the coronation of king Richard the ſecond, in the yeare of our redemption 1377. He was made high conſtable of England by Henrie the fourth, then elected but not crowned king of England, bicauſe the ſaid earle did giue that ring to the king whereby he was wedded to the kingdome of England, to whome alſo the king gaue the Ile of man to beare the ſword with which he entered the realme. He in the fourth yeare of king Henrie the fourth, being the yeare of Chriſt 1403, rebelled againſt the king: but after comming to the king vpon ſending for, he was pardoned his life, but commited to ſafe cuſtodie. After which, in the fift yeare of that king, he was at a parlement holden at London reſtored to his eſtate and dignitie, who the yeare following, being the ſixt of Henrie the fourth, and the yeare of Chriſt 1405, againe rebelled, and after fled into Scotland, to Dauid lord Fleming who receiued him, and in the ſeuenth yeare of Henrie the fourth, being the yere of our redemption 1506, as ſaith Iohn Stow.

This Dauid perſuaded the erle to flie into Wales, for which cauſe the Scots ſlue the ſaid Dauid. After this, in the ninth yeare of Henrie the fourth, he came into England, raiſed the people, and was ſlaine at Bromeham néere to Haſelwood, in a conflict had with him by Thomas Rockleie ſhiriffe of Yorkſhire. He married two wiues, the firſt was Margaret daughter to Rafe lord Neuill, by whome he had iſſue Henrie Perſie, ſurnamed Hotſpurre (ſlaine at the battell of Shrewſburie in the fourth yeare of Henrie the fourth in his fathers life) Thomas and Rafe. His ſecond wife was Mawd, daughter to Thomas lord Lucie, and ſiſter and heire to Anthonie lord Lucie baron of Cockermouth, being before the widow of Gilbert Humfreuill called the earle of Angus. This ladie Mawd gaue to hir huſband the lordſhip and caſtell of Cockermouth, whereby the earles of Northumberland are bound ſtill to beare the armes of Lucie.

ford.

Iohn duke of Bedford the ſonne and brother of kings (for ſo he calleth himſelfe in the precept to ſummon Reginald lord Greie, & ſir Edward Haſtings knight, to determine the controuerſie for bearing of the armes of Haſtings earle of Penbroke in the marſhals court) was earle of Richmond and Kendall, and conſtable of England, being aduanced to that office about the eight yeare of Henrie the fourth his father, being the yeare of our redemption 1406, of whome there is more mention in the following diſcourſe of the protectors of England.

Humfrie Stafford.

Humfrie earle of Stafford, Hereford, and Northampton, lord of Brecnocke, Holderneſſe, and of Cambridge, and conſtable of England, and of Douer caſtell, in the eight yeare of king Henrie the ſixt, being the yeare of Chriſt 1430, went into France with Henrie the ſixt to attend his coronation at Paris. He was created duke of Buckingham in the two and twentith yeare of Henrie the ſixt, being the yeare of Chriſt 1444. He was ſlaine at the battell of Northampton in the eight and thirtith yeare of king Henrie the ſixt, being the yeare of our Lord 1460, he maried Anne daughter to Rafe Neuil erle of Weſtmerland: he had amongſt manie other of his children Humfrie his eldeſt ſonne earle Stafford, hurt (as hath Iohn Stow) with an arrow in the right hand at the battell of ſaint Albons in the thrée and thirtith yeare of Henrie the ſixt, being the yeare of our Lord 1455, of which battell of ſaint Albons thus writeth Iohn Whethamſted a learned abbat of that houſe:

John Tiptoth oꝛ Tiptoſt.

John Tiptoth or Tiptoſt knight, the ſon of John lord Tiptoſt, and of Joice his wife, ſecond daughter to Edmund Charleton lord Powes, was treaſuror of the realme in Michaelmaſſe tearme in the tenth yere of Henrie the fourth, after which he was againe admitted to that office in the one and thirtith and two and thirtith yeare of Henrie the ſixt, from which place being once more remooued, he was the third time aduanced to the honor of lord treaſuror of England in the ſecond of Edward the fourth, and continued the ſame in the third of the ſaid king. He was created earle of Worceſter in the time of king Henrie the ſixt. This man in the yeare 1470, being the tenth of king Edward the fourth, tooke his part againſt the duke of Clarence, and Richard Neuill earle of Warwike, at what time the ſaid duke and earle being diſcomfited, fled to the ſea ſide, and thence ſailed to Southhampton, where they thought to haue had the Trinitie a great ſhip of the earle of Warwikes, but the lord Scales the queenes brother fought with them, and inforced them to flie into France.

Wherevpon king Edward the fourth came to Southhampton and cauſed Tiptoſt earle of Worceſter to ſit in iudgement vpon certeine gentlemen, as Clapham and others, taken at the ſame ſkirmiſh of Southhampton, where the earle cauſed the bodies of certeine condemned men, after that they were hanged to be thruſt thorough the fundament vp to the head with ſtakes, for the which crueltie he and others fell into indignation of the common people. Before which in the eight yeare of king Edward, he was with John Dudleie made conſtable of the Tower, during their liues, and the longer liuer of them two.

After this in the ſaid yeare 1470, being the tenth of Edward the fourth, in which Henrie the ſixt readepted the crowne of England, which yeare of Henrie the ſixt is called in the law bookes, the fourtie & ninth yere of the reigne of K. Henrie the ſixt. This earle of Worceſter was taken in the top of an high tree in the foreſt of Weibridge in Huntingtonſhire, brought to London, and at a parlement arreſted and condemned to death, by ſir John Vere earle of Orford. Wher vpon he was beheded at Tower hill, and buried in the blacke friers of London. He had three wiues, wherof the firſt was called Cicilie the daughter of Richard earle of Saliſburie: the ſecond Elizabeth the daughter of Robert Greindoure: the third was Elizabeth, after married to ſir William Stanleie, which John had by his third wife Edward lord Tiptoſt who died without iſſue, & ſo the inheritance went to the ſiſters of the ſaid earle John Tiptoſt.

Lord Beaumont.

And here I thinke it not amiſſe to ſay ſomewhat of the lord Beaumont, who being in our chronicles named conſtable of England (as may appeare in the fiue and twentith yeare of Henrie the ſixt, in which yeare he arreſted Humfrie duke of Gloceſter) that for any thing that I can yet ſee or learne, this Beaumont was not conſtable by patent during his life, but for the preſent time to execute the princes pleaſure, and therefore not meet in this diſcourſe to haue anie ſpeciall place amongeſt ſuch as were conſtables of England, either by deſcent or patent.

Richard Wooduile.

Sir Richard Wooduile knight, earle Riuers, was high conſtable of England in the fourth yere of king Edward the fourth, of whom is more large mention in the following diſcourſe of the treaſurors of England in the hiſtorie of the reigne of queene Elizabeth.

George Plantagenet.

George Plantagenet, ſecond ſonne to Richard duke of Yorke, was created amongſt other eſtates duke of Clarence, in the yeare of our redemption 1461, being the firſt yeare of king Edward the fourth immediatlie vpon his coronation, and was made conſtable of England in the time of Edward the fourth. He in the eight of Edward the fourth, about the yeare of Chriſt 1468, maried Iſabell the eldeſt daughter of Richard Neuill earle of Warwike and Saliſburie, by whom he had iſſue Edward earle of Warwike and Saliſburie, borne vpon the ſea in the hauen of Calis, who was in the time of Richard the third a continuall priſoner, and ſo hauing beene a priſoner, and thereto borne by a certeine fatall deſtinie, was in the yere of our redemption 1485, being the firſt of king Henrie the ſeuenth committed to cuſtodie in the Tower, where he continued all the reſt of his life, & was beheaded at Tower hill in the fifteenth yeare of king Henrie the ſeuenth, being the yeare of Chriſt 1499, & was buried at Birſam neere to his anceſtors. Beſides this Edward, this George duke of Clarence had iſſue a daughter called Margaret, created by king Henrie the eight counteſſe of Saliſburie, who married ſir Richard Poole knight of the garter, deſcended of the ancient familie of the Pooles in Wales.

Richard Plantagenet.

Richard Plantagenet, the third ſonne to Richard duke of Yorke, was aduanced to the title and honor of the dukedome of Gloceſter, in the yeare of our redemption 1461, being the firſt yeare of king Edward the fourth, ſoone after his coronation. He was high conſtable of England: he maried Anne ſecond daughter to Richard Neuill earle of Warwike and Saliſburie. Which Richard after the death of his brother king Edward the fourth, did by the murther of his nephues aſcend to the higheſt gouernement of England, and was crowned king by the name of Richard the third.

Henrie Stafford.

Henrie Stafford, whome our chronicles doo in manie places corruptlie terme Edward, was ſonne to Humfrie earle Stafford, & was high conſtable of England, and duke of Buckingham. This man raiſing warre againſt Richard the third vſurping the crowne, was in the firſt yeare of the reigne of the ſaid Richard, being the yeare of Chriſt 1483, betraied by his man Humfrie Banaſter (to whome being in diſtreſſe he fled for ſuccour) and brought to Richard the third then lieng at Saliſburie, where the ſaid duke confeſſing all the conſpiracie, was beheaded without arreignement or iudgement, vpon the ſecond of Nouember, in the ſaid yere of our redemption 1483, he maried Katharine the daughter of Richard Wooduile, ſiſter to quéene Elizabeth wife to Edward the fourth; & had iſſue, Edward duke of Buckingham, and Henrie earle of Wilſhire, with two daughters, which were, Anne maried to George lord Haſtings of whom is deſcended the erle of Huntington now liuing, and Elizabeth married to Richard Ratcliffe lord Fitz Waters, of whome is iſſued ſir Henrie Ratcliffe knight, now earle of Suſſex.

Edward Stafford.

Edward Stafford ſonne to Henrie duke of Buckingham, being alſo duke of Bukingham after the death of his father was conſtable of England, earle of Hereford, Stafford, and Northhampton, being in the firſt yeare of Henrie the ſeuenth, in the yeare of our redemption 1485, reſtored to his fathers dignities and poſſeſſions. He is tearmed in the books of the law in the ſaid thirtéenth yeare of Henrie the eight (where his arreignement is liberallie ſet downe) to be the floure & mirror of all courteſie. This man (as before is touched) was by Henrie the ſeuenth reſtored to his fathers inheritance, in recompenſe of the loſſe of his fathers life, taken awaie (as before is ſaid) by the vſurping king Richard the third. He married Elianor the daughter of Henrie earle of Northumberland, and had iſſue Henrie lord Stafford (father to Henrie lord Stafford now liuing) and thrée daughters, Elizabeth married to Thomas Howard earle of Surrie, Katharine married to Rafe Neuill earle of Weſtmerland, and Marie married to George Neuill lord of Aburgauennie. And thus much by Francis Thin touching the ſucceſſion of the conſtables of England.]

Cardinall Woolſie ſent ouer to Calis.

Edw. Hall in H.8.fol.lxxxvj.

In this meane while, were the emperour and the French king fallen at variance, ſo that the warre was renewed betwixt them; for the pacifieng wherof, the cardinall of Yorke was ſent ouer to Calis, where the ambaſſadours of both thoſe princes were appointed to come to him. He arriued there the ſecond of Auguſt. There went ouer with him the erle of Worceſter, then lord chamberleine, the lord of S. Iohns, the lord Ferrers, the lord Herbert, the biſhop of Duresme, the biſhop of Elie, the primat of Armacane, ſir Thomas Bullen, ſir Iohn Pechie, ſir Iohn Huſſie, ſir Richard Wingfield, ſir Henrie Guilford, and manie other knights, eſquiers, gentlemen, doctors, and learned men. Thus honourablie accompanied he rode thorough London the twentie fift daie of Iulie, and at Thomas Beckets houſe the maior and aldermen tooke leaue of him, praieng God to ſend him good ſpéed. Thus paſſed he to Canturburie, where the archbiſhop of Canturburie and others receiued him in his ſtatelineſſe, and brought him vnto his lodging vnder a canopie to the biſhops palace. On the eight daie of Iulie he came to Douer. On the twentith he & the other lords with their retinues tooke paſſage, and arriued at Calis in ſafetie, where the lord deputie and the councell receiued them with much honour and lodged the cardinall in the Staple hall.

The emperor & the French king their ambaſſadours méet at Calis, to treat of a peace.

Shortlie after his arriuall at Calis, thither came the chancellor of France, and the countie de Palice, with foure hundred horſes, as ambaſſadors from the French king; and likewiſe from the emperour came great ambaſſadors, either partie being furniſhed with ſufficient commiſſions to treat and conclude of peace as ſhould appeare. But yet when it came to the point, as the one partie ſéemed conformable to reaſonable offers, ſo the other would not incline that waie; inſomuch that they were neuer at one time agréeable to anie indifferent motion that could be made. There were alſo the popes ambaſſadors, wherevpon the cardinall would haue furthered a league betwixt the emperour, the king of England, the king of France, and the pope: but the popes ambaſſadors wanted commiſſion thereto, and therefore were letters ſent to Rome in all haſt, and the Frenchmen taried ſtill in Calis, till anſwer came from thence. The cardinall rode into Flanders to ſpeake with the emperour, which as then laie in Bruges. A mile without Bruges the emperour receiued him, and did to him as much honour as could be deuiſed. The chéere was great which was made to the Engliſhmen, and of euerie thing there was ſuch plentie, that there was no want of things neceſſarie, inſomuch that of the fare, both for plentifulneſſe, delicatneſſe, and ſtatelineſſe of ſeruice, a man might haue ſaid:

Βρώματα magnorum dixiſſes eſſe deorum.

The emperor receiueth the cardinall with great honour at Bruges.

The cardinall after he had soiorned in Bruges the ſpace of thirtéene daies, and concluded diuerſe matters with the emperour, and accompliſhed his commiſſion, he tooke leaue of his maieſtie, and by conuenient iorneis returned to Calis, where the ambaſſadors of France taried his comming: and immediatlie after his returne to Calis, he treated with them of peace, but not ſo earneſtlie as he did before. In fine, nothing was concluded, but onelie that fiſhermen of both the princes might fréelie fiſh on the ſeas without diſturbance, till the ſecond of Februarie next. When no concluſion of agréement could be accorded, the cardinall ſent to the emperour the lord of S. Iohns, and ſir Thomas Bullen knight, to aduertiſe his maieſtie what had béene doone, and likewiſe to the French king, as then lieng in campe with a mightie armie in the marches about Cambreie. The earle of Worceſter and the biſhop of Elie were ſent to informe him of all things that had béene motioned, exhorting him to incline to peace, but he gaue little eare thereto: and then after they had béene a ninetéene or twentie daies in his hoſt they returned.

Cardinall Woolſie carrieth the great ſeale with him to Calis, & there ſealeth writs and patents.

During the continuance of the cardinall in Calis, all writs and patents were there by him ſealed, and no ſhiriffes choſen for lacke of his preſence, hauing there with him the great ſeale, & full power in things, as if the king had béene there in perſon. ¶ Ambaſſadors comming from the king of Hungarie towards the king of England, were receiued honourablie of the Cardinall during his abode in Calis.

Polydor.

After the returne of the Engliſh ambaſſadours, which the cardinall had ſent to the emperour, and to the French king, he returned into England, hauing (as ſome write) concluded a new league with the emperour, and ſignified by waie of intendment to the French king in the treatie with his ambaſſadors, that the king of England meant him not ſo much fréendſhip as of late he had doone, for diuerſe cauſes. But ſpeciallie this was vttered, that where it was concluded that the king of Scots ſhould be included within the league (as before yée haue heard) contrarie to that agréement, the ſaid king refuſed to enter as a confederate into the ſame league: and this no doubt procéeded through counſell of the French king, by whom he was wholie guided. This quarrell was laid as an occaſion, whie to moue the king of England (perceiuing himſelfe to be diſſembled with) to withdraw his good will from the French king.

Who when he vnderſtood the drifts of the cardinall, and concluſion of the new league confirmed betwixt the king of England and the emperour, he condemned the cardinall of vntruth, accuſed him of diſſimulation, abhorred his practiſes, as by the which he loſt the fruition of the king of England his fréendſhip, and might no longer inioy it. And herewith he determined with himſelfe neuer to put confidence in anie Engliſhman after, nor to beſtow anie gifts or penſions vpon them. For he vſed yéerelie to ſend to diuerſe of the kings councell after the maner of his predeceſſors ſundrie gifts and ſummes of monie: & bicauſe he had imploied more on the cardinall than on the reſidue, he was the more offended toward him as the head of all this iniurious dooing. Yet he found not himſelfe ſo much greeued, as to vtter anie bitter words towards the king: but contrarilie within a while after, directed his letters vnto him, ſignifieng that he meant to continue the league as his freend: but it maie be he did this after a diſſembling ſort, bicauſe he would not be at warres with two ſo mightie princes at one time.

The warres betweene the emperor and the French king.

Tornaie beſieged by the emperors men.

In this meane while, the warre was purſued betwixt the emperour & the French king, as well on the confines towards Flanders, as beyond the mounteins in the parties of Lombardie. Tornaie was beſieged by the lord Hugh de Moncada, a Spaniard, the which comming vpon the ſudden, tooke manie abroad in the fields, yer they knew of his approch, and after this, comming before the citie, he inuironed it with a ſiege, to keepe the citizens from ſtirring forth, and ſent part of his armie with the light horſemen to forlaie the ſtreets and paſſages, that no ſuccour ſhould come to them within. The French king aſſembled an armie, in hope to aid them of Tornaie with men, munitions, and vittels, the which armie aſſaied twiſe or thriſe with all endeuor, to haue approched the citie: but in vaine, for with no ſmall loſſe the French were repelled by the imperials, which neuertheleſſe felt their part of ſlaughter, loſing ſundrie of their capteins, as baſtard Emerie, and the capteine of Gant. Finallie, the French armie brake vp, & was diſperſed into fortreſſes. Wherevpon they of Tornaie perceiuing the ſuccours which they hoped for, to faile them thus at need, rendered the citie to the emperor the laſt of Nouember, in this 13 yeare of king Henries reigne.

Tornaie deliuered vp to the emperor.

The death of pope Leo the tenth who (as was ſuſpected) was poiſoned.

¶ Pope Leo died this yeare ſuddenlie, on the firſt of December, as he laie at the village of Magliana whither he went oftentimes for his recreation. He had heard the firſt reapport of the taking of Millan, which ſtirred in him ſuch an extreame paſſion of ioy, that the ſame night he entered into a ſmall feauer: and for his better remedie he cauſed himſelfe the next daie to be remooued to Rome: where he died within a verie few daies after, notwithſtanding the phyſicians in the beginning made no great reckoning of his diſeaſe. There was great ſuſpicion that he was poiſoned by Barnabie Maleſpina his chamberleine, whoſe office was alwaies to giue him drinke. And yet though he was made priſoner through the ſuſpicion of the fact & the vehement reaſons of the ſame; yet the matter was daſhed and the examination thereof: for that the cardinall de Medicis as ſoone as he came to Rome, ſet him at libertie, fearing to fall further in diſgrace of the French king, by whoſe practiſe it was ſuppoſed that Barnabie gaue him the fatall drinke. This was but whiſpered ſecretlie, the author being no leſſe doubtfull than the coniectures vncerteine.

The maner and order of the popes death.

He died (if we conſider the common opinion of men) in verie great glorie and felicitie, not ſo much for that by the ſurpriſing of Millan he ſaw himſelfe deliuered of dangers & expenſes intollerable, which hauing drained him of all ſtore of monie and treaſure, he was conſtreined to aduance all meanes and maners for his ſupplie and releeuing: but alſo that a verie few daies afore his death he receiued aduertiſement of the taking of Plaiſanca, and the verie daie he died, newes came to him of the winning of Parma: a matter ſo greatlie deſired by him, that at ſuch time as he debated to mooue warre againſt the Frenchmen, it is verie well remembred that he ſaid vnto the cardinall de Medicis labouring to diſſuade him, that as he was in nothing more caried to the deſire of that warre, than to recouer to the church thoſe two cities; ſo when ſo euer God ſhould bleſſe him with the effect of that deſire, it would not greeue him to die. He was a prince in whom were manie things worthie to be commended & blamed, and in the eſtate & diſcourſe of his life he deceiued greatlie the expectation that was had of him, when he was created pope, for that in his gouernement was great diſcretion, but farre leſſe bountie than was looked for.]

Polydor.

Cardinall Woolſie maketh meanes to be elected pope.

Guic. pag. 823.

After the death of the pope, doctor Richard Pace was ſent to Rome, to make freends in the behalfe of the cardinall of Yorke, who was brought into a vaine hope thorough the kings fauour and furtherance, to be elected pope. But Adrian the ſixt of that name was choſen before doctor Pace could come to Rome; and ſo that ſute was daſhed. ¶ This Adrian biſhop of Derchuſo (after great contention in the college of cardinals touching the election of a new pope) was preferred to the cuſtome of lotting of voices in the conclaue, without anie affection or parcialitie of voice: he was of nation a Fleming, & in his youth hauing beene ſchoolemaiſter to Ceſar, and by his meane made cardinall vnder pope Leo, did at that time gouerne Spaine in the abſence of Ceſar. And as there began ſome voices to publiſh for him, ſo cardinall Xiſto one of that election, began vnder an oration ſpeciall, to recount and amplifie his vertues and knowledge, by whoſe example certeine other cardinals yeelded, and the reſidue from hand to hand followed, though more by conſtraint than councell.

The election of Adrian to the popedome woondered at, and why.

Thus was he choſen with the voices of all the cardinals, and had his creation perfected the ſame morning. Wherein this was to be woondered at, that euen thoſe that had elected him could giue no reaſon, why amid ſo manie troubles & dangers in the eſtate eccleſiaſtike, they had raiſed to the ſouereigne ſee a ſtranger, a forrener, and of long abſence out of the countrie, & wherin were helping no reſpects of fauor, no conſideration of former merits, nor anie conuerſation had with anie of the other cardinals: yea they ſcarſelie knew his name, he had neuer beene in Italie, and had no hope nor cogitation to ſee it: of which ſtrauagant maner of dealing, being not able to excuſe themſelues, they attributed all to the working of the Holie-ghoſt, who is woont (for ſo they alleged) to inſpire the hearts of the cardinals in the electing of popes: he receiued newes of his election in the towne of Victoria in Biſkaie, and would not haue impoſed vpon him anie other name than his owne, which he cauſed to be publiſhed vnder Adrian the ſixt.

Pope Adrian the ſixt, commeth to Rome.

Now he made his entrie into Rome the nine and twentith of Auguſt, with a great concourſe of the commons and the whole court: of whome albeit his comming was deſired with an vniuerſall gladneſſe (for that without the preſence forſooth of the popes, Rome beareth more a reſemblance of a ſauage deſart than of a citie) yet that ſpectacle wrought ſundrie impreſſions and diuerſities of thoughts in the minds of all men, when they conſidered that they had a pope for nation and language a ſtranger, and for the affaires of Italie and the court altogither vnexperienced: and alſo for that he was not of thoſe regions and countries, who by long conuerſation were alreadie made familiar with the cuſtomes of Italie. The enuie that ſtirred vp in men this conſideration was redoubled by the accident of the plague, which beginning in Rome at his arriuall, afflicted the citie during the whole ſeaſon of Autumne, to the great calamitie and loſſe of the people: a matter which in the fanſies of men was conſtrued to an euill prognoſtication of his pontificacie.]

The deſcription of doctor Pace.

Notwithſtanding this election of Adrian (as you heare) accompliſhed; yet doctor Pace kept his iournie according to his commiſſion. This Pace was a right worthie man, and one that gaue in councell faithfull aduiſe. Learned he was alſo, and indued with many excellent good gifts of nature, courteous, pleaſant, and delighting in muſike, highlie in the kings fauour, and well heard in matters of weight. But the more the prince fauoured him, the more was he miſliked of the cardinall, who ſought onelie to beare all the rule himſelfe, and to haue no partener; ſo that he procured that this doctor Pace vnder color of ambaſſage, ſhould be ſent forth of the realme, that his preſence about the king ſhould not win him too much authoritie and fauour at the kings hands.

Edw. Hall.
Doctor Tunſtall made biſhop of London.

This yeare was a great death in London and other places of the realme. Manie men of honour and great worſhip died, and amongeſt other, the biſhop of London, doctor Fitz James, in whoſe place was doctor Tunſtall elected. The earle of Surrie returned out of Ireland, and came to the court the fiue and twentith of Ianuarie. Manie complaints were made by the merchants to the king and his councell of the Frenchmen, which ſpoiled them by ſea of their goods. For by reaſon that the wars were open betwixt the emperour, and the French king, manie ſhips of warre were abroad on both parts, and now and then the Engliſhmen fell into their hands, and were vſed as enimies; namelie by the Frenchmen, which naturallie hated the Engliſhmen. The French kings ambaſſadours promiſed reſtitution of euerie thing, but little was reſtored. In this moneth of Ianuarie therefore, the king commanded all his ſhips to be rigged, and made readie, which was doone with all diligence.

Abr. Fl. ex adm. A. G. ad Ang. & Scot. excuſ. Gen. 1558. in fol. 69.

On the ſecond daie of Februarie, the king as then being at Greenewich, receiued a bull from the pope, whereby he was declared Defendor of the Chriſtian faith, & likewiſe his ſucceſſors for euer. The cardinall of Yorke ſang the high maſſe that daie with all the pompous ſolemnitie that might be, and gaue cleane remiſſion of ſinnes to all that heard it. This title was aſcribed vnto the king, bicauſe he had written a booke againſt Luther in Germanie; wherevnto the ſaid Luther anſwered verie ſharpelie, nothing ſparing his authoritie nor maieſtie. ¶ Of which booke publiſhed by the king, I will not (for reuerence of his roiallie) though I durſt, report what I haue read: bicauſe we are to iudge honourablie of our rulers, and to ſpeake nothing but good of the princes of the people. Onelie this breefe clauſe or fragment I will adde (leaſt I might ſeeme to tell a tale of the man in the moone) that king Henrie in his ſaid booke is reported to rage againſt the diuell and antichriſt, to caſt out his fome againſt Luther, to raſe out the name of the pope, and yet to allow his law, &c. I ſuppreſſe the reſt for ſhame, and returne to our hiſtorie.]

The king of England and the king of France at variance.

In this meane time, grudges and diſpleaſures ſtill grew and increaſed betwixt the king of England and the French king, ſo that their greefs rankled dailie more and more, till at length the duke of Albanie returned into Scotland, contrarie to that which was couenanted by the league. The French king in deed alleaged, that he was not priuie to his going thither; and wrote to the king, that the ſaid duke was entered Scotland without his aſſent: but it was otherwiſe iudged & knowne, that he had commiſſion of the French king to go thither. Herevpon, the king was ſore offended, and prepared for wars. Muſters were made of able men, and a note taken of what ſubſtance men were. The king alſo ſent ſix ſhips to the ſea, well trimmed, manned, and vittelled. The admerall was one Chriſtopher Coo, an expert ſea man. His commiſſion was, to ſafe gard the merchants, and other the kings ſubiects, that were greeuouſlie ſpoiled and robbed on the ſea, by Frenchmen, Scots, and other rouers.

Chriſtopher Coo admerall.

The lord of Aburgauennie arreigned at Weſtminſter.

The eight of Februarie, the lord Dacres, warden of the marches fore anenſt Scotland, entered into Scotland with fiue hundred men, by the kings commandement, & there proclamed, that the Scots ſhould come in to the kings peace, by the firſt of March following, or elſe to ſtand at their perils; the duke of Albanie being then within fiue miles with a mightie power of Scots. The eleuenth of Februarie, the lord of Aburgauennie was brought from the Tower to Weſtminſter, and there in the kings bench confeſſed his indictment of miſpriſion. The lord Montacute was about the ſame time reſtored vnto the kings fauour. ¶ On the ſecond of March, certeine noble men of the empire, arriued in England, to paſſe into Spaine, who were honourablie receiued; and in honour of them, great iuſts and triumphs were made, which being finiſhed and doone, they tooke their leaue and departed on their iournie.

A Scotiſh rouer taken on the ſea by Iohn Arundell.
Great dearth of corne.

Duncan Campbell, a Scotiſh rouer, after long fight, was taken on the ſea by Iohn Arundell an eſquier of Cornewall, who preſented him to the king. He was committed to the Tower, & there remained priſoner a long ſeaſon. All the kings ſhips were put in a readineſſe, ſo that by the beginning of Aprill, they were rigged and trimmed readie to make ſaile. ¶ This yeare died the lord Brooke, ſir Edward Poinings, knight of the garter, ſir Iohn Pechie, and ſir Edward Belknap, valiant capteins, which were ſuſpected to be poiſoned at a banket made at Ard, when the two kings met laſt. Wheat was ſold this yeare in the citie of London, for twentie ſhillings a quarter, & in other places for twentie ſix ſhillings eight pence.

Clarenceaux ſent into Scotland.
The French K. attacheth the Engliſhmens goods in Burdeaux.

In this yeare Gawan Dowglas, biſhop of Dunkell fled out of Scotland into England, bicauſe the duke of Albanie being come thither, had taken vpon him the whole gouernement of the king and realme there, the ſequele of whoſe doings the biſhop ſore miſtruſted. The king aſſigned vnto this biſhop an honeſt penſion to liue on. And ſhortlie after, was Clarenceaux the herald ſent into Scotland, vnto the duke of Albanie, to command him to auoid that realme for diuerſe conſiderations; & if he would not, then to defie him, ſith contrarie to the articles of the league concluded betwixt France & England, he was entered Scotland without his licence. The duke refuſed to accompliſh the kings commandement, and was therefore defied by the ſaid Clarenceaux. The firſt of March, the French king commanded all Engliſhmens goods being in Burdeaux, to be attached, and put vnder arreſt, and reteined not onelie the monie due to be paid for the reſtitution of Tornaie, but alſo withheld the French queenes dower.

Polydor.
The cardinals liberalitie by vertue of his ſpirituall power ſet forth.

The cardinall vnderſtanding that he was euill ſpoken of, for vſing his power legantine to ſuch aduantage as he did, in ſelling graces & diſpenſations, he thought to beſtow ſome part therof amongſt the people freelie, without taking anie thing for the ſame. Wherevpon, when Lent drew neere, he appointed the preachers at Paules croſſe, to declare, that it ſhould be lawfull to all perſons for that Lent, to eat milke, butter, cheeſe, & egs. And to the end that none ſhould haue anie ſcrupulouſneſſe of conſcience in ſo doing, he by his authoritie granted remiſſion of ſins to all thoſe that did eat white meats: knowing as it were afore hand, that the people giuen to the obſeruance of their religious faſt, would not eaſilie be brought to breake the ſame, contrarie to the ancient cuſtome vſed in their countrie. Neither was he deceiued therein, for ſo farre were the people from receiuing or accounting this as a benefit, that they tooke it rather for a wicked & curſed deed in thoſe that receiued it, & few or almoſt none could he induce to breake their old order and ſcrupulous trade in that behalfe.

Anno. Reg. 14.

The king, vnderſtanding how his ſubiects were handled at Burdeaux by the French kings commandement, The French ambaſſador is called before the councell.

in mooement in breach of the league, the French ambaſſadour was called before the councell, and the cardinall laid ſore to his charge, that contrarie to his promiſe at all times on the French king his maiſters behalfe, affirming that he ment nothing but peace and amitie to be obſerued in all points with the king of England: yet now the Engliſh merchants had not onelie their goods ſtaied at Burdeaux, but alſo they and their factors were laid in priſon, in full breach of all peace and amitie afore time concluded. The ambaſſadour in words ſo well as hée could excuſed his maiſter, but in the end hée was commanded to kéepe his houſe: and the French hoſtages that were appointed héere to remaine for the monie to be paid for the deliuerie of Tornaie, were committed vnto the ſafe kéeping of the lord of Saint Johns, ſir Thomas Louell, ſir Andrew Windſor, and ſir Thomas Neuill, euerie of them to haue one.

The Frenchmen in Lõdon are all arreſted and put to their fines. Polydor.

All the Scots in England apprehended and fined.

Herewith alſo, all the Frenchmen in London were arreſted, committed to priſon, and put to their fines: but they were more courteouſlie vſed than the Engliſhmen were in France. For after they had béene in durance ten daies, they were ſet at libertie, vpon finding ſuerties to appeare before the maior, or elſe before the councell at a certeine daie, and to paie the fine vpon them aſſeſſed, which fine the king pardoned to diuerſe of the poreſt ſort. But in compariſon of the Scotiſh nation, you would haue ſaid, the Frenchmen were in ſmall diſpleaſure: for not onelie thoſe that were borne in Scotland, but alſo diuers northernmen borne, within Engliſh ground, for enuious ſpite called Scots, were apprehended, impriſoned, and grieuouſlie fined, although ſome of them by ſtreict inquirie tried to be Engliſhmen, eſcaped without paieng the fine.

The nauie ſetteth forth.

There were ſent to the ſea, vnder conduct of ſir William Fitz Williams viceadmerall, twentie & eight goodlie ſhips well manned and trimmed for the warres, & ſeuen other ſhips were ſent toward Scotland, which entered the Forth, and proffered to enter the Scotiſh ſhips that laie in the hauens: but the Scots ran their ſhips aland, and the Engliſhmen followed with boats, landed, and ſet the ſhips on fire, & at Leith tooke certeine priſoners, which they brought into England; and ſtill the kings great nauie kept the narrow ſeas: for then was neither peace betwixt England and France, nor open warres. The king vnderſtanding that the emperor would come to Calis, ſo to paſſe into England, as he went towards Spaine, appointed the lord marqueſſe Dorſet to go to Calis, there to receiue him, and likewiſe the lord cardinall was appointed to receiue him at Douer.

Cardinall Wolſie his pompe when he receiued the emperour at Douer.

The marques Dorſet receiueth the emperour at Graueling.

The cardinall taking his iournie forward on the twentith of Maie, rode through London, accompanied with two earles, ſix and thirtie knights, and an hundred gentlemen, eight biſhops, ten abbats, thirtie chapleins, all in veluet and ſattin, and yeomen ſeuen hundred. The marqueſſe Dorſet was gone ouer before vnto Calis: and the fiue and twentith of Maie being ſundaie, the ſaid marqueſſe, with the biſhop of Chicheſter, the lord de la Ware, and diuerſe other at the water of Graueling, receiued the emperour in the name of the king of England, and with all honour brought him to Calis, where he was receiued with proceſſion, by the lord Bernes lieutenant of the towne, with the maior and merchants of the Staple, in the beſt maner that might be deuiſed.

The emperor landeth at Douer.

Juſtes and tourneies at Gréenwich.

On the mondaie he tooke ſhip at Calis, and landed at Douer, where the cardinall with thrée hundred lords, knights, and gentlemen of England was readie to receiue him, and with all honour that might be, brought him to the caſtell, where he was lodged. On wedneſdaie, being the Aſcenſion éeuen, the king came to Douer, and there with great ioy and gladneſſe, the emperour and he met. On the fridaie in the after noone they departed from Douer, & came that night to Canturburie, ſo from thence by eaſie iournies to Gréenewich, where the quéene receiued his nephue with all the ioy that might be. Here the emperour taried certeine daies in great ſolace and pleaſure; and the more to honor his preſence, roiall iuſtes and tourneies were appointed, the which were furniſhed in moſt triumphant maner: the king, and the earle of Deuonſhire, and ten aids with them, kéeping the place againſt the duke of Suffolke: the marques Dorſet, and other ten aids vpon their part.

Edw. Hall. in H.8. fol. xcviij.

On fridaie being the ſixt of June, the king and the emperour with all their companies, marched toward London, where the citie was prepared for their entrie, after the maner as is vſed at a coronation, ſo that nothing was forgotten that might ſet forth the citie. For the rich citizens well apparelled ſtood within railes ſet on the left ſide of the ſtréetes, and the cleargie on the right ſide in rich copes, which cenſed the princes as they paſſed, and all the ſtréetes were richlie hanged with clothes of gold, ſiluer, veluet, and arras, and in euerie houſe almoſt minſtrelſie: and in euerie ſtréet were theſe two verſes written in letters of gold, both Latine and Engliſh:

Carolus, Henricus, viuant; defenſor vterq;
Henricus fidei, Carolus eccleſiæ. That is,

Long proſperitie,
To Charles and Henrie,
Princes moſt puiſſant:
The one of the faith,
The other of the church,
Choſen defendant.

Sée Ed. Hall in H.8. fo. xcvj. & deinceps.

Note the pride of cardinall Wolſie.

The emperor and the king of England ſweare each to other to obſerue the league made betwixt them.

Sundrie pageants were deuiſed, and ſtages verie faire and excellent to behold, with ſuch melodie of inſtruments, and other tokens of ioy and gladneſſe, that woonder it was to conſider the manner thereof. The emperour was lodged at the Blacke friers, and all his nobles in the new palace of Bridewell. On Whitſundaie being the eight of June, the emperour and the king rode to the cathedrall church of ſaint Paule, and there heard maſſe, which was ſoong by the cardinall that had his trauerſe, and cupbord. Before maſſe, two barons gaue him water, and after the goſpell two earles; and at the laſt lauatorie, two dukes: which pride the Spaniards ſore diſdained. The emperour thus remained with the king certeine daies and rode to diuerſe places with him, being ſtill feaſted & banketted, and had all the pleaſure ſhewed to him that might be imagined. At Windſor they taried a whole wéeke and more, where on Corpus Chriſti daie, the emperour ware his mantell of the garter, and ſate in his owne ſtall. On the ſame daie both the princes receiued the ſacrament, and after that ſeruice was ended, they tooke their corporall othes to kéepe and obſerue the league, which was concluded betwixt them. On the morrow after, they departed from Windſor, and by ſoft and eaſie iourneies they came to Wincheſter, on the two & twentith of June.

Erle of Surrie high admerall of England.

Now before the emperour was thus come to Wincheſter, the earle of Surrie being high admerall of England, was come to Hampton with all the kings nauie, & with him the lord Fitz Walter, the baron Curſon, ſir Nicholas Carew, ſir Richard Wingfield, ſir Richard Jerningham, Francis Brian, ſir William Barentine, ſir Adrian Foſkew, ſir Edward Donne, ſir Edward Chamberleine, ſir Richard Cornwall, ſir Anthonie Poines, ſir Henrie Shirborne, and the viceadmerall ſir William Fitz Williams, ſir Edmund Braie, ſir Giles Capell, ſir William Pirton, John Cornwallis, ſir John Wallop, ſir Edward Echingham, ſir William Sidneie, Anthonie Browne, Giles Huſie, Thomas More, John Ruſſel, Edward Bray, Henrie Owen, George Cobham, Thomas Oldhall, Thomas Louell, Robert Jerningham, Anthonie Kneuet, ſir John Tremaile, and ſir William Skeuington the maiſter of the kings ordinance, & John Fabian ſergeant at armes, by whome this enterpriſe was chieflie mooued, with diuerſe others, which in the end of June departed from Hampton, noiſing that they ſhould onelie ſcowre the ſeas for ſafegard of the emperour and his nauie.

The emperor departeth out of England towards Spaine.

On the firſt of Julie, the emperours nauie came before Hampton, conteining an hundred and foureſcore goodlie ſhips. Then the emperour tooke leaue of the king, of whome he had manie great gifts, and notable ſummes of monie by waie of lone; & ſo the ſixt of Julie he tooke his ſhip, and made ſaile to Spaine, where he arriued in ſafetie the tenth daie after. The king borrowed of the citie of London twentie thouſand pounds, and deliuered priuie ſeales for warrant of the repaiment. None were charged but men of good wealth. The like lone was practiſed through all the realme, not without grudge of manie perſons that were called vpon for the ſame. The earle of Surrie hauing wafted the emperour ouer to the coaſt of Biſcaie, vpon his returne finding the wind fauourable, according to his inſtructions, made to the coaſt of Britaine, and landing with his people in number ſeuen thouſand, about fiue miles from Morleis, marched thither, and aſſaulting the towne, wan it.

The king borroweth 20000 pounds of the citie.

For the maiſter gunner Chriſtopher Morreis hauing there certeine falcons, with the ſhot of one of them, ſtroke the locke of the wicket in the gate, ſo that it flew open: and then the ſame Chriſtopher and other gentlemen, with their ſouldiers, in the ſmoke of the gunnes preſſed to the gates, and finding the wicket open, entered, and ſo finallie was the towne of Morleis woone, and put to ſacke. The ſouldiers gained much by the pillage, for the towne was exceeding rich, and ſpeciallie of linnen cloth. When they had rifled the towne throughlie, and taken their pleaſure of all things therein, the earle cauſed them by ſound of trumpet to reſort to their ſtandards, and after they had ſet fire in the towne, and burned a great part thereof, the earle retreated with his armie towards his ſhips, burning the villages by the waie, and all that night lay on land. On the morrow after they tooke their ſhips, and when they were beſtowed on bord, the earle commanded ſixteene or ſeuenteene ſhips ſmall and great, lieng there in the hauen, to be burnt.

The maner of the winning of Morleis in Britaine by the earle of Surrie.

When the lord admerall had thus woone the towne of Morleis, he called to him certeine eſquiers, and made them knights, as ſir Francis Brian, ſir Anthonie Browne, ſir Richard Cornewall, ſir Thomas More, ſir Giles Huſeie, ſir John Ruſſell, ſir John Reinsford, ſir George Cobham, ſir John Cornewallis, ſir Edward Rigleie, and diuerſe other. After this they continued a while on the coaſt of Britaine, and diſquieted the Britains by entering their hauens, and ſometimes landing and dooing diuerſe diſpleaſures to the inhabitants about the coaſt. After that the earle had lien a while thus on the coaſt of Britaine, hee was countermanded by the kings letters, who therevpon brought backe his whole fleet vnto a place called the Cow, vnder the Jle of Wight, and then went on land himſelfe, diſcharging the more part of his people, and leauing the reſidue with certeine ſhips vnder the gouernance of the viceadmerall ſir William Fitz Williams, to keepe the ſeas againſt the French.

Diuerſe gentlemen knighted by the erle of Surrie vpō the winning of Morleis.

Polydor.

In this meane while, diuerſe exploits were atchiued betwixt them of the garriſons in the marches of Calis, & the Frenchmen of Bullongne and Bullongnois: but ſtill the loſſe ran for the moſt part on the French ſide. For the Engliſh frontiers were well and ſtronglie furniſhed with good numbers of men of warre, and gouerned by right ſage and valiant capteins, which dailie made inuaſions vpon the French confines, and namelie ſir William Sands treaſuror of the towne of Calis, and ſir Edward Gilford marſhall, were two that did the Frenchmen moſt diſpleaſure. On the third of Julie, three hundred French horſſemen comming neere to the caſtell of Guiſnes, kept themſelues in couert, appointing eight or ten of their companie to ſhew themſelues in ſight to the Engliſhmen within. Wherevpon there went foorth eight archers, and fell in ſkirmiſh with thoſe horſſemen, till there came three other to the reſcue of the Frenchmen, and ſkirmiſhed with the archers on foot.

Sir William Sands and ſir Edward Gilford two whips to the Frenchmen.

Herewith iſſued out of Guiſnes twelue demilances all Welſhmen, in reſcue of the footmen, and then all the troope of the French horſſemen brake foorth and ſet on the Welſhmen. The footmen, ſo long as they had anie arrowes to beſtow, ſhot luſtilie, and in the end were driuen to defend themſelues with their ſwords. The Welſhmen keeping togither, entered into the band of the Frenchmen, brake their ſpeares, and after fought and laid about them with their ſwords, ſo that they made a waie, and eſcaped from thoſe three hundred French horſſemen. Of the French ſide were ſlaine three men and fiue horſſes, the Engliſh archers on foot ſelling their liues dearlie, were all ſlaine, for the Frenchmen would not take anie of them priſoners, they were ſo angrie for loſſe of their fellowes.

The valiancie of the Welſhmen againſt the French.

On the fiue and twentith of Julie, the treaſuror and marſhall of Calis, with fourteene hundred footmen, entered the French pale: and finding not monſieur de Foiat for whome they ſought, they went to Whitſand baie, ſet the towne on fire, and aſſaulting the church, into which the people were withdrawne, wan it, and afterwards ſet fire on the ſteeple, bicauſe that diuerſe, hauing ſhut vp themſelues therein, through counſell of a prieſt that was with them, refuſed to yeeld, till the fire cauſed them to leape downe and ſo manie of them periſhed, and the reſt were taken priſoners, and led to Calis. About two daies before this, to wit, the three and twentith daie of Julie, one Thwaits a capteine of an Engliſh ſhip, with ſix ſcore men, archers and others, tooke land beſide Bullongne, and paſſing vp into the countrie three miles to a towne called Newcaſtell, forraied all the parts as he went, and in his returne ſet fire on that towne, and burnt a great part thereof, and came againe to his ſhip in ſafetie, notwithſtanding fourſcore hagbutters, and three hundred other men of warre of the countrie came foorth, and purſued the Engliſhmen verie fiercelie: but the Engliſhmen putting them backe, got to their ſhip, and loſt not a man.

Moreouer, whileſt the warres were thus followed in France, the lord Roſſe, and the lord Dacres of the north, which were appointed to keepe the borders againſt Scotland, burnt the towne of Kelſie, and foureſcore villages, & ouerthrew eighteene towers of ſtone, with all their barnekines. Alſo the king appointed the earle of Shreweſburie to be his lieutenant generall of the north parts, againſt the inuaſion which was intended by the duke of Albanie, which earle directed his letters to all the ſhires lieng from Trent northward, that all men ſhould be in a readineſſe. Order was taken by the cardinall, that the true value of all mens ſubſtance might be knowne, and he would haue had euerie man ſworne to haue vttered the true valuation of that they were worth, and required a tenth part thereof to bee granted towards the kings charges now in his warres, in like caſe as the ſpiritualtie had granted a fourth part; and were content to liue on the other three parts.

The lords Roſſe & Dacres of the north inuade Scotland and ſpoile the countrie.

The cardinall will haue euerie man ſworne to tell what he is worth.

The earle of Surrie ſent with an armie to inuade France.

This demand was thought gréeuous to them of the citie of London, where the cardinall firſt moued it; ſo that manie reaſons were alleaged by them why they iudged themſelues ſore dealt with. In the end they brought in their billes, which were receiued vpon their honeſties. The king in this meane time, being now entered into wars with France, thought not to ſuffer his enimies to reſt in quiet: and therefore leauied an armie which he ſent ouer to Calis, appointing the earle of Surrie to be generall of the ſame. When the earle was come to Calis, and had taken order in his buſineſſe for that iournie, he ſet forward with his armie, being diuided into thrée battels or wards, of the which, the firſt was led by ſir Robert Ratcliffe, lord Fitz Water, the middle ward or battell the earle himſelfe guided, and with him his brother the lord Edmund Howard. The rereward was gouerned by ſir William Sands, and ſir Richard Wingfield, both being knights of the garter. Capteine of the horſſemen was ſir Edward Guilford.

The Burgognians ioine with the Engliſh hoſt.

They entered into the French ground the ſecond of September, being tueſdaie, and tooke their iournie toward Heding. By the way there came to them a great power of Burgognians from the ladie Margaret, as then regent of Flanders, according to the articles of the league. All the townes, villages, and caſtels in the countrie thorough the which they marched, were burned, waſted, and deſtroied on euerie ſide of their waie: as the towne and caſtell of Sellois, the townes of Brume bridge, Senekerke, Botingham, & Manſtier, the towne and caſtell of Nerbins, the towne of Dauerne, the caſtels of Columberge, and Rew, the towne and church fortified of Boards, ſaint Marie de Bois, the towne of Waus, the towne and caſtell of Fringes. On the ſixtéenth daie of September, the earle of Surrie with his armie of Engliſhmen and Burgognians, came before the caſtell of Heding, and planted his ſiege before it. The towne was entered, and part thereof burned by the Burgognians.

The caſtell of Heding beſieged by the Engliſhmen.

The earle of Surrie returneth with his armie to Calis.

Within the caſtell was capteine monſieur de Biez, hauing prouided for defenſe of the place all things neceſſarie; ſo that the earle of Surrie, and other the capteins of the hoaſt, perceiuing they could not within anie ſhort time win it, after they had bin before it eleuen daies, they raiſed their ſiege, chéeflie bicauſe they had no great battering péeces to ouerthrow the walles. For the weather was ſuch, and the waies waxed ſo déepe towards the latter end of that ſummer, that they could not conueie with them anie great ordinance. From Heding they paſſed forward, and comming to Dorlens, burned the towne, and raſed the caſtell. From thenſe they came vnto the towne of Darrier, which they burnt alſo and ſpoiled. Thus they burned and ſpoiled all the waie as they paſſed. But the weather ſtill waxed worſe and worſe, ſo that manie fell ſicke through intemperance thereof, and the Burgognians and Spaniards which were in the armie returned into Flanders.

Then the earle of Surrie, perceiuing that he could no longer kéepe the field in that ſeaſon of the yeare, turned backe towards Calis in good order of battell, and came thither the ſixtéenth of October. He would gladlie in déed (before the departure of the Burgognians and Spaniards) haue paſſed the water of Somme: but other capteins conſidering the time of the yeare to be paſt, and that the whole armie conteined not aboue eightéene thouſand men, iudged it more wiſedome to returne, and ſo in the end their opinions were followed. After that the Engliſh armie was returned to Calis, the earle of Surrie ſent forth ſir William Sands, ſir Maurice Berkeleie, ſir William Fitz Williams, and with them thrée thouſand men, which burned Marguiſon, the towne of ſaint Iehans rode, and alſo Temple towne, with manie villages.

A great bootie woone by the Engliſhmen.

The earle of Surrie returneth with his armie into England.

Aduenturers

They alſo brought a maruellous great bootie of goods out of the countrie, which they got at this rode, as fouretéene thouſand ſhéepe, a thouſand foure hundred oxen and kine, and other great cattell, a thouſand thrée hundred hogs, and eight hundred mares and horſſes, beſides priſoners. When the earle of Surrie had ſet things in order, and appointed forth ſuch as he would haue remaine in the garriſons, on that ſide the ſea; he returned, and all the reſidue of the armie (ſauing thoſe that were commanded to tarie) came ouer alſo with the nauie, and arriued in the Thames; and ſo euerie man into his countrie at his pleaſure. There remained alſo behind a companie of men of warre called aduenturers, which ſerued without wages, liuing onelie on that which they could catch & win of the enimies. There were foure hundred of them that went with the armie now this laſt time into France, and did much hurt vnto the Frenchmen: for they were by practiſe become expert and ſkilfull in the points of warre, and dailie exploited one enterpriſe or other, to their owne aduantage, and hinderance of the enimie.

The duke of Albanie leuieth an armie of Scots to inuade England.

Truce betwixt England & Scotland.
Edw. Hall.

A meane ambaſſage out of Scotland.

The duke of Albanie being in this meane while eſtabliſhed gouernour of Scotland, raiſed an armie of foureſcore thouſand men and aboue, with the which he approched to the Engliſh borders: but made no inuaſion. The miſtruſt that he had in the Scots cauſed him to ſtaie, and therefore he ſent to the French king for ſix thouſand Almans, the which he dailie looking for (& that in vaine) droue off time till the end of ſummer was now at hand, and then requiring a truce for certeine moneths, obteined it at the kings hand. The earle of Shreweſburie had in a readineſſe eight and twentie thouſand men to haue reſiſted him, if he had entered vpon the Engliſh confines. After that an abſtinence of warre was taken betwixt England and Scotland, then in October following there came into England thrée perſonages of ſmall behauiour (as it ſéemed) ambaſſadors out of Scotland: they were ſmallie regarded, and ſhortlie departed.

The earle of Northumberland warden of the whole marches.

Their commiſſion was onelie to vnderſtand, whether the king had aſſented to the truce or not. Wherevpon it was thought that they were ſent rather for a countenance onelie of fulfilling the promiſe made by the duke of Albanie at that preſent, when the truce was granted, than for anie true meaning to accompliſh that which was promiſed; that is to ſaie, to agrée vnto ſome vnfeined and perfect concluſion of peace. The king héere vpon doubting their old pranks, ordeined the earle of Northumberland Henrie Perſie the fift of that name, warden of the whole marches, who thankefullie receiued the honor thereof, and ſo he departed. But whatſoeuer matter it was that moued him, ſhortlie after he began to make ſute to the king, and ceaſſed not, till he was of that office diſcharged: and then the earle of Surrie lord admerall of England was made generall warden, and the lord Marqueſſe Dorſet was made warden of the eaſt and middle marches, and the lord Dacres of the weſt marches.

The Marqueſſe Dorſet entereth into Scotland and burneth diuerſe townes there.

The earle of Northumberland was for this refuſall of exerciſing the office of lord warden, greatlie blamed of his owne tenants, and accounted of all men to be void of the loue and deſire that noblemen ought to haue to honor and chiualrie. The lord Marqueſſe Dorſet accompanied with ſir William Bulmer, and ſir Arthur Darcie, with manie other of the nobilitie, the ſecond of Aprill then being thurſdaie before Eaſter, entered into Tiuidale, and ſo paſſing forward ten miles into Gallowaie, burnt on euerie ſide the townes and villages. All the night he tarried within the Scotiſh ground, and on the morrow being goodfridaie, he withdrew backe into England with foure thouſand neat, hauing burned Grimſleie, Mowhouſe, Douſford, Miles, Ackforth, Crowling, Nowes manour, Midder, Crowling, Marbottell, Lowbog, Seforth manor, Middell right, Primſted, Broket, Shawes, Harwell, Wide open Haugh, with others.

A parlement holden at the Blackefriers in London. Edw.Hall. in H.8.fol.Cvj.

On the fifteenth daie of Aprill began the parlement, which was holden as then at the Blackefriers, and that daie the maſſe of the Holie-ghoſt was ſoong, all the lords being preſent in their parlement robes. ¶ Now when maſſe was finiſhed, the K. came to the parlement chamber, and there ſat downe in the ſeat roiall or throne, and at his feet on the right ſide ſat the cardinall of Yorke and the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and at the raile behind ſtood doctor Tunſtall biſhop of London, which made to the whole parlement an eloquent oration, declaring to the people the office of a king. Firſt he muſt be a man of iudgement, according to the ſaieng of the prophet Dauid, Deus iudicium tuum regi da, &c. Alſo he muſt be a man of great learning, according to the ſaieng of the prophet, Erudimini qui iudicatis terram. According to which ſaiengs he ſaid, that God had ſent vs a prince of great iudgement, of great learning, and great experience: which according to his princelie dutie, forgat not to ſtudie to ſet forward all things which might be profitable to his people and realme, leaſt might be laid to his charge the ſaieng of Seneca; Es rex & non habes tempus eſſe rex? Art thou a king and haſt no time to be a king? Which is as much to ſaie, as; Art thou a king, and dooeſt nothing profitable to thy people? Art thou a king, and ſeeſt the people haue an inſufficient law? Art thou a king, and wilt not prouide remedie for the miſcheefe of thy people?

The oration of doctor Tunſtall biſhop of London.

Theſe things haue mooued the kings moſt excellent maieſtie to call this his high court of parlement, both for the remedie of miſcheefs which be in the common law, as recoueries, forren vouchers & corrupt trials, and for making and ordering of new ſtatutes, which maie be to the high aduancement of the common-wealth. Wherefore he willeth his commons to repaire to the common houſe, and there to elect them a ſpeaker, or their common mouth, and to certifie the lord chancellor of the ſame, who ſhould thereof make report to the kings moſt noble grace, and ſhould declare his pleaſure when he would haue him preſented to his perſon. This was the cauſe of the parlement, as he ſaid. But ſuerlie of theſe things no word was ſpoken in the whole parlement, and in effect no good act made, except the grant of a great ſubſidie were one. But according to this inſtruction the commons departed to the common houſe, & choſe for their ſpeaker ſir Thomas More knight, & preſented him on the ſaturday after in the parlement chamber, where he (according to the old vſage) diſabled himſelfe both in wit, learning, & diſcretion, to ſpeake before the king, and brought in for his purpoſe how one Phormio deſired Haniball to come to his reading, which thereto aſſented, and when Haniball was come he began to read De re militari, that is, of cheualrie. When Haniball perceiued him, he called him arrogant foole: bicauſe he would preſume to teach him which was maiſter of cheualrie, in the feats of warre. So the ſpeaker ſaid, if he ſhould ſpeake before the king, of learning and ordering of a common-wealth and ſuch other like, the king ſo well learned and of ſuch prudence and experience might ſaie to him as Haniball ſaid to Phormio. Wherefore he deſired his grace that the commons might chooſe an other ſpeaker.

The oration of ſir Thomas More ſpeaker for commons.

The cardinall anſwered, that the king knew his wit, learning, and diſcretion by long experience in his ſeruice: wherefore he thought that the commons had choſen him as the moſt meeteſt of all; and ſo he did admit him. Then ſir Thomas More gaue to the king his moſt humble thanks, and deſired of him two petitions: the one, if he ſhould be ſent from the commons to the king on meſſage and miſtake their intent, that he might with the kings pleaſure reſort againe vnto the commons for the knowledge of their true meaning. The other was, if in communication and reaſoning, any man in the common houſe ſhould ſpeake more largelie than of dutie he ought to doo, that all ſuch offenſes ſhould be pardoned, and that to be entered of record. Which two petitions were granted; and ſo thus began the parlement and continued as you ſhall heare.]

This yeare was the citie and the whole Ile of the Rhodes conquered by the Turke, and all the chriſtians diſplaced: whereof Guicciardin hath diſcourſed as followeth. ¶ The end of this yeare (ſaith he) was made no leſſe wretched and vnhappie, than ſlanderous to all chriſtian princes for the loſſe of the Ile of Rhodes: which Soliman Ottoman tooke by violence, notwithſtanding it was defended by the knights of Rhodes, called in other times more ancient the knights of ſaint Iohn of Ieruſalem. And abiding in that place ſince they were chaſed out of Ieruſalem, notwithſtanding they laie betweene two ſo mightie princes as the Turke & the Soldan; yet their valour had preſerued it of long time, and to the right worthie glorie of their order, they had remained as an aſſured rampier of chriſtian religion in thoſe ſeas: & yet they were not without their imputations & notes of infamie, for that hauing a continuall cuſtome for the better defending of thoſe ſhoares, to ſpoile the veſſels of the infidels, they were thought ſometimes to make pillage of chriſtian ſhips.

Abr. Fl. ex Guic. pag. 840. Rhodes taken by Soliman Ottoman.

The Turke ſent into the Iland a woonderfull great armie, which remaining there manie moneths with no leſſe horrour to good men for their cruelties, than terrour to all men for their huge numbers, at laſt he came thither in perſon. And drawing to his deſire of conqueſt and glorie, the reſpect of profit and riches which the victorie would yeeld, he loſt not one minute of time to vex them. Wherein his induſtrie was nothing inferiour to his valour, for ſometimes he caſt monſtrous mines and trenches, ſometimes he raiſed platformes of earth and wood, whoſe height ouertopped the wals of the towne, and ſometimes he afflicted them with moſt furious and bloudie aſſaults: inſomuch that as theſe works and engines were not performed without a woonderfull butcherie & ſlaughter of his ſouldiors; ſo alſo the defenſe of them was ſo dangerous to the liues of them within, that manie numbers were diminiſhed, manie bodies maimed and made vnſeruiceable, & the reſidue ſore terrified by the calamitie of their companions and freends, to whome they could giue no other propertie of compaſſion, than to mourne with them in their common miſerie.

The Turkes great induſtrie equiualent to his valour.

Their aduerſitie was ſo much the more intollerable, by how much their trauels were without fruit, their words without comfort, and their valour diſfauoured of fortune, & laſtlie their ſtore of gunpowder was conſumed, which is not the leaſt neceſſitie for the defenſe of a place. They ſaw before their eies huge breaches made into their walles with the artilleries of their enimies, they diſcerned ſeuerall mines wrought into manie parts of the towne, and they found by lamentable experience, that the leſſe good they did, the more painfullie they laboured, for that their fortune had reduced them to theſe termes of extremitie, that in abandoning one place to relieue another, they put both in danger, not hauing numbers ſufficient to furniſh the ſeruice, and leſſe expectation of reſcue amid perils ſo raging and deſperate: ſo that, what for that their neceſſities were greater than their hopes, & their defenſe leſſe able by the continuall diminution of their numbers, & laſtlie holding it no breach of honour to preſerue by wiſdome and compoſition, that they could no longer defend by their valour and prowes, they gaue place to their deſtinie, and capitulated with the Turke as followeth. That the great maiſter of their order ſhould leaue the towne to him: that as well he as all his knights ſhould depart in ſafetie, with libertie to carie with them as much of their goods as they could. And for aſſurance of this capitulation, the Turke ſhould withdraw out of thoſe ſeas, his fléet or nauie, and retire his armie by land fiue miles from Rhodes. By vertue of which capitulation Rhodes remained to the Turkes, and the chriſtians paſſed into Sicilie, and ſo into Italie, kéeping their faith and profeſſion vnuiolated. They found in Sicilie an armie by ſea compounded of a certeine number of veſſels, with great reléefe of vittels and munitions, and readie to hoiſe ſaile at the next wind to reuittle Rhodes. The ſlowneſſe of this reſcue was laid to the popes fault.

Rhodes rendered vp to the Turke.

Solimans contempt of chriſtian religion.

After they were departed, Soliman for a more contempt of chriſtian religion, made his entrie into the citie vpon the daie of the birth of the ſonne of God: which daie being celebrated in the churches of chriſtians with noiſe of muſike & holie inuocations, he conuerted all the churches of Rhodes dedicated to the ſeruice of Ieſus Chriſt, into Moſqueis (ſo they call their temples) which after all the chriſtian rites and ceremonies were aboliſhed, they made dedicatorie to Mahomet. Good cauſe had the chriſtians herevpon with heauie hearts to make their complaint to God by the preſident of the pſalmiſt, lamenting the libertie of the enimies exerciſing the vehemencie of his rage againſt Gods people; & full well with ſwolne eies teſtifieng the ſorrow of their ſoules might (ſadlie ſounding the dumps of their threnomina) ſate:

Cardinall Wolſie made biſhop of Durham.

About this time the biſhop of Durham departed this life, & the king gaue that biſhoprike to the cardinall, who reſigned the biſhoprike of Bath to doctor Iohn Clerke maiſter of the rolles, and ſir Henrie Marneie that was vicechamberleine, was made lord priuie ſeale, and ſhortlie after was created lord Marneie. In the end of this yeare, doctor Blith biſhop of Cheſter was attached for treaſon, but he acquited himſelfe. About this time the cardinall exerciſed his authoritie (which he pretended by his power legantine) verie largelie, not onelie in proouing of teſtaments in his court, calling the executors and adminiſtrators before him, of what dioceſſe ſoeuer they were, but alſo by prouiſions he gaue all benefices belonging to ſpirituall perſons, and ran thereby within danger of the premunire, as afterward was laid to his charge.

The cardinall exerciſeth his authoritie verie largelie. Polydor.

But after that he perceiued his owne follie and raſh doing herein, contrarie to the lawes, which would not permit that anie ſuch things as were moued within the prouince of Canturburie, might bée concluded without the authoritie of the archbiſhop, he ſent them againe to Poules, and ſate himſelfe at Weſtminſter with his cleargie of the prouince of Yorke. And euen as there was much adoo amongſt them of the common houſe about their agréement to the ſubſidie, ſo was there as hard hold for a while amongſt them of the clergie in the conuocation houſe. Namelie Richard biſhop of Wincheſter, & Iohn biſhop of Rocheſter held ſore againſt it, but moſt of all ſir Rowland Philips vicar of Croidon, and one of the canons of Poules, béeing reputed a notable preacher in thoſe daies, ſpake moſt againſt that parlement.

But the cardinall taking him aſide, ſo handled the matter with him, that he came no more into the houſe, willinglie abſenting himſelfe to his great infamie, and loſſe of that eſtimation which men had of his innocencie. Thus the bellwedder giuing ouer his hold, the other yéelded, and ſo was granted the halfe of all their ſpirituall reuenues for one yeare, to bée paid in fiue yeres following, that the burthen might the more eaſilie be borne. The parlement being begun (as ye haue heard) the cardinall on the nine and twentith day of Aprill came into the common houſe, and there ſhewing the great charges that the king neceſſarilie was at, and dailie muſt be at in maintenance of his warres againſt the French and Scots, demanded the ſummes of eight hundred thouſand pounds to bée raiſed of the fift part of euerie mans goods and lands, that is to wit, foure ſhillings of euerie pound.

The cleargie grant halfe of all their ſpirituall reuenues for one yeare.

Anno Reg. 15.

A great ſubſidie demanded by the cardinall in the cõmon houſe.

This demand was inforced on the morrow after, by ſir Thomas More then ſpeaker of the parlement: but he ſpake not ſo much in perſuading the houſe to grant it, but other ſpake as earneſtlie againſt it; ſo that the matter was argued to and fro, and handled to the vttermoſt. There were that prooued how it was not poſſible to haue it leuied in monie, for men of lands and great ſubſtance had not the fift part of the ſame in coine. And ſith the king by the loane had receiued two ſhillings of the pound, which by this rate amounted to 400000 pounds: and now to haue foure ſhillings of the pound, it would amount in the whole vnto twelue hundred thouſand pounds, which is firſt and laſt ſix ſhillings of the pound, being almoſt a third part of euerie mans goods, which in coine might not be had within this realme.

Hard hold about grant of the great ſubſidie.

For the proofe whereof was alleaged, that if there were in England but twentie thouſand pariſhes, and euerie pariſh ſhould giue an hundred markes, that were but fiftéene hundred thouſand markes, which is but an hundred thouſand pounds; and there be not verie manie pariſhes in England one with another, able to ſpare an hundred markes, out of cities and townes. And where it is written, that in England there be fortie thouſand pariſh churches, it was prooued that there were not thirtéene thouſand at this daie. Hard hold there was about this demand, and certeine wiſe and diſcréet perſons were ſent to the cardinall, to mooue him to be a meane to the king, that a leſſe ſumme might be accepted: but he anſwered that he would rather haue his toong plucked out of his head with a paire of pinſers, than to mooue the king to take anie leſſe ſumme: and ſo with that anſwer they departed, reporting to the houſe the cardinals words. Then euerie daie was reaſoning, but nothing concluded.

There are not 10000 pariſhes in England as Stow hath trulie noted.

The obſtinate anſwer of the cardinall to the motion of the common houſe in the parlement.

Wherevpon the cardinall came againe into the lower houſe, and deſired that he might reaſon with them that were againſt the demand: but he was anſwered that the order of that houſe was to heare, and not to reaſon, except amongſt themſelues. There he began to ſhew arguments of the great wealth of the realme, ſo that it might be thought, that he repined and diſdained that anie man ſhould be wealthie but himſelfe. After he was gone, the commons debated the matter according to their former maner, and ſo in the end concluded of two ſhillings in the pound, from twentie pounds vpwards, and from fortie ſhillings to twentie pounds, of euerie twentie ſhillings twelue pence, and vnder fortie ſhillings of euerie head of ſixteene yeeres and vpward foure pence to be paid in two yeares. When this was notified to the cardinall, he was much therwith offended, ſo that to pleaſe him, at length, the gentlemen of fiftie pounds land and vpward, by the liberall motion of ſir John Huſeie, a knight of Lincolnſhire, were burdened with twelue pence more of the pound of the ſame lands, to be paid in three yeares.

Sir John Huſeie.

The cardinall to mooue them thereto, bare them in hand that the lords had agreed to foure ſhillings of the pound, which was vntrue: for they had granted nothing, but ſtaid till they might vnderſtand what the commons would doo. The king therefore hauing knowledge of this, and ſuch other notable lies vttered by the cardinall, reproued him therefore verie ſharpelie, and ſaid that yer it were long he would looke to things himſelfe without anie ſubſtitute. A maruellous matter to conſider how much the cardinall was cooled herewith, and how lowlie for a while he bare himſelfe, ſo that thereby it well appeared how the maiſters ſharpeneſſe now and then, dooth much to reſtraine the euill nature of the ſeruant. But the cardinall within a few daies after, pacifieng the kings diſpleaſure toward him, became nothing the better.

Cardinall woolſie reproued by the king.

After that the foreſaid grant was paſſed and accorded, the parlement was proroged till the tenth of June. During which prorogation, the common people ſaid to the burgeſſes; Sirs, we heare ſay you will grant foure ſhillings of the pound, we aduiſe you to doo ſo that you may go home: with manie euill words and threatnings. In this ſeaſon the cardinall by his power legantine diſſolued the conuocation at Pouls called by the archbiſhop of Canturburie, calling him and all the cleargie to his conuocation at Weſtminſter, which was neuer ſeene before in England (ſaith Hall) whereof maiſter Skelton a merrie poet wrote:

Edw. Hall in H.8. fol.Cx.

The cardinall diſſolueth the archbiſhop of Canturburies conuocation.

Gentle Paule lay downe thy ſweard,
For Peter of Weſtminſter hath ſhauen thy beard.

When the parlement was begun againe, the gentlemen that ſaw themſelues charged with twelue pence more of the pound for their lands, did ſo much, that it was granted, that men of fiftie pounds and vpward in goods, ſhould alſo pay twelue pence of euerie pound in the fourth yeare: which could not bee brought about but with great adoo, and much grudging of the burgeſſes and commons. The one and thirtith of Julie, the parlement was adiourned to Weſtminſter, & there continuing till the thirteenth of Auguſt, was that day at nine of the clock at night diſſolued. During the time of this parlement, the ſeuen and twentith of Aprill, was ſir Arthur Plantagenet, baſtard ſonne to king Edward the fourth, at Bridewell created vicount Liſle, in right of his wife, which was wife to Edmund Dudleie beheaded.

Arthur Plantagenet created vicount Liſle.

The king of Denmarke arriueth in England.

In this yeare the fifteenth of June, Chriſterne king of Denmarke, with his wife, and a ſmall traine with them, landed at Douer, where he was noblie receiued by the earle of Deuonſhire, the biſhops of Exceſter and Rocheſter, and diuerſe knights and eſquiers which brought them to Greenwich, where the king and queene receiued them with all honor. Now after he had remained at the court certeine daies, he was brought to London, & lodged at Bath place. He ſaw the watch on ſaint Peters euen, beeing brought vnto the kings head in Cheape, accompanied with the duke of Suffolke, the earles of Oxford, Eſſex, and Kent, and diuerſe other lords and ladies. The citie made to him and to his wife a coſtlie banket that night, and after he had paſſed the time a while in London, he reſorted againe to the king, and had of him great gifts, and ſo likewiſe had his wife of the queene hir aunt, & then taking their leaue they departed, and were conueied to Douer. And thus after this king had beene in England two and twentie daies, he tooke ſhipping, and ſailed againe into Flanders, where he remained as a baniſhed man out of his owne countrie.

About the ſame time, the earle of Kildare being reſtored to the cardinals fauour, and taking to wife the ladie Elizabeth Graie, was ſent ouer againe into Ireland to occupie his former office, where by the aſſiſtance of his faithfull friend Hugh Hinke archbiſhop of Dublin, and chancellour of that land, hee brought the countrie into reaſonable good order, ſo far as the rebellious dooings of the wild Iriſh would permit. In this meane while, the warre was earneſtlie purſued betweene England & France, & England and Scotland, inſomuch that each part did what in them lay to hurt other. On the borders toward Scotland lay the earle of Surrie high admerall of England, and the marques Dorſet, with his brethren, ſir William Compton, & ſir William Kingſton, with diuerſe other knights and eſquiers ſent to them by the king, which dailie inuaded the realme of Scotland, and threw downe the caſtell of Wederborne, the caſtell of weſt Neſgate, the caſtell of Blackater, the tower of Mackwalles, the tower of eaſt Neſgate, & manie other, and burnt to the number of thirtie and ſeuen villages, and haried the countrie from the eaſt marches to the weſt, and neuer had ſkirmiſh.

Scotland ſore ſpoiled.

For the Scots, albeit they ſhewed themſelues in plumps, waiting ſome aduantage, they durſt not yet approch to the maine battell of the Engliſhmen, ſo that in all this iournie there were but few Engliſhmen loſt. When the lords perceiued that the Scots ment not to make anie inuaſion into England this yeare, they tooke order for the fortifieng of the frontiers, and ſo returned. It was thought that the cardinall perceiuing in what fauour ſir William Compton was with the king, and doubting leaſt the ſame might diminiſh his authoritie, deuiſed to ſend him thus into the warres againſt the Scots. For the ſaid ſir William could not well brooke the cardinals preſumption, in taking vpon him ſo highlie, to the derogation of the kings ſupreme gouernement, and therfore the cardinall in his abſence thought to worke him out of fauour: but it would not be. For ſhortlie after was ſir William Compton called home to the court againe.

The Frenchmen burned a ſhip fraught with ſtone in the hauen of Calis, vpon hope to haue deſtroied the hauen; but they miſſed the chanell in bringing in the ſhip, and ſo after that the ſhip was conſumed with fire, the ſtones were recouered out of the water, and brought into Calis, which ſerued the Engliſhmen to good vſe. Diuerſe enterpriſes were atchiued betwixt them of the garriſons French and Engliſh in thoſe marches. In Julie the lord Sands treaſuror of Calis, with other capteins & ſouldiors, to the number of twelue hundred, entered into the confines of their enimies, and came before Bullongne, where they had a great ſkirmiſh, & put their enimies to the worſe: and after marching into the countrie, tooke diuerſe churches and other places which the Frenchmen had fortified, as the church of Oderſall, the ſteeple of Odingham, and the caſtell of Hardingham, and ſo after they had beene within the enimies countrie almoſt two nights and two daies, they came backe to Calis, hauing not loſt paſt a dozen of their men.

The Frenchmen meaning to deſtroy Calis hauen, are diſappointed by miſſing the chanell.

A rode made into the French ground.

The king of England being aduertiſed that the duke of Albanie would returne ſhortlie into Scotland by ſea, and bring with him a power of Frenchmen, prepared a fleet of tall and ſtrong ſhips meet to encounter with the ſame duke and his power, and appointed for admerall, ſir William Fitz Williams, & with him ſir Francis Brian, ſir Anthonie Poines, ſargeant Rot, John Hopton, William Ganſton, Anthonie Knenet, Thomas Weſt, and other, which vſed great diligence to haue met with the ſaid duke of Albanie. And as they laie on the French coaſt, the foure and twentith of Auguſt being ſundaie, at ſeauen of the clocke in the morning, they landed in the hauen of Treiport, and aſſaulted the Frenchmen that were in certeine bulworks on the ſhore, and did what they could to impeach the Engliſhmens landing.

The Engliſh fleet landeth in Treiport hauen.

But the Engliſhmen incouraged by their capteins, did ſo valiantlie (although they were but an handfull of men in compariſon of their enimies, as ſeuen hundred to ſix thouſand) that in the end they repelled the Frenchmen, and wan their bulworks of them, and in the ſame found diuerſe peeces of ordinance, which they ſeized. And perceiuing that the Frenchmen fled to the towne of Treiport, they followed, and ſhot at them right egerlie, ſo that manie of the Frenchmen were ſlaine and wounded, yer they could get to the towne. The Engliſhmen aſſaulted the gates but could not breake them open: yet they ſet fire on the ſuburbes, & alſo burnt ſeuen ſhips which laie in the hauen. The Engliſh capteins perceiuing how the people of the countrie came downe in great numbers to the reſcue of the towne, cauſed their men to get togither ſuch ſpoiles as they might bring awaie in that ſudden: and then after they had beene on land fiue houres, with like ſpeed as they came, they retired backe againe to their ſhips, not without ſome loſſe and damage of men both hurt & ſlaine; as it often hapneth, when thoſe be not found vnprouided which a man vnaduiſedlie aſſaileth.

The duke of Suffolke entereth into France with an armie.

In this ſeaſon the king hauing put an armie of men in a readineſſe, cauſed the ſame to be tranſported ouer to Calis, & appointed the duke of Suffolke to haue the leading thereof, and to make a iourneie into France. The duke (according to his commiſſion) came to Calis the foure and twentith of Auguſt, and there abiding the armie, cauſed all things to be prepared neceſſarie for the ſame, as vittels, munition, and ſuch like. There were appointed to attend him in this iourneie, the lord Montacute, and his brother ſir Arthur Pole, the lord Herbert ſonne to the earle of Worceſter, the lord Ferrers, the lord Marneie, the lord Sandes, the lord Barkleie, the lord Powes, and the baron Curſon: of knights ſir Richard Wingfield chancellour of the duchie of Lancaſter, ſir John Weer, ſir Edward Neuill, ſir William Kingſton, ſir Richard Weſton, ſir Andrew Winſor, ſir Robert Wingfield, ſir Anthonie Wingfield, ſir Edward Guilford, ſir Edward Greuile, ſir Edward Chamberleine, ſir Thomas Lucie, ſir Euerard Digbie, ſir Adrian Foſcew, ſir Richard Cornewall, ſir William Courtneie, ſir William Sidneie, ſir Henrie Owen, and manie others.

The whole armie (as appeered by the muſters taken thereof) conſiſted in ſix hundred demilances, two hundred archers on horſſebacke, three thouſand archers on foot, and fiue thouſand bill men. To theſe alſo were adioined ſeuenteene hundred, which were taken out of the gariſons and crewes of Hammes, Guiſnes, & Calis, ſo that in all they were ten thouſand and fiue hundred, well armed and appointed for the warre. Beſide them, there were alſo two thouſand ſix hundred labourers and pioners. When this armie was come ouer to Calis, and all things readie for the iournie, they iſſued out of Calis and tooke the fields. The vant-gard was led by the lord Sandes. Capteine of the right wing was ſir William Kingſton, & on the left ſir Euerard Digbie. The marſhall of Calis ſir Edward Guilford was capteine of all the horſſemen. The duke himſelfe gouerned the battell, and ſir Richard Wingfield was capteine of the rere-ward.

A riot at Calis.
Edw. Hall. pag. Cxiiii.

While the armie laie without Calis, they dailie came into the towne. And ſo it happened that a ſimple felow cut a purſſe, as he made to buie apples, which incontinent was taken, and brought to the maiors houſe to ward. Which thing diuerſe Welſhmen perceiuing, and not knowing what apperteined to iuſtice, ran in great companies to the maiors houſe, & would haue broken the houſe. The officers of the towne intreated, but the Welſhmen more & more approched. The number of the Welſhmen was ſo great, that the watch of Calis ſtrake alarum. Then the lord deputie and the lord Sands did all that in them laie, to bring them to conformitie. But they were ſo rude, that they nothing them regarded: the prieſts brought forth the ſacrament, which alſo was not regarded. Wherefore the lord Ferrers was ſtraightlie commanded to appeaſe their rage, for with him they came thither, which with great paine and intreatie them appeaſed. And then all the Welſhmen were commanded to the field, and to depart the towne, and ſo were all other capteins: and afterwards diuerſe of the head rioters were apprehended and ſore puniſhed for example.

Bell caſtell aſſaulted.

The firſt enterpriſe that the duke attempted, was the winning of a caſtell called Bell caſtell, to which the lord Sands, and the lord Ferrers being ſent, did ſo much by the power of battrie, that after the wals were beaten, thoſe that were appointed to giue the aſſalt, prepared them therto. Which when the Frenchmen within perceiued, they yeelded the place into the Engliſhmens hands, and themſelues to the mercie of the duke, which receiued them as priſoners, and deliuered the caſtell to ſir William Skeuington, the which he cauſed to be raſed downe to the ground the ſeauen and twentith of September. In this ſeaſon was the duke of Burbon high conſtable of France reuolted from ſeruice of the French king to the ſeruice of the emperour and the king of England. For after it was knowne that this duke had his mind alienated from the French king, ſir John Ruſſell (that was afterward created erle of Bedford) was ſent into France vnto the ſaid duke.

Bell caſtell yeelded vp to the Engliſhmen.

Sir John Ruſſell created afterward erle of Bedford.

This gentleman being verie faire ſpoken, & well languaged, in diſguiſed apparell, ordered himſelfe ſo wiſelie and fortunatlie in his iorneie, that in couert manner he came to the duke, and ſo perſuaded him, that he continued in his former determination, and auoided the realme of France, as in the French hiſtorie ye maie more at large perceiue. The more to incourage the Engliſh ſouldiers, there was a proclamation made in the hoſt the eight and twentith of September, how the ſaid duke of Burbon was become enimie to the French king, and friend to the king of England; ſo that hauing in his wages ten thouſand Almans, he was readie to inuade France in another part, the more to let & diſturb the French kings purpoſes. For the accompliſhing wherof there was ſent to him monie in no ſmall ſummes. After this proclamation the nine and twentith of September, the duke of Suffolke remoued to Ard, and ſo forward into Picardie. At Cordes betweene Terwine and ſaint Omers, there came to him the lord of Iſſlſtein, and with him of Spaniards, Almans, Cleueners, and others, three thouſand footmen, and fiue hundred horſſemen.

The Spaniards ioine with the Engliſh armie.

The duke being thus furniſhed with new aid, marched forward in wet weather, and made bridges, The caſtell of Bounegard manned by the Engliſhmen.

and mended the waies where he paſſed as well as he might, ſending out diuerſe companies of his men of warre, to take townes, and fetch in booties on euerie ſide. The Frenchmen were ſo afraid of the Engliſhmen, that they fled out of their houſes, and left the townes and villages void, conueieng ſuch goods as they could awaie with them, but oftentimes they left good ſtore behind them, ſo that the Engliſhmen gained greatlie, and namely at Anchor, which was a rich towne, and vpon the Engliſhmens approch the inhabitants fled out of it, and then the Engliſhmen entred. They tooke alſo the caſtell of Bounegard, and put therein a gariſon, whereof was capteine the lord Leonard Greie, brother to the marqueſſe Dorſet, to conduct vittellers to the armie, which now was farre from anie ſuccours of the Engliſh part.

The towne of Braie beſieged.

The duke paſſed forward till he came to the towne of Braie, in the which were ſixteene hundred men of warre, vnder the gouernance of capteine Adrian, and beſide his retinue, there came to the ſuccours of the towne, monſieur Pontdormie, the vicount Lauerdam, the vicount Tourraine, monſieur Applingcourt, and monſieur Dampneie, with fiue hundred horſſemen, ſo that in the towne beſide the inhabitants were two thouſand good men of warre. This towne ſtandeth on the riuer of Some foure and twentie Engliſh miles from Arras, and foureteene of the ſame miles aboue Amiens. On the twentith of October, the duke cauſed his ordinance to be brought afore it by foure of the clocke in the morning, the which was ſo well applied in making batterie to the walles of the towne, that by nine of the clocke the towne was made aſſaultable; and then the Engliſhmen, Flemings & Burgognians made forward, and by the good comfort of the lord Sandes and other capteins, they got the diches, and after entred vpon the walles. The Frenchmen ſtood at defenſe with pikes, croſſebowes, handguns, and halbards, but they were too weake, for on all parts entred the Engliſhmen, and ſuddenlie the Frenchmen fled, and the Engliſhmen followed.

Braie won by aſſault.

On the further ſide of the towne there was a bulworke fortified with ordinanee verie ſtronglie to defend the paſſage ouer the water of Some, which is there diuided into diuerſe branches. The French horſſemen being withdrawne to the paſſage, defended it till the footmen were got ouer the bridge, and then they plucked awaie the plankes of the bridge, ſo that no man ſhould follow: but the Engliſhmen caſt plankes on the bridge and got ouer, in which paſſing diuerſe were drowned: but ſuch diligence and inforcement was vſed, that they all paſſed both horſmen and footmen. Then was the bulworke fiercelie aſſaulted, and finallie taken by the Engliſhmen, with all the ordinance. There was alſo taken capteine Adrian and capteine Vtterlieu. The Engliſh horſſemen followed the Frenchmen, and ſlue & tooke manie of them. Sir Robert Ierningham brake a ſpeare on the lord Pontdormie. The lord Leonard Greie did valiantlie that day, which was come from the caſtell of Bounegard, and was here at the winning of Braie, which was taken in maner aboue rehearſed the twentith of October.

A traine of gunpowder laid.

The Frenchmen when they perceiued that they ſhould not be able to defend, had laid a traine of gunpowder to ſet it on fire, in hope to haue deſtroied manie of the Engliſhmen as they ſhould be occupied in gathering the ſpoile; but by reaſon that they followed their enimies, and got ouer the paſſage, the fire tooke and ſet the towne on fire yer the Engliſhmen returned. Yet much wine was ſaued which laie in cellars, and ſtood the Engliſhmen in good ſteed. The one and twentith day of October the armie and all the ordinance paſſed ouer the riuer, and came to a towne called Rappe. All the inhabitants were fled, but they had left good plentie of wine & other riches behind them. The gariſon that laie at anchor knowing that the duke was paſſed the water of Some, raſed the towne and caſtell there called Bounegard, and came to the armie now being lodged at Rappe.

Rappe taken.

Roie yeelded to the duke of Suffolke.

The duke ſent to them of Roie, requiring to haue the towne deliuered to him, which they granted to doo, bicauſe they had no gariſon of ſouldiers within to defend the towne. Thither was ſent ſir Richard Cornewall, with foure hundred men, which receiued the towne and kept it in good quiet, till the duke came thither with his whole armie. On the fiue and twentith daie of October, the duke remooued to a village called Lihome where the ſouldiers had great pillage. The next daie they went to Dauenker, and the ſeuen and twentith daie they came before the towne of Montdedier, in the which were a thouſand footmen, and fiue hundred horſſemen vnder the gouernance of monſieur de Roch baron, purpoſing to defend the towne to the vttermoſt. But after that ſir William Skeuington had made batterie from foure of the clocke in the next morning till eight in the ſame forenoone, with ſuch force that the wals were ouerthrowne and made aſſaultable, they within yeelded the towne into the dukes hands, with condition they might go with bag and baggage.

Lihome taken.

Montdedier beſieged.

Montdedier yeelded.

The Frenchmen made ſuch haſt, and were ſo glad to be gone, that they left much houſhold ſtuffe behind them, and great plentie of wine. The Engliſhmen alſo would not ſuffer them to beare their ſtandards vnſpred, but rent the ſame in peeces: wherewith the lord Roch baron was highlie diſpleaſed, but he could not amend it. The duke remained in Montdedier till the laſt of October, and then remooued to Roie, where he reſted a while with all his armie. On Alhallowes daie, the duke of Suffolke in the chiefe church of Roie made knights, the lord Herbert, the lord Powes, Oliuer Manners, Arthur Poole, Richard Sandes, Robert Ierningham, Robert Saliſburie, Edmund Beningfield, Richard Corbet, Thomas Wentworth, William Storton, Walter Mantell, George Warram, Edward Seimor, that was after duke of Summerſet. The morow after the armie remooued to a place called Neele.

Knights made by the duke of Suffolke in France.

The ſouldiers being thus led from place to place, began to murmur among themſelues & to grudge, bicauſe of the winter ſeaſon, being nothing meet for their purpoſe to keepe the fields: it grieued them that the Burgognions being prouided of wagons, made ſhift to ſend the ſpoile and pillage home into their countrie being at hand, & they to want ſuch meanes to make the beſt of thoſe things which they got, ſo that (as they tooke it) they beat the buſh & others had the birds. This grudge was yet by gentle words ceaſſed for a time. On the firſt daie of Nouember the whole armie came to a village called Veane, and there reſted for that night, and on the morow after they returned againe ouer the water of Some, and came to a place called Beauffort. At this paſſage the duke made Iohn Dudleie and Robert Vtreight knights.

Mutinie amongſt the Engliſh ſouldiers.

Iohn Dudleie and Robert Vtreight knighted.

On the eight of Nouember the duke remooued to a place called Mont ſaint Martine, and from thence was ſent the lord Sands to the king in poſt, to aduertiſe him in what caſe the armie ſtood, and the armie remooued to Permont, and there reſted for a time. The Welſhmen ſtill murmured that they might not returne home now that the winter was thus farre entered. But there were a ſort of men of warre, to the number of a thouſand perſons vnder the leading of ſir Iohn Wallop, which had little wages or none, liuing only on their aduentures, & were therefore called aduenturers, and of ſome they were called Kreekers, which had as good will to be ſtill abroad, as the Welſhmen had deſire to returne home. For theſe Kreekers by ſpoiling of townes, taking of priſoners, & other ſuch practiſes of warlike exploits, made their haunts, and dailie brought to the campe, horſſes, mares, vittels, cloth, corne, and other neceſſaries, which might not haue beene miſſed.

A bitter and nipping froſt.

After great raines and winds which had chanced in that ſeaſon, there followed a ſore froſt, which was ſo extreame, that manie died for cold, and ſome loſt fingers, ſome loſt toes, and manie loſt nailes beſide their fingers, ſo extreame was the rigour of that froſt. ¶The thirteenth daie of Nouember the duke remoued to a place within two miles of Boghan caſtell, and ſtill it froze. The Welſhmen in the morning ſet out a ſhout, and cried; Home, home. The Kreekers hearing that, cried; Hang, hang. Hereof buſineſſe was like to haue inſued, but by policie it was ceaſſed. Sir Edward Guilford capteine of the horſſemen viewing the caſtell of Boghan, perceiued that the mariſhes (wherewith it was inuironed) were ſo hard frozen, that great ordinance might paſſe ouer the ſame. Which he ſignified to the duke, & therewith the duke was contented that he ſhould trie what ſucceſſe would come of giuing the attempt to win it. So was the ordinance brought ouer the mariſh ground, whereof they within being aduertiſed, immediatlie after three ſhots of canon diſcharged againſt them, they yeelded the caſtell, and all the artillerie within it, of the which there was good ſtore, as three ſcore & ſixteene peeces great and ſmall. The keeping of this caſtell was deliuered to the ſeneſcall of Henegow.

Boghan caſtell aſſaulted and yeelded.

In this meane while the lord Sands was come to the court, and informed the king of the ſtate of the armie. The king had before his comming heard that his people in the ſaid armie were in great miſerie, both by reaſon of the intemperat weather, & vnſeaſonable time of the yeare, the lacke of vittels, & ſuch other diſcommodities: wherefore he cauſed a new power of ſix thouſand men to be prepared and ſent vnto the duke of Suffolke for a releefe, vnder the leading of the lord Montioie. But yer this power could be put in order to paſſe the ſea, and before the duke could haue knowledge againe from the king of his further pleaſure, he was conſtreined to breake vp his armie, and returned by Valencennes, and ſo through Flanders vnto Calis. He left at Valencennes all the great artillerie. The king was ſomewhat diſpleaſed with the breaking vp of the armie thus contrarie to his mind, but hearing the reſonable excuſes which the duke & the capteins had to alleage, he was ſhortlie after pacified. And ſo after they had remained in Calis a certeine time, vntill their freends had aſſwaged the kings diſpleaſure, they returned, and all things were well taken, and they receiued into as much fauour as before.

The duke of Suffolke breaketh vp his armie and commeth to Calis.

But now to returne to the dooings in other parts, as betwixt the Engliſhmen and Scots, which chanced in this meane while that the duke of Suffolke was thus in France. Ye ſhall vnderſtand, that the Scots hearing that the warre was thus turned into France, thought that nothing ſhould be attempted againſt them, and therefore waxed more bold, and began to rob and ſpoile on the marches of England. Wherefore the king ſent againe thither the earle of Surrie treaſuror and high admerall of England, the which with all ſpeed comming to the weſt borders, ſent for an armie of ſix thouſand men, with the which entering Scotland by the drie mariſhes, he ouerthrew certeine caſtels, piles, and ſmall holds, till he came through the dales to Iedworth, wherein laie a great garriſon of Scots, which ſkirmiſhed with the Engliſhmen right ſharpelie at their firſt comming, but yet at length the towne, abbeie, and caſtell were wonne, ſpoiled, and burned.

The Scots ſpoile the Engliſh marches.

The earle of Surrie inuadeth Scotland.

Iedworth burnt.

After this the earle incamped within the Scotiſh ground from the two and twentith of September till the fiue and twentith of the ſame moneth, & then returned backe againe into England. During which time the lord Dacres wan the caſtell of Ferniherſt. The French king perceiuing that the Scots did not worke anie notable trouble to the Engliſhmen to ſtaie them from the inuading of France (& the cauſe was (as he tooke it) for that they lacked the duke of Albanie, whome they named their gouernour) he therefore prouided a nauie of ſhips to haue tranſported him ouer into Scotland; ſo that all things were redie for his iournie. But the Engliſhmen were redie on the ſea vnder the conduct of ſir William Fitz Williams to ſtop his paſſage if he had ſet forward, wherefore he cauſed his ſhips to be brought into Breſt hauen, and bruted it abroad, that he would not go into Scotland that yeare.

The caſtell of Ferniherſt woon by the lord Dacres.

The king of England being certified that the duke meant not to depart out of France of all that yeare, about the middeſt of September, commanded that his ſhips ſhould be laid vp in hauens till the next ſpring. The duke of Albanie being thereof aduertiſed, boldie then tooke his ſhips, and ſailed into Scotland with all conuenient ſpeed, as in the Scotiſh hiſtorie ye maie read more at large. Shortlie after his arriuall there, he wrought ſo with the Scots, that an armie was leauied, with the which he approched to the borders of England, & lodged at Cawdeſtreame, readie to enter into England. The king of England hauing aduertiſement giuen to him from time to time of the proceedings of his aduerſaries, with all diligence cauſed to be aſſembled the people of the North parts beyond Trent, in ſuch numbers that there were three thouſand gentlemen bearing coats of armes with their powers and ſtrength, which were all commanded to repaire to the erle of Surrie with ſpeed. The noble marqueſſe Dorſet was appointed with ſix thouſand men to keepe Berwike, leaſt the Scots ſhould laie ſiege thereto.

See the hiſtorie of Scotland, pag. 309. & ſic deinceps.

Berwike cheeflie regarded.

The duke of Albanie hearing of the preparation which the earle of Surrie made againſt him, ſent to him an herald, promiſing him of his honour to giue him battell; and if he tooke him priſoner, he would put him to courteous ranſome, & his bodie to be ſafe. To whome the earle anſwered, that much he thanked the duke of his offer, promiſing him to abide battell if he durſt giue it; & that if the ſaid duke chanced to be taken by him or his, he would ſtrike off his head, and ſend it for a preſent to his maiſter the king of England, and bade him that he ſhould truſt to none other. At this anſwer the duke and the Scots tooke great deſpite. The earle of Surrie being at Alnewicke, there came to him the earles of Northumberland and Weſtmerland, the lords Clifford, Dacres, Lumleie, Ogle, & Darcie, with manie knights, eſquiers, gentlemen, and other ſouldiers and men of warre, to the number of fortie thouſand. And from the court there came the maiſter of the horſſe, ſir Nicholas Carew, ſir Francis Brian, ſir Edward Bainton, and others.

The laſt of October being ſaturdaie, in the night before the ſame daie, the duke of Albanie ſent two or three thouſand men ouer the water to beſiege the caſtell of Warke, which comming thither with their great ordinance, beat the caſtell verie ſore, and wan the vttermoſt ward called the Barnekins. On ſundaie and mondaie being the firſt and ſecond of Nouember, they continued their batterie, and then thinking that the place was aſſaultable, couragiouſlie ſet on the caſtell, and by ſtrength entered the ſecond ward. falſe brales, and that nothing remained but onelie the inner ward or dungeon, incouraged his men to the beſt of his power, with words of great comfort and manhood, and therewith iſſued forth with thoſe few that he had left about him (for he had loſt manie at other aſſaults) and what with couragious ſhooting, and manfull fighting, the enimies were driuen out of the place, and of them were ſlaine, and namelie of thoſe Frenchmen which the duke had brought forth of France, to the number of thrée hundred, which laie there dead in fight when the earle of Surrie came thither, beſides ſuch as died of wounds, and were drowned.

The Scots & French driuen backe from warke caſtell.

Then the Scots and Frenchmen remoued their ordinance ouer the water in all haſt, and by that time that they were got ouer, the earle of Surrie was come with fiue thouſand horſſemen, and all his great armie followed. He was ſorie that his enimies were gone, and much praiſed ſir William Liſle for his valiancie. The earle would gladlie haue followed his enimies into their owne borders, but his commiſſion was onelie to defend the realme, and not to inuade Scotland; and therefore he ſtaid, not onelie vnto the great diſpleaſure of himſelfe, but alſo of manie a luſtie gentleman, that would gladlie haue ſéene further proofe of the Scotiſh mens manhood. Shortlie after, the quéene of Scots, mother to the king, ſent to hir brother the king of England, for an abſtinence of warre, vntill further communication might be had about the concluſion of ſome good agréement betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, which requeſt to hir was granted; and ſo the Engliſh armie brake vp, and the earle of Surrie returned to the court.

Edw. Hall in H.8. fol. Cxvj.
A preſent ſent by the emperour to the king.

¶ In this ſeaſon the emperour Charles ſent to the king of England two mules trapped in crimſin veluet curiouſlie embrodered, all the buckles, ſtirrops and all ſuch other garniſhings were ſiluer and gilt of maruellous cunning worke. He ſent alſo eleuen genets full goodlie to behold trapped with ruſſet veluet richlie wrought, and foure ſpeares, and two iauelins of ſtrange timber & worke richlie garniſhed, and fiue brace of greihounds: and to the quéene he ſent two mules with rich trappers, and high chaires after the Spaniſh faſhion. All theſe preſents were thankefullie receiued both of the king and quéene.]

Whileſt the earle of Surrie was in the marches of Scotland, and the duke of Suffolke in France (as before ye haue heard) the cardinall ſent out commiſſions in the moneth of October, that euerie man being worth fortie pounds, ſhould paie the whole ſubſidie before granted, out of hand, not tarrieng till the daies of paiment limited. This was called an anticipation, that is to meane, a thing taken before the time appointed, and was a new tearme not knowne before thoſe daies: but they paied ſwéetelie for their learning. ¶ In December were taken certeine traitors in Couentrie, one called Francis Philip, ſchoolemaiſter to the kings henchmen, and one Chriſtopher Pickering clearke of the larder, and one Anthonie Mainuile gentleman, which by the perſuaſion of the ſaid Francis Philip, intended to haue taken the kings treaſure of his ſubſidie, as the collectors of the ſame came towards London, and then to haue raiſed men and taken the caſtell of Kilingworth, and to haue arreared warre againſt the king. The ſaid Francis, Chriſtopher, and Anthonie, were hanged, drawne, and quartered at Tiborne the eleuenth of Februarie, and the other were ſent to Couentrie, and there executed.

An anticipation.

The archduke of Auſtrich made knight of the garter.

In this yeare the king ſent the lord Morleie, ſir William Huſie knight, & doctor Lée his almoner to don Ferdinando the archduke of Auſtrich, with the order of the garter, which in the towne of Nuremberge receiued the ſame, where all the princes of Germanie were then aſſembled at a diet or councell. In this meane while, diuerſe enterpriſes and feats of warre were practiſed and atchiued by them of the garriſons in the marches of Calis, and the Frenchmen of Bullogne, and the borders thereabouts: but the Frenchmen commonlie were put to the worſe. Amongeſt other exploits, it chanced that one Brereton a gentleman, and capteine of a number of the aduenturers, as he went about to ſpoile the towne of Waſt, was taken by the French horſemen, and ſold vnto the pezants of the countrie, the which vnmercifullie ſlue him and ſixtéene more that were taken with him, after that the men of warre had deliuered them, and were departed. But this murther was reuenged ſhortlie by other of the aduenturers, which comming vnto the ſame towne of Waſt, tooke thirtie eight priſoners of the inhabitants, & ſlue of them thirtie & ſix, & burned the towne.

Bolton prior of S. Bartholomewes buildeth a houſe at Harow on the hill to auoid floods prognoſticated that yeare.

In this yeare thorough books of ephemerides, and prognoſtications, foreſhewing much hurt to come by waters & floods, many perſons vittelled themſelues and went to high grounds for feare of drowning: ſpeciallie one Bolton prior of ſaint Bartholomewes in Smithfield, builded him an houſe vpon Harow on the hill, onelie for feare of this floud, and thither he went and made prouiſion of all things neceſſarie for the ſpace of two moneths. This great raine and waters ſhould haue fallen in Februarie, but no ſuch thing happened, whereby the follie of men was ſhewed. The aſtronomers for their excuſe did ſaie, that in their computation they had miſcounted in their number an hundred yeares. A legat was ſent from the pope to the king to mooue him to peace: but the king declared to him the whole circumſtance of his title, for the which he made wars againſt the Frenchmen, and thereof deliuered notes to the ſaid legat, the which departed with the ſame backe to Rome in poſt. He had béene firſt with the French king, and with the emperour, but could not bring them to anie good conformitie, as his deſire was to haue doone; ſo that his trauell was without frute in maner, as it appeared.

Anno Reg. 16.
A legat from Rome to treat a peace betwéene king Henrie and the French king.

Manie enterpriſes, ſkirmiſhes, forreis, and other feats of warre were attempted and put in vre betwixt the Engliſhmen of Calis, Guiſnes, and other fortreſſes there in thoſe marches, and the Frenchmen of Bullogne, and other of the garriſons in the frontiers of Picardie, and ſtill ſir William Fitz Williams as then capteine of Guiſnes, ſir Robert Jerningham capteine of Newnam bridge, ſir John Wallop, and ſir John Gage were thoſe that did to the Frenchmen moſt damage. Alſo monſieur de Bées being capteine of Bullogne, did for his part what he could to defend the frontiers there, and to annoie his enimies. Yet one daie in Maie, ſir William Fitz Williams, and ſir Robert Jerningham, with ſeuen hundred men (accounting in that number the Kréekers) went to Bullogne, and there ſkirmiſhed with the Frenchmen, whileſt Chriſtopher Coo a capteine of foure Engliſh ſhips tooke land, and fought with them of baſe Bullogne on the one ſide, as the Kréekers aſſailed them on an other.

Chriſtopher Coo.

There was a ſharpe bickering, and in the end the Frenchmen were driuen backe, and diuerſe of them ſlaine & taken, ſpeciallie by the Kréekers, that wan the barriers of them, & ſo when the tide was turned, Chriſtopher Coo with his men withdrew to his ſhips, & the Kréekers returned to ſir William Fitz Williams, who ſtaid for them, and then gathering his men togither by ſound of a trumpet, ſent forth ſuch as might fetch the drifts of beaſts and cattell in the countrie néere adioining, & with the ſame returned backe in ſafetie. On the eight of Auguſt monſieur de Bées accompanied with diuerſe French lords and men of war, to the number of eight hundred footmen, and as manie horſſemen, came verie earlie in a morning to a village called Bonnings, within the Engliſh pale, and leauing there thrée hundred horſſemen in ambuſh, road to Kalkewell, and there appointed to tarrie with other thrée hundred men, and the reſidue of the horſſemen and footmen with banner diſplaied went forth and forraied all the countrie.

Sir Robert Ierningham alſo with foure ſcore horſſemen iſſued forth of Calis, to vnderſtand the demeanor of the Frenchmen: but being not able to reſiſt the great number of the Frenchmen, he was chaſed, and ſaued himſelfe by flight. But this diſpleaſure was ſhortlie after reuenged by the ſaid Robert, the which comming to Marguiſon the twelfe of Auguſt with thrée hundred footmen, and thrée ſcore horſſemen, he ſkirmiſhed with the Frenchmen that ſtood at defenſe, chaſed them into the church, and fired them out of the ſame, ſo that the Frenchmen leapt out of the church to their deſtruction, for of thrée hundred there were ſaued but thrée ſcore aliue. On the one and twentith of Maie being Trinitie ſundaie, fiue hundred Scotiſhmen in the morning verie earlie, entred by ſeuerall fords into England, and laie couertlie by the high waies, in purpoſe to haue ſurpriſed ſuch market men as came to the faire that day kept at Berwike. They tooke diuerſe, but finallie being eſpied, the alarme roſe, and they were fought with right ſharplie, who defended themſelues with ſuch manhood in drawing backe to their aduantage, that if the yoong lord of Fulberie had not come to the ſuccours of the Engliſhmen, the Scots had gone awaie with their bootie. Notwithſtanding in the end they were glad to ſéeke refuge by flight, looſing 200 of their number, which were taken in the chaſe.

The Scots enter England and rob the market folks going to Berwike faire.

On the ſixt of Iulie next inſuing, ſir Iohn a Fenwike, Leonard Muſgraue, and baſtard Heron, with diuerſe other Engliſh capteins, hauing with them nine hundred men of war, entred the Mers, minding to fetch out of the ſame ſome bootie, and encountring with the Scots being in number two thouſand, after ſore and long fight, cauſed them to leaue their ground and to flie, ſo that in the chaſe were taken two hundred Scots, and manie ſlaine, & amongſt them were diuerſe gentlemen. But ſir Raſe a Fenwike, Leonard Muſgraue, and the baſtard Heron, with thirtie other Engliſhmen well horſſed, followed ſo farre in the chaſe, that they were paſt reſcues of their companie, whereof the Scots being aduiſed, ſuddenlie returned, and ſet on the Engliſhmen, which oppreſſed with the multitude of their enimies, were ſoone ouercome, and there was taken ſir Raſe a Fenwike, Leonard Muſgraue, and ſix other: and baſtard Heron, with ſeauen other were ſlaine. The reſidue by chance eſcaped. The other Engliſhmen with their 200 priſoners returned ſafelie into England.

The Scots put to flight and ſlaine.

On the ſeuenth of Iulie, the Engliſhmen fought with like fortune againſt the Scots that were entered England at the weſt marches. For in the beginning they put the Scots to the worſe, and tooke thrée hundred of them priſoners: but afterwards, bicauſe the Engliſhmen that had taken thoſe priſoners, withdrew out of the field with the ſame priſoners, the Scots perceiuing the number of the Engliſhmen to be diminiſhed, gaue a new onſet on the Engliſhmen, and them diſtreſſed. After this, the Scots ſued for a truce, and had it granted to indure till the feaſt of ſaint Andrew. This yeare the firſt of September was doctor Thomas Haniball maiſter of the rolles receiued into London with earles, and biſhops, and diuerſe other nobles and gentlemen, as ambaſſadors from pope Clement, which brought with him a roſe of gold for a token to the king. And on the daie of the natiuitie of our ladie, after a ſolemne maſſe ſong by the cardinall of Yorke, the ſaid preſent was deliuered to the king: which was a trée forged of fine gold, & wrought with branches, leaues, and floures reſembling roſes. This trée was ſet in a pot of gold which had thrée féet of antike faſhion. The pot was of meaſure halfe a pint, in the vppermoſt roſe was a faire ſaphire loupe perſed, the bigneſſe of an acorne, the trée was of heigth halfe an Engliſh yard, and a foot in bredth.

The popes ambaſſadour preſenteth the king with a golden roſe.

This yeare in Iulie the lord Archembald Douglas earle of Angus, which had maried the quéene of Scots ſiſter to the king of England, eſcaped out of France (where he had remained for a ſeaſon, in maner as a baniſhed man) and came into England to the king, as then being at Gréenewich, and was of him courteouſlie receiued. Sir Anthonie Fitz Herbert one of the Iuſtices of the common plées, ſir Raſe Egerton knight, and doctor Denton deane of Lichfield, being ſent in the begining of this yeare into Ireland as commiſſioners, behaued themſelnes ſo ſagelie, that they reformed diuers wrongs, brought ſundrie of the wild Iriſh by faire means vnto obedience, and made (by the kings authoritie) the earle of Kildare deputie of the land; before whome the great Onele bare the ſword. And the lord Piers Butler earle of Ormond, which before was deputie, was now made high treaſurer of Ireland. In September the ſaid commiſſioners returned.

Commiſſioners ſent into Ireland to reforme the countrie.

The earle of Kildare made deputie of Ireland.

During all this ſeaſon, there were dailie attempts made and practiſed by the Engliſhmen in the lowe countries, namelie the Engliſh horſſemen; & the aduenturers reſted not, but dailie made inuaſions vpon the French confines. But the aduenturers about the beginning of winter made an enterpriſe to fetch ſome bootie from a village lieng towards Mutrell. They were not fullie two hundred men, and of thoſe there were fiue and twentie horſſemen. The Frenchmen by chance the ſame time were abroad vnder the conduct of the earle of Dammartine, which was going to S. Omers with fiftéene hundred horſſemen, and eight hundred footmen, and perceiuing where the aduenturers were comming, made towards them, and after long & cruell fight ouercame them, and ſlue moſt part of them, for that in defending themſelues moſt ſtoutlie, they had ſlaine and wounded a great number of the Frenchmen yer they could be ouercome, kéeping themſelues cloſe togither, and might not be broken ſo long as they had anie arrowes to ſhoot. This was the end of the aduenturers otherwiſe called Kréekers, being as hardie men as euer ſerued prince.

The end of the Kréekers.

In December there came to London diuerſe ambaſſadors out of Scotland, about a peace to be had, and a marriage concluded betwéene the king of Scots, and the ladie Marie daughter to the king of England, as in the Scotiſh hiſtorie yée ſhall find more at large expreſſed. Before the feaſt of Chriſtmaſſe, the lord Leonard Graie, and the lord Iohn Graie, brethren to the marqueſſe Dorſet, ſir George Cobham, ſonne to the lord Cobham, William Carie, ſir Iohn Dudleie, Thomas Wiat, Francis Pointz, Francis Sidneie, ſir Anthonie Browne, ſir Edward Seimor, Oliuer Manners, Perciuall Hart, Sebaſtian Nudigate, and Thomas Calen, eſquiers of the kings houſhold, enterpriſed a chalenge of feats of armes againſt the feaſt of Chriſtmas, which was proclaimed by Winſore the herald, and performed at the time appointed after the beſt maner, both at tilt, tourneie, barriers, and aſſault of a caſtell erected for that purpoſe in the tiltyard at Gréenewich, where the king held a roiall Chriſtmaſſe that yeare, with great mirth and princelie paſtime.

power Legantine, would haue viſited the friers obſeruants, but they in no wiſe would thereto condeſcend, wherefore nineteene of the ſame religion were accurſſed at Paules croſſe, by one of their owne religion, called frier Forreſt. Iohn Iokin Steward of houſhold to the French kings mother, this yeere whileſt the French king was in Italie, came into England, & was receiued in ſecret maner into the houſe of one doctor Larke, a prebendarie of S. Stephans, and oftentimes talked with the cardinall about the affaires betwixt the kings of England and France, motioning waies for a peace to be concluded. When this was knowne abroad, as at the length it was, monſieur de Prate the emperours ambaſſador miſliked ſuch couert dooings, and ſore grudged thereat. The foure and twentith of Ianuarie, the preſident of Rone called monſieur Brinion, came to London as ambaſſador from the French king, and was lodged with the ſaid Iohn Iokin.

Ambaſſadors from the emperour and their requeſts.

On ſundaie the fift of March were receiued into London monſieur de Beuer lord of Campher, admerall of Flanders, and maiſter Iohn de la Coſe, preſident of Malins, & maiſter Iohn de la Gache, as ambaſſadours from the ladie Margaret in the name of the emperour. Theſe ambaſſadors required three things in their ſuit. Firſt they demanded the ladie Marie the kings onelie daughter to be deliuered out of hand, and ſhe to be named empreſſe, and to take poſſeſſion of all the lowe countries, and to be gouernour of the ſame. Alſo that all ſuch ſums of monie as the king ſhould giue with hir in mariage for a dower to be made to hir, ſhould be paid incontinentlie. Thirdlie, that the king of England himſelfe ſhould paſſe the ſea, and make warre in France the next ſummer. The two firſt demands were not agreed to for certeine cauſes, and as to this laſt, the king ſaid he would take aduiſement.

Newes of the ſiege of Pauia & the taking of the French king priſoner.

On thurſdaie the ninth of March, at ſeauen of the clocke in the morning, there came a gentleman in poſt from the ladie Margaret gouerneſſe of Flanders, which brought letters conteining how that the foure and twentith of Februarie, the ſiege of Pauia (where the French king had lien long) was raiſed by force of battell, and the French king himſelfe taken priſoner. The ſame day the preſident of Rone, & Iohn Iokin were going to the court (for they had not yet ſpoken with the king) and in Holburne in their waie heard theſe tidings, wherupon they returned to their lodging right ſorowfull, and within ſhort ſpace after returned to the regent of France. It was thought the king would haue agreed with the French king, if this chance had not hapned, for all the people of England grudged againſt Flanders, for the euill demeanour of the Flemings in time of the warre. Alſo the king was diſpleaſed with them for inhancing his coine there, which cauſed much monie to be conueied out of this realme dailie ouer into that countrie. Bounfires and great triumph was made in London for the taking of the French king, on ſaturdaie the eleuenth of March; and on the morow after being ſundaie the twelfe of March, the king came to Paules, and there heard a ſolemne maſſe, and after the ſame was ended, the queere ſong te Deum, and the minſtrels plaid on euerie ſide.

Abr.Fl. ex Guic.pag. 902, & ſic deinceps.

The battell of Pauia, wherein the French king is taken priſoner.

¶ Here it is conuenient to adde the battell of Pauia, wherein the French king was taken priſoner, moſt notablie diſcourſed by Guicciardine, in the fifteenth booke of his hiſtorie: the principall matter wherof, to make the report of Pauia and the French king more perſpicuous, it were good to inſerre. On the night (ſaith mine author) before the fiue and twentith of Februarie, a daie dedicated by the chriſtians to the apoſtle ſaint Matthew, and alſo the daie of the natiuitie of the emperour, the imperialles determined to march to Mirabell, where laie incamped certeine companies of horſſemen and footmen. In this march they ſtood vpon this intention, that if the French men mooued, then they had ſet at libertie the ſiege of Pauia: and if they mooued not, then to aduenture the fortune of the battell. Therefore the better to aduance this determination, all the beginning of the night they gaue manie alarmes, the more to keepe trauelled and wearie the French men, making ſemblance as though they would charge them on that ſide towards Paw, Theſin, and ſaint Lazarus.

About midnight euerie ſouldior, by the commandement of the capteins, put on a white caſſakin ouer his armor, to be knowne from the Frenchmen. They were caſt into two ſquadrons of horſſemen, & foure of footmen. In the firſt were ſix thouſand footmen equallie compounded of lanceknights, Spaniards, and Italians: this ſquadron was led by the marqueſſe of Guaſt: the ſecond ſtood onelie vpon certeine bands of Spaniſh footmen vnder the charge of the marqueſſe of Piſquairo: the third and fourth ſquadron were of lanceknights, commanded by the viceroy and the duke of Burbon. They arriued at the parke walles certeine houres before daie, and by the working of their maſons, and readie willes of their ſouldiers, they caſt downe to the earth three ſcore fadome of wall: by which breach, being entred within the parke, the firſt ſquadron drew towards Mirabell, and the reſidue of the armie tooke the waie to the campe.

Whie the French king deſired to fight in plaine and open field.

As ſoone as the king vnderſtood that they were entred into the parke, thinking they would draw to Mirabell, he iſſued out of his lodging to fight in plaine and open field, deſiring to draw the battell rather to that place than to anie other, for the aduantages which it gaue to the horſſemen: he commanded to turne the artilleries toward the enimies, which beating them in flanke, brought great damage to the reregard. But in the meane while, the battell of the imperialles gaue a furious charge vpon the kings ſquadron, which ordinarilie was the battell: but as the Spaniards went, it was the reregard. The king fought valiantlie, & abode with great courage the violence of his enimies, who with the furie of their harquebuziers forced his men to giue ground, till the reſcue of the Switzers came, when the Spaniards were repelled, as well by them as by the horſſemen that charged them in flanke. But the viceroy being called in by the marqueſſe of Piſquairo, who broght to the fight his lanceknights, they were eaſilie broken, not without great ſlaughter of the Switzers, who that daie did nothing anſwer the opinion of valor which aforetimes they had wont ſo honorablie to expreſſe in battelles.

The maner how the French king was vanquiſhed and taken priſoner.

The king kept alwaies the middle of the battell, being inuironed with a great gard of men at armes. And albeit he did what he could to conteine and confirme his people: yet after he had fought long with his owne hands, his horſſe being ſlaine vnder him, him ſelfe lightlie hurt in the face and in the hand, he was ſtricken downe to the earth, and taken priſoner by fiue ſouldiers that knew not what he was. In which miſfortune the viceroy preſſing into the throng his maieſtie diſcloſed him ſelfe to him, who with great reuerence kiſſed his hand, and receiued him priſoner in the emperours name. At the ſame time the marqueſſe of Guaſt with the firſt ſquadron had defeated the horſſemen that were at Mirabell. And Anthonie de Leua, who (as was ſaid) had to that end caſt downe to the earth ſo great a quantitie and ſpace of wall, as an hundred and fiftie horſſemen might ſallie forth in front, iſſued out of Pauia, & ſo charged the French behind, that he put them wholie to flight. And in that feare they were almoſt all ſtripped and truſſed, except the reregard of the horſemen, which being led by monſieur de Alanſon from the beginning of the battell, retired almoſt whole.

The number of the French that were ſlaine in this battell.

It is holden for certeine, that in this battell were ſlaine more than eight thouſand men of the French campe, part by ſword, and part of bodies drowned in the riuer of Theſin, ſéeking their ſafetie by ſwimming. Of this generall number were about twentie of the moſt noble and apparant lords of France, as the admerall, the lord Iames Chebanes, the lord Paliſſa, and Trimouille, the maſter of the horſſe, monſieur de Aubignie, monſieur de Boiſſie, and monſieur de la Eſcud, who being taken gréeuouſlie wounded by his enimies, gaue to them his life in ſtéed of a ranſome. The priſoners that were taken were the king of Nauarre, the baſtard of Sauoie, the lord Montmerancie, Saint Paule, Brion, Auall, monſieur de Chandion, monſieur de Imbercourt, Galeas Viſconte, Frederike Boſſolo, Barnabie Viſconte, Guidanes, with manie gentlemen, and almoſt all the capteins that eſcaped the ſlaughter of the ſword. There was alſo taken priſoner Ierome Leandro biſhop of Brunduſo the popes nuntio; but by commandement of the viceroy, he was eftſoones ſet at libertie: as alſo monſieur Saint Paule and Frederike Boſſolo committed to the caſtell of Pauia, brake priſon a little after, by the corruption of the Spaniards that had them in charge. Of the imperialles ſide the vniuerſall ſlaughter excéeded not ſeauen hundred bodies; and not one capteine of name except Ferrand Caſtriot marqueſſe of Angeo, the marqueſſe of Piſquairo was wounded in two places, & Anthonie de Leua lightlie hurt in the leg. The preie and ſpoile of this battell was ſo great, as there had not béene ſéene in Italie more rich ſouldiors.

The number of the ſlaine on the imperialles ſide.

Of ſo great an armie there was preſerned but the reregard of foure hundred lances, commanded by monſieur de Alanſon, they neuer came to the fight, neuer ſuffered charge, nor neuer were followed, but leauing behind them their baggage, they retired whole to Piemont, their feare making them more haſtie to flie, than carefull of their honor. And as one calamitie followeth another, ſo the loſſe of the battell was no ſooner reapported at Millaine, than Theodor Triuulce, who laie there in garriſon with foure hundred lances, departed and tooke his waie to Muſocquo, all the ſouldiors folowing him by troops: inſomuch as the ſame daie that the king loſt the battell, all the dutchie of Millaine was made frée from the iuriſdiction of the French. The daie after the victorie, the king was led priſoner to the rocke of Piſqueton, for that the duke of Millaine, in regard of his proper ſuretie, conſented hardlie that the perſon of the king ſhould be kept within the caſtell of Millaine: he was garded with great gelouſie and watch; but in all other things (except his libertie) he was vſed and honored as apperteined to the ſtate and maieſtie of a king.

The French king led priſoner to the rocke of Piſqueton.

Guic. pag. 904.

Now (ſaith mine author, ſpeaking to the readers of his hiſtorie) you haue ſéene ſet downe the ouerthrow of the French armie in the battell of Pauia: a wretched ſucceſſe, where was ſo great expectation of victorie. You haue ſéene a mightie king deliuered vp priſoner into the hands of him, with whom he contended for glorie and emperie: a ſpectacle moſt tragicall amongſt all the calamities that fortune bringeth vpon mans mortalitie. You haue ſéene the moſt part of the nobilitie, and honorable capteins of France, ſlaine in the ſeruice and preſence of their king: a matter that made more lamentable his owne condition and aduerſitie. You haue ſéene the reſidue of that armie, ſo vniuerſallie perplexed with feare and confuſion, that the ſame thing that ſhould haue reteined them in ſo great affliction, made them the leſſe aſſured, and further off from confidence.

Guic. pag. 915. The moderation and temperance of the emperour vpon the newes of the victorie.

When word came to the emperour of all the former accidents, the eies of euerie man were ſet to behold with what propertie of affection he would receiue his gladſome news, and to what ends his thoughts were diſpoſed: who ſo farre as exterior demonſtrations made ſhew, expreſſed great tokens of a mind much moderated, and verie apt to reſiſt eaſilie the proſperitie of fortune: yea the ſignes and inclinations appéering ſo much the more incredible, by how much he was a prince mightie & yong, and as yet had neuer taſted but of felicitie. For after he was informed truelie of ſo great a victorie, whereof he had the reapport the tenth of March, togither with letters of the French kings owne hand, written rather in the ſpirit and condition of a priſoner, than with the courage of a king, he went forthwith to the church to make his holie oblations to God with manie ſolemnities. And the morning folowing he receiued with ſignes of right great deuotion the ſacrament of the euchariſt, and ſo went in proceſſion to our ladies church out of Madrill, where was his court at that time.

His temperance and moderation was aboue the expectation of his eſtate, and farre contrarie to the courſe of the time in matters of that nature: for he would not ſuffer anie bels to be roong, nor bounfires to be made, nor anie other manner of publike demonſtrations, ſuch as are vſed for glorie or gladneſſe, alledging with a mind more vertuous than inſolent, that ſuch propertie of feaſting and reioiſing was due to victories obteined againſt infidels, but ought to haue no ſhew where one chriſtian ouercame another. Neither were the actions and geſtures of his perſon and ſpeaches differing from ſo great a temperance and continencie of mind, which he well expreſſed in the anſwers he made to the congratulations of the ambaſſadours and great men that were about him: to whome he ſaid he was not glad of the accident according to the glorious operation of fleſh and bloud, but his reioiſing was in that God had ſo manfeſtlie aided him: which he interpreted to be an aſſured ſigne that he ſtood in his grace and fauour, though not through his owne merit, yet by his celeſtiall election. The French king being in the cuſtodie of the viceroy of Naples (who much comforted him, and praiſed his valiantneſſe, and praied him to be content, for he ſhoud haue a gentle end) deſired to write to his mother, which was to him granted. His verie words were theſe.

A moſt excellent conceipt and ſaieng of the emperour.

The French kings letter to his mother the regent of France.

This he wrote being the emperors priſoner.

TO aduertiſe you of my infortunat chance: nothing is left but the honour and the life that is ſaued. And ſéeing ſome other news ſhall recomfort you, I haue deſired to write to you this letter, the which liberallie hath béene granted to me: beſéeching you to regard the extremitie of your ſelfe, in inſuing your accuſtomed wiſedome. For I hope that at length God will not forget me, to you recommending your little infants and mine, ſupplieng you to giue ſafe conduct, to paſſe and returne from Spaine, to this bearer that goeth toward the emperor, to know in what wiſe I ſhall be intreated. And thus right humbly to your good grace I haue me recommended. This ſubſcri-bed by your humble and obedient ſonne Francis.

Guic.pag. 625. The manifold paſſions or perplexities of the people in generall.

In this eſtate of aduerſitie the people ſet before their eies all that feare and deſpaire could imagine: they doubted leaſt ſo great a calamitie were not the beginning of a further ruine & ſubuerſion: they ſaw their king priſoner, and with him either taken or ſlaine in the battell the chiefteins of the kingdome, which in the imagination of their ſorrowes they held a loſſe irreparable: they beheld their capteins diſcomfited, and their ſouldiers diſcouraged: a calamitie which ſtopped in them all hope to be readdreſſed or reaſſured: they ſaw the realme made naked of monie and treaſure, and inuironed with moſt mightie enimies: an affliction which moſt of all caried their thoughts into the laſt cogitation of deſperat ruine: for the king of England, notwithſtanding that he had holden manie parlees and treaties, and ſhewed in manie things a variation of mind, yet not manie daies before the battell, he had cut off all the negociations which he had interteined with the king, and had publiſhed that he would deſcend into France, if the things of Italie tooke anie good ſucceſſe.

So that the Frenchmen feared leaſt in ſo great an opportunitie, the emperour and he would not leuie warre againſt France, either for that there was no other head or gouernour than a woman, and the little children of the king, of whom the eldeſt had not yet run eight yeares accompliſhed: or elſe bicauſe the enimies had with them the duke of Burbon, for his owne particular a puiſſant prince, and for his authoritie in the realme of France verie popular and ſtrong in opinion, a mightie inſtrument to ſtirre vp moſt dangerous emotions. Beſides, the ladie regent, as well for the loue ſhe bare to the king, as for the dangers of the realme was not without hir paſſions both proper and particular: for being full of ambition, and moſt greedie of the gouernment, ſhee feared that if the kings deliuerie drew any long tract of time, or if anie new difficultie hapned in France, ſhe ſhould be conſtreined to yeeld vp the adminiſtration of the crowne to ſuch as ſhould be delegate and aſſigned by the voices of the kingdome. Neuertheleſſe amid ſo manie aſtoniſhments and confuſions, ſhe drew hir ſpirits to hir, and by hir example were recomforted the nobles that were of counſell with hir, who tooke ſpeedie order to man the frontiers of the realme, and with diligence to leuie a good prouiſion of monie.

The ladie regent hir ſelfe was partaker of theſe griefs and feares.

The ladie regent, in whoſe name all expeditions and diſpatches went out, wrote to the emperour letters full of humilitie and compaſſion, wherin ſhe forgat not by degrees vehement and inducing to ſolicit a negociation of accord: by vertue whereof, hauing a little after deliuered don Hugo de Moncado, ſhee ſent him to the emperour, to offer him that hir ſonne ſhould renounce and diſclaime from all rights of the kingdome of Naples, and the eſtate of Millan, with contentment to refer to the cenſure and arbitration of the law, the titles and rights of Burgundie, which if it apperteined to the emperour, he ſhould acknowledge it for the dowrie of his ſiſter: that he ſhould render to monſieur Burbon his eſtate togither with his mouables and goods which were of great valour, and alſo the fruits and reuenues which had beene leuied by the commiſſioners deputed out of the regall chamber: that he ſhould giue to him his ſiſter in mariage, and deliuer vp to him Prouence, if iudgement of the intereſt and right were made of his ſide.

The ladie regents offer to the emperor for the deliuerie of hir ſonne

And for the more facilitie and ſpeedie paſſage of this negociation, rather than for anie deſire ſhe had to nouriſh hir inclination to the warre, ſhe diſpatched immediatlie ambaſſadours into Italie, to recommend to the pope and the Venetians the ſafetie of hir ſonne. To whome ſhe offered, that if for their proper ſecuritie they would contract with hir, and raiſe armes againſt the emperour, ſhe would for hir particular aduance fiue hundred lances, togither with a great contribution of monie. But amid theſe trauels and aſtoniſhments, the principall deſire as well of hir, as of the whole realme of France, was, to appeaſe and aſſure the mind of the king of England, iudging trulie that if they could reduce him to amitie and reconcilement, the crowne of France ſhould remaine without quarrell or moleſtation. Where, if he on the one ſide, and the emperour on the other, ſhould riſe in one ioint force, hauing concurrent with them the perſon of the duke of Burbon, and manie other opportunities and occaſions, it could not be but all things would be full of difficulties and dangers.

The regent ſtandeth moſt in feare of the king of Englands diſpleaſure.

Of this the ladie regent began to diſcerne manie tokens and apparances of good hope: for notwithſtanding the king of England immediatlie after the firſt reaports of the victorie, had not onelie expreſſed great tokens of gladneſſe and reioiſing, but alſo publiſhed that he would in perſon paſſe into France: and withall had ſent ambaſſadours to the emperour to ſolicit and treat of the mouing of warre iointlie togither: yet proceeding in deed with more mildneſſe than was expected of ſo furious ſhewes and tokens, he diſpatched a meſſenger to the ladie regent, to ſend to him an expreſſe ambaſſadour: which accordinglie was accompliſhed, and that with fulneſſe of authoritie and commiſſion, ſuch as brought with it alſo all ſorts of ſubmiſſions & implorations which ſhe thought apt to reduce to appeaſement the mind of that king ſo highlie diſpleaſed. He repoſed himſelfe altogither vpon the will and counſell of the cardinall of Yorke, who ſeemed to reſtreine the king and his thoughts to this principall end, that bearing ſuch a hand vpon the controuerſies and quarrels that ran betweene other princes, all the world might acknowledge to depend vpon him and his authoritie the reſolution and expectation of all affaires.

Note how forren chroniclers could report of cardinall Wolſie.

And for this cauſe he offered to the emperour at the ſame time to deſcend into France with a puiſſant armie, both to giue perfection vnto the aliance concluded betweene them before; and alſo to remoue all ſcruple and gelouſie, he offered preſentlie to conſigne vnto him his daughter, who was not as yet in an age and diſpoſition able for mariage. But in theſe matters were very great difficulties, partlie depending vpon himſelfe, and partlie deriuing from the emperour, who now ſhewed nothing of that readineſſe to contract with him which he had vſed before: for the king of England demanded almoſt all the rewards of the victorie, as Normandie, Guien, and Gaſcoigne, with the title of king of France. And that the emperour, notwithſtanding the inequalitie of the conditions ſhould paſſe likewiſe into France, and communicate equallie in the expenſes and dangers. The inequalitie of theſe demands troubled not a little the emperour, to whome they were by ſo much the more grieuous, by how much he remembred that in the yeares next before, he had alwaies deferred to make warre euen in the greateſt dangers of the French king. So that he perſuaded himſelfe that he ſhould not be able to make anie foundation vpon that confederation.

And ſtanding in a ſtate no leſſe impoueriſhed for monie and treaſure, than made wearie with labours and perils, he hoped to draw more commodities from the French king by the meane of peace, than by the violence of armes and warres, ſpeciallie ioining with the king of England. Beſides, he made not that accompt which he was woont to doo of the mariage of his daughter, both for hir minoritie in age, age, and alſo for the dowrie for the which he ſhould ſtand accomptable for ſo much as the emperour had receiued by waie of loane of the king of England: he ſeemed by manie tokens in nature to nouriſh a wonderfull deſire to haue children, and by the neceſſitie of his condition he was caried with great couetouſneſſe of monie: vpon which two reaſons he tooke a great deſire to marie the ſiſter of the houſe of Portugall, which was both in an age able for mariage, and with whome he hoped to receiue a plentifull portion in gold and treaſure, beſides the liberalities of his owne people offered by waie of beneuolence in caſe the mariage went forward: ſuch was their deſire to haue a queene of the ſame nation and language, and of hope to procreat children.

The emperours hope to recouer more profit by the French king in peace than warres.

For theſe cauſes the negociation became euerie daie more hard and deſperat betweene both thoſe princes, wherein was alſo concurrent the ordinarie inclination of the cardinall of Yorke towards the French king, togither with the open complaints he made of the emperour, as well for the intereſts and reſpects of his king, as for the ſmall reputation the emperour began to hold of him. He conſidered that afore the battell of Pauia, the emperour neuer ſent letters vnto him which were not written with his owne hand, and ſubſcribed, your ſonne and coſine Charles: but after the battell, he vſed the ſeruice of ſecretaries in all the letters he wrote to him, inſerting nothing of his owne hand but the ſubſcription, not with titles of ſo great reuerence and ſubmiſſion, but onelie with this bare word Charles. In this alteration of affection in the emperour, the king of England tooke occaſion to receiue with gratious words and demonſtrations, the ambaſſadour ſent by the ladie regent, to whome he gaue comfort to hope well in things to come. And a little afterward, eſtranging his mind wholie from the affaires which were in negociation betweene him and the emperour, he made a confederation with the ladie regent, contracting in the name of hir ſonne, wherein he would haue inſerted this expreſſe condition, that for the kings ranſome and deliuerie, ſhould not be deliuered to the emperour anie thing that at that time ſhould be vnder the power or poſſeſſion of the crowne of France.

What mooued the king of England gratiouſlie to receiue the ladie regents ambaſſadour.

Guic. pag. 930. The perſon of the French king led priſoner into Spaine.

Shortlie after, the viceroy & the other capteins imperiall were induced vpon vrgent reaſons to tranſport the perſon of the French king into a ſurer hold, than where preſentlie he was kept, iudging that for the ill diſpoſition of others, they could not without perill keepe him garded in the duchie of Millan: in which feare ioined to their continuall deſire ſo to doo, they reſolued to conueie him to Genes, and from thenſe by ſea to Naples, where his lodging was prepared within the new caſtell. This determination brought no little greefe to the king, who from the beginning of his captiuitie, had vehementlie deſired to be carried into Spaine: perhaps he had opinion (meaſuring happilie an other man by his owne nature, or elſe running with the common errour of mortall men being eaſilie beguiled in things they deſire) that if once he were brought to the preſence of the emperour, he doubted not of ſome eaſie paſſage for his libertie, either through the emperours benignitie, or by the conditions he meant to offer. The viceroy was of the ſame deſire for the augmentation of his owne glorie.

Monſieur Montmerancie ſent to the ladie regent.

But being reteined for feare of the French armie by ſea, they diſpatched by common conſent monſieur Montmerancie to the ladie regent: who granted to him ſix light gallies of thoſe that laie in the port of Marſeilles vpon promiſe to haue them reſtored as ſoone as the king was arriued in Spaine. With theſe gallies, he returned to Portofino, where the kings perſon was alredie arriued, and ioining them to ſixteene gallies of the emperour, which was the nauie appointed at firſt to conduct him to Naples, he reduced them all into one fleet, and armed them all with footmen of the Spaniſh. The capteins imperials and the duke of Burbon were perſuaded, that the kings perſon ſhould be led to Naples: but of the contrarie, ſetting vp ſaile the ſeuenth of Iune, they tooke ſuch courſe, that the eight daie they arriued with a happie voiage at Roſa a hauen of Catalognia: their comming brought no ſmall ioy to the emperour, who vntill that daie had vnderſtood nothing at all of that reſolution.

The emperor commandeth that the French king ſhould be receiued with honour in all places where he ſhould paſſe.

Now as ſoone as he was made aſſured of the kings being there, he diſpatched commandements vnto all places where he ſhould paſſe, to receiue him with great honours: onelie till it ſhould be otherwiſe determined, he gaue order to keepe him in the caſtell of Sciatiua neere to Valence, a caſtell ancientlie vſed by the kings of Aragon for the garding of great perſonages, and wherein had beene kept priſoner for manie yeares the duke of Calabria. But the deliberation to keepe him in that place, ſeeming farre too rigorous to the viceroy, and nothing agreeable to the promiſes he had made to the king in Italie, he wonne ſo much of the emperour, that till he had taken an other counſell, the kings perſon might remaine neere Valence in a place apt for hunting and other delights of the field. There he left him lodged with ſufficient gard vnder the charge of capteine Alarcon, in whoſe cuſtodie he had alwaies remained ſince his vnfortunate daie.

From thence the viceroy, togither with Montmerancie, went to the emperour to make reapport of the ſtate of Italie, and the diſcourſe of things which till that daie had beene debated with the king, with whome he perſuaded the emperour with manie reaſons to draw to accord, for that he could not haue a faithfull amitie and coniunction with the Italians. The emperour after he had heard the viceroy and Montmerancie, determined to conueie the king into Caſtillo to the caſtell of Madrill, a place farre remooued from the ſea and the confines of France, where being honored with ceremonies & reuerences agreeable to ſo great a prince, he ſhould neuertheleſſe be kept vnder carefull and ſtrait gard, with libertie to take the aire abroad certeine times of the daie, mounted onelie vpon a mule. The emperour could neuer be brought to admit the king to his preſence, if firſt the accord were not either eſtabliſhed, or at leaſt in an aſſured hope of reſolution.

And to the end there might be interpoſed in the negociation a perſonage honorable, & almoſt equall with the king, Montmerancie was ſent in great diligence into France, to bring the ducheſſe of Alanſon the kings ſiſter and a widow, with fulneſſe of authoritie to debate and contract. And to the end this negociation of accord were not hindered by new difficulties, there was made a little afterwards a truce vntill the end of December, betweene the emperour and ſuch as adminiſtred the gouernment of France. Moreouer the emperour gaue order that one part of thoſe gallies which were come with the viceroy, ſhould returne into Italie to bring the duke of Burbon into Spaine, without whoſe preſence and priuitie he gaue out that he would make no conuention: and yet the gallies that for want of monie, and other impediments, were prepared but with ſlow diligence.

A truce for a time betweene the emperour and the gouernors of France.

The French king extremelie ſicke in the caſtell of Madrill. Guic. pag. 937.

[Whiles the caſe of the French king was in demand, but not yet determined, by means of ſundrie ouerthwarts that ouerthrew the foundation of euerie purpoſe tending to his deliuerance; it fortuned that the French king falling ſicke in the caſtell of Madrill, and hauing in vaine deſired the preſence of the emperour, was caried by his diſcontentment and melancholie into ſuch extremitie and danger of his life, that the phyſicians appointed for his cure, told the emperour that they ſtood deſperate of his recouerie, if himſelfe in perſon came not to comfort him with ſome hope of his deliuerie. The emperour obeieng more compaſſion than the reaſon of things, was not curious to condeſcend to performe ſo good an office, and as he prepared to viſit him accordinglie, his high chancellor ſeeking to turne him from the iorneie, told him with manie ſtrong reaſons, that he could not go to him in honour, but with intention to deliuer him preſentlie and without anie couenant: otherwiſe as it would be a humanitie not roiall but mercenarie, ſo it would diſcloſe a deſire to recouer him, not mooued of charitie, but puſhed on by his proper intereſt, as not to loſe by his death the occaſion of the profit hoped for by the victorie.

The emperor viſiteth the French king in durance.

This counſell aſſuredlie was graue and honourable touching the man that gaue it, and no leſſe worthie to be followed by ſo great a prince as the emperour: and yet being more caried by the reaſons of others, he tooke poſt to go to him. But for the danger of the king being almoſt at the extremitie, the viſitation was ſhort, and yet for the time accompanied with gratious words ful of hope that he would deliuer him immediatlie vpon his returning to health: in ſo much that whether it was by the comfort that he breathed into him (in the ſickneſſe of captiuitie the promiſe of libertie exceedeth all medicines) or by the benefit of his youth, which with the fauour of nature was ſtronger than the maladie, he began after this viſitation to reſume ſo good diſpoſition, that within few daies he was out of danger, notwithſtanding he could not recouer his former health but with verie ſlowe time.

The ladie Alanſon treateth with the emperour for the kings deliuerie.

And now neither the difficulties that were ſhewed on the emperours ſide, nor the hopes which were giuen by the Italians, nor anie other nature of impediments whatſoeuer, could ſtaie the voiage of the ladie Alanſon into Spaine. For that as nothing was more hard or heauie to the Frenchmen than to leaue off the practiſes and negociations of accord begun with thoſe that had power to reſtore their king: ſo nothing was more eaſie to the emperour, than feeding the French with hopes, to draw their minds from taking armes; and by that meane ſo to keepe the Italians in ſuſpenſe, as not to dare to enter into new deliberations. And in that cunning maner, ſometimes vſing delaies, and ſometimes preſſing forward the affaires, he thought to keepe the minds of all men confuſed and intangled. The ladie Alanſon was receiued by the emperour with verie gratious demonſtrations and hopes: but the effects fell out both hard and heauie. For when ſhe miniſtred ſpeech to him for the mariage of his ſiſter the widowe with the king: he made anſwer; that it was a matter which could not be doone without the conſent of the duke of Burbon.

The French king is carefull ouer the crowne of France.

The other particularities were debated by deputies of both parts, wherein, as the emperour inſiſted obſtinatlie to haue the dutchie of Burgognie reſtored as apperteining to him: ſo the French refuſed to conſent, vnleſſe he would accept it for dowrie; or elſe to referre it to the ſentence of the law and iuſtice to decide the true title. And albeit they could eaſilie haue condeſcended to the reſidue, yet for that they were ſo farre off for the demand of Burgognie, the ladie Alanſon returned at laſt into France, without winning anie other grace, than a fauour to ſee the king hir brother; who growing more and more into diſtruſt of his deliuerie, deſired hir at hir departing to admoniſh his mother, and all the councell from him, to looke carefullie to the profit of the crowne of France, without hauing anie conſideration of him, as if he liued not. But notwithſtanding the departure of the ladie Alanſon, the ſollicitations for the kings deliuerie did not ceaſſe, for that there remained behind the preſident of Paris, and the biſhops of Ambrun and Tarbe, who had till then followed the negociation but with verie little hope, ſith the emperour would not harken to anie condition, if firſt Burgognie were not rendred, which the king would not be brought to reſtore, but in a laſt neceſſitie.

Guic.961, & deinceps. The treatie of Madrill touching the deliuerie of the French king.

After this infortunate accident of the French king inſued manie troubleſome and intricate matters, among which the caſe of the French king was deſcanted vpon, and a ſollicitation of peace reſolued, which conteined theſe couenants following. That betweene the emperour and the French king ſhould be a peace perpetuall, in which ſhould be comprehended all ſuch as ſhould be named by their common conſent. That the French king by the firſt daie of the next moneth of March, ſhould be ſet at libertie vpon the marches in the coaſt of Fontarabie. That within ſix weeks after he ſhould conſigne to the emperour the dutchie of Burgognie, the countie of Charrolois, the iuriſdiction of Noiers, the caſtell Chainro, dependancies of the ſaid dutchie, the vicountie of Fluſſona, the reſort of S. Laurence de la Roche, a dependant of Franch countie, togither with all the appurtenances as well of the ſaid dutchie as vicountie, all which for hereafter ſhould be ſeparate and exempted from the ſoueraigntie of the realme of France. That at the ſame and verie inſtant that the king ſhould be deliuered, there ſhould be put into the emperours hands the Dolphin of France, and with him either the duke of Orleance the kings ſecond ſonne, or elſe twelue principall lords of France, whom the emperour did name.

What was left to the ladie regents election in this capitulation.

It was left to the election of the ladie regent, either to deliuer the kings ſecond ſonne, or the twelue barons, and they to remaine as hoſtages vntill reſtitution were made of the lands and places aforeſaid, and the peace ſworne and ratified, togither with all the articles by the eſtates generall of France, and inregiſtred in all the courts of parlement of the kingdome with forme and ſolemnities neceſſarie. For the accompliſhing wherof, there was ſet downe a terme of foure moneths: at which time returning the hoſtages, there ſhould be put into the emperors hands the duke de Angoleſme the kings third ſon, to the end to traine him vp with the emperour, the better to interteine and aſſure the peace. That the French king ſhould renounce and giue vp to the emperour all his rights to the realme of Naples, togither with all ſuch titles and preeminences as were to come to him by the inueſtiture of the church. That he ſhould doo the like touching his intereſt in the ſtate of Millaine, of Genes, of Aſt, and likewiſe of Arras, Tourneie, of the Ile, and of Dowaie. That he ſhould render vp the towne and caſtell of Hedin as a member of the countie of Artois, with all the munitions, artilleries, and moueables that were in it when it was laſt taken. That he ſhould diſclaime and yeeld vp all ſoueraigntie in Flanders and Artois, and all other places or peeces which the emperour poſſeſſed.

Couenants concerning the emperour, and of him to be kept and performed.

That on the other ſide, the emperour ſhould reſigne and giue vp to him all the right, title, and quarrell which he pretended to anie place poſſeſſed by the Frenchmen, and eſpeciallie the townes and caſtelldomes of Perone, Montdidier, Roie, the counties of Bullongne, Guines, & Ponthiew, with other towns ſtanding vpon the one and other ſhore of the riuer of Some. That there ſhould be betweene them a league and confederation perpetuall for the defenſe of their eſtates, with oblation to aid one another when néed required, with 500 men at armes, and ten thouſand footmen: that the emperour ſhould promiſe to giue in marriage to the king the ladie Elianor his ſiſter, whom, as ſoone as the diſpenſation ſhould be obteined from the pope, he ſhould contract or handfaſt with words obligatorie for the preſent, and afterwards ſhe ſhould be led into France, to conſummate the marriage at the ſame time that according to the capitulations the hoſtages were to be deliuered: that ſhe ſhould haue for hir portion two hundred thouſand crowns, with iewels according to hir eſtate, the one moitie of the monie to be paid within ſixtéene moneths, and the other halfe in one yeare after.

Theſe couenãts reſtraine a great part of the French kings roialtie.

Furthermore, that a mariage ſhould be made betwéene the Dolphin & the daughter of the K. of Portugall, daughter to the ladie Elianor, at ſuch time as their age will ſuffer: that the French king ſhould doo all that he could to induce the ancient K. of Nauarre to giue vp to the emperour the rights of that kingdome, which in caſe he would not performe, then the king not to aid him with anie ſuccours. That the duke of Guelders, and the countie of Zulffe, and the principall townes of thoſe eſtates, ſhould promiſe with ſufficient ſecuritie, to giue themſelues to the emperour, after his death. That the king ſhould giue no ſuccour to the duke of Wittenberge, nor likewiſe to Robert de la March. That he ſhould furniſh and rigge for the emperour, both when he ſhould paſſe into Italie, and two moneths after being ſo required, twelue gallies, foure ſhips, & foure gallions, all well munitioned and appointed, except men of war, & the ſaid veſſelles to be rendred thrée moneths after accompting from the daie of his imbarking: that in place of the armie by land which the king offered for Italie, he ſhould paie him two hundred thouſand crownes in monie, the one halfe within ſixtéene moneths, and the other halfe within a yéere after.

The king of England included in this peace.

Againe, that at the time when the hoſtages ſhould be deliuered, he ſhould be bound to giue bils of exchange for the paie of ſix thouſand footmen for ſix moneths immediatlie after the emperours arriuall in Italie: that he ſhould alſo furniſh for his ſeruice fiue hundred lances paied, with a band of artillerie. That he ſhould ſaue harmeleſſe the emperour of his promiſe made to the king of England by penſions, which the French king ſhould paie to him, the arerages whereof amounted to fiue hundred thouſand crownes, or elſe to deliuer ſo much in readie monie to the emperour. That they ſhould both ioine to beſéech the pope to call a generall councell with all ſpéed, to the end to conſult vpon an vniuerſall peace amongſt chriſtians, to aduance an enterpriſe againſt the infidels and heretikes, and to grant to all the croiſade for thrée yeares. That within ſix wéeks the king ſhould reſtore the duke of Burbon in moſt ample forme, into all his eſtates, goods mouable and vnmouable, and fruits and reuenues receiued: nor to moleſt him for anie thing paſt, nor conſtraine him to dwell or go to the realme of France. That it ſhould be lawfull to the ſaid duke of Burbon, to demand by the waie of law and iuſtice, the earledome of Prouence. That in like ſort all thoſe that had followed him, ſhould reenter in ſafetie into their goods and ſtates, and namelie the biſhop of Autun, and monſieur de ſaint Vallier.

The prince of Orange included alſo in this peace.

Moreouer, that the priſoners taken in the warre ſhould be deliuered on both parts within fiftéene daies. That there ſhould be reſtitution made to the ladie Margaret of Auſtrich of all that ſhe poſſeſſed afore the warre. That the prince of Orange ſhould be ſet at libertie with reſtauration to the principalitie of Orange, and all that he poſſeſſed by the death of his father, which had béene taken from him for following the faction of the emperour. That the like ſhould be doone to other barons. That there ſhould be made reſtitution to the marqueſſe of Saluſſe of his eſtate. That the king as ſoone as he arriued in the firſt towne of his realme, ſhould ratifie this capitulation, and be bound to procure the Dolphin to ratifie it when he ſhould come to the age of fouretéene yeares. Manie were named by common conſent, and chéeflie the Switzers. Onelie there was not one of the potentates of Italie, except the pope, whom they named as conſeruator of the accord, and that more for maner ſake and ceremonie, than in effect and true meaning. Laſtlie, it was expreſſed in the ſaid capitulation, that in caſe the king for anie occaſion, would not accompliſh theſe matters promiſed; he ſhould returne true priſoner.

Whie this accord ſet all Chriſtendome in a woondering.

This accord for the parts it conteined, brought no ſmall aſtoniſhment to all Chriſtendome. For when it was vnderſtood, that the firſt execution thereof conſiſted in the deliuerie of the king, all mens opinions were, that being in his libertie, he would not deliuer vp Burgongnie, as being a member of too great importance for the realme of France. And except a few, who had counſelled the emperour to it, all his court had the ſame iudgement, and namelie the Chancellor, who reprehended and deteſted the matter with ſo great vehemencie, that notwithſtanding he was commanded to ſigne the capitulation (according to the office of chéefe chancellors) yet he refuſed to doo it, alledging; that in ſuch matters, dangerous and hurtfull as that was, he ought not to vſe the authoritie that was giuen him: neither could he be altered from this opinion, notwithſtanding the emperour was angrie with him: who ſéeing him ſo reſolute in his opinion, ſigned it himſelfe, and within few daies after went to Madrill, to confirme the aliance, and make a foundation of amitie and good will with the king, whom he interteined in familiar and priuat ſort.

The French king marrieth the emperors ſiſter according to a clauſe in the capitulation.

Great were the ceremonies and demonſtrations of amitie betwéene them: oftentimes they ſhewed themſelues togither in places publike: and as often did they paſſe in ſecret familiar diſcourſes. They went togither in one coch vnto a caſtell not halfe a daies iournie from thence, where was quéene Eleanor, whom the king married. And yet in all theſe great ſignes of peace and amitie, he was obſerued with as carefull and ſtreict gard as before, without anie aduantage of libertie. So that he was embraced as a brother, and garded as a priſoner. A matter which made manifeſt to the world, that it was an accord full of diſcord, an aliance without amitie, and that vpon euerie occaſion their ancient gelouſies and paſſions would be ſtronger in them, than the regard of that aliance, made more by force than fréendſhip. Manie daies were ſpent in theſe offices and ceremonies of amitie, when was brought from the ladie regent the ratification, togither with the declaration, that with the Dolphin of France they would rather giue in hoſtage the kings ſecond ſon, than the twelue barons.

The king of England glad of the French kings deliuerance.

Then the king departed from Madrill, taking his waie to the frontier of his realme, where was to be exchanged his perſon for his ſonnes, who bare verie ſmall age. There was ſent to accompanie him the viceroy the worker and author of his deliuerie, to whome the emperour had giuen the citie of Aſt, with other eſtates in Flanders and in the kingdome of Naples. The king of England hearing that the French king ſhould now be deliuered, ſent to him a knight of his chamber, called ſir Thomas Chenie, to ſignifie to him the great ioy and gladneſſe, which he conceiued for his reſtitution to libertie, and the concluſion of the generall peace. For which kindneſſe & courteous remembrance, the French king thought himſelfe much bound (as he confeſſeth himſelfe hereafter) to the king of England, & thanked him greatlie hereafter.

Guic. pag. 966.
The maner of the deliuerie of the French king.

After much a doo and manie remoouings, the French king was come on the confines of Fontarabie, a towne apperteining to the emperour, ſtanding vpon the Ocean ſea, and is a frontier betweene Biſkaie and the duchie of Guien. And on the other ſide, the ladie regent was arriued with the children of France, at Baion, not manie leagues from Fontarabie. The torments of the gowt tooke hir by the waie, which was the cauſe that ſhe had lingred ſome time longer than the daie appointed of permutation. But at laſt, the eighteenth daie of March, the French king accompanied with the viceroy and capteine Alarcon with fiftie horſſe, was preſented vpon the ſhore of the riuer that diuideth the realme of France from the kingdome of Spaine. And on the other ſide, vpon the ſhore oppoſite appeered monſieur Lawtrech with the kings children and like number of horſſe. There was in the middeſt of the riuer a great barke made faſt with anchors, in which was no perſon. The king was rowed neere to this barke in a little boat, wherein he was accompanied with the viceroy, capteine Alarcon, and eight others, all armed with ſhort weapons: and on the other ſide of the barke were likewiſe brought in a little boat, monſieur Lawtrech with the oſtages & eight others, weaponed according to the others.

The French king with the viceroy are imbarked.

After this the viceroy went into the barke with the king, and all his companie: and alſo monſieur Lawtrech with his eight that accompanied him, ſo that they were within the barke a like number of both parts, Alarcon and his eight being with the viceroy, and Lawtrech and the others with the perſon of the king. And when they were all thus within the barke, Lawtrech fetched out of the boat into the barke, the Dolphin, who being giuen to the viceroy and by him committed to capteine Alarcon, was forthwith beſtowed in their boate, and after him followed the little duke of Orleance, who was no ſooner entred the barke, than the French king leaped out of the barke into his boate, which he did with ſuch quickneſſe and celeritie, that the exchange or permutation was thought to be doone at one ſelfe inſtant; ſo welcome to him was libertie, without the which nothing is ſweet, nothing is comfortable, as the poet ſaith:

Libertas perdulce bonum, bona cætera reddit.

The French K. is not a litle glad of his libertie.

Aſſoone as the king was on the other ſide of the ſhore, his new libertie making him fearefull of ambuſh, he mounted vpon a Turkiſh horſſe of a woonderfull ſwiftneſſe, which was prepared for the purpoſe: and running betweene feare and gladneſſe vpon the ſpurre, he neuer ſtaied till he came to S. John de Lus, a towne of his obedience, foure leagues from the place. And being there readilie relieued with a freſh horſſe, he ran with the ſame ſwiftneſſe to Baion, where, after he had paſſed ouer the offices of court doone to him by his people, he diſpatched with great diligence a gentleman to the king of England, to whom he wrote with his owne hand letters of his deliuerie, charging the meſſenger vnder verie louing commiſſion, to tell the king of England, that as he acknowledged the effect of his libertie to be wrought wholie by him and his operations, ſo in recompenſe, he offered to remaine to him a perpetuall and aſſured friend, and to be guided in all his affaires by his counſell. And afterwards he ſent an other ſolemne ambaſſage into England, to ratifie the peace which his mother had made with him, as one that repoſed a verie great foundation in the amitie of that king.

The king of England the procurer of the French kings libertie.

Guic. pag. 968.

When the French king was gotten into Baion, being required by a gentleman of the viceroys, to ratifie the accord according to the obligation of his word, being come into a place free and aſſured, he deferred it from one daie to another, interpoſing reaſons and excuſes generall: wherin, to the end to hold ſtill the emperour in hope, he ſent to aduertiſe him by a man eſpeciall, that he forbare for the preſent to accompliſh the ratification, not by omiſſion or willing negligence, but vpon this neceſſitie, that before he proceeded reallie to ſuch an act, he was to labour to reappeaſe and reduce the minds of his ſubiects ill contented with the obligations he had made, tending to the diminution of the crowne of France. Neuertheleſſe, he would in his time reſolue all difficulties, and obſerue with fidelitie all that he had promiſed to him, both in ſubſtance and circumſtance. By this dealing, no leſſe doubtfull for the manner, than dangerous in meaning, might eaſilie be comprehended what were his intentions, the ſame being more manifeſtlie detected at the arriuall of the meſſengers ſent to him not manie daies after, by the pope and Venetians, in whome was no great need of induſtrie or labour, to ſound out the plaine courſe of his inclination.

The French king is not verie haſtie to ratifie the accord.

For, after he had receiued them with manie demonſtrations and offices of court, he interteined them ſeuerallie and apart with ſundrie ſpeeches of compaſſion, ſuch as tended to manifeſt complaints againſt the inhumanitie of the emperour: who he ſaid did neuer adminiſter to him during his captiuitie, anie one office apperteining to the ranke of a prince, nor at anie time ſhewed himſelfe touched with that affection and commiſeration which one prince ought to expreſſe in the calamities of another: and much leſſe would vſe anie courſe of common comfort, either to relieue the heauineſſe of his condition with anie propertie of apt conſolation, or once to enter into conſideration, that the ſame accident that had fallen vpon him, might alſo be as heauilie heaped vpon his owne head. In this complaint, he alleaged the example of Edward king of England called of ſome Edward Long-ſhanke. To whome when was preſented as priſoner John king of the Frenchmen, taken by the prince of Wales his ſon in the battell of Poitiers, he did not onelie receiue him with great comfort and compaſſion of his afflicted caſe, but alſo, all the time of his impriſonment within the realme of England, he let him go at libertie vnder a free gard.

The French king complaineth vpon the emperour to the meſſengers ſent from the pope and the Venetians.

The king of England alledged by the French king as a preſident of humanitie in the caſe of a captiue king.

Furthermore he had dailie familiar conuerſation with him, he would oftentimes haue him to accompanie him on hunting, to communicate in the open aire and ſolace of the field, and was not curious to call gim to eat with him at his table. And by theſe humanities much leſſe that he loſt his priſoner, or ranged him to an accord leſſe fauourable; but of the contrarie, by the operation of thoſe graces and good offices, there grew betweene them ſuch a familiaritie and confidence, that the French king, after he had continued manie yeares in France, made a voluntarie voiage into England, to honour and gratifie vnder that propertie of office, the liberalitie and frankeneſſe of the king. He alleged that as there was onelie remembrance of two kings of France that had beene taken priſoners in battell, king John and himſelfe, ſo the diuerſitie of the examples was alſo worthie of ſingular memorie, ſeeing vpon the one was exerciſed all facilitie and mildneſſe of the victor, and to the other were miniſtred all thoſe rigours and ſeuerities, which tyrants in the height and pride of their fortune are woont to vſe. Herevnto he added manie circumſtances diſcouering the diſcontentment of his mind, whereupon inſued practiſes wherewith the emperour was not well pleaſed.

To be ſhort, after that this peace was accorded, and the French king deliuered, the emperour maried the ladie Iſabell daughter to Emanuell king of Portugall, and had with hir eleuen hundred thouſand ducats. Thus farre the French affaires intermixed (as you heare) with our owne, and verie néedfull to be added, which here we will end, and returne to England.]

The cardinall erecteth two new colleges.

Polydor.

Cardinall Wolſie being ſtill moſt highlie in the kings fauour, obteined licence to erect a college at Oxford, and another at Ipſwich, the towne where he was borne, the which foundations he began rather of a vaine deſire of glorie and worldlie praiſe, than vpon the inſtinction of true religion and aduancement of doctrine, and therfore ſith he was not mooued therto in reſpect of true godlineſſe and bountifull liberalitie, he went about to cloth Peter and rob Paule: for he firſt got licence of the king to ſuppreſſe certeine ſmall monaſteries, and after got a confirmation of the pope, that he might imploie the góods, lands, and reuenues belonging to thoſe houſes, to the maintenance of thoſe his two colleges, whereby not onelie he, but alſo the pope were euill ſpoken of through the whole realme. In March the king ſent Cuthbert Tunſtall biſhop of London, and ſir Richard Wingfield chancellour of the duchie of Lancaſter, & knight of the garter, into Spaine, to common with the emperour for great cauſes, concerning the taking of the French king, and for warres to be made into France on euerie ſide.

Edw. Hall.

Ambaſſadors ſent to the emperour.

The king being determined thus to make wars in France, & to paſſe the ſea himſelfe in perſon, his councell conſidered that aboue all things great treaſure and plentie of monie muſt néedes be prouided. Wherfore, by the cardinall there was deuiſed ſtrange commiſſions, and ſent in the end of March into euerie ſhire, and commiſſioners appointed, and priuie inſtructions ſent to them how they ſhould proceed in their ſittings, and order the people to bring them to their purpoſe: which was, that the ſixt part of euerie mans ſubſtance ſhould be paid in monie or plate to the king without delaie, for the furniture of his war. Hereof followed ſuch curſing, wéeping, and exclamation againſt both king & cardinall, that pitie it was to heare. And to be bréefe, notwithſtanding all that could be ſaid or doone, forged or deuiſed by the commiſſioners to perſuade the people to this contribution, the ſame would not be granted. And in excuſe of their deniall it was alledged, that wrong was offered, and the ancient cuſtomes & lawes of the realme broken, which would not anie man to be charged with ſuch paiment, except it were granted by the eſtates of the realme in parlement aſſembled. The like anſwer was made by them of the ſpiritualtie, of whome was demanded the fourth part of their góods.

The ſixt part of euerie mans ſubſtance demanded.

The emperors ambaſſador departeth out of England without leaue taking of the king.

Monſieur de Praet the emperours ambaſſador, whether offended for admitting of Iohn Iokin into the realme (as before ye haue heard) or for ſome other cauſe, the ninth of Aprill departed out of England, not taking leaue of the king, nor of the cardinall, and ſo much did by ſafe conduct, that he paſſed through France in poſt, and came to the emperour before the ambaſſadors of England came thither. And whether it was by his report, or otherwiſe, the accuſtomed fauour that the emperour ſhewed to the Engliſhmen, began then to decaie, as was well perceiued, whatſoeuer the matter was. This yeare at Whitſuntide died Thomas duke of Norfolke, and was honourablie buried at Thetford. The cardinall trauelled earneſtlie with the maior and aldermen of London, about the aid of monie to be granted, and likewiſe the commiſſioners appointed in the ſhires of the realme, ſat vpon the ſame: but the burthen was ſo gréeuous, that it was generallie denied, and the commons in euerie place ſo mooued, that it was like to grow to rebellion.

Death of the duke of Norfolke.

Anno. Reg. 17.

The commiſſioners for the tax reſiſted.

In Eſſex the people would not aſſemble before the commiſſioners in no houſes, but in open places, and in Huntingtonſhire diuerſe reſiſted the commiſſioners, and would not ſuffer them to ſit, which were apprehended and ſent to the Fléet. The duke of Suffolke ſitting in commiſſion about this ſubſidie in Suffolke, perſuaded by courteous meanes the rich clothiers to aſſent therto: but when they came home, and went about to diſcharge and put from them their ſpinners, carders, fullers, weauers, and other artificers, which they kept in worke afore time, the people began to aſſemble in companies. Whereof when the duke was aduertiſed, he commanded the conſtables that euerie mans harnes ſhould be taken from him. But when that was knowne, then the rage of the people increaſed, railing openlie on the duke, and ſir Robert Drurie, and threatned them with death, and the cardinall alſo. And herewith there aſſembled togither after the maner of rebels foure thouſand men of Lanam, Sudberie, Hadleie, and other townes thereabouts, which put themſelues in harneſſe, and rang the bels alarme, and began ſtill to aſſemble in great number.

A rebellion in Suffolke by the grieuouſneſſe of the ſubſidie.

The duke of Suffolke perceiuing this, began to gather ſuch power as he could, but that was verie ſlender. Yet the gentlemen that were with the duke, did ſo much that all the bridges were broken, ſo that the aſſemblie of thoſe rebels was ſomewhat letted. The duke of Norffolke being therof aduertiſed, gathered a great power in Norffolke, and came towards the commons, & ſending to them to know their intent, receiued anſwer, that they would liue and die in the kings cauſes, and be to him obedient. Herevpon he came himſelfe to talke with them, and willing to know who was their capteine, that he might anſwer for them all: it was told him by one Iohn Gréene a man of fiftie yeares of age, that Pouertie was their capteine, the which with his couſine Neceſſitie, had brought them to that dooing. For whereas they and a great number of other in that countrie, liued not not vpon themſelues, but vpon the ſubſtantiall occupiers, now that they through ſuch paiments as were demanded of them, were not able to mainteine them in worke, they muſt of neceſſitie periſh for want of ſuſtenance.

The duke of Norffolke cometh with a power againſt the rebels in Suffolke.

Pouertie and Neceſſitie capteins of the rebellion.

The duke hearing this matter, was ſorie for their caſe, and promiſed them, that if they would depart home to their dwellings, he would be a meane for their pardon to the king. Wherevpon they were contented to depart. After this, the duke of Norffolke, and the duke of Suffolke came to Burie, and thither reſorted much people of the countrie in their ſhirts, with halters about their neckes, méekelie deſiring pardon for their offenſes. The dukes ſo wiſelie demeaned themſelues, that the commons were appeaſed, and the demaund of monie ceaſed in all the realme, for well it was perceiued that the commons would pay none. Then went the two dukes to London, and brought with them the chiefe capteins of the rebellion, which were put in the Fléet. The king then came to Weſtminſter to the cardinals palace, and aſſembled there a great councell, in the which he openlie proteſted, that his mind was neuer to aſke anie thing of his commons which might ſound to the breach of his lawes, wherefore he willed to know by whoſe meanes the commiſſions were ſo ſtreictlie giuen forth, to demand the ſixt part of euerie mans góods.

The capteins of the rebels committed to priſon.

The cardinall excuſed himſelfe, and ſaid, that when it was mooued in councell how to leuie monie to the kings vſe; the kings councell, and namelie the iudges,

The cardinall of Yorke excuſeth himſelfe touching the ſtreict commiſſion for the tax ges, ſaid, that he might lawfullie demand anie ſumme by commiſſion, and that by the conſent of the whole councell it was doone, and tooke God to witnes that he neuer deſired the hinderance of the commons, but like a true councellor deuiſed how to inrich the king. The king indéed was much offended that his commons were thus intreated, & thought it touched his honor, that his councell ſhould attempt ſuch a doubtfull matter in his name, and to be denied both of the ſpiritualtie and temporaltie. Therefore he would no more of that trouble, but cauſed letters to be ſent into all ſhires, that the matter ſhould no further be talked of: & he pardoned all them that had denied the demand openlie or ſecretlie. The cardinall, to deliuer himſelfe of the euill will of the commons, purchaſed by procuring & aduancing of this demand, affirmed, and cauſed it to be bruted abrode, that through his interceſſion the king had pardoned and releaſed all things.

The rebels pardoned after their appearance in the Star chamber.

Tindale men great robbers

Thoſe that were in the Tower and Fléet for the rebellion in Suffolke, and reſiſting the commiſſioners aſwell there as in Huntington ſhire and Kent, were brought before the lords in the Star chamber, and there had their offenſes opened and ſhewed to them: and finallie the kings pardon declared, and thereon they were deliuered. ¶ In this ſeaſon a great number of men of warre laie at Bullongne, and in other places thereabout, which diuerſe times attempted to indamage the Engliſhmen, and to ſpoile the Engliſh pale: but they could neuer ſpoile the mariſhes where the greateſt part of the cattell belonging to the inhabitants was kept. Tindale men with aid of the Scots, did much hurt in England by robberies, which they exerciſed: and therefore were ſent thither, ſir Richard Bulmere, and ſir Chriſtopher Dacres, to reſtreine their dooings. Diuerſe came to them, and ſubmitted themſelues: but the greateſt théeues kept them in the mounteins of Cheuiot, and did much hurt, yet at length they ſeuered, and manie of them were taken.

K. Henries baſe ſonne created earle and duke in one daie.

The cardinall by his power legantine ſent one of his chapleins called doctor John Allen, to viſit the religious houſes of this realme about this ſeaſon, which doctor practiſed amongſt them greatlie to his profit, but more to the ſlander both of himſelfe and of his maiſter. On the eightéenth daie of June, at the manor place of Bridewell, the kings ſonne (which he had begot of Elizabeth Blunt, daughter to ſir John Blunt knight) called Henrie Fitzroie, was created firſt earle of Notingham, and after on the ſelfe ſame daie he was created duke of Richmond and Summerſet. Alſo the ſame daie the lord Henrie Courtneie earle of Deuonſhire, and coſine germane to the king, was created marqueſſe of Exceſter: and the lord Henrie Brandon ſonne to the duke of Suffolke and the French quéene, a child of two yeares old, was created earle of Lincolne: and ſir Thomas Manners lord Roos was created earle of Rutland, and ſir Henrie Clifford earle of Cumberland, and the lord Fitzwater ſir Robert Ratcliffe was created vicount Fitzwater, and ſir Thomas Bullen treaſuror of the kings houſhold was created vicount Rochefort.

A truce betwéene England & France for fortie daies.

Ambaſſadors ſent into Denmarke.

The French kings mother as then regent of France, procured a ſafe conduct for an ambaſſador to be ſent into England to treat of peace, and therewith ſent John Jokin called monſieur de Vaux, which (as yée haue heard) in the laſt yeare was kept ſecret in maiſter Larks houſe. By his procurement a truce was granted to indure from the thirtéenth of Julie for fortie daies betwéene England and France both by ſea and land. In the later end of Julie came into England the chéefe preſident of Rone with ſufficient authoritie to conclude anie agréement that ſhould be granted. At his ſute the king was contented that a truce ſhould be taken, to endure from the fouretéenth of Auguſt, till the firſt of December. This yeare the king ſent doctor Henrie Standiſh biſhop of ſaint Aſſe, and ſir John Baker knight into Denmarke, to intreat with the nobles of that countrie for the reduction of their king Chriſtierne to his realme and former dignitie: but the Danes hated him ſo much for his crueltie, that they could not abide to heare of anie ſuch matter, and ſo theſe ambaſſadors returned without ſpéeding of their purpoſe for the which they were ſent.

A peace proclamed betwéene England & France.

The ladie regent ſworne to performe the articles of the league.

But the French ambaſſadors did ſo much both by offers and intreaties, that the king condeſcended to a peace, which being concluded, was proclamed in London with a trumpet the eight of September. By the couenants of this peace the king of England ſhould receiue at certeine daies twentie hundred thouſand crownes, which then amounted in ſterling monie to the ſumme of foure hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, of which one paiment of fiftie thouſand pounds was paid in hand. In October were ſent into France, ſir William Fitzwilliam treaſuror of the kings houſe, and doctor Tailor, as ambaſſadors from the king of England to the ladie regent, whome they found at the citie of Lion, where, of hir they were honorablie receiued: and in their preſence the ſaid ladie regent tooke a corporall oth in ſolemne wiſe, and according to the cuſtome in ſuch caſes vſed, to performe all the articles and couenants paſſed and concluded in the league and treatie of peace by hir commiſſioners.

A winters death.

The ſtill Chriſtmaſſe.

1526

The cardinall altereth the ſtate of the kings houſhold.

The ſtatutes of Eltham.

The emperour was nothing pleaſed, in that the king of England had thus concluded peace with the Frenchmen, and therefore the Engliſh merchants were not ſo courteouſlie dealt with, as they had béene afore time. In this winter was great death in London, ſo that the terme was adiourned: and the king kept his Chriſtmaſſe at Eltham, with a ſmall number, and therefore it was called the ſtill Chriſtmaſſe. ¶ In Januarie was a peace concluded betwixt the realmes of England and Scotland for thrée yeares and ſix moneths. The cardinall about this time comming to the court, which then laie (as before yée haue heard) at Eltham, tooke order for altering the ſtate of the kings houſe. Manie officers and other ſeruants were diſcharged, and put to their penſions and annuities. In which number were foureſcore and foure yeomen of the gard, which before hauing twelue pence the daie with checke, were now allowed ſix pence the daie without checke, and commanded to go home into their countries. Diuers ordinances were made at that ſeaſon by the cardinall, touching the gouernance of the kings houſe, more profitable than honorable, as ſome ſaid, and were called long after, The ſtatutes of Eltham.

Doct. Barnes and two merchants of the Stilliard beare fagots.

On Shrouetueſdaie there was a ſolemne iuſts held at the manor of Gréenewich, the king & eleuen other on the one part, and the marqueſſe of Exceſter with eleauen other on the contrarie part. ¶ At thoſe iuſts by chance of ſhiuering of a ſpeare ſir Francis Brian loſt one of his eies. The eleuenth of Februarie being ſundaie, the cardinall with great pompe came to the cathedrall church of Paules, where he ſat in pontificalibus vnder his cloth of eſtate of rich cloth of gold, and there doctor Barnes an Auguſtine frier bare a fagot for certeine points of hereſie alleaged againſt him; and two merchants of the Stilliard bare fagots for eating of fleſh on a fridaie: and there the biſhop of Rocheſter doctor Fiſher made a ſermon againſt Martine Luther, which certeine yeares before, that is to wit, about the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred and eightéene, had begun to preach and write againſt the authoritie of the pope.

Pée

We muſt here note, that the emperour being at Windſor in the fourtéenth yéers of the kings reigne couenanted, amongſt other things, to take to wife the ladie Marie daughter to the king of England: but now vpon conſiderations his mind changed, for the which the Engliſhmen ſore murmured againſt him. On the nine and twentith of Aprill being ſundaie, the cardinall ſoong a ſolemne maſſe in the kings chappell at Gréenewich, and after the ſame was ended, the king ſware in preſence of the ambaſſadors of France, and of the ambaſſadors of Rome, of the emperour of Venice, and of Florence, to obſerue and kéepe the peace and league concluded betwixt him and his louing brother, and perpetuall alie the French king, during his life and one yeare after.

Anno Reg. 18.

King Henrie ſworne to performe the league concluded.

A ſecret league betwixt the pope and certeine ſtates of Italie.

In this meane while, there was a ſecret league concluded betwixt the pope, the Venecians, the Florentins, and Francis Sforza duke of Millan: into the which league the French king alſo entered, after he was returned into France. There was alſo place left to the king of England to enter into the ſame league, and likewiſe to all other kings and princes; and if the king of England would, he ſhould be admitted as protector of the ſame. But the emperour might not be admitted, till he had deliuered the French kings children (hauing a reaſonable ſumme of monie for the ſame) and had reſtored the duke of Millan to his whole duchie. It was thought indéed, that the emperour being wrongfullie informed againſt this duke, rather through enuie of ſome of the emperours capteins, than for anie cauſe miniſtred by the duke, dealt verie ſtreightlie with him, & meant to defeat him of his duchie. For redreſſe whereof, and alſo to prouide that the emperor ſhould not grow too ſtrong in Italie to the danger of other eſtates, this league was deuiſed: by force whereof he might be brought to reaſon, if he would refuſe conuenient offers and indifferent waies of agréement.

Abr. Fl. ex Guic.pag.1067

The pope being abandoned of all hopes, compoundeth with the imperials.

This league was concluded the two and twentith of Maie in this yeare. What followed thereof, ye may read more at large in the hiſtories of Italie and France, where the warres are more at large touched, which chanced in that ſeaſon betwixt the emperour, and the confederats, and how the imperiall armie tooke the citie of Rome, and beſieging the pope in caſtell ſaint Angelo, conſtreined him to yéeld, and agrée to certeine propoſitions put vnto him. ¶ Who being by his aduerſitie made naked of all helpe preſent, and leſſe expectation to be reſcued where was ſo great want of valour and order, was driuen to run the race of his fortune, compounding the ſixt daie of Iune with the imperials almoſt vnder the ſame conditions with the which he might haue accorded before. That the pope ſhould paie to the armie foure hundred thouſand duckets in this order: one hundred thouſand preſentlie to be defraied of the gold, monie, and treaſure reſerued in the caſtell: fiftie thouſand within twentie daies, and two hundred and fiftie thouſand within two moneths: aſſigning to him for theſe defraiments, an impoſt of monie to be charged vpon the whole church ſtate. That he ſhould deliuer into the power of the emperour, to reteine them ſo long as he thought good, the caſtell S. Angelo, the rockes of Oſtia, of Ciuita Vecchia, of Ciuita Caſtelano, togither with the cities of Parma, Plaiſanca, and Modena.

A hard article and to be merueiled how the pope and his cardinals might brooke it.

Furthermore, that the pope togither with all thoſe cardinals that were with him, which were thirtéene in number, ſhould remaine priſoners within the caſtell, vntill the firſt paiment of an hundred and fiftie thouſand duckets were ſatiſfied. That afterwards they ſhould go to Naples or to Caietta, to expect what the emperour would determine of them. That for aſſurance of the paiments, whereof the third part apperteined to the Spaniards, he ſhould deliuer in for oſtages, the archbiſhops of Siponto and Piſa, the biſhops of Piſtoia & Verona, togither with Iames Saluiatio, Simon de Ricaſola, and Laurence brother to cardinall Rodolffo. That Ranſo de Cero, Albert Pio, Oratio Baillon, the knight Caſalo, the ambaſſadour of England, with all others that were ſaued within the caſtell, except the pope and the cardinals, ſhould depart in ſuertie. That the pope ſhould giue abſolution to the Colonnois of the cenſures they had incurred. And that when he ſhould be led out of Rome, a legat ſhould remaine there for him with authoritie to diſpoſe and adminiſter iuſtice.

The caſtell where the pope was priſoner infected with the plague.

During the popes captiuitie, Rome was ſore afflicted with the plague, in ſomuch that the rage thereof ſo greatlie increaſed, that the caſtell of ſaint Angelo was viſited, to the great danger of the life of the pope; about whome died certeine ſpeciall men that did ſeruice to his perſon: who amid ſo manie afflictions and aduerſities, and no other hope remaining to him than in the clemencie of the emperour, appointed for legat with the conſent of the capteins, cardinall Alexander of Farneſo, who notwithſtanding being iſſued out of the caſtell, and Rome, refuſed vnder that occaſion to go in the ſaid legation. The capteins deſired to carie the perſon of the pope with the thirtéene cardinals that were with him, to Caietto: but he laboured againſt that reſolution with great diligence, petitions, and art.]

¶ In the month of Maie was a proclamation made againſt all vnlawfull games, according to the ſtatutes made in this behalfe, and commiſſions awarded into euerie ſhire for the execution of the ſame; ſo that in all places, tables, dice, cards, and bouls were taken and burnt. Wherfore the people murmured againſt the cardinall, ſaieng: that he grudged at euerie mans pleſure, ſauing his owne. But this proclamation ſmall time indured. For when yoong men were forbidden boules and ſuch other games: ſome fell to drinking, ſome to feretting of other mens conies, ſome to ſtealing of déere in parks, and other vnthriftineſſe.]

Great grudge againſt ſtrangers for procuring licẽces to ſell woad.

Edw.Hall.H.8, fol.Cliij.

This yeare in the citie of London a great grudge was conceiued againſt merchants ſtrangers, for that they by vertue of licences, which they had purchaſed to bring woad into the realme, contrarie to a ſtatute thereof prouided, brought ouer ſuch plentie thereof, and vttered it aſwell in the citie, as abroad in the countrie, ſo franklie, that Engliſhmens woad laie vnbought. At length the maior called a common councell in the moneth of Auguſt, and there were manie billes laied againſt the ſtrangers, and at laſt it was enacted, that no citizen nor fréeman ſhuld buy nor ſell in no place, nor exchange nor meddle with certeine ſtrangers, called Anthonie Bonuice, Laurence Bonuice, Anthonie Viuald, Anthonie Caueler, Francis de Bard, Thomas Calnecant, and a great ſort more, whoſe names I let paſſe. And if anie perſon did meddle or occupie with them contrarie to this act, he ſhould looſe his fréedome and libertie in the citie of London. By which act the ſtrangers were ſo brideled, that they came to a reaſonable point and concluſion.

Valuation of certeine coins as angels, rials, crownes, &c.

In this ſeaſon the angell noble was iuſt the ſixt part of an ounce Troie, ſo that ſix angels were iuſt an ounce, which was fourtie ſhillings ſterling; & the angell was worth two ounces of ſiluer: ſo that ſix angels were worth twelue ounces, which was but fourtie ſhillings in ſiluer. By reaſon of the good weight and low valuation of the Engliſh coine, merchants dailie carried ouer great ſtore, bicauſe the ſame was much inhanced there. So that, to méet with this inconuenience, in September proclamation was made through all England, that the angell ſhould go for ſeuen ſhillings foure pence, the roiall for eleuen ſhillings, & the crowne for foure ſhillings foure pence. On the fift of Nouember following, by proclamation againe, the angell was inhanced to ſeuen ſhillings ſix pence, and ſo euerie ounce of gold ſhould be fiue and fourtie ſhillings, and an ounce of ſiluer at thrée ſhillings and nine pence in value.

Edw.Hall in H.8.fol.Cliiij.

The king kept a ſolemne Chriſtmaſſe at Gréenewich with reuelles, maſkes, diſguiſings, & bankets: and the thirtith daie of December, was an enterpriſe of iuſts made at the tilt by ſix gentlemen, againſt all commers, which valiantlie furniſhed the ſame, both with ſpeare and ſword: and like iuſts were kept the third daie of Ianuarie, where were thrée hundred ſpeares broken. That ſame night, the king and manie yoong gentlemen with him, came to Bridewell, and there put him and fiftéene other, all in maſking apparell, and then tooke his barge, and rowed to the cardinals place, where were at ſupper a great companie of lords and ladies, and then the maſkers danſed, and made goodlie paſtime: and when they had well danſed, the ladies plucked awaie their viſors, and ſo they were all knowen, and to the king was made a great banket.

An ambaſſadour from the emperour.

Abr.Fl. ex Edw.Hall in H.8.fol.Cliiij.

A plaie at Graies In.

The argument of the plaie.

On the fourtéenth of Ianuarie came to the court don Hugo de Mendoza, a man of a noble familie in Spaine: he came as ambaſſadour from the emperour to the king, with large commiſſion, for the emperour put it to the kings determination, whether his demands which he required of the French king were reaſonable or not. This noble man tarried here two yéeres. ¶This Chriſtmaſſe was a goodlie diſguiſing plaied at Greis In, which was compiled for the moſt part by maiſter Iohn Roo, ſergeant at the law manie yeares paſt, and long before the cardinall had any authoritie. The effect of the play was, that lord gouernance was ruled by diſſipation and negligence, by whoſe miſgouernance and euill order ladie publike weale was put from gouernance: which cauſed rumor populi, inward grudge and diſdaine of wanton ſouereignetie, to riſe with a great multitude, to expell negligence and diſſiptaion, and to reſtore publike welth againe to hir eſtate, which was ſo doone.

The cardinall is offended at it and puniſheth the author and actors of the ſame.

This plaie was ſo ſet foorth with rich and coſtlie apparell, with ſtrange deuiſes of maſkes & morriſhes, that it was highlie praiſed of all men, ſauing of the cardinall, which imagined that the plaa had béene deuiſed of him, and in a great furie ſent for the ſaid maiſter Roo, and tooke from him his coiſe, and ſent him to the Fléet; and after he ſent for the yoong gentlemen, that plaied in the plaie, and them highlie rebuked and threatned, and ſent one of them called Thomas Moile of Kent to the Fléet, but by means of friends maiſter Roo and he were deliuered at laſt. This plaie ſore diſpleaſed the cardinall, and yet it was neuer meant to him, as you haue heard. Wherfore manie wiſemen grudged to ſée him take it ſo hartilie, and euer the cardinall ſaid that the king was highlie diſpleaſed with it, and ſpake nothing of himſelfe. But what will you haue of a guiltie conſcience but to ſuſpect all things to be ſaid of him (as if all the world knew his wickedneſſe) according to the old verſe:

Conſcius ipſe ſibi de ſe putat omnia dici.]

Ambaſſadors frō the Frēch king.

Edw.Hall pag. Clv.

Iuſtes.

The ſecond of March were receiued into London the biſhop of Tarbe, Francis vicount of Thurane, and maſter Anthonie Veſcie ſecond preſident of Paris, as ambaſſadours from the French king. They were lodged in Tailors hall. On Shrouetueſdaie the king himſelfe in a new harneſſe all gilt, of a ſtrange faſhion that had not béene ſéene, and with him eight gentlemen all in cloth of gold of one ſute, embrodered with knots of ſiluer, and the marques of Exceſter, and eight with him in blew veluet and white ſattin, like the waues of the ſea, theſe men of armes came to the tilt, and there ran manie freſh courſes, till two hundred foureſcore and ſix ſpeares were broken, and then they diſarmed and went to the quéenes chamber, where for them was prouided a coſtlie banket.

Sute by the French ambaſſadors for the ladie Marie to be married to the duke of Orleance.

Edw.Hall. in H.8.fol.Clv.

The dogged nature of the French for a matter of nothing.

The cardinals crueltie.

The French ambaſſadours ſued (as was ſaid) to haue the ladie Marie daughter to the K. of England, giuen in mariage to the duke of Orleance, ſecond ſonne to their maſter the French king: but that matter was put in ſuſpenſe for diuerſe conſiderations. And one was, for that the preſident of Paris doubted whether the mariage betwéene the king and hir mother (ſhe being his brothers wife) was lawfull or not. ¶ While the French ambaſſadors laie thus in London, it happened one euening as they were comming from the Blacke friers, from ſupper to the Tailors hall, two boies were in a gutter caſting downe rubbiſh, which the raine had driuen there, and vnwares hit a lackeie belonging to the vicount of Thurane, and hurt him nothing, for ſcantlie touched it his cote. But the French lords tooke the matter highlie, as a thing doone in deſpite, & ſent word to the cardinall. Who being too haſtie of credence, ſent for ſir Thomas Seimor knight, lord maior of the citie, and in all haſt commanded him vpon his allegiance, to take the huſband, wife, children, and ſeruants of the houſe, and them to impriſon, till he knew further of the kings pleaſure, and that the two boies apprentiſes ſhould be ſent to the Tower: which commandement was accompliſhed without anie fauor. For the man, and his wife, and ſeruants, were kept in the counter till the ſixt daie of Maie, which was ſix wéekes full, and their neighbours of gentleneſſe kept their houſe in the meane time, and one of the apprentiſes died in the Tower, and the other was almoſt lame. Of the crueltie of the cardinall, and of the pride of the Frenchmen, much people ſpake, & would haue béene reuenged on the Frenchmen, if wiſe men in the citie had not appeaſed it with faire words.]

Ambaſſadors from the kings of Hungarie.

An oration made by maiſter Faber.

On the fouretéenth daie of March were conueied from London to Gréenwich by the earle of Rutland and other, the lord Gabliel de Salamanca earle of Ottonburgh, Iohn Burgraue of Siluerberge, and Iohn Faber a famous clearke, after biſhop of Vien, as ambaſſadors from don Ferdinando, brother to the emperour, newlie elect king of Hungarie and Beame, after the death of his brother in law king Lewes, which was ſlaine by the Turke the laſt ſummer, as you haue heard before. This companie was welcomed of the high officers, and after brought into the kings preſence, all the nobilitie being preſent, and there after great reuerence made, maſter Faber made a notable oration, taking his ground of the goſpell, Exyt ſeminator ſeminare ſemen ſuum, and of that he declared how Chriſt and his diſciples went foorth to ſow, and how their ſéed was good that fell into the good ground, and brought foorth good fruit, which was the chriſtian faith: and then he declared how contrarie to that ſowing, Mahomet had ſowne ſéed, which brought foorth euill fruit. He alſo ſhewed from the beginning, how the Turkes haue increaſed in power, what realmes they had conquered, what people they had ſubdued euen to that daie.

He declared further what acts the great Turke then liuing had doone, and in eſpeciall he noted the getting of Belgrad, and of the Rhodes, and the ſlaieng of the king of Hungarie, to the great rebuke (as he ſaid) of all the kings chriſtened. He ſet foorth alſo what power the Turke had, what diuerſities of companies, what armor, what capteins he had, ſo that he thought, that without a maruellous great number of people he could not be ouerthrowne. Wherefore he moſt humblie beſought the king, as S. Georges knight, and defendor of the faith, to aſſiſt the king his maſter in that godlie warre and vertuous purpoſe. To this oration the k. by the mouth of ſir Thomas More anſwered, that much he lamented the loſſe that happened in Hungarie, and if it were not for the wars which were betwéene the two great princes, he thought that the Turke would not haue enterpriſed that act. Wherefore he with all his ſtudie would take paine, firſt, to ſet an vnitie and peace throughout all chriſtendome; and after that, both with monie and men, he wold be redie to helpe toward that glorious warre, as much as anie other prince in chriſtendome. After this doone, the ambaſſadours were well cheriſhed, and diuerſe times reſorted to the court, and had great cheare and good rewards, and ſo the third daie of Maie next inſuing, they tooke their leaue and departed homeward.

The kings anſwer by the mouth of ſir Thomas More.

In the winter ſeaſon of this yeare fell great abundance of raine, and namelie in September, Nouember, and December. And on the ſixtéenth of Ianuarie it rained ſo abundantlie, that great flouds thereby inſuing, deſtroied corne fields, paſtures, and drowned manie ſhéepe and beaſts. Then was it drie till the twelfe of Aprill, and from thence it rained euerie day or night till the third of Iune, & in Maie it rained thirtie hours continuallie without ceaſing, which cauſed great flouds, & did much harme, namelie in corne, ſo that the next yeare it failed within this realme, and great dearth inſued.

A verie wet ſeaſon for a long time by continuall raine.

¶ This time a bill was ſet vp in London, much contrarie to the honour of the cardinall, in the which the cardinall was warned that he ſhould not counſell the king to marrie his daughter into France: for if hée did, he ſhould ſhew himſelfe enimie to the king and the realme, with manie threatning words. This bill was deliuered to the cardinall by ſir Thomas Seimer maior of the citie, which thanked him for the ſame, & made much ſearch for the author of that bill, but he could not be found, which ſore diſpleaſed the cardinall. And vpon this occaſion the laſt daie of Aprill at night he cauſed a great watch to be kept at Weſtminſter, and had there cart guns readie charged, & cauſed diuerſe watches to be kept about London, in Newington, S. Iohns ſtréet, Weſtminſter, ſaint Giles, Iſlington, and other places néere London: which watches were kept by gentlemen & their ſeruants, with houſholders, and all for feare of the Londoners bicauſe of this bill. When the citizens knew of this, they ſaid that they maruelled why the cardinall hated them ſo, for they ſaid that if he miſtruſted them, he loued them not: and where loue is not, there is hatred: and they affirmed that they neuer intended anie harme toward him, and muſed of this chance. For if fiue or ſix perſons had made alarm in the citie, then had entred all theſe watchmen with their traine, which might haue ſpoiled the citie without cauſe. Wherefore they much murmured againſt the cardinall and his vndiſcréet doings.]

The French ambaſſadors at Gréenwich on ſundaie the fift of Maie, ſware in the name of their maſter the French king to obſerue the peace and league concluded betwéene them, for tearme of two princes liues. Theſe ambaſſadours had great cheare, and iuſtes were enterpriſed for the honour and pleaſure of them at the kings commandement by ſir Nicholas Carew, ſir Robert Ierningham, ſir Anthonie Browne, and Nicholas Haruie eſquier chalengers. Againſt whome ran the marques of Exceſter, and thirtene with him as defendants. When theſe ambaſſadours ſhould returne, they had great rewards giuen them of the king, and ſo tooke their leaue and departed. Shortlie after the king ſent ſir Thomas Bullen vicuont Rochford, and ſir Anthonie Browne knight, as ambaſſadours from him into France, which came to Paris to the biſhop of Bath that laie there for the king as legier.

Ambaſſadors into France.

Then theſe thrée went to the court, and ſaw the French king in perſon ſweare to kéepe the league & amitie concluded betwéene him & the king of England. Alſo the king ſent ſir Francis Poins knight ambaſſadour from him to Charles the emperour, and with him went Clarenceaux king of armes, to demand the one halfe of the treaſure and ordinance which was taken at Pauia, forſomuch as that warre was made as well at the kings charge as at the emperours. Alſo they were commanded to demand one of the French kings ſonnes, which lay in hoſtage with the emperour, that is to wit, the duke of Orleance to be deliuered to the king of England; and further that he ſhuld call backe his armie out of Italie. And if it were ſo that he refuſed theſe reaſonable requeſts, then ſhould they in the kings name denounce open warre againſt him. The Engliſh merchants liked the matter nothing at all, that there ſhould bée anie warres betwixt the emperour and the king of England. And where they were deſired by the cardinall to kéepe their marts at Calis, they would not aſſent thereto.

An ambaſſage to the emperor

¶ In this meane time great warres were managed betwéene the pope and other princes, amongeſt whom the duke of Burbon (of whom you haue heard often mention before in ſundrie actions) leuieng a great power, led the ſame towards Rome, and incamped within the medow néere to the citie, from whence with the inſolencie of a ſouldier hée ſent a trumpet to demand paſſage of the pope through the citie of Rome, to go with his armie to the realme of Naples. The morning following vpon the point of the daie, by the conſideration of his caſe and the aduerſities thereof, he found there remained no other hope for his affaires, than to be reſolute to reléeue the afflictions of his armie, and according to the opportunitie that was offered by the citie of Rome, either to die or to vanquiſh. In which reſolution puſhed on more and more by the murmurs and exclamations of his ſouldiers, in whom he could not diſcerne which was greater, either their inſolencies or their neceſſities, he drew néere the ſuburbs by the waie of the mounteine and Santo Spirito, where he began to giue a furious aſſault. Wherein he ſéemed to haue the fauour of fortune, who made him preſent his armie in more ſuertie by the benefit of a thicke miſt, which being riſen before daie, and increaſed with degrées of fog and thickneſſe, became ſuch a couer to his whole campe, that his ſouldiers were not diſcerned till they were néere the place where they began to giue the aſſault.

Abr.Fl. ex Guic.pag.1060 The duke of Burbon incampeth néere Rome.

The duke of Burbon through a laſt deſpaire of his eſtate aduanced before all his companies, either for that he had no other expectation of refuge, in caſe he returned not victorious, or elſe by his owne example he thought to call on with a greater courage the lanceknights who, it ſéemed went not reſolutelie to the ſeruice. But ſuch was his deſtinie to determine his life & his glorie togither, or rather ſuch the reward of his wilfull forwardnes, which for the moſt part heapeth wretched effects vpon ſuch as ſéeke not to accompanie their valour with counſell and diſcretion. In the beginning of the aſſault he was ſtriken with a bullet of an harquebuze, of which wound he fell downe dead to the earth, receiuing iuſtlie vpon his bodie and life the price of the action, which contrarie to all iuſtice and pietie he went about to execute. But much leſſe that his death did abate or diminiſh, ſéeing it did inflame and redouble the courage of his ſouldiers, who fighting with a woonderfull conſtancie the ſpace of two houres, made waie at laſt by their hands and weapons to enter the ſuburbs, wherin they were not onelie holpen by the weakneſſe of the rampires which were great and generall, but alſo they found helpe in the ſlender reſiſtance which the defendants made.

The morall of the foreſaid action worth the noting.

An experience of right good doctrine to ſuch as haue not as yet gotten by the benefit of examples paſt, the knowledge of things preſent, who in that “ action maie diſcerne what propertie of difference is “ betweene the vertue of ſouldiours exerciſed and trai“ ned in war, and armies newlie and haſtilie leuied,
“ and compounded of the multitude of a people more “ wilfull than ſkilfull; and by ſo much leſſe apt to be drawen vnder diſcipline, by how much more by their “ nature and cuſtome they are ſeldome conformable
“ to anie good order. For there was at the defenſe of the ſuburbs one part of the youth of Rome, vnder the enſignes of the people; notwithſtanding that manie of the Gebelins & faction of Colonno deſired, or at leaſt did not feare the victorie of the imperials. They hoped in regard of their faction, to receiue no harme or offenſe by the victors: the ſame being the cauſe whie they proceeded ſo coldlie in the defenſe. Neuertheleſſe, for that according to the rules of warre, it is a hard matter to take townes without artilleries, there died of the aſſailants, partlie by that want, and partlie through their wilfull forwardneſſe, about a a thouſand footmen; who hauing once by their valor made the waie open to enter in, all the defendants fled before them as men whoſe feare was far aboue anie other ſenſe or paſſion in them.

Rome taken and ſacked.

In which diſorder, ſome tooke the waie which his fortune and not his wit laid out for him: ſome in the aſtoniſhment ſeeking to flie, who durſt no more fight, were ſlaine by the enimie afore he could reſolue vpon the waie of his ſafetie; ſome either better prepared, or more happilie preſerued, found that ſafetie in running awaie, which they could not but doubt if they had longer endured the fight: and ſome with that reſolution which their preſent calamitie would ſuffer, ran by heapes towards the caſtell, where in place of reſcue they found a feare conformable to their owne: inſomuch as all things being reduced to confuſion and manifeſt flight, the ſuburbs were entierlie abandoned & left a preie to the victors. And the perſon of the pope, who expected with great deuotion in the palace of Vatican what would be the iſſue of the aſſault, hearing that the enimies were entred, had alſo (with the others) his paſſions of feare & frailtie, and in that timorous contemplation of his owne perill, he fled with certeine cardinalles to the caſtell.

The pope with certeine cardinals flie to the caſtell of ſaint Angelo.

His feare kept him from being reſolute in a perill that was ſo deſperate, neither did he thinke, that with the preſence and maieſtie of his perſon, though it was couered with the vaile of the higheſt dignitie on earth, he was able to put by the danger, which the valor and fidelitie of his ſouldiers could not defend with their weapons. There he conſulted with the cardinalles, whether it were more for his ſafetie to remaine there, or during the furie of the aſtoniſhment, to retire with the light horſſemen of his gard into ſome place of more ſuertie by the waie of Rome. But he, who was appointed by deſtinie, to be an example of the calamities that maie thunder vpon popes, and how fraile is the authoritie and maieſtie of that ſee, being certified by the relation of Berard de Padoa, who was fled from the armie imperiall, that the duke of Burbon was dead, and that the whole armie ſtanding abated in courage for the death of their capteine, deſired to come to accord with him. In which matter they ſent out men to parlee with the principalles there, he wretchedlie left there all his councelles to go awaie, both he and his capteins remaining no leſſe irreſolute in the prouiſions for defenſe, than they had beene ſlow in the expeditions.

So that the daie following, the Spaniards neither ſeeing order nor councell to defend the quarter beyond Tiber, entred the place without anie reſiſtance. And from thence, not finding anie impediments to ſtop their victorie, the ſame euening they entred the citie of Rome by the bridge Xiſto,; where, except ſuch as reapoſed in the confidence of their faction, and certeine cardinalles, who for that they bare a name to embrace the emperours quarrell, beleeued to find more ſuertie than the others, all the reſidue of the court and citie (as happeneth in accidents ſo furious) was conuerted into fleeing and confuſion. But the ſouldiours being within the citie, which they knew wanted nothing to make them right glorious, and well ſatiſfied of all things apperteining to their deſires, they began to omit no time to execute the thing they had ſo dearlie bought. Euerie one ran to pillage with the ſame vnbridled libertie, which in ſuch caſes maketh ſouldiors both inſolent and impious.

The Spaniards enter into Rome by the bridge Xiſto.

There was ſmall care or regard borne either to the name of freends, factions, or fauourers; and much leſſe was reſpected the authoritie of cardinalles and prelats, or dignitie of temples and monaſteries; and laſtlie, not reſerued from violation, the holie reliks brought thither from all parts of the world; yea euen things ſacred, and ſpeciallie dedicated, were profaned from their ſhrines and holie places, and made ſubiect to the furious wils and diſcretion of the ſouldiours. It is not onelie impoſſible to reaccount, but alſo to imagine the calamities of that citie raiſed to a wonderfull greatneſſe, and appointed by Gods ordinance to ſuffer manie fortunes and directions, hauing beene ſacked by the Goths within ix. C. and lxxx yeares. It is hard to particulate the greatneſſe of the preie, both for the generall wealth and riches which the greedie hands of the ſouldiours had made vp in heaps, and for other things more rare and pretious drawne out of the ſtore-houſes of merchants and courtiers. But the matter which made the ſpoile infinit in value, was the qualitie and great number of priſoners redeemed with moſt rich and huge ranſomes.

The reader is to tollerate the report of this hiſtorie though fauouring of ſuperſtition.

And to make vp a full tragedie of miſerie and infamie, the lanceknights being ſo much the more inſolent and cruell, by how much they bare hatred to the name of the church of Rome, tooke priſoners certeine prelats, whom with great contempt and indignitie they ſet vpon aſſes and leane mules, and with their faces reuerſed to the crowp of the beaſts, they led them thorough the citie of Rome, apparelled with the habits and markes of their dignitie: yea they paſſed manie of them to cruell torments, who either died in the furie of the action, or at leaſt with the painefulneſſe thereof they liued not long after, firſt yeelding a ranſome, and afterwards rendering their liues. The generall ſlaughter as well at the aſſault as in the rage of ſacking, was about foure thouſand bodies. All the palaces of the cardinalles were ſacked, except ſome particulars, who to ſaue the merchants that were retired thither with their goods, togither with the perſons and goods of manie others reſerued of the generall calamitie, made promiſe of great ſummes of monie. To whom notwithſtanding was vſed this iniquitie, that ſome of them that had compounded with the Spaniards, were afterwards ſacked by the lanceknights, or at leaſt conſtreined to a ſecond ranſome.

This ſpectacle could not but afford plentie of hart-greefe.

Compoſitions with the ſouldiours to ſaue certeine places vnſacked.

The ladie marqueſſe of Mantua compounded for hir palace for the ſumme of fiftie thouſand duckats, which were paied by the merchants and others retired thither: of which ſumme the rumor ran, that Ferrand hir ſonne had ten thouſand for his ſhare.

This ſpectacle could not but afford plentie of hart-gréefe.

Compoſitions with the ſouldiours to ſaue certeine places vnſacked.

The cardinall of Sienna dedicated in a perpetuall deuotion to the name of the emperor, after he had agréed with the Spaniards, as well for him ſelfe as for his palace, was afterwards made priſoner by the lanceknights, who made bootie and preie of his palace; and afterwards leading him all naked with buffets and baſtanadoes into the borough, he was driuen to redéeme his life out of their hands, with a promiſe of fiue thouſand duckats. The cardinalles Minerua and Ponſero paſſed vnder almoſt the like calamitie, who being priſoners to the lanceknights, were rated at a ranſome which they paied, after they had béene in a vile ſpectacle caried in proceſſion thorough the towne of Rome.

The ſhamefull and lamentable abuſe which the ſouldiors offered to the female ſex.

This furie of ſouldiours executed in a place of ſo great riches and profit, could endure no diſpenſation of anie ſort or qualitie of men, ſéeing the prelats and cardinalles, Spaniſh and Germans, who made themſelues aſſured that the ſouldiours of their nation would ſpare them from oppreſſion and taxation, were taken and paſſed by the ſame meaſure of miſerie and calamitie as others did. Right pitifull were the criengs and lamentations of the women of Rome: and no leſſe worthie of compaſſion, the calamitie of nunnes and virgins profeſſed, whom the ſouldiours rauiſhed by troopes out of their houſes to ſatiſfie their luſt, no age, no ſex, no dignitie or calling was frée from the violation of ſouldiours, in whom it was doubtfull whether bare more rule, the humor of crueltie to kill, or the appetite of luſt to deflowre, or laſtlie, the rage of couetouſneſſe to rob and ſpoile: yea in the violation of theſe women might be diſcerned a confirmation of the iudgements of God hidden from mortall men, for that he ſuffered to be deliuered vp to the vileneſſe of men, barbarous and blodie, the renowmed chaſtitie of women profeſſed and virgins.

To this compaſſion was ioined the infinite clamors of men forced againſt all law of humanitie, partlie to wreſt from them vnreaſonable ranſomes, and partlie to diſcloſe their goods which they had hidden from the rauine of the ſouldiors. All holie things, ſacraments and reliks of ſaints, whereof the churches were full, being deſpoiled of their ornaments, were pulled downe, and laid vpon the earth, ſuffring no ſmall prophanations, by the vile hands of the lanceknights. And whatſoeuer remained vpon the preies and ſpoilings of the imperialles, which were things but baſe and vile, were raked and caried awaie by the pezants and tenants of the lands of the Colonnois, whoſe inſolencie caried them into Rome during the generall furie. Onelie the cardinall of Colonno arriuing the daie after, preſerued in his compaſſion the honor of manie women that happilie were fled for reſcue into his houſe. The rumor went that the valuation and price of this ſacke in gold, ſiluer, and iewels, amounted to more than a millian of duckats, but the matter of ranſomes conteined a greater quantitie.]

The value of this ſacke in gold, ſiluer, and iewels.

When Rome was thus taken by the imperials, and the pope brought into captiuitie, therewith the king was ſo incenſed againſt the emperour by the inſtigation of the cardinall, that he had determined not to ſpare anie treaſure for the popes deliuerance. There roſe a ſecret brute in London that the kings confeſſor doctor Longland, and diuerſe other great clerks had told the king that the marriage betwéene him and the ladie Katharine, late wife to his brother prince Arthur was not lawfull: wherevpon the king ſhould ſue a diuorſe, and marrie the ducheſſe of Alanſon ſiſter to the French king at the towne of Calis this ſummer: and that the vicount Rochford had brought with him the picture of the ſaid ladie. The king was offended with thoſe tales, and ſent for ſir Thomas Seimor maior of the citie of London, ſecretlie charging him to ſée that the people ceaſſed from ſuch talke.

The kings marriage brought in queſtion.

But what ſo euer the commons talked, it was determined that the cardinall ſhould go ouer into France as high ambaſſadour for the king, and to take with him twelue ſcore thouſand pounds, to be emploied on the warres to be made by the confederats againſt the emperour, if he would not condeſcend to ſuch demands as the Engliſh ambaſſadours on the kings behalfe ſhould exhibit vnto him. The third of Iulie this triumphant cardinall paſſed thorough London with twelue hundred horſſe towards the ſea ſide, and comming vnto Canturburie reſted there, and there declared to the people what had chanced vnto the pope, and cauſed the monks of Chriſtes church to ſing their Letanie after this maner: Sancta Maria ora pro Clemente papa, &c. Then he exhorted the people to faſt and praie for the popes deliuerance, accordinglie as he had alreadie ſent commiſſions vnto all the biſhops within the realme to follow that order, which was to faſt thrée daies in the wéeke, and to vſe in euerie pariſh ſolemne proceſſions. The eleuenth of Iulie the cardinall tooke ſhipping at Douer, and landed the ſame daie at Calis, from whenſe he departed the two and twentith of Iulie, and with him was the biſhop of London Cutbert Tunſtall, the lord Sands chamberleine to the king, the earle of Derbie, ſir Henrie Guilford, ſir Thomas Moore, with manie other knights and eſquiers, in all to the number of twelue hundred horſſe, and of carriages there were foure ſcore wagons, and thrée ſcore mules and ſumpter horſſes.

The cardinall goeth ambaſſadour into France.

A proceſſion. A new deuiſed letanie.

He that is deſirous to vnderſtand with what honour this triumphant cardinall was receiued in all places as he paſſed thorough Picardie by order giuen by the French king, maie read thereof at large in the chronicles of maiſter Edward Hall. At Amiens he was receiued by the French king himſelfe, and by his mother with all other chéefe péeres of France. There was nothing forgot that might doo him honour or pleaſure. But to the effect of his buſineſſe. After he had ſhewed his commiſſion, they fell in councell, and in the end grew to a full concluſion of a league to be accorded and eſtabliſhed betwixt the kings of England and France: the couenants and articles whereof were drawne and written vp in a faire charter, which was ſealed in ſolemne wiſe, and deliuered vnto the cardinals by the kings owne hand.

The cardinall is honourablie receiued by the Frēch king.

A league betwéene England and France.

After this, it was agréed, that Odet de Fois, commonlie called monſieur de Lawtrech, ſhould go into Italie with a puiſſant armie to procure the popes deliuerance, & expell the emperours power out of all the partie of Italie, if he refuſed ſuch reaſonable offers & articles of agréement as were drawen, & ſhould be exhibited to him. In this armie went ſir Robert Jerningham, & Iohn Carew of Hakam, & 80 other Engliſh gentlemen which were ſent by the cardinall from Amiens. When the armie was aſſembled, the cardinall deliuered the monie which he had brought out of England with him in barrels, with the which the armie was paid two moneths before hand, & the ſurpluſage was deliuered to ſir Robert Jerningham, which was called treaſuror of the wars. This armie was called in Latine, Exercitus Angliæ & Gallorum regum pro pontifice Romano liberando congregatus, that is to ſaie, The armie of the kings of England and France, gathered for the deliuerance of the biſhop of Rome: and ſo was it reputed.

In this meane time the Engliſh ambaſſadors, ſir Francis Poins and Clarenceaux the herald, were come into Spaine, and there to the emperour in the towne of Vale Doliſſe the firſt of Iulie deliuered the kings letters, and further declared their meſſage as they had in commandement. The emperor made to them a courteous anſwer for that time, and ſaid he would take counſell in the matter, and then ſhuld they receiue further anſwer, and in the meane time they might repoſe them. Within a daie or two after he called to him doctor Lee that was the kings ambaſſadour legier there with him, & the ſaid ſir Francis Poins, and ſaid to them; My lords we haue perceiued the king your maiſters demands, which are weightie and of great importance. Wherefore we intend with all ſpeed to write to the king our vncle, and when we haue receiued anſwer from him, we ſhall deliuer you of ſuch things as you require, praieng you in the meane time to take patience.

The emperour protracted time of purpoſe, bicauſe he was loth to anſwer directlie to ſuch grieuous and moſt irkeſome complaints, bicauſe he geſſed by the courſe of things that the French king would ſhortlie be conſtrained to agree to thoſe conditions of peace, which he at the firſt had offered. But the French king & the cardinall being togither at Amiens, amongſt other things determined there betwixt them in counſell, deuiſed further what articles of offer ſhould be ſent to the emperour, which if he refuſed, then open defiance to be made vnto him in name of both the kings. The articles were theſe in effect.

Articles propoſed to the emperor being in number fifteene.

1 Firſt that the French king ſhould paie for his ranſome 25000 crownes: one writer calleth it two millians. 2 Alſo that he ſhould releaſe all the penſion that he had in Naples, with all the right of the ſame. 3 Alſo that he ſhould neuer claime title to the dutchie of Millane. 4 Alſo he ſhould releaſe the ſuperioritie of Flanders for euer, and the right which he had to the citie of Torneie. 5 Alſo he ſhould releaſe all the homages of all perſons within thoſe countries. 6 Alſo to withdraw his armie out of Italie. 7 Alſo to forſake the aid of the Switzers againſt the emperour. 8 Alſo to take no more part with Robert de la March againſt the emperor. 9 Alſo neuer to aid the king of Nauarre againſt him, although he had maried the kings ſiſter. 10 Alſo neuer to aid the duke of Gelderland, nor to chalenge the ſame dutchie. 11 Alſo to aid the emperor with ſhips and men to his coronation. 12 Alſo to marie the ladie Elenor queene of Portugall ſiſter to the emperor. 13 Alſo that the Dolphine ſhould marie the ſaid queenes daughter. 14 Alſo that if the French king had anie children male by the ſaid queene, then the dutchie of Burgognie to remaine to the ſaid child being male. 15 Alſo that the French king ſhould be freend to the emperour & his freends, and enimie to his enimies.

Articles ſent to ẏ Engliſh ambaſſadors in Spaine.

Theſe with manie other articles, which were not openlie knowne, were ſent to the biſhop of Tarbe, and to the vicount of Thuraine ambaſſadours with the emperour from the French king. Other articles were alſo ſent to the Engliſh ambaſſadours being in Spaine, as to mooue the emperour to ſome reaſonable end with the French king: and that the king of England would releaſe vnto him all the ſummes of monie due to him, as well by the emperour Maximilian his grandfather as himſelfe, and take the French king as debtor for the ſame. If he would not agree to theſe offers, then was it accorded, that the French king ſhould marrie the ladie Marie daughter to the king of England, and they both to be enimies to the emperour. When all theſe things were concluded, the cardinall tooke his leaue of the French king & his moother, and with great rewards returned, comming to Richmond, where the king then laie, the laſt of September.

The cardinall returneth out of France.

Ambaſſadors from the French king.

In October, there came ambaſſadours from the French king into England, the lord Annas de Montmerancie, great maiſter of the ſaid French kings houſe, the biſhop of Baion cheefe preſident of Rone, and monſieur de Humiers accompanied with ſixtie gentlemen well appointed. Theſe ambaſſadours were receiued with all honour that might be deuiſed. On Alhallowes daie the king comming to the cathedrall church of ſaint Paule, where the cardinall ſang maſſe, ſware before the high altar in the preſence of the French ambaſſadours to keepe and performe the league. On ſundaie the tenth of Nouember, the king being elected knight of the order of S. Michaell, receiued at Greenewich the ſaid order by the hands of the great maiſter of France, and monſieur Humiers that were companions of the ſame order: in like caſe as the French king the ſame daie at Paris receiued the order of the garter by the hands of the lord Liſle, doctor Tailor maiſter of the rolles, ſir Nicholas Carew knight maiſter of the kings horſſes, ſir Anthonie Browne knight, and ſir Thomas Wriotheſleie knight, otherwiſe called Garter king of armes, the which were ſent thither with the whole habit, collar, and other habillements of the order as apperteined.

The king of England receiueth the order of ſaint Michaell.

The French king receiueth the order of the garter.

After that the French ambaſſadors had beene highlie feaſted, banketed, and interteined, with all honor and paſtime conuenient, the great maiſter and all his companie tooke leaue of the king, and with great rewards returned into France, leauing the biſhop of Baion behind them, who abode ambaſſador legier in England. In this moneth of Nouember, Arthur Bilneie, Geffreie Lome, and one Garret that ſpake againſt the popes authoritie, were abiured by the cardinall. ¶By reaſon of the great wet that fell in the ſowing time of the corne, and in the beginning of the laſt yeare, now in the beginning of this, corne ſo failed, that in the citie of London for a while bread was ſcant, by reaſon that commiſſioners appointed to ſee order taken in ſhires about, ordeined that none ſhould be conueied out of one ſhire into an other.

Bilneie and other abiured.

Which order had like to haue bred diſorder, for that euerie countrie and place was not prouided alike, and namelie London, that maketh hir prouiſion out of other places, felt great inconuenience hereby, till the merchants of the Stiliard, and others out of the Dutch countries, brought ſuch plentie, that it was better cheape in London than in anie other part of England, for the king alſo releeued the citizens in time of their need with a thouſand quarters by waie of lone of his owne prouiſion. The ſcarſitie at the firſt was more than the dearth. For in the beginning of their want, wheat was onelie at fifteene ſhillings a quarter, & from thence it roſe to twentie ſhillings, and after to ſix and twentie ſhillings eight pence the quarter, till remedie by outward prouiſion was procured and had. In this meane while the lord Lautrech with his armie was entred into Italie, where how he ſped, and what came of that expedition, ye ſhall find in the hiſtories of France and Italie, and therefore in this place I paſſe it ouer. Sir Francis Poins knight, in the end of December, returned out of Spaine into England, leauing Clarenceaux behind him to bring further anſwer.

Dearth of corne in London and elſewhere.

The emperor releaſeth 12 preiudiciall articles to the French king.

The emperour at the requeſt of this ſir Francis Poins, who made the ſame in name of his maiſter the king of England, was contented to releaſe twelue articles, which were reputed moſt preiudiciall to the French king, onelie to gratifie the king of England: but the cardinall kept the king ſtill in diſpleaſure toward the emperor, for the fauour which he bare to the French king, whoſe onelie purpoſes he ſought to aduance. The articles which were drawne at Amiens when the cardinall was there, were exhibited to the emperor by the French ambaſſadors, and bicauſe he refuſed the ſame, word was ſent to Clarenceaux king of armes, to make defiance to the emperor. Where vpon on the wednesdaie the two and twentith of Ianuarie, Guien king of armes to the French king, and Clarenceaux king of armes to the king of England, being in the citie of Burges in Spaine, came to the court of Charles the elect emperour, about nine of the clocke in the morning, and there did requeſt of his maieſtie, that it would pleaſe him to appoint them an houre of audience.

The emperor commeth at the houre of audience.

The lord de Chaour by ordinance from his maieſtie gaue them anſwer, that it ſhould be about ten of the clocke before noone the ſame daie. And at the ſame houre his maieſtie came into the great hall of his court accompanied with diuerſe prelats, dukes, marqueſſes, earles, barons, and other great lords and good perſonages, of diuerſe nations of his kingdome and ſeigniories in great number. The emperour ſitting in a chaire prepared according to his dignitie, the two kings of armes of France & England being in the nether end of the hall, holding vpon their left arms each one his coat of armes, did make three ſolemne reuerences accuſtomed, with knee to the ground. And when they were at the loweſt ſtaire before his imperiall maieſtie, Clarenceaux king of armes of England, hauing the words in both their names, ſpake as followeth.

The words of Clarenceaux king of armes to the emperor.

Sir, following the three edicts inuiolablie kept and obſerued by your predeceſſors emperours of Rome, kings, princes, and capteins, Guien king of armes of the moſt chriſtened king; and alſo Clarenceaux king of armes to the king of England our ſoueraigne & naturall lords: we preſenting our ſelues before your ſacred maieſtie, for to declare certeine things from the ſaid kings our maiſters: beſeech your maieſtie, that hauing regard to the ſaid lawes according to your benignitie and mercie, that it would pleaſe you to giue vs ſure acceſſe and good intreating in your countries, lands, and ſeigniories, attending your anſwer, with ſure conduct to returne vnto the countries, lands, and ſeigniories of our ſaid ſoueraigne lords. The emperour then bad them ſaie on whatſoeuer the kings your maiſters haue giuen you in charge: your priuileges ſhall be kept, none ſhall doo you anie diſpleaſure within my kingdomes or territories. After this, Guien read a writing ſigned with the hand of the ſaid Guien king of armes.

The emperor giueth the heralds libertie to ſpeake.

A copie of the ſaid writing read as followeth.

SIr, the moſt chriſtened king my ſoueraigne and naturall lord hath commanded me to ſaie to you, that he hath conceiued a maruellous greefe and diſpleaſure of that, that in place of amitie, which he ſo much deſired to haue with you, the former enmitie in full force ſtill remaineth. By the which he ſeeth and perceiueth, that the euils and inconuenie̱nces long ſince begun, ſhall continue and augment, not onelie vnto you, and vnto him, with your vaſſals and ſubiects, but alſo vnto all chriſtendome: and that the forces and youths which the one and the other ought to emploie againſt the enimies of the faith, ſhall be ſpent to the effuſion of chriſtian bloud, and in offenſe vnto God; and that you and he endowed with ſo manie gratious gifts, ſhall not inioy the benefits, which it pleaſed the ſon of God to leaue to vs, by his teſtament, which is peace, whereof all goodneſſe proceedeth; and in place of the ſame ſhall haue war, wherof foloweth all calamities, dangers, inconueniences, pouerties, and miſeries.

Heerewith you ſhall ſubmit your ſelfe vnto them whome yee may command, and ſhall hazard the bloud and ſubſtance of your ſubiects in the purſſes of ſtrangers. Euerie one as for himſelfe ought to haue regard thereto, and for the ſhort time that we haue here to liue, not to go about to depriue himſelfe of that tranquillitie, ioy, good regard and paſtime, that the princes may haue by peace: and by following the warre, to be in pouertie, heauineſſe, and hazard of loſſe of goods, honours, and liues: and that worſt is, after they haue had euill daies in this world, to be in danger of eternall paine in the world to come, thorough them that haue beene the cauſe thereof, and that would not yeeld vnto reaſon.

The inconueniences of warre mooued to ÿ emperor.

The king my ſoueraigne lord is readie to put himſelfe for his part in all deuoir, and more than ſo, to haue peace and amitie with you: and by this meanes peace ſhall be procured throughout all chriſtendome, whereby men might doo God good ſeruice, in making warre on the Infidels, which will be ſo thankfull to him, that it will put off the puniſhment of faults, which haue beene committed heeretofore by reaſon of the warres, which haue too long indured betweene you two, and not yet like to ceaſſe, conſidering the termes which you hold and ſeeke to mainteine; ſith on the one part, certeine aduowing themſelues on you, haue aſſailed and taken by force the citie of Rome, which is the place of the holie and apoſtolike ſee, where they haue committed and done all the miſcheefe that might be deuiſed.

The churches and reliſkes were prophaned, the pope holding ſaint Peters ſeat, as vicar of God on earth, taken and put out of his libertie. By meanes whereof, they that haue committed and executed the ſaid execrable deeds and wickedneſſe, with their authors and fautors, be fallen and run in paines of right; and they that hold them captiues, beare themſelues on you; and he that dooth keepe them, hath beene and is of the principall capteins, of whome you haue beene ſerued in your warres in Italie and other parts. And on the other ſide, the difference which at this time reſteth betweene you and the king my ſoueraigne and naturall lord, is principallie vpon the ranſome and recouerie of the princes his ſonnes, which you hold for hoſtages of the ſame. He hath oftentimes offered, and yet dooth offer to paie to you, and giue to you, not onelie that which may be ſaid to be reaſonable, and in ſuch caſes accuſtomed, but alſo more largelie.

The herald proſecuteth the ſtate of Rome & the pope in lamentable ſort.

You ought not to ſtand vpon things which by force and conſtraint he hath promiſed, the which iuſtlie and honeſtlie he maie not performe nor accompliſh: you had a great deale more gained, to haue taken the ſaid ranſome which was offered vnto you, than to continue the warre, and to giue occaſion of all the euils and inconueniences that dailie happen thereby thorough chriſtendome. You ſee the king of England, with whome he hath brotherlie amitie for euer, and alſo the Venetians, Florentines, and duke of Bar, and other princes and potentats, following and holding the partie of the ſaid chriſtian king, for that they ſee he yeeldeth to reaſon, and by reaſon you will not thereto incline, the vniuerſall peace can not be concluded in chriſtendome. The enimies of the faith gaine countries: all Italie is in armes, bloud and rapine, and the apoſtolicall ſee in trouble: ſo that if on your part you ſeeke not remedie, and that things doo thus continue as they haue begun, it is to be feared that God will be angrie.

The herald mooueth the emperor with the king of Englands example, &c.

And for as much (ſir) as to the declarations which the aboue ſaid princes haue offered vnto you, and the preſentations which the ſaid chriſtian king hath made vnto you, you haue refuſed to giue eare, thereby to come to ſome accord with him, and to content your ſelfe with a ranſome more than reaſonable: alſo for that

The herald commmeth to the verie drift of his meſſage.

that you will not render vnto his good brother, perpetuall alie and confederat, the king of England, that which is his, ſet the pope at libertie, and leaue Italie in peace and tranquillitie, he hath commanded me to declare, ſignifie, and notifie vnto you, his great greefe and diſpleaſure, with his ſaid good brother the king of England, that they will hold and take you for their enimie, declaring all maner of treaties and couenants heretofore paſſed betweene them and you, in all that concerneth your profit & vtilitie to be nothing, and that for his part he will not obſerue nor keepe the ſame.

What the king of Englãd deſireth of the emperour in the French kings behalfe.

Naie he hath reſolued by all meanes that he may imagine with his good freends, alies, & confederats, & with all his forces to indamage you, your countries, lands, and vaſſals by warre, or otherwiſe, in ſuch ſort as he maie deuiſe, vntill the time that you haue reſtored vnto him his children, with honeſt meanes and couenants touching his ranſome, deliuered the pope, rendered vnto the king of England that you hold of him, and acquited the ſumme which you owe him, and ſuffer his alies and confederats to liue in peace, reſt, and tranquillitie, and proteſteth before God and all the world, that he doth not wiſh nor deſire the warre, but that it wholie diſpleaſeth him, and is not therefore the cauſe of the euill that is or maie come thereof, conſidering that he hath put, and will put himſelfe vnto all reaſon, as he hath offered and ſignified vnto you and to all other chriſtian princes, and yet doth.

The king of Englands meaning and the French kings for the returne of the emperours ſubiects out of their countries, and contrariwiſe.

And of all this he calleth God (who knoweth all things) to witneſſe. And for that vnder colour of the publication of the pretended tretie of Madrill made, he being yet priſoner in Spaine, diuerſe of your ſubiects, and of them of the king of Englands, and of his haue carried their merchandizes and other goods into the kingdomes, ſtreicts, and ſeignories the one of the other, whereby maie inſue great damages, if of them no mention ſhould be made in this preſent declaration and ſignification: my ſouereigne lord and the ſaid king of England be contented that libertie be giuen vnto all ſubiects being in the ſaid kingdomes, countries, ſtreicts, and ſeignories, to retire and depart from thence with all their goods and merchandizes within fortie daies after this intimation made. Prouided that you ſhall doo the like vnto their ſubiects in all & euerie their merchandizes. Giuen the eleuenth daie of Nouember 1527, & ſigned Guien king of armes.

The emperors words to Guien the French kings herald.

The emperour after the defiance giuen by Guien, ſpake in this ſort: I doo vnderſtand that which you haue read from the king your maiſter, & I doo much maruell why he doth defie me, for he being my priſoner by right warre, and I hauing his faith by reaſon he can not doo it. It is vnto me a noueltie to be defied of him, ſeeing it is ſix or ſeuen yeares that he hath warred againſt me, and yet giuen me no defiance. And ſith that by the grace of God I haue defended my ſelfe from him (as he hath ſeene, and euerie one elſe) without that he hath giuen me anie warning, or conſidering the reaſon and iuſtification whereon I doo reſt my ſelfe, for the which I thinke I haue not otherwiſe deſerued towards God: I hope that at this time now you aduertiſe me of it, being aduertiſed I ſhall defend my ſelfe the better, in ſuch ſort that the king your maiſter ſhall doo me no hurt: for ſith he doth defie me, I am halfe aſſured.

How the emperor was affectioned for the pope in his captiuitie.

And touching that which you ſpake of the pope, none hath beene more ſorrowfull than I of that which was doone, and it was without my knowledge or commandement: and that which hath beene doone, was doone by vnrulie people, without obedience to anie of my capteins. And yet I aduertiſe you, that the pope long ſince is ſet at libertie, and yeſterdaie I had certeine newes of it. And touching the ſonnes of your maiſter, he knoweth that I haue them for pledges; and alſo my lords his ambaſſadors know well, that the fault hath not lien in me that they haue not beene deliuered. And as for that of the king of England my good brother and vncle, I beleeue if it be ſo as you doo ſay, that he is not well informed of things paſſed: and if he were, yet could I not ſaie as your writing conteineth, I deſire to ſend him my reaſons for to aduertiſe him of all the truth. And I beleeue when he ſhall know it, that he will be vnto me as he hath beene.

The emperor ſeemeth loth to incur the K. of Englands diſpleaſure.

I neuer denied the monie which I borowed of him, and I am readie to paie it as by reaſon & right I am bound: and thanked be God I haue enough to doo it. Neuertheleſſe, if he will make warre againſt me, it will be to my great diſpleaſure, & I cannot but defend my ſelfe. I praie to God that he giue me no more occaſion than I thinke I haue giuen vnto him. And to the reſt, for that your writing is great, and the paper ſheweth it ſelfe to be gentle, ſeeing that they haue written what they would, you ſhall giue me the writing, whereby more particularlie I maie anſwer in another paper, wherein ſhall be nothing but truth. This anſwer being made by his maieſtie with his owne mouth vnto Guien king of armes, the ſaid Guien tooke his cote of armes that he had on his left arme (as before is ſaid) and put it on, and then Clarenceaux king of armes of England, ſaid vnto his maieſtie, not by writing, but by mouth, as followeth.

The Engliſh heralds meſſage deliuered by word of mouth.

SIr, the king my ſouereigne lord hath commanded me to ſay vnto you, that ſeeing the neceſſitie of peace in the chriſtian religion, as well by reaſon of the inforcements manie yeers paſt, begun by the great Turke enimie vnto our faith, which by force of armes hath taken awaie from the chriſtians the citie and Ile of Rhodes, one of the principall bulworks of chriſtendome, and in Hungarie the fortreſſe of Belgrad, and part of the countrie there, as alſo by hereſies and new ſects, of late riſen in diuerſe places of chriſtendome; and likewiſe knowing the great warres being kindled in all parts, by meanes of which all chriſtendome is in trouble, confuſion, and maruellous diuiſion, and not long ſince by your people and miniſters and ſouldiers in your armie, and vnder your capteins the holie citie of Rome hath beene ſacked and robbed, the perſon of our holie father the pope taken priſoner, and kept by your people, the cardinals likewiſe taken and put to ranſome, the churches robbed, biſhops, prieſts, and people of religion put to the ſword, and ſo manie other euils, cruelties, and inhumane facts committed by your people, that the aire and the land are infected therewith.

The report of the herald falleth out iuſtifiable by Guicciardines diſcourſe, lib. 18.

And it is verie like, that God is verrie greatlie ſtirred and prouoked vnto ire. And to ſpeake after the maner of men, if by amendment it be not pacified, innumerable euils and inconueniences ſhall happen vnto all chriſtendome. And for that the root and increaſement of the ſaid warre, proceedeth of the contentions and debates betweene you, and the moſt chriſtened king his good brother and perpetuall alie: to make an end of which debates, the king my ſouereigne lord hath ſent his ambaſſadors and others, vnto the moſt chriſtened king his good brother, with whome he hath doone ſo much, that for the loue that he hath borne him, he hath made vnto you ſo great offers, and ſo reaſonable, that you cannot, nor ought reaſonablie to refuſe them, as conditions and offers for his ranſome exceeding the ranſome accuſtomed of all kings. And if in this, the conſideration of peace had not beene, an euill example might thereof grow for other kings and chriſtened princes ſubiect vnto the like fortune.

The king of England fauoured the French king.

The herald vſeth an argument drawne from benefits receiued to mooue the emperour.

Of which offers and conditions he hath likewiſe aduertiſed you by his ambaſſadours, praied and beſought you for the honour of God, and the wealth of all chriſtendome, for the benefits and pleaſures that he hath doone vnto you diuerſe waies, and that in time of your great need, that it would pleaſe you to accept the ſaid offers, and make an end of the ſaid warres, that haue too long endured. Likewiſe as a chriſtened prince bound to the protection of the pope, and ſee apoſtolike, and conſequentlie to the deliuerance of his holineſſe (whom you cannot, nor ought to keepe priſoner without great offenſe) that you would reſtore his holineſſe vnto a full and entier libertie. Alſo he hath oftentimes ſhewed by diuerſe obligations, and other meanes, how you are indebted vnto him in diuerſe great ſummes of monie, that he hath giuen and lent you in your neceſſitie, requiring you to make paiment.

Of all which things you haue made no account from time to time, but deferred it, and held in ſuſpenſe the ambaſſadours of the king my ſouereigne, without hauing regard to Gods honour, and the neceſſitie of all chriſtendome, and the reuerence that ye ought to haue vnto the holie ſeate and perſon of our holie father the pope, the vicar of God on earth, or vnto the pleaſures that you haue receiued of him, or vnto your faith and promiſe that you ſo oftentimes haue made. And for this cauſe the king my ſaid ſouereigne, by honeſt reaſon and iuſtice conſtreined, by great and ripe deliberation of his councell, hoping for a finall concluſion, hath cauſed againe to be preſented offers more large and to greater aduantage than the others before, to put you in deuoir, and to auoid and take awaie all occaſion to deferre and diſſemble to come to reaſon.

The herald of England ſheweth the emperour what is the king of Englands preſent determination if his offers be refuſed.

Which offers, and the augmenting of the ſame, haue beene made and made againe, with all demonſtrations and honeſt reſons that haue beene poſſible, And in the end there hath beene made vnto you inſtance for the deliuerie of our holie father, whom you haue reſtreined or cauſed to be reſtreined in place of deliuerie, which is verie ſtrange, & againſt the true eſtate & dutie of a chriſtian prince. So that the king my ſouereigne, & the moſt chriſtian king his brother and perpetuall alie, can no longer indure it with their honours and dutie towards God and the church. And ſeeing you will not condeſcend to reaſon, nor accept the ſaid offers being more than reaſonable, nor ſatiſfie the king my ſaid ſouereigne of the debts by you due, as you are bound, he hath concluded with the ſaid moſt chriſtened king his good brother & perpetuall alie, & other of his confederats, to doo his endeuour to conſtreine you by force & might of armes to deliuer our holie father, & likewiſe the children of France, whom you hold, in paieng you a reaſonable ranſome, and to ſatiſfie him of that you owe him.

The diſpoſition of the king of England to the pope and the French king.

Therefore the king my ſouereigne lord, as a true and conſtant prince, willing to keepe inuiolablie his faith, which he hath promiſed vnto the ſaid chriſtian prince and other his alies, and not willing to leaue the perſon of our ſaid holie father the pope in captiuitie, as alſo will not the ſaid chriſtian king: they two doo ſummon you at this time for all, to accept theſe laſt offers, for the deliuerance of the ſaid children of France, and for the wealth of an vniuerſall peace, & to deliuer the perſon of our ſaid holie father, & alſo to paie ſpeedilie and without anie more delaie, the debts by you due vnto the king my ſouereigne. And if you refuſe theſe finall offers, and alſo to deliuer the perſon of our ſaid holie father, and paie the ſaid debtes, as a good chriſtian prince and louer of peace is bound to doo; the king my ſouereigne, and the ſaid chriſtian king his good brother, not without great ſorrow and diſpleaſure, doo declare to be your enimies, and ſo hereafter doo hold and repute you for ſuch one, denouncing vnto you warre by ſea and land, and defieng you with all their forces.

The defiance intimated to the emperor by the herald of England.

Neuertheleſſe, conſidering that there be diuerſe of your ſubiects, and great quantitie of their goods in the realmes of England and France, and other lands & lordſhips of the ſaid princes: likewiſe there be diuerſe of the ſubiects of the kings of England and France, and of their goods in your kingdomes, countries, lands, and lordſhips, the which may receiue aſwell of the one part as of the other, great and vnrecouerable hurts and damages, if without aduertiſements and monition they ſhould be taken and deteined, the kings maieſtie my ſouereigne, and the moſt chriſtian king of France his good brother be willing that libertie be giuen vnto your ſubiects being in their kingdomes, countries, and lordſhips, for to retire and depart with all their goods and merchandize, within fourtie daies after this intimation, ſo that the like libertie and permiſſion be in like ſort granted to their ſubiects. ¶ To this defiance of the king at armes of England the emperours maieſtie did anſwer in theſe words.

Libertie granted to the emperors ſubiects in England and France to returne to their owne countries, and the like demanded on the contrarie part.

The emperours anſwer to the Engliſh heralds oration.

I Doo vnderſtand that which you haue declared, and I cannot thinke that if the king of England were throughlie aduertiſed of things as they haue paſſed, and of the reaſon to which I haue yeelded, he would not ſaie that which you haue ſaid, and therefore mine intention is to aduertiſe him. As to that which you ſpake of the pope, I was neuer conſenting to his deſtruction, which was neuer doone by my commandement: & I giue you to vnderſtand, that he is deliuered, and I am ſorie for the harmes that were doone at the time when he was taken, of the which I take my ſelfe not to be in fault, as I haue told the king at armes of France. And as to the deliuerance of the French kings ſons, where means haue beene made for their deliuerance, I haue beene readie to giue eare thereto, and the fault reſteth not in me, for that the peace hath not beene concluded.

The emperors modeſtie in this point notable.

But now that yea tell me that the king your maiſter will force me to deliuer them, I will anſwer thereto in other ſort than hitherto I haue doone, and I truſt to keepe them in ſuch wiſe, that by force I ſhall not need to deliuer them: for I am not accuſtomed to be forced in things which I doo. As to the debt which the king of England hath lent me, I haue neuer denied it, neither doo I denie it, but am readie to paie it as right requireth, as I haue cauſed it to be declared vnto him, and I my ſelfe haue ſhewed no leſſe to his ambaſſadors, and deliuered my ſaieng by writing, and I cannot beleeue, that for ſuch things (which I refuſe not to accompliſh) he will make war againſt me, and if he will ſo doo it will grieue me, but yet I muſt defend my ſelfe: and I praie God that the king your maiſter giue me not greater occaſion to make him war, than I haue giuen him. You ſhall deliuer me in writing, that which you haue ſaid, to the which I will anſwer by writing particularlie.

This anſwer made by the emperour to the king of armes Clarenceaux, the ſaid Clarenceaux tooke his coat of armes, which he had lieng on his left arme, The Engliſh herald is cōmanded by the emperour to leaue his oration behind him in writing.

arme (as before is ſaid) and put it vpon him. The emperour herewith commanded him to deliuer by writing into the hands of the lord of Buclans all that he had vttered by word of mouth, as is aboue expreſſed. Which Clarenceaux promiſed to doo, & ſo he did afterwards, ſigned with his owne hand, word for word. Clarenceaux hauing thus doone his dutie, incontinentlie withdrew: but before his departure, the lord of Buclans ſaid to him, and alſo to Guien, theſe words inſuing. Behold here this writing in my hand, conteining the articles of the compoſition betwéene the emperour and the pope.

Guic.pag.1085 Accord betwéene the pope & the emperours agents.

¶That the pope ſhould be no partie againſt the emperour, neither in the affaires of Millaine, nor in the kingdome of Naples. That he ſhould accord vnto the emperour the croiſade in Spaine, and a tenth of the reuenues eccleſiaſtike through all his dominions. That to aſſure the obſeruation of theſe things, Oſtia ſhould remaine in the hands of the emperour, and Ciuita Vecchia which Andrea Dore had left to him before. That he ſhould aſſigne ouer to him Ciuita Caſtellana, a towne which had refuſed to receiue the imperials, Mario Peruſquo procuror of the fiſke being entred within the rocke by ſecret commiſſion from the pope, notwithſtanding he made ſemblance of the contrarie. That he ſhould alſo deliuer ouer to him the rocke of Furlie, and to put into his hands for oſtages Hyppolito and Alexander his nephues, and till they were come from Parma the emperour to be poſſeſſed of the cardinals Piſani, Triuulco, and Gaddi, whome they led to the realme of Naples.

Heauie paiments for the pope to diſcharge.

Furthermore, that he ſhould make preſent paiment to the lanceknights of thrée ſcore thouſand ducates, and to the Spaniards thirtie & fiue thouſand. That in ſo dooing they ſhould let him come out at libertie with all the cardinals, and they to go out of Rome and out of the caſtell, alwaies interpreting to libertie when ſoeuer they ſhould be conueied in ſafetie to Orbietto, Spoletto, or Perouſa. That within fiftéene daies after his going out of Rome he ſhould paie the like quantitie of monie to the lanceknights, and afterwards the reſidue within thrée moneths to the Spaniards & lanceknights iointlie, according to their ſhares and portions. Which reſidue togither with the ſummes paid amounted to more than thrée hundred and fiftie thouſand ducats.]

This is the true copie (ſaid the lord of Buclans) of the capitulation, made touching the deliuerance of the pope, and how he is deliuered, and departed from caſtell ſaint Angelo, the tenth of December laſt paſt: put it in your relation. The ſaid king of armes anſwered; We will ſo doo: and ſo for that time they parted. ¶ Here, bicauſe mention is made of the popes deliuerance out of priſon, it ſhall not be amiſſe to ſet downe the maner thereof as it is reported by Guicciardine. All things hauing their orderlie expedition, & the reſolution ſet downe, that the tenth of December the Spaniards ſhould accompanie him into a place of ſuertie, he fearing ſome variation either for the ill mind which he knew don Hugo bare to him, or for anie other accident that might happen, the night before he ſtale ſecretlie out of the caſtell in the cloſing of the euening, diſguiſed in the attire of a merchant. Lewis de Gonſaguo who was in the paie of the emperour, taried for him in the medowes with a ſtrong companie of harquebuziers, and with that gard did accompanie him to Montfalcon, where diſmiſſing almoſt all his bands of footmen, he was led by the ſame Lewis euen to Orbietto, into which citie he entred by night without the companie of anie one cardinall. An example worthie of conſideration, and perhaps neuer happened ſince the church was great, that a pope ſhould in that ſort fall from ſo great a puiſſance and reuerence, his eies to behold the loſſe and ſacke of Rome, his perſon to be turned ouer into captiuitie, and his whole eſtate reduced to the diſpoſing of an other, and within few moneths after, to be reſtored & eſtabliſhed in his former greatneſſe. So great towards princes chriſtian is the authoritie of the pope, and the reſpect which mortall men doo beare to him.]

Guic.pag.1085 The maner of the popes going out of priſon.

The emperors words to the French herald.

At the ſame inſtant that the heralds were at the emperors court, the emperour called before him the ſaid Guien king at armes of France, and ſaid to him as followeth. Sith it is reaſon that you enioy your priuileges, you ought alſo to doo your dutie; and therefore I praie you declare to your maiſter, yea euen to his owne perſon that which I ſhall tell you, which is this: that ſince the treatie of Madrill contrarie to the ſame, diuerſe of my ſubiects haue béene taken going about their buſineſſes, and other alſo going to ſerue me in Italie, which haue béene deteined priſoners, euill intreated, and by force thruſt into the gallies: and bicauſe I haue of his ſubiects the which I might likewiſe take, yée ſhall aduertiſe him, that if he deliuer vnto me mine, I will deliuer his; if not, as he ſhall intreat mine, I will intreat his; and that he ſend me anſwer hereof within fortie daies: if not, I will take the refuſall for an anſwer.

This the emperor inferreth to iuſtifie his owne dealings by waie of compariſon

The king of armes Guien aſked if his maieſtie ment this concerning the merchants? Wherevnto the emperor anſwered: This is beſide that which is conteined in your writing, touching the merchants, to which point (ſaid he) I will anſwer by writing. And herewith Guien making thrée obeiſances, ſaid; Sir I will gladlie doo it. Then ſaid the emperor, Tell the king your maiſter further, that I beléeue that he hath not béene aduertiſed of that which I told to his ambaſſador in Granado, which toucheth him néere. For I told him in ſuch a caſe ſo noble a prince, that if he had vnderſtood the ſame, he would haue made me an anſwer. He ſhall do well to know it of his ambaſſador. For by that he ſhall vnderſtand, that I haue kept better faith to him in that I haue promiſed at Madrill than he to me, and I praie you ſo tell him, and faile not hereof. Guien anſwered, Without doubt ſir I will doo it: and ſo making his obeiſance he departed.

The heralds receiue the emperors anſwer in writing.

The emperor appointed Iohn le Alemant the baron of Buclans to ſée that no diſpleaſure nor euill ſpeach were vſed to the ſaid kings of armes, but that they ſhould be well vſed: which was doone to their good contentation. After this, the ſeauen and twentith of Ianuarie, the ſaid kings of armes came to the ſaid lord of Buclans, who by the emperours appointment deliuered an anſwer vnto either of them in writing, accordinglie as the emperor had promiſed, the copies whereof are ſet foorth at large in the annales of Aquitaine, and for bréefeneſſe here omitted. To conclude, the French king tooke ſuch diſpleaſure with the emperours anſwers made vnto his king of armes Guien, whereby he was charged to doo otherwiſe than by his faith giuen he ought to haue doone, that the eight and twentith daie of March being in the citie of Paris, accompanied with a great number of the princes of his bloud, cardinals and other prelats and nobles of his realme, and alſo the ambaſſadors of diuerſe princes and potentates, he called before him Nicholas Perenot lord of Granuelle, vnto whom he ſaid in effect as followeth.

The ſeauen & twentith ſaith Guic.pag.1091.

The French kings oration before an honourable aſſemblie at Paris.

This ſpeach of the kings dooth wholie concerne the emperor and fauoureth of diſpleaſure.

My lord ambaſſadors, it hath gréeued me, and dooth gréeue me, that I haue béene conſtreined to handle you not ſo courteouſlie and gratiouſlie as for the good and honourable behauiour, which you haue ſhewed in dooing your dutie being here with me, you haue deſerued at my hands, ſith I muſt néeds ſaie, yée haue acquit your ſelfe in euerie behalfe, as well to the honor of your maiſter, as good contentation of each man elſe, ſo that I am aſſured the fault reſteth not in you, whie things haue not come to better end and purpoſe than they haue doone, for the good zeale and affection, which I haue euer prooued in you to the aduancement of peace and quieting of things, wherein I doubt not but you haue doone your duetie to the full.

But being informed what your maiſter the elect emperor, againſt all right and law, as well diuine as humane, had commanded to be doone vnto my ambaſſadors, and likewiſe to the other of the league remaining with him, for the furtherance of things toward a peace, and contrarie to all good cuſtoms, which hitherto haue béene obſerued betwixt princes, not onelie chriſtians, but alſo infidels, me thought I could not otherwiſe doo, for the behoofe of mine owne ambaſſadours, arreſted and againſt reaſon kept in ward, but to doo the ſame to you, although I had no mind to vſe you euill, for the reaſons aboue ſaid, for the which, and for the dutie you haue ſhewed in dooing that apperteined, I aſſure you my lord ambaſſador, that beſide that I doubt not but your maiſter will recompenſe you for the ſame, yée may be aſſured that where particularlie in anie thing I may pleaſure you, I will doo it with as good a will as you can require me.

what induced the French king to vſe ſome diſcourteſie againſt the emperors ambaſſadors.

And to make anſwer to that which your maiſter by word of mouth hath ſaid vnto Guien and Clarenceaux kings of armes of the king my good brother and perpetuall and beſt alie, and of me vpon the intimation of the warre which hath béene made by vs, conſiſting in eight points, I will that each one vnderſtand it. Firſt, as to the which he ſaith he maruelleth that he hauing me a priſoner by iuſt warre, and hauing alſo my faith, I ſhould defie him, and that in reaſon I neither may nor ought to doo it; I anſwer thereto, that if I were his priſoner here, and that he had my faith, he had ſpoken true: but I know not that the emperor hath euer at anie time had my faith, that may in anie wiſe auaile him. For firſt in what warre ſo euer I haue béene, I know not that I haue either ſéene him or encountred with him.

The king anſwereth the emperours words vttered to Guien his herald.

When I was priſoner, garded with foure or fiue hundred harquebuzers, ſicke in my bed, and in danger of death, it was an eaſie matter to conſtreine me, but not verie honorable to him that ſhould doo it: and after that I returned into France, I know not anie that hath had power to compell me to it: and to doo it willinglie without conſtraint, it is a thing which I waie more than ſo lightlie to bind my ſelfe thereto. And bicauſe I will not that my honor come in diſputation, although I know well that euerie man of warre knoweth ſufficientlie, that a priſoner garded is not bound to anie faith, nor can bind himſelfe thereto in anie thing: I doo neuertheleſſe ſend to your maſter this writing ſigned with mine owne hand, the which my lord ambaſſadour I praie you read, and afterwards promiſe me to deliuer it vnto your maſter, and not to anie other. And herewith the king cauſed it to be deliuered to the ſaid ambaſſador by maſter Iohn Robertet, one of the ſecretaries of the eſtate, and of his chamber.

The French K. ſaith that conſtraint and neceſſitie made him tractable to the emperor.

The ambaſſador tooke the writing in his hand, and after excuſed himſelfe to the king, ſaieng: That as to him, by the letter which his maſter & ſouereigne lord had written vnto him now laſtlie, his commiſſion was alreadie expired, and that he had no further commandement nor inſtructions from his maieſtie, but to take leaue of the king with as much ſpéed as he might, and to returne home. Which he moſt humblie beſought him to permit him to doo, without further charge or commiſſion, although he knew that he was at his commanddement, and that he might at his pleaſure conſtreine him, as ſéemed to him good. Herevnto the king anſwered; My lord ambaſſador, ſith you will not take vpon you to read this writing, I will cauſe it to be read in this companie, to the end that euerie one may vnderſtand and know that I am cléered in that, whereof againſt truth he goeth about to accuſe me.

The emperors ambaſſador refuſeth to read the French kings letters ſent to his ſouereigne.

Beſide that, if you afterwards will not beare it, & deliuer it to him, I will ſend one of my heralds here preſent to go in companie with you: for whom you ſhall procure a good & auailable ſafe conduct, that he maie paſſe vnto your maſter, proteſting & demanding, that an act maie be regiſtred before this companie, that if he will not it ſhould come to his knowledge, that I am diſcharged, in that I doo my beſt to cauſe him to vnderſtand it accordinglie as I ought to doo, and in ſuch ſort as he can not pretend cauſe of ignorance. After he had made an end of theſe words, he called to him the ſaid Robertet, and commanded him to reade the ſaid writing with a lowd voice, which was doone word for word.

The French king deliuereth his mind with a corage, as vtter enimie to the emperour.

The copie of the ſaid writing directed to the emperour.

WE Francis, by the grace of God, king of France, lord of Genes, &c. To you Charles, by the ſame grace, choſen emperour of Rome, and king of Spaine. We doo you to wit, that being aduertiſed, that in all the anſwers that you haue made to our ambaſſadors and heraulds, ſent to you for the eſtabliſhing of peace, in excuſing your ſelfe, without all reaſon you haue accuſed vs, ſaieng, that we haue plight you our faith, and that therevpon (beſides our promiſe) we departed out of your hands and power. In defenſe of our honour, which hereby might be burthened too much againſt all truth, we thought good to ſend you this writing; by which we giue you to vnderſtand, that notwithſtanding that no man being in ward is bound to kéepe faith, and that the ſame might be a ſufficient excuſe for vs: yet for the ſatiſfieng of all men, and our ſaid honor (which we mind to kéepe, and will kéepe, if it pleaſe God, vnto the death) that if ye haue charged, or will charge vs, not onelie with our ſaid faith, and deliuerance, but that euer we did anie thing that became not a gentleman that had reſpect to his honor; that ye lie falſlie in your throat: and as oft as ye ſaie it, ye lie: and we determine to defend our honor to the vttermoſt drop of our bloud. Wherefore, ſéeing ye haue charged vs againſt all truth, write no more to vs hereafter: but appoint vs the field, and we will bring you the weapons. Proteſting, that if after this declaration ye write into anie place, or vſe anie words againſt our honor, that the ſhame of the delaie of the combat ſhall light on you, ſéeing that the offering of combat is the end of all writing. Made at our good towne and citie of Paris, the eight and twentith daie of March.

The French kings allegations in defenſe of his honor charged with vntruth.

The French king giueth the emperor the lie: ſée Guic.pag 1091

March. In the yere of our Lord, one thouſand fiue hundred twentie and eight, before Eaſter. Thus ſigned. Francis.

This Robertet was one of the ſecretaries to the eſtate.

After that Robertet had read this writing there in preſence of the emperours ambaſſadors, the king made further replie vnto the points conteined in the emperours anſwers to the defiance: and withall to conclude, told the ſaid ambaſſador, that his maſter the emperor had conſtreined him by ſuch meſſage as he had ſent to him, to make the anſwer in truth, which he had made: and further willed him to deliuer vnto the emperour the writing which he had ſigned with his hand, and to ſaie to him, that he tooke him for ſo honorable a prince, that conſidering the matter wherewith he charged him, and the anſwer that he made, he would not faile but to anſwer him like a gentleman, and not by writing like an aduocate. For if he otherwiſe doo (ſaid the king) I will anſwer his chancellor by an aduocate, and a man of his eſtate, and a more honeſt man than he.

The emperor anſwereth the French kings letters.

Shortlie after, the emperors ambaſſadors returned home into Spaine in ſafetie, and well intreted. And vpõ their returne, the ambaſſadors of France were ſet at libertie, and deliuered beyond Fonterabie, & ſo came ſafelie home into France. Then a French herald, appointed to accompanie the ambaſſadour Grandeuill, brought the writing of the combat vnto the emperor, bicauſe Grandeuill refuſed to medle with it. To the which the emperor fiue moneths after, or thereabouts, ſent an anſwer by one of his heralds; who being arriued at Paris, meant vpon the ſudden to preſent his letters vnto the French king. But the king getting intelligence thereof, the tenth of September, ſitting within his great hall of his palace at Paris aforeſaid, before the table of marble in a roiall ſeat, addreſſed and ſet vp for him ſixtéene ſteps in height, appointed to giue audience to the ſaid herald.

What ſtates both natiue and forren were preſent in the French kings hall.

On his right hand ſate in chaires the king of Nauarre, the duke of Alanſon and Berrie, the earle of Foix and Arminacke. And on the ſame ſide ſate alſo vpon a bench, the duke of Vandoſme a péere of France, lieutenant generall, and gouernor of Picardie, don Hercules de Eſt, eldeſt ſonne to the duke of Ferrar, duke of Chartres and Montarges, who latelie before had maried the ladie Rener, a daughter of France, the duke of Albanie regent and gouernor of Scotland, the duke of Longueuille, great chamberleine of France. And néere to them vpon another bench ſate the preſidents and councellors of the court of parlement; and behind them manie gentlemen, doctors, and learned men. On the left hand were ſet in chaires prepared for them, the cardinall Saluarie the popes legat, the cardinall of Burbon, and duke of Laon, a péere of France, the cardinall of Sens chancellor of France, the cardinall of Lorrain, the archbiſhop of Narbon, the ambaſſadors of the kings of England and Scotland, of the ſegniorie of Venice, of Millan, of the Cantons, of the Suiſſes, and of Florence.

Who ſtood on either ſide of the French kings ſeate roiall.

On an other bench ſate the biſhop of Tranſiluania, ambaſſador for the king of Hungarie, the biſhop and duke of Langres, one of the péeres of France, the biſhop & earle of Noion, an other of the péeres of France, th'archbiſhop of Lion, primat of all France, the archbiſhop of Burges primate of Aquitaine, the archbiſhops of Aux and Rouen, the biſhops of Paris, Meaux, Lizeux, Maſcon, Limoges, Vabres, Conſerans and Terbe. And behind them ſate the maſters of the requeſts, and the councellors of the great councell. On either ſide the kings ſeate ſtood the earle of Beaumont great maſter and marſhall of France, the lord de Brion admerall of France lieutenant generall, and gouernor of Burgognie. And behind the ſame ſeat were manie knights of the order, that is to wit, the earle of Lauall, lieutenant generall and gouernor of Britaine, the lord of Montmerancie, the lord Daubignie capteine of an hundred lances, and of the Scotiſh gard, the earle of Brienne, Lignie, and Rouſſie, the lord of Fleuranges marſhall of France, the lord of Ruffoie, the lord of Genoilliac great eſquier and maſter of the artillerie of France, Lois monſieur de Clenes, the lord of Humiers, and the earle of Carpie.

Behind them was the earle of Eſtamps prouoſt of Paris, and with him manie gentlemen of the kings chamber: among the which was the earle of Tancaruill, the lord of Guien, the ſon of the earle of Rouſſie, the ſon of the lord of Fleuranges, the lord de la Rochpot, the lord Donartie great maſter of the waters and forreſts, the lord of Lude, the lord of Ianlie, the lord de Villebon, bailie of Rouen, the baron of Chaſteau Morant, the lord de la Loue, the vicount de la Motheaugroing, and the lord of Vertes. And beſides theſe, the maſters and officers of the houſhold & gentlemen waiters, with the more part of the two hundred gentlemen or penſioners, as we terme them. At the entrie into the ſaid throne or tribunall ſeat, were the capteins of the gards, and the prouoſt of the houſhold. And before the king knéeled the vſhers of the chamber vpon the one knée: and at the foot of the ſtep that went vp to the kings ſeate were the prouoſts of the merchants and eſcheuins of the towne of Paris. Beneath in the hall (the gates whereof were ſtill open) there was an infinite number of people of all nations: and in preſence of them all, the king made this declaration.

The king ſheweth the firſt cauſe of this aſſemblie of honorable perſonages.

The cauſe wherefore I haue made this aſſemblie, is, for that the emperour elect hath ſent to me an herald of armes, who (as I coniecture, and as the ſame herald hath ſaid, and as his ſafe conduct importeth) hath brought me letters patents and autentike, concerning the ſuertie of the field for the combat that ſhould be betwixt the ſaid elected emperour and me. And foraſmuch as the ſaid herald, vnder colour to bring the ſuertie of the field, may vſe certeine fictions, diſſimulations, or hypocriſies, to ſhift off the matter, whereas I deſire expedition, and to haue it diſpatched out of hand; ſo that by the ſame an end of the warres, which haue ſo long continued, may be had, to the eaſe and comfort of all chriſtendome, to auoid the effuſion of bloud, and other miſchéefes which come thereof: I haue wiſhed it knowne to all chriſtendome, to the end that euerie one may vnderſtand the truth, from whence procéedeth the miſchéefe and the long continuance thereof.

Further cauſe whie the ſaid aſſemblie was procured.

I haue alſo cauſed this aſſemblie to be made, to ſhew that I haue not without great cauſe enterpriſed ſuch an act; for the right is on my ſide: and if I ſhould otherwiſe haue doone, mine honor had béene greatlie blemiſhed. A thing which my lords that are of my bloud, and other my ſubiects would haue taken in euill part. And knowing the cauſe of the combat, and my right, they will beare with it, as good and loiall ſubiects ought to doo, truſting by Gods helpe to procéed in ſuch ſort therein, that it ſhall plainelie appéere if the right be on my ſide or not: and how, againſt truth, I haue béene accuſed for a breaker of my faith, which I would be loth to doo, nor at anie time haue meant ſo to doo. The kings my predeceſſors and anceſtors, whoſe pictures are ingrauen and ſet héere in order within this hall, which in their daies haue ſucceſſiuelie atchiued glorious acts, and greatlie augmented the realme of France, would thinke me vnworthie, and not capable to be their ſucceſſor, if againſt mine honor I ſhould ſuffer my ſelfe to be charged with ſuch a note by the emperour, and ſhould not defend my perſon and honor in the manner and forme accuſtomed.

The French king in preſence of all his eſtates auerreth that he neuer gaue his faith to anie of his enimies, ergo not to the emperour.

And herewith he declared the whole caſe as it ſtood. Firſt, how being taken at Pauia by fortune of war, he neuer gaue his faith to anie of his enimies, & conſenting to be led into Spaine, cauſed his owne gallies to be made readie to conueie him thither, where at his arriuall, he was committed to ward within the caſtell of Madrill, garded with a great number of harquebuziers & others. Which vncourteous dealing found in the emperor, ſo much greeued him, that he fell ſicke, and laie in danger of death. Wherevpon the emperour comming to viſit him after his recouerie of health, an accord was made betwixt the deputies of the emperour and the ambaſſadours of the ladie his mother then regent of France: which accord was ſo vnreaſonable, that no prince being in libertie would haue conſented thereto, nor for his deliuerance haue promiſed ſo great a ranſome. Which tretie yet they conſtrained him (as he ſaid) to ſweare to performe, being priſoner, againſt the proteſtation which he diuerſe times had made, yea as yet being ſicke, and in danger of recidiuation; and ſo conſequentlie of death.

The king proſecuteth the diſcourteſie of the emperour in his declaration.

After this, he was conueied forth on his iournie homewards, ſtill garded & not ſet at libertie. And it was told him, that after he came into France, it was conuenient that he ſhould giue his faith, for that it was knowne well enough, that what he did or promiſed in Spaine, it nothing auailed. And further he remembred not that the emperour had told him at anie time, that if he performed not the contents of the treatie, he would hold him for a breaker of his faith, & though he had, he was not in his libertie to make anie anſwer. Two things therefore ſaid he, in this caſe are to be conſidered. One, that the tretie was violentlie wrong out from them that could not bind his perſon, and the which (as to the reſidue) had beene accompliſhed by his mother, deliuering his ſonnes in hoſtage. The other thing was his pretended faith, on which they can make no ground, ſith he was not ſet at libertie. And herevnto he ſhewed manie reaſons, to proue that his enimies could not pretend in right that they had his faith.

The field, that is, a place where they may ſafelie come to fight in liſtes before indifferent iudges.

Further he ſaid, that in matter of combat there was the aſſailant, which ought to giue ſuertie of the field, and the defendant the weapons. Herewith alſo he cauſed a letter to be read, which the emperour had written to maiſter Iohn de Caluimont preſident of Burdeaux, the ſaid kings ambaſſadour in the court of the ſaid emperour: the tenor of which letter imported, that the emperour put the ſaid ambaſſadour in remembrance of ſpeech which he had vttered to the ſaid ambaſſadour in Granado, repeating the ſame in ſubſtance as followeth. That the king his maiſter had doone naughtilie in not keeping his faith which he had of him, according to the treatie of Madrill: and if the king would ſaie the contrarie, I will (ſaid the emperour) mainteine the quarrell with my bodie againſt his. And theſe be the ſame words that I ſpake to the king your maiſter in Madrill, that I would hold him for a lewd and naughtie man, if he brake the faith which I had of him, &c.

Guic.pag.1091

Then after the ſaid letter had beene read, he cauſed alſo his anſwer made by way of a cartell to be read, the tenor whereof ye haue heard before. That doone, he continued his tale, in declaring what order he had obſerued to procure the emperour to the combat, without all ſhifting delaies: ſo as if the herald now come from the emperour would vſe anie talke, other than to deliuer him an authentike writing for ſuertie of the field, and not obſerue the contents of his ſafe conduct, he meant not to giue him audience. And herevpon was the herald called to come in, and declare his meſſage. Who apparelled in his cote of armes, made his appearance before the king there ſitting, accompanied (as ye haue heard.) Vnto whome the king ſaid.

The French kings talke and communication to the emperors ambaſſador vttered with indignation.

Herald, dooeſt thou bring the ſuertie of the field, ſuch one as thy maiſter, being the aſſailant, ought to deliuer vnto the defendant, being ſuch a perſonage as I am? The herald herevnto ſaid: Sir, maie it pleaſe you to giue me licence to doo mine office? Then ſaid the king; Giue me the pattent of the field, and ſaie what thou wilt. The herald beginning his tale, The ſacred. Tuſh (ſaid the king) ſhew me the pattent of the field, for I hold thy maſter for ſo noble a prince, that he hath not ſent thee without the ſuertie of the field, ſith I haue demanded it; and thou knoweſt that thy ſafe conduct conteineth no leſſe but that thou ſhouldeſt bring it. The herald anſwered, that he truſted he had brought that which might content his maieſtie.

The king replied & ſaid: Herald, giue me the pattent of the field, giue it me: and if it be ſufficient, I will receiue it, and after ſaie what thou wilt. The herald ſaid he had in commandement not to deliuer it, except he might declare that which he had firſt to ſaie. The king ſaid: Thy maiſter can not giue lawes to vs in France. To conclude he told the herald, that he peraduenture might ſpeake things that his maiſter would not auouch, and that he had not to deale with him, but with his maiſter. The herald then required that he might haue licence to depart: which the king granted. And withall the king commanded that it might be regiſtred what had paſſed in this behalfe, for a teſtimonie that the fault reſted not in him in that he receiued not the pattent. The herald likewiſe for his diſcharge, required a copie in writing of that which had paſſed, and the ſame was granted.

The herald requireth libertie to depart.

Thus far haue I ouerpaſſed the common bounds of my purpoſe, in ſpeaking ſo largelie of this matter of combat, bicauſe of the rareneſſe thereof, chancing betwixt two ſo mightie princes, although it came not to the effect of triall. And now to returne to that which followed further vpon the defiance, denounced to the emperor by the two kings of armes, Guien and Clarenceaux. Ye ſhall vnderſtand, that the lords and nobilitie, to the number of ſeuen hundred in whoſe preſence it was giuen, tooke it ſo offenſiuelie, that drawing forth their ſwords, they ſware that the ſame ſhould be reuenged: for otherwiſe they proteſted, that the infamie would redound to them and their heires for euer. Herewith the warre was proclamed through all Spaine with baners diſplaied, in which were painted a red ſword, with a burning creſſet againſt the French king and his partakers, but not mentioning the king of England by expreſſe name. But it was recited in the proclamation, that the king of England had menaced and defied the emperour in the French kings quarell.

The emperor defied by the kings of England and France.

Then were the Engliſh merchants in Spaine attached, and their goods put in ſafetie, till it might be knowne how the emperours ſubiects were ordered in England. Then likewiſe were all the ſhips of the emperours ſubiects here arreſted: and in ſemblable maner all the Engliſhmen and their goods and ſhips were arreſted by the ladie regent in the low countries. The common people in England much lamented, that warre ſhould ariſe betweene the emperour and the king of England, ſpeciallie bicauſe the emperours dominions had holpen and releeued them with graine in time of their neceſſitie & want. But cheefelie this matter touched merchants which haunted the emperors dominions. Yet at length were thoſe of the low countries ſet at libertie, and their goods to them deliuered, in fauour of intercourſe of merchandize. But forſomuch as the Spaniards were ſtill deteined, the ladie regent alſo deteined the ſhips and goods of the Engliſh merchants though ſhe ſet their perſons at libertie.

Engliſh merchants ſtaied in Spaine.

The incõmoditie riſing of lacke of intercourſe for traficke.

By this meanes the trade of merchandize was in maner fore-let here in England, and namelie the clothes laie on their hands, whereby the commonwealth ſuffered great decaie, and great numbers of ſpinners, carders, tuckers, and ſuch other that liued by clothworking, remained idle, to their great impoueriſhment. And as this warre was diſpleaſant to the Engliſhmen, ſo was it as much or more diſpleaſant to the townes and people of the low countries, & in eſpeciall to the townes of Antuerpe & Barrow, where the marts are kept. So that at length there came ambaſſadours from the ladie regent, the which aſſociating themſelues with don Hugo de Mendoza ambaſſadour for the emperour, came to the king at Richmond the twentie and ninth of March, and there mooued their ſute ſo effectuallie, that an abſtinence of warre was granted, till time that a further communication might be had: and vpon this point letters were ſent into Spaine, France, and Flanders, and ſo this matter continued vntill anſwers were brought from thenſe againe.

An abſtinence of war granted vpon ſute made to the king of England.

The emperours ambaſſadours intreated not ſo earneſtlie to mooue the king to haue peace with their maiſter, but the French ambaſſadours ſollicited the king as earneſtlie to enter into the warre againſt him, and ſuerlie they had the cardinall on their ſide. But yet the king wiſelie conſidering with other of his councell, what damage ſhould inſue therby vnto his ſubiects, and ſpeciallie to the merchants and clothiers, would not conſent ſo eaſilie to the purpoſe of the Frenchmen, though he had twentie thouſand pounds ſterling out of France, of yearelie penſion, to continue freend & alie to the French king. But he proteſted euer that he would ſee the relme of France defended to his power, and ſtudie no leſſe to haue a peace concluded, which might be as honourable to the French king as to himſelfe, and beneficiall vnto their people, of whome by warres, might be made both ſlaughter and bloudſhed, which are companions vnſeparable of battell; as the poet well ſaith:

Hinc breuiter diræ mortis aperta via eſt.

On the two and twentith of Februarie the king created at Windſor ſir Piers Butler of Ireland, erle of Oſſerie. ¶Alſo a Dutch craire of Armew chaſed a French craire vp the Thames from Margate to the Tower wharfe, and there as they fought ſir Edmund Walſingham lieutenant of the Tower perceiuing them, called his men togither, and entering the ſhips tooke both the capteins. The kings councell tooke vp the matter betwixt them, for the Fleming chalenged the Frenchman as a lawfull priſe. An abſtinence of the warre was taken in the beginning of this yeare betwixt Flanders, and the countries of Picardie on this ſide the riuer of Some to begin the firſt of Maie & indure till the laſt of Februarie. By means of this truce all the Engliſhmen might lawfullie paſſe into the low countries, but not into Spaine: which ſore greeued the merchants that haunted thoſe parties. It was further agreed, that if no generall peace could be had, during the time of this truce: then all the merchants ſhould haue reſpit two moneths after to paſſe into their owne countries with their wares and merchandizes in ſafetie.

Creation of the earle of Oſſerie.

Sir Edmund Walſingham.

A truce and the benefits inſuing from the ſame.

In the end of Maie began in the citie of London the diſeaſe called the ſweating ſickeneſſe, which afterwards infected all places of the realme, and ſlue manie within fiue or ſix houres after they ſickened. This ſickeneſſe, for the maner of the taking of the patients, was an occaſion of remembring that great ſweat which raged in the reigne of this kings grandfather; and happilie men cauſed the ſame remedie then vſed to be reuiued. By reaſon of this ſickeneſſe, the tearme was adiourned, and the circuit of the aſſiſes alſo. There died diuerſe in the court of this ſickeneſſe, as ſir Francis Poins, which had beene ambaſſadour in Spaine, and diuerſe others. The king for a ſpace remooued almoſt euerie daie till he came to Tintinhangar, a place of the abbat of ſaint Albons, and there he with the queene, and a ſmall companie about them, remained till the ſickeneſſe was paſt. In this great mortalitie died ſir William Compton knight, and William Carew eſquier; which were of the kings priuie chamber.

The ſweating ſickeneſſe, whereof died both courtiers and others.

Sir William Compton.

¶A priſoner brake from the ſeſſions hall at Newgate when the ſeſſions was doone, which priſoner was brought downe out of Newgate in a baſket, he ſeemed ſo weake: but now in the end of the ſeſſions he brake thorough the people vnto the Greie friers church, and there was kept ſix or ſeauen daies yer the ſhiriffes could ſpeake with him, and then bicauſe he would not abiure and aſke a crowner, with violence they tooke him thenſe, and caſt him againe in priſon, but the law ſerued not to hang him.]

Abr. Fl. ex I.S. pag. 959. A priſoner brake frõ the ſeſſions houſe, Regiſter of Greie friers.

Ye heaue heard how the people talked a little before the cardinals going ouer into France the laſt yeare, that the king was told by doctor Longland biſhop of Lincolne and others, that his mariage with queene Katharine could not be good nor lawfull. The truth is, that whether this doubt was firſt mooued by the cardinall, or by the ſaid Longland, being the kings confeſſor, the king was not onelie brought in doubt, whether it was a lawfull marriage or no; but alſo determined to haue the caſe examined, cleered, and adiudged by learning, law, and ſufficient authoritie. The cardinall verelie was put in moſt blame for this ſcruple now caſt into the kings conſcience, for the hate he bare to the emperor, bicauſe he would not grant to him the archbiſhoprike of Toledo, for the which he was a ſuter. And therefore he did not onlie procure the king of England to ioine in freendſhip with the French king, but alſo ſought a diuorſe betwixt the king and the queene, that the king might haue had in marriage the ducheſſe of Alanſon, ſiſter vnto the French king: and (as ſome haue thought) he trauelled in that matter with the French king at Amiens, but the ducheſſe would not giue eare therevnto.

But howſoeuer it came about, that the king was thus troubled in conſcience concerning his mariage, this followed, that like a wiſe & ſage prince, to haue the doubt cleerelie remooued, he called togither the beſt learned of the realme, which were of ſeuerall opinions. Wherfore he thought to know the truth by indifferent iudges, leaſt peraduenture the Spaniards, and other alſo in fauour of the queene would ſaie, that his owne ſubiects were not indifferent iudges in this behalfe. And therefore he wrote his cauſe to Rome, and alſo ſent to all the vniuerſities in Italie and France, and to the great clearkes of all chriſtendome, to know their opinions, and deſired the court of Rome to ſend into his realme a legat, which ſhould be indifferent, and of a great and profound iudgement, to heare the cauſe debated. At whoſe requeſt the whole conſiſtorie of the college of Rome ſent thither Laurence Campeius, a preeſt cardinall, a man of great wit and experience, which was ſent hither before in the tenth yeare of this king, as yee haue heard, and with him was ioined in commiſſion the cardinall of Yorke and legat of England.

Cardinall Campeius ſent into England.

This cardinall came to London in October, and did intimate both to the king & queene the cauſe of his comming: which being knowne, great talke was had thereof. The archbiſhop of Canturburie ſent for the famous doctors of both the vniuerſities to Lambeth, beth, and there were euerie daie diſputations and communings of this matter. And bicauſe the king meant nothing but vprightlie therein, and knew well that the quéene was ſomewhat wedded to hir owne opinion, and wiſhed that ſhe ſhould do nothing without counſell, he bad hir chooſe the beſt clearks of his realme to be of hir counſell, and licenced them to doo the beſt on hir part that they could, according to the truth. Then ſhe elected William Warham archbiſhop of Canturburie, and Nicholas Weſt biſhop of Elie, doctors of the laws; and Iohn Fiſher biſhop of Rocheſter, and Henrie Standiſh biſhop of ſaint Aſaph, doctors of diuinitie, and manie other doctors and well learned men, which for ſuertie like men of great learning defended hir cauſe, as farre as learning might mainteine and hold it vp.

This yeare was ſir Iames Spenſer maior of London, in whoſe time the watch in London on Midſummer night was laid downe. About this time the king receiued into fauour doctor Stephan Gardiner, whoſe ſeruice he vſed in matters of great ſecrecie and weight, admitting him in the roome of doctor Pace, the which being continuallie abroad in ambaſſages, and the ſame oftentimes not much neceſſarie, by the cardinals appointment, at length he tooke ſuch gréefe therewith, that he fell out of his right wits. The place where the cardinals ſhould ſit to heare the cauſe of matrimonie betwixt the king and the quéene, was ordeined to be at the Blacke friers in London, where in the great hall was preparation made of ſeats, tables, and other furniture, according to ſuch a ſolemne ſeſſion and roiall apparance. The court was platted in tables and benches in manner of a conſiſtorie, one ſeat raiſed higher for the iudges to ſit in. Then as it were in the midſt of the ſaid iudges aloft aboue them thrée degrées high, was a cloth of eſtate hanged, with a chaire roiall vnder the ſame, wherein ſat the king; and beſides him, ſome diſtance from him ſat the quéene, and vnder the iudges féet ſat the ſcribes and other officers: the chéefe ſcribe was doctor Stéeuens, and the caller of the court was one Cooke of Wincheſter.

Anno Reg. 21. Edw. Hall.

Abr. Fl. ex I. S. pag. 959.

The maner of the ſeſſion, euerie perſonage of account in his place.

Then before the king and the iudges within the court ſat the archbiſhop of Canturburie Warham, and all the other biſhops. Then ſtood at both ends within, the counſellors learned in the ſpirituall laws, as well the kings as the quéenes. The doctors of law for the king (whoſe names yée haue heard before) had their conuenient roomes. Thus was the court furniſhed. The iudges commanded ſilence whileſt their commiſſion was read, both to the court and to the people aſſembled. That doone the ſcribes commanded the crier to call the king by the name of king Henrie of England, come into the court, &c. With that the king anſwered and ſaid, Héere. Then called he the quéene by the name of Katharine quéene of England come into the court, &c. Who made no anſwer, but roſe out of hir chaire.

The king and quéene called into the court.

And bicauſe ſhée could not come to the king directlie, for the diſtance ſeuered betwéene them, ſhée went about by the court, and came to the king, kneeling downe at his féet, to whome ſhe ſaid in effect as followeth: Sir (quoth ſhe) I deſire you to doo me iuſtice and right, and take ſome pitie vpon me, for I am a poore woman, and a ſtranger, borne out of your dominion, hauing héere no indifferent counſell, & leſſe aſſurance of fréendſhip. Alas ſir, what haue I offended you, or what occaſion of diſpleaſure haue I ſhewed you, intending thus to put me from you after this ſort? I take God to my iudge, I haue béene to you a true & humble wife, euer conformable to your will and pleaſure, that neuer contraried or gainesaid any thing thereof, and being alwaies contented with all things wherein you had any delight, whether little or much, without grudge or diſpleaſure, I loued for your ſake all them whome you loued, whether they were my fréends or enimies.

Quéene Katharines lamentable and pithie ſpéech in preſence of the court.

I haue béene your wife theſe twentie yeares and more, & you haue had by me diuerſe children. If there be anie iuſt cauſe that you can alleage againſt me, either of diſhoneſtie, or matter lawfull to put me from you; I am content to depart to my ſhame and rebuke: and if there be none, then I praie you to let me haue iuſtice at your hand. The king your father was in his time of excellent wit, and the king of Spaine my father Ferdinando was reckoned one of the wiſeſt princes that reigned in Spaine manie yeares before. It is not to be doubted, but that they had gathered as wiſe counſellors vnto them of euerie realme, as to their wiſedoms they thought méet, who déemed the marriage betwéene you and me good and lawfull, &c. Wherefore, I humblie deſire you to ſpare me, vntill I may know what counſell my fréends in Spaine will aduertiſe me to take, and if you will not, then your pleaſure be fulfilled. ¶ With that ſhe aroſe vp, making a lowe curteſie to the king, and departed from thence.

The quéene iuſtifieth the mariage.

The king being aduertiſed that ſhée was readie to go out of the houſe, commanded the crier to call hir againe, who called hir by theſe words; Katharine quéene of England, come into the court. With that (quoth maiſter Griffith) Madame, you be called againe. On on (quoth ſhe) it maketh no matter, I will not tarrie, go on your waies. And thus ſhe departed, without anie further anſwer at that time, or anie other, and neuer would appeare after in anie court. The king perceiuing ſhe was departed, ſaid theſe words in effect: For as much (quoth he) as the quéene is gone, I will in hir abſence declare to you all, that ſhée hath béene to me as true, as obedient, and as conformable a wife, as I would wiſh or deſire. She hath all the vertuous qualities that ought to be in a woman of hir dignitie, or in anie other of a baſer eſtate, ſhe is alſo ſurelie a noble woman borne, hir conditions will well declare the ſame.

The quéene departing out of the court is called againe.

With that quoth Wolſeie the cardinall: Sir, I moſt humblie require your highneſſe, to declare before all this audience, whether I haue béene the chéefe and firſt moouer of this matter vnto your maieſtie or no, for I am greatlie ſuſpected héerein. My lord cardinall (quoth the king) I can well excuſe you in this matter, marrie (quoth he) you haue béene rather againſt me in the tempting héereof, than a ſetter forward or moouer of the ſame. The ſpeciall cauſe that mooued me vnto this matter, was a certeine ſcrupuloſitie that pricked my conſcience, vpon certeine words ſpoken at a time when it was, by the biſhop of Baion the French ambaſſador, who had béene hither ſent, vpon the debating of a marriage to be concluded betwéene our daughter the ladie Marie, and the duke of Orleance, ſecond ſon to the king of France.

The cardinall requireth to haue that declared which was well enough knowen.

Vpon the reſolution and determination whereof, he deſired reſpit to aduertiſe the king his maiſter thereof, whether our daughter Marie ſhould be legitimate in reſpect of this my marriage with this woman, being ſometimes my brothers wife. Which words once conceiued within the ſecret bottome of my conſcience, ingendered ſuch a ſcrupulous doubt, that my conſcience was incontinentlie accombred, vexed, and diſquieted; whereby I thought my ſelfe to be greatlie in danger of Gods indignation. Which appeared to be (as me ſéemed) the rather, for that he ſent vs no iſſue male: and all ſuch iſſues male as my ſaid wife had by me, died incontinent after they came into the world, ſo that I doubted the great diſpleaſure of God in that behalfe.

The king confeſſeth that the ſting of conſcience made him miſlike this mariage.

Thus my conſcience being toſſed in the waues of a ſcrupulous mind, and partlie in deſpaire to haue anie other iſſue than I had alredie by this ladie now my wife, it behooued me further to conſider the ſtate of this realme, and the danger it ſtood in for lacke of a prince to ſucceed me, I thought it good in releaſe of the weightie burthen of my weake conſcience, & alſo the quiet eſtate of this worthie relme, to attempt the law therin, whether I may lawfullie take another wife more lawfullie, by whome God may ſend me more iſſue, in caſe this my firſt copulation was not good, without anie carnall concupiſcence, and not for anie diſpleaſure or miſliking of the quéenes perſon and age, with whome I would be as well contented to continue, if our mariage may ſtand with the laws of God, as with anie woman aliue.

The ſtate of the queſtion.

In this point conſiſteth all this doubt that we go about now to trie, by the learning, wiſedome, and iudgement of you our prelats and paſtors of all this our realme and dominions now héere aſſembled for that purpoſe; to whoſe conſcience & learning I haue committed the charge and iudgement: according to the which I will (God willing) be right well content to ſubmit my ſelfe, and for my part obeie the ſame. Wherein, after that I perceiued my conſcience ſo doubtfull, I mooued it in confeſſion to you my lord of Lincolne then ghoſtlie father. And for ſo much as then you your ſelfe were in ſome doubt, you mooued me to aſke the counſell of all theſe my lords: whervpon I mooued you my lord of Canturburie, firſt to haue your licence, in as much as you were metropolitane, to put this matter in queſtion, and ſo I did of all you my lords: to which you granted vnder your ſeales, héere to be ſhewed. That is truth, quoth the archbiſhop of Canturburie. After that the king roſe vp, and the court was adiorned vntill another daie.

The king ſubmitteth himſelfe to the cenſures of the learned in this caſe of diuorſe.

Héere is to be noted, that the quéene in preſence of the whole court moſt gréeuouſlie accuſed the cardinall of vntruth, deceit, wickedneſſe, & malice, which had ſowne diſſention betwixt hir and the king hir husband; and therefore openlie proteſted, that ſhe did vtterlie abhorre, refuſe, and forſake ſuch a iudge, as was not onelie a moſt malicious enimie to hir, but alſo a manifeſt aduerſarie to all right and iuſtice, and therewith did ſhe appeale vnto the pope, committing hir whole cauſe to be iudged of him. But notwithſtanding this appeale, the legats ſat wéekelie, and euerie daie were arguments brought in on both parts, and proofes alleaged for the vnderſtanding of the caſe, and ſtill they aſſaied if they could by anie meanes procure the quéene to call backe hir appeale, which ſhe vtterlie refuſed to doo. The king would gladlie haue had an end in the matter, but when the legats draue time, and determined vpon no certeine point, he conceiued a ſuſpicion, that this was doone of purpoſe, that their dooings might draw to none effect or concluſion.

The quéene accuſeth cardinall Wolſie.

She appealeth to the pope.

The king miſtruſteth the legats of ſéeking delaies.

The next court daie, the cardinals ſat againe, at which time the councell on both ſides were there readie to anſwer. The kings councell alleaged the matrimonie not to be lawfull at the beginning, bicauſe of the carnall copulation had betwéene prince Arthur and the quéene. This matter was verie vehementlie touched on that ſide, and to prooue it, they alleaged manie reaſons and ſimilitudes of truth: and being anſwered negatiuelie againe on the other ſide, it ſéemed that all their former allegations were doubtfull to be tried, and that no man knew the truth. And thus this court paſſed from ſeſſions to ſeſſions, and daie to daie, till at certeine of their ſeſſions the king ſent the two cardinals to the quéene (who was then in Bridewell) to perſuade with hir by their wiſdoms, and to aduiſe hir to ſurrender the whole matter into the kings hands by hir owne conſent & will, which ſhould be much better to hir honour, than to ſtand to the triall of law, and thereby to be condemned, which ſhould ſéeme much to hir diſhonour.

The preſent mariage while thought vnlawfull.

The cardinals being in the quéenes chamber of preſence, the gentleman vſher aduertiſed the quéene that the cardinals were come to ſpeake with hir. With that ſhe roſe vp, & with a ſkeine of white thred about hir necke, came into hir chamber of preſence, where the cardinals were attending. At whoſe comming, quoth ſhe, What is your pleſure with me? If it pleaſe your grace (quoth cardinall Wolſeie) to go into your priuie chamber, we will ſhew you the cauſe of our comming. My lord (quoth ſhe) if yée haue anie thing to ſaie, ſpeake it openlie before all theſe folke, for I feare nothing that yée can ſaie againſt me, but that I would all the world ſhould heare and ſée it, and therefore ſpeake your mind. Then began the cardinall to ſpeake to hir in Latine. Naie good my lord (quoth ſhe) ſpeake to me in Engliſh.

Quéene Katharine and the cardinals haue communication in hir priuie chamber.

Forſooth (quoth the cardinall) good madame, if it pleaſe you, we come both to know your mind how you are diſpoſed to doo in this matter betwéene the king and you, and alſo to declare ſecretlie our opinions and counſell vnto you: which we doo onelie for verie zeale and obedience we beare vnto your grace. My lord (quoth ſhe) I thanke you for your good will, but to make you anſwer in your requeſt I cannot ſo ſuddenlie, for I was ſet among my maids at worke, thinking full little of anie ſuch matter, wherein there néedeth a longer deliberation, and a better head than mine to make anſwer: for I néed counſell in this caſe which toucheth me ſo néere, & for anie counſell or fréendſhip that I can find in England, they are not for my profit. What thinke you my lords, will anie Engliſhman counſell me, or be fréend to me againſt the K. pleaſure that is his ſubiect? Naie forſooth. And as for my counſell in whom I will put my truſt, they be not here, they be in Spaine in my owne countrie.

The quéene refuſeth to make ſudden anſwer to ſo weightie a matter as the diuorſe.

And my lords, I am a poore woman, lacking wit, to anſwer to anie ſuch noble perſons of wiſedome as you be, in ſo weightie a matter, therefore I praie you be good to me poore woman, deſtitute of fréends here in a forren region, and your counſell alſo I will be glad to heare. And therewith ſhe tooke the cardinall by the hand, and led him into hir priuie chamber with the other cardinall, where they tarried a ſeaſon talking with the quéene. Which communication ended, they departed to the king, making to him relation of hir talke. Thus this caſe went forward from court to court, till it came to iudgement, ſo that euerie man expected that iudgment would be giuen the next day. At which daie the king came thither, and ſet him downe in a chaire within a doore, in the end of the gallerie (which opened directlie againſt the iudgement ſeat) to heare the iudgement giuen, at which time all their procéedings were red in Latine.

The king & quéenes matter commeth to iudgement.

That doone, the kings councell at the barre called for iudgement. With that (quoth cardinall Campeius) I will not giue iudgement till I haue made relation to the pope of all our procéedings, whoſe counſell and commandement in this caſe I will obſerue: the caſe is verie doubtfull, and alſo the partie defendant will make no anſwer here, but dooth rather appeale from vs, ſuppoſing that we be not indifferent. Wherfore I will adiourne this court for this time, according to the order of the court of Rome. And with that the court was diſſolued, and no more doone. This protracting of the concluſion of the matter, king Henrie tooke verie diſpleaſantlie. Then cardinall Campeius tooke his leaue of the king and nobilitie, and returned towards Rome.]

Cardinall Campeius refuſeth to giue iudgement.

Whileſt theſe things were thus in hand, the cardinall of Yorke was aduiſed that the king had ſet his affection vpon a yoong gentlewoman named Anne, the daughter of ſir Thomas Bullen vicount Rochford, which did wait vpon the quéene. This was a great griefe vnto the cardinall, as he that perceiued aforehand, that the king would marie the ſaid gentlewoman, if the diuorſe tooke place. Wherfore he began with all diligence to diſappoint that match, which by reaſon of the miſliking that he had to the woman, he iudged ought to be auoided more than preſent death. While the matter ſtood in this ſtate, and that the cauſe of the quéene was to be heard and iudged at Rome, by reaſon of the appeale which by hir was put in: the cardinall required the pope by letters and ſecret meſſengers, that in anie wiſe he ſhould defer the iudgement of the diuorſe, till he might frame the kings mind to his purpoſe.

The ſecret working and diſſimulation of cardinall Wolſeie.

Howbeit he went about nothing ſo ſecretlie, but that the ſame came to the kings knowledge, who tooke ſo high diſpleaſure with ſuch his cloked diſſimulation, that he determined to abaſe his degrée, ſith as an vnthankefull perſon he forgot himſelfe and his dutie towards him that had ſo highlie aduanced him to all honor and dignitie. When the nobles of the realme perceiued the cardinall to be in diſpleaſure, they began to accuſe him of ſuch offenſes as they knew might be proued againſt him, and thereof they made a booke conteining certeine articles, to which diuerſe of the kings councell ſet their hands. The king vnderſtanding more plainlie by thoſe articles, the great pride, preſumption, and couetouſneſſe of the cardinall, was ſore moued againſt him; but yet kept his purpoſe ſecret for a while. Shortlie after, a parlement was called to begin at Weſtminſter the third of Nouember next inſuing.

The king conceiueth diſpleaſure againſt the cardinall.

Edw. Hall.

Articles exhibited againſt the cardinall.

In the meane time the king, being informed that all thoſe things that the cardinall had doone by his power legantine within this realme, were in the caſe of the premunire and prouiſion, cauſed his atturneie Chriſtopher Hales to ſue out a writ of premunire againſt him, in the which he licenced him to make his atturneie. ¶ And further, the ſeuentéenth of Nouember the king ſent the two dukes of Norffolke and Suffolke to the cardinals place at Weſtminſter, who (went as they were commanded) and finding the cardinall there, they declared that the kings pleaſure was that he ſhould ſurrender vp the great ſeale into their hands, and to depart ſimplie vnto Aſher, which was an houſe ſituat nigh vnto Hampton court, belonging to the biſhoprike of Wincheſter. The cardinall demanded of them their commiſſion that gaue them ſuch authoritie, who anſwered againe, that they were ſufficient commiſſioners, and had authoritie to doo no leſſe by the kings mouth. Notwithſtanding, he would in no wiſe agrée in that behalfe, without further knowledge of their authoritie, ſaieng; that the great ſeale was deliuered him by the kings perſon, to inioy the miniſtration thereof, with the roome of the chancellor for the terme of his life, whereof for his ſuertie he had the kings letters patents.

The cardinall ſued in a premunire.

Abr. Fl. ex I.S. pag. 966, 967.

The cardinall is loth to part from the great ſeale.

This matter was greatlie debated betwéene them with manie great words, in ſo much that the dukes were faine to depart againe without their purpoſe, and rode to Windſore to the king, and made report accordinglie; but the next daie they returned againe, bringing with them the kings letters. Then the cardinall deliuered vnto them the great ſeale, and was content to depart ſimplie, taking with him nothing but onelie certeine prouiſion for his houſe: and after long talke betwéene him and the dukes, they departed with the great ſeale of England, and brought the ſame to the king. Then the cardinall called all his officers before him, and tooke accompt of them for all ſuch ſtuffe, whereof they had charge. And in his gallerie were ſet diuerſe tables, whervpon laie a great number of goodlie rich ſtuffe, as whole péeces of ſilke of all colours, veluet, ſattin, damaſke, taffata, grograine, and other things. Alſo, there laie a thouſand péeces of fine Holland cloth.

The cardinall diſcharged of þ great ſeale.

The cardinall calleth all his officers to accounts.

There was laid on euerie table, bookes reporting the contents of the ſame, and ſo was there inuentaries of all things in order againſt the kings comming. He cauſed to be hanged the walles of the gallerie on the one ſide with cloth of gold, cloth of tiſſue, cloth of ſiluer, and rich cloth of bodken of diuerſe colours. On the other ſide were hanged the richeſt ſute of coapes of his owne prouiſion made for his colleges of Oxford and Ipſwich, that euer were ſéene in England. Then had he two chambers adioining to the gallerie, the one moſt commonlie called the gilt chamber, and the other the councell chamber, wherein were ſet vp two broad and long tables vpon treſtles, wher vpon was ſet ſuch a number of plate of all ſorts, as was almoſt incredible.

In the gilt chamber were ſet out vpon the table nothing but gilt plate, and vpon a cupbord and in a window was ſet no plate but gold, verie rich: and in the councell chamber was all white and parcell gilt plate, and vnder the table in baſkets was all old broken ſiluer plate, and bookes ſet by them purporting euerie kind of plate, and euerie parcell, with the contents of the ounces thereof. Thus were all things prepared, giuing charge of all the ſaid ſtuffe, with all other remaining in euerie office, to be deliuered to the king, to make anſwer to their charge: for the order was ſuch, that euerie officer was charged with the receipt of the ſtuffe belonging to his office by indenture. To ſir William Gaſcoigne, being his treaſuror, he gaue the charge of the deliuerie of the ſaid goods, and therwithall, with his traine of gentlemen and yeomen, he tooke his barge at the priuie ſtaires, and ſo went by water vnto Putneie, where when he was arriued, he tooke his mule, ⁊ euerie man tooke their horſſes, and rode ſtreight to Aſher, where he and his familie continued the ſpace of thrée or foure wéekes, without either beds, ſhéets, table cloths, or diſhes to eat their meat in, or wherwith to buie anie: the cardinall was forced to borow of the biſhop of Carleill, plate and diſhes, ⁊c.]

The cardinall of Yorke goeth to Aſher, and hath his plentie turned into penurie.

After this, in the kings bench his matter for the premunire, being called vpon, two atturneis, which he had authoriſed by his warrant ſigned with his owne hand, confeſſed the action, and ſo had iudgement to forfeit all his lands, tenements, goods, and cattels, and to be out of the kings protection: but the king of his clemencie ſent to him a ſufficient protection, and left to him the biſhoprikes of Yorke and Wincheſter, with plate and ſtuffe conuenient for his degrée. The biſhoprike of Dureſme was giuen to doctor Tunſtall biſhop of London, and the abbeie of ſaint Albons to the prior of Norwich. Alſo the biſhoprike of London being now void, was beſtowed on doctor Stokeſleie, then ambaſſadour to the vniuerſities beyond the ſea for the kings mariage.

The ladie Margaret duches of Sauoy aunt to the emperour, and the ladie Lois ducheſſe of Angoleſme mother to the French king, met at Cambreie in the beginning of the moneth of June, to treat of a peace, where were preſent doctor Tunſtall biſhop of London, and ſir Thomas More then chancellor of the duchie of Lancaſter, commiſſioners for the king of England. At length through diligence of the ſaid ladies a peace was concluded betwixt the emperour, the pope, and the kings of England and France. All theſe met there in the beginning of Julie, accompanied with diuerſe great princes and councellors, on euerie part. And after long debating on both ſides, there was a good concluſion taken the fift daie of Auguſt. In the which was concluded, that the treatie of Madrill ſhould ſtand in his full ſtrength and vertue, ſauing the third and fourth, and the eleuenth and four-15 Item, that the duches of Vandoſme, and Lois earle of Nauers, ſhould haue all ſuch right and actions, as they ſhould haue had before the warre began.

In the emperours countries, when all things were written, ſealed, and finiſhed, there was a ſolemne maſſe ſong in the cathedrall church of Cambreie, the two ladies ambaſſadors of the king of England, ſitting in great eſtate: and after maſſe the peace was proclamed betweene the three princes, and Te Deum ſong, and monie caſt to the people, and great fires made through the citie. The ſame night the French king came into Cambreie, well and noblie accompanied, and ſaluted the ladies, and to them made diuerſe bankets: and then all perſons departed into their countrie, glad of this concord. This peace was called the womens peace, for bicauſe that notwithſtanding this concluſion, yet neither the emperour truſted the French king, nor he neither truſted nor loued him, and their ſubiects were in the ſame caſe. This proclamation was proclamed ſolemnelie by heralds with trumpets in the citie of London, which proclamation much reioiſed the Engliſh merchants, repairing into Flanders, Brabant, Zeland, and other the emperors dominions. For during the wars, merchants were euill handled on both parties, which cauſed them to be deſirous of peace.] On the foure & twentith of Nouember, was ſir Thomas Moore made lord chancellor, & the next day led to the Chancerie by the dukes of Norffolke and Suffolke, and there ſworne.

The womens peace.

Sir Thomas Moore lord chancellor.

Edw.Hall.in H.8.fo.clxxxvij

An oration made in the audience of the parlement by ſir Thomas Moore.

At the daie appointed the parlement began, on which daie the king came by water to his place of Bridewell, and there he and his nobles put on their robes of parlement, and ſo came to the Blacke friers church, where a maſſe of the Holie-ghoſt was ſolemnelie ſong by the kings chappell: and after the maſſe, the king with all the lords of parlement and commons, which were ſummoned to appeare at that daie, came into the parlement chamber, where the king ſate in his throne or ſeat roiall: and ſir Thomas Moore his chancellor, ſtanding on the right hand of the king behind the barre, made an eloquent oration.

In this oration he declared, that like as a good ſheepheard, which not alonelie keepeth and attendeth well his ſheepe, but alſo foreſeeth and prouideth for all things which either may be hurtfull or noiſome to his flocke, or maie preſerue and defend the ſame againſt all perils that may chance to come: ſo the king which was the ſheepheard, ruler and gouernour of his realme, vigilantlie foreſeeing things to come, conſidered how diuers laws before this time were made, now by long continuance of time and mutation of things, verie inſufficient and vnperfect: and alſo by the fraile condition of man, diuerſe new enormities were ſprong amongeſt the people, for the which no law was yet made to reforme the ſame. Which was the verie cauſe whie at that time the king had ſummoned his high court of parlement. And hee reſembled the king to a ſheepheard or heardman for this cauſe: for if a prince be compared to his riches, he is but a rich man; if a prince be compared to his honour, he is but an honourable man: but compare him to the multitude of his people, and the number of his flocke, then he is a ruler, a gouernor of might & puiſſance, ſo that his people maketh him a prince, as of the multitude of ſheepe commeth the name of a ſheepheard. And as you ſee that amongſt a great ſort of ſhepe ſome be rotten & faultie, which the good ſheepheard ſendeth from the good ſheepe: ſo the great wedder which is of late fallen (as you all know) ſo craftilie, ſo ſcabbedlie, yea and ſo vntrulie iugled with the king, that all men muſt neede ghesse and thinke, that he thought in himſelfe that he had no wit to perceiue his craftie dooing; or elſe that he preſumed that the king would not ſee nor know his fraudulent iugling and attempts. But he was deceiued: for his graces ſight was ſo quicke and penetrable, that hee ſaw him, yea and ſaw through him, both within and without, ſo that all things to him was open, and according to his deſert he hath had a gentle correction.

wherein the perſon of the king is properlie reputed a ruler.

Which ſmall puniſhment the king will not to be an example to other offendors, but clearelie declareth, that whoſoeuer hereafter ſhall make like attempt, or commit like offenſe, ſhall not eſcape with like puniſhment. And bicauſe you of the common houſe be a groſſe multitude, and can not ſpeake all at one time: therefore the kings pleaſure is, that you ſhall reſort to the nether houſe, & there amongſt your ſelues, according to the old and ancient cuſtome, to chooſe an able perſon to be your common mouth and ſpeaker: and after your election ſo made, to aduertiſe his grace thereof, which will declare to you his pleaſure, what day he will haue him preſent in this place. After this doone, the commons reſorted to the nether houſe, and they choſe for their ſpeaker Thomas Audleie eſquier, and attourneie of the duchie of Lancaſter: and the ſame daie was the parlement adiorned to Weſtminſter.

Thomas Audleie choſen ſpeaker.

On the ſirt daie of the ſame moneth, the king came to the parlement chamber, and all the lords in their robes. And there the commons of the nether houſe preſented their ſpeaker, which there made an eloquent oration, which conſiſted in two points. The firſt point was, that he much praiſed the king for his equitie and iuſtice, mixed with mercie and pitie, ſo that none offenſe was forgotten and left vnpuniſhed, nor in the puniſhment the extremitie nor the rigor of the law cruellie extended: which ſhould be a cauſe to bridle all men from doing like offenſes, & alſo a comfort to offendors to confeſſe their crime and offenſe, and an occaſion of amendment and reconciliation. The ſecond point was, that he diſabled himſelfe, both for lacke of wit, learning, and diſcretion to ſo high an office, beſeeching the king to cauſe his commons to reſort eftſoones to their common houſe, and there to chooſe an other ſpeaker for that parlement.

An oration made by the ſpeaker of the parlement.

To this the king (by the mouth of the lord chancellor) anſwered; that where he diſabled himſelfe in wit and learning, his owne ornate oration there made teſtified the contrarie. And as touching his diſcretion and other qualities, the king himſelfe had well knowne him and his doings ſince he was in his ſeruice, to be both wiſe and diſcreet: and ſo for an able man he accepted him, and for the ſpeaker he him admitted. When the commons were aſſembled in the nether houſe, they began to commune of their griefes, wherewith the ſpiritualtie had before time greeuouſlie oppreſſed them, both contrarie to the law of the realme, and contrarie to all right: and in ſpeciallie they were ſore mooued with ſix great cauſes.

The commõs of the lower houſe complaine againſt the clergie.

1 The firſt for the exceſſiue fines, which the ordinaries tooke for probats of teſtaments, inſomuch that ſir Henrie Guilford knight of the garter, and controllor of the kings houſe, declared in the open parlement on his fidelitie, that he and others being executors to ſir William Compton knight, paied for the probat of his will to the cardinall and the archbiſhop of Canturburie a thouſand markes ſterling. After this declaration were ſhewed ſo manie extortions doone by ordinaries for probats of willes, that it were too much to rehearſe.

2 The ſecond was the great polling and extreame exaction, which the ſpirituall men vſed in taking of corps, preſents, or mortuaries. For the children of the defunct ſhould all die for hunger, and go a begging, rather than they would of charitie giue to them the ſeelie cow which the dead man owght, if he had but onelie one; ſuch was the charitie then.

3 The third cauſe was, that prieſts being ſuruciors, ſtewards and officers to biſhops, abbats, and other ſpirituall heads, had and occupied farmes, granges, and graſing in euerie countrie, ſo that the poore huſbandmen could haue nothing but of them; and yet for that they ſhould paie deerlie.

4 The fourth cauſe was, that abbats, priors, and ſpirituall men kept tan-houſes, and bought and ſold wooll, cloth, and all maner of merchandize, as other temporall merchants did.

5 The fift cauſe was, bicauſe that ſpirituall perſons promoted to great benefices, and hauing their liuings of their flocke, were lieng in the court in lords houſes, and tooke all of the pariſhioners, and nothing ſpent on them at all: ſo that for lacke of reſidence both the poore of the pariſh lacked refreſhing, and vniuerſallie all the pariſhioners lacked preaching and true inſtruction of Gods word, to the great perill of their ſoules.

6 The ſirt cauſe was, to ſee one prieſt little learned, to haue ten or twelue benefices, & to be reſident vpon none; and to know manie well learned ſcholars in the vniuerſities, which were able to preach & teach, to haue neither benefice nor exhibition.

These things before this time might in no wiſe be touched, nor yet talked of by anie man, except he would be made an heretike, or leeſe all that he had. For the biſhops were chancellors, and had all the rule about the king, ſo that no man durſt once preſume to attempt anie thing contrarie to their profit or commoditie. But now, when God had illuminated the eies of the king, and that their ſubtile doings were once eſpied; then men began charitablie to deſire a reformation: and ſo at this parlement men began to ſhew their grudges. Whereupon the burgeſſes of the parlement appointed ſuch as were learned in the law, being of the common houſe, to draw one bill of the probats of teſtaments, another for mortuaries, and the third for non reſidence, pluralities, and taking of farmes by ſpirituall men. The learned men tooke much paines, and firſt ſet foorth the bill of mortuaries, which paſſed the common houſe, and was ſent vp to the lords. To this bill the ſpirituall lords made a faire face, ſaieng; that ſuerlie prieſts and curats tooke more than they ſhould, and therefore it were well done to take ſome reaſonable order: thus they ſpake, bicauſe it touched them little.

The biſhops ſticke hard againſt theſe billes.

But within two daies after was ſent vp the bill concerning probats of teſtaments; at the which the archbiſhop of Canturburie in eſpeciall, and all other biſhops in generall both frowned and grunted, for that touched their profit. Inſomuch as doctor John Fiſher biſhop of Rocheſter ſaid openlie in the parlement chamber theſe words: My lords, you ſee dailie what billes come hither from the common houſe, and all is to the deſtruction of the church. For Gods ſake ſee what a realme the kingdome of Boheme was; and when the church went downe, then fell the glorie of the kingdome: now with the commons is nothing but Downe with the church; and all this me ſeemeth is for lacke of faith onlie. When theſe words were reported to the commons of the nether houſe, that the biſhop ſhould ſaie, that all their doings were for lacke of faith, they tooke the matter greeuouſlie, for they imagined that the biſhop eſteemed them as heretikes, and ſo by his ſlanderous words would haue perſuaded the temporall lords, to haue reſtrained their conſent from the ſaid two billes, which they before had paſſed, as you haue heard before.

The ſaieng of John Fiſher biſhop of Rocheſter.

Wherefore the commons, after long debate, determined to ſend the ſpeaker of the parlement to the kings highneſſe, with a greeuous complaint againſt the biſhop of Rocheſter. And ſo on a daie, when the king was at leaſure, Thomas Audleie ſpeaker for the commons, and thirtie of the cheefe of the common houſe, came to the kings preſence in his palace at Weſtminſter, which before was called Yorke place; and there verie eloquentlie declared what a diſhonor to the king and the realme it was, to ſaie, that they which were elected for the wiſeſt men of all the ſhires, cities, and boroughs, within the realme of England, ſhould be declared, in ſo noble and open preſence, to lacke faith: which was equiualent to ſaie, that they were infidels, and no chriſtians, as ill as Turkes, or Saracens, ſo that what paine or ſtudie ſoeuer they tooke for the common wealth, or what acts or lawes ſoeuer they made or ſtabliſhed, ſhould be taken as lawes made by Painims and heathen people, and not woorthie to be kept by chriſtian men. Wherefore he moſt humblie beſought the kings highneſſe to call the ſaid biſhop before him, and to cauſe him to ſpeake more diſcreetlie of ſuch a number as was in the common houſe.

A complaint made to the king againſt the biſhop of Rocheſter.

The king was not well contented with the ſaieng of the biſhop, yet he gentlie anſwered the ſpeaker, that he would ſend for the biſhop, and ſend them word what anſwer he made, and ſo they departed againe. After this the king ſent for the archbiſhop of Canturburie and ſix other biſhops, and for the biſhop of Rocheſter alſo, and there declared to him the grudge of the commons; to the which the biſhop anſwered, that he meant the doings of the Bohemians was for lacke of faith, and not the doings of them that were in the common houſe. Which ſaieng was confirmed by the biſhops being preſent, who had him in great reputation: and ſo by that onelie ſaieng the king accepted his excuſe, and thereof ſent word to the commons by ſir William Fitz Williams knight, treaſuror of his houſhold; which blind excuſe pleaſed the commons nothing at all. After diuerſe aſſemblies were kept betweene certeine of the lords, and certeine of the commons, for the billes of probats of teſtaments, and the mortuaries; the temporaltie laid to the ſpiritualtie their owne lawes and conſtitutions; and the ſpiritualtie ſore defended them by preſcription & vſage, to whom this anſwer was made by a gentleman of Greies inne: The vſage hath euer beene of theeues to rob on Shooters hill, ergo is it lawfull?

The biſhops excuſe to the kings maieſtie.

Hard hold betweene the lords ſpirituall and temporall about the probats of willes and mortuaries.

With this anſwer the ſpirituall men were ſore offended, becauſe their doings were called robberies. But the temporall men ſtood ſtill by their ſaiengs, inſomuch that the ſaid gentleman ſaid to the archbiſhop of Canturburie, that both the exaction of probats of teſtaments, and the taking of mortuaries, as they were vſed, were open robberie and theft. After long diſputation, the temporall lords began to leane to the commons: but for all that the billes remained vnconcluded for a while. In the meane ſeaſon, there was a bill aſſented to by the lords, and ſent downe to the commons: the effect whereof was, that the whole realme by the ſaid act did releaſe to the king, all ſuch ſummes of monie as he had borrowed of them at the loane, in the fifteenth yeare of his reigne (as you haue heard before.) This bill was ſore argued in the common houſe, but the moſt part of the commons were the kings ſeruants, and the other were ſo laboured to by other, that the bill was aſſented vnto.

The loane of monie releaſed to the king, which he borowed in anno reg. 15.

When this releaſe of the loane was knowen to the commons of the realme, Lord ſo they grudged & ſpake ill of the whole parlement. For almoſt euerie man counted it his debt, and reckoned ſuerlie of the paiment of the ſame. And therefore ſome made their willes of the ſame, and ſome other did ſet it ouer to other for debt, and ſo manie men had loſſe by it, which cauſed them ſore to murmur, but there was no remedie. The king like a good and diſcreet prince, ſeeing that his commons in the parlement houſe had releaſed the loane, intending ſomewhat to requite the ſame, granted to them a generall pardon of all offenſes; certeine great offenſes and debts onelie excepted: alſo he aided them for the redreſſe of their griefes againſt the ſpiritualtie, and cauſed two new billes to be made indifferentlie, both for the probats of teſtaments and mortuaries; which billes were ſo reaſonable, that the ſpirituall lords aſſented to them all, though they were ſore againſt there mindes, & in eſpeciall the probats of teſtaments ſore diſpleaſed the biſhops, and the mortuaries ſore diſpleaſed the parſons and vicars.

The matter of teſtaments and mortuaries moderated by the king.

After theſe acts thus agreed, the commons made another act for pluralities of benefices, non reſidence, bieng ſelling and taking of farmes by ſpirituall perſons. Which act ſo diſpleaſed the ſpiritualtie, that the prieſts railed on the commons of the common houſe, and called them heretikes and ſchiſmatikes, for the which diuerſe prieſts were puniſhed. This act was ſore debated aboue in the parlement chamber, and the lords ſpirituall would in no wiſe conſent. Wherefore the king perceiuing the grudge of his commons, cauſed eight lords and eight of his commons to meet in the Star chamber at an after noone, and there was ſore debating of the cauſe, inſomuch that the temporall lords of the vpper houſe, which were there, tooke part with the commons, againſt the ſpirituall lords; and by force of reaſon cauſed them to aſſent to the bill with a little qualifieng. Which bill the next daie was wholie agreed to in the lords houſe, to the great reioiſing of the laie people, and to the great diſpleaſure of the ſpirituall perſons. During this parlement was brought downe to the commons the booke of articles, which the lords had put to the king againſt the cardinall, the chiefe whereof were theſe.

All againſt the cleargie both head and taile.

Articles exhibited againſt the cardinall of Yorke.

1 Firſt, that he without the kings aſſent had procured to be a legat, by reaſon whereof he tooke awaie the right of all biſhops and ſpirituall perſons.

2 Item, in all writings which he wrote to Rome, or anie other forren prince, he wrote Ego & rex meus, I and my king: as who would ſaie, that the king were his ſeruant.

3 Item, that he hath ſlandered the church of England in the court of Rome. For his ſuggeſtion to be legat was to reforme the church of England, which (as he wrote) was Facta in reprobum ſenſum.

4 Item, he without the kings aſſent carried the kings great ſeale with him into Flanders, when he was ſent ambaſſador to the emperour.

5 Item, he without the kings aſſent, ſent a commiſſion to ſir Gregorie de Caſſado, knight, to conclude a league betweene the king & the duke of Ferrar, without the kings knowledge.

6 Item, that he hauing the French pockes preſumed to come and breath on the king.

7 Item, that he cauſed the cardinals hat to be put on the kings coine.

8 Item, that he would not ſuffer the kings clerke of the market to ſit at ſaint Albons.

9 Item, that he had ſent innumerable ſubſtance to Rome, for the obteining of his dignities, to the great impoueriſhment of the realme.

Theſe articles, with manie more, read in the common houſe, and ſigned with the cardinals hand, was confeſſed by him. And alſo there was ſhewed a writing ſealed with his ſeale, by the which he gaue to the king all his moueables and vnmoueables. On the daie of the Conception of our ladie, the king at Yorke place at Weſtminſter, in the parlement time, created the vicount Rochford erle of Willſhire, and the vicount Fitz Water was created earle of Suſſex, and the lord Haſtings was created earle of Huntington. When all things were concluded in the parlement houſe, the king came to the parlement chamber the 17 daie of December, and there put his roiall aſſent to all things doone by the lords and commons, and ſo proroged his court of parlement till the next yeare. After the parlement was thus ended, the king remoued to Greenewich, and there kept his Chriſtmaſſe with the queene in great triumph: with great plentie of viands, and diuerſe diſguiſings and enterludes, to the great reioiſing of his people.]

Creation of earles at Yorke place.

The king, which all this while, ſince the doubt was moued touching his marriage, abſteined from the queenes bed, was now aduertiſed by his ambaſſadors, whom he had ſent to diuerſe vniuerſities for the abſoluing of his doubt, that the ſaid vniuerſities were agreed, and cleerelie concluded, that the one brother might not by Gods law marrie the other brothers wife, carnallie knowen by the firſt marriage, & that neither the pope nor the court of Rome could in anie wiſe diſpenſe with the ſame. For ye muſt vnderſtand, that amongſt other things alleged for diſproofe of the mariage to be lawfull, euidence was giuen of certeine words, which prince Arthur ſpake the morrow after he was firſt married to the quéene, whereby it was gathered, that he knew hir carnallie the night then paſſed. The words were theſe, as we find them in the chronicle of maſter Edward Hall.

In the morning after he was riſen from the bed, in which he had laine with hir all night, he called for drinke, which he before time was not accuſtomed to doo. At which thing, one of his chamberleines maruelling, required the cauſe of his drought. To whome he anſwered merilie, ſaieng; I haue this night béene in the middeſt of Spaine, which is a hot region, and that iournie maketh me ſo drie: and if thou haddeſt béene vnder that hot climat, thou wouldeſt haue béene drier than I. Againe, it was alleged, that after the death of prince Arthur, the king was deferred from the title and creation of prince of Wales almoſt halfe a yeare, which thing could not haue béene doubted, if ſhe had not béene carnallie knowen. Alſo ſhe hirſelfe cauſed a bull to be purchaſed, in the which were theſe words vel forſan cognitam, that is, and peraduenture carnallie knowen: which words were not in the firſt bull granted by pope Iulie at hir ſecond mariage to the king, which ſecond bull with that clauſe was onelie purchaſed to diſpenſe with the ſecond matrimonie, although there were carnall copulation before, which bull néeded not to haue béene purchaſed, if there had béene no carnall copulation, for then the firſt bull had béene ſufficient. To conclude, when theſe & other matters were laid forth to prooue that which ſhe denied, the carnall copulation betwixt hir and prince Arthur, hir counſellors left that matter, and fell to perſuaſions of naturall reaſon. And laſtlie, when nothing elſe would ſerue, they ſtood ſtiffe in the appeale to the pope, and in the diſpenſation purchaſed from the court of Rome, ſo that the matter was thus ſhifted off, and no end likelie to be had therein.

Ambaſſadors ſent to Italie out of England about this intricate matter of the marriage.

The king therefore vnderſtanding now that the emperour and the pope were appointed to méet at the citie of Bononie aliàs Bologna, where the emperour ſhould be crowned, ſent thither in ambaſſage from him the earle of Wilſhire, doctor Stokeſleie, elected biſhop of London, and his almoner doctor Edward Lée, to declare both vnto the pope and emperour, the law of God, the determinations of vniuerſities in the caſe of his mariage, and to require the pope to doo iuſtice according to truth, and alſo to ſhew to the emperour, that the king did mooue this matter onelie for diſcharge of his conſcience, and not for anie other reſpect of pleaſure or diſpleaſure earthlie. Theſe ambaſſadours comming to Bononie were honorablie receiued, and firſt dooing their meſſage to the pope, had anſwer of him, that he would heare the matter diſputed when he came to Rome, and according to right he would doo iuſtice.

The emperours anſwer to the ambaſſadors.

The emperour anſwered, that he in no wiſe would be againſt the lawes of God, & if the court of Rome would iudge that the matrimonie was not good, he could be content: but he ſolicited both the pope and cardinals, to ſtand by the diſpenſation, which he thought to be of force inough to prooue the mariage lawfull. With theſe anſwers the ambaſſadors departed and returned homewards, till they came on this ſide the mounteins, and then receiued letters from the king, which appointed the earle of Wilſhire to go in ambaſſage to the French king which then laie at Burdeaux, making ſhift for monie for redéeming of his children: and the biſhop of London, was appointed to go to Padoa, and other vniuerſities in Italie, to know their full reſolutions and determinate opinions in the kings caſe of matrimonie: and the kings almoner was commanded to returne home into England, and ſo he did.

The earle of Wilſhire ambaſſador to the French king, & others ſent to other places.

The cardinall licenced to repaire into Yorkeſhire.

¶ You haue heard before how the cardinall was atteinted in the premunire, and how he was put out of the office of the chancellor, & laie at Aſher. In this Lent ſeaſon the king by the aduiſe of his councell licenced him to go into his dioceſſe of Yorke, & gaue him commandement to kéepe him in his dioceſſe, and not to returne ſouthward without the kings ſpeciall licence in writing. So he made great prouiſion to go northward, and apparelled his ſeruants newlie, and bought manie coſtlie things for his houſhold: and ſo he might well inough, for he had of the kings gentleneſſe the biſhoprikes of Yorke and Wincheſter, which were no ſmall things. But at this time diuerſe of his ſeruants departed from him to the kings ſeruice, and in eſpeciall Thomas Crumwell one of his chiefe counſell, and chiefe dooer for him in the ſuppreſſion of abbeies. After that all things neceſſarie for his iournie were prepared, he tooke his waie northward till he came to Southwell, which is in his dioceſſe, and there he continued this yeare, euer grudging at his fall, as you ſhall heare hereafter. But the lands which he had giuen to his colleges in Oxford and Ipſwich, were now come to the kings hands, by his atteindor in the premunire: and yet the king of his gentleneſſe and for fauour that he bare to good learning, erected againe the college in Oxford, and where it was named the cardinals college, he called it the kings college, & indowed it with faire poſſeſſions, and put in new ſtatutes and ordinances. And for bicauſe the college of Ipſwich was thought to be nothing profitable, therefore he left that diſſolued.

Thomas Crumwell aduanced to the kings ſeruice.

The kings college in Oxford otherwiſe called Chriſts church.

In this yeare the emperour gaue to the lord maſter of ſaint Iohnes of Ieruſalem, and his brethren the Iland of Malta lieng betwéene Sicill and Barbarie, there to imploie themſelues vpon Chriſts enimies, which lord maſter had no place ſure to inhabit there, ſince he was put frõ the Rhodes by the Turke that beſieged Vienna, but miſſed of his expectation. For the chriſtians defended the ſame ſo valiantlie againſt the ſaid Turke and his power, that he loſt manie of his men by ſlaughter; manie alſo miſcarried by ſickneſſe and cold: ſo that there periſhed in all to the number of fourescore thouſand men, as one of his baſſats did afterward confeſſe, which was to him a great diſpleaſure; and in eſpeciallie bicauſe he neuer beſieged citie before, but either it was yéelded or taken. In the time of this ſiege a metrician did make theſe two verſes in memorie of the ſame:

Cæſar in Italiam quo venit Carolus anno,
Cincta eſt ripheis noſtra Vienna Getis.]

The new teſtament tranſlated into Engliſh.

In the beginning of this yeare was the hauing and reading of the new teſtament in Engliſh tranſlated by Tindall, Ioie, and others, forbidden by the king with the aduiſe of his councell, and namelie the biſhops, which affirmed that the ſame was not trulie tranſlated, and that therein were prologs and prefaces ſounding to hereſie, with vncharitable railing againſt biſhops and the cleargie. The king therefore commanded the biſhops, that they calling to them the beſt learned men of the vniuerſities, ſhould cauſe a new tranſlation to be made, that the people without danger might read the ſame for their better inſtruction in the lawes of God, and his holie word. Diuerſe perſons that were detected to vſe reading of the new teſtament, and other bookes in Engliſh ſet forth by Tindall, and ſuch other as were fled the realme, were puniſhed by order taken againſt them by ſir Thomas Moore then lord chancellor, who held greatlie againſt ſuch bookes, but ſtill the number dailie increaſed.

Edw. Hall in H.8. fol. Cxcij.

¶ In this yeare in Maie, the biſhop of London

Tindals teſtaments burned.

The wild Iriſh ſpoile the earle of Kildares countrie, &c.

cauſed all his new teſtaments which he had bought with manie other bookes, to be brought into Paules churchyard in London, and there were openlie burned. In the end of this yeare, the wild Iriſhmen, knowing the earle of Kildare to be in England, entered his land, and ſpoiled and burnt his countrie, with diuerſe other countries. And the erle of Oſſerie being the kings deputie made little reſiſtance, for lacke of power. Wherfore the king ſent the earle of Kildare into Ireland, & with him ſir William Skeuington knight, maſter of the kings ordinance, and diuerſe gunners with him, which ſo politikelie ordered themſelues, that their enimies were glad to offer amends, and to treat for truce: & ſo ſir William Skeuington the next yeere returned into England, leauing there the earle of Kildare for the kings deputie.

The execution of the treatie accorded vpon at Cambreie.

Now I will returne to the execution of the treatie of Cambreie, in the which it was agreed, that the ladie Eleanor and the French kings children ſhould be deliuered when the ranſome appointed was paied as you haue heard in the laſt yeare. Wherefore the French king gathered monie of his ſubiects with all ſpeed, and when the monie was readie, he ſent the great maſter of France called Annas de Memorancie and diuerſe other nobles to Baion with the monie, and to receiue the ladie and the children. And thither came to them the great conſtable of Caſtile and monſieur Prat for the emperour, & there the crowns were weied and touched: and what fault ſoeuer the Spaniards found in them they would not receiue a great number of them, and ſo they carried the children backe from Fontarbie into Spaine. Thus the great maſter of France and his companie laie ſtill at Baion, without hauing his purpoſe performed, from March till the end of June, and longer had lien if the king of England had not ſent ſir Francis Brian to Baion to warrant the paiement: wherevpon the daie of deliuerance was appointed to be on ſaint Peters daie in June.

The deliuerance of the French kings children.

At which daie the great maſter, with one and thirtie mulets laden with the crownes came to the one ſide of the riuer of Andaie, which riuer departeth Spaine and France, and there taried till the firſt daie of Julie: on which daie the ladie Eleanor and the children were put in two great boates, hauing onelie twelue gentlemen of Spaine with them: and in like maner the great maſter with two great boats, in the which the mony was, and twelue gentlemen with him. All theſe boats met at a bridge made in the middeſt of the riuer. The conſtable of Spaine and his twelue gentlemen met with the great maſter of France and his twelue gentlemen on the bridge: and after a little ſalutation, the Frenchmen entered into the two boats where the ladie and the two children were; and the Spaniards into the two boats where the monie was, and then ech part haſted to land. Thus were the French kings wife and children deliuered into his hands, for which deliuerance was great ioy and triumph made in France: and alſo in Julie were fiers made in London and diuerſe other places for the ſame conſideration and cauſe.]

Cardinall Wolſeie remoueth to Richmond.

¶ Now will we leaue France, and returne to England, renewing the remembrance of cardinall Wolſeie, who after great ſute made to the king, was licenced to remoue from Aſher to Richmond, which place he had a little before repared with great coſts, for the king made an exchange thereof with him for Hampton court. The cardinall hauing licence of the king to repaire to Richmond, made haſt thither, and lodged there in the lodge of the great parke, which was a verie pretie houſe, there he laie vntill the beginning of Lent. Then he remoued into the charterhouſe of Richmond, where he laie in a lodging which doctor Collet made for himſelfe, vntill he remoued northward, which was in the Paſſion weeke after, and euerie daie he reſorted to the charterhouſe there, and would ſit with one of the moſt ancient fathers, who perſuaded him to deſpiſe the vaine glorie of the world.

The cardinall prepareth for his iournie into the north.

Then prepared the cardinall for his iournie into the north, and ſent to London for liuerie clothes for his ſeruants, and ſo rode from Richmond to Hendon, from thence to a place called the Rie, the next daie to Raiſtone, where he lodged in the priorie; the next daie to Huntingdon, and there lodged in the abbeie; the next daie to Peterborow, and there lodged in the abbeie, where he abode all the next weeke, & there he kept his Eaſter, his traine was in number an hundred and threeſcore perſons. Vpon Maundie thurſdaie he made his maundie, there hauing nine and fiftie poore men, whoſe feet he waſhed, and gaue euerie one twelue pence in monie, three els of good canuas, a paire of ſhoes, a caſt of red herrings, and three white herrings, and one of them had two ſhillings.

On thurſdaie next after Eaſter, he remoued to maſter Fitz Williams, ſometime a merchant-tailor of London, and then of the kings councell; the next weeke he remoued to Stamford, the next daie to Grantham, the next daie to Newarke, and lodged in the caſtell that night and the next daie alſo: from thence he rode to Southwell, where he continued moſt part of all that ſummer, vntill the latter end of graſſe time, and then he rode to Scrobie, where he continued vntill Michaelmaſſe, and then to Cawood caſtell within ſeuen miles of Yorke, whereof we will ſpeake more hereafter. On the ſixteenth of Maie, a man was hanged in chaines in Finſburie field, for murthering doctor Miles vicar of ſaint Brides. The fourth and fift of Nouember was a great wind, that blew downe manie houſes and trees, after which wind followed ſo high a tide, that it drowned the marſhes on Eſſex ſide and Kent, with the Ile of Thanet, and other places, deſtroieng much cattell. The nineteenth of September, in the citie of London, a proclamation was made for the reſtreining of the popes authoritie in England, as followeth.

Vicar of S. Brides ſlain.

A great wind.

A proclamation publiſhed in England in the behalfe of the kings prerogatiue roiall againſt the pope.

THe kings highnes ſtreictlie chargeth and commandeth, that no maner of perſon, of what eſtate, degree, or condition ſoeuer he or they be of, doo purchaſe or attempt to purchaſe from the court of Rome or elſwhere, nor vſe & put in execution, diuulge, or publiſh anie thing hertofore within this yeare paſſed purchaſed, or to be purchaſed hereafter, conteining mater preiudiciall to the high authoritie, iuriſdiction, and prerogatiue roiall of this his ſaid realme, or to the let, hinderance, or impechment of his graces noble & vertuous intended purpoſes in the premiſſes, vpon paine of incurring his highneſſe indignation, and impriſonment, and further puniſhment of their bodies for their ſo dooing at his graces pleaſure, to the dreadfull example of all other.

What was ſurmiſed to be the cauſe of this proclamation.

Some iudged, that this proclamation was made, bicauſe the queene (as was ſaid) had purchaſed a new bull for ratification of hir marriage. Others thought that it was made, bicauſe the cardinall had purchaſed a bull to curſſe the king, if he would not reſtore him to his old dignities, and ſuffer him to correct the ſpiritualtie, the king not to meddle with the ſame. In deed manie coniectured, that the cardinall grudging at his fall from ſo high dignities, ſticked not to write things ſounding to the kings reproch, both to the pope, and other princes; for that manie opprobrious words were ſpoken to doctor Edward Keerne the kings orator at Rome, and that it was ſaid to him, that for the cardinals ſake the king ſhould haue the worſe ſpeed in the ſute of his matrimonie.

Abr. Fl. ex I. S. pag. 970.
The cardinall at his manor of Cawood keepeth a bountifull houſe.

¶Cardinall Wolſeie lieng at Cawood, held there an honourable and plentifull houſe for all commers, and alſo built & repared the caſtell, which was greatlie in decaie, hauing artificers and labourers aboue three hundred perſons dailie in wages. At length being thereunto perſuaded by the doctors of the church of Yorke, he determined to be inſtalled there at Yorke minſter, the next mondaie after Alhallowes daie, againſt which time due preparation was made for the ſame, but not in ſuch ſumptuous wiſe, as his predeceſſors before him had vſed. For wheras the cardinall was not abaſhed to ſend to the king, requiring him to lend him the mitre and pall which he was woont to weare when he ſang maſſe in anie ſolemne aſſemblie: the king vpon ſight of his letters, could not but maruell at the proud preſumptuouſnes of the man, ſaieng: What a thing is this, that pride ſhuld thus reigne in a perſon that is quite vnder foot.

The cardinall knoweth not that he was to be arreſted of treaſon.

The daie being once knowne vnto the worſhipfull gentlemen of the countrie, and other, as abbats, and priors, and notice of his inſtallation, they ſent in ſuch prouiſion of vittels, that it is almoſt incredible, all which was vnknowne to the cardinall, for as much as he was preuented and diſappointed of his purpoſe, by the reaſon that he was arreſted of high treaſon, as yee ſhall heereafter heare. So that moſt part of this former prouiſion that I ſpeake of, was ſent vnto Yorke the ſame daie of his arreſt, and the next daie following: for his arreſt was kept as cloſe as could be. The order of his arreſt was thus. It was appointed by the king & counſell, that ſir Walter Walſh knight, one of the kings priuie chamber, ſhould be ſent downe with a commiſſion into the north vnto the earle of Northumberland (who was ſometime brought vp in houſe with the cardinall) and they twaine being iointlie in commiſſion to arreſt the cardinall of high treaſon, maiſter Walſh tooke his horſſe at the court gate, about noone, vpon Alhallowes daie, toward the earle of Northumberland.

Prognoſtications of the cardinals ruine or fall.

And now haue I occaſion to declare what happened about the ſame time, which peraduenture ſignified the troubles following to the cardinall. The cardinall ſitting at dinner vpon Alhallowes daie, hauing at his boords end diuerſe chapleins ſitting at dinner, yee ſhall vnderſtand that the cardinals great croſſe ſtood in a corner at the tables end, leaning againſt the hanging, and when the boords end was taken vp, and a conuenient time for the chapleins to ariſe, one doctor Auguſtine a Venecian, and phyſician to the cardinall, riſing from the table with the other, hauing vpon him a great gowne of boiſterous veluet, ouerthrew the croſſe, which trailing downe along the tappet, with the point of one of the croſſes, brake doctor Bonars head that the bloud ran downe, the companie there ſtanding greatlie aſtonied with the chance.

Doctor Bonars head broken.

The cardinall perceiuing the ſame, demanded what the matter meant of their ſudden amaze? And they ſhewed him of the fall of his croſſe vpon doctor Bonars head. Hath it (quoth he) drawne anie bloud? Yea forſooth my lord (quoth they.) With that he caſt his eies aſide, & ſhaking his head, ſaid Malum omen, & therewith ſaieng grace, roſe from the table, & went to his chamber. Now marke the ſignification how the cardinall expounded this matter at Pomfret after his fall. Firſt, yee ſhall vnderſtand, that the croſſe which he bare as archbiſhop of Yorke, ſignified himſelfe; and Auguſtine the phyſician who ouerthrew the croſſe, was onelie he that accuſed the cardinall, whereby his enimies caught an occaſion to ouerthrow him: it fell vpon doctor Bonars head, who was maiſter of the cardinals faculties and ſpirituall iuriſdictions, and was then damnified by the ouerthrow of the croſſe: yea, and more ouer, drawing bloud of him, betokened death, which ſhortlie after did inſue.

How the cardinall expounded the fall of his croſſe.

About the time of this miſchance, the ſame verie daie and ſeaſon, maiſter Walſh tooke his horſſe at the court as nigh as could be iudged. Now the appointed time drew neere of his inſtallation, and ſitting at dinner vpon the fridaie next before the mondaie on the which daie he intended to be inſtalled at Yorke, the earle of Northumberland and maiſter Walſh, with a great companie of gentlemen of the earles houſe, & of the countrie, whome he had gathered togither in the kings name, came to the hall at Cawood, the officers being at dinner, and the cardinall not fullie dined, being then in his fruits. The firſt thing that the earle did after he had ſet order in the hall, he commanded the porter at the gates to deliuer him the keies thereof. Who would in no wiſe obeie his commandement, though he were roughlie threatened, and ſtreictlie commanded in the kings name to make deliuerie of them to one of the earles ſeruants.

The earle of Northumberland arreſteth the cardinall.

Sir (quoth he) ſeeing that yee doo but intend to ſet one of your ſeruants in my place to keepe the gates, I know no ſeruant that yee haue but I am as able as he to doo it, and keepe the gates to your purpoſe (whatſoeuer it be) alſo the keies were deliuered me by my lord and maiſter, wherfore I praie you to pardon me, for whatſoeuer yee ſhall command me to doo in the miniſtration of mine office, I ſhall doo it with a good will. With that (quoth the earle) hold him a booke (& commanding him to laie his hand thereon:) Thou ſhalt ſweare (quoth he) that thou ſhalt well and trulie keepe the gates to the kings vſe, and to doo all ſuch things as we ſhall command: and that yee ſhall let paſſe neither in nor out at theſe gates, but ſuch as yee be commanded by vs. And with this oth he receiued the keies at the earles hands.

The porters words to the earle.

Of all theſe doings knew the cardinall nothing, for they ſtopped the ſtaires, ſo that none went vp to the cardinals chamber, and they that came downe could no more go vp againe. At the laſt one eſcaped, who ſhewed the cardinall that the earle was in the hall. Whereat the cardinall maruelled, and would not beleeue him, but commanded a gentleman to bring him the truth, who going downe the ſtaires, ſaw the earle of Northumberland, and returned, and ſaid it was verie he. Then (quoth the cardinall) I am ſorie that we haue dined, for I feare our officers be not prouided of anie ſtore of good fiſh, to make him ſome honorable cheere, let the table ſtand (quoth he.) With that he roſe vp, and going downe the ſtaires, he encountered the earle comming vp with all his taile. And as ſoone as the cardinall eſpied the earle, he put off his cap, and ſaid, My lord ye be moſt hartilie welcome, and ſo imbraced each other.

The cardinall maruelleth at the earls ſudden comming.

Then the cardinall tooke the earle by the hand, and had him vp into the chamber, whome followed all the number of the earles ſeruants. From thence he led him into his bed-chamber, and they being there all alone, the earle ſaid vnto the cardinall with a ſoft voice, laieng his hand vpon his arme: My lord I arreſt you of high treaſon. With which words the cardinall being maruellouſlie aſtonied, ſtanding both ſtill a good ſpace. At laſt (quoth the cardinall) What authoritie haue you to arreſt me? Forſooth my lord (quoth the erle) I haue a commiſſion ſo to doo. Where is your commiſſion (quoth he) that I may ſée it? Naie ſir that you may not (ſaid the erle.) Well then (quoth the cardinall) I will not obeie your reſt. But as they were debating this matter betwéene them in the chamber, as buſie was maiſter Walſh in arreſting doctor Auguſtine at the doore of the palace, ſaieng vnto him, Go in traitor or I ſhall make thée.

The action of arreſt which the cardinall taketh in ill part.

At the laſt maiſter Walſh being entred the cardinals chamber, began to plucke off his hood, and after knéeled downe to the cardinall. Vnto whom the cardinall ſaid, Come hither gentleman & let me ſpeake with you: Sir, héere my lord of Northumberland hath arreſted me, but by whoſe authoritie he ſheweth not, if yée be ioined with him I praie you ſhew me. Indéed my lord (quoth maiſter Walſh) he ſheweth you the truth. Well then (quoth the cardinall) I praie you let me ſée it. Sir I beſéech you (quoth maiſter Walſh) hold vs excuſed: there is annexed to our commiſſion certeine inſtructions, which you may not ſée. Well (quoth the cardinall) I trow yée are one of the kings priuie chamber, your name is Walſh, I am content to yéeld to you, but not to my lord of Northumberland without I ſée his commiſſion: the worſt in the kings priuie chamber is ſufficient to arreſt the greateſt péere of the realme by the kings commandement, without anie commiſſion, therefore put your commiſſion and authoritie in execution, ſpare not, I will obeie the kings will; I take God to iudge, I neuer offended the king in word nor déed.

The cardinall deſireth to ſée the commiſſion of the areſt.

Then the earle called into the chamber diuerſe gentlemen of his owne ſeruants, and after they had taken the cardinals keies from him, they put him in cuſtodie of the earles gentlemen, and then they went about the houſe to ſet all things in an order. Then ſent they doctor Auguſtine awaie to London with as much ſpéed as they could, who was bound vnto the horſſe like a traitor. But it was ſundaie toward night yer the cardinall was conueied from Cawood, who lodged that night in the abbeie of Pomfret. The next daie he remoued toward Doncaſter, and was there lodged at the Blacke friers. The next daie he was remoued to Shefield parke, where the earle of Shrewſburie with his ladie, and a traine of gentlemen and gentlewomen receiued him with much honour. Then departed all the great number of gentlemen that conducted him thither.

The cardinall committed to the cuſtodie of the earls gentlemen.

The cardinall being thus with the earle of Shrewſburie, continued there eightéene daies after, vpon whome the earle appointed diuerſe gentlemen to attend continuallie, to ſée that he ſhould lacke nothing, being ſerued in his owne chamber as honorablie as he had béene in his owne houſe, and once euerie daie the earle would repaire to him and commune with him. After the cardinall had thus remained with the earle of Shrewſburie about a fortnight, it came to paſſe at a certeine time as he ſat at dinner in his owne chamber, hauing at his boords end a meſſe of gentlemen and chapleins to kéepe him companie, toward the end of his dinner, when he was come to eating his fruits, his colour was perceiued often to change, whereby he was iudged not to be in good health.

The cardinall honourablie receiued and ſerued at the earle of Shrewſburies houſe.

Wherevpon one of his gentlemen ſaid, Sir, me ſéemes you are not well at eaſe. To whom he anſwered with lowd voice, Forſooth no more I am, for I am (quoth he) taken ſuddenlie with a thing about my ſtomach, that lieth there along as cold as a whetſtone, which is no more but wind, I praie you go to the apothecarie, & inquire of him if he haue anie thing that will breake wind vpward. Then went he to the earle and ſhewed him what eſtate the cardinall was in, and what he deſired. With that, the earle cauſed the apothecarie to be called before him, & demanded of him if he had anie thing that would breake wind vpward in a mans bodie. And he anſwered he had ſuch géere. Then (quoth the earle) fetch me ſome. Then the apothecarie fetched a white confection in a faire paper, & ſhewed it to the earle, who commanded one to giue the aſſaie thereof before him, and then the ſame to be brought to the cardinall, who receiued it vp all at once into his mouth.

The cardinall ſickneth ſitting at the table.

But immediatlie after ſuerlie, he auoided much wind vpward: Lo (quoth he) ye may ſée that it was but wind, and now I am well eaſed, I thanke God, and ſo roſe from the table, and went to his praiers. And that doone, there came on him ſuch a looſeneſſe, that it cauſed him to go to the ſtoole. And not long after the earle of Shreweſburie came into the gallerie to him, with whome the cardinall met: and then ſitting downe vpon a bench, the earle aſked him how he did, and he moſt lamentablie anſwered him, and thanked him for his good interteinment. Sir (quoth the earle) if ye remember, ye haue often wiſhed to come before the king, to make your anſwer; and I haue written to the king in that behalfe, making him priuie of your lamentation that yée inwardlie haue receiued for his diſpleaſure, who accepteth all your doings therein, as friends be accuſtomed to doo in ſuch caſes: wherefore I would aduiſe you to plucke vp your hart, and be not agaſt of your enimies, I doubt not but this your iournie to his highneſſe ſhall be much to your aduancement.

The cardinall falleth into a flux that coſt him his life.

The king hath ſent for you that worſhipfull knight maſter Kingſton, and with him foure and twentie of your old ſeruants, now of the gard, to the intent yée may ſafelie come to his maieſtie. Sir (quoth the cardinall) I trow maſter Kingſton is conſtable of the Tower. Yea, what of that (quoth the erle) I aſſure you he is elected by the king for one of your friends. Well quoth the cardinall, as God will, ſo be it, I am ſubiect to fortune, being a true man, readie to accept ſuch chances as ſhall follow, and there an end; I praie you where is maſter Kingſton. Quoth the earle, I will ſend for him. I praie you ſo doo (quoth the cardinall) at whoſe meſſage he came. And as ſoone as the cardinall eſpied him, he made haſt to encounter him, and at his comming he knéeled to him, and ſaluted him in the kings behalfe, whome the cardinall bareheaded offered to take vp, and ſaid: I praie you ſtand vp, knéele not to me, I am but a wretch replet with miſerie, not eſtéeming my ſelfe but as a vile abiect, vtterlie caſt awaie, without deſert, as God knoweth.

Sir william Kingſton is ſent to fetch vp the cardinall before the king.

Then ſaid maſter Kingſton with humble reuerence: Sir, the king hath him commended vnto you. I thanke his highneſſe quoth the cardinall, I truſt he be in health. Yea (quoth maſter Kingſton) and he commanded me to ſaie to you, that you ſhould aſſure your ſelfe that he beareth you as much good will as euer he did, and willeth you to be of good chéere. And where report hath béene made, that ye ſhould commit againſt him certeine heinous crimes, which he thinks to be vntrue, yet he can doo no leſſe than ſend for you to your triall, & to take your iournie to him at your owne pleaſure, commanding me to be attendant vpon you. Therefore ſir I praie you, when it ſhall be your owne pleaſure to take your iournie, I ſhall be readie to giue attendance. Maſter Kingſton (quoth he) I thanke you for your newes, and ſir, if I were as luſtie as I haue béene but of late, I would ride with you in poſt, but I am diſeaſed with a flux that maketh me verie weake, but I ſhall with all ſpéed make me readie to ride with you to morrow.

Talke betwixt the ſaid ſir william & the cardinall.

When night came, the cardinall waxed verie ſicke

with the laſke, the which cauſed him continuallie to go to the ſtoole all that night, in ſo much that he had that night fiftie ſtooles: therefore in conſideration of his infirmitie, they cauſed him to tarrie all that day: and the next daie he tooke his iournie with maſter Kingſton, and them of the gard, till he came to an houſe of the earle of Shreweſburies called Hardwike hall, where he laie all night verie euill at eaſe. The next daie he rode to Notingham, and there lodged that night more ſicke: and the next daie he rode to Leiceſter abbeie, and by the waie waxed ſo ſicke that he was almoſt fallen from his mule; ſo that it was night before he came to the abbeie of Leiceſter, where at his comming in at the gates, the abbat with all his conuent met him with diuerſe torches light, whom they honorablie receiued and welcomed.

To whom the cardinall ſaid: Father abbat, I am come hither to lay my bones among you, riding ſo ſtill vntill he came to the ſtaires of the chamber, where he allighted from his mule, and maſter Kingſton led him vp the ſtaires, and as ſoone as he was in his chamber he went to bed. This was on the ſaturday at night, and then increaſed he ſicker and ſicker, vntill mondaie, that all men thought he would haue died: ſo on tueſdaie ſaint Andrewes euen, maſter Kingſton came to him and bad him good morrow, for it was about ſix of the clocke, and aſked him how he did? Sir (quoth he) I tarrie but the pleaſure of God, to render vp my poore ſoule into his hands. Not ſo ſir (quoth maſter Kingſton) with the grace of God, yée ſhall liue and doo verie well, if yée will be of good chéere. Nay in good ſooth maſter Kingſton, my diſeaſe is ſuch, that I can not liue: for I haue had ſome experience in phyſicke.

The cardinall affirmeth by his owne experience in phyſicke that he can not liue.

Thus it is, I haue a flux with a continuall feuer, the nature whereof is, that if there be no alteration of the ſame within eight daies, either muſt inſue excoriation of the intrailes, or franſie, or elſe preſent death, and the beſt of them is death, and (as I ſuppoſe) this is the eight daie, & if yée ſée no alteration in me, there is no remedie, ſaue (though I may liue a daie or twaine after) but death muſt inſue. Sir (quoth maiſter Kingſton) you be in much penſiuenes, doubting that thing, that in good faith yée néed not. Well, well, maſter Kingſton (quoth the cardinall) I ſée the matter how it is framed: but if I had ſerued God as diligentlie as I haue doone the king, he would not haue giuen me ouer in my greie haires: but it is the iuſt reward that I muſt receiue for the diligent paines and ſtudie that I haue had to doo him ſeruice, not regarding my ſeruice to God, but onelie to ſatiſfie his pleaſure.

The cardinall aſcribeth his fall to the iuſt iudgement of God.

I praie you haue me moſt humblie commended vnto his roiall maieſtie, & beſéech him in my behalfe to call to his princelie remembrance all matters procéeding betwéene him & me from the beginning of the world, and the progreſſe of the ſame, &c. Maſter Kingſton farewell, I can no more ſaie, but I wiſh all things to haue good ſucceſſe, my time draweth on faſt. And euen with that he began to draw his ſpéech at length, & his tong to faile, his eies being ſet, whoſe ſight failed him. Then they did put him in remembrance of Chriſt his paſſion, & cauſed the yeomen of the gard to ſtand by to ſée him die, and to witneſſe of his words at his departure: & incontinent the clocke ſtroke eight, and then he gaue vp the ghoſt, and departed this preſent life: which cauſed ſome to call to remembrance how he ſaid the daie before, that at eight of the clocke they ſhould looſe their maſter.

Manifeſt indication of death in the cardinall.

Example of pride and arrogancie.

Here is the end and fall of pride and arrogancie of men exalted by fortune to dignitie: for in his time he was the hautteſt man in all his procéedings aliue, hauing more reſpect to the honor of his perſon, than he had to his ſpirituall profeſſion, wherin ſhould be ſhewed all méekenes, humilitie, and charitie. [An example (ſaith Guicciardin, who handleth this ſtorie effectuallie, and ſheweth the cauſe of this cardinals ruine) in our daies worthie of memorie, touching the power which fortune and enuie hath in the courts of princes.] He died in Leiceſter abbeie, & in the church of the ſame abbeie was buried. Such is the ſuertie of mans brittle ſtate, doubtfull in birth, & no leſſe féeble in life, which is as vncerteine, as death moſt certeine, and the meanes thereof manifold, which as in number they excéed; ſo in ſtrangeneſſe they paſſe: all degrées of ages & diuerſities of ſexes being ſubiect to the ſame. In conſideration whereof, it was notablie ſaid by one that wrote a whole volume of infirmities, diſeaſes, and paſſions incident to children:

Sebaſt.Auſterius.

This cardinall (as Edmund Campian in his hiſtorie of Ireland deſcribeth him) was a man vndoubtedly borne to honor: I thinke (ſaith he) ſome princes baſtard, no butchers ſonne, excéeding wiſe, faire ſpoken, high minded, full of reuenge, vitious of his bodie, loftie to his enimies, were they neuer ſo big, to thoſe that accepted and ſought his fréendſhip wonderfull courteous, a ripe ſchooleman, thrall to affections, brought a bed with flatterie, inſatiable to get, and more princelie in beſtowing, as appeareth by his two colleges at Ipſwich and Oxenford, the one ouerthrowne with his fall, the other vnfiniſhed, and yet as it lieth for an houſe of ſtudents, conſidering all the appurtenances incomparable thorough Chriſtendome, whereof Henrie the eight is now called founder, bicauſe he let it ſtand. He held and inioied at once the biſhopriks of Yorke, Dureſme, & Wincheſter, the dignities of lord cardinall, legat, & chancellor, the abbeie of ſaint Albons, diuerſe priories, ſundrie fat benefices In commendam, a great preferrer of his ſeruants, an aduancer of learning, ſtout in euerie quarell, neuer happie till this his ouerthrow. Wherein he ſhewed ſuch moderation, and ended ſo perfectlie, that the houre of his death did him more honor, than all the pompe of his life paſſed. Thus far Campian. Here it is neceſſarie to adde that notable diſcourſe, which I find in Iohn Stow, concerning the ſtate of the cardinall, both in the yeares of his youth, and in his ſettled age: with his ſudden comming vp from preferment to preferment; till he was aduanced to that ſtep of honor, which making him inſolent, brought him to confuſion.

The deſcription of cardinall Wolſeie, ſet downe by Edmund Campian.

¶This Thomas Wolſeie was a poore mans ſonne of Ipſwich, in the countie of Suffolke, & there borne, and being but a child, verie apt to be learned, by the meanes of his parents he was conueied to the vniuerſitie of Oxenford, where he ſhortlie proſpered ſo in learning, as he was made bachellor of art, when he paſſed not fiftéene yeares of age, and was called moſt commonlie thorough the vniuerſitie the boie bachellor. Thus proſpering in learning, he was made fellow of Mawdeline college, and afterward appointed to be ſchoolemaſter of Mawdelin ſchoole, at which time the lord marqueſſe Dorſet had thrée of his ſonnes there at ſchoole, committing vnto him as well their education as their inſtruction. It pleaſed the ſaid lord marqueſſe againſt a Chriſtmas ſeaſon to ſend as well for the ſchoolemaſter, as for his children home to his houſe for their recreation, in that pleaſant and honorable feaſt.

Then being there, the lord their father, perceiuing them to be right well imploied in learning for their time, he hauing a benefice in his gift, being at that time void, gaue the ſame to the ſchoolemaſter in reward of his diligence at his departure after Chriſt-was to the vniuerſitie, and hauing the preſentation thereof, repaired to the ordinarie for his induction, and being furniſhed of his inſtruments, made ſpéed to the benefice to take poſſeſſion, and being there for that intent, one ſir James Paulet knight dwelling thereabouts, tooke occaſion againſt him, and ſet the ſchoolemaſter by the héeles during his pleaſure, which after was neither forgotten nor forgiuen.

Thomas Wolſeie gat a benefice.

Thomas Wolſeie ſet in the ſtocks by ſir James Paulet. Wolſeies impriſonment reuenged.

For when the ſchoolemaſter mounted to the dignitie to be chancellor of England, he ſent for maſter Paulet, & after manie ſharpe words, inioined him to attend vntill he were diſmiſſed, and not to depart out of London without licence obteined; ſo that he continued there within the middle Temple the ſpace of fiue or ſix yeares, and laie then in the Gate houſe next the ſtréet, which he reedified verie ſumptuouſlie, garniſhing the ſame all ouer the outſide with the cardinals armes, with his hat, cogniſances, and other deuiſes in ſo glorious a ſort, that he thought thereby to haue appeaſed his old diſpleaſure.

Gatehouſe of the middle Temple new builded.

Now after the deceaſſe of the lord marqueſſe, this ſame ſchoolemaſter conſidering himſelfe to be but a ſimple beneficed man, and to haue loſt his fellowſhip in the college, which was much to his reléefe, thought not long to be vnprouided of ſome other helpe, and in his trauell thereabouts, he fell in acquaintance with one ſir John Naphant, a verie graue & ancient knight, who had a great roome in Calis vnder king Henrie the ſeuenth: this knight he ſerued, and behaued himſelfe ſo diſcréetlie, that he obteined the eſpeciall fauor of his maſter, inſomuch that he committed all the charge of his office vnto his chapleine, and (as I vnderſtand) the office was the treaſurorſhip of Calis, who was in conſideration of his great age diſcharged of his roome, and returned againe into England, and thorough his inſtant labor, his chapleine was promoted to be the kings chapleine, and when he had once caſt anchor in the port of promotion, how he wrought, I ſhall ſomewhat declare.

Sir John Naphant treaſuror of Calis, Thomas Wolſie his chapleine.

Thomas Wolſie was chapleine to Henrie the ſeuenth.

He hauing there a iuſt occaſion to be in the ſight of the king dailie, by reaſon he ſaid maſſe before him in his cloſet, and that being doone, he ſpent not the daie in idleneſſe, but would attend vpon thoſe whom he thought to beare moſt rule in the councell, the which at that time was doctor Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, ſecretarie, and lord of the priuie ſeale: and alſo ſir Thomas Louell knight, a ſage councellor, maſter of the wards, and conſtable of the Tower: theſe graue councellors in proceſſe of time perceiued this chapleine to haue a verie fine wit, and thought him a méet perſon to be preferred to wittie affaires. It chanced at a certeine ſeaſon that the king had an vrgent occaſion to ſend an ambaſſador vnto the emperor Maximilian, who laie at that preſent in the low countrie of Flanders, not farre from Calis.

The biſhop of Wincheſter, and ſir Thomas Louell, whome the king counſelled and debated with vpon this ambaſſage, ſaw they had a conuenient occaſion to prefer the kings chapleine, whoſe wit, eloquence, and learning, they highly commended to the king. The king commanded them to bring his chapleine before his preſence, with whome he fell in communication of great matters, and perceiuing his wit to be verie fine, thought him ſufficient, commanding him therevpon to prepare himſelfe to his iournie; and hauing his depeach, he tooke his leaue of the king at Richmond about noone; & ſo comming to London about foure of the clocke, where the barge of Graues end was readie to lanch foorth, both with a proſperous tide and wind, without anie abode he entered the barge.

Thomas Wolſeie ambaſſador to the emperor.

Hauing ſo doone, he paſſed foorth with ſuch ſpéed, that he arriued at Graues end within little more than thrée houres, where he tarried no longer than his poſt horſſes were a prouiding, and then trauelled ſo ſpéedily that he came to Douer the next morning, whereas the paſſengers were readie vnder ſaile to Calis, into the which paſſenger, without tarrieng, he entered, and ſailed foorth with them, that long before noone he arriued at Calis, and hauing poſt horſſes, departed from thenſe with ſuch ſpéed, that he was that night with the emperor, and diſcloſed the whole ſumme of his ambaſſage to the emperor, of whome he required ſpéedie expedition, the which was granted him by the emperor; ſo that the next daie he was cléerlie diſpatched with all the kings requeſts fullie accompliſhed.

The cardinall verie expedite and readie in his ambaſſage.

At which time he made no longer delaie, but tooke poſt horſſes that night, and rode toward Calis, conducted thither with ſuch perſons as the emperor had appointed; and at the opening of the gates of Calis, he came thither, where the paſſengers were as readie to returne into England, as they were before at his iournie forward, inſomuch that he arriued at Douer by ten of the clocke before noone, and hauing poſt horſſes, came to the court at Richmond the ſame night, where he taking ſome reſt vntill the morning, repaired to the king at his firſt comming from his bedchamber to his cloſet, whom when the king ſaw, he checked him, for that he was not on his iournie: Sir (quoth he) if it may pleaſe your highneſſe, I haue alreadie béene with the emperor, and diſpatched your affaires (I truſt to your graces contentation) and with that preſented vnto the king his letters of credence from the emperor.

His returne into England after his ambaſſage diſcharged.

The king being in a great maze and woonder of his ſpéedie returne and procéedings, diſſembled all his woonder, and demanded of him whether he incountered not his purſiuant the which he ſent vnto him, ſuppoſing him not to be out of London, with letters concerning a verie neceſſarie matter, neglected in their conſultation; Yea forſooth (quoth the chapleine) I met with him yeſterdaie by the waie, and hauing no vnderſtanding by your graces letters of your pleaſure, haue notwithſtanding béene ſo bold vpon mine owne diſcretion (perceiuing that matter to be verie neceſſarie in that behalfe) to diſpatch the ſame. And forſomuch as I haue excéeded your graces commiſſion, I moſt humblie require your graces pardon. The king reioiſing not a little, ſaid; We doo not onelie pardon you thereof, but alſo giue you our princelie thanks, both for the procéeding therein, and alſo for your good and ſpéedie exploit, commanding him for that time to take his reſt, and repaire againe after dinner for the further relation of his ambaſſage.

The king maruelleth at the cardinals ſpéedie returne.

The ambaſſador, when he ſaw time, repaired before the king and councell, where he declared the effect of all his affaires ſo exactlie, with ſuch grauitie and eloquence, that all the councell that heard him, commended him, eſtéeming his expedition to be almoſt beyond the capacitie of man. The king gaue him at that time the deanrie of Lincolne. From thenſe forward he grew more and more into eſtimation and authoritie, and after was promoted by the king to be his almoner. After the death of king Henrie the ſeuenth, and in the floriſhing youth of king Henrie the eight, this almoner handled himſelfe ſo politiklie, that he ſoone found the meanes to be made one of the kings councell, and to grow in fauor with the king, to whome the king gaue an houſe at Bridewell in Fléetſtréet, ſometime ſir Richard Empſons, where he kept houſe for his familie; and ſo dailie attended vpon the king, and in his eſpeciall fauor, who had great ſute made vnto him.

Thomas Wolſeie deane of Lincolne.

Thomas Wolſeie the kings almoner.

Thomas Wolſeie of the priuie councell vnto Henrie the eight.

His ſentences & wittie perſuaſions in the councell chamber were alwaies ſo pithie, that the councell (as occaſion mooued them) continuallie aſſigned him to be the expoſitor to the king in all their procéedings, in whome the king receiued ſuch a leaning fantaſie, for that he was moſt earneſt and readieſt of all the councell to aduance the kings will and pleaſure: the king therefore eſtéemed him ſo highlie, that all the other councellors were put from the great fauor that they before were in, inſomuch that the king committed all his will vnto his diſpoſition, which the almoner perceiuing, tooke vpon him therefore to diſcharge the king of the weightie and troubleſome buſineſſe, perſuading the king that he ſhould not néed to ſpare anie time of his pleaſure for anie buſineſſe that ſhould happen in the councell.

The cardinall preſumeth too farre vpon a conceit and flattering opinion of his owne qualities and the kings fauor.

And whereas the other councellors would diuerſe times perſuade the king to haue ſometime recourſe into the councell chamber, there to heare what was doone; the almoner would perſuade him to the contrarie, which delited him much: and thus the almoner ruled all them that were before him, ſuch did his policie and wit bring to paſſe. Who was now in high fauor but maſter almoner? And who ruled all vnder the king, but maſter almoner? Thus he perſeuered in fauor, vntill at laſt in came preſents, gifts, and rewards ſo plentifullie, that he lacked nothing that might either pleaſe his fantaſie, or inrich his coffers.

And thus procéeding in fortunes bliſſulneſſe, it chanced the warres betwéene the realmes of England and France to be open, inſomuch as the king was fullie perſuaded in his moſt roiall perſon to inuade his forren enimies with a puiſſant armie; wherefore it was neceſſarie that this roiall enterpriſe ſhould be ſpéedilie prouided and furniſhed, in euerie degrée of things apt & conuenient for the ſame, for the expedition wherof the king thought no mans wit ſo méet for policie and painefull trauell, as was his almoner, to whome therefore he committed his whole truſt therein, and he tooke vpon him the whole charge of all the buſineſſe, and brought all things to good paſſe in a decent order, as all maner of vittels, prouiſions, and other neceſſaries conuenient for ſo noble a voiage and armie.

The cardinall taketh vpon him the managing of all the kings affaires.

All things being by him perfected, the king aduanced to his roiall enterpriſe, paſſed the ſeas, and marched forward in good order of battell, vntill he came to the ſtrong towne of Terwine, to the which he laid his ſiege, and aſſailed it verie ſtronglie continuallie with ſuch vehement aſſaults, that within ſhort ſpace it was yéelded vnto his maieſtie, vnto the which place the emperor Maximilian repaired vnto the king with a great armie like a mightie prince, taking of the king his graces wages: which is a rare thing, and but ſeldome ſéene, an emperor to fight vnder a kings banner.

Sée before pag. 821, 822.

Thus after the king had obteined this puiſſant fort and taken the poſſeſſion thereof, and ſet all things there in due order, for the defenſe and preſeruation thereof to his vſe, he departed thenſe, and marched toward the citie of Torneie, and there laid his ſiege in like maner, to the which he gaue ſo fierce & ſharpe aſſault, that they were conſtreined of fine force to render the towne vnto his victorious maieſtie: at which time the king gaue the almoner the biſhoprike of the ſame ſée, towards his paines and diligence ſuſteined in that iournie. Now when the king had eſtabliſhed all things agréeable to his will and pleaſure, and furniſhed the ſame with noble capteines & men of warre for the ſafegard of the towne, he returned againe into England, taking with him diuerſe noble perſonages of France being priſoners, as the duke of Longuile, and vicount Clarimont, with other which were taken there in a ſkirmiſh.

Thomas Wolſeie biſhop of Torneie in Frãce.

After whoſe returne, immediatlie the ſée of Lincolne fell void, by the death of doctor Smith late biſhop there, the which benefice his grace gaue to his almoner, late biſhop of Torneie elect, who was not negligent to take poſſeſſion therof, and made all the ſpéed he could for his conſecration: the ſolemnization whereof ended, he found meanes that he gat the poſſeſſion of all his predeceſſors goods into his hands. It was not long after that doctor Benbrike archbiſhop of Yorke died at Rome, being there the kings ambaſſador, vnto the which ſée the king immediatlie preſented his late and new biſhop of Lincolne; ſo that he had thrée biſhopriks in his hands in one yeere giuen him.

Thomas Wolſeie biſhop of Lincolne.

Sée pag. 835.

Then prepared he for his tranſlation from the ſée of Lincolne, vnto the ſée of Yorke, after which ſolemnization doone, he being then an archbiſhop Primas Angliæ, thought himſelfe ſufficient to compare with Canturburie, and thervpon erected his croſſe in the court, and euerie other place, as well within the precinct and iuriſdiction of Canturburie, as in anie other place. And forſomuch as Canturburie claimeth a ſuperioritie ouer Yorke, as ouer all other biſhopriks within England, and for that cauſe claimeth as a knowledge of an ancient obedience of Yorke, to abate the aduancing of his croſſe, in preſence of the croſſe of Canturburie; notwithſtanding, the archbiſhop of Yorke nothing minding to deſiſt from bearing thereof, in maner as I ſaid before, cauſed his croſſe to be aduanced, as well in the preſence of Canturburie as elſewhere. Wherefore Canturburie being mooued therewith, gaue vnto Yorke a certeine checke for his preſumption, by reaſon whereof, there ingendered ſome grudge betwéene Yorke and Canturburie; Yorke intending to prouide ſome ſuch meanes, that he would be rather ſuperior in dignitie to Canturburie, than to be either obedient or equall to him. Wherefore he obteined to be made preeſt cardinall, and Legatus de latere: vnto whome the pope ſent a cardinals hat with certeine buls for his authoritie in that behalfe. Yet you ſhall vnderſtand, that the pope ſent him this worthie hat of dignitie, as a iewell of his honor and authoritie, the which was conueied in a varlets budget, who ſéemed to all men to be but a perſon of ſmall eſtimation.

Thomas Wolſeie cardinall, ſée pag. 837.

Wherefore Yorke being aduertiſed of the baſenes of this meſſenger, & of the peoples opinion, thought it méete for his honor, that this iewell ſhould not be conueied by ſo ſimple a perſon, and therefore cauſed him to be ſtopped by the waie immediatlie after his arriuall in England, where he was newlie furniſhed in all maner of apparell, with all kind of coſtlie ſilks, which ſéemed decent for ſuch an high ambaſſador, and that doone, he was incountered vpon Blackeheath, and there receiued with a great aſſemblie of prelats, and luſtie gallant gentlemen, and from thenſe conducted thorough London with great triumph. Then was great and ſpéedie preparation made in Weſtminſter abbeie, for the confirmation and acceptance of this high order and dignitie, the which was executed by all the biſhops and abbats about or nigh London, with their rich miters and copes, and other ornaments, which was doone in ſo ſolemne wiſe, as had not béene ſéene the like, vnleſſe it had béene at the coronation of a mightie prince or king. Obteining this dignitie, he thought himſelfe méet to beare rule among the temporall power, & among the ſpirituall iuriſdiction: wherfore, remembring as well the taunts ſuſteined of Canturburie, as hauing reſpect to the aduancement of worldlie honor & promotion, he found the meanes with the king, that he was made lord chancellor of England, and Canturburie which was chancellor diſmiſſed, who had continued in that roome long ſince before the deceaſſe of Henrie the ſeuenth. Now being in poſſeſſion of the chancellorſhip, and indued with the promotions of the archbiſhop, & cardinall

The cardinall in all his actions ſtandeth vpon his reputation.

Thomas Wolſeie lord chancellor arrogateth all that he may to himſelfe by vertue of his promotions.

dinall De Latere, hauing power to correct Canturburie, and all other biſhops and ſpirituall perſons, to aſſemble his conuocation when he would aſſigne, he tooke vpon him the correction of matters in all their iuriſdictions, and viſited all the ſpirituall houſes, hauing in euerie dioceſſe all maner of ſpirituall miniſters, as commiſſaries, ſcribes, apparators, and all other officers to furniſh his courts, and preſented by preuention whome he pleaſed vnto all benefices throughout all this realme.

And to the aduancing further of his legantine iuriſdiction and honor, he had maſters of his faculties, maſters Ceremoniarum, and ſuch other, to the glorifieng of his dignitie. Then had he his two great croſſes of ſiluer, the one of his archbiſhoprike, the other of his legacie, borne before him whither ſoeuer he went or rode, by two of the talleſt prieſts that he could get within the realme. And to increaſe his gaines, he had alſo the biſhoprike of Durham, and the abbeie of ſaint Albons in commendation. And after, when doctor Fox biſhop of Wincheſter died, he ſurrendred Durham into the kings hands, and tooke to him Wincheſter. Then had he in his hand (as it were in farme) the biſhopriks of Bath, Worceſter, & Hereford, for ſo much as the incumbents of them were ſtrangers, and made their abode continuallie beyond the ſeas in their owne countries, or elſe at Rome, from whence they were ſent in legation to this realme vnto the king, and for their reward at their departure, king Henrie the ſeuenth gaue them thoſe biſhopriks.

Thomas Wolſeie biſhop of Wincheſter, he had alſo thrée other biſhopriks in his hands as it were in farme.

But they being ſtrangers, thought it more méet for the aſſurance to ſuffer the cardinall to haue their benefices for a conuenient ſum of monie paid them yearelie, where they remained, than either to be troubled with the charges of the ſame, or to be yearelie burthened with the conueiance of their reuenues vnto them: ſo that all the ſpirituall liuings and preſentations of theſe biſhopriks were fullie in his diſpoſition, to prefer whom he liſted. He had alſo a great number dailie attending vpon him, both of noblemen & worthie gentlemen, with no ſmall number of the talleſt yeomen that he could get in all the realme, inſomuch that well was that nobleman and gentleman, that could preferre a tall yeoman to his ſeruice.

What kind of perſons he reteined in his ſeruice.

The order of the cardinals houſe, and firſt of his hall.

Ye ſhall vnderſtand, that he had in his hall continuallie thrée boords, kept with thrée ſeuerall principall officers, that is to ſaie, a ſteward which was alwaies a prieſt; a treaſuror a knight; and a comptrollor an eſquier; alſo a cofferer being a doctor; thrée marſhals; thrée yeomen vſhers in the hall, beſides two groomes, and almoners. Then in the hall kitchin, two clearks of the kitchin; a clearke comptrollor; a ſurueior of the dreſſor; a clearke of the ſpicerie, the which togither kept alſo a continuall meſſe in the hall. Alſo in his hall kitchin he had of maſter cooks two, and of other cooks, laborers and children of the kitchin, twelue perſons; foure yeomen of the ſcullerie, and foure yeomen of the ſiluer ſcullerie; two yeomen of the paſtrie, with two other paſtelers vnder the yeomen.

Then in his priuie kitchin a maſter cooke, who went dailie in veluet or in ſattin, with a chaine of gold, with two other yeomen and a groome: in the ſcalding houſe, a yeoman and two groomes: in the pantrie two perſons: in the butterie two yeomen, two groomes, and two pages: and in the yewrie likewiſe: in the cellar thrée yeomen, and thrée pages: in his chandrie two: in the wafarie two: in the wardrobe of beds, the maiſter of the wardrobe, and ten other perſons: in the landrie, a yeoman, a groome, thirtie pages, two yeomen purueiors, & one groome: in the bake-houſe, a yeoman and two groomes: in the wood-yard a yeoman, and a groome: in the barne one: in the garden a yeoman and two groomes: porters at the gate, two yeomen, and two groomes: a yeoman of his barge: and a maiſter of his horſſe: a clearke of the ſtable, a yeoman of the ſame: the ſadler: the ferrier: a yeoman of his chariot: a ſumpter man: a yeoman of his ſtirrop: a muleter: ſixtéene groomes of his ſtable, euerie of them kept foure geldings.

Thomas Wolſeis chappell and ſuch as bare office there.

In the almorie a yeoman and a groome: in his chappell he had a deane, a great diuine, and a man of excellent learning: a ſubdeane: a repeater of the quire: a goſpeller: a piſtler: of ſinging prieſts ten: a maiſter of the children: ſeculars of the chappell, ſinging men twelue: ſinging children ten, with one ſeruant to await vpon the children: in the reueſtrie a yeoman, and two groomes, ouer and beſides diuerſe reteiners that came thither at principall feaſts. For the furniture of his chappell, it paſſeth my capacitie to declare the number of coſtlie ornaments and rich iewels that were to be occupied in the ſame continuallie: there hath béene ſéene in proceſſion, about the hall, foure and fortie verie rich coapes of one ſute worne, beſides the rich croſſes and candleſtickes, and other ornaments to the furniture of the ſame.

The furniture of his chappell.

Officers of credit about Thomas Wolſeie in his priuie chamber.

He had two croſſebearers, and two pillerbearers in his great chamber: and in his priuie chamber theſe perſons: firſt the chiefe chamberleine, and vicechamberleine: of gentlemen vſhers, beſides one in his priuie chamber, he had twelue dailie waiters; and of gentlemen waiters in his priuie chamber he had ſix, and of lords nine or ten, who had each of them two men allowed them to attend vpon them, except the earle of Darbie, who had allowed fiue men: then had he of gentlemen, of cupbearers, caruers, and ſewers, both of the priuie chamber, and of the great chamber, with gentlemen dailie waiters there, fortie perſons: of yeomen vſhers ſix: of groomes in his chamber eight: of yeomen in his chamber fiue and fortie dailie: he had alſo almes men ſometime more in number than other ſometime.

Attendants on his boord.

There was attending on his boord of doctors and chapleins, beſides them of his chappell, ſixtéene dailie: a clearke of his cloſet: ſecretaries two: and two clearks of his ſignet: and foure counſellers learned in the law. And forſomuch as it was neceſſarie to haue diuerſe officers of the Chancerie to attend vpon him, that is to ſaie, the clerke of the crowne: a riding clearke: a clearke of the hamper: and a chafer of the wax: then a clearke of the checke, aſwell vpon the chapleins, as of the yeoman of his chamber: he had alſo foure footmen which were garniſhed in rich running coats, whenſoeuer he rode in anie iourneie: then had he an herald of armes: and a ſargeant of armes: a phyſician: an apothecarie: foure minſtrels: a kéeper of his tents: an armorer: an inſtructor of his wards: two yeomen of the wardrobe of his robes: and a kéeper of his chamber continuallie in the court: he had alſo in his houſe the ſurueior of Yorke, and a clearke of the gréene cloth.

Officers of the Chancerie.

His footmen.

His herald at armes & other officers.

All theſe were dailie attending, downe lieng and vpriſing, and at meales: he kept in his great chamber a continuall boord for the chamberers and gentlemen officers, hauing with them a meſſe of the yong lords, and another of gentlemen. Beſides all theſe, there was neuer an officer, gentleman, or worthie perſon, but he was allowed in the houſe, ſome thrée, ſome two, and all other one at the leaſt, which grew to a great number of perſons. Thus farre out of the checker roll, beſides other officers, ſeruants, reteiners, and ſuters, that moſt commonlie dined in the hall. After that he was thus furniſhed, he was ſent twiſe in ambaſſage to the emperour Charles the fift, for diuerſe vrgent cauſes touching the kings maieſtie,

Thomas Wolſeie twiſe ambaſſador to the emperour Charles.

maieſtie, it was thought, that ſo noble a prince (the cardinall) was moſt méet to be ſent: wherfore being readie to take vpon him the charge thereof, hée was furniſhed in all degrées and purpoſes, moſt like a great prince.

For firſt he procéeded forth furniſhed like a cardinall: his gentlemen being verie manie in number, were clothed in liuerie coats of crimſin veluet of the beſt, with chaines of gold about their necks, and his yeomen and meane officers in coats of fine ſcarlet, garded with blacke veluet an hand broad. Thus furniſhed, he was twiſe ſent into Flanders to the emperour then lieng in Bruges, whome he did moſt highlie interteine, diſcharging all his charges and his mens. There was no houſe within the towne of Bruges, wherein anie gentleman of the cardinals was lodged, or had recourſe, but that the owners were commanded by the emperours officers, that they, vpon paine of their liues, ſhould take no monie for anie thing that the cardinals ſeruants did take of anie kind of vittels, no although they were diſpoſed to make anie coſtlie bankets.

The emperors munificence notable and worthie his imperiall perſon.

Commanding furthermore their ſaid hoſtes, to ſée that they lacked no ſuch things as they honeſtlie required for their honeſtie and pleaſure. Alſo the emperours officers euerie night went through the towne from houſe to houſe, whereas anie Engliſh gentlemen did repaſt or lodge, and ſerued their liueries for all night, which was done in this maner. Firſt, the officers brought into the houſe a caſt of fine manchet, and of ſiluer two great pots with white wine, and ſugar to the weight of a pound: white lights and yellow lights of wax: a boll of ſiluer with a goblet to drinke in, and euerie night a ſtaffetorch: this was the order of the liueries euerie night. And in the morning, when the ſame officers came to fetch awaie their ſtuffe, then would they account with the hoſtes for the gentlemens coſts ſpent in the daie before. Thus the emperour interteined the cardinall and all his traine for the time of his ambaſſage there. And that done, he returned into England with great triumph.

The maner of his going to Weſtminſter hall dailie in the terme time.

Now of his order in going to Weſtminſter hall dailie in the tearme. Firſt yer he came out of his priuie chamber, he heard ſeruice in his cloſet, and there ſaid his ſeruice with his chapleine; then going againe to his priuie chamber, he would demand if his ſeruants were in a readineſſe, and furniſhed his chamber of preſence, and waiting chamber. Being thereof then aduertiſed, he came out of his priuie chamber about eight of the clocke, apparelled all in red, that is to ſay, his vpper garment either of fine ſcarlet, or elſe fine crimſin taffata, but moſt cõmonlie of fine crimſin ſattin ingrained, his pillion of fine ſcarlet, with a necke ſet in the inner ſide with blacke veluet, and a tippet of ſables about his necke, holding in his hand an orenge, whereof the ſubſtance within was taken out, and filled vp againe with the part of a ſponge, wherein was vinegar and other confections againſt the peſtilent aires, the which he moſt commonlie held to his noſe when he came among anie preaſe, or elſe that he was peſtered with manie ſuters.

His owne apparell of crimſin and other ſumptuous ſtuffe.

The tokens and marks of his dignities borne before him.

Before him was borne firſt the broad ſeale of England, and his cardinals hat, by a lord, or ſome gentleman of worſhip, right ſolemnlie: & as ſoone as he was once entered into his chamber of preſence, his two great croſſes were there attending to be borne before him: then cried the gentlemen vſhers, going before him bare headed, and ſaid: On before my lords and maiſters, on before, make waie for my lords grace. Thus went he downe through the hall with a ſergeant of armes before him, bearing a great mace of ſiluer, and two gentlemen carieng two great pillers of ſiluer. And when he came at the hall doore, there was his mule, being trapped all in crimſin veluet, with a ſaddle of the ſame ſtuffe, & gilt ſtirrups. Then was there attending vpon him when he was mounted, his two croſſe-bearers: & his piller-bearers in like caſe vpon great horſſes, trapped all in fine ſcarlet. Then marched he forward with a traine of noble men and gentlemen, hauing his footmen foure in number about him, bearing ech of them a gilt pollar in their hands.

His behauior in the court of Chancerie & Starchamber

Thus paſſed he forth vntill he came to Weſtminſter hall doore, and there lighted, and went vp after this maner into the Chancerie, or into the Starrechamber: howbeit, moſt commonlie he would go into the Chancerie, and ſtaie a while at a barre made for him beneath the Chancerie on the right hand, and there commune ſometime with the iudges, and ſome time with other perſons: and that done, he would repaire into the Chancerie, and ſitting there vntill eleuen of the clocke, hearing of ſutes, and determining of other matters, from thence he would diuers times go into the Starre-chamber, as occaſion ſerued. There he neither ſpared high nor low, but iudged euerie ſtate according to his merits and deſerts.

His order of going to and cõming from the court.

He vſed alſo euerie ſundaie to reſort to the court, then being for the moſt part of all the yeare at Gréenewich, with his former triumphs, taking his barge at his owne ſtaires, furniſhed with yeomen ſtanding vpon the bails, and his gentlemen being within about him, and landed againe at the thrée cranes in the Vintrie: and from thenſe he rode vpon his mule with his croſſe, his pillers, his hat and broad ſeale carried afore him on horſſebacke through Thames ſtreet, vntill he came to Billingſgate, and there tooke his barge againe, and ſo was rowed to Gréenewich, where he was receiued of the lords and chiefe officers of the kings houſe, as the treaſuror, comptrollor and others, and ſo conueied vnto the kings chamber. Then the court was wonderfullie furniſhed with noblemen and gentlemen: and after dinner among the lords, hauing ſome conſultation with the king or with the councell, he would depart homeward with the like triumph.

The cardinals houſe like a princes court for all kind of brauerie & ſumptuouſneſſe.

Thus in great honour, triumph, and glorie, he reigned a long ſeaſon, ruling all things within the realme apperteining vnto the king. His houſe was reſorted to with noblemen and gentlemen, feaſting and banketting ambaſſadors diuerſe times, and all other right noblie. And when it pleaſed the king for his recreation to repaire to the cardinals houſe (as he did diuerſe times in the yeare) there wanted no preparations or furniture: bankets were ſet forth with maſkes and mummeries, in ſo gorgeous a ſort and coſtlie maner, that it was an heauen to behold. There wanted no dames or damoſels meet or apt to danſe with the maſkers, or to garniſh the place for the time: then was there all kind of muſike and harmonie, with fine voices both of men and children.

A maſke and banket, the king in perſon preſent at the cardinals houſe.

On a time the king came ſuddenlie thither in a maſke with a dozen maſkers all in garments like ſhéepheards, made of fine cloth of gold, and crimoſin ſattin paned, & caps of the ſame, with viſards of good phyſnomie, their haires & beards either of fine goldwire ſilke, or blacke ſilke, hauing ſixtéene torch-bearers, beſides their drums and other perſons with viſards, all clothed in ſattin of the ſame color. And before his entring into the hall, he came by water to the water gate without anie noiſe, where were laid diuerſe chambers and guns charged with ſhot, and at his landing they were ſhot off, which made ſuch a rumble in the aire, that it was like thunder: it made all the noblemen, gentlemen, ladies, and gentlewomen, to muſe what it ſhould meane, comming ſo ſuddenlie, they ſitting quiet at a ſolemne banket, after this ſort.

The cardinals ſtatelie ſitting at table like a prince.

Firſt yée ſhall vnderſtand, that the tables were ſet in the chamber of preſence iuſt couered, ⁊ the lord cardinall ſitting vnder the cloth of eſtate, there hauing all his ſeruice alone: and then was there ſet a ladie with a noble man, or a gentleman and a gentlewoman throughout all the tables in the chamber on the one ſide, which were made and ioined as it were but one table, all which order and deuiſe was doone by the lord Sandes then lord chamberleine to the king, and by ſir Henrie Gilford comptrollor of the kings maieſties houſe. Then immediatlie after the great chamberleine, and the ſaid comptrollor, ſent to looke what it ſhould meane (as though they knew nothing of the matter) who looking out of the windowes into the Thames, returned againe and ſhewed him, that it ſéemed they were noblemen and ſtrangers that arriued at his bridge, comming as ambaſſadours from ſome forren prince.

The cardinall knew not that the king was in the number.

With that (quoth the cardinall) I deſire you, bicauſe you can ſpeake French, to take the paines to go into the hall, there to receiue them according to their eſtates, and to conduct them into this chamber, where they ſhall ſée vs, and all theſe noble perſonages being merie at our banket, deſiring them to ſit downe with vs, and to take part of our fare. Then went he incontinent downe into the hall, whereas they receiued them with twentie new torches, and conueied them vp into the chamber, with ſuch a noiſe of drums and flutes, as ſeldome had béene heard the like. At their entring into the chamber two and two togither, they went directlie before the cardinall, where he ſate and ſaluted him reuerentlie.

The cardinall reuerentlie ſaluted of the maſkers.

To whom the lord chamberleine for them ſaid: Sir, for as much as they be ſtrangers, and can not ſpeake Engliſh, they haue deſired me to declare vnto you, that they hauing vnderſtanding of this your triumphant banket, where was aſſembled ſuch a number of excellent dames, they could doo no leſſe vnder ſupport of your grace, but to repaire hither, to view as well their incomparable beautie, as for to accompanie them at mum-chance, and then to danſe with them: and ſir, they require of your grace licence to accompliſh the ſaid cauſe of their cõming. To whom the cardinall ſaid he was verie well content they ſhould ſo doo. Then went the maſkers, and firſt ſaluted all the dames, and returned to the moſt worthie, and there opened their great cup of gold filled with crownes and other péeces of gold, to whome they ſet certeine péeces of gold to caſt at.

The cardinall plaieth at dice.

He ſuſpecteth that the king is preſent and abateth his eſtate.

Thus peruſing all the ladies and gentlewomen, to ſome they loſt, and of ſome they woone: and marking after this maner all the ladies, they returned to the cardinall with great reuerence, powring downe all their gold ſo left in their cup, which was aboue two hundred crownes: At all (quoth the cardinall) and ſo caſt the dice and wan them, whereat was made a great noiſe and ioy. Then quoth the cardinall to the lord chamberleine, I praie you (quoth he) that you would ſhew them, that me ſéemeth there ſhould be a nobleman amongſt them, who is more méet to occupie this ſeat and place than I am, to whome I would moſt gladlie ſurrender the ſame according to my dutie, if I knew him.

Then ſpake the lord chamberleine to them in French, and they rounding him in the eare, the lord chamberlein ſaid to my lord cardinall: Sir (quoth he) they confeſſe, that among them there is ſuch a noble perſonage, whome, if your grace can appoint him out from the reſt, he is content to diſcloſe himſelfe, and to accept your place. With that the cardinall taking good aduiſement among them, at the laſt (quoth he) me ſéemeth the gentleman with the blacke beard, ſhould be euen he: and with that he aroſe out of his chaire, and offered the ſame to the gentleman in the blacke beard with his cap in his hand. The perſon to whom he offered the chaire was ſir Edward Neuill, a comelie knight, that much more reſembled the kings perſon in that maſke than anie other.

He taketh his marks amiſſe and is deceiued.

The king diſuiſardeth his face and is verie pleaſant.

The king perceiuing the cardinall ſo deceiued, could not forbeare laughing, but pulled downe his viſar and maſter Neuels alſo, and daſhed out ſuch a pleaſant countenance and chéere, that all the noble eſtates there aſſembled, perceiuing the king to be there among them, reioiſed verie much. The cardinall eftſoons deſired his highneſſe to take the place of eſtate. To whom the king anſwered, that he would go firſt and ſhift his apparell, and ſo departed into my lord cardinals chamber, and there new apparelled him: in which time the diſhes of the banket were cleane taken vp, and the tables ſpred againe with new cleane perfumed cloths, euerie man and woman ſitting ſtill, vntill the king with all his maſkers came among them againe all new apparelled.

A new banket vpon the ſudden of 200 diſhes.

Then the king tooke his ſeat vnder the cloth of eſtate, commanding euerie perſon to ſit ſtill as they did before: in came a new banket before the king, and to all the reſt throughout all the tables, wherein were ſerued two hundred diuerſe diſhes, of coſtlie deuiſes and ſubtilties. Thus paſſed they forth the night with banketting, danſing, and other triumphs, to the great comfort of the king, and pleaſant regard of the nobilitie there aſſembled. And thus ſpent this cardinall his time from daie to daie, and yeare to yeare, in ſuch wealth, ioie, triumph, and glorie, hauing alwaies on his ſide the kings eſpeciall fauour, vntill fortune enuied his proſperitie, and ouerthrew all the foundations of his glorie; which as they were laid vpon ſand, ſo they ſhronke and ſlipt awaie, whereby inſued the ruine of his eſtate, euen to the verie loſſe of his life, which (as a man of a guiltie conſcience, and fearing capitall puniſhment due by law for his vndutifull demeanour againſt his ſouereigne) Edward Hall ſaith (vpon report) he partlie procured, willinglie taking ſo great a quantitie of a ſtrong purgation, as nature was therewith oppreſſed, and vnable to digeſt the ſame; ſo that in fine he gaue vp the ghoſt, and was buried in Leiceſter abbeie: of whome to ſaie more I will ſurceaſſe, concluding onelie with a deſcription which I find of him not impertinent for this place, ſith wholie concerning his perſon.

Ab. Fl. ex Edw. Hal. Clxxxxiiij.

The deſcription of the cardinall.

¶This cardinall (as you may perceiue in this ſtorie) was of a great ſtomach, for he compted himſelfe equall with princes, ⁊ by craftie ſuggeſtion gat into his hands innumerable treaſure: he forced little on ſimonie, and was not pittifull, and ſtood affectionate in his owne opinion: in open preſence he would lie and ſaie vntruth, and was double both in ſpeach and meaning: he would promiſe much ⁊ performe little: he was vicious of his bodie, ⁊ gaue the clergie euill example: he hated ſore the citie of London ⁊ feared it: it was told him that he ſhould die in the waie toward London, wherefore he feared leaſt the commons of the citie would ariſe in riotous maner and ſo ſlaie him, yet for all that he died in the waie toward London, carrieng more with him out of the world than he brought into it; namelie a winding ſhéete, beſides other neceſſaries thought méet for a dead man, as chriſtian comelineſſe required. This ruine of the cardinall was not ſo much as once dreampt vpon, when I. Leland the famous antiquarie wrote this welwiſhing octaſtichon vnto the ſaid Wolſeie (being then in the flowre of his glorie, and the pearle of his pride) as hereafter followeth.

The king and quéene kept a ſolemne Chriſtmaſſe at Gréenwich

After the cardinall was dead, the king remoued from Hampton court to Gréenwich, where he with quéene Katharine kept a ſolemne Chriſtmaſſe, and on the Twelfe night he ſat in the hall in his eſtate, whereas were diuerſe enterludes, rich maſkes and diſports, and after that a great banket. Now after Chriſtmas he came to his manour of Weſtminſter, which before was called Yorke place: for after that the cardinall was attainted in the premunire, & was gone northward, he made a feoffement of the ſame place to the king, and the chapiter of the cathedrall church of Yorke by their writing confirmed the ſame feoffement, & then the king changed the name and called it the kings manor of Weſtminſter, and no more Yorke place.

The cleargie in danger of a premunire.

The whole cleargie of England euer ſupported and mainteined the power legantine of the cardinall, wherefore the kings learned councell ſaid plainlie that they were all in the premunire: the ſpirituall lords were called by proceſſe into the kings Bench to anſwer, but before their daie of appearance they in their conuocation concluded an humble ſubmiſſion in writing, and offered the king a hundred thouſand pounds to be their good lord, & alſo to giue them a pardon of all offenſes touching the premunire by act of parlement, the which offer with much labour was accepted, and their pardon promiſed. In this ſubmiſſion the cleargie called the king ſupreame head of the church of England, which thing they neuer confeſſed before, wherevpon manie things followed after, as you ſhall heare.

The offer of the cleargie to the king.

The king firſt named ſupreme head.

When the parlement was begun the firſt daie of Januarie, the pardon of the ſpirituall perſons was ſigned with the kings hand, and ſent to the lords, which in time conuenient aſſented to the bill, and ſent it to the commons in the lower houſe. Now when it was read, diuers froward perſons would in no wiſe aſſent to it except all men were pardoned, ſaieng that all men which had anie thing to doo with the cardinall were in the ſame caſe. The wiſer ſort anſwered, that they would not compell the king to giue them his pardon, & beſide that it was vncharitablie doone of them to hurt the cleargie, and doo themſelues no good: wherefore they aduiſed them to conſent to the bill, and after to ſue to the king for their pardon, which counſell was not followed, but they determined firſt to ſend the ſpeaker to the king yer they would aſſent to the bill.

Thom. Audlie ſpeaker for the commons.

Wherevpon Thomas Audleie ſpeaker for the commons, with a conuenient number of the common houſe, came to the kings preſence, and there eloquentlie declared to the king, how the commons ſore lamented and bewailed their chance, to thinke or imagine themſelues to be out of his gratious fauor, bicauſe that he had gratiouſlie giuen his pardon of the premunire to his ſpirituall ſubiects and not to them: wherefore they moſt humblie beſought his grace of his accuſtomed goodneſſe and clemencie to include them in the ſame pardon. The king wiſelie anſwered that he was their prince and ſoueraigne lord, and that they ought not to reſtraine him of his libertie, nor to compell him to ſhew his mercie; for it was at his pleaſure to vſe the extremitie of his laws or mitigate and pardon the ſame: wherefore ſith they denied to aſſent to the pardon of the ſpirituall perſons, which pardon (he ſaid) he might giue without their aſſent by his great ſeale, he would be well aduiſed yer he pardoned them, bicauſe he would not be noted to be compelled to it.

The ſumme of the kings wiſe anſwer.

With this anſwer the ſpeaker and the commons departed verie ſorowfull and penſiue, and ſome light perſons ſaid that Thomas Crumwell, which was newlie come to the fauour of the king, had diſcloſed the ſecrets of the commons, which thing cauſed the king to be ſo extreame. The king like a good prince conſidered how ſorowfull his commons were of the anſwer that he made them, and thought that they were not quiet: wherefore of his owne motion he cauſed a pardon of the premunire to be drawne, and ſigned it with his hand, and ſent it to the common houſe by Chriſtopher Hales his atturneie, which bill was ſoone aſſented to. Then the commons louinglie thanked the king, and much praiſed his wit, that he had denied it to them when they vnworthilie demanded it, and had bountifullie granted it when he perceiued that they ſorrowed and lamented.

The kings voluntarie inclination to pardon the premunire.

While the parlement ſat, on the thirtith daie of March at afternoone, there came into the common houſe the lord chancellor and diuerſe lords of the ſpiritualtie and temporaltie, to the number of twelue, and there the lord chancellor ſaid: You of this worſhipfull houſe (I am ſure) be not ſo ignorant, but you know well, that the king our ſoueraigne lord hath married his brothers wife, for ſhe was both wedded and bedded with his brother prince Arthur, and therefore you may ſuerlie ſaie that he hath married his brothers wife. If this marriage be good or no manie clerkes doo doubt. Wherefore the king like a vertuous prince willing to be ſatiſfied in his conſcience, & alſo for the ſuertie of his realme, hath with great deliberation conſulted with profound clerkes, & hath ſent my lord of London here preſent, to the chiefe vniuerſities of all chriſtendome, to know their opinion and iudgement in that behalfe. And although that the vniuerſities of Cambridge and Oxford had béene ſufficient to diſcuſſe the cauſe, yet bicauſe they be in his realme, and to auoid all ſuſpicion of parcialitie he hath ſent into the realme of France, Italie, the popes dominions and Venecians, to know their iudgement in that behalfe; which haue concluded, written, and ſealed their determinations according as you ſhall heare read. Then ſir Brian Tuke tooke out of a box certeine writings ſealed, and read them word by word as after inſueth, tranſlated out of Latine into the Engliſh toong.

Touching the kings mariage.

Namelie Edmund Bonner.

Determinations of diuerſe vniuerſities touching the vnlawfulneſſe of the kings marriage, and firſt the determination of the vniuerſitie of Orleance.

NOt long ſince there were put forth to vs the college of doctors, regents of the vniuerſitie of Orleance, theſe two queſtions that follow. The firſt, whether it be lawfull by the law of God for the brother to take to wife that woman whom his brother hath left? The ſecond, if this be forbidden by the law of God, whether this prohibition of the law of God may be remitted by the pope his diſpenſation? We the foreſaid college of doctors regents, according to our cuſtome and vſage came manie times togither, and did ſit diuerſe times vpon the diſcuſſing of theſe foreſaid doubts and queſtions, and did examine and weigh as much as we might diuerſe and manie places, both of the old teſtament and the new, and alſo the interpretors and declarers both of the law of God and the canon law.

After we had weighed & conſidered all things exactlie, with good leiſure and deliberation we haue all determined and concluded, that theſe foreſaid mariages cannot be attempted, nor enterpriſed, except a man doo wrong, and plaine contrarie to the law of God: yea and that although it be doone by pardon and ſufferance of the pope. And in witneſſe of this concluſion and determination, we haue cauſed this preſent publike writing to be ſigned by the ſcribe of our ſaid vniuerſitie, and to be ſtrengthened ⁊ fortified with the ſeale of the ſame. Enacted in the chapell of our ladie, the annuntiation, or the good tidings that ſhe had of Chriſtes comming in Orleance, the yeare of our Lord 1529, the 5. daie of Aprill.

The determination of the facultie of decrees of the vniuerſitie of Paris.

Lawiers of Paris.

IN the name of the Lord ſo be it. There was put forth before vs the deane and college of the right councelfull facultie of decrées of the vniuerſitie of Paris, this queſtion? Whether that the pope might diſpenſe, that the brother might marrie the wife that his brother hath left, if mariage betwéene his brother now dead and his wife were once conſummate? We the deane and college of the ſaid facultie after manie diſputations and reaſons made of both ſides vpon this matter, and after great and long turning and ſearching of bookes, both of the law of God, and the popes law, and of the law ciuill, we counſell and ſaie that the pope hath no power to diſpenſe in this foreſaid caſe. In witneſſe whereof we haue cauſed this preſent writing to be ſtrengthened with the ſeale of our facultie and with the ſigne of our ſcribe or chiefe bedle. Yeuen in the congregation or aſſemble at ſaint Iohn Laterenenſe in Paris the ſecond daie of Maie 1530.

The determination of ciuilians and canoniſts of the vniuerſitie of Aniou.

Aniou.

NOt long time ſince there were propoſed vnto vs the rector and doctors regents in law canon and ciuill of the vniuerſitie of Aniou, theſe two queſtions here following, that is to wit; Whether it is vnlawfull by the law of God ⁊ the law of nature for a man to marrie the wife of his brother, that is departed without children, ſo that the marriage was conſummate? And againe, whether it is lawfull for the pope to diſpenſe with ſuch marriage? We the aforeſaid rector and doctors haue according to our cuſtome and vſage manie times communed togither, and ſitten to diſpute theſe queſtions, and to find out the certeintie of them. And after that we had diſcuſſed and examined manie and diuerſe places, aſwell of the law of God as of the law of man, which ſéemed to perteine to the ſame purpoſe, and after we had brought reaſons for both parties, and examined them: all things faithfullie and after good conſcience conſidered, and vpon ſufficient deliberation and aduiſement taken, we define and determine that neither by the law of God nor of nature, it is permitted for any chriſtian man, no not euen with the authoritie of the ſée apoſtolike, or with anie diſpenſation granted by the pope, to marrie the wife that his brother hath left, although his brother be departed without children, after that the marriage is once finiſhed and conſummate. And for witnes of the aforſaid things, we haue commanded the ſcribe of our ſaid vniuerſitie to ſigne this preſent publike inſtrument, and it to be fortified with the great ſeale of our vniuerſitie. Enacted in the church of ſaint Peter in Aniou, the yeare of our Lord 1530, the 7 daie of Maie.

The determination of the facultie of diuinitie in the vniuerſitie of Paris.

Paris.

THe deane and the facultie of the holie diuinitie of the vniuerſitie of Paris, to all them to whom this preſent writing ſhall come, wiſheth ſafetie in our ſauiour Ieſu Chriſt, which is the verie true ſafetie. Where of late there is riſen a great controuerſie of great difficultie, vpon the marriage betwéene the moſt noble Henrie the eight king of England defendor of the faith, and lord of Ireland, ⁊c: and the noble ladie Katharine quéene of England, daughter to the catholike king Ferdinand, which marriage was not onelie contract betwéene hir and hir former huſband, but alſo conſummate and finiſhed by carnall intermedling.

This queſtion alſo was propoſed to vs to diſcuſſe and examine according to iuſtice and truth, that is to ſaie; Whether to marrie hir that one brother dead without children hath left, being ſo prohibited by the law of God and nature, that it can not be lawfull by the popes diſpenſation, that any chriſtian man ſhuld marrie the wife that his brother hath left? We the foreſaid deane and facultie calling to our remembrance, how vertuous, and how holie a thing, and how agréeable to our profeſſion, vnto our dutie of loue and charitie it is for vs to ſhew the waie of iuſtice and right, of vertue and honeſtie, to them which deſire to lead and paſſe ouer their life in the law of our Lord with ſure and quiet conſcience; could not but be readie to ſatiſfie ſo honeſt and iuſt requeſts: wherevpon after our old woont, we came togither vpon our oth in the church of S. Maturine, and there for the ſame cauſe had a ſolemne maſſe with deuout praier to the Holie-ghoſt.

And alſo we tooke an oth, euerie man to deliuer and to ſtudie vpon the foreſaid queſtion, as ſhould be to the pleaſure of God ⁊ according to conſcience. And after diuerſe ⁊ manie ſeſſions or ſittings, which were had and continued in the church of ſaint Maturine, and alſo in the college called Sorbon, from the eight daie of Iune to the ſecond daie of Iulie; when we had ſearched and examined through and through, with as much diligence as we could, and with ſuch reuerence and religion or conſcience as becommeth in ſuch a matter, both the bookes of holie ſcripture, and alſo the moſt approoued interpretors of the ſame: finallie the generall and ſynodall councels, decrées and conſtitutions of the ſacre and holie church, which by long cuſtome hath béene receiued and approbate.

We the foreſaid deane and facultie, diſputing vpon the foreſaid queſtion, and making anſwer to the ſame, and that after the iudgement and full conſent of the moſt part of the ſaid facultie, haue concluded and determined, that the foreſaid marriage with the brothers wife, departing without children, be ſo forbidden both by the law of God ⁊ of nature, that the pope hath no power to diſpenſe with ſuch mariages, whether they be contract or to be contract. And for credence, beléefe, and witneſſe of this our aſſertion and determination, we haue cauſed the ſeale of our facultie, with our notaries ſigne, to be put vnto this preſent writing. Dated in our generall congregation that we kéepe by an oth at ſaint Maturines, the yeare of our Lord 1530, the ſecond daie of Iulie.

The determination of the vniuerſitie of Burges in Berrie or Biturs.

Burges.

WE the deane and facultie of diuinitie in the vniuerſitie of Burges (bicauſe we will doo according to the example of S. Paule doctor of the gentiles, which dooth likewiſe) will begin our writing with praier for all the beloued of God, among whome you moſt deare readers, vnto whome we write, be called: grace, peace, and quietneſſe of conſcience come to you from God the father, and from our Lord Ieſu Chriſt. While we were gathered together all into one place (in the octaues of Whitſuntide) both in bodie and mind, and were ſitting in the houſe of the ſaid deane, there was a queſtion put to vs againe, which had béene propoſed to vs oftentimes before, being no ſmall queſtion, which was this: Whether the brother taking the wife of his brother now dead, and the marriage once conſummate and perfect, dooth a thing vnlawfull or no?

At the laſt when we had ſought for the truth of the thing, and had perceiued and found it out by much labour and ſtudie of euerie one of vs by himſelfe, and by much and often turning of holie bookes, euerie one of vs not corrupt, whereby we might the leſſe obeie the truth, began as the holie ghoſt did put in his mind, to giue euerie man one arbitrement and ſentence, which was this. I haue well perceiued in verie truth, without regard or reſpect of anie perſon, that thoſe perſons which be rehearſed in the 18 chapter of the Leuiticall law, be forbidden by the verie law of nature to contract matrimonie togither, and that this law can in no wiſe be releaſed by anie authoritie of anie man, by the which there is made an abhominable diſcouering of his brothers fouleneſſe. And this is the ſigne of our common bedell or notarie, and the ſeale of our foreſaid facultie put vnto this preſent writing the 10 daie of Iune, in the yeare of our Lord 1530. And bicauſe the foot of our writing ſhall be of one forme and faſhion with the head, as we began with praier, ſo let vs end after the example of S. Paule that we ſpake of before, and ſaie, the grace and fauour of our Lord Ieſu Chriſt, the charitie and loue of God and the communication of the holie ghoſt be with you all, Amen.

The determination of the diuines in the popes vniuerſitie of Bononie.

Bononie.

GOD beſt and mightieſt taught firſt the old law and teſtament with his owne mouth, to forme and faſhion according to loue and charitie the maners and life of men. And ſecondarilie the ſame God did take afterwards manhood vpon him for to be the redéemer of man, and ſo made the new law or new teſtament, not onlie to forme and faſhion according to loue and charitie the life and maners of men, but alſo to take awaie and to declare doubts, the which did ariſe in manie caſes, which when they be once cléerelie determined, ſhall helpe greatlie to perfect vertue and goodneſſe, that is to ſaie, to perfect loue and charitie.

Wherefore we thought it euermore, that it ſhould be our part to follow theſe moſt holie doctrines and lawes of our father of heauen, and that we lightned by the light of God aboue & of the holie ghoſt, ſhould giue our ſentence and iudgement in high and doubtfull matters, after that we haue once leiſurelie and ſufficientlie taken aduiſement vpon the cauſe, and haue cléerelie ſearched out and opened the thing by manie reaſons and writings of holie fathers, as well for the one part as for the other, dooing nothing (as néere as we can) raſhlie or without deliberation. Therefore where certeine great and noble men did inſtantlie deſire vs, that we would with all diligence poſſible looke for this caſe that after inſueth, & afterwards to giue our iudgement vpon the ſame, according to moſt equitie, right, and conſcience, ſticking onelie to the truth.

Burges.

All the doctors of diuinitie of this vniuerſitie, when we had euerie one by himſelfe examined the matter at home in our houſes, came all togither into one place, and there treated vpon it manie daies with as much cunning and learning as we could, we anon looked on the caſe togither, we examined it togither, we compared all things togither, we handling euerie thing by it ſelfe, did trie them euen as you would ſaie by line and rule, we brought foorth all maner of reaſons which we thought could be brought for the contrarie part, and afterward ſolued them, yea euen the reaſons of the moſt reuerend father cardinall Caietane, yea and moreouer the Deuteronomie diſpenſation of ſtirring vp the brothers ſéed, and ſhortlie all other maner of reaſons and opinions of the contrarie part, as manie as ſéemed to belong to this purpoſe.

And this queſtion that was aſked of vs, was this: Whether it was forbidden onelie by the ordinance of the church, or elſe by the law of God, that a man might not marrie the wife left of his brother departed without children? And if it were commanded by both the lawes not to be doone, whether the pope may diſpenſe with anie man to make ſuch marriage? The which queſtion now that we haue examined both by our ſelfe ſecretlie, and alſo openlie as diligentlie and exactlie as we could poſſiblie, and diſcuſſed it after the beſt manner that our wits would ſerue: we determine, giue iudgement, and ſaie, and as ſtiflie as we can we witneſſe, and without anie doubt doo ſtedfaſtlie hold, that this marriage ſhould be horrible, accurſſed, and to be cried out vpon, and vtterlie abhominable not onelie for a chriſtian man, but for an infidell, vnfaithfull or heathen.

And that it is prohibited vnder gréeuous paines and puniſhments by the law of God, of nature, and of man, and that the pope, though that he almoſt may doo all things, vnto whome Chriſt did giue the keies of the kingdome of heauen, hath no power to giue a diſpenſation to anie man for to contract ſuch marriage for anie maner of cauſe, conſideration or ſuggeſtion: and all we be readie at all times & in all places to defend & mainteine the truth of this our concluſion. In witneſſe whereof we haue made this preſent writing, and haue fortified the ſame both with the ſeale of our vniuerſitie, and alſo with the ſeale of our college of doctors of diuinitie, and haue ſubſcribed & ſigned it with our generall and accuſtomed ſubſcription in the cathedrall church of Bononie, the tenth daie of Iune, the yeare of our Lord 1530.

The determination of the facultie of diuinitie in the vniuerſitie of Padua in Italie.

Padua.

THey that haue written for the maintenance of the catholike faith, affirme that God (beſt and mightieſt) did giue the precepts & commandements of the old law with his owne mouth, to be an example for vs, wherein we might ſée how we ſhould order our life and maners, and this God had doone before he became man: and after that he had put vpon him our manhood, & was become redéemer or buier of mankind, he made the new law or teſtament, and of his méere liberalitie did giue it vs, not onelie for the cauſe aforſaid; but alſo to take awaie and declare all maner of doubts and queſtions that might ariſe, the which once opened and declared, what their verie true meaning is, to the intent that thereby we might be made perfectlie good, which be greatlie fruitfull vnto vs and wholeſome.

And ſéeing that this was the mind of God in making theſe lawes, it hath béene our intent, and euermore ſhall be, as it becommeth chriſtian men, to follow theſe moſt ſolemne ordinances of the moſt high workemaſter God, & the helpe of his light, that is aboue the capacitie of nature, to vtter our iudgment in all maner of doubts and hard queſtions. After we had once conſidered the thing after the beſt maner, and had by ſufficient leiſure made it cléere by manie euident reaſons of both parties, and by manie authorities of the fathers of the church, determining nothing (as neere as we can) raſhlie or without conuenient deliberation. Séeing therefore that certeine great orators or ambaſſadors did humblie require and praie vs, that we would vouchſafe to ſearch out with all the diligence we could this caſe following, and afterwards to giue our ſentence vpon the ſame, plainelie and ſimplie looking onelie on the truth.

After the doctors of diuinitie of this vniuerſitie came togither, and after that we had euerie man examined the thing particularlie in our owne houſes, and had beaten it with all learning and cunning that we were able: anon when we were togither, we conſidered, examined, and weied all things by themſelues, and brought in all maner of reaſons, which we thought might by anie meanes be made to the contrarie, and without all colour or cloke did wholie and cléerlie diſſolue them and take them awaie. And amongſt all, the diſpenſation by the law of Deuteronomie, of ſtirring vp the brothers ſéed, and all maner other reaſons and determinations to the contrarie, that ſéemed to vs to perteine anie thing to that purpoſe, we vtterlie confuted and diſpatched them.

The queſtion that is put vnto vs is this; Whether to marrie the wife of our brother departed without children, is forbidden onelie by the law of the church, or by the law of God alſo? And if it be forbidden by both theſe laws, whether the pope maie diſpenſe with anie man for ſuch matrimonie or no? Which queſtion now that we haue diſcuſſed it, and as farre as we could, haue made it cléere, both priuatlie euerie man by himſelfe, and after all togither openlie, we ſaie, iudge, decrée, witneſſe, and for a truth affirme, that ſuch marriage is no marriage; yea and that it is abhorred and curſſed of euerie chriſtian man, and to be abhominate as a grieuous ſinne; and that it is as cléere as can be forbidden vnder moſt cruell penalties by the lawes of nature, of God, and of man; and that the pope, vnto whome the keies of the kingdome of heauen be committed by Chriſt the ſonne of God, hath no power to diſpenſe by the right of law for anie cauſe, ſuggeſtion, or excuſe, that anie ſuch matrimonie ſhould be contracted.

For thoſe things which be forbidden by the law of God, be not vnderneath his power, but aboue it; nor he is not the vicar of God as concerning thoſe things, but onelie in ſuch things as God hath not determined himſelfe in his law; but hath left them to the determination and ordinance of man. And to mainteine the truth of this our ſentence and concluſion, and for the moſt certeine and vndoubted defenſe of the ſame, we all of one mind and accord ſhall at all times and in euerie place be readie. In witneſſe whereof we haue made this writing, and haue authoriſed it with the accuſtomed ſeale of our vniuerſitie and alſo of our college of diuines. Dated at Padua in the church of the heremites of ſaint Auguſtine the firſt daie of Iulie, in the yeare of our Lord 1530.

The determination of the vniuerſitie of Tholoſe.

Tholoſe.

THere was treated in our vniuerſitie of Tholoſe a verie hard queſtion; Whether it be lawfull for the brother to marrie hir which had béene wife to his brother now departed, & that without children? There was beſides this an other thing that troubled vs verie ſore; Whether, if the pope which hath the cure of Chriſts flocke, would by his diſpenſation (as men call it) ſuffer this, that then at the leaſt wiſe it might be lawfull? The rector of the vniuerſitie called to counſell all the doctors regents, that were at that time at Tholoſe for to ſhew their minds on this queſtion, and that not once, but twiſe: for he iudged that counſell giuing ought not to be haſted nor doone vpon head, and that we had néed of time and ſpace to doo anie thing conuenientlie and as it ought to be.

At the laſt there came togither into one place all the beſt learned and cunningeſt doctors, both of holie diuinitie, and alſo doctors that were beſt learned in both lawes; yea, and finallie as manie as had anie experience in anie matter, and were able to doo anie thing either by iudgement and diſcretion, or by eloquence or their excellent wits; and there did ſweare that they would obeie the ſacred and holie councels, and would follow the decrées of the fathers, which no man that hath anie good conſcience will violat or breake. And ſo euerie man ſaid his mind, & the matter was debated and reaſoned diffuſelie and at large for both parts.

In concluſion, we fell ſo faſt to this point, that this was the ſentence and determination that our vniuerſitie, with one voice of all, did determine and conclude with moſt pure and cléere conſcience, and defiled with no maner of leuen of corruption: That it is lawfull for no man, neither by the law of God, nor by the law of nature, to take hir to wife that his brother hath left: and ſéeing that it maie not be doone by the law of God nor of nature, we anſwered all, that the pope can looſe no man from that law, nor diſpenſe with him. And as for that thing can not be contrarie to our ſentence and verdict, that the brother in old time was compelled by the law of Deuteronomie to marrie the brothers wife departed without iſſue. For this law was but a ſhadow and a figure of things to come, which vaniſhed awaie as ſoone as euer the light and truth of the goſpell appeared. And bicauſe theſe things be thus, we haue giuen our ſentence after this forme aboue, and haue commanded the ſame to be ſigned by our notarie which is our ſecretarie, and to be fortified and authoriſed by the putting to of our authenticall ſeale of our vniuerſitie aforeſaid, at Tholoſe the calends or firſt daie of October, the yeare of our Lord 1530.

After theſe determinations were read, there were ſhewed aboue an hundred bookes drawn by doctors of ſtrange regions, which all agreed the kings marriage to be vnlawfull, which were not read, for the daie was ſpent. Then the chancellor ſaid: Now you of this common houſe maie report in your countries what you haue ſéene and heard, & then all men ſhall openlie perceiue, that the king hath not attempted this matter of will and pleaſure, as ſome ſtrangers report, but onlie for the diſcharge of his conſcience and ſuertie of the ſucceſſion of his realme: this is the cauſe of our repaire hither to you, and now will we depart.

When theſe determinations were publiſhed, all wiſe men in the realme much abhorred that marriage: but women, and ſuch as were more wilfull than wiſe or learned, ſpake againſt the determination, and ſaid that the vniuerſities were corrupt and intiſed ſo to doo, which is not to be thought. The king himſelfe ſore lamented his chance, and made no maner of mirth nor paſtime as he was wont to doo. He dined and reſorted to the quéene as he was accuſtomed, and diminiſhed nothing of hir eſtate, and much loued and cheriſhed their daughter the ladie Marie: but in no wiſe he would not come to hir bed. When Eaſter began to draw néere, the parlement for that time ended, and was proroged till the laſt daie of March, in the next yéere. In the parlement aforeſaid was an act made, that whoſoeuer did poiſon anie perſon, ſhould be boiled in hot water to the death: which act was made, bicauſe one Richard Roſe, in the parlement time had poiſoned diuerſe perſons at the biſhop

An act of poiſoning.

ſhop of Rocheſters place, which Richard, according to the ſame act, was boiled in Smithfield the teneber wedneſdaie following, to the terrible example of all other.

Anno Reg. 23.

When the vniuerſitie aforeſaid, and a great number of clearks and well learned men had determined the kings marriage to be vnlawfull, deteſtable, and againſt Gods law (as you haue heard) the king willing the quéene to haue knowledge of the ſame, ſent to hir diuerſe lords of the councell, the laſt daie of Maie, being the wedneſdaie in Whitſun wéeke: the which Lords, in hir chamber at Gréenewich, declared to hir all the determinations (as you haue heard) and aſked hir whether ſhe would (for the quietneſſe of the kings conſcience) put the matter to foure prelats, and foure temporall lords of this realme, or abide by hir appeale? The quéene anſwered: The king my father which concluded my marriage, I am ſure, was not ſo ignorant but he aſked counſell of clearks and well learned men before he married me the ſecond time: for if he had had anie doubt in my marriage, he would not haue diſburſed ſo great a treſure as he did, & then all the doctors in a maner agréed my marriage to be good, inſomuch that the pope himſelfe, which knew beſt what was to be doone, did both diſpenſe and ratifie the ſecond marriage, againſt whoſe doings I maruell that any perſon will ſpeake or write.

Meſſage ſent to the quéene from the king.

And as to the determination of the vniuerſitie, I am a woman, and lacke wit and learning to anſwer to them, but to God I commit the iudgement of that, whether they haue doone iuſtlie or parciallie: for this I am ſure, that neither the kings father, nor my father would haue condeſcended to our marriage, if it had béene declared to be vnlawfull. And where you ſaie that I ſhould put the cauſe to eight perſons of this realme for quietneſſe of the kings conſcience, I pray God ſend his grace a quiet conſcience. And this ſhall be your anſwer: that I ſaie I am his lawfull wife, and to him lawfullie married, and by the order of holie church I was to him eſpouſed as his true wife (although I was not ſo worthie) and in that point I will abide till the court of Rome, which was priuie to the beginning, haue made thereof a determination and finall ending. With this anſwer the lords departed to the king, which was ſorie to heare of hir wilfull opinion, and in eſpeciall that ſhe more truſted in the popes law, than in kéeping the precepts of God.]

A proclamation for merchant ſtrangers.

Forſomuch as merchant ſtrangers, bringing their wares into the realme, did receiue readie monie for them, and euer deliuered the ſame monie to other merchants by exchange, not emploieng it vpon the commodities of the realme, a proclamation was ſet forth and made, that no perſon ſhould make anie exchange, contrarie to the meaning of a ſtatute ordeined in the time of king Richard the ſecond: by reaſon whereof, clothes and other commodities of this realme ſhortlie after were well ſold, till they fell to exchange againe, and that this proclamation was forgotten. After Whitſuntide, the king & the quéene remooued to Windſor, and there continued till the fourtéenth of Iulie, on the which daie the king remooued to Woodſtocke, and left the quéene at Windſor, where ſhe remained a while, & after remooued to the More, and from thence to Eſtamſtéed, whither the king ſent to hir diuerſe lords, to aduiſe hir to be conformable to the law of God, ſhewing ſundrie reaſons to perſuade hir to their purpoſe, and one among the reſt vſed for that preſent this communication, as I find it left in writing, in the behoofe of the king.

Abr. Fle. ex lib. manuſcripto. Talke to Q. Katharine.

¶ Madam, the kings highneſſe hath commanded vs repairing vnto you, on his highneſſe behalfe to ſhew vnto you thus much, that his maieſtie hauing heretofore ſent vnto you a great number of his councellors and learned men, to declare what great iniuries and wrongs by your procurement and ſollicitation were and yet be doone vnto his maieſtie and this his realme, in citing his highneſſe in his owne perſon, or by his proctor to appeare at Rome, to make anſwer to your ſute, contrarie to the determination of all lawes, as not onelie the famous vniuerſities of chriſtendome, as Paris and Orleance, but alſo as the moſt part of the learned men here or elſewhere in that facultie affirme, and as maiſter deane learned in that facultie can and will teſtifie vnto you, on his conſcience, if it ſhall pleaſe you to heare him, and contrarie alſo to his eſtate roiall, and to the priuileges and prerogatiues of this his graces realme.

His highneſſe perceiuing your grace not to regard their aduertiſements in right and iuſtice, but ſtill to perſeuere and continue, and rather increaſe your iniurious procurements and ſolicitations in that behalfe, is not a little gréeued & diſpleaſed with your continuance and proſecution of this iniurie and manifeſt wrong towards his maieſtie, and this his graces realme. The continuance of which your vnkind dealing hath compelled his highneſſe not onelie to abſteine from the ſight of you, but alſo to forbeare to receiue anie of your tokens, which doo nothing elſe but renew and refreſh his diſpleaſure, inforcing him alſo to an indignation, to ſée tokens offered and ſent by hir, who continueth in proſecuting of ſo notable an iniurie and manifeſt wrong towards his maieſtie, & this his realme, perceiuing alſo what boldneſſe other outward princes might take to miſintreat his highneſſe, when they ſhould vnderſtand how his maieſtie ſuffreth himſelfe to be wronged by his pretended ſubiect, and ſo notable wrong to be doone to this his realme.

And vpon this cauſe and ground, like as the kings highneſſe theſe certeine moneths paſt, hath diſſeuered your grace from his preſence, ſo he intendeth yet to continue, and hath commanded vs to ſhew you, that his pleaſure is ye ſhalbe at your libertie, & (as ye ſhall thinke moſt commodious) repaire to either of theſe thrée places, his manour of Oking, his manour of Eſtamſtéed, or the monaſterie of Biſham, and there to continue without further moleſting of his highneſſe with your ſutes or requeſts to the contrarie, as wherewith ye ſhall not preuaile; but more and more moleſting and troubling his highneſſe, procure his further diſpleaſure towards you.

And though percaſe the pope ſhall deſiſt, as perceiuing now the matter of right he will, yet the kings highneſſe cannot digeſt in his ſtomach this iniurie doone, not to be amended or reformed at your graces procurement, but your grace rather ſuing and inſtanting the contrarie. And this is the charge, madam, which the kings highneſſe hath committed vnto vs, to be ſpoken vnto you on his highneſſe behalfe. And to ſaie to you as of my ſelfe, concerning the iuſtneſſe of the kings cauſe, as I haue heretofore ſaid, I ſhall now repeat and rehearſe againe vnto your grace; which is, that your grace being knowne by prince Arthur, ye be not lawfull wife to the kings highneſſe our ſoueraigne lord in my conſcience. This ſpeach ended, others of the companie vſed their perſuaſorie talke to the quéene: whoſe words notwithſtanding did ſo little mooue hir, that ſhe ſtood ſtiffelie in hir firſt opinion, that ſhe was his true and lawfull wife, and from the ſame would not by anie meanes be remooued.]

The quéene ſtandeth ſtiffe in hir opinion concerning the controuerſie of hir mariage.

The prieſts of London being called afore the biſhop that would haue had them contributaries to his paiment of the hundred thouſand pounds, granted to the king for his pardon of the premunire, kept ſuch a ſtir in breaking into the chapiter houſe (where the biſhop ſat) all at once, and ſtriking and buffeting the biſhops ſeruants which gaue them euill language, that the biſhop was faine to giue them his bleſſing, and ſuffer them to depart in quiet for that time. But after, vpon complaint made to the lord chancellor, diuerſe of them and of their partakers were arreſted, and committed to priſon, to the number of fifteene prieſts, and fiue laie men, ſome to the Tower, and ſome to the Fleet, and to other places, where they remained long after. ¶Thomas Bilneie, bachellor of law, was burnt at Norwich the ninteenth of Auguſt, and the fourth of December ſir Rees Griffin was beheaded at the Tower hill, and his man named John Hewes was drawne to Tiburne, and there hanged and quartered.

Crueltie of ordinaries.

The fiue and twentith of Maie, beteene London and Grauesend, were taken two great fiſhes called whorlepooles, male and female. ¶In this ſeaſon, there was in the realme much preaching, one lerned man holding againſt another, namelie in the matter of the kings mariage. After Chriſtmas, the parlement began to ſit againe, in the which the commons found themſelues ſore greeued with the crueltie of ordinaries, that called men before them Ex officio. At length, a booke was drawne of all the griefes of the commons, for the cruell demeanor of the cleargie, and the ſame deliuered to the K. by the ſpeaker, humblie beſeeching him in the name of all the commons, to take ſuch direction therein, as to his high wiſedome might ſeeme moſt expedient. The king anſwered, that he would take aduiſe, and heare the partie accuſed ſpeake. He was not ſo readie to gratifie the commons in their requeſts, as ſome thought that he would haue beene, if they had not ſticked and refuſed to paſſe a ſtatute, which he had ſent to them touching wards and primer ſeaſons.

The parlemēt proroged. Annates forbidden to be paid.

A fifteenth granted.

After this, was the parlement proroged till the tenth of Aprill. In this parlement was an act made, that biſhops ſhould paie no more annates or monie for their bulles to the pope: for it was prooued that there had beene paid for bulles of biſhops, ſince the fourth yeare of Henrie the ſeuenth an hundred threeſcore thouſand pounds ſterling, beſide other diſpenſations & pardons. When the parlement was begun againe after Eaſter, there was a motion made to helpe the king with monie toward his charges about the edifieng of houſes, piles, and other fortifications, vpon the borders fore againſt Scotland, both for better habitation to be had there, & alſo for the reſtraint of the Scots that vſed to make inuaſions. There was therefore a fifteenth granted, but not enacted at this ſeſſion, bicauſe that ſuddenlie began a peſtilence in Weſtminſter, wherfore the parlement was proroged, as ye ſhall heare in the next yeare.

A toll demanded in the low countries.

Yorke place or White Hall now the palace of weſtminſter.

S. James.

In this yeare was an old toll demanded in Flanders of Engliſhmen called the toll of the hound, which is a riuer and a paſſage. The toll is twelue pence of a fardell. It had beene often demanded, but neuer paied, inſomuch that king Henrie the ſeuenth for the demand of that toll, prohibited all his ſubiects to keepe anie mart at Antwerpe or Barrow, till it was promiſed that vpon their returne the ſaid toll ſhould neuer be demanded. The king ſent doctor Knight, and others to Calis, whither came the emperours commiſſioners, and there (vpon talke) the matter was put in ſuſpenſion for a time. The king hauing purchaſed of the cardinall after his attendure in the premunire his houſe at Weſtminſter, called Yorke place, and got a confirmation of the cardinals feoffement thereof, made of the chapter of the cathedrall church of Yorke, purchaſed this yeare alſo all the medows about ſaint James, and there made a faire manſion and a parke for his greater commoditie & pleaſure. And bicauſe he had a great affection to the ſaid houſe at Weſtminſter, he beſtowed great coſt in going forward with the building thereof, and changed the name, ſo that it was after called the kings palace of Weſtminſter.

Anno reg.24. The parlemēt proroged.

Sir Thomas Moore deliuereth vp the great ſeale.

Sir Thomas Audleie lord keeper of the great ſeale.

The fourteenth daie of Maie, the parlement was proroged till the fourth of Februarie next comming. After which prorogation, ſir Thomas Moore, chancellor of England, after long ſutes made to the king to be diſcharged of his office, the ſixteenth of Maie he deliuered to the king at Weſtminſter the great ſeale of England, and was with the kings fauour diſcharged, which ſeale the king kept till mondaie in Whitſunweeke, on which daie he dubbed Thomas Audleie ſpeaker of the parlement, knight, and made him lord keeper of the great ſeale, and ſo he was called. ¶The king being informed, that the pope and the French king ſhould meet in the beginning of the next ſpring at Marſeiles, he thought good for diuerſe conſiderations, to ſpeake with the French king in his owne perſon, before the pope and he ſhould come togither: wherevpon it was concluded, that in October following, both the princes ſhould meet betweene Calis and Bullongne. Wherfore the king of England ſent out his letters to his nobles, prelats, and ſeruants, commanding them to be readie at Canturburie the ſix and twentith of September, to paſſe the ſeas with him, for the accompliſhment of the interuiew betwixt him and the French king.

The ladie Anne Bullongne created marchiones of Penbroke.

The king paſſeth ouer to Calis.

On the firſt of September being ſundaie, the K. being come to Windſor, created the ladie Anne Bullongne marchioneſſe of Penbroke, and gaue to hir one thouſand pounds land by the yeare; and that ſolemnitie finiſhed, he rode to the college, where after that ſeruice was ended, a new league was concluded and ſworne betwene the king, and the French king, Meſſire Pomoraie the French ambaſſador being preſent. On the tenth of October, the king came to Douer, and on the eleuenth daie in the morning at three of the clocke hee tooke ſhipping at Douer rode, and before ten of the ſame daie, he with the ladie marchioneſſe of Penbroke landed at Calis, where he was receiued with all honour, and lodged at the Eſchecker. There came to him whileſt he laie in Calis, diuerſe lords from the French court, and amongſt other the lord great maiſter of France, and the archbiſhop of Roane, which were honorablie of him receiued, and with them he tooke a date and place of meeting with the king their maiſter.

The interuiew betwixt the kings of England and France.

Wherevpon the one and twentith of October, he marched out of Calis, accompanied with the dukes of Norffolke and Suffolke, the marqueſſes of Dorſet and Exceſter, the erles of Arundell, Oxford, Surreie, Eſſex, Darbie, Rutland, Huntington, and Suſſex, with diuerſe vicounts, barons, knights of the garter, and other of the nobilitie and gentlemen freſhlie apparelled, and richlie trimmed; and comming to the place appointed, he there met with the French king, who was come to receiue him with all honor that might be: and after ſalutations and embracings vſed in moſt louing maner, the king of England went with the French K. to Bullongne; and by the waie was incountered by the French kings three ſons, and other great lords that attended them, with welcomming the king of England; he them gentlie receiued, and ſo all this noble companie came to Bullongne, where the king of England and his nobles were ſo noblie interteined, feaſted, banketed, and cheared, that wonder it was to conſider the great plentie of viands, ſpices, wines, and all other prouiſion neceſſarie for man and horſſe, ſo that there was no more but aſke and haue; and no man durſt take anie monie; for the French king paid for all.

The dukes of Norffolke and Suffolke elected into the order of S. Michaell.

The fiue and twentith of October, whileſt the king laie thus in Bullongne, the French king called a chapiter of the companions of his order named S. Michaell, of whome the king of England was one, and ſo there elected the dukes of Norffolke and Suffolke to be companions of the ſame order: and being brought to the chapiter, they had their collars deliuered to them, and were ſworne to the ſtatutes of the order, their obeiſance to their ſoueraigne lord alwaie reſerued. Thus the two kings laie in Bullongne, mondaie, tueſdaie, wedneſdaie, and thurſdaie: and on fridaie the fiue and twentith of October, they departed out of Bullongne to Calis. Without the towne of Calis about the diſtance of two miles, the duke of Richmond the kings baſe ſon, with a great companie of noble men, which had not béene at Bullongne, met them, and ſaluting the French king, embraced him in moſt honorable and courteous maner.

The duke of Richmond.

Thus they paſſed forward, and came to Newnham bridge, and ſo to Calis, where was ſuch prouiſion made for the receiuing of them, as well for lodgings, plate, and all ſuch other furniture of houſhold, as alſo of all ſorts of viands, wines, and other neceſſaries, that it ſéemed woonderfull: in ſo much as the proportion aſſigned to the French lords oftentimes was ſo abundant, that they refuſed a great part thereof. The French kings traine was twelue hundred horſſes, or rather aboue. But there was lodging inough in Calis, not onlie for them, but alſo for manie other, ſo that there were aboue eight thouſand perſons lodged within the towne in that ſeaſon. The French king comming thither on the fridaie, tarried there till tueſdaie the thirtith of October, and then departed; the king of England accompanieng him out of the towne, till he came to enter into the French ground, and there either tooke leaue of other with right princelie countenance, louing behauiour, and ſo hartie words, that all men reioiſed that ſaw them.

The great maſter and admerall of France made knights of the garter.

Whileſt the two kings laie in Calis, the lord Annas de Montmorancie earle of Beaumont, great maſter of the French kings houſe, & Philip de Chabot erle of Newblanke, great admerall of France, were admitted into the order of the garter, the king calling a chapiter for that purpoſe, of the knights of that order, at the which the French king was preſent, and ware a blew mantell, becauſe he was one of the ſame order. Whileſt the king was in the French kings dominion, he had the vpper hand, and likewiſe had the French king in his dominion. And as the French king paid all the Engliſhmens charges at Bullongne: ſo did the king of England at Calis. There roſe about the ſame ſeaſon ſuch ſore weather, ſtorms and rigorous winds, continuing for the more part at north and northweſt, that the king ſtaied at Calis for a conuenient wind till tueſdaie the thirtéenth of Nouember at midnight, and then taking his ſhip, landed at Douer the next daie about fiue of the clocke in the morning. And herewith vpon his returne, hs married priuilie the ladie Anne Bullongne the ſame daie, being the fourtéenth daie of Nouember, and the feaſt daie of ſaint Erkenwald; which marriage was kept ſo ſecret, that verie few knew it till Eaſter next inſuing, when it was perceiued that ſhe was with child.

The king returneth into England. He marrieth the lady Anne Bullongne.

When the king ſhould paſſe ouer the ſea, he conſidered that the Scots would happilie attempt ſomewhat to the preiudice of his ſubiects in his abſence, which ſticked not (he being within the realme) to rob both by ſea and land. Wherefore to reſiſt their malice, he appointed ſir Arthur Darcie with thrée hundred men to go vnto Berwike, to defend the borders from inuaſions of the Scots, who ſhortlie after by the middle marches entred the realme, and came to a place called Fowberie, and fiering certeine villages in their waie, returned. The erle of Angus as then was at Berwike as a baniſhed man; and the ſaid ſir Arthur determined to reuenge this diſpleaſure: and therevpon with foure hundred men made a rode into Scotland, and ſet a village on fire. Then immediatlie aſſembled togither eight hundred Scots, and began to approch néere to the Engliſhmen, who perceiuing them, cauſed their trumpet to blow the retreit, and the erle and twentie with him ſhewed himſelfe on an hill, euen in the face of the Scots, and the trumpet blew at their backs, ſo that the Scots thought that there had béene two companies, which cauſed the Scots to flie, and the Engliſhmen followed and ſlew a great number of them, and tooke manie of them priſoners.

Scots diſcomfited by the Engliſhmen.

Sir Thomas Audleie lord chancellor.

After Chriſtmaſſe ſir Thomas Audleie lord kéeper of the great ſeale was made high chancellor of England. And when the parlement began, becauſe the office of the ſpeaker was void, Humfreie Wingfield of Greis inne was choſen ſpeaker. In this parlement was an act made, that no perſon ſhould appeale for anie cauſe out of this realme to the court of Rome, but from the commiſſarie to the biſhop, and from the biſhop to the archbiſhop, and from the archbiſhop to the king; and all cauſes of the king to be tried in the vpper houſe of the conuocation. It was alſo enacted the ſame time, that quéene Katharine ſhould no more be called quéene, but princeſſe Dowager, as the widow of prince Arthur. ¶ In the ſeaſon of the laſt ſummer died William Warham archbiſhop of Canturburie, and then was named to that ſea Thomas Cranmer the kings chapleine, a man of good learning, and of a vertuous life, which latelie before had béene ambaſſador from the king to the pope.

Quéene Katharine to be named princeſſe Dowager.

After that the king perceiued his new wife to be with child, he cauſed all officers neceſſarie to be appointed to hir, and ſo on Eaſter euen ſhe went to hir cloſet openlie as quéene; and then the king appointed the daie of hir coronation to be kept on Whitſundaie next following: and writings were ſent to all ſhiriffs, to certifie the names of men of fortie pounds to receiue the order of knighthood, or elſe to make fine. The aſſeſment of the fine was appointed to Thomas Cromwell, maiſter of the kings iewell houſe, & councellor to the king, a man newlie receiued into high fauour. He ſo vſed the matter, that a great ſumme of monie was raiſed to the kings vſe by thoſe fines. The matter of the quéenes appeale whereunto ſhe ſtill ſticked, and by no means could be remooued from it, was communed of, both in the parlement houſe, and alſo in the conuocation houſe, where it was ſo handled, that manie were of opinion, that not onelie hir appeale, but alſo all other appeales made to Rome were void and of none effect: for that in ancient councels it had béene determined, that a cauſe riſing in one prouince ſhould be determined in the ſame.

Quéene Anne.

Anno reg. 25.

This matter was opened with all the circumſtances to the ladie Katharine Dowager (for ſo was ſhe then called) the which perſiſted ſtill in hir former opinion, and would reuoke by no meanes hir appeale to the court of Rome. Wherevpon the archbiſhop of Canturburie accompanied with the biſhops of London, Wincheſter, Bath, Lincolne, and diuers other learned men in great number, rode to Dunſtable, which is ſix miles from Ampthill, where the princeſſe Dowager laie, and there by one doctor Lée ſhe was cited to appeare before the ſaid archbiſhop in cauſe of matrimonie in the ſaid towne of Dunſtable, and at the daie of appearance ſhe appeared not, but made default, and ſo ſhe was called peremptorie euerie daie fiftéene daies togither, and at the laſt, for lacke of appearance, by the aſſent of all the learned men there preſent, ſhe was diuorſed from the king, and the mariage declared to be void and of none effect. Of this diuorſe and of the kings mariage with the ladie Anne Bullongne men ſpake diuerſelie; ſome ſaid the king had doone wiſelie, and ſo as became him to doo in diſcharge of his conſcience. Other otherwiſe iudged, and ſpake their fanſies as they thought good: but when euerie man had talked inough, then were they quiet, and all reſted in good peace.

In Maie pope Clement ſent an orator to the king, requiring him to appeare perſonallie at the generall councell which he had appointed to be kept the yéere following. But when his commiſſion was ſhewed, at the earneſt requeſt of the king, there was neither place nor time ſpecified for the kéeping of that councell; and ſo with an vncerteine anſwer to an vncerteine demand he departed, but not vnrewarded. The king vnderſtanding that the pope, the emperor, & the French king ſhuld méet at Nice in Iulie folowing, appointed the duke of Norffolke, the lord Rochford brother to quéene Anne, ſir William Pawlet controllor of his houſe, ſir Anthonie Browne, and ſir Francis Brian knights, to go in ambaſſage to the French king, and both to accompanie him to Nice, and alſo to commune with the pope there concerning his ſtaie in the kings diuorſe. Theſe worthie perſonages made their prouiſion readie; and ſo with the number of eight ſcore horſſes they went to Douer, and paſſing ouer to Calis, tooke their waie through France, to accompliſh their ambaſſage as they had in commandement.

Proclamation for the coronation of quéene Anne.

In the beginning of Maie, the king cauſed open proclamations to be made, that all men that claimed to doo anie ſeruice, or execute anie office at the ſolemne feaſt of the coronation by the waie of tenure, grant, or preſcription, ſhould put their grant thrée wéekes after Eaſter in the Starrechamber before Charles duke of Suffolke, for that time high ſteward of England, and the lord chancellor and other commiſſioners. The duke of Norffolke claimed to be erle marſhall, and to exerciſe his office at that feaſt; the erle of Arundell claimed to be high butler, and to exerciſe the ſame; the erle of Oxford claimed to be chamberlaine; the vicount Liſle claimed to be panteler; the lord Aburgauennie to be chiefe larderer; and the lord Braie claimed to be almoner, and ſir Henrie Wiat knight claimed to be ewrer. All theſe noble perſonages deſired their offices with their fées.

The ſeuerall claimes of diuerſe honorable and worſhipfull perſons.

Beſide theſe, the maior of London claimed to ſerue the quéene with a cup of gold, and a cup of aſſaie of the ſame, and that twelue citizens ſhould attend on the cupboord, and the maior to haue the cup and cup of aſſaie for his labor: which petition was allowed. The fiue ports claimed to beare a canopie ouer the quéens head the daie of the coronation with foure guilt belles, and to haue the ſame for a reward, which to them was allowed. Diuerſe other put in petie claimes which were not allowed, bicauſe they ſéemed onlie to be doone at the kings coronation. All this ſeaſon great purueiance was made of all maner of vittels: & lords, knights & eſquierrs were ſent for out of all countries, which came to London at their daie with a great number of people.

The kings letters to the maior of London, touching the coronation.

¶Aft..: that the kings highneſſe had addreſſed his gratious letters to the maior and communaltie of the citie, ſignifieng to them, that his pleaſure was to ſolemnize and celebrate the coronation of his moſt deare and welbeloued wife quéene Anne, at Weſtminſter the Whitſundaie next inſuing, willed them to make preparation, as well to fetch hir grace from Gréenwich to the Tower by water, as to ſée the citie ordered and garniſhed with pageants in places accuſtomed, for the honor of hir grace. When ſhe ſhuld be conueied from the Tower to Weſtminſter, there was a common councell called, and commandement was giuen to the haberdaſhers (of which craft the maior ſir Stephan Pecocke then was) that they ſhould prepare a barge for the bachelors, with a wafter and a foiſt, garniſhed with banners and ſtreamers likewiſe, as they vſe to doo when the maior is preſented at Weſtminſter on the morrow after Simon and Iude. Alſo all other crafts were commanded to prepare barges, and to garniſh them, not alonelie with their banners accuſtomed, but alſo to decke them with targets by the ſides of the barges, and to ſet vp all ſuch ſéemelie banners and bannerets as they had in their halles, or could get méet to furniſh their ſaid barges, and euerie barge to haue minſtrelſie: according to which commandements great preparation was made for all things neceſſarie for ſuch a noble triumph.

The cities preparation.

Hir comming by water from Gréenewich on thurſdaie.

The ninetéenth daie of Maie, the maior and his brethren all in ſcarlet, and ſuch as were knights had collars of S S, and the remnant hauing good chains, and the counſell of the citie with them, aſſembled at ſaint Marie hill, and at one of the clocke deſcended to the new ſtaire to their barge, which was garniſhed with manie goodlie banners and ſtreamers, and richlie couered. In which barge were ſhalmes, ſhagbuſhes, and diuerſe other inſtruments, which continuallie made goodlie harmonie. After that the maior and his brethren were in their barge, ſéeing that all the companies to the number of fiftie barges were readie to wait vpon them, they gaue commandement to the companies, that no barge ſhould rowe néerer to another than twiſe the length of the barge vpon a great paine. And to ſée the order kept, there were thrée light wheries prepared, and in euerie one of them two officers to call on them to kéepe their order, after which commandement giuen, they ſet foorth in order as hereafter is deſcribed.

The maiors barge with the conceits and deuiſes thereof.

Firſt before the maiors barge was a foiſt or wafter full of ordinance, in which foiſt was a great dragon continuallie mouing and caſting wild fire: and round about the ſaid foiſt ſtood terrible monſters and wild men caſting fire, and making hideous noiſes. Next after the foiſt a good diſtance came the maiors barge: on whoſe right hand was the bachelors barge, in the which were trumpets and diuerſe other melodious inſtruments; the deckes of the ſaid barge and the ſailyards, with the top caſtels were hanged with rich cloth of gold and ſilke: at the foreſhip and the ſterne were two great banners rich, beaten with the armes of the king and the quéene, and on the top caſtell alſo was a long ſtreamer newlie beaten with the ſaid armes. The ſides of the barge was ſet full of flags and banners of the deuiſes of the companie of the haberdaſhers and merchants aduenturers, and the cords were hanged with innumerable penſelles, hauing little belles at the ends, which made a goodlie noiſe and a goodlie ſight, wauering in the wind. On the outſide of the barge were thrée dozen ſcutchions in mettall of arms of the king and the quéene, which were beaten vpon ſquare bucram diuided, ſo that the right ſide had the kings colours, and the left ſide the quéenes, which ſcutchions were faſtened on the clothes of gold and ſiluer, hanging on the decks on the left hand.

A foiſt with a mount and other deuiſes.

On the left hand of the maior was another foiſt, in the which was a mount, and on the ſame ſtood a white falcon crowned, vpon a roote of gold inuironed with white roſes and red, which was the quéens deuiſe; about which mount ſat virgins ſinging and plaieng ſwéetlie. Next after the maior folowed his fellowſhip the habardaſhers; next after them the mercers, then the grocers, and ſo euerie companie in his order, and laſt of all the maior and ſhiriffes officers, euerie companie hauing melodie in his barge by himſelfe, and goodlie garniſhed with banners, and ſome garniſhed with ſilke, and ſome with arras and rich carpets, which was a goodlie ſight to behold: and in this order they rowed to Gréenwich, to the point next beyond Gréenwich, and there they turned backeward in another order, that is to wit, the maior and ſhiriffs officers firſt, and the meaneſt craft next, and ſo aſcending to the vttermoſt crafts in order, and the maior laſt, as they go to Paules at Chriſtmas, and in that order they rowed downeward to Gréenwich towne, and there caſt anchor, making great melodie.

Quéen Anne taketh barge with hir traine attending vpon hir.

At thrée of the clocke the quéene appéered in rich cloth of gold, entring into hir barge accompanied with diuerſe ladies and gentlewomen: and incontinent the citizens ſet forwards in their order, their minſtrelles continuallie plaieng, and the bachelors barge going on the quéens right hand, which ſhe tooke great pleaſure to behold. About the quéenes barge were manie noble men, as the duke of Suffolke, the marques Dorſet, the erle of Wilſhire hir father, the erles of Arundell, Darbie, Rutland, Worceſter, Huntington, Suſſex, Oxford, and manie biſhops and noble men, euerie one in his barge, which was a goodlie ſight to behold. She thus being accompanied rowed toward the tower: and in the meane waie the ſhips which were commanded to lie on the ſhore for letting of the barges, ſhot diuerſe peales of guns, and yer ſhe was landed, there was a maruellous ſhot out of the tower as euer was heard there. And at hir landing there met with hir the lord chamberlaine with the officers of armes, and brought hir to the king, which receiued hir with louing countenance at the poſterne by the water ſide, and then ſhe turned backe againe, and thanked the maior and the citizens with manie goodlie words, and ſo entred into the tower. After which entrie the citizens all this while houered before the tower, making great melodie, and went not on land, for none were aſſigned to land but the maior, the recorder, and two aldermen. But for to ſpeake of the people that ſtood on either ſhore to behold the ſight, he that ſaw it not would ſcarſe beleeue it.

Knights of the bath ſerued at dinner.

On Fridaie at dinner ſerued the king all ſuch as were appointed by his highneſſe to be knights of the bath, which after dinner were brought to their chambers, and that night were bathed and ſhriuen, according to the old vſage of England, and the next daie in the morning the king dubbed them according to the ceremonies thereto belonging, whoſe names inſue; the marques Dorſet, the erle of Darbie, the lord Clifford, the lord Fitzwater, the lord Haſtings, the lord Mounteagle, ſir John Mordant, the lord Vaux, ſir Henrie Parker, ſir William Winſore, ſir Francis Weſton, ſir Thomas Arundell, ſir John Hulſton, ſir Thomas Poinings, ſir Henrie Sauell, ſir George Fitzwilliam, ſir John Tindall, ſir Thomas Jermeie.

The receiuing and conueieng of the quéen through London.

To the intent that the horſſes ſhould not ſlide on the pauement, nor that the people ſhould not be hurt by horſſes, the high ſtréets where the quéene ſhould paſſe were all grauelled from the tower to temple barre, and railed on the one ſide, within which railes ſtood the crafts along in their order from Grace church, where the merchants of the Stilliard ſtood till the little conduit in Cheape, where the aldermen ſtood: and on the other ſide of the ſtréet ſtood the conſtables of the citie, apparelled in veluet and ſilke, with great ſtaues in their hands, to cauſe the people to kéepe roome and good order. And when the ſtréets were ſomwhat ordered, the maior clothed in a gowne of crimſin veluet, and a rich collar of S S S, with two footmen clad in white and red damaſke, rode to the tower to giue his attendance on the quéene, on whome the ſhiriffs with their officers did wait till they came to tower hill, where they taking their leaue, rode downe the high ſtréets, commanding the conſtables to ſée roome and good order kept, and ſo went and ſtood by the aldermen in Cheape.

The maior in a gowne of crimſin veluet.

Now before the quéen and hir traine ſhould come, Cornehill and Gracious ſtréet were hanged with fine ſcarlet, crimſin, and other grained cloths, and in ſome place with rich arras, tapiſtrie, and carpets; and the moſt part of the Cheape was hanged with cloth of tiſſue, gold, veluet, and manie rich hangings, which made a goodlie ſhew, and all the windowes were repleniſhed with ladies and gentlewomen, to behold the quéene and hir traine as they ſhould paſſe by. The firſt of the quéenes companie that ſet forward were twelue Frenchmen, which were belonging to the French ambaſſador, clothed in coates of blew veluet, with ſléeues of yellow and blew veluet, and their horſſes trapped with cloſe trappers of blew ſarſenet powdered with white croſſes: after them marched gentlemen, eſquires and knights two and two: after them the iudges, and after them the knights of the bath in violet gownes, with hoods purfled with miniuer like doctors; after them abbats, then barons; after them biſhops, then earls and marqueſſes; then the lord chancellor of England; after him the archbiſhop of Yorke, and the ambaſſador of Venice, after him the archbiſhop of Canturburie and the ambaſſador of France, after rode two eſquiers of honor with robes of eſtat rolled and worne bauldrike-wiſe about their necks, with caps of eſtate, repreſenting the dukes of Normandie & Aquitaine: after them rode the maior of London with his mace and garter in his cote of armes, which maior bare his mace to Weſtminſter hall.

After all theſe rode the lord William Howard with the marſhalles rod, deputie to his brother the duke of Norffolke marſhall of England, which was ambaſſador then in France: and on his right hand rode Charles duke of Suffolke, for that daie high conſtable of England, bearing the verder of ſiluer apperteining to the office of conſtableſhip, and all the lords for the moſt part were clothed in crimſin veluet, and all the quéenes ſeruants or officers of armes in ſcarlet. Next before the quéene rode hir chancellor bareheaded, the ſargeants and officers of armes rode on both the ſides of the lords. Then came the quéene in a litter of white cloth of gold, not couered, nor bailed, which was lead by two palfries clad in white damaſke downe to the ground, head and all, led by hir footmen. She had on a circot of white cloth of tiſſue, and a mantell of the ſame furred with ermine, hir haire hanged downe, but on hir head ſhée had a coiffe with a circlet about it full of rich ſtones. Ouer hir was borne a canopie of cloth of gold, with foure guilt ſtaues and foure ſiluer belles. For the bearing of which canopie were appointed ſixtéene knights, foure to beare it one ſpace on foot, and other foure another ſpace, according to their owne appointment.

Next after the quéene rode the lord Borough hir chamberleine, next after him William Coffin maiſter of the horſſes, leading a ſpare horſſe with a ſide ſaddle trapped downe with cloth of tiſſue. After him rode ſeauen ladies in crimſin veluet turned vp with cloth of gold and of tiſſue, and their horſſes trapped with cloth of gold, after them two chariots couered with red cloth of gold. In the firſt chariot were two ladies, which were the old dutcheſſe of Norffolke, and the old marchioneſſe Dorſet. In the ſecond chariot were foure ladies all in crimſin veluet. Then rode ſeauen ladies in the ſame ſute, their horſſes trappers and all. Then came the third chariot all white, with ſix ladies in crimſin veluet; next after them came the fourth chariot all red with eight ladies alſo in crimſin veluet: after whom followed thirtie gentlewomen all in veluet and ſilke in the liuerie of their ladies, on whom they gaue their attendance. After them followed the gard in cotes of goldſmiths worke.

Sundrie pageants with the deſcriptions of their deuiſes.

Thus they rode forth till they came to Fanchurch, where was made a pageant all with children, apparelled like merchants, which welcommed hir to the citie, with two proper propoſitions both in French and Engliſh. And from thence ſhe rode to Gratious church corner, where was a coſtlie and a maruelous cunning pageant made by the merchants of the Stilliard, for there was the mount Parnaſſus with the founteine of Helicon, which was of white marble, and foure ſtreames without pipe did riſe an ell high, and met togither in a little cup aboue the founteine, which founteine ran abundantlie racked Rheniſh wine till night. On the mounteine ſat Apollo, and at his féet ſat Calliope, and on euerie ſide of the mounteine ſat foure muſes plaieng on ſeuerall ſwéet inſtruments, and at their féet epigrams and poeſes were written in golden letters, in the which euerie muſe according to hir propertie praiſed the quéene.

The quéene from thence paſſed to Leaden hall, where was a goodlie pageant with a type and a heauenlie roofe, and vnder the type was a roote of gold ſet on a little mounteine inuironed with red roſes and white: out of the type came downe a falcon all white & ſat vpon the roote, and incontinent came downe an angell with great melodie, and ſet a cloſe crowne of gold on the falcons head. And in the ſame pageant ſat ſaint Anne with all hir iſſue beneath hir, and vnder Marie Cleoph ſat hir foure children, of the which children one made a goodlie oration to the queene of the fruitfulnes of ſaint Anne and of hir generation, truſting that like fruit ſhould come of hir. Then ſhe paſſed to the conduit in Cornhill, where were thrée graces ſet in a throne, afore whom was the ſpring of grace continuallie running wine. Afore the founteine ſat a poet declaring the properties of euerie grace: and that doone euerie ladie by hir ſelfe, according to hir propertie, gaue to the quéene a ſeuerall gift of grace.

An oration made to the quéene by one of the children in the pageant.

That doone, ſhe paſſed by the great conduit in chéepe, which was newlie painted with armes of deuiſes: out of the which conduit by a goodlie founteine ſet at the one end ran continuallie wine both white and claret all that afternoone, and ſo ſhe rode to the Standard which was richlie painted with images of kings and quéenes, and hanged with banners of armes, and in the top was maruellous ſwéet harmonie both of ſong and inſtrument. Then ſhe went forward to the croſſe, which was newlie guilt, till ſhe came where the aldermen ſtood, and then maſter Baker the recorder came to hir with low reuerence, making a proper and briefe propoſition, and gaue to hir in the name of the citie a thouſand marks in a purſe of gold, which ſhe thankefullie accepted with manie goodlie words, and ſo rode to the little conduit, where was a rich pageant full of melodie and ſong.

The conduit in Cheape runneth wine white and claret.

The recorder preſenteth a 1000 marks in gold to the quéene for a gratuitie in yͤ cities behalfe.

In this pageant was Pallas, Iuno and Venus, and before them ſtood Mercurie, which in the name of the thrée goddeſſes gaue to hir a ball of gold diuided in thrée, ſignifieng thrée gifts which the thrée goddeſſes gaue to hir, that is to ſaie, wiſedome, riches, and felicitie. As ſhe entered into Paules gate there was a pretie pageant, in which ſat thrée ladies richlie clothed, and in a circle on their head was written Regina Anna proſperè procede & regna. The ladie in the middes had a tablet, in the which was written Veni amica coronaberis, and vnder the tablet ſat an angell with a cloſe crowne, and the ladie ſitting on the right hand had a tablet of ſiluer in which was written, Domine dirige greſſus meos, & the third ladie had a tablet of gold with letters azure written, Confido in Domino, & vnder their féet was written in legible letters:

Regina Anna nouum regis de ſanguine natum
Cum paries, populis aurea ſecla tuis.

And theſe ladies caſt downe wafers, on the which the two verſes were written. From thence ſhe paſſed to the eaſt end of Paules churchyard againſt the ſchoole, where ſtood on a ſcaffold two hundred children well apparelled, which ſaid to hir diuerſe goodlie verſes of poets tranſlated into Engliſh, to the honour of the king and hir, which ſhe highlie commended. And when ſhe came to Ludgate, the gate was newlie garniſhed with gold & biſe. And on the leads of ſaint Martins church ſtood a goodlie queere of ſinging men and children, which ſoong new balads made in praiſe of hir. After that ſhe was paſſed Ludgate, ſhe procéeded toward Fléetſtréet, where the conduit was newlie painted, and all the armes and angels refreſhed, & the chime melodiouſlie ſounding. Vpon the conduit was made a towre with foure turrets, and in euerie turret ſtood one of the cardinall vertues with their tokens and properties, which had ſeuerall ſpéeches, promiſing the quéene neuer to leaue hir, but to be aiding and comforting hir: and in the middeſt of the towre cloſelie was ſuch ſeuerall ſolemne inſtruments, that it ſéemed to be an heauenlie noiſe, and was much regarded and praiſed: and beſide this the ſaid conduit ran wine claret and red all the afternoone.

Goodlie melodie.

So ſhe with all hir companie and the maior rode forth to Temple barre, which was newlie painted and repared, where ſtood alſo diuerſe ſinging men and children, till ſhe came to Weſtminſter hall, which was richlie hanged with cloth of arras, and new glaſed. And in the middeſt of the hall ſhe was taken out of hir litter, & ſo led vp to the higher deſke vnder the cloth of eſtate, on whoſe left hand was a cupbord of ten ſtages maruellous rich and beautifull to behold: and within a little ſeaſon was brought to the quéene with a ſolemne ſeruice in great ſtanding ſpice plates, a void of ſpice and ſubtilties with ipocras and other wines, which ſhe ſent downe to hir ladies, and when the ladies had dranke, ſhe gaue hartie thanks to the lords and ladies, with the maior and other that had giuen their attendance on hir, and ſo withdrew hir ſelfe with a few ladies to the Whitehall and ſo to hir chamber, and there ſhifted hir, and after went into hir barge ſecretlie to the king to his manour of Weſtminſter, where ſhe reſted that night.

The quéene commeth to Weſtminſter hall and the maner of hir receiuing.

On ſundaie the maior clad in crimſin veluet and with his collar, and all the aldermen and ſhiriffes in ſcarlet, and the counſell of the citie tooke their barge at the crane by ſeauen of the clocke and came to Weſtminſter, where they were welcomed & brought into the hall by maſter treaſuror and others of the kings houſe, and ſo gaue their attendance till the quéene ſhould come forth. Betwéene eight and nine ſhe came into the hall, and ſtood vnder the cloth of eſtate, and then came in the kings chappell, and the moonks of Weſtminſter all in rich copes, and manie biſhops and abbats in copes and miters which went into the middeſt of the hall, and there ſtood a ſeaſon. Then was there a raie cloth ſpred from the quéenes ſtanding in the hall through the palace and ſanctuarie, which was railed on both ſides to the high altar of Weſtminſter. After that the raie cloth was caſt, the officers of armes appointed the order accuſtomed.

The comelie order & ſtate kept on the coronation daie of euerie attendant in his degrée.

Firſt went gentlemen, then eſquiers, then knights, then the aldermen of the citie in their cloks of ſcarlet, after them the iudges in their mantels of ſcarlet and coiffes. Then followed the knights of the bath being no lords, euerie man hauing a white lace on his left ſléeue, then followed barons and vicounts in their parlement robes of ſcarlet. After them came earls, marqueſſes and dukes in their robes of eſtate of crimſin veluet furred with ermine poudered according to their degrées. After them came the lord chancellor in a robe of ſcarlet open before, bordered with lettiſe: after him came the kings chapell and the monks ſolemnelie ſinging with proceſſion, then came abbats and biſhops mitered, then ſargeants and officers of armes, then after them went the maior of London with his mace and garter in his cote of armes, then went the marqueſſe Dorſet in a robe of eſtate which bare the ſcepter of gold, and the earle of Arundell which bare the rod of iuorie with the doue both togither.

Then went alone the earle of Oxford high chamberleine of England which bare the crowne, after him went the duke of Suffolke in his robe of eſtate alſo for that daie being high ſteward of England, hauing a long white rod in his hand, and the lord William Howard with the rod of the marſhalſhip, and euerie knight of the garter had on his collar of the order. Then procéeded forth the quéene in a circot and robe of purple veluet furred with ermine in hir here coiffe and circlet as ſhe had the ſaturdaie, and ouer hir was borne the canopie by foure of the fiue ports, all crimſin with points of blue and red hanging on their ſléeues, and the biſhops of London and Wincheſter bare vp the laps of the quéenes robe. The quéenes traine which was verie long was borne by the old duches of Norffolke: after hir folowed ladies being lords wiues, which had circots of ſcarlet with narow ſléeues, the breſt all lettiſe with bars of borders according to their degrées, and ouer that they had mantels of ſcarlet furred, and euerie mantell had lettiſe about the necke like a neckercher likewiſe poudered, ſo that by the pouderings their degrée was knowen. Then followed ladies being knights wiues in gownes of ſcarlet, with narow ſléeues without traines, onlie edged with lettiſe, and likewiſe had all the quéenes gentlewomen.

The maner of the coronatiõ as it was then vſed.

When ſhe was thus brought to the high place made in the middeſt of the church, betwéene the quéere and the high altar, ſhe was ſet in a rich chaire. And after that ſhe had reſted a while, ſhe deſcended downe to the high altar and there proſtrate hir ſelfe while the archbiſhop of Canturburie ſaid certeine collects: then ſhe roſe, and the biſhop annointed hir on the head and on the breſt, and then ſhe was led vp againe, where after diuerſe oriſons ſaid, the archbiſhop ſet the crowne of ſaint Edward on hir head, and then deliuered hir the ſcepter of gold in hir right hand, and the rod of iuorie with the doue in the left hand, and then all the quéere ſoong Te Deum, &c. Which doone, the biſhop tooke off the crowne of ſaint Edward being heauie and ſet on the crowne made for hir. Then went ſhe to ſaint Edwards ſhrine and there offered, after which offering doone ſhe withdrew hir into a little place made for the nones on the one ſide of the quéere.

Now in the meane ſeaſon euerie duches had put on their bonets a coronall of gold wrought with flowers, and euerie marqueſſe put on a demie coronall of gold, euerie counteſſe a plaine circlet of gold without flowers, and euerie king of armes put on a crowne of coper and guilt, all which were worne till night. When the quéene had a little repoſed hir, the companie returned in the ſame order that they ſet forth, and the quéene went crowned and ſo did the ladies aforeſaid. Hir right hand was ſuſteined by the earle of Wilſhire hir father, and hir left hand by the lord Talbot deputie for the earle of Shreweſburie and lord Forinſall his father. Now when ſhe was out of the ſanctuarie and appéered within the palace, the trumpets plaied maruellous freſhlie, then ſhe was brought to Weſtminſter hall, & ſo to hir withdrawing chamber: during which time the lords, iudges, maior and aldermen put off their robes, mantels and clokes, and tooke their hoods from their necks and caſt them about their ſhoulders, and the lords ſat onlie in their circots, and the iudges and aldermen in their gownes. And all the lords that ſerued that daie ſerued in their circots and their hoods about their ſhoulders: alſo diuerſe officers of the kings houſe being no lords had circots and hoods of ſcarlet edged with mineuer, as the treaſuror, controllor, & maſter of the iewell houſe, but their circots were not guilt.

The order and ſitting at dinner.

While the quéene was in hir chamber, euerie lord and other, that ought to doo ſeruice at coronations, did prepare them according to their dutie, as the duke of Suffolke high ſteward of England which was richlie apparelled, his doublet and iacket ſet with orient pearle, his gowne of crimſin veluet imbrodered, his courſer trapped with a cloth trapper head and all to the ground of crimſin veluet, ſet full of letters of gold of goldſmiths worke, hauing a long white rod in his hand; on his left hand rode the lord William, deputie for his brother as earle marſhall with the marſhals rod, whoſe gowne was crimſin veluet, and his horſſe trapper purple veluet cut on white ſattin imbrodered with white lions. The earle of Oxenford was high chamberleine, the earle of Eſſex caruer, the earle of Suſſex ſewer, the earle of Arundell chéefe butler, on whom twelue citizens of London did giue their attendance at the cupbord. The earle of Darbie cupbearer, the vicount Liſle pantler, the lord of Aburgaine chéefe larder, the lord Braie almoner for him and his coparteners, and the maior of Oxford kept the buttrie bar, and Thomas Wiat was chéefe eurer for ſir Henrie Wiat his father.

The maner of ſitting at the table.

When all things were redie, the quéene vnder hir canopie came to the hall, and waſhed and ſat downe in the middeſt of the table vnder the cloth of eſtate. On the right ſide of the chaire ſtood the counteſſe of Oxford widow, and on the left ſide ſtood the counteſſe of Worceſter all the dinner ſeaſon, which diuerſe times in the dinner time did hold a fine cloth before the quéenes face when ſhe liſt to ſpet or doo otherwiſe at hir pleaſure. At the tables end ſat the archbiſhop of Canturburie on the right hand of the quéene, and in the middeſt betwéene the archbiſhop and the counteſſe of Oxford ſtood the earle of Oxford with a white ſtaffe all dinner time, and at the quéenes féet vnder the table ſat two gentlewomen all dinner time. When all theſe things were thus ordered, in came the duke of Suffolke and the lord William Howard on horſſebacke, and the ſargeants of armes before them, and after them the ſewer, and then the knights of the bath bringing in the firſt courſe which was eightéene diſhes, beſides ſubtilties and ſhips made of wax maruellous gorgious to behold, all which time of ſeruice the trumpets ſtanding in the window at the nether end of the hall plaied melodiouſlie.

The bringing in of the firſt courſe.

When hir grace was ſerued of two diſhes, then the archbiſhops ſeruice was ſet downe, whoſe ſewer came equall with the third diſh of the quéenes ſeruice on his left hand. After that the quéene and the archbiſhop was ſerued, the barons of the ports began the table on the right hand next the wall, next them at the table ſat the maſters and clearks of the Chancerie, and beneath them at the table other doctors and gentlemen. the left hand by the cupbord, was begun by the maior and aldermen, the chamberleine and the councell of the citie of London, and beneath them ſat ſubſtantiall merchants, and ſo downeward other worſhipfull perſons. At the table on the right hand in the middeſt of the hall ſat the lord chancellor, and other temporall lords on the right ſide of the table in their circots: and on the left ſide of the ſame table ſat biſhops and abbats in their parlement robes: beneath them ſat the iudges, ſargeants, & the kings councell, beneath them the knights of the bath. At the table on the left hand, in the middle part, ſat dutcheſſes, marqueſſes, counteſſes, baroneſſes, in their robes, and other ladies in circots, and gentlewomen in gownes. All which ladies and gentlewomen ſat on the left ſide of the table along, and none on the right ſide.

The maior of Londons ſeruice.

The duke of Suffolke and Norffolke rode about the hall.

When all were thus ſet, they were incontinent ſerued, and ſo quicklie that it was maruell: for the ſeruitors gaue ſuch good attendance, that meat or drinke nor anie thing elſe néeded not to be called for, which in ſo great a multitude was maruell. As touching the fare, there could be deuiſed no more coſtlier diſhes nor ſubtilties. The maior of London was ſerued with thrée and thirtie diſhes at two courſes, and ſo were all his brethren, and ſuch as ſat at his table. The quéene had at hir ſecond courſe foure and twentie diſhes, and thirtie at the third courſe: & betwéene the two laſt courſes, the kings of armes cried larges, in thrée parts of the hall: and after ſtood in their place, which was in the bekins at the kings bench. And on the right hand out of the cloiſter of S. Stephans, was made a little cloſet, in which the king with diuerſe ambaſſadors ſtood to behold the ſeruice. The duke of Suffolke and the lord William rode often times about the hall, chering the lords, ladies, and the maior and his brethren. After they all had dined, they had wafers and ipocras, and then they waſhed, and were commanded to riſe, and to ſtand ſtill in their places, before the table or on the formes till the quéene had waſhed.

Running at tilt.

When ſhe had taken wafers and ipocras, the table was taken vp, and the earle of Rutland brought vp the ſurnap, and laid it at the bords end, which immediatlie was drawne, and caſt by maſter Rode, marſhall of the hall: and the quéene waſhed, and after the archbiſhop, and when the ſurnap was drawne off, ſhe aroſe and ſtood in the middeſt of the palace hall: to whome the earle of Suſſex in a goodlie ſpice plate brought a void of ſpice and comfets. After him the maior of London brought a ſtanding cup of gold, ſet in a cup of aſſaie of gold, and after that ſhe had dronke, ſhe gaue the maior the cup, with the cup of aſſaie, bicauſe there was no leiar, according to the claime of the citie, thanking him and all his brethren, for their paine. Then ſhe vnder hir canopie departed to hir chamber, and at the entrie of hir chamber, ſhe gaue the canopie with bels and all, to the barons of the ports, according to their claime, with great thanks. Then the maior of London bearing his cup in his hand, with his brethren, went through the hall to their barge, and ſo did all other noble men and gentlemen, for it was ſix of the clocke. On mondaie were the iuſts at the tilt, before the kings gate, where the maior and his brethren had a goodlie ſtanding: but there were verie few ſpeares broken, by reaſon the horſſes would not cope. On wedneſdaie, the king ſent for the maior and his brethren to Weſtminſter, and there he himſelfe gaue to them hartie thanks, with manie goodlie words. On Midſummer daie after, the ladie Marie the French quéene died in Suffolke, who was the late wife to Lewes the twelfe, & after married to Charles duke of Suffolke, & was buried at S. Edmundſburie. The K. kept his progreſſe about London, bicauſe of the quéene.] The ſeuenth of September being ſundaie, betwéene thrée & foure of the clocke in the afternoone, the quéene was deliuered of a faire yong ladie, on which daie the duke of Norffolke came home to the chriſtening, which was appointed on the wedneſdaie next following, and was accordinglie accompliſhed on the ſame daie, with all ſuch ſolemne ceremonies as were thought conuenient. The godfather at the font, was the lord archbiſhop of Canturburie, the godmothers, the old dutches of Norffolke, & the old marchioneſſe Dorſet widow; and at the confirmation the ladie marchioneſſe of Exceſter was godmother: the child was named Elizabeth.

Upon the daie of the chriſtening, the maior ſir Stephan Peacocke, in a gowne of crimſin veluet, with his collar of SS, and all the aldermen in ſcarlet, with collars and chaines, and all the councell of the citie with them, tooke their barge after dinner, at one of the clocke, and the citizens had another barge, and ſo rowed to Gréenwich, where were manie lords, knights, and gentlemen aſſembled. All the walles betwéene the kings palace & the friers were hanged with arras, and all the waie ſtrawed with gréene ruſhes: the friers church was alſo hanged with arras.

The honorable traine of courtiers in their degrées.

The font was of ſiluer, and ſtood in the middeſt of the church, thrée ſteps high, which was couered with a fine cloth, and diuerſe gentlemen with aperns and towels about their necks gaue attendance about it, that no filth ſhould come in the font, ouer it hong a ſquare canopie of crimſin ſattin, fringed with gold, about it was a raile couered with red ſaie: betwéene the quier and the bodie of the church was a cloſe place with a pan of fire, to make the child readie in. When all theſe things were ordered, the child was brought to the hall, and then euerie man ſet forward; firſt the citizens two and two, then gentlemen, eſquiers and chapleins, next after them the aldermen and the maior alone: next the maior the kings councell, the kings chappell in copes: then barons, biſhops, earles, then came the earle of Eſſex, bearing the couered baſins gilt, after him the marqueſſe of Exceſter with the taper of virgin wax, next him the marqueſſe Dorſet bearing the ſalt.

A canopie borne ouer the yong princeſſe.

Behind him the ladie Marie of Norffolke, bearing the créeſome which was verie rich of pearle and ſtone, the old dutches of Norffolke bare the child in a mantell of purple veluet, with a long traine furred with ermine. The duke of Norffolke with his marſhall rod went on the right hand of the ſaid dutches, and the duke of Suffolke on the left hand, and before them went the officers of armes. The counteſſe of Kent bare the long traine of the childs mantell, and betwéene the counteſſe of Kent and the child went the earle of Wilſhire on the right hand, and the earle of Darbie on the left hand, ſupporting the ſaid traine: in the middeſt ouer the ſaid child was borne a canopie, by the lord Rochford, the lord Huſée, the lord William Howard, and by the lord Thomas Howard the elder, after the child followed manie ladies and gentlewomen. When the child was come to the church doore, the biſhop of London met it with diuerſe biſhops and abbats mitred.

Rich gifts giuen to the princeſſe.

When the ceremonies and chriſtening were ended, Garter chéefe king of armes cried alowd, God of his infinite goodneſſe ſend proſperous life & long to the high and mightie princeſſe of England Elizabeth: & then the trumpets blew. Then the archbiſhop of Canturburie gaue to the princeſſe a ſtanding cup of gold: the dutches of Norffolke gaue to hir a ſtanding cup of gold, fretted with pearle: the marchioneſſe of Dorſet gaue thrée gilt bolles, pounced with a couer: and the marchioneſſe of Exceſter gaue thrée ſtanding bolles grauen, all gilt with a couer.

Then was brought in wafers, comfets, & ipocraſſe in ſuch plentie, that euerie man had as much as he would deſire. Then they ſet forwards, the trumpets going before in the ſame order towards the kings palace, as they did when they came thitherwards, ſauing that the gifts that the godfather and the godmothers gâue, were borne before the child by foure perſons, that is to ſaie. Firſt ſir Iohn Dudleie bare the gift of the ladie of Exceſter, the lord Thomas Howard the yonger bare the gift of the ladie of Dorſet, the lord Fitzwater bare the gift of the ladie of Norffolke, and the earle of Worceſter bare the gift of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, & all the one ſide as they went was full of ſtaffe torches to the number of fiue hundred, borne by the gard and other of the kings ſeruants, and about the child were borne manie other proper torches by gentlemen.

Who bare the gifts preſented to the princeſſe.

In this order they brought the princeſſe to the Q. chamber, & tarried there a while with the maior & his brethren the aldermen, and at the laſt the dukes of Norffolke & Suffolke came out frõ the K. thanking them hartilie, who commanded them to giue thanks in his name: which being doone with other courteſies they departed, & ſo went to their barges. From that time forward (God himſelfe vndertaking the tuition of this yoong princeſſe, hauing predeſtinated hir to the accompliſhment of his diuine purpoſe) ſhe proſpered vnder the Lords hand, as a choſen plant of his watering, & after the reuolution of certeine yeares with great felicitie and ioy of all Engliſh hearts atteined to the crowne of this realme, and now reigneth ouer the ſame: whoſe heart the Lord direct in his waies, and long preſerue hir in life, to his godlie will and pleaſure, and the comfort of all true and faithfull ſubiects. Pauier a contemner of the goſpell, & his ſhamefull end.

¶This yéere alſo, one Pauier the towne clerke of the citie of London hanged himſelfe, which ſuerly was a man that in no wiſe could abide to heare the goſpell ſhould be in Engliſh. And I my ſelfe heard him once ſaie to me and other that were by, ſwearing a great oth, that if he thought the kings highneſſe would ſet forth the ſcripture in Engliſh, and let it be read of the people by his authoritie, rather than he would ſo long liue, he would cut his owne throat, but he brake promiſe, for (as you haue heard) he hanged himſelfe: but of what mind and intent he ſo did, maie be ſoone gathered. For God had (no doubt) appointed him to that iudgement, no leſſe heauie than his offenſe was heinous; namelie the contempt of Gods word, the knowledge whereof Dauid deſired, preferring it before gold and ſiluer, yea before pearles & pretious ſtones in richneſſe; and before honie and the honiecombe in ſwéetnes, as the paraphraſe noteth, ſaieng:

¶About this time the pope, by lingering ſickenes, (whoſe gréefe in the firſt apprehenſion was the pains of the ſtomach, which drawing with them to paſſions of a feuer and other accidents, kept him long time vexed and tormented) ſometimes ſéeming to be reduced to the point of death, and ſometimes ſo eaſed and reléeued, that he gaue to others but not to himſelfe a kind of hope of recouering, being no longer able to make reſiſtance againſt his maladie, exchanged his life the fiue and twentith of September, leauing behind him in the caſtell of ſaint Angeo manie rich ſtones and iewels, more than was expected of him, and in the chamber of the ſée apoſtolike infinit offices, contrarie to cuſtome and good order, but in the treaſurie a verie ſmall ſtore of monie, wherin he beguiled the opinion of all men. He was raiſed from baſe degrée to the place of the popedome with wonderfull felicitie, but in managing the place he proued a verie great variation of fortune, wherein if both the properties of fortune be euenlie balanced the one with the other, the worſer fortune without all compariſon was farre more familiar with him than the better.

Death of pope Clement the ſeuenth.

For as there could happen to him no greater infelicitie than the aduerſitie of his impriſonment (for that with his owne eies he beheld with ſo great a ruine and deſtruction the ſacke of Rome; a deſolation which his fortune ſuffered him to bewaile with pitie and compaſſion, but not to turne awaie or remedie the harme) ſo alſo by him mooued the generall deſolation of his naturall countrie, to the which by how much more he was bound by perpetuall obligations, by ſo much greater was his aduerſitie to be a chiefe inſtrument in the ruine of the place where he had taken his firſt being.

Pope Clement more infortunate than fortunate.

He died hated of all the court, ſuſpected to moſt princes, and for the diſcourſe of his life, he left behind him a renowme rather hatefull than acceptable: for he was accounted couetous, of little fidelitie, and naturallie farre off from dooing pleaſures to men. And in that humor albeit during his time of pope he created one and thirtie cardinals; yet vpon none of them did he impoſe that dignitie to content himſelfe but was drawne as it were by the violent law of neceſſitie and to pleaſe others: yea he called to that dignitie the cardinall of Medicis, not of his proper and frée election, but at the contemplation and perſuaſion of others, and at that time when being oppreſſed with a dangerous maladie, if he had died, he had left his friends and kindred in the ſtate of beggers and depriued of all aid. Neuertheleſſe he was in counſell verie graue, and in his actions much foreſéeing; touching paſſions and affections a conqueror of himſelfe, and for the facultie of his mind & ſpirit of great capacitie and power, if timorouſneſſe had not oftentimes corrupted his iudgement.

How manie cardinals he created during his popedome.

Immediatlie after his death the cardinals going the ſame night into the conclaue, elected in his place with full voice, Alexander of the familie of Farneſa, a Roman by nation, and for his time the moſt ancient cardinall of the court: in which election their voices ſéemed conformable to the iudgement and inſtance that Clement had made, the perſon elected being moſt worthie to be preferred before all the other to ſo ſouereigne a degrée: for that he was both furniſhed with doctrine and good learning, and fullie repleniſhed with good apparances and cuſtomes. And for the cardinals, they were ſo much the more forward to paſſe the election in his perſon, by how much for the greatneſſe of his age, being alreadie vpon the thréeſcore and ſeuenth yeare, and ſuppoſed to beare a weake and vnſound complexion (which opinion he nouriſhed with art) they hoped he would not ſit long in the ſeat; whereby the dignitie of the place and primaſie might fall to one of them, whoſe eies looked for the glorie which their hearts luſted, being vtterlie eſtranged from God and godlineſſe, as altogither addicted to the wanton deſires of temporall delites, that they might paſſe their daies in delicacie; as one noteth trulie of all that viperous generation, ſaieng:

Elizabeth Barton.

About this ſeaſon, the craftie practiſes of one Elizabeth Barton, named the holie maid of Kent, came to light and were diſcouered: ſo that ſhe and hir adherents in Nouember folowing were brought to the Starchamber, ⁊ there before the kings councell confeſſed their feined hypocriſie and diſſembled holineſſe, traitorous purpoſes and intents. The names of thoſe hir adherents, which were preſented with hir before the lords in the Starchamber were as followeth: Richard Maſter prieſt, parſon of Aldington in Kent: Edward Bocking doctor in diuinitie, a monke of Canturburie: Richard Dering, monke alſo of Canturburie: Edward Twaites gentleman: Thomas Laurence regiſter to the archdeacon of Canturburie: Henrie Gold parſon of Aldermarie, bachellor of diuinitie: Hugh Rich frier obſeruant: Richard Riſbie: and Thomas Gold gentleman. They were adiudged vpon their confeſſion aforeſaid, to ſtand at Pauls croſſe in the ſermon time, where they with their owne hands ſhould ſeuerallie deliuer ech of them to the preacher that ſhould be appointed, a bill, declaring their ſubtill, craftie, and ſuperſtitious doings. Which thing they did the ſundaie next following, ſtanding vpon a ſtage at the croſſe erected for that purpoſe. But for their treaſons commited, the order was reſpited till the parlement next following; in the which they were attainted, and ſuffered (as after ye ſhall heare.)

Penance at Pauls croſſe.

The Scots mooue warre.

In this meane time, the Scots were not quiet, but ſtill robbed the kings ſubiects both by ſea and land: whereupon the king cauſed them to be requited, not onelie by the borderers and other to them aſſociate, which entring by the marches, burnt manie of their ſtrong piles, but alſo he ſet foorth certeine ſhips which entered into their ſtreames, and fetched out manie of thoſe priſes, which they had taken out of their hauens and créekes, mawger all their heads. Yet was there no warre proclaimed, but ſtill commiſſioners ſat and communed of agréement, and amends to be made on either part. Now in the end when the Scots had much demanded, and little or nothing granted, they for that time being wearie of warre, deſired peace, which was concluded to indure both the kings liues. And ſo the twentith daie of Maie in the yeare following, it was openlie proclamed, to the comfort of all them that delited in peace and godlie quietneſſe.

A curſſe procured from the pope.

At the ſuit of the ladie Katharine Dowager, a curſſe was ſent from the pope, which curſſed both the king and the realme. This curſſe was ſet vp in the towne of Dunkirke in Flanders (for the bringer thereof durſt no nearer approch) where it was taken downe by one William Locke a mercer of London. Bicauſe it was knowne that the ladie Katharine Dowager had procured this curſſe of the pope, all the order of the court was broken: for the duke of Suffolke being ſent to hir as then lieng at Bugden beſide Huntingdon, according to that he had in commandement, diſcharged a great ſort of hir houſhold ſeruants, and yet left a conuenient number to ſerue hir like a princeſſe, which were ſworne to ſerue hir not as quéene, but as princeſſe Dowager. Such as tooke that oth ſhe vtterlie refuſed, and would none of their ſeruice, ſo that ſhe remained with the leſſe number of ſeruants about hir.

Elizabeth Barton attainted.

After Chriſtmas the parlement began, wherein the forenamed Elizabeth Barton and other hir complices were attainted of treaſon, for ſundrie practiſed deuiſes and tales by them aduanced, put in vre, and told, ſounding to the vtter reproch, perill, and deſtruction of the kings perſon, his honour, fame and dignitie: for they had of a diueliſh intent put in the heads of manie of the kings ſubiects, that to the ſaid Elizabeth Barton was giuen knowledge by reuelation from God and his ſaints, that if the king procéeded to the diuorſe, and maried another, he ſhould not be king of this realme one moneth after, and in the reputation of God not one daie nor houre.

This Elizabeth firſt through ſickeneſſe, being oftentimes brought as it were into a tranſe, whereby hir viſage and countenance became maruellouſlie altered at thoſe times when ſhée was ſo vexed, at length, by the incouraging, procurement, and information of the forenamed Richard Maſter perſon of Aldington, ſhe learned to counterfeit ſuch maner of tranſes (after ſhe came to perfect health) as in hir ſickenes by force of the diſeaſe ſhe had bene acquainted with: ſo that ſhe practiſed, vſed, and ſhewed vnto the people diuerſe maruellous and ſundrie alterations of the ſenſible parts of hir bodie, craftilie vttering in hir ſaid feigned and falſe tranſes, diuerſe and manie counterfeit, vertuous, and holie words, tending to the rebuke of ſin, and reprouing of ſuch new opinions as then began to riſe.

And to bring the people the more in beliefe with hir hypocriticall doings, ſhe was counſelled to ſaie in thoſe hir tranſes, that ſhe ſhould neuer be perfectlie whole, till ſhe had viſited an image of our ladie, at a place called Court at Stréet, within the pariſh of Aldington aforeſaid. Thither was ſhe brought, and by the meanes of the ſaid Richard Maſter, and Edward Bocking, that was now made of counſell in the matter, there aſſembled about two thouſand perſons at the daie appointed of hir thither comming, to ſée the miracle. At which daie, being brought before all that aſſemblie and multitude of people, ſhée falſelie feigned and ſhewed vnto the people in the chappell of our ladie there in Court at Stréet, manie alterations of hir face, and other outward ſenſible parts of hir bodie, and in thoſe tranſes ſhe vttered woonderous words, as ſhe was before ſubtilie and craftilie induced, and taught by the ſaid Edward Bocking and Richard Maſter.

A forged miracle.

And amongſt other things ſhe vttered, that it was the pleaſure of God, that the ſaid Bocking ſhould be hir ghoſtlie father, and that ſhe ſhould be a religious woman. And within a while, after ſuch feigned and counterfeit tranſes, ſhe appeared to the people to be ſuddenlie relieued from hir ſickeneſſe and afflictions, by the interceſſion and meane of the image of our ladie, being in the ſame chappell. By reaſon of which hypocriticall diſſimulation, the ſaid Elizabeth was brought into a maruellous fame, credit, and good opinion of a great multitude of the people of this realme. And to increaſe the fame, by counſell of the ſaid Edward Bocking, ſhe became a nun in the priorie of ſaint Sepulchres at Canturburie, to whome the ſaid Edward Bocking had commonlie his reſort, not without ſuſpicion of incontinencie, pretending to be hir ghoſtlie father by Gods appointment. And by conſpiracie betwene hir & him, ſhe ſtill continued in practiſing hir diſſembled tranſes, alledging, that in the ſame ſhe had reuelations from almightie God and his ſaints, and amongſt other, that which (as before we haue mentioned) touched the kings mariage, as ye haue heard.

The archbiſhop of Canturburie and the biſhop of Rocheſter gaue credit to hir hypocriticall practiſes.

This matter procéeded ſo farre, that there was a booke written by hir complices, and namelie by Thomas Laurence, regiſter to the archbiſhop of Canturburie, of hir feigned and counterfeit miracles, reuelations, and hypocriticall holineſſe. All things were handled ſo craftilie, that not onelie the ſimple, but alſo the wiſe and learned ſort were deceiued by the ſame, inſomuch that William Warham the late archbiſhop of Canturburie, and John Fiſher biſhop of Rocheſter, and diuerſe others, being informed thereof, gaue credit thereto. All which matters and manie other had bene traitorouſlie practiſed and imagined amongeſt the parties manie yeres, chieflie to interrupt the diuorſe and to deſtroie the king, and to depriue him from the crowne and dignitie roiall of this realme, as in the act of their attaindor made more at large it maie appeare, and likewiſe in the chronicles of maiſter Edward Hall. Therefore to conclude with hir and hir adherents, on the one and twentith of Aprill next following, ſhe with diuerſe of them before condemned, was drawen to Tiburne, and there executed, as iuſtlie they had deſerued; where and when ſhe made this confeſſion following, euen at the preſent time that ſhe ſuffered, in the hearing of the people.

Elizabeth Barton executed.

The words of Elizabeth Barton, other*wiſe called the holie maid of Kent at the* houre of hir death in maner of a confeſſion.

Hither am I come to die, and I haue not béene the onelie cauſe of mine owne death, which moſt iuſtlie I haue deſerued, but alſo I am the cauſe of the death of all theſe perſons which at this time here ſuffer: and yet to ſay the truth, I am not ſo much to be blamed, conſidering that it was wel known vnto theſe learned men, that I was a poore wench, without learning, and therefore they might haue eaſilie perceiued, that the things that were doone by me, could not procéed in any ſuch ſort, but their capacities and learning could right well iudge from whence they procéeded, and that they were altogither feined: but bicauſe the things which I feined were profitable vnto them, therefore they much praiſed mée, and bare me in hand that it was the holie ghoſt, and not I that did them, and then I being puft vp with their praiſes, fell into a certeine pride and fooliſh fantaſie with my ſelfe, and thought I might feine what I would, which thing hath brought me to this caſe, and for the which now I crie God and the kings highnes moſt hartilie mercie, and deſire all you good people to praie to God to haue mercie on me, and on all them that ſuffer here with me.

The act of eſtabliſhing the crowne.

In this parlement alſo was made the act of ſucceſſion, for the eſtabliſhing of the crowne, to the which euerie perſon being of lawfull age ſhould bée ſworne. On mondaie the thrée & twentith of March in the parlement time, were ſolemnlie receiued into London ambaſſadours from James the fift king of Scots, the biſhop of Aberdine, the abbat of Kinlos, and Adam Otterborne the kings attourneie, with diuerſe gentlemen on them attendant, which were brought to the tailors hall, and there lodged. And on the daie of the Annunciation, they were brought to the kings palace at Weſtminſter, where they ſhewed their commiſſion and meſſage, for the which the king appointed them daies to counſell. During the parlement time, euerie ſundaie at Paules croſſe preached a biſhop, declaring the pope not to be ſupreme head of the church.

Ambaſſadors forth of Scotland.

The popes ſupremacie denied in ſermons.

The lords ſworne to the ſucceſſion.

The thirtith of March was the parlement proroged, and there euerie lord, knight, and burges, and all other were ſworne to the act of ſucceſſion, and ſubſcribed their hands to a parchment fixed to the ſame. The parlement was proroged till the third of Nouember next. After this were commiſſioners ſent into all parts of the realme, to take the oth of all men and women to the act of ſucceſſion. Doctor John Fiſher, and ſir Thomas More knight, and doctor Nicholas Wilſon parſon of ſaint Thomas apoſtles in London, expreſlie denied at Lambeth before the archbiſhop of Canturburie, to receiue that oth. The two firſt ſtood in their opinion to the verie death (as after ye ſhall heare) but doctor Wilſon was better aduiſed at length, and ſo diſſembling the matter eſcaped out of further danger.

Ab. Fl. ex Edw. Hall 224.

Woolfes wiſe a notable harlot.

¶ In this yéere it chanced that two merchant ſtrangers fell in loue with a harlot, which was called Woolfes wife, and this harlot had often hanted the ſtrangers chambers. And ſo on a time the ſaid harlot appointed theſe ſtrangers to come to Weſtminſter, and ſhe had prepared for them a bote, in the which bote was but one man to row which was a ſtrong théefe, and in the end of the bote laie Woolfe hir huſband, couered with a leather that botemen vſe to couer their cuſhins with, and ſo theſe ſtrangers ſat them down miſtruſting nothing. Now when this boteman had brought them as farre as a place called the turning trée, ſuddenlie ſtepped vp the ſaid Woolfe, and with his dagger thruſt the one of them through: the other cried out to ſafe his life, and offred great ſums of monie to the boteman and him to ſaue his life. But no proffers would be heard, nor mercie would they extend, but as cruell murtherers without pitie ſlue the other alſo, and bound them face to face, and ſo threw them into the Thames in the foreſaid place, where they were long after before they were found. But immediatlie the harlot Woolfes wife went to the ſtrangers chambers, & tooke from thence ſo much as ſhe could come by. And at the laſt ſhe and hir huſband (as they deſerued) were apprehended, arreigned, and hanged at the aforeſaid turning trée.]

The end of vnlawful loue and luſt.

The reward of murther committed through couetouſneſſe.

Anno Reg. 26.

The lord Dacres of the north arreigned.

On the ninth of Julie was the lord Dacres of the north arreigned at Weſtminſter of high treaſon, where the duke of Norffolke ſate as iudge, and high ſteward of England. The ſaid lord Dacres being brought to the barre, with the axe of the Tower before him, after his indictment read, ſo improoued the ſame, anſwering euerie part and matter therein conteined, and ſo plainlie and directlie confuted his accuſers, which were there readie to auouch their accuſations, that to their great ſhames, and his high honor, he was found that day by his péeres not guiltie, whereof the commons not a little reioiſed, as by their ſhout and crie made at thoſe words, not guiltie, they fréelie teſtified.

John Frith burned.

The two and twentith of Julie was John Frith burned in Smithfield, for the opinion of the ſacrament: and with him the ſame time, and at the ſame ſtake, ſuffered alſo one Andrew Hewet, a yoong man,

The eleuenth of Auguſt were all the places of the obſeruant friers ſuppreſſed, as Gréenwich, Canturbarie, Richmont, Newarke, and Newcaſtell, and in their places were ſet Auguſtine friers, and the obſeruant friers were placed in the roomes of the graie friers. ¶ The one and twentith of September, doctor Tailor maſter of the rolles, was diſcharged of that office, and Thomas Cromwell ſworne in his place the nintéenth of October. Moreouer the third of Nouember, the parlement began againe, in the which was concluded the act of ſupremacie, which authoriſed the kings highnes to be ſupreme head of the church of England, and the authoritie of the pope aboliſhed out of the realme. ¶ In the ſame parlement alſo was giuen to the king, the firſt fruits and tenths of all ſpirituall dignities and promotions. This yeare came the great admerall of France into England, ambaſſadour from the French king, and was honorablie receiued.

Certeine priors arreigned and executed for treaſon.

In this time died the earle of Kildare, priſoner in the Tower, and his ſonne Thomas Fitzgaret began to rebell, and tooke all the kings ordinance, and ſent to the emperour, requiring him to take his part: alſo he ſlue the biſhop of Dublin, and robbed all ſuch as would not obeie him. In the beginning of this yeare, the duke of Norffolke and the biſhop of Elie went to Calis, and thither came the admerall of France. On the two & twentith of Aprill the prior of the Charterhouſe at London, the prior of Beuall, the prior of Erham, Reinalds a brother of Sion, & John vicar of Thiſtleworth, were arreigned and condemned of treaſon: and therevpon drawne, hanged and quartered at Tiburne the fourth of Maie: their heads and quarters were ſet ouer the bridge & gates of the citie, one quarter excepted, which was ſet vp at the Charterhouſe at London. ¶ On the eight of Maie, the king commanded that all belonging to the court ſhould poll their heads, & to giue example, cauſed his owne head to be polled, and his beard from thenceforth was cut round, but not ſhauen, which faſhion the courtiers imbraced, and would (no doubt) haue put in practiſe, though they had not béene therevnto bound by precept: for the people imitate the prince, as the poet long ago well noted, ſaieng:

Hollanders condemned for heretikes.

¶ The fiue and twentith daie of Maie, was in ſaint Paules church at London examined ninetéene men and ſix women borne in Holland, whoſe opinions were, firſt, that in Chriſt is not two natures, God and man: ſecondlie, that Chriſt tooke neither fleſh nor bloud of the virgin Marie: thirdlie, that children borne of infidels ſhall be ſaued: fourthlie, that baptiſme of children is to none effect: fiftlie, that the ſacrament of Chriſts bodie is but bread onelie: ſixtlie, that he, who after his baptiſme ſinneth wittinglie, ſinneth deadlie, and cannot be ſaued. Fourtéene of them were condemned, a man & a woman of them were burned in Smithfield, the other twelue were ſent to other townes there to be burnt.]

Monks of ẏ Charterhouſe executed.

The biſhop of Rocheſter beheaded.

Sir Thomas More beheaded.

On the ninetéenth of June were thrée monkes of the Charterhouſe hanged, drawne, and quartered at Tiburne, and their heads and quarters ſet vp about London, for denieng the king to be ſupreme head of the church: their names were, Exmew, Middlemore, and Nudigate. Alſo the one and twentith of the ſame moneth, and for the ſame cauſe, doctor John Fiſher biſhop of Rocheſter was beheaded for denieng of the ſupremacie, and his head ſet vpon London bridge, but his bodie buried within Barking churchyard. This biſhop was of manie ſore lamented, for he was reported to be a man of great learning, and of a verie good life. The pope had elected him a cardinall, and ſent his hat as far as Calis, but his head was off before his hat was on: ſo that they met not. On the ſixt of Julie was ſir Thomas More beheaded for the like crime, that is to wit, for denieng the king to be ſupreme head. And then the bodie of doctor Fiſher was taken vp, and buried with ſir Thomas Mores in the Tower. This man was both learned and wiſe, and giuen much to a certeine pleaſure in merie taunts and ieaſting in moſt of his communication, which maner he forgat not at the verie houre of his death.

Abr.Fl. ex Edw. Hall. fol.CCxxvj.

Sir Thomas More a ſcoffer & mocker at the verie houre of his death.

¶ I cannot tell (ſaith maſter Hall) whether I ſhould call him a fooliſh wiſe man, or a wiſe fooliſh man, for vndoutedlie he beſide his learning, had a great wit, but it was ſo mingled with taunting and mocking, that it ſéemed to them that beſt knew him, that hée thought nothing to be well ſpoken except he had miniſtred ſome mocke in the communication. Inſomuch as at his comming to the Tower, one of the officers demanded his vpper garment for his fée, meaning his gowne: and he anſwered, he ſhould haue it, and tooke him his cap, ſaieng it was the vppermoſt garment that he had. Likewiſe euen going to his death at the Tower gate, a poore woman called vnto him, and beſought him to declare what he had doone with euidences of hirs in the time that he was in office (which after he was apprehended ſhée could not come by) and that he would intreat ſhée might haue them againe, or elſe ſhe was vndoone. He anſwered, good woman, haue patience a little while, for the king is ſo good vnto me, that euen within this halfe houre he will diſcharge me of all buſineſſe, and helpe thée himſelfe.

Alſo when he went vp the ſtaiers on the ſcaffold, he deſired one of the ſhiriffes officers to giue him his hand to helpe him vp, and ſaid; When I come downe againe, let me ſhift for my ſelfe as well as I can. Alſo the hangman knéeled downe to him, aſking him forgiueneſſe of his death (as the maner is) to whome he ſaid, I forgiue thée, but I promiſe thée thou ſhalt neuer haue honeſtie by ſtriking off my head, my necke is ſo ſhort. Alſo euen when he ſhould laie downe his head on the blocke, he hauing a great graie beard, ſtroked out his beard, and ſaid to the hangman, I praie you let me laie my beard ouer the blocke, leaſt you ſhould cut it. Thus with a mocke he ended his life.

God had in moſt bountifull ſort powred his bleſſings vpon this man, induing him with eloquence, wiſedome and knowledge: but the grace of God withdrawne from him, he had the right vſe of none, no not of reaſon as it ſhould be rightlie vſed. God had extraordinarilie bleſſed his children, and namelie his thrée daughters, to whome he had giuen an admirable dexteritie in the ſcience of toongs and arts, as John Leland our reuerend antiquarie noteth in a proper and learned epigramme, ſaieng:

Spirituall graces doo not neceſſarilie concurre or depend vpon temporall.

And yet was not the will of God for the infuſing of ſpirituall graces, ſo linked to that of temporall, as becauſe the one was granted, therefore the other muſt not be denied. For the bleſſings of God which be outward, are common to the wicked with the good: the ſun ſhineth vpon all, the raine is kept from none: naie, God with a ſparing hand reacheth out thoſe things to the faithfull, which with full gripes he filleth out and powreth into the laps and boſoms of infidels and epicures: inſomuch that the prophet Dauid noting no leſſe, with a kind of indignation opened his mouth ſaieng; I was grieued at the wicked, I do alſo ſee the vngodlie in ſuch proſperitie, theſe floriſh in the world, theſe haue riches in poſſeſſion, and I ſaid; Then haue I cleanſed my heart in vaine, and waſhed my hands in innocencie: yea, and I had almoſt ſaid euen as they; but lo, then ſhould I haue condemned the generation of Gods children. But the end of theſe men, being ſet in ſlipperie places, are caſt downe and deſtroied, yea ſuddenlie do they conſume and come to a fearefull end: euen like as a dreame when one awaketh, ſo doth God make their image to vaniſh out of the citie.

Sir Thomas More in ſome caſes commended.

And albeit the fall of this ſir Thomas More was reprochfull, iſſuing from a treaſonable offenſe; yet as in pagans manie times there is ſomwhat which may teach chriſtians leſſons for their lerning to their ſhame: ſo in this papiſt was one praiſe-worthie propertie among the reſt moſt eminent, which I will note to the rebuke of proteſtants. ¶The reuerend father doctor Elmer biſhop of London, in a ſermon at Paules croſſe by him made in a ſolemne audience aſſembled at the parlement time 1584, teaching diuerſe points of doctrine, and the duties of ſundrie degrees, ſaid, that it was commendable for noble men and gentlemen, and a great furtherance to the loue of religion, to be deuout: he brought an example of ſir Thomas More, a man for his zeale (ſaith the biſhop) to be honored, but for his religion to be abhorred.

Abr. Flem. out of a ſermon made at Paules croſſe by doctor Elmer biſhop of London on the eighteenth of October 1584.

Whether it were mattins or euenſong it makes no matter.

This knight would diuerſe times put on a ſurpleſſe, and helpe the preeſt in proper perſon to ſaie ſeruice: inſomuch that vpon a time being at Chelſie, and buſie about that exerciſe, the duke of Norffolke then liuing, came to the ſaid ſir Thomas, then lord chancellor of England, about ſpeciall affaires: and being informed that ſir Thomas was at the church; thither went the duke, expecting the end of ſeruice. In the end, the duke and the lord chancellor met, and after mutuall greeting the duke ſaid thus: What! is my lord chancellor become a pariſh clarke? What will the kings maieſtie ſaie to this geere, when he ſhall vnderſtand that the lord chancellor of England, a ſpeciall peere of the realme, and in higheſt roome of honor in the land next the prince is become a pariſh clarke? Now trulie (ſaith ſir Thomas) I thinke, and verelie beleeue, that his highneſſe will be ſo farre to miſdeeme or miſlike me herein, that when he ſhall heare of the care which I haue to ſerue both his maiſter and mine, he will accept and take me for a faithfull ſeruant. And thus much of him.]

The king of Scots knight of the garter.

This yeere in the time that the king went his progreſſe to Gloceſter, and to other places weſtward, the king of Scots was inſtalled knight of the garter at Winſore by his procurator the lord Erſkin: and in October following, Stephen Gardner (which after the cardinals death was made biſhop of Wincheſter) was ſent ambaſſador into France, where he remained three yeeres after. ¶In Auguſt the lord Thomas Fitzgerard, ſonne to the earle of Kildare, was taken in Ireland, and ſent to the tower of London.

Viſitation of religious houſes.

In the moneth of October, doctor Lee and other were ſent to viſit the abbeies, priories, and nunries in England, who ſet all thoſe religious perſons at libertie that would forſake their habit, and all that were vnder the age of foure and twentie yeeres, and the reſidue were cloſed vp that would remaine. Further, they tooke order that no men ſhould haue acceſſe to the houſes of women, nor women to the houſes of men, except it ſhould be to heare their ſeruice. The abbat or prior of the houſe, where anie of the brethren was willing to depart, was appointed to giue to euerie of them a prieſts gowne for his habit, and fortie ſhillings in monie, the nunnes to haue ſuch apparell as ſecular women ware, and to go whither them liked beſt. ¶The eleuenth of Nouember was a great proceſſion at London for ioie of the French kings recouerie of health from a dangerous ſickneſſe. ¶In December a ſuruie was taken of all chanteries, and the names of them that had the gift of them.

The ladie Katharine Dowager deceaſeth.

The princeſſe Dowager lieng at Kimbalton, fell into hir laſt ſickneſſe, whereof the king being aduertiſed, appointed the emperors ambaſſador that was legier here with him named Euſtachius Caputius, to go to viſit hir, and to do his commendations to hir, and will hir to be of good comfort. The ambaſſador with all diligence did his duetie therein, comforting hir the beſt he might: but ſhe within ſix daies after, perceiuing hir ſelfe to war verie weake and feeble, and to feele death approching at hand, cauſed one of hir gentlewomen to write a letter to the king, commending to him hir daughter and his, beſeeching him to ſtand good father vnto hir: and further deſired him to haue ſome conſideration of hir gentlewomen that had ſerued hir, and to ſee them beſtowed in marriage. Further, that it would pleaſe him to appoint that hir ſeruants might haue their due wages, and a yeeres wages beſide. This in effect was all that ſhe requeſted, and ſo immediatlie hereupon ſhe departed this life the eight of Ianuarie at Kimbalton aforeſaid, and was buried at Peterborow. ¶The nine and twentith of Ianuarie queene Anne was deliuered of a child before hir time, which was borne dead.

Religious houſes giuen to the king.

On the fourth of Februarie the parlement began, in the which (amongſt other things) enacted, all religious houſes of the value of three hundred marks and vnder, were giuen to the king, with all the lands and goods to them belonging. The number of theſe houſes were three hundred ſeauentie and ſix; the value of their lands yearlie aboue two and thirtie thouſand pounds; their moouable goods one hundred thouſand; the religious perſons put out of the ſame houſes, amounted to the number of aboue 10000. This yeere was William Tindall burnt at a towne betwixt Bruxels and Maclin called Villefort. This Tindall, otherwiſe called Hichins, was borne in the marches of Wales, and hauing a deſire to tranſlate and publiſh to his countrie diuerſe books of the bible in Engliſh, and doubting to come in trouble for the ſame, if he ſhould remaine here in England, got him ouer into the parties of beyond the ſea, where he tranſlated not onelie the new teſtament into the Engliſh toong, but alſo the fiue books of Moſes, Ioſua, Iudicum, Ruth, the books of the kings, and Paralipomenon, Nehemias, or the firſt of Eſdras, and the prophet Ionas.

I. Stow.

William Tindall burnt.

Beſide theſe tranſlations, he made certeine treatiſes, and publiſhed the ſame, which were brought ouer into England, and read with great deſire of diuerſe, and of many ſore deſpiſed and abhorred, ſo that proclamations were procured forth for the condemnation and prohibiting of his books (as before you haue heard.) Finallie, he was apprehended at Antwerpe by meanes of one Philips an Engliſhman, and then ſcholer at Louaine. After he had remained in priſon a long time, and was almoſt forgotten, the lord Cromwell wrote for his deliuerance; but then in all haſt, becauſe he would not recant anie part of his doctrine, he was burned (as before you haue heard.) Of whoſe conuerſation and doctrine, innocent in the world, and ſincere for truth, as alſo ſo of his death and martyrdome, read the martyrologie of Iohn Fox our eccleſiaſticall chronographer Anno 1536. *ſub Hen.*8.

Anno reg.28.

On Maie daie were ſolemne iuſts kept at Gréenwich, and ſuddenlie from the iuſts the king departed, not hauing aboue ſix perſons with him, and in the euening came to Weſtminſter. Of this ſudden departing many muſed, but moſt chéeflie the quéene. ¶On the next morrow, the lord Rochford brother to the quéene, and Henrie Norris were brought to the tower of London priſoners. Alſo the ſame daie about fiue of the clocke in the after noone, quéene Anne of Bullongne was brought to the tower of London, by ſir Thomas Audleie lord chancellor, the duke of Norffolke, Thomas Cromwell ſecretarie, and ſir William Kingſton conſtable of the tower; and when ſhe came to the tower gate, entring in ſhe fell on hir knées before the ſaid lords, beſéeching God to helpe hir, as ſhe was not guiltie of that whereof ſhe was accuſed, and then deſired the ſaid lords to beſéech the kings grace to be good vnto hir, and ſo they left hir there priſoner. On the fiftéenth of Maie quéene Anne was arreigned in the tower of London on a ſcaffold for that purpoſe, made in the kings hall, before the duke of Norffolke, who ſate vnder the cloth of eſtate as high ſteward of England, with the lord chancellor on his right hand, the duke of Suffolke on his left hand, with marqueſſes and lords, &c: and the earle of Surrie ſat before the duke of Norffolke his father, as earle marſhall of England. The kings commiſſion being read, the conſtable of the tower, and the lieutenant brought the quéene to the barre, where was made a chaire for hir to ſit downe in, and there hir indictement was read, whereunto ſhe made ſo wiſe and diſcréet anſwers, that ſhe ſéemed fullie to cléere hir ſelfe of all matters laid to hir charge: but being tried by hir péeres, whereof the duke of Suffolke was chiefe, ſhe was by them found guiltie, and had iudgement pronounced by the duke of Norffolke.

GOod chriſtian people, I am come hither to die, for according to the law, and by the law I am iudged to die, and therfore I will ſpeake nothing againſt it. I am come hither to accuſe no man, nor to ſpeake anie thing of that whereof I am accuſed & condemned to die, but I praie God ſaue the king and ſend him long to reigne ouer you, for a gentler, nor a more mercifull prince was there neuer, and to me he was euer a good, a gentle, and a ſoueréigne lord. And if anie perſon will meddle of my cauſe, I require them to iudge the beſt. And thus I take my leaue of the world, and of you all, and I hartilie deſire you all to praie for me, Oh Lord haue mercie on me, to God I commend my ſoule, Ieſu receiue my ſoule: diuerſe times repeting thoſe words, till that hir head was ſtriken off with the ſword.

Now bicauſe I might rather ſaie much than ſufficientlie inough in praiſe of this noble quéene, as well for hir ſingular wit and other excellent qualities of mind, as alſo for hir fauouring of learned men, zeale of religion, and liberalitie in diſtributing almes in reliefe of the poore, I will refer the reader vnto maſter Fox his volume of Acts and Monuments, where he commendeth hir mild nature in taking admonition, prooueth hir marriage lawfull, defendeth hir ſucceſſion, ouerthroweth the ſiniſter iudgements, opinions and obiections of backebiters againſt that vertuous quéene, ſheweth hir faith and truſt in Chriſt at hir death, and finallie how the proteſtants of Germanie forſooke king Henrie for the death of ſo good a princeſſe. ¶Anglorum prælia ſaith, that this good quéene was forwarned of hir death in a dreame, wherein Morpheus the god of ſléepe (in the likeneſſe of hir grandfather) appéered vnto hir, and after a long narration of the vanities of this world (how enuie reigneth in the courts of princes, maligning the fortunate eſtate of the vertuous, how king Henrie the eight and his iſſue ſhould be the vtter ouerthrow and expulſion of poperie out of England, and that the gouernment of quéene Elizabeth ſhould be eſtabliſhed in tranquillitie & peace) he ſaith vnto hir in concluſion by waie of propheſie, as our poet hath recorded:

Immediatlie after hir death, in the wéeke before Whitſuntide, the king married the ladie Iane Seimer, daughter to ſir Iohn Seimer knight, which at Whitſuntide was openlie ſhewed as quéene. In the time of this parlement the biſhops and all the cleargie of the realme held a ſolemne conuocation at Paules church in London, where after much diſputation and debating of matters, they publiſhed a booke of religion, intituled Articles deuiſed by the kings highneſſe, &c. Aduancement of the lord Cromwell.

The death of the kings baſe ſonne.

In September, Thomas Cromwell lord priuie ſeale and vicegerent, ſent abroad vnder the kings ſpirituall priuie ſeale certeine iniunctions, commanding that the perſons and curats ſhould teach their pariſhioners the Pater noſter, the Aue & Creed, with the ten commandements, and articles of the faith in Engliſh. Theſe articles and iniunctions being eſtabliſhed by authoritie of parlement, and now to the people deliuered, bred a great miſliking in the harts of the common people, which had béene euer brought vp and trained in contrarie doctrine. And herewith diuerſe of the cleargie as moonks, prieſts, and others, tooke occaſion herby to ſpeake euill of the late procéedings of the king, touching matters of religion, affirming that if ſpéedie remedie were not in time prouided, the faith would ſhortlie be vtterlie deſtroied, and all praier and diuine ſeruice quite aboliſhed and taken awaie.

The people grudged at the iniunctions eſtabliſhed by act of parlement.

Manie ſiniſter reports, ſlanderous tales, and feigned fables were blowne abroad, and put into the peoples eares, and diuerſe of the nobilitie did alſo what they could to ſtir the commons to rebellion, faithfullie promiſing both aid and ſuccour againſt the king. The people thus prouoked to miſchiefe, and deceiued through ouer light credence, incontinentlie as it were to mainteine that religion, which had ſo manie yeares continued, and béene eſtéemed, they ſtiffelie and ſtoutlie conſpired togither, and in a part of Lincolneſhire they firſt aſſembled, and ſhortlie after ioined into an armie, being (as it was ſuppoſed) of men apt for the warres, in number about twentie thouſand. Againſt theſe rebels with all the haſt that might be, the king in his proper perſon vpon intelligence therof had marched towards them, being furniſhed with a warlike armie, perfectlie appointed of all things that to ſuch a companie ſhould apperteine.

A traitorous conſpiracie.

The Lincolnſhire men in armes againſt the king.

The rebels hearing that his perſon was preſent with his power to come thus againſt them, began to feare what would follow of their dooings: and ſuch nobles and gentlemen as at the firſt fauoured their cauſe, fell from them and withdrew, ſo that they being deſtitute of capteines, at length put certeine petitions in writing, which they exhibited to the king, profeſſing that they neuer intended hurt towards his roiall perſon. The king receiued their petitions, which conſiſted in choiſe of councellors, ſuppreſſion of religious houſes, maintenance of the ſeruice of almightie God, the ſtatute of vſes, the releaſe of the fiftéenth, and receiuing of the firſt fruits, with ſuch other matters as nothing apperteined to them: wherevpon he made them anſwer in pithie ſentence, reprouing them of their preſumptuous follie and rebellious attempt, to meddle in anie ſuch matters and weightie affaires, the direction whereof onelie belonged to him, and to ſuch noble men and councellors as his pleaſure ſhould be to elect and chooſe to haue the ordering of the ſame.

The petitions of the rebels receiued of the king and of what points they conſiſted.

Wherfore he aduiſed them to remember their raſh and inconſiderate dooings, and that now in anie wiſe they ſhould reſort home to their houſes, and no more to aſſemble contrarie to his lawes and their owne allegiances; and alſo to cauſe the prouokers of this miſchiefe to be deliuered to the hands of his lieutenant, and further to ſubmit themſelues wholie to ſuch puniſhment as he and his nobles ſhould thinke them worthie to receiue: for otherwiſe he would not ſuffer that iniurie at their hands to go vnreuenged. After the Lincolnſhire men had receiued the kings anſwer thus made to their petitions, each miſtruſting other, who ſhould be noted the greateſt meddler, ſuddenlie they began to ſhrinke, and got them home to their houſes without longer abode.

The Lincolnſhiremen giue ouer their rebellious enterpriſe.

Herewith the duke of Suffolke the kings lieutenant was appointed to go with the armie, to ſée the countrie ſet in quiet, accompanied with the lord admerall, ſir Francis Brian, and ſir Iohn Ruſſell that were ioined with him alſo in commiſſion for the ordering of things there within the countie of Lincolne. The duke entred into the citie of Lincolne the ſeuentéenth of October. On the ninetéenth all the inhabitants of Louth (according to order giuen by the duke) came to Lincolne, and there in the caſtell made their ſubmiſſion, holding vp their hands, and crieng for the kings mercie. And herwith were choſen forth Nicholas Melton, capteine Cobler, & thirtéene more, which were commanded to ward, and all the reſidue were new ſworne to the king, renouncing their former oth receiued in time of their rebellion, and then departed home to their houſes in the kings peace. After this were proclamations made abrode in the countrie in euerie market towne by the heralds of armes, Summerſet and Winſore, that the capteins and ſouldiers of the dukes armie ſhould not take anie mans goods, cattels, or vittels, except they paied or agréed with the owners of the ſame.

The rebels ſubmit themſelues and receiue a new oth of fealtie to the king.

And further commandement was giuen, that all inhabitants and dwellers within the townes and villages about, ſhould repaire to the citie of Lincolne, with all maner of vittels as well for men as horſſes, where they ſhould receiue paiment at reaſonable prices for the ſame. After this, there was likewiſe proclamation made for the apprehending of all ſuch lewd perſons, as had ſowne anie falſe rumors abrode in the countrie (the chéefe occaſion of this rebellion) bruting that the king pretended to haue the gold in the hands of his ſubiects brought into the tower to be touched, and all their cattell vnmarked, the chalices, goods, and ornaments of pariſh churches, fines for chriſtenings, weddings, and buriengs, licences to eat white meat, bread, pig, gooſe or capon, with manie other ſlanderous, falſe, and deteſtable tales and lies, forged of diueliſh purpoſe to incourage the people to rebellion. If therefore anie man could apprehend ſuch as had béene the ſetters forth and ſowers of ſuch ſeditious reports, they that brought them in, ſhould be ſo rewarded, as they ſhould thinke their labour well beſtowed.

Falſe rumors the occaſion of rebellions.

Moreouer, if there were anie aſſemblies made in anie part of the realme without the kings licence, by anie vnrulie perſons, and would not depart to their houſes vpon warning by his graces proclamations, they ſhould not looke for further mercie at the kings hand, but to be proſecuted with fire and ſword to the vttermoſt. To conclude, by the wiſe and ſage direction taken in appeaſing the countrie by that noble duke, all things were quieted in thoſe parties. Diuerſe of the principall offendors were ſent vnto London. He that tooke vpon him as chéefe capteine of the rout, was the ſame that called himſelfe capteine Cobler: but he was indéed a moonke named doctor Makarell, which afterwards with diuerſe others was executed.

But now in the meane time, whileſt the duke

A commotion in the north parts.

was ſent forwards into Lincolneſhire, within ſix daies after the king was trulie informed, that there was a new ſtir begun in the north parts by the people there, which had aſſembled themſelues into an huge armie of warlike men & well appointed, both with capteins, horſſes, armor, and artillerie, to the number of fortie thouſand men, which had incamped themſelues in Yorkeſhire. Theſe men declared by their proclamations ſolemnlie made, that this their riſing and commotion ſhould extend no further, but onelie to the maintenance and defenſe of the faith of Chriſt, and deliuerance of holie church, ſore decaied and oppreſſed, and alſo for the furtherance as well of priuate as publike matters in the realme, touching the wealth of all the kings poore ſubiects.

An holie pilgrimage.

They named this their ſeditious voiage, an holie and bleſſed pilgrimage: they had alſo certeine banners in the field, in which was painted Chriſt hanging on the croſſe on the one ſide, and a chalice with a painted cake in it on the other ſide, with diuers other banners of like hypocriſie and feigned holineſſe. The ſouldiers had alſo imbrodered on the ſléeues of their cotes in ſtéed of a badge, the ſimilitude of the fiue wounds of our ſauiour, and in the middeſt thereof was written the name of our Lord. Thus had the rebels hoſt of ſathan with falſe and counterfeit ſignes of holineſſe ſet out themſelues, onelie to deceiue the ſimple people in that their wicked and rebellious enterpriſe againſt their liege lord and naturall prince, whome by the law of nations and by Gods commandements they were bound in conſcience to obeie, and ſo farre to be from lifting vp the leaſt finger of their hand, as rather to put life and goods in hazard for his ſake, to teſtifie their allegiance.

The faithfull diligence of the earle of Shrewſburie

The ſpéedie diligence and loiall dutie which was found at that preſent in the worthie councellour George earle of Shreweſburie, is not to be forgotten, who immediatlie after he vnderſtood how the northerne men were thus vp in armes, conſidering how much it imported to ſtop them of their paſſage before they ſhould aduance too far forwards, whereby they might both increaſe in power, and put all other parts of the realme in hazard, through feare or hope to incline to their wicked purpoſes, he ſent abroad with all ſpéed poſſible to raiſe ſuch power of his ſeruants, tenants, and fréends, as by anie means he might make, and withall diſpatched one of his ſeruants to the king, both to aduertiſe him what he had doone, and alſo to purchaſe his pardon, for making ſuch leuie of power, before he had receiued his maieſties commiſſion ſo to doo.

I haue heard by relation of men of good credit that were there preſent: that when ſuch knights and gentlemen as were of his councell, and other of his eſpeciall fréends were come vnto him, he put forth this queſtion to them; Whether his fact in raiſing a power of armed men without the kings commiſſion (although he had doone it to reſiſt the rebels) were treaſon or not? Wherevnto when anſwer was made by ſome that were knowne to haue ſkill in the laws of the realme, how that by no means it could be intended treaſon, ſith his intent was good, and no euill thereby meant, but contrarilie the aduancement of the kings ſeruice dutifullie ſought: Yée are fooles (quoth the earle) I know it in ſubſtance to be treaſon, and I would thinke my ſelfe in an hard caſe, if I thought I had not my pardon comming.

A good meaning or intent dooth not by and by iuſtifie and make good the action.

The loialtie of the earle.

Such a reuerend regard had this noble earle vnto his bounden allegiance towards his prince, that whatſoeuer ſéemed but as it were to ſound in anie behalfe to the breach thereof, it ſo troubled his loiall mind, that he could not be ſatiſfied, till as it were in confeſſing his fault: where according to the truth there was none at all. He had ſignified his aſſured fidelitie in crauing pardon, where otherwiſe he might haue looked for thanks, which indéed he receiued with his pardon, according to his petition, and a commiſſion to procéed as he had begun. Moreouer, whereas there were diuerſe ſpeaches amongſt the ſoldiors in the armie, vttered by ſome not altogither happilie well diſpoſed, that the ſaid earle had ſo good liking of the northerne mens cauſe, that when it came to the point of triall, he would ſurelie ioine with them againſt that part, which he yet pretended to mainteine.

What the earle ſaid to them that talked lewdlie of him in the campe.

To put that matter out of doubt, he cauſed the multitude of his ſoldiours to come before him, and there declared to them, that he vnderſtood what lewd talke had béene raiſed of his meaning among them in the campe, as if he had fauoured the part of the rebels: But (ſaith he) whatſoeuer their colourable pretenſe may be, true it is, that traitors they are in this their wicked attempt. And whereas my anceſtors haue béene euer true to the crowne, I meane not to ſtaine my bloud now in ioining with ſuch a ſort of traitors, but to liue and die in defenſe of the crowne, if it ſtood but vpon a ſtake: and therefore thoſe that will take my part in this quarrell, I haue to thanke them, and if there be anie that be otherwiſe minded, I would wiſh them hence. And herewith he cauſed his chapleine to miniſter an oth to him, which he receiued to the effect aforeſaid, in the preſence of them all.

And verelie this was thought to be doone not without great cauſe that moued him thereto: for whereas the more part of his ſoldiours conſiſted of the countrie people, who with forged tales and wicked ſurmiſes were eaſilie led to beléeue whatſoeuer was reported in fauor of the rebels, and diſfauor of ſuch as were then chiefe councellors to the king, againſt whome they pretended to riſe (although there was no reaſonable occaſion leading them therevnto) it was greatlie to be ſuſpected, leaſt they might thorough ſome traitorous practiſe haue béene induced to forget their dutifull allegiance to their ſoueraigne, and ſouldiorlike obedience to their leaders, inſomuch that the capteins of the rebels were perſuaded (and ſome of them reported no leſſe) that they might haue fought with the duke of Norffolke, and the earle of Shreweſburie, on this hither ſide of the riuer of Dun, euen with their owne men, not néeding to haue brought a man of their armie with them.

He was prouided of ill ſouldiors that ſo vndutifullie to deale with him would be induced.

The oth of the earle of Shreweſburie in preſence of the people neceſſarie.

Therefore it was thought, that the oth which the earle of Shreweſburie in that ſort receiued before all his people there openlie in field, ſerued to great purpoſe; to put out of his ſoldiours wauering heads all ſuch lewd expectation that he would turne to the enimies, ſtaieng thereby their fickle minds; ſith they were now aſſured, that he being their chiefteine meant no diſſimulation. A matter trulie of no ſmall importance, conſidering the fauor which the commons bare towards him, and the opinion they had conceiued of his high prowesſe; ſo that which waie he inclined, it was thought verelie the game were likelie to go. But now after the king was aduertiſed of that perilous commotion of the northerne men, he appointed not onlie the ſaid earle of Shreweſburie to raiſe a power to reſiſt them: but alſo ordeined the duke of Norffolke his lieutenant generall, with the marqueſſe of Exceſter, and the ſaid earle of Shreweſburie, the earles of Huntington and Rutland, accompanied with a mightie power to go againſt them.

The duke of Norffolke the kings lieutenant.

Theſe lords raiſing ſuch retinues of ſouldiers and men of warre as were to them aſſigned, made forward to the place where the armie of the rebels was then incamped, which was beyond the towne of Doncaſter, in the high waie towards Yorke. But firſt the ſaid earle of Shrewſburie, with the earles of Huntington, and Rutland, and ſuch other that were next adioining to thoſe parties, with their powers aſſembled out of the ſhires of Salop, Stafford, Leiceſter, Rutland, Notingham, and Derbie, came to a place in Notingham ſhire called Blithlow, and there taking the muſters of their people, ſtreightwaies paſſed foorth to Doncaſter, and appointed certeine bands of their men, to lie in places where anie foords or paſſages laie ouer the riuer of Dun, that runneth by the northſide of Doncaſter, to ſtaie the enimies if they ſhould attempt to come ouer. Shortlie after came the duke of Norffolke, and finallie the marqueſſe of Exceſter with a iollie companie of weſterne men, well and perfectlie appointed.

The euen of Simon and Iude.

When theſe capteins and ſage councellors being here aſſembled, vnderſtood the manner of the northerne men, their number, and readineſſe to battell, they firſt practiſed with great policie, to haue pacified the matter without bloudſhedding: but the northerne men were ſo bent to mainteine their wilfull enterpriſe, that there was no hope to take vp the matter without battell: therefore a daie was ſet, on the which they ſhould trie the quarrell betwixt them with dint of ſword. But ſée the chance. The night before the daie aſſigned for this bloudie and vnnaturall battell, to haue béene fought betwixt men of one nation, and ſubiects to one king; there fell a raine not great to ſpeake of, but yet as it were by miracle, the riuer of Dun roſe ſuddenlie on ſuch a height, that ſeldome had béene ſéene there the like hugeneſſe of water: ſo that the daie when the houre of battell ſhould come, it was not poſſible for the one armie to come at the other, and ſo the appointment made betwéene both the armies for triall of the matter by force of armes, was by Gods good prouidence diſappointed, and manie an innocent mans life preſerued, that ſhould haue died, if their purpoſes had taken place.

I ſaw.

Gods prouidence ſtaieth them from battell.

After this by the great wiſedome and policie of the nobles and capteins, a communication was had, and an agréement made vpon the kings pardon, obteined for all the capteins and chiefe dooers in this inſurrection, and promiſe made that they ſhould be gentlie heard, to declare ſuch things as they found themſelues gréeued with: and that vpon their articles preſented to the king, their reaſonable petitions ſhould be granted, as by him & his councell it ſhould be thought expedient, whereby all troubles might be quieted, and ech thing brought to a good concluſion. Herewith euerie man departed, and thoſe which before came as hot as fire to fight, letted of their deſperat purpoſe, by Gods mercifull prouidence, returned now peaceablie to their houſes without anie more buſineſſe.

The matter is taken vp.

At the ſelfe ſame time that theſe northerne men were lodged néere to Doncaſter, and the kings power readie to ſtop them of their paſſage (as before ye haue heard) there was an other armie readie to haue marched ſouthwards thorough Lancaſhire: but by the faithfull diligence of the earle of Derbie, who with the forces of Lancaſhire and Cheſhire was appointed to reſiſt them, they were likewiſe kept backe and brought to quiet; notwithſtanding they were a verie great number aſſembled togither of the commons out of Cumberland, Weſtmerland, and of the north parts of Lancaſhire. The earle of Suſſex was ſent downe by the king, to ioine in aſſiſtance with the earle of Derbie; who cauſing diuerſe of the chiefe procurers of that rebellion in thoſe parties to be apprehended and arreigned, they being found giltie had iudgement, and were executed, as the abbats of Walleie, Sanleie, and others.

An other armie of rebels marching ſouthwards through Lancaſhire.

In time of this rebellion, a prieſt that by a butcher dwelling within fiue miles of Windſor had béen procured to preach in fauor of the rebels, and the butcher (as well for procuring the prieſt thereto, as for words ſpoken as he ſold his meat in Windſor) were hanged: the prieſt on a trée at the foot of Windſor bridge, and the butcher on a paire of new gallowes ſet vp before the caſtell gate, at the end of the ſame bridge. The words which the butcher ſpake were theſe. When one bad him leſſe for the carcaſe of a ſhéepe than he thought he could make of it: Naie by Gods ſoule (ſaid he) I had rather the good fellowes of the north had it, and a ſcore more of the beſt I haue, than I would ſo ſell it. This prieſt and butcher being accuſed on a mondaie in the morning whileſt the kings armie was in the field, and the king himſelfe lieng at Windſor, they confeſſed their faults vpon their examinations, and by the law martiall they were adiudged to death, and ſuffered as before is mentioned. This yeare in December, the Thames was froſen ouer: inſomuch that the king and quéene rode thorough London to Gréenewich.

A butcher & a prieſt hanged and the cauſe why.

A great froſt.

In Chriſtmas the king by his meſſengers and heralds ſent downe into the north his generall pardons to all the offendors; and ſhortlie after Aſke that had béene the principall procurer, & as it were chiefe capteine of the northerne rebels, came to London, and now was both pardoned and receiued into fauor, receiuing of the kings bounteous liberalitie, apparell, and diuerſe other rewards, whereof he was moſt vnworthie: for there liued not (as Hall ſaith) a verier wretch, as well in perſon as conditions and déeds, ſpeciallie towards the kings maieſtie, as after appeared. ¶ Sir Rafe Euers kept Scarbrow caſtell in the north, being ſix wéeks beſieged by the rebels, twentie daies whereof he and all his companie (which were his onelie friends, ſeruants, and tenants, and ſerued for good will to him) were forced to ſuſteine themſelues with bread and water, and yet he kept the ſame to the end of that rebellion; and ſo deliuered it to king Henrie, who ſent him ſoone after to ſerue in the borders againſt Scotland, where in great credit he continued his ſeruice, kéeping the Scots without dooing hurt to England, and with ſuch obedience of them, as within twentie miles of the borders of Scotland fore againſt him, there was not a Scot but at his commandement: and ſo continued, till he was killed in the yeare 1545.]

Sir Rafe Euers his good ſeruice in the north.

The twelfe of Nouember, ſir Thomas Newman prieſt bare a faggot at Paules croſſe, for ſinging maſſe with good ale. On the third of Februarie, Thomas Fitzgaret ſonne and heire to the earle of Kildare was beheaded, and fiue of his vncles were drawne, hanged, and quartered at Tiborne for treaſon. In the ſame moneth Nicholas Muſgraue, Thomas Tilbie, with others, began a new rebellion at Kirkbie Stephan in Weſtmerland, who hauing got togither eight thouſand men, beſieged the citie of Carleill, from whence they were beaten with the onlie power of the citie: and in returning from thenſe, the duke of Norffolke, who then was lieutenant of the north, incountered with them, tooke the capteins, and according to the law martiall arreigned ſeuentie and foure of them, whome he hanged on Carleill wals; but Muſgraue eſcaped.

Tilbie. A new rebellion.

In the ſame moneth of Februarie began a new commotion, by the procurement of ſir Francis Bigod, who being intiſed to that miſchieuous enterpriſe by certeine wicked perſons, forgat his dutie to his prince, although he had béene a man (as Hall ſaith) that vndoubtedlie loued God, and reuerenced his prince with a right obedient and louing feare: but ſuch are men when God leaueth them, and that they will take in hand things which Gods moſt holie word vtterlie forbiddeth. This laſt rebellion began in Setrington, Pikering, Leigh, and Scarbrow; but it

The purpoſe of the rebels.

it was quickelie ſuppreſſed, and the ſaid ſir Francis Bigod apprehended, and brought to the Tower. The ſaid ſir Francis & one Halam, hauing raiſed a great companie of rebels, meant to haue taken the towne of Hull, there to haue fortified themſelues, and to haue aſſembled more power; but by the wiſedome of ſir Raſe Ellerkar, & the maior of the towne of Hull, the ſaid Halam, & thréeſcore other of the rebels without anie ſlaughter were taken, which Halam was afterwards hanged in chaines, and two other with him, at the ſaid towne of Hull. Sir Francis Bigod fled, & could not be heard of for a time, but at length he was alſo apprehended.

Aſke & others practiſe to raiſe a new rebellion.

Robert Packington murthered.

Moreouer, about the latter end of this twentith and eight yeare, the lord Darcie, Aſke, ſir Robert Conſtable, ſir Iohn Bulmer and his wife, ſir Thomas Perſie brother to the erle of Northumberland, ſir Stephan Hamilton, Nicholas Tempeſt eſquier, William Lomleie, began eftſoones to conſpire, although euerie of them before had receiued their pardons: and now were they all taken and brought to the Tower of London as priſoners. This yeare Robert Packington a mercer of London, a man both rich, wiſe, and of good credit, dwelling at the ſigne of the leg in Cheapſide, on a morning going (as his cuſtome was) about foure of the clocke to heare maſſe, in the church then called S. Thomas of Acres, & now the Mercers chappell, as he croſſed ouer the ſtréet from his houſe to the church, was ſuddenlie murthered with a gun, the cracke whereof was heard of the neighbors, and of a great number of laborers that ſtood at Soper lane end, and ſaw the ſaid Packington go foorth of his houſe: but there was ſuch a thicke miſt that morning, as the like had not béene ſéene, by couert whereof the murtherer found ſhift the more eaſilie to eſcape.

Manie were ſuſpected, but none found in fault, albeit forſomuch as he was one that would ſpeake his mind fréelie, and was at the ſame time one of the burgeſſes of the parlement for the citie of London, and had talked ſomewhat againſt the couetouſneſſe and crueltie practiſed by the cleargie, it was miſtruſted leaſt by ſome of them he came thus to his end. At length the murtherer in déed was condemned at Banburie in Oxfordſhire, to die for a fellonie which he afterwards committed: and when he came to the gallowes on which he ſuffered, he confeſſed that he did this murther, and till that time he was neuer had in anie ſuſpicion thereof. ¶ The nine and twentith of March, were twelue of the Lincolneſhire rebels drawne to Tiburne, and there hanged and quartered, fiue of them were prieſts, the reſidue laie men. One of the prieſts was doctor Makarell, and an other was the vicar of Louth.

Rich. Grafton. The inuention of caſting pipes.

About this ſeaſon the maner of caſting pipes of lead for the conueiance of water vnder the ground, without occupieng of ſoulder to the ſame, was inuented by Robert Brocke clearke, then one of the kings chapleins, an inuention right neceſſarie for the ſauing of expenſes: for two men and a boie will doo that in one daie, which before could not be doone by manie men in manie daies. Robert Cooper goldſmith was the firſt that made the inſtruments, and put this inuention in practiſe. ¶ In the verie beginning of this yeare, certeine commiſſioners being ſent into Summerſetſhire to take vp corne, the people began to make an inſurrection: but by the wiſedome and diligence of yoong maſter Paulet & others the ſame was ſuppreſſed, and the beginners thereof, to the number of thréeſcore, were apprehended & condemned, and fourtéene of them were hanged and quartered, one of the number being a woman, the reſidue were ſaued by the kings mercifull pardon.

Execution.

In Iune the lord Darcie & the lord Huſeie were arreigned at Weſtminſter before the marqueſſe of Exceſter then high ſteward, where they were found guiltie, and had iudgement, as in caſes of high treaſon. Shortlie after alſo were arreigned ſir Robert Conſtable, ſir Thomas Perſie, ſir Francis Bigod, ſir Stephan Hamilton, ſir Iohn Bulmer, and his wife, or rather (as ſome report) his paramour: alſo William Lomleie, Nicholas Tempeſt, William Thurſt abbat of Founteins, Adam Sudburie abbat of Ierueux, William Wold prior of Birlington, alſo the abbat of Riuers, and Robert Aſke. They were all found guiltie of high treaſon, and all put to death. Sir Robert Conſtable was hanged in chains ouer Beuerleie gate at Hull, and Robert Aſke was alſo hanged in chains on a tower at Yorke, and Margaret Cheineie ſir Iohn Bulmers paramour burnt in Smithfield in London. The other ſuffered at Tiburne.

The birth of king Edward the ſixt.

In the latter end of Iune, was the lord Darcie beheaded at the Tower hill, and ſhortlie after the lord Huſeie was likewiſe beheaded at Lincolne. This yeare at ſaint Georges feaſt, was the lord Cromwell made knight of the garter. In October on ſaint Edwards euen, which falleth on the twelft of that moneth, at Hampton court the quéene was deliuered of hir ſonne named Edward, for whoſe birth great ioie was made thorough the realme, with thankſgiuing to almightie God, who had ſent ſuch a yoong prince to ſuccéed his father in the crowne of this realme (as afterwards he did) by the name of king Edward the ſixt. His godfathers at the fontſtone were the archbiſhop of Canturburie & the duke of Norffolke, the ladie Marie was his godmother, and at the biſhopping, the duke of Suffolke was his godfather. On the eightéenth of October he was made prince of Wales, duke of Cornewall, and erle of Cheſter.

The death of quéene Iane.

But as ioie is often mixed with ſorrow, ſo at that time it came to paſſe by the death of his moother, that noble and vertuous ladie quéene Iane, which departed out of this life the fourtéenth daie of this moneth of October, to the great griefe of the whole realme: but namelie the king hir huſband tooke it moſt grieuouſlie of all other, who remoouing to Weſtminſter, there kept himſelfe cloſe a great while after. The eight of Nouember, the corps of the quéene was caried to Windſor, with great ſolemnitie, and there buried in the midſt of the quire in the caſtell church. There was alſo a ſolemne hearſe made for hir in Paules church, and funerall exequies celebrated, as well as in all other churches within the citie of London. Thus was the king left againe a widower, and ſo continued the ſpace of two yeares togither. Vpon the death of which quéene Iane, and the birth of prince Edward hir ſon this diſtichon following was made:

Lord Thomas Howard deceaſſed.

The king held his Chriſtmas at Gréenewich, and as well he as all the court ware mourning apparell, till the morrow after Candlemas daie, & then he and all other changed. This yeare Edward Seimer viſcount Beauchampe the quéenes brother was created earle of Hertford, & ſir William Fitzwilliams lord high admerall was created earle of Southhampton, ¶ and maſter Paulet was made vicetreaſuror, ſir Iohn Ruſſell comptrollor of the kings houſe, maſter Henedge, maſter Long, maſter Kneuet of the kings priuie chamber, knights; maſter Coffin, maſter Liſtar, & maſter Seimer the quéenes brother, knights. On Allhallowes euen, the lord Thomas Howard, brother to the duke of Norffolke, died priſoner in the Tower of London, and was buried at Thetford, and then the ladie Margaret Dowglas was pardoned, and releaſed out of the Tower. The foure and twentith of Februarie, being ſundaie, the rood of Borleie in Kent, called the rood of grace, made with diuerſe vices, to mooue the eies and lips, was ſhewed at Paules croſſe by the preacher, which was the biſhop of Rocheſter, and there it was broken and plucked in peeces.

The fiue and twentith of Februarie, ſir Ihon Allen prieſt, and alſo an Iriſh gentleman of the Garets were hanged & quartered at Tiburne. The ſecond of March, the image of the rood, called ſaint Sauior at Bermonſeie abbeie in Southworke, was taken downe by the kings commandement. The one and twentith of March, Henrie Harſam cuſtomer of Plimmouth, and Thomas Ewell, were hanged and quartered at Tiburne.] In Maie a frier obſeruant called frier Forreſt was apprehended, for that he was knowne in ſecret confeſſions to haue declared to manie of the kings liege people, that the king was not ſupreame head of the church, where he had by his oth neuertheleſſe affirmed him ſo to be. Wherupon in his examination, that point being laid to his charge, he anſwered that he tooke his oth with his outward man, but his inward man neuer conſented therevnto. But being further accuſed of diuerſe hereticall and damnable opinions that he held & mainteined contrarie to the ſcripture, at length being not able to defend the ſame, he ſubmitted himſelfe to the puniſhment of the church.

Anno Reg.30. Frier Forreſt.

Now when vpon this his ſubmiſſion, hauing more libertie than before he had to talke with whome he would, and other hauing libertie to talke with him, he was incenſed by ſome ſuch as had conference with him, that when his formall abiuration was ſent him to read and peruſe, he vtterlie refuſed it, and obſtinatelie ſtood in all his hereſies and treaſons. Wherevpon he was condemned, & afterwards on a paire of new gallowes prepared for him in Smithfield, he was hanged by the middle and armeholes all quicke, and vnder the gallowes was made a fire wherewith he was conſumed and burnt to death. There were diuerſe of the councell preſent at his death readie to haue granted him pardon, if anie ſparke of repentance would haue appeared in him. There was alſo a pulpit prepared, in which that renowmed preacher Hugh Latimer, then biſhop of Worceſter, by manifeſt ſcriptures confuted the friers errors, and with manie godlie exhortations moued him to repentance, but he would neither heare nor ſpeake.

Frier Forreſt burnt.

A little before the execution, an huge and great image was brought to the gallowes. This image was fetched out of Wales, which the Welſhmen had in great reuerence: and it was named Daruell Gatheren. They had a propheſie in Wales, that this image ſhould ſet a whole foreſt on fire, which propheſie was now thought to take effect, for he ſet this frier Forreſt on fire, and conſumed him to nothing. The frier when he ſaw the fire come, caught hold on the ladder, which he would not let go, but in that ſort vnpatientlie tooke his death, ſo as if one might iudge him by his outward man, he appeared (ſaith Hall) to haue ſmall knowledge of God, and leſſe truſt in him at his ending: otherwiſe he would haue beene perſuaded to patience, and a chriſtian farewell to the world. ¶ Vpon the gallows that he died on, was ſet vp in great letters theſe verſes here following:

In Julie was Edmund Cuningſbie atteinted of treaſon, for counterfeiting the kings ſigne manuell, and in Auguſt was Edward Clifford for the ſame cauſe atteinted, and both put to execution as traitors at Tiburne. In September by the ſpeciall motion of the Lord Cromwell, all the notable images, vnto the which were made anie eſpeciall pilgrimages and offerings, were vtterlie taken awaie, as the images of Walſingham, Ipſwich, Worceſter, the ladie of Wilſdon, with manie other, and likewiſe the ſhrines of counterfeit ſaints, as that of Thomas Becket, and others. And euen forthwith, by meanes of the ſaid Cromwell, all the orders of friers and nuns, with their cloiſters and houſes, were ſuppreſſed and put downe. ¶ As for the images of our ladie of Walſingham, and Ipſwich, were brought vp to London, with all the iewels that hoong about them, and diuerſe other images both in England & Wales, wherevnto anie common pilgrimage was vſed, for auoiding of idolatrie, all which were burnt at Chelſie by the lord priuie ſeale.

On the firſt of September being ſundaie, one Gratnell hangman of London and two other were hanged at the wreſtling place by Clearken well, for robbing a booth in Bartholomew faire, at which execution were aboue twentie thouſand people, as Edward Hall himſelfe (then a preſent beholder) iudged. This moneth of September, Thomas Cromwell lord priuie ſeale, vicegerent to the kings highneſſe, ſent forth iniunctions to all biſhops & curats through the realme, charging them to ſee that in euery pariſh church, the bible of the largeſt volume, printed in Engliſh, were placed for all men to read on: and that a booke of regiſter were alſo prouided and kept in euerie pariſh church, wherein ſhall be written euerie wedding, chriſtening, and burieng, within the ſame pariſh for euer.

The monks there were commanded to change their habits, &c. The one and twentith of October, the church of Thomas Becket in London called the hoſpitall of ſaint Thomas of Acres was ſuppreſſed. Nicholas Gibſon groſer, for this yeare ſhiriffe of London, builded a free ſchoole at Ratcliffe, neere vnto London, appointing to the ſame, for the inſtruction of threeſcore poore mens children, a ſchoolemaſter and vſher, with a ſtipend of ten pounds by the yere to the maſter, and ſix pounds thirteene ſhillings foure pence to the vſher. bert, a prieſt, was accuſed of hereſie, for holding opinion againſt the bodilie preſence in the ſacrament of the altar. He appealed to the kings maieſtie, who fauourablie conſented to heare him at a daie appointed, againſt which daie, in the kings palace at Weſtminſter, within the kings hall, there was ſet vp a throne or ſeat roiall for the king, with ſcaffolds for all the lords, and a ſtage for Nicholſon to ſtand vpon.

The marques of Exceſter condemned.

This Nicholſon was eſteemed to be a man well learned, but that daie he vttered no ſuch knowledge (ſaith Hall) as was thought to be in a man of that eſtimation. Diuerſe arguments were miniſtred to him by the biſhops, but namelie the king preſſed him ſore, and in the end offered him pardon if he would renounce his opinion: but he would not conſent thereto, and therefore he was there condemned, and had iudgement, and ſo ſhortlie after he was drawne into Smithfield, and there burnt to aſhes. The third of Nouember, Henrie Courtnie marques of Exceſter and earle of Deuonſhire, Henrie Poole lord Montacute, and ſir Edward Neuill brother to the lord Aburgauennie, were ſent to the tower, being accuſed by ſir Geffrie Poole, brother to the lord Montacute, of high treaſon. They were indicted for deuiſing to mainteine, promote, & aduance one Reginald Poole, late deane of Exceſter, enimie to the king beyond the ſea, & to depriue the king. The marques, and the lord Montacute were arreigned the laſt of December at Weſtminſter before the lord Audleie that was chancellor, and for that preſent time high ſteward of England, and there they found him giltie.

The ninth of Ianuarie, the lord marques, and the lord Montacute, with ſir Edward Neuill loſt their heads on the Tower hill. The two prieſts and Holland were drawne to Tiburne, and there hanged and quartered. Sir Geffreie Poole had his pardon. ¶ On Aſhwedneſdaie, Iohn Ihons, Iohn Potter, & William Manering, were hanged in the princes liueries (bicauſe they were the princes ſeruants) on the ſouthſide of Paules chuchyard, for killing Roger Cholmeleie eſquier in that place, of malice prepenſed. The third of March, ſir Nicholas Carew of Bedington in the countie of Surrie knight of the garter, and maiſter of the kings horſſe, condemned before of treaſon, was beheaded on the Tower hill, where he made a godlie confeſſion, both of his fault, and ſuperſtitious faith, giuing God thanks, for that his hap was to be priſoner in the Tower, where he firſt ſauored the pleaſant taſt of Gods holie word, meaning the bible in Engliſh, which there he read by the exhortation of one Thomas Philips then keeper of that priſon, and ſometime a citizen and point-maker of London, who had beene in ſome trouble for religion, and examined before doctor Stokeſlie biſhop of London, and ſir Thomas More, but through his wiſe demeanor and mild anſwers, he eſcaped their hands.

Bulworks & blockhouſes builded.

Anno Reg. 31. A parlement. Atteindors.

Execution.

The ninth of March, the king created ſir William Paulet knight treaſuror of his houſe, lord ſaint Iohn, and ſir Iohn Ruſſell comptrollor of his houſhold, lord Ruſſell. Alſo either then or ſhortlie after, was ſir William Par created lord Par. The new abbeie of white moonks at the Tower hill, and the Minories, nuns without Algate, were ſuppreſſed on the laſt of March. The ſame time the king cauſed all the hauens to be fenſed with bulworks, and blockehouſes, and riding to Douer, he tooke order to haue bulworks made alongſt the ſea coaſts, and ſent commiſſion to haue generall muſters made through the realme. Moreouer on Eaſter daie there were threeſcore ſaile diſcouered that laie in the Downes, and for that it was neither knowne what they were, nor what they intended to doo, all the able men in Kent roſe and muſtered in armour the ſame daie. The eight and twentith of Aprill began a parlement at Weſtminſter, in the which Margaret counteſſe of Saliſburie, Gertrude wife to the marques of Exceſter, Reginald Poole cardinall, brother vnto the lord Montacute, ſir Adrian Foſkew, & Thomas Dingleie knight of ſaint Iohns, and diuerſe other were atteinted of high treaſon, which Foſkew and Dingleie the tenth of Iulie were beheaded.

The ſtatute of the ſix articles, An inqueſt of inquirie.

The extreme proceeding in execution of the ſix articles.

In this parlement the act of the ſix articles was eſtabliſhed. Of ſome it was named the bloodie ſtatute, as it prooued indeed to manie. And euen ſhortlie after the making thereof, when the firſt inqueſt for inquirie of the offendors of the ſame ſtatute ſat in London at the mercers chappell, thoſe that were of that inqueſt were ſo choſen foorth for the purpoſe, as there was not one amongſt them that wiſhed not to haue the ſaid ſtatute put in execution to the vttermoſt, inſomuch that they were not contented onelie to inquire of thoſe that offended in the ſix articles conteined in that ſtatute, but alſo they deuiſed to inquire of certeine branches (as they tooke the matter) belonging to the ſame, as of thoſe that came ſeldome to heare maſſe, that held not vp their hands at the ſacring time, who tooke no holie bread nor holie water, who vſed to read the bible in churches, or in communication ſeemed to deſpiſe preeſts, or images in the churches, &c. To conclude, they inquired ſo diligentlie of them that had ſo offended in anie of thoſe articles or the branches, that they indicted & preſented to the number of fiue hundred perſons and aboue, ſo that if the king had not granted his pardon, for that he was informed by the lord Audleie then lord chancellor that they were indicted of malice, a great manie of them which alreadie were in priſon, had died for it in Smithfield, in frieng a faggot. But although the king at that preſent granted his gratious pardon, and forgaue all thoſe offenſes: yet afterwards, during the time that this ſtatute ſtood in force, which was for the ſpace of eight yeares inſuing, they brought manie an honeſt and ſimple perſon to death. For ſuch was the rigor of that law, that if two witneſſes, true or falſe, had accuſed anie, and aduouched that they had ſpoken againſt the ſacrament, there was no waie but death; for it booted him not to confeſſe that his faith was contrarie, or that he ſaid not as the accuſers reported, for the witneſſes (for the moſt part) were beleeued.

Prouiſion for defenſe of the realme.

The king being informed that the pope by inſtigation of cardinall Poole, had mooued and ſtirred diuers great princes and potentats of chriſtendome to inuade the realme of England; without all delaie rode himſelfe toward the ſea coaſts, and ſent diuerſe of his nobles and councellors to ſurueie all the ports and places of danger on the coaſt, where anie meet and conuenient landing place might be doubted, as well in the borders of England, as alſo of Wales: in which dangerous places he cauſed bulworks and forts to be erected. And further, he cauſed the lord admerall earle of Southampton to prepare in a readineſſe his nauie of ſhips, for defenſe of the coaſts. Beſide this, he ſent forth commiſſions to haue generall muſters taken through the realme, to vnderſtand what number of able men he might make account of: and further to haue the armor and weapons ſéene and viewed. Nothing left he vndoone that tended to the foreſéeing and preuenting of a miſchiefe to inſue, which in a prince is counted a vertue, becauſe ſuch prouidence and circumſpection is reputed no leſſe in a priuat & ordinarie man, as the poet Plautus ſaith;

Virtus eſt, vbi occaſio admonet, diſpicere.

Sir William Forman knight, at that preſent maior of London, was commanded to certifie the names of all the able men within the citie and liberties thereof, betwéene the ages of thrée ſcore and of ſixtéene, with the number of armors and weapons of all kinds of ſorts. Wherevpon the ſaid maior and his brethren ech one in his ward, by the oth of the common councell and conſtable, tooke the number of men, armor, and weapons. And after well conſidering of the matter, by view of their bookes, they thought it not expedient to admit the whole number certified for apt and able men: and therefore aſſembling themſelues againe, they choſe forth the moſt able perſons, and put by the reſidue, ſpeciallie ſuch as had no armor, nor for whom anie could be prouided. But when they were crediblie aduertiſed by Thomas Cromwell lord priuie ſeale (to whome the citie was greatlie beholden) that the king himſelfe would ſée the people of the citie muſter in a conuenient number, and not to ſet forth all their power, but to leaue ſome at home to kéepe the citie; then eftſoons euerie alderman repaired to his ward, and there put aſide all ſuch as had iacks, cotes of plate of maile, and brigandines, and appointed none but ſuch as had white armor, except ſuch as ſhould beare moriſh pikes, which ware no armor but ſculles, and there was no ſtranger (although he were a deniſine) permitted to be in this muſter.

Preparation in London for a muſter to be made and ſhewed before the king.

Euerie man being of anie abilitie, prouided himſelfe a cote of white ſilke, and garniſhed their baſenets with turues like caps of ſilke, ſet with owches, furniſhed with chaines of gold and feathers, or cauſed their armor to be guilt, and likewiſe their halberds and pollaxes. Some, and eſpeciallie certeine goldſmiths, had their whole armor of ſiluer bullion. The lord maior, the recorder, the aldermen, and euerie other officer beſide were gorgeouſlie trimmed, as for their degrées was thought ſéemelie. The maior had ſixtéene tall fellowes on foot attending on him with guilt halberds, apparelled in white ſilke doublets, and their hoſe and ſhooes were likewiſe white, cut after the Almaine guiſe, pounſed and puiled out with red ſarſenet: their ierkins were of white leather cut, and chains about their necks, with feathers and brooches in their caps. The recorder and euerie alderman had about him foure halberders trimmed alſo in warlike ſort. The chamberleine of the citie, the councellors & aldermens deputies were appointed to be wiflers on horſſebacke, which aloft on their armor ware white damaſke cotes, mounted on good horſſes well trapped, with great chaines about their necks, and proper iauelins or battell axes in their hands, and caps of veluet richlie trimmed.

The wiflers.

The wiflers on foot, being in number foure hundred proper light perſons, were clad in white ierkins of leather cut, with white hoſe and ſhooes, euerie man with a iauelin or ſlaughſword in his hands, to kéepe the people in arraie. They had chaines about their necks, and fethers in their caps. The minſtrels were in white, with the armes of the citie, and ſo was euerie other perſon at this muſter without anie diuerſitie; the lord maior, recorder, and aldermen, onelie excepted, who had croſſes of veluet or ſatin pirled with gold. The ſtandard bearers were the talleſt men of euerie ward, for whome were made thirtie new ſtandards of the deuiſe of the citie, beſide baners. Euerie alderman muſtred his own ward in the fields, to ſée that euerie man were in furniture prouided as was requiſite.

The minſtrels.

Euerie alderman with his ward in order of battell.

The eight of Maie being the daie appointed for to ſhew themſelues before the king, euerie alderman in order of battell with thoſe of his ward came into the fields at Mile end, and then all the gunners ſeuered themſelues into one place, the pikes into another, and the archers into an other, and likewiſe the bilmen, and there caſt themſelues in rings, and other formes of battell, which was a beautifull ſight to behold: for all the fields from white Chapell to Mile end, and from Bednall gréene to Ratcliffe & Stepnie, were all couered with armour, men, and weapons, and eſpeciallie the battell of pikes ſéemed to be as it had béene a great forreſt. Then was euerie part diuided into thrée battels, a for-ward, a midle-ward, and a rere-ward.

The order of the Londoners in their muſters.

About ſeauen of the clocke marched forward the light péeces of ordinance, with ſtone and powder. After them followed the drums and fifes, and immediatlie after them a guidon of the armes of the citie. Then followed maſter Sadler capteine of the gunners on horſſebacke armed, and in a cote of veluet, with a chaine of gold, and foure halberders about him apparelled as before is recited. Then followed the gunners foure in a ranke, euerie one going fiue foot in ſunder, which ſhot altogither in diuerſe places verie liuelie, and in ſpeciallie before the kings maieſtie, which at that time ſat in his new gatehouſe at his palace of Weſtminſter, where he viewed all the whole companie. In like maner paſſed the other companies of all the thrée battels in good and ſéemelie order. The foremoſt capteine at nine of the clocke in the morning, by the little conduit came and entered into Paules churchyard, and from thenſe directlie to Weſtminſter, and ſo through the ſanctuarie, and round about the parke of S. James, and vp into the field, comming home through Holborne, and as the firſt capteine entered againe to the little conduit, the laſt of the muſter entered Paules churchyard, which was then about foure of the clocke in the afternoone. The number, beſide the wiflers, and of other waiters was fiftéene thouſand.

The king taketh view of the Londoners in their muſters.

Ladie Anne of Cleue is receiued into Calis.

The eleuenth daie of December at the turne pike on this ſide Graueling, was the ladie Anne of Cleue receiued by the lord deputie of the towne of Calis, and with the ſpeares and horſſemen belonging to the retinue there. When ſhe came within little more than a mile of the towne of Calis, ſhe was met by the erle of Southampton high admerall of England, who had in his companie thirtie gentlemen of the kings houſhold, as ſir Francis Brian, ſir Thomas Seimer, and others, beſide a great number of gentlemen of his owne retinue clad in blue veluet, and crimſin ſatin, and his yeomen in damaſke of the ſame colours. The mariners of his ſhip were apparelled in ſatin of Bridges, cotes & ſlops of the ſame colour. The lord admerall brought hir into Calis by Lanterne gate. There was ſuch a peale of ordinance ſhot off at hir entrie, as was maruellous to the hearers. The maior preſented hir with an hundred markes in gold, the merchants of the ſtaple with an hundred ſouereignes of gold in a rich purſe. She was lodged in the kings place called the Checker, and there ſhe laie fifteene daies for want of proſperous wind.

She landeth in Kent.

During which time, goodlie iuſts and coſtlie bankets were made to hir, for hir ſolace and recreation. And on S. Iohns daie in Chriſtmaſſe, ſhe with fiftie ſaile tooke paſſage about noone, and landed at Dele in the Downes about fiue of the clocke, where ſir Thomas Chenie lord Warden of the ports receiued hir. She taried there a certeine ſpace in a caſtell newlie built, and thither came the duke of Suffolke, and the dutches of Suffolke, and the biſhop of Chicheſter with a great number of knights and eſquiers, and ladies of Kent and other, which welcomed hir grace, and brought hir that night vnto Douer caſtell, where ſhe reſted till mondaie, on which daie (notwithſtanding it was verie foule and ſtormie weather) ſhe paſſed towards Canturburie, and on Baram downe met hir the archbiſhop of Canturburie, with the biſhops of Elie, S. As ſhe paſſed towards Rocheſter on Newyeares euen, on Reinam downe met hir the duke of Norffolke, and the lord Dacres of the ſouth, and the lord Montioie, with a great companie of knights and eſquiers of Norffolke and Suffolke, with the barons of the eſcheker which brought hir to Rocheſter, where ſhe laie in the palace all Newyeares daie. On which daie, the king (longing to ſee hir) accompanied with no more but eight perſons of his priuie chamber, both he and they all apparelled in marble cotes, priuilie comming to Rocheſter, ſuddenlie came to hir preſence, wherof at the firſt ſhe was ſomewhat aſtonied, but after he had ſpoken to hir and welcomed hir, ſhe with louing countenance and gratious behauiour him receiued, and welcomed him on hir knees, whom he gentlie tooke vp and kiſſed, and all that after noone communed and deuiſed with hir, ſupped that night with hir, and the next daie he departed to Greenewich, and ſhe came forward to Dartford.

On the morrow the third daie of Ianuarie being ſaturdaie, in a faire plaine of Blackeheath, more neere to the foot of Shooters hill, than the aſcendent of the ſame, called Blackheath hill, was pitched a pauilion of rich cloth of gold, and diuerſe other tents and pauilions, in which were made fiers and perfumes for hir and ſuch ladies as were appointed to receiue hir: and from the tents to the parke gate of Greenewich, all the buſhes and firs were cut downe, and a large open waie made for the ſhew of all perſons. And firſt next to the parke pale on the eaſt ſide ſtood the merchants of the Stilliard, and on the weſt ſide ſtood the merchants of Genoa, Florence and Venice, and the Spaniards in cotes of veluet. Then on both ſides the waie ſtood the merchants of the citie of London, and the aldermen, with the councellors of the ſaid citie, to the number of a hundred and threeſcore which were mingled with the eſquiers; then the fiftie gentlemen penſioners: and all theſe were apparelled in veluet and chaines of gold, trulie accounted to the number of twelue hundred & aboue, beſide them that came with the king and hir, which were ſix hundred in veluet cotes and chaines of gold. Behind the gentlemen ſtood the ſeruingmen in good order well horſſed and apparelled, that who ſo euer had well viewed them, might haue ſaid, that they for tall and comelie perſonages, and cleane of lim and bodie, were able to giue the greateſt prince in chriſtendome a mortall breakefaſt, if he had beene the kings enimie.

The order of receiuing hir on Blackeheath.

About twelue of the clocke, hir grace with all the companie which were of hir owne nation, to the number of an hundred horſſe, accompanied with the dukes of Norffolke and Suffolke, the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and other biſhops, lords, and knights, which had receiued and conueied hir, came downe Shooters hill towards the tents, and a good ſpace from the tents met hir the earle of Rutland appointed lord chamberlaine to hir grace, ſir Thomas Deniſe hir chancellor, and all hir councellors and officers, amongſt whome doctor Daie (appointed to be hir almoner) made to hir an eloquent oration in Latine, preſenting to hir on the kings behalfe all the officers and ſeruants: which oration was anſwered vnto by the duke hir brothers ſecretarie, there being preſent: which doone the ladie Margaret Dowglas, daughter to the queene of Scots, the ladie marqueſſe Dorſſet, daughter to the French queene, being neeces to the king, and the dutches of Ritchmond the counteſſes of Rutland and Hereford, with diuers other ladies and gentlewomen, to the number of threeſcore and fiue, ſaluted and welcomed hir grace, who alighted out of hir chariot in the which ſhe had rid all hir long iournie, and with courteous demeanor and & louing countenance, gaue to them hartie thanks, and kiſſed them all, and after all hir councellors and officers kiſſed hir hand: which doone, ſhe with all the ladies entered the tents, and there warmed them a ſpace.

When the king knew that ſhe was arriued in hir tent, he with all diligence ſet out through the parke. And firſt iſſued the kings trumpets, then the kings officers ſworne of his councell, next after came the gentlemen of his priuie chamber, after them followed barons, the yoongeſt firſt, and ſir William Hollis lord maior of London rode with the lord Par that was the yoongeſt baron. Then followed the biſhops, and immediatlie after them the earles, and then the duke of Bauiere, and countie Palatine of the Rhine, with the liuerie of the Toiſon or golden fléece about his necke.

Then came the ambaſſadours of the French king and emperour, next to whome followed the lord priuie ſeale lord Cromwell, and the lord chancellour, then Garter king at armes, and the other officers and ſargeants of armes gaue their attendance on each ſide the lord. The lord marqueſſe Dorſet bare the ſword of eſtate, and after him a good diſtance followed the kings highneſſe, mounted on a goodlie courſer. To ſpeake of the rich and gorgeous apparell that was there to be ſéene that daie, I haue thought it not greatlie neceſſarie, ſith each man may well thinke it was right ſumptuous, and as the time then ſerued, verie faire and coſtlie, as they that are deſirous to vnderſtand the ſame may read in maiſter Halles chronicle more at large, which in this part I haue thought good to abridge.

The kings maieſtie on horſſebacke.

After the king followed the lord chamberleine, then came ſir Anthonie Browne maiſter of his horſſes, a goodlie gentleman, and of perſonage verie ſéemelie, richlie mounted, & leading the kings horſſe of eſtate by a long reine of gold. Then followed his pages of honour riding on great courſers, and laſtlie followed ſir Anthonie Wingfield capteine of the gard, and then the gard well horſſed, and in their rich cotes. In this order rode the king till he came to the laſt end of the ranke of the penſioners, & there euerie perſon that came with him placed himſelfe on the one ſide or the other, the king ſtanding in the middeſt.

who followed the king.

When hir grace vnderſtood that the king was come, ſhe came forth of hir tent, and at the doore thereof, being ſet on a faire and beautifull horſſe richlie trapped, ſhe rode forth towards the king, who perceiuing hir to approch, came forward ſomewhat beyond the croſſe on Blackheath, and there ſtaied till ſhe came néerer, & then putting off his cap, he made forward to hir, and with moſt louing countenance and princelie behauiour ſaluted, welcomed, and imbraced hir, to the great reioiſing of the beholders: and ſhe likewiſe not forgetting hir dutie, with moſt amiable aſpect and womanlie behauiour receiued him with manie apt words and thanks, as was moſt to purpoſe. Whileſt they were thus talking togither, the fiftie penſioners with the gard departed to furniſh the hall at Gréenewich. After the king had talked with hir a ſmall while, he put hir on his right hand, and ſo with their footmen they rode togither, and with their companies being thus met, returned in this manner through the rankes of the knights and eſquiers (which ſtood ſtill all this while and remooued not.)

The méeting of the king & the ladie Anne of Cleue on Blackeheath.

Firſt hir trumpets ſet forward being twelue in number, beſide two ketle drums on horſſebacke; then followed the kings trumpeters, then the kings councellors, then the gentlemen of the priuie chamber, after them the gentlemen of hir graces countrie in cotes of veluet, and all on great horſſes. Then the maior of London with the yoongeſt baron, then all the barons: next them the biſhops, then the earles, with whom rode the earles of Ouerſtein and Waldec hir countrimen, then the dukes of Norffolke and Suffolke; and the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and duke Philip of Bauier: next followed the ambaſſadors, then the lord priuie ſeale, and the lord chancellor, then the lord marqueſſe Dorſet that bare the ſword: next followed the king himſelfe equallie riding with the ladie Anne, and behind him rode ſir Anthonie Browne with the kings horſſe of eſtate, as yée haue heard, and behind him rode ſir John Dudleie maiſter of hir horſſes, leading hir ſpare horſſe trapped in rich tiſſue downe to the ground; after them followed henxmen and pages of honor.

The king and the ladie Anne ride togither.

Then followed the ladie Margaret Dowglas, the ladie marqueſſe Dorſet, the dutches of Richmond and Suffolke, the counteſſes of Rutland and Hertford, and other counteſſes. Then came hir chariot in which ſhe had rid all hir iournie, well carued and gilt with the armes of hir countrie curiouſlie wrought & couered with cloth of gold, all the horſſes were trapped with blacke veluet, and on them rode pages of honor, in which chariot rode two ancient ladies of hir countrie: next after the chariot, followed ſix ladies and gentlewomen of hir countrie verie beautifull and richlie apparelled, and with them rode ſix ladies of England. Then followed an other chariot, gilt and furniſhed, then ten Engliſh ladies, and next them an other chariot couered with blacke cloth, and therein rode foure gentlewomen that were hir chamberers. Then followed all the remnant of the ladies, gentlewomen and damoſels in great number: and laſt of all came an other chariot all blacke, with thrée launders apperteining to hir grace; next after followed an horſlitter of cloth of gold and crimſin veluet vpon veluet paled, with horſſes trapt accordinglie, which the king had ſent to hir. Then followed the ſeruingmen of hir traine, all clothed in blacke, mounted on great horſſes, euerie one in due place and decent order, ſo that it was verie magnificall and more than princelie brauerie that then was exhibited to the beholders eies, as the poet ſaith:

Hir chariot wherein ſhe rode all hir iourneie.

Cernitur hîc pluſquam regia pompa comes.

In this order they rode through the rankes and through the parke, till they came at the late friers wall, where all men alighted except the king, the two maiſters of the horſſe, and the henxmen, which rode to the hall doore, & the ladies rode to the court gate, & as they paſſed, they might behold on the wharfe, how the citizens of London were rowing vp and downe on the Thames right before them, euerie craft with his barge garniſhed with banners, flags, ſtreamers, pencels, and targets, painted and beaten with the kings armes, ſome with hir armes, and ſome with the armes of their craft and myſterie.

There was alſo a barge called the bachellors barks, richlie decked, on the which waited a foiſt that ſhot great péeces of artillerie, and in euerie barge was great ſtore of inſtruments of diuerſe ſorts, and men and children ſinging and plaieng altogither, as the king and the ladie Anne paſſed by on the wharfe. When the king and ſhe were within the vtter court, they alighted from their horſſes, and the king louinglie imbraced hir, kiſſed hir, & bad hir welcome to hir owne, leading hir by the left arme through the hall, which was furniſhed beneath the harth with the gard and aboue the harth with the fiftie penſioners, with their battell axes; and ſo the king brought hir vp to hir priuie chamber, where he left hir for that time. Aſſoone as the king and ſhe were entered the court, a great peale of artillerie was ſhot off from the tower of Gréenwich, and there about.

The king welcommeth hir to Gréenwich.

When the kings companie and hirs were once come within the parke(as before yée haue heard)then all the horſſemen on Blackeheath brake their araie, and had licence to depart to London or otherwhere to their lodgings.

The mariage is ſolemnized betwixt king Henrie & the ladie Anne of Cleue.

On the tueſdaie following, being the daie of the Epiphanie, the mariage was ſolemnized betwixt the king and the ſaid ladie. She was fetched from hir chamber by the lords, ſo that ſhe going betwéene the earle of Ouerſteine, and the grand maſter Hoſconder, which had the conduct and order to ſée the mariage performed, ſhe paſſed through the kings chamber & all the lords before hir, till ſhée came into the gallerie, where the king was readie, ſtaieng for hir, to whom ſhe made thrée low obeiſances and courteſies. Then the archbiſhop of Canturburie receiued them, and married them togither, and the earle of Ouerſteine did giue hir. When the mariage was celebrate they went hand in hand into the kings cloſet, and there hearing maſſe, offered their tapers, and after Maſſe was ended, they had wine and ſpices. And that doone, the king departed to his chamber, and all the ladies waited on hir to hir chamber, the duke of Norffolke going on hir right hand, and the duke of Suffolke on hir left.

After nine of the clocke, the king hauing ſhifted his apparell, came to his cloſet, & ſhe likewiſe in hir haire, & in the ſame apparell ſhe was married in ſhe came to hir cloſet with hir ſargeant at armes, & all hir officers before hir like a quéene, & ſo the king and ſhe went openlie in proceſſion, and offered and dined togither. After they had ſupped togither, there were bankets and maſkes, and diuerſe diſports ſhewed, till time came, that it pleaſed the king and hir to take reſt. On the ſundaie after were kept ſolemne iuſts, which greatlie contented the ſtrangers. This daie ſhe was apparelled after the Engliſh manner, with a French hood, which became hir excéeding well. When the earle of Ouerſteine and the other lords and ladies which had giuen their attendance on hir grace all that iourneie, had béene highlie feaſted and interteined of the king and other of the nobles, they tooke leaue, and had great gifts giuen to them, both in monie and plate, and ſo returned toward their countrie, leauing behind them the erle of Waldecke, and diuerſe gentlemen and damoſels to remaine with hir, till ſhe were better acquainted in the realme.

Iuſts and tornements.

The king and the ladie Anne remooue to weſtminſter.

The fourth of Februarie, the king and ſhe remooued to Weſtminſter by water, on whome the lord maior & his brethren, with twelue of the chéefe companies of the citie, all in barges gorgeouſlie garniſhed with baners, penons, and targets, richlie couered, and furniſhed with inſtruments, ſwéetlie ſounding, gaue their attendance: and by the waie, all the ſhips ſhot off, and likewiſe from the tower, a great peale of ordinance went off luſtilie. The twelfe of Februarie, the duke of Norffolke was ſent in ambaſſage to the French king, of whome he was well interteined, and in the end of the ſame moneth he returned againe into England.

S. Marie Oueries made a pariſh church.

After Chriſtmas, the priorie church of S. Marie Oueris in Southworke was purchaſed of the king by the inhabitants of the Borow, D. Gardener biſhop of Wincheſter putting to his helping hand: they made thereof a pariſh church, and the little church of Marie Magdalen ioining to the ſame priorie, was made all one church, and ſaint Margarets in Southworke a pariſh, was admitted to the ſame pariſh.

D. Barnes.

The third ſundaie in Lent, one doctor Barnes preched at Paules croſſe, and in his ſermon inueighed againſt the biſhop of Wincheſter, for doctrine by him preached in the ſame place, the firſt ſundaie of that Lent, intreating of iuſtification. Among other taunts that Barnes vttered againſt the biſhop, this was one, that if he & the biſhop were both at Rome, he knew that great ſums of monie would not ſaue his life, where but for the biſhop, there was no great feare, but ſmall intreatance would ſerue. The biſhop offended herewith, complained of Barnes to the k. and had him examined, & at length by the kings commandement he came to the biſhops houſe, where the matter was ſo handled at this time, that Barnes with two other preachers, the one named Hierome, and the other Garret (of whom hereafter more ſhall be ſaid)were appointed to preach at S. Marie ſpittle by London in the Eſter wéeke. In that ſermon which Barnes made before all the people, he aſked the biſhop forgiueneſſe, for ſpeaking ſo vnreuerentlie of him in his former ſermon, and required the biſhop (if he did forgiue him) in token thereof to hold vp his hand, which like as it was long before he did, ſo (as manie thought afterward) it was but a feigned forgiueneſſe.

Sir Iohn Shelton, ſir Nicholas Hare, ſir Humfreie Browne fraudulent lawiers puniſhed.

The twelfe of Aprill began a parlement, and ſir Nicholas Hare was reſtored to the office of ſpeaker, who togither with ſir Humfreie Browne knight, and William Conneſbie eſquier, the thrée and twentith of Februarie laſt paſt, had bin called before the lords into the Starchamber, for being of counſell with ſir Iohn Shelton knight, in making a fraudulent will of his lands, to the hinderance of the kings prerogatiue, and contrarie to the ſtatute of Anno 27, for the which offenſe they were all at that time diſmiſſed of their offices and ſeruices to the king, and the two knights were immediatlie ſent to the tower, and thrée daies after Conneſbie was committed thither alſo. They remained there in ward about ten daies, and were then deliuered. Sir Humfreie Browne was the kings ſargeant at law, ſir Nicholas Hare was one of the kings councellors, and ſpeaker of the parlement, who being then depriued, was now againe thereto reſtored. William Conneſbie was attorneie of the dutchie of Lancaſter. In this parlement, were fréelie granted without contradictions, foure fiftéenes and a ſubſidie of two ſhillings of lands, and twelue pence of goods, toward the kings great charges of making Bulworkes.

Aduancement of Thomas Cromwell.

The eightéenth of Aprill at Weſtminſter was Thomas lord Cromwell created earle of Eſſex, and ordeined great chamberleine of England, which office the earles of Oxford were woont euer to enioie; alſo Gregorie his ſonne was made lord Cromwell. The foure and twentith of Aprill, Thomas lord Audleie, & chancellor of England, with ſir Anthonie Browne, maiſter of the kings horſſes, were made knights of the right honourable order of the garter. On Maie daie, was a great triumph of iuſting at Weſtminſter, which iuſts had béene proclaimed in France, Flanders, Scotland, and Spaine, for all commers that would, againſt the challengers of England; which were, ſir Iohn Dudleie, ſir Thomas Seimer, ſir Thomas Poinings, ſir George Carew knights, Anthonie Kingſton, and Richard Cromwell eſquiers, which ſaid challengers came into the liſts that daie richlie apparelled, and their horſſes trapped all in white veluet, with certeine knights and gentlemen riding afore them, apparelled all in white veluet, and white ſarſenet, and all their ſeruants in white dublets, and hozen cut after the Burgonion faſhion: and there came to iuſt againſt them the ſaid daie, of defendants fortie ſix, the earle of Surrie being the formoſt, lord William Howard, lord Clinton, and lord Cromwell, ſonne and heire to Thomas Cromwell earle of Eſſex, and chamberleine of England, with other, which were richlie apparelled.

Sir Iohn Dudleie ouerthrowne.

And that day, ſir Iohn Dudleie was ouerthrowne in the field, by miſchance of his horſſe, by one maſter Breme defendant, neuertheleſſe he brake diuerſe ſpeares valiantlie after that. And after the ſaid iuſts were doone, the ſaid challengers rode to Durham place, where they kept open houſhold, and feaſted the king and quéene, with hir ladies, and all the court. The ſecond of Maie, Anthonie Kingſton & Richard Cromwell were made knights at the ſaid place. The third of Maie, the ſaid challengers did tournie on horſſebacke with ſwords, & againſt them came nine and twentie defendants; ſir Iohn Dudleie, and the earle of Surrie running firſt, who in the firſt courſe loſt both their gantlets: and that daie, ſir Richard Cromwell ouerthrew maſter Palmer in the field off his horſſe, to the great honor of the challengers. On the fift of Maie, the ſaid challengers fought on foot at the barriers, and againſt them came thirtie defendants, which fought valiantlie: but ſir Richard Cromwell ouerthrew that daie at the barriers maſter Culpeper in the field.

The ſaid challengers brake vp their houſhold, after they had kept open hoſpitalitie, and feaſted the king, quéene, and all the lords, beſide all the knights and burgeſſes of the common houſe in time of the parlement, and the maior, aldermen, and all their wiues to their no ſmall honor, though great expenſe. In the parlement which began the eightéenth of Aprill laſt paſt, the religion of ſaint Iohns in England, commonlie called the order of knights of the Rhodes, was diſſolued; & on the aſcenſion day, being the fift of Maie, ſir William Weſton knight, prior of ſaint Iohns departed this life for thought (as was reported) which he tooke to the heart, after he heard of that diſſolution of his order. ¶ For the king tooke all the lands that belonged to that order into his hands, to the augmentation of his crowne, and gaue vnto euerie of the challengers aboue written for a reward of their valiantneſſe, a hundred marks, and a houſe to dwell in of yearelie reuenues out of the ſaid lands for euer.]

The ſame moneth were ſent to the Tower doctor Samſon, biſhop of Chicheſter, and doctor Wilſon, for releeuing certeine traitorous perſons: and for the ſame offenſe was one Richard Farmer, a grocer of London, a rich and welthie man, and of good eſtimation in the citie, committed to the Marſhalſeie, & after at Weſtminſter hall arreigned, and atteinted in the premunire; ſo that he loſt all his goods. ¶ The ninth daie of Iulie, Thomas lord Cromwell, late made earle of Eſſex (as before you haue heard) being in the councell chamber, was ſuddenlie apprehended & committed to the Tower of London: the which manie lamented, but more reioiſed, and ſpeciallie ſuch as either had béene religious men, or fauoured religious perſons, for they banketed & triumphed togither that night, manie wiſhing that that daie had béene ſeuen yeares before; & ſome fearing that he ſhould eſcape, although he were impriſoned, could not be merie.

Abr.Fle. ex Ed.Hal.Ccxlij. The lord Cromwell committed to the Tower.

Other who knew nothing but truth by him, both lamented him, and heartilie praied for him. But this is true, that of certeine of the cleargie he was deteſtablie hated, and ſpeciallie ſuch as had borne ſwinge and by his meanes were put from it: for in déed he was a man that in all his doings ſéemed not to fauor anie kind of poperie, nor could not abide the ſnuffing pride of ſome prelats, which vndoubtedlie (whatſoeuer elſe was the cauſe of his death) did ſhorten his life, and procured the end that he was brought vnto: which was, that the nintéenth daie of the ſaid moneth he was atteinted by parlement, and neuer came to his anſwer: which law manie reported that he cauſed firſt to be made, howbeit the plaine truth thereof I know not. The articles for which he died appeare in the records, where his attaindor is written, which are too long here to be rehearſed; but to conclude he was there atteinted of hereſie and high treaſon, and the eight & twentith of Iulie was brought to the ſcaffold on the Tower hill, where he ſaid theſe words following.

The words of the lord Cromwell ſpoken at his death.

I Am come hither to die, and not to purge my ſelfe, as may happen ſome thinke that I will, for if I ſhould ſo doo, I were a verie wretch and a miſer. I am by the law condemned to die, and thanke my Lord God, that hath appointed me this death for mine offenſe. For ſince the time that I came to yeares of diſcretion I haue liued a ſinner, and offended my Lord God, for the which I aſke him hartilie forgiueneſſe. And it is not vnknowne to manie of you, that I haue béene a great traueller in the world, and being but of a baſe degrée, was called to high eſtate. And ſince the time I came thereunto, I haue offended my prince, for the which I aſke him hartilie forgiueneſſe, and beſéech you all to praie to God with me, that he will forgiue me. O Father forgiue me, O Sonne forgiue me, O Holie ghoſt forgiue me, O thrée perſons and one God forgiue me. And now I praie you that be here, to beare me record, I die in the catholike faith, not doubting in anie article of my faith, no nor doubting in anie ſacrament of the church. Manie haue ſlandered me, and reported that I haue béene a bearer of ſuch as haue mainteined euill opinions, which is vntrue: but I confeſſe, that like as God by his holie ſpirit dooth inſtruct vs in the truth, ſo the diuell is readie to ſeduce vs, and I haue béene ſeduced: but beare me witneſſe, that I die in the catholike faith of the holie church, and I hartilie deſire you to praie for the kings grace, that he may long liue with you in health and proſperitie, & after him that his ſonne prince Edward, that goodlie impe may long reigne ouer you. And once againe I deſire you to praie for me, that ſo long as life remaineth in this fleſh, I wauer nothing in my faith.

Then made he his praier, which was long, but not ſo long as godlie and learned, and after committed his ſoule to the hands of God, and ſo patientlie ſuffered the ſtroke of the ax, by a ragged and butcherlie miſer, which ill fauouredlie performed the office. This man being borne in Putneie, a village in Surreie by the Thames ſide, foure miles diſtant from London, was ſonne to a Smith, after whoſe deceaſſe, his mother was married to a Shereman. But notwithſtanding the baſeneſſe of his birth and lacke of maintenance was at the beginning (as it happeneth to manie others) a great let and hinderance for vertue to ſhew hir ſelfe: yet through a ſingular excellencie of wit, ioined with an induſtrious diligence of mind, and helpe of knowledge, gathered by painefull trauell, and marking the courſes of ſtates and gouernements as well of his natiue countrie at home, as in forren parties abrode, he grew to ſuch a ſufficient ripeneſſe of vnderſtanding and ſkill, in ordering of weightie affaires, that he was thought apt and fit for anie roome or office whereto he ſhould be admitted.

Thomas Cromwell in moſt authoritie vnder the king.

Which being perceiued of cardinall Wolſeie, then archbiſhop of Yorke, he tooke him into his ſeruice, and making him his ſolicitor, imploied him about buſineſſe oftentimes of moſt importance, wherein he acquited himſelfe with ſuch dexteritie, as anſwered alwaies the credit committed to him. After the cardinals fall, he was aduanced to the kings ſeruice, behauing himſelfe ſo aduiſedlie in matters which he tooke in hand, that within a ſmall time he roſe to high authoritie, and was admitted to be of the priuie councell, bearing moſt rule of all other vnder the king, as partlie ye haue heard: ſo that by him it well appeared, that the excellencie of heroicall vertues, which aduance men to fame and honor, reſteth not onelie in birth and bloud, as a priuilege appropriate and alonelie annexed vnto noble houſes, but remaineth at the diſpoſition of almightie God the giuer & diſpoſer of all gifts, who raiſeth the poore manie times from the baſeſt degree, and ſetteth him vp with princes, according to the ſaieng of Eccleſiaſtes:

Qui iacuit tetro quandóque in carcere vinctus,

Iohn Fox in the Acts and Monuments.

Neuertheleſſe, concerning the lord Cromwell earle of Eſſex, if we ſhall conſider his comming vp to ſuch high degree of honor as he atteined vnto, we maie doubt whether there be cauſe more to maruell at his good fortune, or at his worthie and induſtrious demeanor. But ſith in the booke of Acts and Monuments ye maie find a ſufficient diſcourſe hereof, we need not to ſpend more time about it, ſaue onelie as maſter Fox hath trulie noted, ſuch was his actiuitie and forward ripeneſſe of nature, ſo readie and pregnant of wit, ſo diſcreet and well aduiſed in iudgement, ſo eloquent of tong, ſo faithfull and diligent in ſeruice, of ſuch an incomparable memorie, ſo bold of ſtomach and hardie, and could doo ſo well with his pen, that being conuerſant in the ſight of men, he could not long continue vneſpied, nor yet vnprouided of fauor and helpe of friends, to ſet him forward in place and office.

Friſcobald an Italian, ſee Iohn Fox in the Acts and Monuments.

Thankefull he was and liberall, not forgetting benefits receiued, as by his great courteſie ſhewed to Friſcobald the Italian it well appeared: a fauourer of the poore in their ſutes, and readie to releeue them that were in danger to be oppreſſed by their mightie aduerſaries: a fauorer of the goſpell, and an enimie to the pride of prelates, verie ſtout, and not able well to put vp iniuries, which wan him ſhrewd enimies that ceaſſed not (as was thought) to ſeeke his ouerthrow, till at length they had brought to paſſe that they wiſhed. Carefull he was for his ſeruants, and readie to doo them good, ſo that fearing the thing which came to paſſe, he prouided well for the more part of them, notwithſtanding his fall. And thus much for the lord Cromwell. The morrow after Midſummer daie, the king cauſed the queene to remooue to Richmont, ſuppoſing it to be more for hir health, and more for hir pleaſure.

The mariage betwixt the king and the ladie Anne of Cleue adiudged vnlawfull.

The ſixt of Iulie, certeine lords came downe into the nether houſe, & expreſſelie declared cauſes, for the which the kings marriage was not to be taken lawfull: & in concluſion, the matter was by the conuocation cleerelie determined, that the king might lawfullie marrie where he would, and ſo might ſhe. And thus were they cleerelie diuorſed, and by the parlement it was enacted, that ſhe ſhould be taken no more for queene, but called the ladie Anne of Cleue. In this yeare, the lord Leonard Greie, brother vnto Thomas marqueſſe Dorſet, being the kings lieutenant in Ireland, was reuoked home, and vpon his comming to London was ſent to the Tower. In Iulie the prince of Salerne, and the lord Lois Dauola came into England to ſee the king, & after they were departed, don Frederike, marqueſſe of Padula, brother to the duke of Ferrara, the prince of Macedonie, the marqueſſe of Terra Noua, & monſieur de Flagie, with other, came from the emperors court into England to ſee the king, the which on Marie Magdalens daie came to the court at Weſtminſter, and after they had beene highlie feaſted, and noblie interteined, they were richlie rewarded as the other, and ſo departed.

The lord Hungerford executed for buggerie.

Execution of Barnes and others.

The eight and twentith of Iulie (as you haue heard before) the lord Cromwell was beheaded, and likewiſe with him the lord Hungerford of Heiteſburie, who at the houre of his death ſeemed vnquiet, as manie iudged him rather in a frenſie than otherwiſe: he ſuffered for buggerie. The thirteenth of Iulie were drawne on hurdels from the Tower to Smithfield, Robert Barns doctor of diuinitie, Thomas Garard, and William Ierom bachellors in diuinitie; Ierom was vicar of Stepnie, and Garard was perſon of Honie lane: alſo Powell Fetherſton, and Abell prieſts. The firſt three were drawne to a ſtake, there before ſet vp, and then burned. The other three were drawne to the gallowes, and hanged, beheaded and quartered. The three firſt (as is found in their atteindor) were executed for diuerſe hereſies, but none alledged, whereat (ſaith Hall) I haue much maruelled, that their hereſies were ſo manie, and not one alledged as a ſpeciall cauſe of their death. And verelie at their deaths they aſked the ſhiriffs what was their offenſe for which they were condemned. Who anſwered, they could not tell: but moſt men ſaid it was for preaching againſt the doctrine of Stephan Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter, who chieflie (as the ſame Hall ſaith) procured their deaths. The laſt three, to wit, Powell, Fetherſton, and Abell, ſuffered for treaſon, as in their atteindor was ſpeciall mention made, to wit, for denieng the kings ſupremacie, and affirming his mariage with the ladie Katharin Dowager to be good.

Thomas Empſon an obſtinate monke.

Execution for treaſon.

The fourth of Auguſt, Thomas Empſon ſometime a monke of Weſtminſter, which had beene in priſon for treaſon in Newgate now for the ſpace of three yeares and more, came before the iuſtices of gaole deliuerie at Newgate, and for that he would not aſke the kings pardon, nor be ſworne to be true to him, his monks garment was plucked from his backe, and he repriued, till the king were informed of his malicious obſtinacie: and this was the laſt monke that was ſeene in his clothing in England till queene Maries daies. The fourth of Auguſt were drawne from the Tower of London to Tiburne, Giles Heron gentleman, Clement Philpot gentleman, late of Calis, and ſeruant to the lord Liſle, Darbie Genning, Edmund Brindholme prieſt, chapleine to the ſaid lord Liſle, William Horne late a laie brother of the Charterhouſe of London, and an other offendor: which ſix perſons were there hanged and quartered, and had beene atteinted of treaſon by parlement. The ſame daie alſo was one Charles Carew gentleman hanged for robbing of the ladie Carew.

ter to the lord Edmund Howard ſhewed openlie as quéene at Hampton court. The eleuenth of September a ſtranger was hanged in Moore field, named James Kinatian, who had ſlaine his maiſter, one Capon a Florentine in a garden, for his harlot. In the latter end of this ſummer, was vniuerſallie through the moſt parts of this realme great death by a ſtrange kind of hot agues and fiures, and ſome peſtilence, in which ſeaſon was ſuch a drought, that wels and ſmall riuers were cleane dried vp, ſo that much cattell died for lacke of water, and the Thames was ſo ſhalow, & the freſh water of ſo ſmall ſtrength that the ſalt water flowed aboue London bridge, till the raine had increaſed the freſh waters.

A caſtell built at Ard.

Guiſnes fortified.

On the two and twentith of September, Raſe Egerton, ſeruant to the lord Audleie, lord chancellor, and one Thomas Harman ſeruant to one maſter Flightwood, were drawne, hanged, and quartered; the one for counterfeiting and antidating of the kings ſeale in a ſignet, wherewith he ſealed licences for denizens, vnder the name of the clearkes of the chancerie: and the other, that is to ſaie Harman, for writing them. One Tuckefield, being of their faction, robbed the lord Audleies chappell and fled, who being afterward apprehended at Calis, which towne he would haue betraied, he ſlue himſelfe with a dagger. In the end of this yeare, the French king made a ſtrong caſtell at Ard, and alſo a bridge ouer into the Engliſh pale, which bridge the crew of Calis did beat downe, and the Frenchmen built it vp againe, but the Engliſhmen beat it downe againe. After this, the K. ſent about fiftéene hundred workemen to fortifie the towne of Guiſnes, and ſent with them fiue hundred men of warre to gard them.

The earles of Surrie and Southampton ſent to Calis.

Richard Mekins burnt. Sée John Fox in the Acts & Monuments.

It was reported in France, that a mightie armie was come ouer forth of England with great ordinance: which brute cauſed the French king to ſend to the frontiers of Picardie the duke of Vandoſme, and other capteins with all ſpéed to defend the ſame. The king of England hearing thereof, ſent the earles of Surrie, and Southampton, and the lord Ruſſell, high admerall into the marches of Calis, to ſet order there, and after them he likewiſe ſent two hundred light horſſemen of the borders of Scotland, whom the Frenchmen called Stradiots. The lords hauing ſet order in things, ſhortlie returned. A boie, one Richard Mekins, not paſt fiftéene yeares of age, was burnt in Smithfield, for ſpeaking againſt the ſacrament, and contrarie to the ſtatute of the ſix articles. The biſhop of London was thought in great fault, for procuring that terrible execution, ſéeing the yong fellow was but an ignorant foole without learning, and gladlie recanted that wherewith he was charged.

Anno Reg. 33. A new rebellion practiſed in Yorkſhire.

Sir John Neuill executed.

The counteſſe of Saliſburie beheaded.

Execution of two of the gard.

About the latter end of this yeare, doctor Samſon biſhop of Chicheſter, and doctor Wilſon, which had béene committed to the tower (as before ye haue heard) were now pardoned of the king, and ſet againe at libertie. In the beginning of this yeare, fiue prieſts in Yorkeſhire began a new rebellion, with the aſſent of one Leigh, a gentleman, and nine temporall men, all which perſons were apprehended, and in diuers places put to execution. The ſaid Leigh and two other, the one named Taterſall a clothier, & the other Thornton a yeoman, on the ſeuentéenth of Maie, were drawne through London to Tiburne, and there executed. And ſir John Neuill knight, and ten other perſons, died for the ſame cauſe at Yorke. The ſame daie, Margaret counteſſe of Saliſburie, that had remained a long time priſoner in the tower, was beheaded there within the tower. She was the laſt of the right line and name of Plantagenet. The ninth of June for example ſake, two of the kings gard, the one named Damport, and the other Chapman, were hanged at Gréenwich by the friers wall, for robberies which they had committed.

Abr. Fl. ex I.S. pag. 1020.

Sir Edmund Kneuet arreigned for ſtriking in the court.

The order of euerie officer about that execution.

¶ On the tenth of June, ſir Edmund Kneuet knight, of Norffolke, was arreigned before the kings iuſtices (ſitting in the great hall at Gréenewich) maiſter Gage, comptrollor of the kings houſehold, maiſter Southwell, ſir Anthonie Browne, ſir Anthonie Winkefield, maiſter Wriſleie, and Edmund Peckham, cofferer of the kings houſhold, for ſtriking of one maiſter Clers of Norffolke, ſeruant with the earle of Surrie, within the kings houſe in the tenis court. There was firſt choſen to go vpon the ſaid Edmund, a queſt of gentlemen, and a queſt of yeomen, to inquire of the ſaid ſtripe, by the which inqueſts he was found giltie, and had iudgement to loſe his right hand. Wherevpon was called to doo the execution, firſt the ſergeant ſurgion with his inſtruments apperteining to his office: the ſergeant of the woodyard with the mallet, and a blocke wherevpon the hand ſhould lie: the maiſter cooke for the king, with the knife: the ſergeant of the larder, to ſet the knife right on the ioint: the ſergeant ferrer, with the ſearing irons to ſeare the veines: the ſergeant of the poultrie, with a cocke, which cocke ſhould haue his head ſmitten off vpon the ſame blocke, and with the ſame knife: the yeoman of the chandrie, with ſeare cloths: the yeoman of the ſkullerie, with a pan of fire to heate the irons, a chafer of water to coole the ends of the irons, and two formes for all officers to ſet their ſtuffe on: the ſergeant of the cellar, with wine, ale, and béere: the yeoman of the yewrie in the ſergeants ſtead, who was abſent, with baſon, ewre, and towels.

Iudgement vpon Kneuet to loſe his hand.

He is pardoned.

Thus euerie man in his office readie to doo the execution, there was called forth ſir William Pickering knight marſhall, to bring in the ſaid Edmund Kneuet; and when he was brought to the bar, the chiefe iuſtice declared to him his treſpaſſe, and the ſaid Kneuet confeſſing himſelfe to be giltie, humblie ſubmitted him to the kings mercie: for this offenſe he was not onelie iudged to loſe his hand, but alſo his bodie to remaine in priſon, and his lands and goods at the kings pleaſure. Then the ſaid ſir Edmund Kneuet deſired that the king of his benigne grace would pardon him of his right hand, and take the left, for (quoth he) if my right hand be ſpared, I maie hereafter doo ſuch good ſeruice to his grace, as ſhall pleaſe him to appoint. Of this ſubmiſſion and requeſt the iuſtices forthwith informed the king, who of his goodneſſe, conſidering the gentle heart of the ſaid Edmund, and the good report of the lords, granted him his pardon, that he ſhould loſe neither hand, lands, nor goods, but ſhould go frée at libertie.]

The lord Leonard Greie beheaded.

The lord Leonard Greie being indicted of certeine points of treaſon by him committed, as was alledged againſt him, during the ſeaſon that he was the kings lieutenant in Ireland, to wit, for deliuering his nephew Girald Fitzgerard brother vnto Thomas Fitzgerard before executed, and alſo for that he cauſed certeine Iriſhmen to inuade the lands of the kings friends, whome he fauoured not: on the fiue and twentith of June he was arreigned at Weſtminſter in the kings bench, and appointed to be tried by knights, becauſe he was a lord by name, and no lord of the parlement; but he diſcharged the iurie, and confeſſed the indictement, wherevpon he had iudgement, and on the eight and twentith of June being ſaint Peters euen, he was beheaded at tower hill, where he ended his life verie quietlie and godlie.

This noble man as he was come of high linage, ſo was he a right valiant and hardie perſonage, hauing in his time doone his prince and countrie good ſeruice, both in Ireland, France, and other places, greatlie to his commendation, although now his hap was thus to loſe his head, as conuicted by law, and his renowme (ouercaſt with a cloud of diſgrace) vaniſhed, as future chances befell, to the aboliſhing of the preſent honor which ſometime he inioied. Howbeit, his eſtimation he might haue preſerued vnblemiſhed, had prouident circumſpection vndertaken the direction of his doings, and that he had borne his eies in his forehead, to foreſée all afterclaps, which a wiſe man will in no caſe neglect:

Nam ſapiens in fronte oculos habet, omnia ſpectans,
Omnia prudenti cum ratione videns.

The true report of the cauſe whereupon the murther of Iohn Buſbrig inſued.

The ſame daie that he ſuffered, there was executed at ſaint Thomas Waterings thrée gentlemen, Iohn Mantell, Iohn Frowds, and george Roidon: they died for a murther committed in Suſſex (as their indictement imported) in companie of Thomas Fines lord Dacres of the ſouth. The truth whereof was thus. The ſaid lord Dacres, through the lewd perſuaſion of ſome of them, as hath béene reported, meaning to hunt in the parke of Nicholas Pelham eſquire at Laughton, in the ſame countie of Suſſex, being accompanied with the ſaid Mantell, Frowds, and Roidon, Iohn Cheinie and Thomas Iſleie gentlemen, Richard Middleton and Iohn Goldwell yeomen, paſſed from his houſe of Hurſtmonſeux, the laſt of Aprill in the night ſeaſon, toward the ſame parke, where they intended ſo to hunt; and comming vnto a place called Pikehaie in the pariſh of Hillingleie, they found one Iohn Buſbrig, Iames Buſbrig, and Richard Sumner ſtanding togither; and as it fell out through quarelling, there inſued a fraie betwixt the ſaid lord Dacres and his companie on the one partie, and the ſaid Iohn and Iames Buſbrig and Richard Sumner on the other: inſomuch that the ſaid Iohn Buſbrig receiued ſuch hurt, that he died thereof the ſecond of Maie next inſuing.

The lord Dacres arreigned before the lord Audleie.

Lord Dacres executed at Tiburne.

Whereupon, as well the ſaid lord Dacres as thoſe that were there with him, and diuerſe other likewiſe that were appointed to go an other waie to méet them at the ſaid parke, were indicted of murther: and the ſeauen and twentith of Iune the lord Dacres himſelfe was arreigned before the lord Audleie of Walden then lord chancellor, ſitting that daie as high ſteward of England, with other péeres of the realme about him, who then and there condemned the ſaid lord Dacres to die for that tranſgreſſion. And afterward the nine and twentith of Iune being ſaint Peters daie, at eleuen of the clocke in the forenoone, the ſhiriffs of London, accordinglie as they were appointed, were readie at the tower to haue receiued the ſaid priſoner, and him to haue lead to execution on the tower hill. But as the priſoner ſhould come forth of the tower, one Heire a gentleman of the lord chancellors houſe came, and in the kings name commanded to ſtaie the execution till two of the clocke in the afternoone, which cauſed manie to thinke that the king would haue granted his pardon. But neuertheleſſe, at thrée of the clocke in the ſame afternoone, he was brought forth of the tower, and deliuered to the ſhiriffs, who lead him on foot betwixt them vnto Tiburne, where he died. His bodie was buried in the church of ſaint Sepulchers. He was not paſt foure and twentie yéeres of age, when he came through this great miſhap to his end, for whome manie ſore lamented, and likewiſe for the other thrée gentlemen, Mantell, Frowds, and Roidon. But for the ſad yoong lord, being a right towardlie gentleman, and ſuch a one, as manie had conceiued great hope of better proofe, no ſmall mone and lamentation was made; the more indéed, for that it was thought he was induced to attempt ſuch follie, which occaſioned his death, by ſome light heads that were then about him.

The king goeth in progreſſe into Yorkeſhire.

Gifts giuen to him by them of Lincolneſhire.

Gifts giuen him by them of Yorkeſhire.

The firſt of Iulie a Welſhman a minſtrell was hanged and quartered for ſinging of ſongs, which were interpreted to be propheſies againſt the king. This ſummer the king tooke his progreſſe to Yorke, and paſſed through Lincolneſhire, where was made to him an humble ſubmiſſion by the temporaltie, and confeſſing their faults, they humblie thanked him for his pardon, which he had granted them. The towne of Stanford gaue to him twentie pounds, the citie of Lincoln fortie pounds, Boſton fiftie pounds, that part of the ſhire which is called Linſeie gaue thrée hundred pounds, and Keſterne and the church of Lincolne preſented him with fiftie pounds. At his entring into Yorkeſhire, he was met with two hundred gentlemen of the ſame ſhire, in cotes of veluet, and foure thouſand tall yeomen and ſeruing men well horſſed, which on their knées made their ſubmiſſion, by the mouth of ſir Robert Bowes, and gaue to the king nine hundred pounds. On Barneſdale the archbiſhop of Yorke, with thrée hundred prieſts and more met the king, and making a like ſubmiſſion, gaue to him ſix hundred pounds. The like ſubmiſſion was made by the maiors of Yorke, Newcaſtell, and Hull, and ech of them gaue to the king an hundred pounds.

Hull fortified.

Diram and Culpeper quéene Katharins paramours.

At Lincolne (ſaith Hall) in Auguſt, where ſhe gaue to him a rich cap and a chaine.

Quéene Katharine detected of incontinent liuing.

After he had béene at Yorke twelue daies, he came to Hull, where he deuiſed certeine fortifications. This doone, he paſſed ouer the water of Humber, and ſo through Lincolneſhire, returned toward the ſouth parts, and at Alhallowen tide came to Hampton court. About the ſame time, the king had knowledge that the quéene liued diſſolutelie, in vſing the vnlawfull companie of one Francis Diram, with whome ſhe had béene too familiar before hir maraiage with the king; & not meaning to forgo his companie now in time of hir marriage, without regard had either to the feare of God, or the king hir huſband, the laſt ſummer being in progreſſe with the king at Pomfret, the ſeuen and twentith of Auguſt, ſhe reteined the ſaid Francis Diram in hir ſeruice, to the intent ſhe might vſe his companie in ſuch vnlawfull ſort the more fréelie: and not ſatiſfied with him, ſhe alſo vſed the vnlawfull companie of Thomas Culpeper eſquire, one of the gentlemen of the kings priuie chamber, as well at Pomfret aforeſaid on the nine and twentith and laſt of Auguſt aforeſaid, and on the firſt of September, as at diuerſe other times and places before and after. Whereupon, the thirtéenth of Nouember, ſir Thomas Wriotheſleie knight the kings ſecretarie, came to Hampton court vnto the ſaid quéene, and called all hir ladies, gentlewomen, and ſeruants into hir great chamber, & there openlie in preſence of them all, declared hir offenſes committed in abuſing of hir bodie before hir mariage, & therwith he diſcharged hir houſhold. The morrow after ſhe was conueied to Sion, the ladie Bainton and certeine gentlewomen and ſome of hir ſeruants being appointed to wait vpon hir there, till the kings pleaſure might be further knowen. Culpeper, Diram, and others were had to the tower. Diram in his examination being charged with the familiaritie which had béene betwixt them, before ſhe was married to the king, confeſſed that he and the ſaid quéene had made a precontract togither, and that he concealed it for hir preferment in marriage to the king, after he vnderſtood the king began to caſt a liking towards hir.

The firſt of December, Culpeper and Diram were arreigned at the Guildhall in London, before the lord maior ſitting there in iudgement as chéefe iudge, hauing the lord chancellor vpon his right hand, and the duke of Norffolke vpon his left hand, the duke of Suffolke the lord priuie ſeale, the earles of Suſſex and Hereford, with diuerſe other of the councell ſitting there as iudges in commiſſion that daie: the priſoners in the end confeſſed the indictement, and had iudgement to die, as in caſes of treaſon.

Culpeper and Diram executed.

The tenth of December, the ſaid Culpeper and Diram were drawen from the tower vnto Tiburne and there Culpeper had his head ſtriken off, and Diram was hanged, diſmembred and headed. Culpepers bodie was buried in S. Sepulchers church, but both their heads were ſet on London bridge. The two and twentith of December were arreigned in the Kings bench at Weſtminſter, the ladie Margaret Howard, wife to the lord William Howard, Katharine Tilneie, & Alice Reſtwold gentlewomen, Ioane Bulmer, wife to Anthonie Bulmer gentleman, Anne Howard, wife to Henrie Howard eſquier, and brother to the late quéene, Malein Tilneie widow, Margaret Benet, wife to Iohn Benet gentleman, Edward Walgraue gentleman, William Aſhbie gentleman; all theſe were condemned of miſpriſion of treaſon, for concealing the quéenes miſdemeanour. And the ſame daie in the afternoone, the lord William Howard, and Damport a gentleman were likewiſe arreigned, and condemned of the ſame offenſe, and as well theſe as the other were adiudged to loſe their goods, & the profits of their lands during life, and to remaine in perpetuall priſon.

Attaindors.

A parlement.
1542

The petitiõs of the lords & commons of the parlement to the king.

The ſixtéenth of Ianuarie the parlement began at Weſtminſter, in the which the lords and commons exhibited certeine petitions to the king. Firſt, that he would not vex himſelfe with the quéenes offenſe, and that ſhe and the ladie Rochford might be attainted by parlement: and to auoid protracting of time, they beſought him to giue his roiall aſſent thereto, vnder his great ſeale, without ſtaieng for the end of the parlement. Alſo, that Diram and Culpeper before attainted by the common law, might alſo be attainted by parlement, & that Agnes duches of Norfolke, and Katharine counteſſe of Bridgewater hir daughter, which for concealing the ſaid offenſe, were committed to the towre, and indicted of miſpriſion, & the lord William Howard arreigned of the ſame, might likewiſe be attainted. Alſo, that who ſoeuer had ſpoken or doone anie thing in deteſtation of hir naughtie life, ſhould be pardoned.

The quéene and other attainted by parlement.

The quéene ſent to the towre.

To theſe petitions the king granted, thanking the commons, for that it appéered they tooke his griefe to be theirs: wherevpon the quéene and the ladie Rochford were attainted by both the houſes. On the tenth of Februarie, the quéene was conueied from Sion to the towre by water, the duke of Suffolke, the lord priuie ſeale, and the lord great chamberleine, hauing the conduction of hir. The next daie after being ſaturdaie, and the eleuenth of Februarie, the king did ſend his roiall aſſent by his great ſeale, and then all the lords were in their robes, and the common houſe called vp, & there the act was read, and his aſſent declared. And ſo on the thirtéenth daie, thoſe two ladies were beheaded on the gréene within the towre with an ax, where they confeſſed their offenſes, and died repentant.

She is beheaded.

The king proclamed king of Ireland.

Before this, on the thrée and twentith daie of Ianuarie was the king proclamed king of Ireland, as it was enacted both by authoritie of the parlement here, and alſo of an other parlement holden at Dublin in Ireland, there begun the thirtéenth of Iune laſt paſt, before ſir Anthonie Saintleger knight, and the kings deputie there, where as till that time the kings of England were onlie intituled lords of Ireland. In the beginning of March died ſir Arthur Plantagenet vicount Liſle, baſtard ſonne to Edward the fourth, in the towre of London vnattainted, when he ſhould haue béene deliuered and ſet at libertie.

The occaſion of ſir Arthur Plantagenets trouble.

The occaſion of his trouble for the which he was committed to the towre, roſe vpon ſuſpicion that he ſhould be priuie to a practiſe, which ſome of his men (as Philpot and Brindholme executed the laſt yeare as before ye haue heard) had conſented vnto, for the betraieng of Calis to the French, whileſt he was the kings lieutenant there. But after that by due triall it was knowne that he was nothing guiltie to the matter, the king appointed ſir Thomas Wriotheſlie his maieſties ſecretarie, to go vnto him, and to deliuer to him a ring, with a rich diamond for a token from him, & to will him to be of good chéere. For although in that ſo weightie a matter, he would not haue doone leſſe to him if he had béene his owne ſon; yet now vpon through triall had, ſith it was manifeſtlie proued that he was void of all offenſe, he was ſorie that he had béene occaſioned ſo farre to trie his truth: and therefore willed him to be of good chéere and comfort, for he ſhould find that he would make accompt of him as of his moſt true and faithfull kinſman, and not onelie reſtore him to his former libertie, but otherwiſe forth be readie to pleaſure him in what he could. Maſter ſecretarie ſet forth this meſſage with ſuch effectuall words, as he was an eloquent and well ſpoken man, that the lord Liſle tooke ſuch immoderate ioy thereof, that his hart being oppreſſed therwith, he died the night following through too much reioiſing. After his deceaſſe, the twelfe of the ſame moneth of March, ſir Iohn Audeleie ſonne and heire to the ſaid lord Liſles wife, was at Weſtminſter created vicount Liſle. ¶The ſeuentéenth of March one Margaret Dauie a yoong woman, being a ſeruant, was boiled in Smithfield for poiſoning of hir miſtres with whome ſhe dwelt, and diuerſe other perſons.

The lord Liſle dieth through immoderate ioy.

George Ferrers a burgeſſe of the parlement arreſted, and what miſchiefe inſued.

In the Lent ſeaſon, whileſt the parlement yet continued, one George Ferrers gentleman, ſeruant to the king, being elected a burgeſſe for the towne of Plimmouth in the countie of Deuonſhire, in going to the parlement houſe, was arreſted in London by a proceſſe out of the Kings bench, at the ſute of one White, for the ſum of two hundred markes or thereabouts, wherein he was late afore condemned, as a ſuertie for the debt of one Weldon of Saliſburie: which arreſt being ſignified to ſir Thomas Moile knight, then ſpeaker of the parlement, and to the knights and burgeſſes there, order was taken, that the ſargeant of the parlement, called S. Iohn, ſhould forthwith repaire to the counter in Bredſtréet (whither the ſaid Ferrers was caried) and there demand deliuerie of the priſoner.

The ſargeant (as he had in charge) went to the counter, and declared to the clearks there what he had in commandement. But they and other officers of the citie were ſo farre from obeieng the ſaid commandement, as after manie ſtout words they forciblie reſiſted the ſaid ſargeant, whereof inſued a fraie within the counter gates, betwéene the ſaid Ferrers and the ſaid officers, not without hurt of either part: ſo that the ſaid ſargeant was driuen to defend himſelfe with his mace of armes, & had the crowne thereof broken by bearing off a ſtroke, and his man ſtriken downe. During this brall, the ſhiriffes of London, called Rowland Hill, and Henrie Suckliffe came thither, to whome the ſargeant complained of this iniurie, and required of them the deliuerie of the ſaid burgeſſe, as afore. But they bearing with their officers, made little accompt either of his complaint or of his meſſage, reiecting the ſame contemptuouſlie, with much proud language, ſo as the ſargeant was forced to returne without the priſoner, wheras if they had obeied authoritie, and ſhewed the ſeruice neceſſarilie required in their office and perſon, they might by their diſcretion haue appeaſed all the broile, for wiſedome aſſuageth the outrage & vnreſtreinable furiouſnes of war, as the poet ſaith:

The ſhiriffes and officers denie the deliuerie of the burgeſſe.

Inſtrumenta feri vincit ſapientia belli.

The ſargeant thus hardlie intreated, made returne to the parlement houſe, and finding the ſpeaker, and all the burgeſſes ſet in their places, declared vnto them the whole caſe as it fell, who tooke the ſame in ſo ill part, that they altogither (of whome there were not a few, as well of the kings priuie councell, as alſo of his priuie chamber) would ſit no longer without their burges, but roſe vp wholie, and repaired to the vpper houſe, where the whole caſe was declared by the mouth of the ſpeaker, before ſir Thomas Audleie knight then lord chancellor of England, and all the lords and iudges there aſſembled, who iudging the contempt to be verie great, referred the puniſhment thereof to the order of the common houſe. They returning to their places againe, vpon new debate of the caſe, tooke order, that their ſargeant ſhould effſoones repaire to the ſhiriffe of London, and require deliuerie of the ſaid burgeſſe, without anie writ or warrant had for the ſame, but onelie as afore.

The ſpeaker of the parlement declareth all the matter to the lords.

And yet the lord chancellor offered there to grant a writ, which they of the common houſe refuſed, being in a cléere opinion, that all commandements and other acts of procéeding from the nether houſe, were to be doone and executed by their ſargeant without writ, onelie by ſhew of his mace, which was his warrant. But before the ſargeants returne into London, the ſhiriffes hauing intelligence how heinouſlie the matter was taken, became ſomwhat more mild, ſo as vpon the ſaid ſecond demand, they deliuered the priſoner without anie deniall. But the ſargeant hauing then further in commandement from thoſe of the nether houſe, charged the ſaid ſhiriffes to appéere perſonallie on the morrow, by eight of the clocke before the ſpeaker in the nether houſe, and to bring thither the clearks of the counter, and ſuch officers as were parties to the ſaid affraie, and in like manner to take into his cuſtodie the ſaid White, which wittinglie procured the ſaid areſt, in contempt of the priuilege of the parlement.

The ſhiriffes deliuer the burgeſſe and are charged to appéere before the ſpeaker.

Which commandement being doone by the ſaid ſargeant accordinglie, on the morrow the two ſhiriffes, with one of the clearks of the counter (which was the chiefe occaſion of the ſaid affraie) togither with the ſaid White, appéered in the common houſe, where the ſpeaker charging them with their contempt and miſdemeanor aforeſaid, they were compelled to make immediat anſwer, without being admitted to anie counſell. Albeit, ſir Roger Cholmeleie, then recorder of London, and other of the councell of the citie there preſent, offered to ſpeake in the cauſe, which were all put to ſilence, and none ſuffered to ſpeake, but the parties themſelues: wherevpon in concluſion, the ſaid ſhiriffes and the ſame White, were committed to the Tower of London, and the ſaid clearke (which was the occaſion of the affraie) to a place there called litle eaſe, and the officer of London which did the arreſt, called Tailor, with foure other officers to Newgate, where they remained from the eight & twentith vntill the thirtith of March, and then they were deliuered, not without humble ſute made by the maior of London & other their fréends.

The ſhiriffes committed to the Tower.

And for ſomuch as the ſaid Ferrers being in execution vpon a condemnation of debt, and ſet at large by priuilege of parlement, was not by law to be brought againe into execution, and ſo the partie without remedie for his debt, as well againſt him as his principall debter; after long debate of the ſame by the ſpace of nine or ten daies togither, at laſt they reſolued vpon an act of parlement to be made, and to reuiue the execution of the ſaid debt againſt the ſaid Welden which was principall debter, and to diſcharge the ſaid Ferrers. But before this came to paſſe, the common houſe was diuided vpon the queſtion: howbeit in concluſion, the act paſſed for the ſaid Ferrers, woone by fourtéene voices.

In act paſſeth for George Ferrers.

The king then being aduertiſed of all this procéeding, called immediatlie before him the lord chancellor of England and his iudges, with the ſpeaker of the parlement, and other of the graueſt perſons of the nether houſe, to whome he declared his opinion to this effect. Firſt commending their wiſedomes in mainteining the priuileges of their houſe (which he would not haue to be infringed in anie point) he alleged that he being head of the parlement, and attending in his owne perſon vpon the buſineſſe thereof, ought in reaſon to haue priuilege for him and all his ſeruants attending there vpon him. So that if the ſaid Ferrers had béene no burgeſſe, but onlie his ſeruant, yet in reſpect thereof he was to haue the priuilege as well as anie other.

Priuilege of a burgeſſe of the parlement or of anie ſeruant to ſuch like officers belonging.

For I vnderſtand (quoth he) that you not onelie for your owne perſons, but alſo for your neceſſarie ſeruants, euen to your cookes and horſſekéepers, inioie the ſaid priuilege; in ſomuch as my lord chancellor here preſent hath informed vs, that he being ſpeaker of the parlement, the cooke of the Temple was arreſted in London, and in execution vpon a ſtatute of the ſtaple. And for ſomuch as the ſaid cooke, during all the parlement, ſerued the ſpeaker in that office, he was taken out of execution, by the priuilege of the parlement. And further we be informed by our iudges, that we at no time ſtand ſo highlie in our eſtate roiall, as in the time of parlement, wherein we as head, and you as members, are conioined and knit togither into one bodie politike, ſo as whatſoeuer offenſe or iniurie (during that time) is offered to the meaneſt member of the houſe, is to be iudged as doone againſt our perſon, and the whole court of parlement. Which prerogatiue of the court is ſo great (as our learned councell informeth vs) as all acts and proceſſes comming out of anie other inferiour courts muſt for the time ceaſe and giue place to the higheſt.

And touching the partie, it was a great preſumption in him, knowing our ſeruant to be one of this houſe, and being warned thereof before, would neuertheleſſe proſecute this matter out of time, and therevpon was well worthie to haue loſt his debt (which I would not wiſh) and therefore doo commend your equitie, that hauing loſt the ſame by law, haue reſtored him to the ſame againſt him who was his debter. And if it be well conſidered, what a charge hath it béene to vs and you all, not onelie in expenſe of our ſubſtance, but alſo in loſſe of time, which ſhould haue béene imploied about the affaires of our realme, to ſit here welnigh one whole fortnight about this one priuat caſe, he may thinke himſelfe better vſed than his deſert. And this may be a good example to other to learne good maners, & not to attempt anie thing againſt the priuilege of this court, but to take their time better. This is mine opinion, and if I erre, I muſt referre my ſelfe to the iudgement of our iuſtices here preſent, and other learned in our lawes.

The king counted it preſumption to arreſt the burgeſſe.

Wher vpon ſir Edw. Montacute lord chiefe iuſtice, verie grauelie told his opinion, cōfirming by diuers reaſons all that the king had ſaid, which was aſſented vnto by all the reſidue, none ſpeaking to the contrarie. The act in déed paſſed not the higher houſe, for the lords had not time to conſider of it, by reaſon of the diſſolution of the parlement, the feaſt of Eaſter then approching. Bicauſe this caſe hath béene diuerſlie reported, and is commonlie alleged as a preſident for the priuilege of the parlement; I haue endeuored my ſelfe to learne the truth thereof, and ſo ſet

Anno Reg.34.

I lone.

This yeare in Maie the king tooke a lone of monie of all ſuch as were valued at fiftie pounds and vpward in the ſubſidie bookes. The lord priuie ſeale, the biſhop of Wincheſter, ſir Iohn Baker, and ſir Thomas Wriotheſleie were commiſſioners about this lone in London, where they ſo handled the matter, that of ſome head citizens they obteined a thouſand markes in preſt to the kings vſe. They that laid forth anie ſumme in this wiſe, had priuie ſeales for the repaiment thereof within two yeares next inſuing. Diuerſe of the Iriſh nobilitie came this yeare into England, and made their ſubmiſſion to the king as in the Iriſh chronicle it is more particularlie touched. Alſo wars fell out betwixt England and Scotland, the cauſes whereof (as appeereth by a declaration ſet forth by the king of England at this preſent) in effect were theſe. Firſt there were diuerſe of the Engliſh rebels, ſuch as had moued the commotion in the north and Lincolneſhire, that fled into Scotland, and were there mainteined: and although requeſt had beene made that they might be deliuered, yet it would not be granted.

Submiſſion of the Iriſh nobilitie.

The cauſes of the wars betwixt England & Scotland.

Moreouer, where the king of Scots had promiſed to repaire vnto Yorke the laſt yeare, and there to meet his vncle the king of England, wherevpon the king of England to his great charges had made preparation for their meeting there; the ſame was not onelie diſappointed, but alſo at the kings being at Yorke, in lieu thereof an inuaſion was made by the Scots, as it were in contempt and deſpite of the king of England, who notwithſtanding imputing the default of meeting to the aduiſe of his nephues councell, and the inuaſion to the lewdneſſe of his ſubiects, was contented to giue courteous audience vnto ſuch ambaſſadors as the ſame king of Scots ſent into England, which came to the king at Chriſtmas laſt, and with manie ſweet and pleaſant words excuſed that which was doone amiſſe, & ſought to perſuade kindneſſe and perfect amitie in time to come. And for the better accompliſhment thereof, they offered to ſend commiſſioners to the borders, there to determine the debate betwixt them of the confines, if it would pleaſe the king likewiſe to ſend commiſſioners for his part, which to doo he gratiouſlie condeſcended, deſirous to make triall of his nephue in ſome correſpondence of deeds, to the faire and pleaſant meſſages in words which he had receiued from him.

Herevpon commiſſioners were ſent from either king, the which met and talked. But where the Engliſhmen chalenged a peece of ground, vndoubtedlie vſurped by the Scots, being for the ſame ſhewed ſuch euidence as more ſubſtantiall, or more autentike can not be brought forth for anie ground within the realme; the ſame was neuertheleſſe by the Scots denied and reiected, onelie for that it was made (as they alleged) by Engliſhmen, and yet was it ſo ancient, as it could not be counterfeited now; and the value of the ground ſo little, and of ſo ſmall weight, as no man would attempt to falſifie a writing for ſuch a matter. But yet this deniall notwithſtanding, the Engliſh commiſſioners departed from the Scotiſh commiſſioners as freends, taking order, as hath beene accuſtomed, for good rule vpon the borders in the meane time to be obſerued.

The wilfull obſtinatneſſe of the Scotiſh commiſſioners.

After their departure, the lord Marwell warden of the weſt marches in Scotland, made proclamation in deed for good rule to be kept: but neuertheleſſe added therwith, that the borderers of Scotland ſhuld withdraw their goods from the borders of England, and incontinentlie after the Scotiſh borderers, on the fourth of Iulie entered into England ſoddenlie, & ſpoiled the kings ſubiects, contrarie to the league, and euen after the plaine maner of warre. Wherevpon the king of England greatlie maruelling, was driuen to furniſh his borders with a garriſon for defenſe of the ſame, as miſtruſting a further miſchiefe intended by the enimie, whoſe treacherie & looſe dealing became a whetſtone to the kings wrath, and ſet him in a heat of indignation, as the poet ſaith:

Iam Scotus Henrici iuſtam irritauerat iram Fœdifragus.

Iames Leirmouth.

Then was Iames Leirmouth maſter of the Scotiſh kings houſhold ſent into England with letters deuiſed in the beſt maner, offering a good redreſſe of all attempts: and yet neuertheleſſe at the entrie of the ſaid Leirmouth into England, a great number of Scots then not looked for, made a rode into England, to the great annoiance of the Engliſh borders, which dealing, though it much mooued the king of England to take diſpleaſure againſt the Scots, yet he gaue gentle audience to Leirmouth at his comming vnto him, and by his faire words and promiſes was partlie pacified. But in the meane time, the deeds of the Scotiſh borderers were as extreame as might be. And in a rode made by ſir Robert Bowes for reuenge thereof, the ſame ſir Robert, and manie other with him, were taken priſoners, and could not be deliuered, nor admitted to paie their fine and ranſome, as hath beene euer accuſtomed betwixt them on the borders.

King Henrie forced to take armes againſt the Scots.

And where at the ſame time, an aſſurance was made on both ſides for a ſeaſon, at the ſute of the ſaid Leirmouth, the Scots ceaſed not to make ſundrie inuaſions into England, in ſuch wiſe, as the king no longer truſting to their faire words, but weieng their deeds, put an armie in a readineſſe for defenſe of his ſubiects, as the due meane to atteine ſuch a peace, as for the ſafetie of his people and dominions, he thought it ſtood with his honour to procure. After which preparation made, and knowledge thereof had, the king of Scots made new ſute to haue the matter taken vp by treatie. Wherevpon the king cauſed the armie to ſtaie about Yorke, and appointed the duke of Norffolke his lieutenant generall, the lord priuie ſeale, the biſhop of Durham, & ſir Anthonie Browne maſter of his horſſes, to treat & conclude with the ambaſſadors of Scotland ſome friendlie peace, vpon reaſonable and indifferent conditions, as ſhould be thought requiſit, for the auoiding of warres, than by ſundrie inuaſions of the Scots made open and manifeſt. But after they had viewed ech others commiſſions, and began to propone articles, the Scotiſh commiſſioners to protract time, at the firſt ſeemed to like ſuch articles as the Engliſh commiſſioners had proponed, and made ſemblance as if there were no doubt, but that in caſe their king & ours might meet, all matters ſhuld be quietlie compounded and ended: and ſo taking it as for a thing ſure and certeine, they onlie deſired ſix daies to obteine anſwer from their maſter, and our armie for that time to ſtaie: wherevnto the Engliſh commiſſioners accorded.

The double dealing of the Scots in the negotiation about an agreement.

After thoſe ſix daies was ſent a commiſſion out of Scotland, to conclude a meeting preciſelie, at ſuch a place as they knew well could not in the winter ſeaſon be obſerued nor kept. Wherewith when the Engliſh commiſſioners ſeemed nothing content, the Scotiſh commiſſioners ſhewed forth inſtructions, wherein libertie was giuen to them to exceed their commiſſion in the appointing of a place, & to conſent to anie other by the Engliſh commiſſioners thought meet and conuenient. But when the Engliſh commiſſioners refuſed to deale with men wanting ſufficient commiſſion to warrant their doings, the Scotiſh commiſſioners required other ſix daies reſpit, to ſend for a larger commiſſion, which being granted, at the end of thoſe ſix daies, they brought forth a commiſſion made in good forme, and without exception or reſtraint of place: but therewith they ſhewed inſtructions conteining a like reſtraint, as in the former commiſſion was expreſſed. And thus driuing forth the matter by trifling, vpon purpoſe onelie to win time, they hoped thereby through the winter comming on, that the Engliſh armie ſhould not be able much to annoie their countrie for that yeare. And ſo their talke brake vp without anie concluſion of agréement at all; and forthwith was the armie ſet forward, a good part whereof had lien all this time of the treatie in Yorke, and in the countries thereabouts.

The Engliſh armie entreth into Scotland.

When the whole power was aſſembled, the duke of Norffolke then lieutenant generall, accompanied with the earles of Shrewſburie, Derbie, Cumberland, Surreie, Hertford, Angus, Rutland, and the lords of the north parts, and ſir Anthonie Browne maſter of the horſſes, ſir John Gage controllor of the kings houſe, and others, hauing with them twentie thouſand men well and warlike appointed, entred Scotland the one and twentith of October, and tarried there eight daies, without hauing anie battell offered vnto them, in which ſpace they burnt theſe townes and villages, Paxton, Ramrige, Stine, Gradin, Shilles, lang Ednem, Newton, Skitſhell, Newthorne, Smellem ſpittle, the two Merdens, Sledericke, and the two Broxlawes, Floris, and the Faire croft, Ednem ſpittle, Roxborough, Kelſeie and the abbeie, long Spronſtow, Riden, and Hadenſton. For they had determined with fire and ſword to take vtter reuenge, crieng out, as the poet ſaith;

Vindice ferro opus eſſe, opus eſſe & vindice flamma,
Acclamant omnes.

Now while the duke was at Farnton, the fourth daie after his comming into Scotland, there came to ſpeake with him halfe a mile from the campe, the biſhop of Orkeneie, and James Leirmouth ſent from the king of Scots to intreat of peace, but they agréed not. Finallie, after the Engliſhmen had lien ſo long within Scotland as they might recouer vittels, at length for neceſſitie they returned to Berwike. In all which iourneie the ſtandard of the earle of Southampton, late lord priuie ſeale (which died at Newcaſtell before their entring into Scotland) was borne in the fore-ward, becauſe he was appointed capteine of the ſame.

An armie of Scots inuade England.

The king of Scots, hearing that the Engliſh armie was returned, raiſed a power of fiftéene thouſand men forth of all parts of his realme, vnder the guiding of the lord Maxwell (or rather of Oliuer Sincler, as the Scots affirme) boaſting to tarrie as long in England, as the duke of Norffolke had tarried in Scotland. And ſo on fridaie being ſaint Katharins euen, they paſſed ouer the water of Eſke, and burnt certeine houſes of the Greues on the verie border. Thomas baſtard Dacres, with Jacke of Muſgraue ſent word to ſir Thomas Wharton lord Warden for the king vpon the weſt marches, to come forward to ſuccour them. But in the meane while the Scots entring verie fiercelie, the aforeſaid two valiant capteins, baſtard Dacres and Muſgraue, manfullie ſet vpon the Scots with one hundred light horſſes, and left a ſtale on the ſide of a hill, wherewith the Scots were wonderfullie diſmaied, thinking that either the duke of Norffolke with his whole armie had béene come to thoſe weſt marches, or that ſome other great power had béene comming againſt them, when they ſaw onelie ſir Thomas Wharton with thrée hundred men marching forward toward them. But ſo it fortuned at that time vndoubtedlie, as God would haue it, that the Scots fled at the firſt brunt, whome the Engliſhmen followed, and tooke priſoners at their pleaſure; for there was ſmall reſiſtance, or none at all ſhewed by the Scots.

Scotiſh lords taken at Solem Moſſe.

Amongſt others that were taken, we find theſe men of name, the earle of Caſſill and Glencarne, the lord Maxwell admerall of Scotland, and warden of the weſt marches, the lord Fleming, the lord Sumerwell, the lord Oliphant, the lord Greie, ſir Oliuer Sincler the kings minion, John Roſſe lord of Gragie, Robert Erſkin ſon to the lord Erſkin, Carre lard of Gredon, the lord Maxwelles two brethren, John Leſleie baſtard ſon to the earle of Rothus, George Hume lard of Hemitton, John Mateland lard of Wike caſtell, James Pringell, James Sincler brother to Oliuer Sincler, John Carmell capteine of Craſforth, Patrike Hebborne eſquire, John Seton eſquire ſon in law to the lord Erſkin, William Seton eſquire, John Steward couſin to the king, John Morrowe eſquire, Henrie Droumont eſquire, James Mitton eſquire, John Cormurth eſquire capteine of Gainſforth, James Milton eſquire, and other eſquiers and gentlemen (beſide the earles and lords before mentioned) to the number of two hundred and aboue, and more than eight hundred other perſons of meaner calling; ſo that ſome one Engliſhman, yea ſome women had thrée or foure priſoners. They tooke alſo foure and twentie péeces of ordinance, foure carts laden with ſpeares, and ten pauilions, with other things of price; ſo that this might well be ſaid to be the handie worke of God, and the verſe of the pſalme verified:

The death of the king of Scotland.

The king of Scots tooke ſuch griefe and inward thought for his ouerthrow, and alſo for the murther of an Engliſh herald that was ſlaine at Dunbar, by one Léech an Engliſhman (the which for the rebellion in Lincolnſhire was fled into Scotland) that he fell into a hot ague, and thereof died, although manie reported that he was at the bickering, and receiued there his deaths wound, and fled therewith into Scotland. But of his death, and of the birth of his daughter ye may ſée more in the hiſtorie of Scotland.

Of theſe priſoners before named, one and twentie of them were brought to London, and on the ninetéenth of December entred into the citie by Biſhops gate, and ſo were conueied to the tower, where they remained for the ſpace of two daies: and vpon ſaint Thomas daie the apoſtle, being the one and twentith of December, they were conueied to Weſtminſter, ſir John Gage conſtable of the tower riding before them, and the lieutenant of the ſame tower riding behind them. They rode two and two togither, and eight of them being earls and lords, had new gowns of blacke damaſke furred with blacke conie, cotes of blacke veluet, and doublets of ſattin, with ſhirts and other apparell bought new for them at the kings charges.

Scots priſoners brought to London.

The Scots priſoners before the councell in the Starchamber.

Thus being ſolemnelie conueied through the ſtréets of London vnto Weſtminſter, they came before the councell ſitting in the Starchamber, and there the lord chancellor declared to them their vntruth, vnkindneſſe, and falſe diſſimulation, declaring further how the king had cauſe of war againſt them, both for denieng of their homages, and alſo for their traitorous inuaſions made into his realme without defiance, and for kéeping his ſubiects priſoners without redemption, contrarie to the ancient laws of the marches; for which doings, God (as they might perceiue) had ſcourged them. Howbeit the K. more regarding his honor than his princelie power, was content to ſhew them kindneſſe for vnkindneſſe, and right for wrong. And although he might keepe them in ſtreict priſon by iuſt law of armes, yet he was content that they ſhould haue libertie to be with the nobles of his realme in their houſes, and ſo according to their eſtates, they were appointed to dukes, earles, biſhops, knights, and gentlemen, which ſo interteined them, that they confeſſed themſelues neuer to be better vſed, nor to haue had greater chéere in all their life times.

The earle of Caſſils was appointed to be with the archbiſhop of Canturburie, the earle of Glencarne with the duke of Norffolke, the lord Fleming with the lord priuie ſeale, the lord Marwell with ſir Anthonie Browne, the lord Sumerwell with the lord chancellor, the lord Oliphant with ſir Thomas Lée, Oliuer Sincler with the duke of Suffolke, Robert Erſkin with the biſhop of Weſtminſter, the lord Mouteth with ſir Antonie Wingfield, the lord Monketh with ſir Raſe Sadler, George Hume with the earle of Hertford, the lord of Gragie with ſir Thomas Cheincie, the lard of Gredon with maiſter Goſtwike, Henrie Marwell with ſir Richard Long, Thomas Craiford with ſir Arthur Darcie, Patrike Hebborne with ſir Thomas Wriotheſleie, Iames Pringell with ſir Richard Rich, Iohn Matland with ſir Edward North, the lord Greie, Iames Sincler, and Iohn Liſleie, were appointed to men of ſuch credit, as were thought méet to anſwer for their ſafe kéeping.

The two and twentith of December, tidings came of the king of Scots death, and vpon S. Iohns daie in Chriſtmas wéeke the foreſaid lords of Scotland were brought to the court, which was then at Gréenwich, where they had great cheare, and went before the king to the chappell, and were lodged within the court. Herevpon ye muſt conſider, that whereas the king of Scots had left no iſſue behind him in life but onelie one daughter, the king and his councell perceiuing a meane now offered, whereby without warre the two realmes might be vnited, theſe Scottiſh lords hauing firſt made the motion themſelues, for a mariage to be had betwixt prince Edward and their yong quéene, the king required their helpe vnto the furtherance of that matter, which might be a great benefit to themſelues & their countrie. This they promiſed faithfullie to doo, and aſwell by themſelues as by their friends, to bring the ſame to effect, ſo much as the king could require. Wherevpon the king was not onelie contented to releaſe them home, but alſo highlie rewarded them with rich and coſtlie gifts of ſundrie ſorts, in moſt bountifull wiſe, as Anglorum prælia noteth verie well, ſaieng:

A motion of a mariage betwéene prince Edward and the yong Scottiſh quéene.

Præterea ex auro captiuos torquibus ornat,
Et ſumptum, veſtes, argentum donat & aurum.

The thirtith of December they departed from the court, and the morrow after, eight of them dined with ſir Iohn Cotes then lord maior of London, and the reſt with the ſhiriffes, and had verie great cheare. On Newyeares daie they departed from London homewards towards Scotland, and rode to Enfield to ſée the prince, and there dined that day, greatlie reioiſing, as by their words and countenance it ſéemed, to behold ſo proper and towardlie an impe. From thence they kept on their iournie till they came to the north parts, where they found the duke of Suffolke the kings lieutenant there, and with him remained till ſuch pledges were come forth of Scotland, as it was couenanted they ſhould leaue behind them.

The Scots depart into their owne countrie.

The duke then after he had receiued the hoſtages, permitted them to depart, and ſo they returned into Scotland, where they were gladlie welcomed by their kinſmen and friends. With them went alſo the earle of Angus, who had béene baniſhed Scotland, and hauing remained here in England a long time, receiued of the kings fée, a thouſand marks by yeare; and likewiſe his brother ſir George Dowglas, who had fiue hundred markes yearelie likewiſe of the kings gift. They were now both reſtored home into their countrie, and that (as was ſaid) by the kings laſt will. The ſaid earle of Angus, and diuerſe of the lords that had béene priſoners here in England, were made of the priuie councell of the realme by the earle of Arraine, that was choſen gouernour to the yong quéene, and of the realme, as next heire apparent: notwithſtanding that the archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews, and cardinall of the ſée of Rome, enimie mortall vnto the king of England for the popes cauſe (and partlie ſet on by the French king) had forged a will, expreſſing how the king had made him gouernour (aſſociat with two earles of his affinitie) as well of the quéene as realme, contrarie to the lawes of Scotland. Wherevpon the ſaid earle of Arraine, according to his right (as he pretended) with the helpe of his friends, tooke vpon him the authoritie of gouernor, and put the ſaid cardinall in priſon, and deliuered ſir Robert Bowes, and the other Engliſh priſoners, by their bonds, according to the cuſtome of the marches.

All this yeare was neither perfect peace nor open warre betwixt England and France, but the merchants ſhips were taken and robbed on both parts; and at length merchants goods were ſeized, and the ambaſſadors of both realms ſtaied. Howbeit, ſhortlie after the ambaſſadors were deliuered; but the merchants ſtill were robbed, and no warre proclamed. In the end of this yeare came from the gouernor of Scotland as ambaſſadors, ſir William Hamilton, and Iames Leirmouth the ſecretarie of Scotland, whoſe meſſage was ſo meanlie liked, that they were faine to ſend an herald into Scotland for other ambaſſadors, and ſo came hither the earle of Glencarne, and ſir George Dowglas: but whatſoeuer their anſwer was, ſir George returned in poſt, and within twentie daies came backe againe with an anſwer that was well liked of. But ſhortlie after they brake promiſe, and went from that which they had couenanted, greatlie to their reproch.

Ambaſſadors from Scotland.

Wood was ſold verie deare in the winter ſeaſon of this yeare, and likewiſe vittels both fleſh and fiſh grew to an high price towards the ſpring, by reaſon (as was thought) of the vntemperate wet ſummer laſt paſt, cauſing great death among cattell. A quarter of mutton was ſold for two ſhillings, or ſeuen grotes, a lambe at thrée ſhillings, or thrée and foure pence, which afore that time was eſtéemed ſcarſe worth ſixtéene pence. Againſt Eaſter at a court of aldermen kept in the Guildhall the twentith of March 1542, it was enacted by the lord maior and his brethren, that the maior and ſhiriffs ſhould be ſerued at their tables but with one courſe at dinner and ſupper in their houſes; the maior to haue but ſeuen diſhes at the moſt at one meſſe for his owne table, and the ſhiriffs and euerie other alderman but ſix diſhes, vpon paine to forfeit for euerie diſh fortie ſhillings at euerie time when they offended in this ordinance. Alſo that the ſargeants and yeomen of their houſes ſhould haue but thrée diſhes at dinner or ſupper, the ſwordbearers meſſe onlie excepted, which ſhould be allowed to haue one diſh more. It was alſo enacted, that from the feaſt of Eaſter then next inſuing, neither the maior nor his brethren ſhould buie anie crane, ſwan, or buſtard, vpon paine to forfeit for euerie foule by them ſo bought, twentie ſhillings, the offenſe to be tried by oth, if it ſhould be preſented.

king and the emperour at Hampton court, either of them to be friends to the others friends, and enimies to the others enimies. ¶ In this yeare alſo a proclamation was made, whereby the people were licenced to eate whit meats in Lent, but ſtreitlie forbidden the eating of fleſh. Wherevpon ſhortlie after the earle of Surrie, with diuerſe lords, knights, and gentlemen, were impriſoned for eating of fleſh in the ſame Lent, contrarie to the ſaid proclamation. The eight of Maie, one Léech, ſometimes bailie of Louth, who had killed Summerſet one of our heralds of armes at Dunbar in Scotland, was drawne to Tiburne, and there hanged and quartered. And the twelfe of Iune, Edward Léech his brother, and with him a prieſt, for the ſame fact were likewiſe executed at Tiburne.

This yeare the firſt caſt péeces of iron that euer were made in England, were made at Buckeſtéed in Suſſex, by Rafe Hoge, and Peter Bawd.] The third of Iune came to the court from the realme of Ireland, thrée Iriſh lords, Obrin, Macke William a Burgh, and Macke Gilpatrike. In Iulie the ſaid Obrin was created earle of Towmon, Macke William a Burgh, earle of Claurickford, and ſir Dunon Obrin was made baron of Ebrankie, and ſo with rewards they tooke leaue and returned. The ſame moneth alſo, the Scotiſh ambaſſadors returned with great rewards. In the parlement holden this yeare at Weſtminſter, a ſubſidie was granted to the king, to be paied in thrée yeares. Euerie Engliſhman being woorth in goods twentie ſhillings & vpward to fiue pounds, paied foure pence of euerie pound. From fiue pounds to ten pounds, eight pence. From ten pounds to twentie pounds, ſixtéene pence. From twentie pounds and vpward, of euerie pound two ſhillings. Strangers as well denizens as other, being inhabitants, doubled this ſumme: and euerie ſtranger not being an inhabitant, that was ſixtéene yéeres of age and vpwards, paid foure pence for euerie poll. And for lands, fées, and annuities, euerie one borne within the kings dominions, paid eight pence of the pound, from twentie ſhillings to fiue pounds. And from fiue pounds to ten pounds, ſixtéene pence. From ten pounds to twentie pounds, two ſhillings. And from twentie pounds and vpwards, thrée ſhillings; ſtrangers ſtill doubling this ſumme. The cleargie granted a ſubſidie of ſix ſhillings the pound, to be paied of their benefices in perpetuities in thrée yeares inſuing: and euerie prieſt hauing no perpetuitie, but an annuall ſtipend, paid yearelie (during the ſaid thrée yeares) ſix ſhillings and eight pence.

Corporations, fraternities, & cōmunalties paid more as well of their lands as goods as appeareth by the ſtatute.

Articles demanded of the French king.

About the ſame time, the king and the emperour ſent Garter and Toiſon Dor, kings at armes, to demand the performance of certeine articles of the French king, which if he denied, they were commanded then to defie him, but he would not ſuffer them to come within his land, & ſo they returned. Wherevpon the king cauſed the ſaid demands to be declared to the French ambaſſador at Weſtminſter. And in Iulie the king ſent ouer ſix thouſand men, vnder the leading of ſir Iohn Wallop, appointed to haue the generall conduction of them, accompanied with diuerſe other knights, eſquiers and gentlemen right hardie and valiant. Sir Thomas Seimer was marſhall of that armie, ſir Robert Bowes treaſuror, ſir Richard Cromwell capteine of the horſſemen, and ſir George Carew his lieutenant. There were likewiſe ſir Thomas Palmer, ſir Iohn Reinſforth, ſir Iohn ſaint Iohn, and ſir Iohn Gaſcoigne, knights, that were capteines of the footmen. They were appointed to ioine with the emperours power, and ſo to make warre into France. They departed from Calis the two and twentith of Iulie. The third of Auguſt open warre was proclamed in London betwixt the emperour and the king of England on the one part, and the French king on the other, as enimie mortall to them both, and to all other chriſtian princes beſide, as he that had confederated himſelfe with the Turke.

The armie that was ſent ouer vnder the leading of ſir Iohn Wallop, paſſed foorth from the marches of Calis, and kéeping alongſt betwixt the borders of the French and Burgonion pales and confines, and ioining with the emperors forces, Spaniards, Wallons, and Dutch, came at length before Landerſeie, a towne latelie fortified by the French, within the borders of the emperors dominions, to the which they laid a ſtrong ſiege. At length the emperour hauing diſpatched his wars againſt the duke of Cleue, who had ſubmitted himſelfe vnto him, came now to the ſiege of Landerſeie, with a mightie power of ſundrie nations, ſo that the towne was ſore conſtreined and in danger to haue béene loſt, if at that preſent the French king had not likewiſe with an huge armie of Frenchmen, Switzers, Lantſquenets, Italians, and others, come to the reſcue, pitching downe his campe, making countenance as if he ment preſentlie to giue battell: and verelie it was thought that two ſuch powers as were there at that time ſo néere togither, ſhould neuer haue departed without battell. The emperor thinking ſuerlie to fight, raiſed his ſiege, and drew his people into the field. The Frenchmen thereby eſpieng their aduantage, put as well freſh men as vittels, and all kind of munition neceſſarie into the towne, and in the meane while kept the emperours people occupied with hot ſkirmiſhes.

Landerſeie beſieged.

The French king commeth to the reſcue of Landerſeie.

But now after the towne was thus reléeued, which thing the French king onelie wiſhed to accompliſh, the next daie when the emperor was readie with his armie ranged in battell to haue fought with his aduerſaries, the French king put his armie alſo in order; but hauing no mind to come forward, he trifled foorth that daie, and in the night following, ſecretlie departed with as much haſte as was poſſible. When the next morning had diſcouered the Frenchmens flight (for manie ſo termed this their ſudden retire) it was no néed to bid diuerſe troops of the emperours armie to hie after them: but ſome made too much haſte. For the French king ſuſpecting what would inſue, appointed his eldeſt ſonne Henrie the Dolphin to remaine behind with the rereward, accompanied with diuerſe noble capteins, which ordered their people in their retire with ſuch warineſſe and héedfull ſkill, as the reaſon of warre required, that ſuch of the emperours campe as aduentured ouer raſhlie, and ſhewed themſelues more forward than wiſe, fell within danger of ſuch ambuſhments as were by the waie couertlie laid in places of aduantage: and ſo diuerſe were taken, as ſir George Carew, ſir Thomas Palmer knight porter of Calis, Edward Bellingham, and others. But neuertheleſſe a great number of ſuch Frenchmen as could not make waie, and kéepe paſe with their maine troops, were ſnapped vp, ſlaine, and taken in no ſmall numbers by their enimies, who followed them as egre as tigers, and as the deſcriber of that purſute ſaith:

The French king retireth backe with his armie.

Imbuit & gladios manante cruore Britannus.

This was after Alhalowentide, ſo that now by reaſon the winter was farre entred, and the weather waxing extreame foule, and contrarie to an armie that ſhould lie in the fields, the emperour brake vp his his campe and licenced the moſt part of his people to depart home into their countries, for all hope to win Landerſeie at that time was cleane cut off, ſith it was vittelled and newlie furniſhed with freſh men and munition. After that the warres were once open betwixt England and France, ſundrie enterpriſes were attempted by the parties on either ſide in the marches of Calis and Bullognois, in which, for the moſt part, the Engliſhmen got the vpper hand of their enimies.

At one time the Frenchmen, to the number of eight hundred, comming in the night ſeaſon to enter into the Engliſh pale by the turne pike at Hammes, in purpoſe to make ſome ſpoile in the countrie there, were aſſailed vpon the ſudden by ſir George Summerſet, and ſir William Walgraue, latelie before come ouer with two hundred men out of Suffolke, to ſtrengthen the Engliſh pale againſt the enimies, and at this time did behaue themſelues ſo valiantlie, that they diſappointed the enimies of their purpoſe. For whereas they were entered into a lane incloſed with hedges on either ſide, ſixteene archers getting into the grounds on the backe ſide of the hedges lieng alongſt the lane, through which the Frenchmen were marching, placed themſelues as they ſaw their aduantage, and ſo beſtowed their ſhot, that they galled the Frenchmen in ſuch wiſe, that they were forced to recule in ſo great diſorder, that other of the Engliſhmen comming vpon them, eaſilie ſlue and tooke of them no ſmall number.

Beſide this, at ſundrie times the Engliſhmen inuading the countrie of Bullognois, waſted the townes and villages, brought awaie great booties of goods and cattell, to the great impoueriſhing of the countrie. They burnt at one time the towne of Audinghen, and tooke the ſteeple of the church there, into the which were fled ſix ſcore pezzants with their wiues and children, whome the Engliſhmen threw downe headlong out of the ſteeple, bicauſe they had moſt ſtubbornelie refuſed to yeeld. In this yeare a great death of the peſtilence reigned in London, and therefore Michaelmaſſe terme was adiourned to S. Albons, and there kept till the end thereof. The eighteenth of December the archbiſhop of Canturburies palace at Canturburie was burnt, and therin was burnt his brother in law, and other men.

A great death in London.

Ambaſſadors from the emperour.

In Chriſtmaſſe weeke came to the king lieng at Hampton court, Ferdinando Gonzaga viceroie of Sicilie, prince of Malfeta, duke of Iuano, the emperours capteine generall. The chiefeſt cauſe of his comming was, to appoint what time the emperours armie ſhould be readie to inuade France. He had great cheere, and at his departure was rewarded with a hundred and fiftie three ounces of gold in plate, and foure thouſand and three ounces in guilt plate, all verie curiouſlie wrought, and all the time of his being here, his charges were borne by the king. The ſundaie before Chriſtmas, the lord William Par brother to the queene, who had married the daughter & heire of Henrie Bourchier erle of Eſſex, at Hampton court was created earle of Eſſex, & ſir Will. Par knight vncle to them both, was made lord Par of Horton, & chamberleine to the queene.

I. Stow 1005.

On New yeares daie, was ſir Thomas Wriotheſleie the kings ſecretarie made lord Wriotheſleie of Tichfield. ¶ This yeare chanced foure eclipſes, one of the ſunne the fourteenth of Ianuarie, and three of the moone. On the ſeuenth of March, Germaine Gardner, and Larke perſon of Chelſeie were executed at Tiburne, for denieng the kings ſupremacie, & with whom was executed for other offenſes one Singleton. And ſhortlie after Aſhbeie was likewiſe executed for the ſupremacie. In this yeare ſir Iohn Allen (who had bin twiſe maior of London, & of councell to the king) departing out of this life, did giue to the citie of London a rich collar of gold, to be worne by the maior: which collar was firſt worne by ſir William Laxton on S. Edwards daie, to the election of the new maior, who gaue to euerie ward in London twentie pounds to be diſtributed to the poore houſholders, beſides to one hundred and twentie perſons, three ſcore men euerie of them a gowne of brode cloth, and a blacke cap, and threeſcore women, to euerie of them a gowne of the like cloth, and a white kerchiefe. Humfreie Monmouth, and Iohn Cotes which were ſhiriffes in his maioraltie, in the beginning of their yeare put awaie twelue ſargeants and twelue yeomen, till they were forced by a court of common councell to take them againe.]

Charitable deeds of ſir Iohn Allen.

Shiriffes put awaie their officers.

In this meane while was the cardinall of Scotland deliuered forth of priſon, and ſhortlie after got into his hands againe all ſuch concluſions as were made touching the marriage betwixt the queene of Scots and prince Edward, procuring in maner all the lords and nobles of the realme to renounce that which they had promiſed to the king of England, as well diuerſe of thoſe whome the ſaid king had releaſed home out of captiuitie, as others. Wherwith the king tooke ſuch ſore diſpleaſure, that he prepared an armie to paſſe into Scotland by ſea, and ordeined the lord Edward Seimer, earle of Hertford to be lieutenant of the north parts, and to haue the leading of the ſame armie: who went thither in March, as well for defenſe of the borders, as to foreſee all things in order for the armie that ſhould thus go into Scotland, whereof he was appointed generall.

The earle of Hertford lieutenant of the north.

When all things were in a readineſſe for the nauie which was rigged to ſet forward towards Scotland, and that the ſoldiers were come which were appointed to go with ſir Iohn Dudleie lord Liſle, and high admerall of England in that voiage, they were imbarked, and ſo the two and twentith of March the ſaid lord admerall, with ſir Nicholas Pointz, and diuerſe other knights and capteins departed from the port of London towards the north parts; and comming to Newcaſtell, found the erle of Hertford readie with ſuch power as was appointed to be there at a daie aſſigned, forth of thoſe countries that lie from Trent northwards. And now wanted nothing to further their iournie, but a conuenient wind; which cauſed them to ſtaie certeine daies at the ſaid towne of Newcaſtell, and in the villages thereabouts.

The lord admerall Dudleie ſetteth forth from London towards Scotland.

Anno Reg. 36.

After that the earle of Hertford, and the lord admerall, accompanied with the earle of Shreweſburie, the lords Cobham, Clinton, Conters, Stinton, the lord William Howard, and manie other right valiant knights, gentlemen, and capteines, had lien with the armie and nauie readie at Newcaſtell a certeine time, looking for a proſperous wind to ſet forward on their purpoſed iournie, at length the ſame came about verie fit to ſerue their turne, and then with all ſpeed the ſoldiers were beſtowed abord, euerie companie in their appointed veſſels: and herewith vp went the ſailes, and forth they got into the maine ſeas, making their courſe directlie towards the Forth, a gulfe or riuer in Scotland, able to beare veſſels fiftie miles vp within the countrie. There were at the leaſt two hundred ſaile which the lord admerall had cauſed to come togither, according to his commiſſion, rigged, trimmed, and furniſhed with all things neceſſarie for the conduction of ſuch an armie, eſteemed to be about ten thouſand men.

The number of the Engliſh armie.

The third of Maie they arriued in the Forth, entring betweene two Ilands, the Bas and the Maie. The next daie being the fourth of Maie, the whole armie was landed two miles by weſt the towne of Lith, at a place called Grantham crag. And forthwith the lord lieutenant putting his people in good order of warre, marched on towards the ſaid towne of Lith. The lord admerall led the fore-ward, the lord lieutenant the battell, and the earle of Shrewesburie gouerned the rere-ward. Before they came to the towne of Lith, they found in their waie readie to impeach their paſſage ſix thouſand horſſemen beſide footmen. At the firſt the Scots made towards the Engliſhmen, as if they had ment to ſet vpon the voward: but being manfullie aſſailed by the harquebutters, fiue hundred in number, and ſhrewdlie by them curried and galled, they had no mind to come forward, but perceiuing how willing the Engliſhmen were to incounter with them, after certeine ſhot on both ſides, they made a ſudden retreat, and leauing their artillerie behind them, they fled to Edenburgh.

The firſt man that fled (as the talke went) was the cardinall, who perceiuing the deuotion which the Engliſhmen had to ſée his holineſſe, had no mind to tarie. With him alſo fled the gouernour, the earles of Huntleie, Murreie, and Bothwell: as for their ſoldiers, they were diſparkled, and feared the Engliſh forces as the lambe dooth the wolfe, the doe the dog, or the hart the lion: to vſe the words of Anglorum prælia verie fitlie deſcribing this battell, and ſaieng:

Exhorrent, vt dama canes, vt cerua leones.

The Engliſh armie entreth into Lith.

The Engliſhmen thus hauing put their enimies to flight, & ſeized vpon their artillerie, made ſtreight to the towne of Lith, and entered it without anie great reſiſtance, wherein they incamped themſelues the ſame night to their moſt eaſe and aduantage, and afterwards landed their vittels and great artillerie. They found alſo in this towne ſuch plentie of riches as they looked not to haue found in anie one towne of Scotland.

The prouoſt of Edenburghs requeſt.

The earle of Hertfords anſwer.

The ſixt of Maie they went towards Edenburgh, and as they approched néere the towne, the prouoſt of the ſame towne accompanied with one or two burgeſſes, and two or thrée officers at armes, deſired to ſpeake with the kings lieutenant, and in the name of all the towne, ſaid that the keies of the towne ſhould be deliuered vnto his lordſhip, conditionallie that they might go with bag & baggage, and the towne to be ſaued from fire. Wherevnto anſwer was made by the ſaid lord lieutenant, that where the Scots had ſo manifeſtlie broken their promiſes confirmed by oths and ſeales, and certified by the whole parlement, as was euidentlie knowne to the world, he was ſent thither by the kings highneſſe to take vengeance of their deteſtable falſehood, to declare and ſhew the force of his highneſſe ſword to all ſuch as ſhould make anie reſiſtance vnto his graces power ſent thither for that purpoſe. And therfore he told them reſolutelie, that vnleſſe they would yéeld vp their towne franklie without condition, and cauſe man, woman, and child, to iſſue forth into the fields, ſubmitting them to his will and pleaſure, he would put them to the ſword, and their towne to the fire. The prouoſt anſwered it were better to ſtand to their defenſe.

Sir Chriſtopher Morice.

Edenburgh entered by force.

Wherevpon charge was giuen to the ſaid prouoſt and officer at armes, vpon their perill to depart. And forthwith the lord lieutenant ſent to the voward, commanding that they ſhould march toward the towne, which right hardilie they did, and the Engliſh gunners manfullie aſſailed the gates; namelie ſir Chriſtopher Morice maſter of the ordinance, inſomuch that the Scots were beaten from their ordinance, and the gate called Canogate beaten open with ſhot of the great artillerie, and therewith the Engliſhmen entering the ſame gate by fine force, beat downe & ſlue a great number of Scots, and continuallie without ſtaieng was the great ordinance drawne vp the ſtréet to the caſtell gates; but thoſe that were within the caſtell ſhot ſo fréelie at the Engliſhmen thus approching with their great artillerie, that diuerſe were ſlaine, the artillerie of the caſtell beat ſo directlie alongeſt the high ſtréet, as the Engliſhmen came vp the ſame. At length alſo one of the Engliſhmens culuerings was ſtriken, and diſmounted, and therevpon they were forced to retire backe and giue ouer their enterpriſe of making batterie to the caſtell, wanting pioners, baſkets, and other things neceſſarie for ſuch a purpoſe.

This daie the Engliſhmen ſet fire in diuerſe parts of the towne, but they had not leaſure to mainteine it, by reaſon of the ſmoke riſing and troubling them ſo extremelie, that no great hurt could be doone that daie, for that the night alſo came on, and ſo they departed backe againe to their campe at Lith. But the next daie, a certeine number of Engliſhmen vnder the leading of doctor Leigh, went againe to Edenburgh, and did what they could, vtterlie to deſtroie the whole towne with fire, and ſo continued all that daie & the two daies next following. During all this violence offered by the Engliſh to the enimie, & nothing left but deſpaire of life, the women and children beholding this deſolation, made ſuch outragious exclamations and wofull lamentations, that heauen it ſelfe rang with their noiſe, as verie pithilie is deſcribed by Chr. O. in his report, ſaieng:

Fœminei ſexus gemitus ad ſydera grandi
Tolluntur ſtrepitu, puerorum clamor in auras,
Nil niſi triſte fuit, faciéſque miſerrima rerum.

The lord Euers brought a power of horſſemen from the borders.

In the meane time, foure thouſand light horſſemen, vnder the leading of the lord Euers, came from our borders, as order was taken afore, and ioined themſelues with the armie thus lieng in Lith, where after their comming, they did ſuch exploits, in riding and waſting the countrie, that within ſeuen miles euerie waie of Edenburgh, they left few places, either pile, village, or houſe vnburnt. And beſide this, they brought great numbers of cattell dailie into the armie, and met with much good ſtuffe, which the inhabitants of Edenburgh had for the ſafetie of the ſame conueied out of the towne.

Knights created at Lith by the earle of Hertford.

The names of the knights made at Lith after the burning of Edenburgh by the earle of Hertford, generall of the kings armie there, on ſundaie the eleuenth of Maie, in the ſix & thirtith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the eight, in the yeare 1544, as they were deliuered to me by ſir Gilbert Dethike knight, aliàs Garter, king of armes, are as followeth: The lord Clinton, the lord Coniers, ſir William Wroughton, ſir Thomas Holcroft, ſir Edward Dorrell, ſir John Luttrell, ſir John Jenins, ſir Thomas Waterton, ſir Charles Howard, ſir George Blunt, ſir Peter Mewtas, ſir Edward Warner, ſir Raſe Bulmer, ſir Hugh Cholmeleie, ſir Thomas Leigh, aliàs doctor Leigh, ſir Richard Leigh, ſir Peter Leigh, ſir John Leigh of Booth, ſir Lawrence Smith, ſir William Vauaſour, ſir Richard Shirburne, ſir Robert Stapleton, ſir Thomas Holt, ſir William Dauenport, ſir Raſe Leiceſter, ſir Humfrie Bradborne, ſir Thomas Maliuereie, ſir Francis Hothome, ſir John Maſſie, ſir Leonard Beckwith, ſir Thomas Cokaine, ſir Peter Freſhwell, ſir Richard Egerton, ſir Anthonie Neuill, ſir John Neuill, ſir William Ratcliffe, ſir George Bowes, ſir Brian Brereton, ſir William Brereton, ſir Roger Brereton, ſir Edward Waren, ſir Brian Leiton, ſir Robert Worſeleie, ſir Thomas Talbot, ſir Hugh Caluerleie, ſir John Clere, ſir Richard Holland, ſir Thomas Venables, ſir John Conſtable, ſir Edmund Trafford, ſir John Atherton, ſir Richard Cholmeleie, ſir Philip Egerton, ſir Hugh Willoughbie, ſir Thomas Conſtable, ſir William Woodhouſe, ſir Edmund Sauage, and ſir Thomas Gerard.

On the fouretéenth daie the Engliſhmen brake downe the pire of the hauen of Lith, and burnt euerie ſticke of it. This doone, and hauing ſhipped their great artillerie, and taken forth all ſuch Scottiſh ſhips as were meet to ſerue, appointing them to attend on their ſhips, they tooke vpon them to returne home by land. Amongſt other ſhips which the Engliſhmen had in Lith hauen, there were two of notable faireneſſe, the one called the Salamander, giuen by the French king at the marriage of his daughter into Scotland, the other called the Vnicorne, made by the late Scottiſh king. The balaſt of theſe two ſhips was cannon ſhot, which they found in the towne, to the number of foure ſcore thouſand. The reſt of the Scottiſh ſhips being taken awaie togither with their owne ſhips, which they brought with them, were for the more part peſtered with the ſpoile and booties of the ſouldiors & mariners. On the fifteenth of Maie, their armie and their fleet departed from Lith both in one houre, the towne being ſet on fire and burned to the ground.

Lith burnt.

The lord Seaton.

The Engliſh armie incamped that night at a place called Seaton, ſeuen miles from Lith, where they burnt the caſtell, and deſtroied the orchards and gardens with the more deſpite, for that the lord Seaton owner of the place, was the chiefe laborer to helpe the lord cardinall out of priſon. The ſame daie was Haddington burnt, with a great nunrie and houſe of friers there. The next night they incamped beſide Dunbar, where they had an alarum giuen them, but in the morning they burnt the towne of Dunbar, and marched forth, though ſomewhat ſtaid by the waie, by reaſon of the miſt and fog, which was verie thicke, continuing all the forenoone, and bicauſe alſo they vnderſtood how the lords of Seton & Hume with the lard of Bouclough, and others, had aſſembled a power of men of warre, and were minded to impeach their paſſage at a ſtreict named the Peaſe.

Haddington burnt.

Dunbar burnt.

But after that the miſt brake vp, which was about two of the clocke in the afternoone, the Engliſhmen came forward, and paſſed the ſame ſtreict without anie reſiſtance. For the Scottiſh lords perceiuing that they were not of power ſufficient to incounter with the Engliſhmen, minded not to put their people in their danger, but wiſelie retired, ſuffering the Engliſhmen to paſſe at their pleaſure, who that night lodged at Ranton, eight miles diſtant from our borders, where hauing ouerthrowne a pile which ſtood there, they diſlodged the next morrow, and the ſame daie being the eighteenth of Maie, they entered into Berwicke: ſo ending their voiage with great ioie and gladneſſe, not hauing loſt paſt fortie perſons in all this iournie.

The end of the voiage.

The names of the chiefe townes, caſtels, and places burned in this voiage, were theſe: the burow and towne of Edenburgh, with the abbeie called holie Rood houſe, and the kings palace adioining to the ſame. The towne of Lith burnt, and the hauen and pire deſtroied, the caſtle and village of Cragmiller, the abbeie of Newbottle, part of Muſkelburow towne, with the chappell of our ladie of Lauret, Preſton towne and the caſtell, Seton caſtell, Hadington towne, with the friers and nunrie, a caſtell of Oliuer Sinclers, the towne of Dunbar, Laureſton with the grange, Drilaw, Weſter crag, Enderligh, the pile, and the towne, Broughton, Cheſter fields, Crawnend, Dudiſton, Stan houſe, the Ficket, Beuerton, Tranent, Shenſton, Markle, Trapren, Kirkland hill, Hatherwike, Belton, eaſt Barnes, Bowland, Butterden, Quickewood, Blackeburne, Ranton, Bildie and the Tower, Kinkorne, ſaint Monees, the queenes ferrie, part of Petin Waines, and the burnt Iland, were burned by the fleet on the ſea.

Townes burnt in the ſame voiage.

For during the continuance of the armie at Lith, the ſhips laie not idle, but ſcowring the riuer, burnt diuerſe places, and left neither ſhip, craier, nor bote belonging to anie village, towne, creeke, or hauen, vpon either ſide of the foord, betweene Sterling, and the mouth of the riuer, vnburned, or brought awaie, which ſpace conteineth fiftie miles in length. About the ſame time the earle of Lenox fled out of Scotland into the relme of England, where he was right gladlie receiued by king Henrie, and ſhortlie he obteined in marriage the ladie Marie Dowglas, neece to the king of England, and returned ſoone after into Scotland by ſea, accompanied with a good competent crue of Engliſh. But finding no ſuch friendſhip among his countrie men as he looked to haue doone, he was conſtreined to returne, without atchiuing the enterpriſe which he had taken in hand, in hope of ſuch aſſiſtance by his friends, as now failed him at need.

¶ In the moneth of Maie proclamation was made for the inhancing of gold to eight & fortie ſhillings, & ſiluer foure ſhillings the ounce. Alſo the K. cauſed to be coined baſe monie, which was ſince that time called downe, the fift yeare of Edward the ſixt, and called in the ſecond of queene Elizabeth. About the ſame time that the armie before remembred, was ſet forward into Scotland vnder the guiding of the earle of Hertford, as before yee haue heard, the king by aduiſe of his councell tooke order for the leuieng of a mightie armie, to paſſe ouer into France, according to the appointment taken with his confederate, freend and colleague, the emperour, againſt the French king, at that preſent common aduerſarie to them both, and not long before had entered in league with the Turks, as Ch. There were appointed three battels, the voward vnder the leading of the duke of Norffolke, the battell vnder the guiding of the duke of Suffolke, which alſo was reckoned to be the kings battell, bicauſe his maieſtie ment to be preſent with the ſame in perſon, and the rere-ward was led by the lord Ruſſell lord priuie ſeale. Thoſe of the fore-ward were appareled in blew cotes garded with red, and had caps and hoſen after the ſame ſute, partie blue and partie red, their caps made fit for their ſculs, which were put into the ſame. others beſide, no leſſe worthie to be remembred for their valure and merits, if time would permit to rehearſe them, paſſed ouer to Calis about Whitſuntide, and from thence marching forward to France, left Bullongne on their right hand, & keeping forth towards Muttrell, ioined with an armie which the emperour had raiſed for that purpoſe, vnder the leading of the countie de Buren, admerall of the low countries, and ſo theſe armies being vnited in one, came before Muttrell, and there laid ſiege to that towne, being well manned and furniſhed with all things neceſſarie for defenſe, as well in vittels as munition. The chéefe capteine of which towne was mounſieur de Biez one of the marſhals of France, and gouernour alſo in the abſence of monſieur de Vandoſme of Picardie, who being within Bullongne & hearing how the Engliſh armie was paſſed by, and drew towards Muttrell, he left Bullongne, and with all ſpeed got him into Muttrell, not miſtruſting anie thing of that policie which the king of England went about, which was, to ſend this armie to beſiege Muttrell, to the end the Frenchmen might be kept occupied further off, while he with the reſidue of his power ſhould come and beſiege Bullongne, which towne ſtanding moſt commodious for his purpoſe, he ment by force to bring vnder his ſubiection.

The duke of Suffolke.

Bullongne beſieged.

Herevpon was the duke of Suffolke appointed with the kings armie to paſſe ouer, accompanied with the earle of Arundell marſhall of the field, the lord ſaint Iohn, and the biſhop of Wincheſter, ſir Iohn Gage comptroller of the kings houſe, ſir Anthonie Browne maiſter of the kings horſſe, with diuerſe other worthie capteins, all which the ninteenth of Iulie came before Bullongne, incamped on the eaſtſide of the ſaid towne aloft vpon the hill, and after for his more ſafetie remooued into a vallie, where after manie ſharpe ſkirmiſhes they firſt entered the baſe towne, being left and forſaken by the inhabitants, which hauing ſet fire on their fiſhing nets, and other ſuch baggage, vnder couert of the ſmoke, got them vp into the high towne, before the Engliſhmen could eſpie them. After this, the Old man, otherwiſe called Le toure dordre, ſtanding without the towne for a direction to them that were to enter the hauen, and now being kept by ſixtéene ſouldiers, was yéelded vp by them, vpon preſenting the canon before it.

The king paſſeth the ſeas to Bullongne.

The Frenchmen within the towne, being deſpoiled of thoſe two places, yet ſpared not to ſhoot off from their walles and bulworkes, dooing what damage they might deuiſe, and namelie from the caſtell and gréene bulworke they did much hurt to the Engliſhmen with their ſhot, whereof they made no ſpare, till at length they were forced to be quiet: for the Engliſhmen ſo applied them with ſuch plentie of their ſhot, that the Frenchmen had no oportunitie to doo them anie great hurt with their artillerie. The fourtéenth of Iulie, the king in perſon, accompanied with diuers of the nobilitie, paſſed the ſeas from Douer to Calis; and the ſix and twentith of the ſame moneth incamped himſelfe before Bullongne, on the north ſide, within leſſe than thrée quarters of a mile of the towne, where he remained, till the towne was ſurrendered into his hands. The king being then in campe, it was a matter of eaſe to diſcerne which was he, for none of the reſt came néere him in talneſſe by the head: as for his proportion of lims, it was anſwerable to his goodlie ſtature and making: a memorable deſcription whereof, as alſo of his artificiall armour, I find reported as followeth:

Rex capite Henricus reliquos ſupereminet omnes,
Heros præualidus ſeu fortia brachia ſpectes,
Seu ſuras quas fuluo opifex incluſerat auro,
Siue virile ducis præſtanti pectore corpus,
Nulla vi domitum, nullo penetrabile ferro, &c.

Bullongne aſſaulted.

Beſide the trenches which were caſt, and brought in maner round about the town, there was a mount raiſed vpon the eaſt ſide, and diuerſe péeces of artillerie planted aloft on the ſame, the which togither with the morter péeces, ſore annoied them within, & battered downe the ſtéeple of our ladies church. To conclude, the batterie was made in moſt forcible wiſe in thrée ſeuerall places, and the walles, towers, and caſtell were vndermined, and the towne within ſo beaten with ſhot out of the campe, and from the mount and trench by the morter péeces, that there were verie few houſes left whole therein. The towne thus ſtanding in great diſtreſſe, there were two hundred Frenchmen and Italians, which interpriſed vnder the conduct of Ioncurtio to enter the town in couert of the night, which exploit they ſo warilie atchiued, that by meanes of a prieſt that could ſpeake the Engliſh tong, they paſſed by the ſcouts, & through the watch, ſo as the moſt part of them were got ouer the trenches yer it was knowne what they were: to the number of ſix ſcore of them got into the towne, but the reſidue after they were once deſeried, being intercepted, were taken or ſlaine. Although this ſmall ſuccour ſomewhat relieued them within, and put them in ſome hope to defend the towne ſomewhat longer againſt the kings power: yet at length when a péece of the caſtell was blowne vp, and the breaches made, as was thought reaſonable, the aſſault was giuen by the lord admerall Dudleie, that was come thither from the ſea, which he had ſcowred after his returne forth of Scotland.

Bullongne deliuered.

This aſſault was couragiouſlie giuen, and to ſpeake a truth, no leſſe manfullie defended: ſo that when the aſſailants had perceiued in what ſtate the breaches ſtood, and what prouiſion they within had made for defenſe of their towne, which vndoubtedlie was great (for nothing was by them omitted, that might either aduantage the defendants, or annoie the aſſailants) thoſe that were appointed in this ſort to giue the aſſault, were called backe, and ſo they retired, but not without loſſe on both ſides, and namelie of them within. For during the time of the aſſault, the great artillerie did beat ſtill vpon them that preſented themſelues at the breaches to repell the aſſailants, and ſo diuerſe of their valiant capteins and braue ſouldiers were ſlaine at this aſſault, & among other, capteine Philip Corſe. Shortlie after, the capteins within the towne, doubting to be eftſoones aſſaulted, and perceiuing themſelues in extreame danger to loſe the towne by force, if they prouided not the ſooner, by rendering it to ſaue themſelues: they ſent forth two of their chiefe capteins, monſieur Semblemont, and monſieur de Hales, which declared vnto the king, that monſieur de Veruine gouernour of the towne, with his retinue, was contented to deliuer the towne vnto his grace, with condition that they might paſſe with bag and baggage. Which requeſt the king, like a noble and mercifull prince, fréelie granted: and ſo the next daie, the duke of Suffolke rode into Bullongne, vnto whome in the kings name the keies of the towne were deliuered, & in the afternone departed out of Bullongne all the Frenchmen with heauie hearts, to the number of ſix thouſand, as C. O. witneſſeth, ſaieng:

Sex hinc exierant Gallorum millia gentis.

The number of them that went forth of Bullongne.

The number of the men of warre that were ſtrong and able to ſerue, were of horſſemen ſixtie ſeuen, of footmen fiftéene hundred, thréeſcore and thrée, of the which number eight hundred were harquebutters, of hurt men fourescore and ſeuen, of women & children ninetéene hundred and twentie ſeuen, beſide a great number of aged & ſicke perſons, not able to depart with the others. The laſt perſon that came forth was monſieur de Veruine himſelfe, who vpon his approch to the place where the king ſtood, alighted from his horſſe, and came to the king, and after hée had talked with him a ſpace, the king tooke him by the hand, and he reuerentlie knéeling vpon his knées, kiſſed his hand, and afterward mounted vpon his horſſe, and ſo departed, following his companie.

The king entereth into Bullongne.

The eight of September, the king hauing the ſword borne before him by the lord marques Dorſet, like a puiſſant conqueror rode into Bullongne, and the trumpetters ſtanding on the walles, ſounded their trumpets at the time of his entering, to the great comfort of the beholders. In the entering, there met him the duke of Suffolke, and deliuered to him the keies of the towne, and ſo he rode forth to his lodging that was prepared for him on the ſouth ſide of the towne. Within two daies after, the king rode about the towne within the walles, and appointed that our ladie church of Bullongne ſhould bée taken downe, and in the place thereof a mount to bée made, for the more ſtrengthening of the towne. Finallie after he had ſet things in order for the ſafe kéeping of this his towne of Bullongne, by his princely force thus woone out of the poſſeſſion of his aduerſaries hands, he appointed the lord Liſle high admerall of the ſeas, to be his deputie of the ſame towne, and then determining not to ſtaie there any longer, he tooke the ſeas, & returned into England, landing at Douer the firſt of October.

The king returneth into England.

In this meane time, whileſt the king of England laie (as ye haue heard) with his ſiege about Bullongne, and the duke of Norffolke, and lord priuie ſeale about Mutterell, the emperour inuaded France by Champeigne, winning diuerſe caſtels and townes, as Comerſis, Lignie, ſaint Deſir, Chauſteau, Thierie, and others. But at the length, meanes were made by treatie to haue the matter taken vp, as in the end it was, and a peace concluded without conſent of the king of England, although there was place left for him and other princes to enter into this agréement of peace. But the king of England hauing now defraied no ſmall quantitie of treaſure in theſe warres, beſide the trauell of his owne perſon and his people, and hauing the thing now in a maner ſure in his poſſeſſion, which he chéeflie went about to obteine, that is to wit, the ſtrong towne of Bullongne, he would not agrée vnto anie peace, except he might inioy that towne, at that inſtant redie to be deliuered into his hands. And euen now after it was to him deliuered, hearing that for certeine, the peace was concluded betwixt the emperour and the French king, he determined to breake vp his camps: but neuertheleſſe to kéepe Bullongne in his poſſeſſion, in deſpite of all his aduerſaries. But here, before we procéed anie farther, we haue thought good ſomewhat to ſpeake touching the ſiege which all this while continued afore Mutterell, where the Engliſhmen and Burgonians inforced themſelues by all waies and meanes they could deuiſe, how to conſtreine their enimies within the towne. On the other part, monſieur de Biez, and thoſe that were with him in gard of the ſame towne, left nothing vndone that might ſerue for their defenſe, and make to the annoiance of their enimies.

The emperor concludeth a peace with the French king.

The number of the men of war in Muttrell.

There were with monſieur de Biez within the towne, an hundred men at armes of the retinue of the conſtable of France, vnder the leading of the lord de la Guich an expert man of war. There were alſo with the lord of Genlie, foure enſignes of French footmen. Count Berenger a Neapolitane with a thouſand footmen Italians. Capteine Franciſco de Chiaramont, a Neapolitane alſo, with the like number of Italian footmen. So that the towne might ſéeme ſufficientlie furniſhed with men, and they wanted neither ſhot nor powder requiſit, ſo that there was no ſpare thereof when occaſion ſerued on either part.

A mount raiſed.

The duke of Norffolke and the lord priuie ſeale cauſed a mount to be raiſed, and aloft thereon were certeine péeces of artillerie planted to ſhoot into the towne. Moreouer they compaſſed the walles ſo on ech hand with their ſeuerall camps and trenches, that hardlie might anie eſcape either in or out vneſpied. Sir Francis Brian was appointed with certeine bands, conteining about the number of a thouſand men, to lodge in a campe fortified by himſelfe, ouer againſt one part of the towne, to ſtop certeine paſſages on that ſide, that no ſuccors ſhould enter by the ſame to the reléefe of them within. There were ſkirmiſhes dailie betwixt them that ſallied forth of the gates, and the Engliſhmen that watched and warded in the trenches, and other places, inſomuch that diuerſe loſt their liues, and ſome were irrecouerablie wounded, as Anglorum prælia witneſſeth, ſaieng:

Sir Francis Brian.

Confoſſi ſæuo moriuntur vulnere multi

Tiberio, that after ſerued the king of England.

On a daie as ſir Thomas Poinings ſoldiours were warding in one of the trenches, an Italian ſecretlie comming forth of the towne, fetched awaie the ſaid ſir Thomas Poinings his enſigne; and notwithſtanding the purſute that was made after him, he eſcaped and got into the towne with it, to the great diſpleaſure of the whole campe. But as the enimies ſometimes went awaie with the aduantage of their attempted enterpriſes, ſo ofttimes againe they paid for their aduenturing ouer raſhlie aboue the common price of the market.

Negligence of Engliſhmen for not putting their valiant dooings in writing.

But here I cannot but lament the negligence vſed in that ſeaſon: for there is not one Engliſh writer to be found extant, that hath written anie thing effectuallie of the exploits atchiued in that iornie; ſo as we are driuen to borrow of the aduerſaries that haue written thereof, wanting other helps of our owne nation to furniſh our booke héerin according to our wiſhed purpoſe. But neuertheleſſe, to giue occaſion to thoſe that yet liue, and can beſt doo it, to ſet forth hereafter a more perfect diſcourſe thereof, I haue thought it not amiſſe to recite in part what I haue read and learned of ſuch things as then were accounted worthie of relation, and now like to be buried in the dimme booke of obliuion, vnleſſe ſome fauourer of notable euents chancing in the aſſiegement of thoſe two townes, Bullongne and Muttrell, will put to his helping hand to report the ſame to poſteritie.

A ſtratagem of the lord Mountioie.

Among other ſtratagems, one I remember, deuiſed and put in practiſe by the lord Mountioie, as thus. The enimies had eſpied a place of aduantage without the towne, where vnder fauour of the ſhot of certeine péeces of great artillerie lodged vpon ſome platforms or bulworks within the towne, they might lie without the walles betwixt the Engliſhmens trenches and the towne ditches, and there couer themſelues within a litle trench or counterſcarpe made for the purpoſe, and out of the ſame be readie with their harquebuſſes to ſhoot at the Engliſhmen, ſo ſoone as anie of them ſhould once ſhew his head out of the trenches, to the great danger of them that warded in the ſame.

The lord Mountioie perceiuing this, deuiſed with himſelfe how to rouſe the enimies out of that lurking place, and withall came to the duke of Norfolke, and deſired licence to put the deuiſe (which he had alreadie forecaſt in his mind) in practiſe. But the duke being not willing that he ſhould put himſelfe in ſuch danger, was loth to grant thereto, but rather perſuaded with him not to attempt it: for (ſaid he) my lord, yée may doo the king better ſeruice than ſo to hazard your life, and caſt your ſelfe awaie, as it is verie like you ſhould, in aduenturing vpon ſuch a deſperat péece of ſeruice, and therfore I would not wiſh you to meddle therewith, for we ſhall otherwiſe prouide for the matter well inough. But the lord Mountioie ſtill perſiſted in his ſute verie earneſtlie, declaring that he doubted not (by Gods helpe) but to atchiue his purpoſe to his good contentation without anie great danger, if that were executed which he tooke to be neceſſarie for the accompliſhment of his deuiſe: and that was to haue certeine péeces of the great ordinance ſhot off that waie forth, at what time the wind ſtood méet to carrie the ſmoke full vpon the place where the Frenchmen laie. At length vpon his earneſt ſute, the duke gaue him licence to trie what he could doo, commanding the great ordinance to be laid and charged readie to ſhoot off as he ſhould appoint it. Herewith the lord Mountioie taking with him fouretéene of his owne ſoldiors (of the which number one of them forſooke to go through with him when it came to the point) immediatlie vpon the ſhooting off of the artillerie, & that all the ground about was couered ouer with ſmoke, he came to the place where thoſe Frenchmen laie vnder couert of their trench, and ſo diſplaced them, that they had no liking eftſoones to lodge ſo néere vnto ſuch vnfriendlie neighbors.

A politike feat atchiued by the lord Mountioie.

Manie other valiant and politike feats (no doubt) were atchiued during this ſiege, & happilie as worthie the rehearſall as this. But ſith it was the inuention of ſo noble a yoong gentleman, I haue eſtéemed it not impertinent to ſpeake thereof, and withall to lament the loſſe of the inuentor, who being taken awaie ſhortlie after in his returne homewards, by vntimelie death, was like (if he had liued to greater yéers of experience) to haue prooued comparable in valor to anie of his noble progenitors. But now to ſpeake of other incidents that chanced whileſt this ſiege remained before Muttrell, you muſt vnderſtand that the moſt part of the vittels that was ſpent in the campe was brought to them either from the kings campe at Bullogne, or elſe from S. Omers, to conueie the ſame ſo far off, it was néedfull to haue the carriage garded with good troops and bands both of horſſemen and footmen: for the French fortreſſes were ſtronglie furniſhed with great numbers of men of war, which vpon occaſions were readie to take aduantages offered.

The lord Mountioie a noble yoong gentleman.

And as it fortuned at one time among other, there was a conuoie of certeine wagons loden with vitels appointed to come from ſaint Omers, the ſame being garded with diuerſe bands of Engliſhmen and Burgonions, ſent thither for that purpoſe, the which marching forward from ſaint Omers, kept not ſo good order as had béene requiſit: whereof certeine companies of French horſſemen that were abroad being aware, ſet vpon the Burgonions that were attendant vpon the foremoſt carriages, and finding them in ſome diſorder, eaſilie diſcomfited them, followed, and ſlue them in the chaſe, till they came to the hindermoſt carriages, where ſix hundred Engliſh men that attended on the ſame, impaled themſelues with their wagons, ſo as the Frenchmen could take no aduantage: but with ſhot of the Engliſh archers were ſo curried and galled that they were driuen to retire, and that in ſuch haſt, as they left diuerſe of their companie captiues in the Engliſhmens hands beſide thoſe that were faire laid to take their laſt ſléepe there on the ground. Neuertheleſſe, of the Burgonions there were ſlaine foure hundred, and much good vittels loſt, the bottoms of the hogſheads and other veſſels being beaten out, and manie a good Flemiſh mare killed or taken. For the Frenchmen found ſmall reſiſtance (as before ye haue heard) till they approched to the Engliſhmen, by whoſe accuſtomed manhood, ſome part of the vittels of that conuoie was ſaued, to the reléefe of the campe, which notwithſtanding by loſſe of the reſidue ſuffered great want for the time.

The Engliſh archers gall the French horſſemen.

Moreouer, ſomewhat towards the latter end of this ſiege, the earle of Surreie ſon vnto the duke of Norffolke and marſhall of his field, accompanied with the lord warden of the cinque ports, and diuerſe other valiant capteins Engliſh & Burgonions marched forth into the countrie towards Abuile, where they tooke and burnt a proper towne called ſaint Requiers: and after comming to another towne called Rieu, they found no bodie at home but women and children, for the men were departed out of it before their comming thither. When they had taken their pleaſure in ſacking all ſuch goods as they found there fit to be carried awaie, they ſpared the towne from fire, and ſo departed. And thus after they had béene two daies and two nights abroad in the countrie, they returned home to the campe with a great bootie of beaſts, ſhéepe, and other things which they had got in that voiage.

Rieu ſacked.

But now to conclude with this ſiege of Muttrell, after the king had woone Bullongne, and vnderſtood how the emperor had agréed with his aduerſarie the French king, he reſolued to haue his armie to raiſe that ſiege which thus had lien before Muttrell, and with all cōuenient ſpéed to draw toward Calis. And becauſe it was ſignified that the Dolphin of France Henrie was comming forward with a great power, which had béene raiſed by his father the French king to reſiſt the emperor, and now was ſent vnder the conduct of the ſaid Dolphin, to the ſuccours of them that were beſieged in Muttrell, the king ſent the earle of Arundell, ſir Iohn Gage, ſir George Carew, ſir Iohn Reinſford, and others, with a choſen number of luſtie ſoldiors vnto Muttrell, to reinforce his armie there, that in leuieng the campe, and withdrawing backe, they might be the better able to withſtand anie attempt which the enimies might put in execution to their annoiance. And verelie this was doone with good aduiſe and neceſſarie conſideration, for the Engliſhmen that had lien ſo long time at the ſiege before Muttrell, wanting ſuch behoouefull refreſhment as thoſe were ſtored with that laie before Bullongne, hauing the ſeas open, and all things at pleaſure brought vnto them forth of England, were ſore weakened and decaied by death and ſickneſſe, and now in raiſing their campe had manie things to looke vnto, as well for the conueieng of their ordinance, truſſe, and baggage, as their feeble and diſeaſed perſons: ſo that if the Dolphin with his armie might haue made ſuch ſpéed forward as to haue ouertaken them with his maine power before they had come to Bullongne, it was to be feared leaſt he might haue put them in danger of a plaine diſtreſſe. But with ſuch timelie foreſight as was vſed the ſiege was raiſed, and the armie retired firſt to Bullongne, and after to Calis without loſſe, although the French horſſemen in great number followed, and ſundrie times made proud proffers to giue the charge vpon the hindermoſt companies; but nothing was doone to make great account of, except certeine ſkirmiſhes that were procured, and alarums giuen, as in ſuch caſes it fortuneth.

The ſiege at Muttrell broken vp.

The Dolphin notwithſtanding that the ſiege was thus raiſed from Muttrell, yer he could come thither, yet he kept forward his iourneie, to prooue what he might doo to recouer Bullongne, which towne the king of England (as ye haue heard) had left in the kéeping of the lord Liſle high admerall. The ſame towne being then weake, God knoweth, on all ſides through batterie and minings, which by the kings power had béen made, to bring it into his ſubiection, and the trenches not caſt downe, nor the ordinance mounted.

The Dolphin commeth before Bullongne with his great power.

A camiſado giuen to baſe Bullongne.

In ouerthrow giuen to the French at baſe Bullongne.

The Dolphin being come before the towne, ſent certeine bands of his beſt ſoldiors by night to giue a camiſado to the baſe towne. They that thus were ſent, entred the ſame the ninth of October, about two of the clocke in the morning, where they tooke the ſtand watches, and ſlue (beſide a great number of ſicke and weake perſons) as well ſoldiors as other, before they could araie themſelues, or well get out of their beds. But after, the Frenchmen and Italians fell to rifling and breaking vp of coffers, ſcattering here and there abrode, and began to fall to their vittels, which they found there in good plentie. The Engliſhmen that were driuen vp to the gates of the high towne, got weapons that were throwne downe vnto them forth of the ſame, & aſſembling togither, fiercelie entred in amongſt the preaſe of their enimies. And herewith there ſallied forth of the high towne ſir Thomas Poinings with a band of two hundred ſoldiors, the which togither with the other ſo beſtirred themſelues, that they manfullie beat backe the enimies, ſlue to the number of eight hundred of them, and chaſed the reſidue out of the towne, which fled ouer the ſands vp to the hill, where the Dolphin himſelfe ſtood with a great trope of horſſemen about him, and durſt not once come downe to the reſcue of his people, for feare of the great artillerie that with plentie of bullets ſaluted the enimies, after that the breake of the daie had once diſcouered them in ſight. Amongſt other that were ſlaine in this repulſe of the Frenchmen, le ſegneur de Foqueſſolles, another of the marſhall de Biez his ſons in law, and ſeneſchall of Bullongne was one.

Thus the Dolphin, perceiuing that it would nothing auaile him to make anie further attempt againſt Bullongne, paſſed forth toward Guiſnes, & ſhortlie after through want of vittels, and ſickneſſe which ſore infeſted his campe, brake vp his armie, and returned into France: ſo that the proud enterpriſes of the vainglorious and moſt inſolent French turned to their owne great ſhame, as C.O. trulie ſaith:

Sic Galli in magnum ceſſerunt dedecus auſa.

Monſieur de Biez cõmeth before Bullongne with an armie.

But ſhortlie after Chriſtmas came downe an armie of fourteene thouſand, vnder the conduction of monſieur de Biez, the which the ſix and twentith of Ianuarie incamped on the weſt ſide of Bullongne beyond the hauen, where they laie ten daies: but on the ſixt of Februarie, the earle of Hertford, the lord admerall, as then lord lieutenant of the towne of Bullongne, the lord Greie of Wilton, ſir Thomas Poinings & others, hauing aſſembled out of the gariſons on that ſide the ſeas, to the number of foure thouſand footmen, & ſeuen hundred horſmen, whereof an hundred or foure ſcore were Albanoiſes, iſſued forth of Bullongne about foure of the clocke in the morning, and comming to the place where the king had incamped during the time of the ſiege, they ſtaid there, and put themſelues in order of battell: and about ſix of the clocke, it being then a low water, capteine Edward Breie, with three hundred ſhot, was appointed to paſſe ouer, and to giue the enimies an alarum in their campe.

The Frenchmen diſlodge out of their campe.

At which inſtant the trumpets ſounded, and the drums ſtroke vp in the Engliſh armie, and herewith they being diuided into three battels, and to ech one his gard of two hundred horſſemen, beſide the od hundred that attended as a defenſe to the reſidue, they ſhewed themſelues to their enimies. The Frenchmen perceiuing this, packed awaie with all haſte poſſible, marching toward Hardilo in two battels. Wherevpon the Engliſh capteins leauing their footmen behind them, and taking onelie with them the horſſemen, followed with all ſpeed after their enimies, and comming to the bridge commonlie called pont de Bricque, which certeine Engliſh carpenters garded with a number of harquebutters, and foure ſmall field peeces, had forced and repared the ſame that night: and ſo the horſſemen finding it ſufficientlie repared, paſſed ouer, and comming to S. Eſtienne, they found there fiue hundred Dutch horſmen, commonlie called Swart rutters, that were lodged there to keepe that paſſage: but being ſurpriſed on the ſudden by the Engliſh horſſemen, and ſharpelie aſſailed, they were wholie diſtreſſed, and the moſt part of them taken priſoners, and therewith left with the followers of the armie, were after ſlaine, bicauſe they knew not where to beſtow them.

The comfortable words of the Engliſh capteins.

The Engliſh horſſemen charge the French battels.

But now the hill of ſaint Eſtienne being thus gained by the Engliſh horſmen, they put themſelues in order of battell againe, appointing an hundred of their men at armes to follow and keepe alooſe as a ſtale to relieue their fellowes in time of need, when they ſaw them in anie danger. The lords, to incourage euerie one to doo his dutie, rode vp and downe about the troops, & vſing manie comfortable words, deſired them, that although they were but an handfull in compariſon to the number of their enimies, they would yet in regard of the honour of the realme of England, make a proffer of an onſet to the enimies, that they might perceiue that there they were to giue them battell, and to follow, as they ſhould ſee them their capteins and gouernors to lead them the waie. Herewith forward they make towards the enimie, and ouertaking them three miles on the hitherſide of Hardilo ſands, they valiantlie gaue the charge, and thruſting in betwixt the two French battels, ouerthrew their cariages, tooke their ordinance and munitions, ſlue and bare downe manie of them that preaſed forth to defend the ſame.

The valiant order of monſieur de Biez.

The lord admerall his readie cõceiuing the meaning of the enimies.

Monſieur de Biez being in the fore ward, brought backe the ſtrongeſt and beſt armed men he had to reſiſt his enimes, ranging them in order ſo, as he ment to haue incloſed the Engliſh horſſemen betwixt his battels and the ſea, and ſo to haue diſtreſſed them. But this purpoſe being eſpied firſt of all by the lord admerall, the Engliſhmen by his valiant incouragement gaue a new charge, and breaking through their ranks by force, came backe againe vnto their hundred men of armes that kept alooſe, and there ſtaied till their footmen might come to them, who by this time were aduanced within ſight of them, but diſtant yet by the ſpace of two Engliſh miles, or little leſſe.

Hardilo ſands.

Monſieur de Biez, perceiuing that the Engliſh footmen began thus to approch, made forward againe with his armie, ſo faſt as was poſſible for his people to march, drawing ſtill his armed men and beſt ſouldiors to the hindermoſt ranks, there to be readie to withſtand the Engliſhmen, as they ſhould offer to aſſaile them: and in this order the Frenchmen made away, and reſted not till they came to Hardilo ſands, being a place of ſuch ſtrength and aduantage, by reaſon of the ſtreict, that after they were once got thither, they might account themſelues out of all danger, and therefore there they ſtaid, and diſpatched an herald vnto the chiefteins of the Engliſh armie, to ſignifie vnto them, that there they ment to abide and to giue them battell, if they would aduance forward to fight with them: but yet they would not in anie wiſe come forth of their ſtrength vnto ſome euen ground, although they were earneſtlie required therevnto. Wherevpon the Engliſhmen, to light them a candle that they might ſee where they were, ſet all the villages & houſes about on a light fire, continuing the ſame all that afternoone, and moſt part of the night following, and the next morning betwixt foure and fiue of the clocke, they came backe againe vnto Bullongne with all their ſpoiles and priſoners.

Artillerie gained.

They tooke in this incounter ſeuen peeces of artillerie, two of braſſe and fiue of iron; alſo the peeces of aduantage of the armour of monſieur de Biez, beſide apparell, plate, and furniture in great plentie, as well taken in the field, as alſo in their campe, where they left their tents ſtanding, & all their prouiſion of vittels wholie vnremoued. The ſame peeces of armour were ſent ouer into England to the king for a witneſſe of the good ſucceſſe that had thus happened to his people in this famous enterpriſe, in the atchiuing wherof there were not paſt halfe a dozen Engliſhmen ſlaine, beſides thoſe that were hurt, which neither were manie, as vnder halfe a ſcore at the moſt.

Great priſes of French goods taken by the weſterne ſhips.

Abr.Fl. ex I.S.pag.1030.

Whileſt ſuch things were in dooing about Bullongne, and other places (as before ye haue heard in this twentie and ſixt yeare) the ſhips of the weſt countrie and other coaſts of this realme waſted abroad on the ſeas, and tooke to the number of three hundred & od French ſhips, ſo that the Graie friers church in London was laid full of wine, the Auſtine friers and Blacke friers full of herring, and other fiſh that was taken, as the ſame ſhould haue beene conueied into France. About the ſame ſeaſon the king demanded a beneuolence of his ſubiects ſpirituall and temporall, towards the maintenance of the warres againſt the Frenchmen and Scots. ¶ On the twelfe of Ianuarie, the lord chancellour, the duke of Suffolke, and other of the kings councell, began to ſit at Bainards caſtell, where they firſt called before them the maior and aldermen, &c. And bicauſe Richard Read alderman would not agree to paie as they ſet him; he was commanded vpon paine to ſerue the king in his warres of Scotland, who departed from London the three and twentith of Ianuarie.

Sir William Roch ſent to the Fleet.

Execution for falſe accuſation.

Alſo ſir William Roch alderman, for words of diſpleaſure taken by the kings councell, was by them ſent to the fleet, where he remained till paſſion ſundaie. On the ſix and twentith of Ianuarie, there camped on the weſt ſide of Bullongne beyond the hauen, an armie of French, to the number of eighteene thouſand, where they laie ten daies, and the firſt of Februarie were put to flight by the earle of Hertford, and ſir Iohn Dudleie lord admerall, then deputie of Bullongne. On the thirteenth of Februarie, a prieſt was ſet on the pillorie in Cheape, and burnt in both cheekes with the letters F. and A. and a paper on his head, wherein was written, For falſe accuſing: which iudgement was giuen by the lord chancellor in the Starre chamber, a notable example of iuſtice. Great cauſe haue I to wiſh the like to the like accuſer, who neuer yet repented, but contrariwiſe ſweareth and forſweareth that he neuer did anie ſuch act againſt his brother.]

The diſcomfiture gotten by the Scots at Halidon rig.

The valiant ſir Raſe Euers ſlaine.

Read, alderman of London priſoner.

In the beginning of March ſir Raſe Euers lord warden of the marches after manie fortunate rodes and forraies made into Scotland, aſſembled now about foure thouſand men, & entering with the ſame into Scotland, was incountered at Halidon rig by the earle of Arraine and other Scottiſhmen, which ſo beſet the Engliſhmen with three battels on ech ſide, that in the end they ſlue the ſaid lord warden, with the lord Ogle, and a great number of other gentlemen and commons, beſide priſoners, which they tooke, ſo that few eſcaped the Scottiſhmens hands. Among other priſoners taken, Richard Read an alderman of London aforeſaid was one. The death of ſir Raſe Euers was greatlie bemoned: for he had ſhewed great proofe of his valiant proweſſe at ſundrie times before; namelie in this yeare paſt, as at the taking and burning of the towne of Iedworth, which enterpriſe was atchiued the tenth of Iune, beſide diuerſe other exploits fortunatelie brought to paſſe by his high valiancie and manhood, till his hap was at this preſent to finiſh his daies: whoſe life though then it tooke end, yet ſhall not his fame & good report (purchaſed by martiall courage, policie, and dangerous aduentures) periſh or decaie; as the poet trulie ſaith:

Parta labore volat vaſtum bona fama per orbem,
Hæc veluti Phœbus non moritura manet.

Anno Reg. 37. Rich. Grafton.

Anne Askew and others arreigned and acquited.

This yeare on ſaint Georges daie ſir Thomas Wriotheſleie lord chancellor of England was made knight of the garter. Alſo Trinitie terme was adiourned by reaſon of the warres, but the eſcheker and the court of the tenths were open, for thoſe that were accomptable in either of the ſaid courts. The thirteenth of Iune Robert Luken ſeruant to ſir Humfrie Browne one of the iuſtices of the kings Bench, Anne Askew gentlewoman, otherwiſe called Anne Kime, wife to one Kime, a gentleman of Lincolneſhire, and Ione Sautereie, wife to Iohn Sautereie of London, were arreigned in the Guildhall of London, for ſpeaking againſt the ſacrament of the altar (as they tearmed it) contrarie to the ſtatute of the ſix articles: but becauſe no witneſſe appeared againſt the women, nor againſt Luken, one onelie excepted, who was thought to accuſe him rather of malice, than otherwiſe, they were by twelue honeſt ſubſtantiall men of the citie (ſworne to paſſe vpon their inditements) cleerelie acquited and diſcharged.

Thomas Daie pewterer.

The new fort before Bullongne.

I.S.pag.1031.

Haileſtones figured like mens heads.

The ſame daie alſo was a pewterer named Thomas Daie diſcharged, by the pardon granted in the laſt parlement, after he had remained in priſon in Newgate the ſpace of three yeares now paſt, condemned long before the date of the ſame pardon, for the article of auricular confeſſion compriſed within the ſame ſtatute. About the ſame time, to wit the ſeuenth of Iune a great armie of Frenchmen came downe to Bullongne, and neere to the hauen incamped themſelues. In this armie were reckoned to be twelue thouſand lanceknights, twelue thouſand French footmen, ſix thouſand Italians, foure thouſand of legionarie ſouldiours of France, & a thouſand or twelue hundred men of armes, beſide ſeuen or eight hundred light horſmen. After ſome ſkirmiſhes not greatlie to their aduantage, they began yet to build a fort, which at length they accompliſhed, as after ſhall appeare. ¶ About the fiue & twentith of Iune, was a great tempeſt in Derbiſhire, where thorough trees were ouerturned, & diuerſe churches, chappels, and houſes were vncouered. Alſo in Lancaſhire, there fell haileſtones as big as mens fiſts, which had diuerſe prints in them, ſome like mens faces, ſome like gun holes, &c.]

The Engliſh fleet commeth before Newhauen.

The number in the French nauie.

The ſame moneth alſo the lord Liſle admerall of England with the Engliſh fleet entered the mouth of Saine, and came before Newhauen, where a great nauie of the Frenchmen laie, to the number of a two hundred ſhips, and ſix and twentie gallies, wherof the pope (as was reported) had ſent twentie well furniſhed with men and monie, to the aid of the French king. The Engliſhmen being not paſt an hundred and threeſcore ſaile, and all great ſhips, determined not to ſet vpon the Frenchmen where they laie: but yet approching neere vnto them, ſhot off certeine peeces of ordinance at them, and thereby cauſed the gallies to come abroad, which changed ſhot againe with the Engliſhmen. The gallies at the firſt had great aduantage, by reaſon of the great calme. Twiſe either part aſſaulted other with ſhot of their great artillerie, but ſuddenlie the wind roſe ſo high, that the gallies could not indure the rage of the ſeas, and ſo the Engliſhmen for feare of flats were compelled to enter the maine ſeas, and ſo ſailed vnto Portſmouth where the king laie, for he had knowledge by his eſpials that the Frenchmen intended to land in the Ile of Wight, wherefore he repaired to that coaſt, to ſee his realme defended.

The French fleet landeth in the Ile of Wight.

The Frenchmen land in Suſſex.

After this, the eighteenth of Iulie the admerall of France monſieur Danebalte hoiſed vp ſailes, and with his whole nauie came forth into the ſeas, and arriued on the coaſt of Suſſex before bright Hamſteed, and ſet certeine of his ſoldiors on land, to burne and ſpoile the countrie: but the beacons were fired, & the inhabitants thereabouts came downe ſo thicke, that the Frenchmen were driuen to flie with loſſe of diuerſe of their numbers: ſo that they did little hurt there. Immediatlie herevpon they made to the point of the Ile of Wight, called ſaint Helens point, and there in good order vpon their arriuall they caſt anchors, and ſent dailie ſixteene of their gallies to the verie hauen of Portſmouth. The Engliſh nauie lieng there in the ſame hauen, made them readie, and ſet out toward the enimies, and ſtill the one ſhot hotlie at the other: but the wind was ſo calme, that the kings ſhips could beare no ſaile, which greatlie grieued the minds of the Engliſhmen, and made the enimies more bold to approch with their gallies, and to aſſaile the ſhips with their ſhot euen within the hauen.

The Marie Roſe drowned by negligence.

The twentith of Iulie, the whole nauie of the Engliſhmen made out, & purpoſed to ſet on the Frenchmen, but in ſetting forward, thorough too much follie, one of the kings ſhips called the Marie Roſe was drowned in the middeſt of the hauen, by reaſon that ſhe was ouerladen with ordinance, and had the ports left open, which were verie low, and the great artillerie vnbreeched; ſo that when the ſhip ſhould turne, the water entered, and ſuddenlie ſhe ſuncke. In hir was ſir George Carew knight and foure hundred ſoldiours vnder his guiding. There eſcaped not paſt fortie perſons of all the whole number. On the morrow after about two thouſand of the Frenchmen landed in the Ile of Wight, where one of their chiefe capteins named le cheualier Daux, a Prouencois was ſlaine with manie other, and the reſidue with loſſe and ſhame driuen backe againe to their gallies.

Frenchmen diſtreſſed in the Ile of Wight.

The king perceiuing the great Armada of the Frenchmen to approch, cauſed the beacons to be fired, and by letters ſent into Hamptonſhire, Summerſetſhire, Wiltſhire, and into diuerſe other countries adioining, gaue knowledge to ſuch as were appointed to be readie for that purpoſe, to come with all ſpeed to incounter the enimies. Wherevpon they repaired to his preſence in great numbers well furniſhed with armor, weapon, vittels, and all other things neceſſarie, ſo that the Ile was garniſhed, and all the frontiers alongeſt the coaſts fortified with exceeding great multitudes of men. The French capteins hauing knowledge by certeine fiſhermen, whom they tooke, that the king was preſent, & ſo huge a power readie to reſiſt them, they diſanchored and drew along the coaſt of Suſſex, and a ſmall number of them landed againe in Suſſex, of whome few returned to their ſhips; for diuerſe gentlemen of the countrie, as ſir Nicholas Pelham, and others, with ſuch power as was raiſed, vpon the ſudden, tooke them vp by the waie and quickelie diſtreſſed them.

The number in the French nauie.

When they had ſearched euerie where by the coaſt, and ſaw men ſtill readie to receiue them with battell, they turned ſterne, and ſo got them home againe without anie act atchiued worthie to be mentioned. The number of the Frenchmen was great, ſo that diuerſe of them that were taken priſoners in the Ils of Wight, and in Suſſex, did report that they were three ſcore thouſand. The French king aduertiſed the emperor moſt vntrulie by letters, that his armie had gotten the Ile of Wight with the ports of Hamton, and Portſmouth, and diuerſe other places. In Auguſt following, the earle of Hertford entered againe into Scotland with twelue thouſand men, and deſtroied all the townes in the middle marches, burned Coldingham abbeie, and paſſed to the weſt marches, ſore annoieng and indamaging the Scots, and yet neither they, nor the Frenchmen that were ſent into Scotland this yeare to the aid of the Scots, vnder the leading of monſieur de Lorges, Montgomerie his father, durſt once come forth into the field to incounter with him.

The earle of Hertford forraieth the middle marches of Scotland.

The Londoners ſet forth a power into France.

Alſo in the beginning of this moneth the citie of London ſet forth a thouſand ſoldiors of archers, harquebutters, pikes, and bils, which went to Douer, and ſo paſſed ouer vnto Calis, to ſerue the king in his wars on that ſide the ſeas. In the ſame moneth that valiant capteine ſir Thomas Poinings knight, lord Poinings, and the kings lieutenant of his towne and marches of Bullogne departed this life, after he had to his great honor atchiued manie worthie enterpriſes in ſeruice of his prince againſt the enimies, ſo that his death was much lamented. A gentleman vndoubtedlie deſeruing to be had in perpetuall memorie: and pitie it is, that diuerſe ſuch valiant feats as he in his life time atchiued, were not committed to writing, to remaine for examples ſake to poſteritie.

The death of the valiant lord Poinings.

The death of the duke of Suffolke.

Alſo in the ſame moneth at Guilford died the noble and valiant duke of Suffolke Charles Brandon lord great maiſter of the kings houſhold, a right hardie gentleman, and yet not ſo hardie, as almoſt of all eſtats and degrees of men, high & low, rich and poore, hartilie beloued, & his death of them greatlie lamented: his bodie was honorablie buried at Windſore, at the kings coſts. This man in his daies had doone to the king and realme right agreeable ſeruices, as well in peace, as in wars, both in England, France, Scotland, and Ireland, he died the kings generall lieutenant of his armie then appointed to reſiſt the Frenchmen, if they durſt haue landed.

His iuſt commendation.

But now, whereas in this meane time we haue ſpoken nothing of the doings in Scotland, where the warre was ſtill continued, the king of France ſent thither certeine bands of Frenchmen, vnder the gouernement of monſieur de Lorges, to aid the Scots againſt the Engliſhmen; and the king of England waged manie ſtrangers, and ſent them with certeine Engliſhmen to the borders, for defenſe of the ſame againſt the inuaſions of the enimies: for after the arriuall of the Frenchmen, a great armie of Scots was raiſed, and approched neere to the borders, where for a certeine time they incamped, ſo that manie thought ſome notable enterpriſe would haue beene attempted. But after they had laine in campe a certeine time, they brake vp, and departed without attempting anie further exploit.

Monſieur de Lorges ſent into Scotland with certeine French bands.

Shortlie after the earle of Hertford lieng on the borders, as lieutenant of the north parts of England, calling to him an armie of twelue thouſand men, or thereabouts, what of Engliſhmen and ſtrangers, entred Scotland with the ſame, and burnt a great part of the Mers, and Teuidale, as Kelſaie abbeie and the towne; Melroſſe abbeie & Driborne abbeie, alſo Iedworth abbeie, and diuerſe other places, townes, and villages, to the number of fiue ſcore. Kelſaie abbeie was defended a while by three hundred Scots, but in the end the moſt part of them were ſlaine, & taken by the ſtrangers and others that gaue the aſſault. Thus the earle of Hertford ſore indamaged the Scots by this inuaſion, and yet neither they, nor the Frenchmen their aſſiſtants, durſt come forth into the field once to incounter with him.

The earle of Hertford inuadeth Scotland.

On the ſixteenth of September a number of Scots and Frenchmen attempted to enter into England on the eaſt borders. But the Engliſhmen perceiuing them about to paſſe by a certeine ſtreict, ſet vpon them, and ſlue and tooke of them to the number of ſeuen ſcore. Among the priſoners that were taken, the lord of Humes ſonne, and a French capteine were accompted chiefeſt. Alſo in another rode made into the weſt borders, the lord Maxwels ſonne, and diuerſe others were taken. But at an other time about the ſame ſeaſon alſo, certeine Engliſhmen to the number of fiue hundred, making their entrie by the weſt borders into Scotland, were diſcomfited by the Scots, and the more part of them either taken or ſlaine. Thus were they occupied as well on the borders betwixt England and Scotland, in this ſeaſon, as alſo in the marches of Calis, Guiſnes, and Bullognois, where the garriſons lieng in thoſe places, made continuall rodes & forraies into the marches of the enimies countrie, and oftentimes chanced to incounter with ſome of their troops.

Ouerthrowes on both ſides, betwixt the Engliſh and Scots.

The capteine of Ard, monſieur de Dampiere, hauing got for a ſupplie from the French campe at Bullogne, the companie of the men of armes that belonged to the duke of Orleance, led by his lieutenant monſieur de Tauannes, chanced on a daie to incounter with the Engliſhmen guided by that valiant baron the lord Greie of Wilton, capteine of the towne of Guiſnes, who being accompanied with a number of valiant gentlemen & ſoldiers, diſtreſſed their enimies, & ſlue the capteine of Ard the foreſaid lord de Dampiere there in field. Diuerſe other ſkirmiſhes and incounters chanced in that ſummer, on the further ſide the ſeas. And moreouer, now after that the French nauie was withdrawen (as ye haue heard) from the coaſts about Porteſmouth, that martiall chiefteine, ſir Iohn Dudleie, lord Liſle, and high admerall of England, hauing all his ſhips, men, munition, & furniture readie, ſet forward from Porteſmouth hauen, to haue fought with the Frenchmen, if they had ſtill kept the ſeas, but they were withdrawne home into harborough.

Wherevpon the lord admerall meaning to reuenge their brauados, and preſumptuous attempts made at Porteſmouth, and in the Ile of Wight, approched to the coaſts of Normandie, and landed with ſix thouſand men at Treport, burnt the ſuburbes of that towne, with the abbeie, and certeine villages and houſes thereabouts. Alſo they deſtroied thirtie ſhips, and a barke there found in the hauen: and after they had wrought their pleaſures, they returned to the ſea, and ſo home, not hauing loſt paſt fourteene perſons in the execution of this whole enterpriſe. Of this great ſpoile & ouerthrow giuen at Treport, by the kings admerall, I find theſe verſes remembred:

—— Treportem paſſibus æquis
Ordine ſeruato (qui mos eſt militis) intrant:
Obuius vt quiſque eſt, is ſtricto ſternitur enſe,
Aſt alius volucri traiectus membra ſagitta,
Occidit exanguis, fœdátque cruore plateas.
Dum recluſa alius vult proſpectare feneſtra,
Nec conferre pedem, nec aperto prælia Marte
Commiſcere audet, glandis transfigitur ictu.
Omne genus telorum ad cædem immittitur atram.

Treporte oppidum Galliæ maritimum à Iohanne Dudleio prefecto regiæ claſſis diripitur & flammis abſumitur.

In this meane while monſieur de Biez, being incamped neere to Bullogne with ſuch a puiſſant armie (as before you haue heard) buſied about the building of a fort, there was not ſuch diligence vſed therin, as was promiſed on his part in accompliſhing the ſame, to the French kings great diſpleaſure (as ſome write) who had meant with that armie (if this fort had beene finiſhed at the appointed time) to haue gone to beſiege the towne and caſtell of Guiſnes: but now the time being prolonged, and not without ſome ſuſpicion leaſt monſieur de Biez cared not how long the warres indured in that ſort, ſo as he might command ouer ſo manie princes and great lords as were there vnder his gouernance, at length before the fort were fullie finiſhed, he remooued to mount Lambert with the more part of the armie, pretending as though he meant to fight with the Engliſhmen, the which (as he ſaid) he vnderſtood were purpoſed to come with a conuoie of vittels from Calis to Bullogne.

Whileſt he there remained, manie princes and great lords came from the court, that laie at an abbeie called forreſt Montier, eleuen leagues from Bullogne beyond Muttrell, on the waie towards Abuille, in hope that battell ſhould haue followed betwixt the Engliſh and French armies. Among other that came thither are theſe remembred as principall, monſieur Danguien, monſieur Daumalle, monſieur le duc de Neuers, monſieur le conte de Lauall, and monſieur de la Trimoille. Monſieur Daumalle eldeſt ſonne to the duke of Guiſe, being lodged in the vantgard that was gouerned by monſieur de Briſſac, chanced on a daie to be preſent at a ſkirmiſh, where ſhewing himſelfe verie forward, he was ſtriken through the ſight of his helmet, with a light horſſemans ſtaffe, that pearſing in betwixt his noſe and his eie, entred halfe a foot into his head, as monſieur de Langeie writeth, and breaking off a two fingers beneath the iron, the ſame iron remained ſtill within his head: but yet eſcaping out of the Engliſh mens hands, he came backe to the campe, had the truncheon and iron pulled out of his head, and being dreſſed was conueied in a litter to Piquignie, where he laie for two or three daies in ſuch danger, that no man looked that he ſhould haue eſcaped with life.

Martin de Bellaie, ſeigneur Langeie in his memoires.

There were manie of theſe ſkirmiſhes, wherin the Engliſhmen bare themſelues ſo valiantlie, that the Frenchmen went awaie oftentimes with loſſe of manie of their noble men and beſt ſouldiers. At one time they loſt the lord Menainuille brother to the lord de Tillebonne, being ſlaine with ſtroke of lance and pike. At another time they loſt likewiſe a yoong lord of Picardie called le ſeigneur de Fretoie. At length, after their new fort or baſtillion was brought in ſome ſtrength, they furniſhed it in moſt defenſible wiſe with men, munition and vittels, naming it Monpleaſire. Herewith monſieur de Biez departing from mount Lambert with part of the armie, came downe towards Calis, and entring into the Engliſh pale beſide Grauelin, wan certeine bulworks, and incountring diuerſe new bands of Leiceſterſhiremen and others, latelie before ſent ouer, diſtreſſed them, and after burnt certeine villages, forraied the countrie almoſt to Marke, and afterwards in great haſt with their bootie and pillage returned. This enterpriſe was exploited by the Frenchmen about S. Mathews daie in September.

Monſieur de Biez forraieth the Engliſh pale about Calis.

There were with monſieur de Biez at this enterpriſe the lord of Briſſac, who gouerned the vantgard, and had with him his owne companie of men of armes, and the light horſſemen of whome he had the generall conduct. There was alſo the companie of men at armes that belonged to the conſtable of France, led by the lord Guich, & fiftie men of armes vnder the gouernance of the lord of Helleie, the companie alſo of the lord of Boiſie, the companie of the lord Eſcars, and that of the lord de la Roch du Maine, & others. There was alſo monſieur de Taies generall of the French footmen, and manie yoong princes and lords of high eſtate, as monſieur Francis de Bourbon, duc Danglien, Francis de Lorraine, duke Daumalle latelie recouered of his hurt, the duke of Neuers, and the earle de Lauall that in this voiage was hurt with an harquebuſh ſhot in the arme.

Martin de Bellaie.

The thrée and twentith of Nouember, a parlement began at Weſtminſter, in the which was granted to the king a ſubſidie of the ſpiritualtie of ſix ſhillings the pound, to be paid in two yeares next inſuing: and of the temporaltie two ſhillings and eight pence of the pound in goods, and foure ſhillings of the pound in lands, to be paid likewiſe within two yeares. Alſo in this parlement all colleges, chanteries, and hoſpitals were committed to the king, to order, by altering or tranſpoſing the ſame as to him ſhould ſéeme expedient, which at the prorogation of the ſame parlement he promiſed ſhould be doone to the glorie of God, and the common profit of the realme. The foure and twentith of December, the ſaid parlement was proroged, on which daie the king comming into the houſe, to giue his roiall aſſent vnto ſuch acts as were paſſed, the ſpeaker made vnto him an eloquent oration, to the which although the cuſtome hath euer béene that the lord chancellor ſhould make anſwer, it pleaſed the king at that preſent to make the anſwer himſelfe, which he vttered as here enſueth.

A parlement. A ſubſidie granted.

The kings oration in the par*lement houſe*.

ALthough my chancellor, for the time being, hath before this time vſed verie eloquentlie and ſubſtantiallie, to make anſwer to ſuch orations as hath béene ſet forth in this high court of parlement; yet is he not ſo able to open and ſet forth my mind and meaning, and the ſecrets of my heart, in ſo plaine and ample manner, as I my ſelfe am and can doo. Wherefore I taking vpon me to anſwer your eloquent oration maiſter ſpeaker, ſaie, that where you in the name of our welbeloued commons, haue both praiſed and extolled me, for the notable qualities that you haue conceiued to be in me: I moſt hartilie thanke you all, that you haue put me in remembrance of my dutie, which is to indeuour my ſelfe to obteine and get ſuch excellent qualities, and neceſſarie vertues, as a prince or gouernour ſhould or ought to haue, of which gifts I recogniſe my ſelfe both bare and barren, but of ſuch ſmall qualities as God hath indued me withall, I render to his goodneſſe my moſt humble thanks, intending with all my wit and diligence to get and acquire to me ſuch notable vertues and princelie qualities, as you haue alledged to be incorporated in my perſon. Theſe thanks for your louing admonition and good counſell firſt remembred, I eftſoones thanke you. Againe, bicauſe that you conſidering our great charge, not for our pleaſure, but for your defenſe, not for our gaine, but to our great coſt, which we haue latelie ſuſteined, aſwell in defenſe of our and your enimies, as for the conqueſt of that fortreſſe, which was to this realme moſt diſpleſant and noiſome, and ſhalbe (by Gods grace) hereafter to our nation moſt profitable and pleaſant, haue fréelie of your owne minds granted to vs a certeine ſubſidie, here in an act ſpecified, which verelie we take in good part, regarding more your kindneſſe, than the profit thereof, as he that ſetteth more by your louing harts than by your ſubſtance. Beſide this hartie kindneſſe, I cannot a little reioiſe, when I conſider the perfect truſt and confidence, which you haue put in me, as men hauing vndoubted hope and vnfeined beléefe in my good doings and iuſt procéedings for you, without my deſire or requeſt, haue committed to mine order and diſpoſition all chanteries, colleges, hoſpitals, and other places ſpecified in a certeine act, firmlie truſting that I will order them to the glorie of God, and the profit of the common-wealth. Surelie if I (contrarie to your expectation) ſhould ſuffer the miniſters of the church to decaie, or learning (which is ſo great a iewell) to be miniſhed, or poore and miſerable to be vnrelieued, you might ſaie that I being put in ſo ſpeciall a truſt, as I am in this caſe, were no truſtie fréend to you, nor charitable to mine euen chriſtian, neither a louer to the publike wealth, nor yet one that feared God, to whome accompt muſt be rendered of all our doings. Doubt not I praie you, but your expectation ſhall be ſerued, more godlie and goodlie than you will wiſh or deſire, as hereafter you ſhall plainlie perceiue.

The kings thanks to his commons.

The kings promiſes for the well diſpoſing of chantries and colleges.

Now ſith I find ſuch kindneſſe on your part towards me, I cannot chooſe but loue and fauour you, affirming that no prince in the world more fauoureth his ſubiects than I doo you; nor no ſubiects or commons more loued and obeied their ſoueraigne lord, than I perceiue you doo me, for whoſe defenſe my treaſure ſhall not be hidden, nor if neceſſitie require, my perſon ſhall not be vnaduentured. Yet although I wiſh you, and you wiſh me, to be in this perfect loue and concord, this fréendlie amitie cannot continue, except both you my lords temporall, and my lords ſpirituall, and you my louing ſubiects, ſtudie and take paine to amend one thing, which ſurelie is amiſſe, and farre out of order, to the which I moſt hartilie require you: which is, that charitie and concord is not among you, but diſcord and diſſention beareth rule in euerie place. Saint Paule ſaith to the Corinthians, and the thirtéenth chapter: Charitie is gentle, charitie is not enuious, charitie is not proud, and ſo forth in the ſaid chapter. Behold then what loue and charitie is among you, when the one calleth an other heretike and anabaptiſt, and he calleth him againe papiſt, hypocrite, and phariſie? Be theſe tokens of charitie amongſt you? Are theſe ſignes of fraternall loue betwéene you? No, no, I aſſure you that this lacke of charitie amongſt your ſelues will be the hinderance and aſſwaging of the feruent loue betwéene vs, as I ſaid before, except this wound be ſalued, and cléerelie made whole. I muſt néeds iudge the fault and occaſion of this diſcord to be partlie by negligence of you the fathers and preachers of the ſpiritualtie: for if I know a man which liueth in adulterie, I muſt iudge him a lecherous and a carnall perſon: if I ſée a man boaſt and brag himſelfe, I cannot but déeme him a proud man. I ſée héere dailie that you of the cleargie preach one againſt another, teach one contrarie to another, inueigh one againſt an other without charitie or diſcretion; ſome be too ſtiffe in their old Mumpſimus, other be too buſie and curious in their new Sumpſimus: thus all men almoſt be in varietie and diſcord, and few or none preacheth trulie and ſincerelie the word of God, according as they ought to doo. Shall I iudge you charitable perſons dooing this? No, no, I cannot ſo doo. Alas, how can the poore ſoules liue in concord, when you preachers ſow amongſt them in your ſermons debate and diſcord? Of you they looke for light, and you bring them to darkeneſſe. Amend theſe crimes I exhort you, and ſet forth Gods word, both by true preaching and good example giuing: or elſe I, whome God hath appointed his vicar and high miniſter here, will ſée theſe diuiſions extinct, and theſe enormities corrected according to my verie dutie, or elſe I am an vnprofitable ſeruant, and an vntrue officer. Although I ſaie the ſpirituall men be in ſome fault, that charitie is not kept amongſt you; yet you of the temporaltie be not cleare and vnſpotted of malice and enuie: for you raile on biſhops, ſpeake ſlanderouſlie of prieſts, and rebuke and taunt preachers, both contrarie to good order and chriſtian fraternitie. If you know ſuerlie that a biſhop or preacher erreth, or teacheth peruerſe doctrine, come and declare it to ſome of our councell, or to vs, to whome is committed by God the high authoritie to reforme and order ſuch cauſes and behauiors, and be not iudges your ſelues, of your owne fantaſticall opinions and vaine expoſitions, for in ſuch high cauſes you may lightlie erre. And although you be permitted to read holie ſcriptures, and to haue the word of God in your mother tong, you muſt vnderſtand, that it is licenced you ſo to doo, onelie to informe your owne conſciences, and to inſtruct your children and familie, and not to diſpute, and make ſcripture a railing and a taunting ſtocke againſt prieſts and preachers, as manie light perſons doo. I am verie ſorie to know and heare, how vnreuerentlie that moſt pretious iewell the word of God is diſputed, rimed, ſong, and tangled in euerie alehouſe and tauerne, contrarie to the true meaning and doctrine of the ſame: and yet I am euen as much ſorie, that the readers of the ſame follow it in dooing ſo faintlie and coldlie. For of this I am ſure, that charitie was neuer ſo faint amongſt you, and vertuous and godlie liuing was neuer leſſe vſed, nor God himſelfe amongſt chriſtians was neuer leſſe reuerenced, honored, or ſerued. Therfore (as I ſaid before) be in charitie one with an other, like brother and brother: loue, dread, and ſerue God, to the which I as your ſupreame head and ſoureigne lord exhort and require you, and then I doubt not, but that loue and league that I ſpake of in the beginning, ſhall neuer be diſſolued or broken betwéene vs. And to the making of laws which we haue now made and concluded, I exhort you the makers to be as diligent in putting them in execution, as you were in making & furthering of the ſame: or elſe your labour ſhall be in vaine, & your common-wealth nothing releeued. Now to your petition, concerning our roiall aſſent to be giuen to ſuch acts as haue paſſed both houſes, they ſhall be read openlie that ye may heare them.

Charitie and concord in common-wealths be things moſt neceſſarie: but in matters of religion, charitie and concord is not enough, without veritie and true worſhip of God.

Then were they openlie read, and to manie his grace aſſented, and diuerſe he aſſented not vnto. Thus the kings oration was to his ſubiects there preſent ſuch comfort, that the like ioie could not be vnto them in this world. And thus the acts read (as the manner is) and his aſſent giuen, his grace roſe and departed. Manie proper feats of armes were exploited and doone in this meane while, betwixt the parties Engliſh and French about Bullongne. On the morrow after the feaſt of the Epiphanie, there came a conuoie of vittels towards the French fort, garded with thrée or foure thouſand lancequenetz vnder their coronell the Reingraue and certeine French horſſemen. The earle of Surreie then lieutenant of Bullongne aduertiſed thereof, made out with ſuch power as he might conuenientlie ſpare of them within Bullongne and the Old man, to cut off thoſe vittels: but comming to encounter with the enimies at ſaint Eſtiens, he was put to flight: ſir Edward Poinings capteine of a band called the kings gard of Bullongne was ſlaine in that conflict with fiftéene or ſixtéene other capteins, beſide officers and common ſoldiors. About the ſame time the Frenchmen made a voiage vnto the Iſle of Braſill, with a ſhip called the barke Ager, which they had taken from the Engliſhmen before: and in their waie they met with a little craier, of the which one Golding was maſter, a proper man and an hardie. The barke perceiuing the craier to be an Engliſhman, ſhot at hir and bowged hir. Whereupon ſtrait waies the craier drew to the great barke, and ſix or ſeauen of the Engliſhmen leapt into hir. In the meane time while the Frenchmen, without regard of perill towards themſelues, looked ouer hatches to behold how the craier ſunke there at hand before them, not miſtruſting anie thing that the Engliſhmen might doo againſt them, it fortuned that thoſe Engliſhmen which got vp into the barke, found in the end thereof a great number of lime pots, which they with water quenched, or rather (as the nature thereof is) ſet them on fire, and threw them ſo thicke at the Frenchmen which were there aboord, that they blinded them, in ſuch wiſe as thoſe few Engliſhmen that entred the ſhip vanquiſhed the Frenchmen, and driuing them vnder hatches, ſhut the ſame, and brought the barke awaie with them home into England. In the latter end of March the brothell houſes called the Stues on the banke ſide in Southworke were conuerted from ſuch filthie vſes by the kings commandement, the bawds and ruffians being put out, and other perſons of honeſt behauior plaſed in their roms to inhabit in the ſame houſes. This was doone by proclamation and ſound of trumpet by an herald of armes.

¶On the ſeuen and twentith of Aprill being tueſdaie in Eaſter wéeke William Forleie pot-maker for the mint of the Tower of London fell aſléepe, and ſo continued ſléeping, and could not be wakened with pricking, cramping, or otherwiſe burning whatſoeuer, till the firſt daie of the next terme, which was full fouretéene daies, and as manie nights or more, for that Eaſter terme beginneth not before ſeauentéene daies after Eaſter. The cauſe of his thus ſléeping could not be knowen, though it were diligentlie ſearched for by the kings phyſicians and other learned men, yea the king himſelfe examining the ſaid William Forleie, who was in all points found at his waking to be but as if he had ſlept but one night: he was liuing in the Tower of London in the yéere of our Lord God 1579.]

Ab. Fl. ex I.S. William Forleie ſlept more than fouretéene daies, and as manie nights without waking.

This yéere by meanes made by the emperor, commiſſioners were appointed to méet & treat of ſome accord betwéene the realmes of England & France, ſo that the king of England ſent ouer to Guiſnes, Cutbert Tunſtall biſhop of Dureſme, ſir William Paget his ſecretarie, and doctor Tregonell: and the French king ſent to Ard a biſhop, the chiefe preſident of Rouen, and a notarie, but no concluſion followed of their trauell. Whervpon the king of England hauing perfect knowledge how the Frenchmen intended to build a fortreſſe at ſaint Iohns rode betwéene Bullongne and Calis, to the great annoiance of both thoſe places, if they might haue compaſſed their purpoſe; he meant to preuent that deuiſe of his aduerſaries, ſending ouer the earle of Hertford and the lord Liſle high admerall of England, with manie valiant capteins, which got the rode but two daies before the Frenchmen had appointed to be there. But when they vnderſtood that the Engliſhmen had ſo preuented them, they ſtaied about Hardilow, where monſieur de Biez their generall gaue order to incampe, and durſt not once come forward to aſſaie the Engliſh forces: ſo that without anie impeachment by land, the Engliſhmen built certeine fortreſſes, to wit, two at the ſame place of ſaint Iohns rode, otherwiſe called Hamble Thew, and an other about a two miles from thence at a place called Blacke Neſſe. There was in the earle of Hertfords campe beſide Engliſhmen diuerſe ſtrangers, Almains, Spaniards and Italians. And becauſe it is not much impertinent to the matter, we haue thought good here to ſet downe the whole number of all the kings forces at that preſent in his paie that were there vnder the ſaid earle of Hertford the kings generall lieutenant. Firſt the earle had two hundred, the lord William Sturton thrée hundred, the lord Iohn Greie brother to the marques Dorſet two hundred, the lord Braie one hundred, ſir Thomas Seimer knight marſhall of the hoſt one hundred, ſir Henrie Kneuet capteine of the horſſemen one hundred, ſir Iohn Harrington treaſuror of the armie one hundred, ſir Thomas Wiat maſter of the

Anno Reg. 38.

Hamble Thew fortified by the Engliſhmen, ordinance one hundred, ſir Mauris Barkleie thrée hundred, ſir Thomas Holcroſt two hundred, ſir Walter Dennis two hundred, ſir George Blewet two hundred, ſir Richard Gréenefield two hundred, ſir George Cornewall two hundred, ſir John Lutterell one hundred, ſir Edmund Huſſie one hundred, Gorge Throkmorton two hundred, capteine Broughton two hundred, capteine Palmer two hundred, capteine Chancie two hundred, capteine Windam two hundred, capteine Stukeleie one hundred, capteine Blewet one hundred, capteine Sidnam one hundred, capteine Bret one hundred, capteine Dier one hundred, capteine Euans one hundred, Spaniards fiftéene hundred, Italians two hundred, Cleueners thrée hundred; lancequenets vnder the gouernment of their coronell Conrade Phenning, commonlie called Courtpennie, thrée thouſand. The ſumme of all the ſoldiors in Bullongne & Bullongnois were 93000. Here you muſt note, that whileſt the Engliſh armie laie thus in the field till the forts of Hamble Thew and Blacke Neſſe were in building, the French gallies were on the ſeas, and now and then came and approched néere to the ſhore, where the Engliſh armie laie in campe, at the which they ſhot off their ordinance: and the Engliſhmen anſwered them againe with the like. They came alſo before Calis, and ſhot off at the towne. But the lord admerall being there, made out to encounter them, notwithſtanding they did firſt much hurt, and tooke awaie diuerſe of the Engliſh veſſels laden with vittels.

The eightéenth daie of Maie there were foure of the kings ſhips, and foure pinaſes abroad on the ſeas afore the hauen of Hamble Thew, and there came eightéene of the French gallies to ſet vpon them, and ſo there was great ſhooting betwéene them: and at length one of their gallies was taken, in the which were aboord fourtéene ſcore ſoldiors and ſeauen ſcore rowers: the reſt of their gallies packed awaie. Moreouer, whileſt the campe laie thus at Hamble Thew, it chanced that on a daie a mutinie roſe among the lancequenets againſt their capteine, ſo that they got themſelues into order of battell, ſeized vpon the great artillerie, and ſhewed countenance as if they would haue ſet vpon the reſidue of the whole campe. Herevpon euerie ſoldior was commanded to repaire to his enſigne, and the Spaniards came and ioined with the Engliſhmen, readie to take ſuch part as they did. At length by the diligence of the chiefteines, and good countenance of the Engliſh ſoldiors and Spaniards the tumult was ſtaied, and ſix of the principall beginners were hanged.

A French gallie taken,

A mutinie in the Engliſh campe.

The one and twentith of Maie the French armie came and incamped beyond Bullongne at the church on the hill: and the morrow after the earle of Hertford marched with his power to a place within two miles of them, and certeine footmen and horſſemen went forth and ſkirmiſhed with them; and in the meane time the artillerie ceaſſed not to ſhoot off, as well from the French campe and fortreſſe as from Bullongne and the Old man. This daie were ſlaine fouretéene Frenchmen and two taken priſoners; and thrée of the Engliſh part were likewiſe taken, and ſo the earle of Hertford returned to his campe, and left the lancequenets vpon the hill, incamped before the enimies faces, not two miles diſtant from them, in which place a fort was begun to be raiſed, which was after called the fort of Bullongne Berg. The next daie, to wit, the thrée and twentith of Maie the ſoldiors of Bullongne and the lancequenets ſkirmiſhed with the Frenchmen, ſlue and tooke of them ſeuen ſcore and aboue, of the which there were fortie that were in cotes of veluet, and diuerſe alſo with chaines.

A great ſkirmiſh,

Here you muſt vnderſtand, that now in this meane while by the motion of diuerſe princes, a méeting was had of ſundrie commiſſioners, appointed to treat of ſome peace, to be concluded betwixt the two kings of England and France. Herevpon there came to Guiſnes for the king of England the earle of Hertford, the biſhop of Wincheſter, ſir John Dudleie vicount Liſle baron of Maupas, and high admerall of England, ſir William Paget the kings ſecretarie, and doctor Nicholas Wotton deane of Canturburie. For the French king there came to Ard monſieur Claude Danebault admerall of France, being alſo one of the foure marſhals of that realme, the biſhop of Eureux, monſieur Reimund chiefe preſident of Rone, the ſecretarie Bouchetell. Diuerſe times they met betwixt Ard and Guiſnes, and after long debating of matters, and diuerſe breakings off: yet at length the ſeauenth of June a peace was concluded, and proclamed as well in the court as in the citie of London on Whitſundaie the thirtéenth of June, with ſound of trumpet, according to the manner: and in like ſort the ſame daie it was proclamed at Paris and at Rone. The chiefeſt article of which peace was this, that the French king paieng to the king of England 800000 crownes within the terme of eight yeares, ſhould haue Bullongne againe to him reſtored, which in the meane time ſhould remaine in the hands and poſſeſſion of the king of England, as a pledge and gage for aſſurance of the ſaid moneie.

A peace concluded and proclamed.

On the ſeuen & twentith of June doctor Crome recanted at Paules croſſe: which recantation was vrged vpon this occaſion. When the chanteries & colleges were giuen by act of parlement into the kings hands (as is aboue remembred) which was about the moneth of December 1545, the next lent following doctor Crome preaching in the mercers chappell, among other reaſons and perſuaſions, to rouſe the people from the vaine opinion of purgatorie, inferred this, grounding vpon the ſaid act of parlement: that if trentals and chanterie maſſes could auaile the ſoules in purgatorie, then did the parlement not well in giuing awaie monaſteries, colleges, & chanteries, which ſerued principallie to that purpoſe. But if the parlement did well (as no man could denie) in diſſoluing them & beſtowing the ſame vpon the king, then is it a plaine caſe, that ſuch chanteries and priuat maſſes doo nothing conferre to reléeue them in purgatorie. This Dilemma of doctor Crome, no doubt, was inſoluble: but notwithſtanding the charitable prelats (for all the kings late exhortation vnto charitie) were ſo charitable to him that they brought him Coram nobis, and ſo handled him that they made him recant his words. ¶ On the ſixtéenth of June were letters patents deliuered to ſir Thomas Cheinie treaſuror of the kings houſhold, and lord warden of the cinque ports, wherby he was authoriſed to be the kings agent in chriſtening the Dolphins daughter of France named Elizabeth. A true copie of which letters patents is here recorded, bicauſe the ſaid action hath béene ignorantlie tranſferred from the ſaid ſir Thomas Cheinie to ſir Henrie Kneuet: as appeareth in Holinſheds chronicle publiſhed 1577, pag. 1608.

The king hauing paſſed ouer the foreſaid letters patents to ſir Thomas, and he in forwardneſſe to execute his charge, to the intent that his retinue and attendants ſhould no waies offenſiuelie behaue themſelues againſt the French, with whom the king was verie carefull to continue and mainteine the peace interchangeablie agreed vpon and concluded, his maieſtie to preuent and cut off all occaſions that might anie waie impeach, interrupt, or violate this peace, commanded the lords of his councell to direct letters withall expedition to the ſaid ſir Thomas, then vpon his voiage into France, conteining a preſcript forme of demeanor, which the gentlemen & yeomen attendant vpon him in France ſhould vſe, during the time of their abode in thoſe forren parts: a copie of which letter, being a teſtimoniall of the king of Englands inclinable mind to peace hereafter followeth out of the verie originall, as the ſame was ſubſcribed by the lords.

A copie of the ſaid letters ſent in poſt to ſir Thomas Cheinie being vpon his voiage into France.

AFter our right hartie commendations to your good lordſhip. The kings maieſtie hath willed vs to ſignifie vnto you, that his highneſſe expreſſe pleaſure and commandement is, ye ſhould in his maieſties name declare to ſuch gentlemen as accompanie you into France, that they haue in remembrance ſo to vſe & behaue themſelues among the Frenchmen as well on the waie as at the court, in ſuch ſort as they by communication vpon feats of the warre paſſed giue no occaſion of priuat diſpleaſure. Wherein therefore it ſhall be expedient, that either they ſaie nothing, vnleſſe they be prouoked; or in that caſe call the things happened fortune de la guerre, without compariſon of things chanced on our part or on theirs, but turne the communication to reioiſe in peace. In the conditions whereof they ſhall pretend ignorance, without ſpeaking of the keeping ſtill of Bullogne, or deliuerance of it againe, but as ſhall pleaſe the princes for the continuance of peace, wherein by Gods grace the crueltie of warre ſhall be conuerted into extreamitie of friendſhip, to the weale and commoditie of both realmes.

And forſomuch as there want not in the world naughtie men of the ſtate of moonks and friers, who for malice of the alteration of their eſtate here, would gladlie defame our religion towards God, as though we had with them caſt out all; his highneſſe expreſſe pleaſure and commandement is, that conſidering at this firſt entrie of you, the behauiour of your companie ſhall be much marked and noted in matters of religion and circumſtances: of the ſame they ſhould therfore haue ſo much the more regard both to their communications and alſo behauiors, and not onelie in ſpeech to forbeare to diſpute or intermedle with the ſtate of their policy there, but alſo in their diet on the fiſh daie and deuout hearing of maſſe, follow the order of the kings maieſties relme, ſo as their conuerſation & behauior maie be cõfuſion to ſuch as would defame this realme in the contrarie. Thus fare your good lordſhip right hartilie well. From Greenewich the ninteenth of Iune 1546. Your lordſhips aſſured louing friends, *Thomas Wriotheſleie canc. W: Saint-Iohn. I: Ruſſell. Cutb: Dureſme. Steph: Winton. Anthonie Brenne. Haſt, poſt haſt for thy life, to Douer, Calis, or where he ſhall chance to be: haſt, haſt.

Thus farre of ſir Thomas Cheinie, imploied about the kings affaires in France; namelie the christening of the Dolphins daughter: wherein we haue béene the more copious in words, bicauſe it hath béen publiſhed, that ſir Henrie Kneuet was thervnto perſonallie deputed: which to be vntrue, both the letters patents and the letter miſſiue doo ſufficientlie proue: both which we receiued at the hands of an *ancient ſeruitor, attendant vpon the ſame ſir Thomas at his béeing in France to execute his charge in the kings behalfe. Of which worthie knight when we come to the yeare and daie of his death, we will deliuer further report to his high commendation, but yet none otherwiſe than as by warranted intelligence we ſhall be directed.]

*Henrie Tenant.

The ſame time was a combat fought before the French king betwixt two Spaniards, Iulian Romeron, and one Morow. They both ſerued the king of England in the laſt wars againſt France: but Morow had reuolted from his ſeruice to the French kings, and for certeine ſpéeches which he had vttered, was chalenged to fight the ſaid combat by the ſaid Iulian, for whome ſir Henrie Kneuet vndertooke that he ſhould ſtand to his chalenge, and trie it with his aduerſarie, which he now did, and vanquiſhed him in liſts, the fight being appointed on horſſebacke. Incontinentlie after, ſir Henrie Kneuet ſickned and died at Corbell, and was buried in Paris within the church of S. Paule. Moreouer, for the full eſtabliſhment of the peace, and to receiue the French kings oth, the vicount Liſle lord admerall, with the biſhop of Dureſme, and diuerſe other lords, and gentlemen, tlemen, to the number of one hundred and aboue, all in veluet cotes and chaines of gold, with fiue and fortie yeomen right ſeemelie appointed, went into France, departing from Bullogne the tenth of Iulie, and came to Meſlune a towne beyond Paris, where the French king then laie, by whome and the Dolphin his ſonne they were roiallie receiued, feaſted, and banketted: and hauing doone that for the which he was ſent, the ſaid lord admerall Dudleie the firſt of Auguſt tooke his leaue of the French king, who rewarded him with a cupboord of plate all gold, valued at 1500 pounds. The lords alſo and gentlemen had chaines of gold giuen to them, and the yeomen had two hundred crownes beſtowed amongſt them, and ſo the lord admerall returned into England. This lord admerall, during the time that he had to deale with the French, ſo valiantlie demeaned himſelfe, and was ſuch a terror and aſtoniſhment to the enimie, as it is left written of him, that they durſt not queech in his preſence, but were like a ſort of timorous cattell, giuing roome to the raging lion ranging ouer the paſtures with hir yoonglings, and making the verie heauens to ring with hir roring, after ſhe hath filled hir ſelfe with bulles fleſh, and laid hir ſelfe downe to reſt being wearie with eating; the compariſon verie aptlie followeth:

The lord admerall Dudleie went into France to receiue the Frẽch kings oth.

Tantus terror erat Gallis Dudleius Heros.

In the ſame moneth of Auguſt monſieur Danebalt high admerall of France, accompanied with the biſhop of Eureux, the earle of Nanteuill knight of the order, the earle of Villiers, the chiefe preſident of Roan, ſecretarie Bouchetell, monſieur de Canaples knight of the order, monſieur de Taies knight of the order, monſieur de Maillerie viceadmerall of France, monſieur de Deſſe, the baron de la Gard, with diuerſe other lords and capteines of honor, beſide two hundred gentlemen well appointed, leuſed from Deepe with twelue gallies and a right faire ſhip called the Sacre of Deepe, and ſo making ſaile he ſtaied not anie where to take land, till he came into the Thames, where at Blackewall he was receiued into the kings barge by the earles of Darbie and Eſſex, who brought him to Greenewich, where he landed, and lodged there that night.

An ambaſſage forth of France.

The next daie he came vp with all his gallies, and landed at the Tower wharfe. Vpon all the banks by the water ſide were laid peeces of artillerie, which ſhot off freelie, and ſo likewiſe did all the artillerie in the ſhips, but ſpeciallie from the Tower was ſhot a maruellous great peale of ordinance. From whence being landed, they rode thorough London in great triumph (the maior and the crafts ſtanding in the ſtreets in verie good order) vnto the biſhops palace by Paules, where the French admerall lodged till Bartholomew euen, on which daie he was conueied toward Hampton court, where in the waie the prince hauing with him the archbiſhop of Yorke, the earles of Hertford and Huntington, and aboue two thouſand horſſe, met him and imbraſed him in ſuch courteous and honorable wiſe, that all the beholders greatlie reioiſed, and much maruelled at the ſaid princes high wit and great audacitie, and ſo the French admerall came to the court, giuing the prince the vpper hand as they rode. And at the vtter gate of the court, the lord chancellor, and all the kings councell receiued him, and brought him to his lodging.

The kings ſhips that laie in the riuer betwixt Grauesend & Detford, ſhot off luſtilie, & likewiſe the French gallies hailed them againe.

The French admerall receiued by prince Edward.

On Bartholomew daie the king admitting him to his preſence, welcomed him, and in great triumph went to the chappell, where the king receiued his oth to performe the articles of the league, as it was couenanted. To ſpeake of the bankettings, huntings, and ſuch like honorable ſorts of interteinements, it were much to vtter, and hard to beleeue. But on fridaie following, being the ſeuen and twentith of Auguſt, he being rewarded with a cupboord of plate, to the value of twelue hundred pounds, returned to London, and on the ſundaie next inſuing tooke his gallies and departed. Beſide the kings gifts, he had giuen to him by the citie of London two flaggons guilt, and two other that were parcell guilt, valued at one hundred thirtie ſix pounds, beſide wine, wax, and torches. There were diuerſe of his companie alſo that went not awaie vnrewarded, hauing both plate, and alſo manie horſſes, and greihounds giuen them.

The admerall of France receiueth an oth.

His gifts that he had of the king & others.

Although this peace pleaſed both the Engliſh and French nations, yet ſuerlie both miſtruſted the continuance therof. And verelie the old prouerbe ſeemed to be throughlie verefied, which ſaith, that what the eie ſeeth, the hart rueth: for the Frenchmen ſtill longed for Bullogne, and the Engliſhmen meant not willinglie to giue it ouer. For during the French admerals being in England, monſieur de Chatillon capteine of Montplaiſier began to make a new baſtilion euen at the verie mouth of the hauen, naming it Chatillons garden. Wherevpon that noble gentleman the lord Greie of Wilton, ſhortlie after appointed to be deputie of the towne and countie of Bullogne, perceiuing the great inconuenience that this new building would bring to the towne if it went forwards, did aduertiſe the king thereof, earneſtlie beſeeching his grace, that the matter might be throughlie conſidered of. Sir Thomas Palmer was the meſſenger.

The lord Greie of Wilton.

Sir Thomas Palmer.

The king vpon the intelligence, aſked his councels aduiſe, which onelie went wholie, that the conditions of the peace were not in anie wiſe to be infringed. This reſolued, ſecretarie Paget then knight, and afterwards lord, was commanded accordinglie to draw a letter to the lord Greie, the which the king himſelfe did ſigne, willing that the meſſenger ſhould further know of his pleaſure before he departed. Wherevpon ſir Thomas Palmer, hauing his diſpatch at the ſecretaries hands, did get word to be giuen to the king, who preſentlie ſent for him into his priuie chamber, and betwixt them two, vſed theſe words: Palmer, you haue there a letter from vs to the lord Greie, that he doo in no wiſe deale in the matter that he hath by you aduertiſed vs of. Notwithſtanding, I will that you deliuer him this meſſage from vs.

King Henries meſſage to the lord Greie by ſir Thomas Palmer.

Bid him call to mind how that his brethren and himſelfe not a ſhort time, but euen from tender yeares, nor farre off, but ſtill neere to our perſon, we haue brought him vp, which (tell him) not vniuſtlie, if that be in him that we conceiue dooth breed in vs an od truſt of feruencie to ſerue vs of him, more than a common ſeruant or ſubiect. By that token will him whatſoeuer I haue written to the contrarie, that he preſentlie impeach the fortification of Chatillons garden, and raſe it if it be poſſible: and this my meſſage ſhall be his cleering therein, & the ſeruice gratefullie accepted. Sir Thomas Palmer ſomewhat aſtonied hereat, conſidering the weightineſſe of the cauſe, and the contrarietie of the letter and meſſage, began to put the king in mind of the ſmall credit that his bare errand of right was like to haue, ſo flat againſt that which his maieſties letters imported. But the king cutting off his tale; Deliuer thou the meſſage (quoth he) at his choiſe then be the executing thereof.

Sir Thomas thus diſpatched, with great ſpeed arriued at Bullogne immediatlie vpon the opening of the gates at after noone. His letters and meſſage deliuered, the lord Greie ſtreight aſſembled the councell, ſhewed them the kings letters, which read, he cauſed ſir Thomas to pronounce before them the meſſage alſo. Euerie man was to ſaie his aduiſe: it went roundlie through the boord without anie queſtion, that the letter was to be followed, the meſſage not to be ſtaied on. The lord Greie hauing heard, and not replieng anie thing, willed ſir Thomas to be called in againe, bad him repeat his meſſage, and therwhileſt made a clearke of the councell to write the ſame verbatim. This doone, he praied the whole table to ſet their hands vnto it, which they did, and the lord Greie taking the ſame into his hands, without further opening, declaring his reſolution, brake vp councell, commanded ſtreight the gates to be ſhut, gaue priuie warning, that certeine bands with armour and weapon, and likewiſe pioners ſhould that night by an houre be in a readines.

Chatillons garden ouerthrowen and raſed downe.

The houre came, himſelfe with the warned companie iſſued out, paſſed ouer the water, and without anie alarum of the enimie, did ouerthrow in thrée or foure houres, what in two or thrée moneths had bin raiſed, and ſo in great quietneſſe returned into the towne. Preſentlie he diſpatched ſir Thomas Palmer backe againe to the king with the newes, whoſe returne was ſo ſudden, as the king himſelfe being in the chamber of preſence, & ſéeing him, ſaid alowd: What? Will he doo it or no? Sir Thomas giuing no other anſwer, but preſenting his letters, and ſaieng, that thereby his maieſtie ſhould know. The king againe in earneſt mood, Naie tell vs I ſaie, whether he will doo it or not? Then ſir Thomas told him that it was doone, and the whole fortification cleane raſed. Whereat the king taking great ioy, preſentlie called to certeine of the lords of the councell that were by, and ſaid: How ſaie you my lords, Chatillons garden the new fort is laid as flat as this floore. One ſtreight amongſt them gaue iudgement, that he that had doone it, was worthie to loſe his head. The king ſtreight replied, he had rather loſe a dozen ſuch heads as his was that ſo iudged, than one ſuch ſeruants as had doone it: and herewith he commanded, that the lord Greies pardon ſhould preſentlie be made, the which with a letter of great thanks, and promiſe of reward, was returned by the ſaid ſir Thomas Palmer to the ſaid lord Greie; but the reward failed, the king not continuing long after in life: the like hap whereof had oftentimes happened vnto diuerſe of his worthie anceſtors vpon their due deſerts to haue béene conſidered of, and therefore the caſe the leſſe ſtrange.

The lord Greies ſeruice verie honorablie accepted of the king.

This haue I ſet downe the more willinglie, for that I haue receiued it from them, which haue heard it reported, not onlie by the lord Greis owne mouth, but alſo by the relation of ſir Thomas Palmer, and others that were preſent: the ſame not tending ſo much to the lord Greies owne praiſe, as to the betokening of the kings noble courage, and the great ſecret truſt which he worthilie repoſed in the ſaid lord Greie. Here is to be noted alſo, leſt any man ſhould miſtake the matter, as if the king dealt indirectlie herein, that his maieſtie knowing how the Frenchmen in going about to build this fort, did more than they might by the couenants of the peace; and therefore was reſolued at the firſt aduertiſement thereof, to haue it raſed. But yet for that it might happilie haue béene ſignified ouer vnto the Frenchmen, before my lord Greie could haue accompliſhed the feat, he therefore wiſelie wrote one thing in his letters, whervnto manie might be priuie, and ſent ſecret knowledge by words contrarie to the contents of the ſame letters, ſo as if the meſſenger were truſtie, his pleaſure might not be diſcouered to the hinderance or diſappointing of the ſame. But now to our purpoſe.

The French king after this, bicauſe as yet he would not ſéeme to breake the peace, commanded the trenches and new fortifications made about this fortreſſe, called Chatillons garden thus caſt downe, to be filled by his owne people, and ſo it reſted during the life of king Henrie: but afterwards it was begun againe, and finiſhed, as after ye ſhall heare. About Michaelmas in this preſent yeare, Thomas duke of Norffolke, and Henrie earle of Surrie that was his ſonne and heire, vpon certeine ſurmiſes of treaſon, were committed to the tower of London, and immediatlie after Chriſtmas, the thirtéenth of Ianuarie, the king then lieng in the extremities of death, the ſaid earle was arreigned in the Guildhall of London, before the lord maior, the lord chancellor, and diuerſe other lords and iudges being there in commiſſion. Where if he had tempered his anſwers with ſuch modeſtie as he ſhewed token of a right perfect and readie wit, his praiſe had béene the greater. Some things he flatlie denied, ſéeking to weaken the credit of his accuſers by certeine circumſtances: other he excuſed with interpretations of his meaning, to proue the ſame to be far otherwiſe than was alleged againſt him.

The duke of Norffolke committed to the tower.

And one ſpeciall matter amongeſt other wherewith he was charged, was, for bearing certeine arms that were ſaid to belong to the king, and to the prince. The bearing whereof he iuſtified and mainteined, that (as he tooke it) he might beare them as belonging to diuerſe of his anceſtors, and withall affirmed, that he had the opinion of heralds therein. But yet to his indictment he pleaded not giltie: and for that he was no lord of the parlement, he was inforced to ſtand to the triall of a common inqueſt of his countrie, which found him giltie, and therevpon he had iudgement of death: and ſhortlie after, to wit, the 19 of Ianuarie, he was beheaded on the tower hill. ¶ In this moneth of Ianuarie, the church of the late graie friers in London was opened, and maſſe ſoong there: and that daie preached at Paules croſſe the biſhop of Rocheſter, who declared the kings gift to the citie of London, for the relieuing of the poore people, which was by patent vnder his great ſeale. Saint Bartholomews ſpittle, the church of the graie friers, and two pariſh churches, the one of ſaint Nicholas in the ſhambles, the other ſaint Ewine in Newgate market, all to be made one pariſh church of the graie friers church; and in lands he gaue for the maintenance of the ſame 500 markes by yeare for euer, & this church to be named Chriſts church, founded by king Henrie the eight.]

The earle of Surrie beheaded.

I.S.pag.1034. King Henrie his gift to the citie of London.

The duke was atteinted by parlement, and the atteindor after reuerſed in the firſt yeare of quéene Marie. The euill hap as well of the father, as of the ſonne, was greatlie lamented of manie, not onelie for the good ſeruice which the duke had doone in his daies in defenſe of this realme, but alſo for that the earle was a gentleman well learned, and knowne to haue an excellent wit, if he had béene thankefull to God for the ſame, and other ſuch good gifts as he had indued him withall. The king now lieng at the point of death, made his laſt will and teſtament, wherein he not onelie yéelded himſelfe to almightie God; but alſo tooke order, that during the minoritie of his ſonne prince Edward, his executors ſhould be councellors and aiders to him in all things, as well concerning priuate as publike affaires. They were ſixtéene in number, whoſe names were as hereafter followeth.

The duke atteinted.

The deceaſe of king Henrie the eight.

So ſoone as the noble king had finiſhed his laſt will and teſtament, as afore is ſaid, he ſhortlie therevpon yeelded vp his ſpirit to almightie God, departing this world the eight and twentith daie of Januarie, in the eight and thirtith yeare of his reigne, and in the yeare of our Lord 1546, after the accompt of the church of England; but after the accompt which we follow in this booke 1547, beginning our yeare the firſt of Januarie. He reigned thirtie and ſeuen yeares, nine moneths and od daies. His bodie (according to his will in that behalfe) was conueied to Windſor with all funerall pompe, and in the college there interred. Of this treſnoble and treſpuiſſant monarch, I find theſe few verſes, which maie ſerue in good ſtead of an epitaph or funerall inſcription:

Henricus octauus poſt 38. annos moritur.

Henricus princeps propè luſtra peregerat octo,
Et populum magna prudens cum laude regebat,
Ex quo magna ſoli tractauit ſceptra Britanni:
Cùm Deus omnipotens, morbo obrepente, moneret
Hinc emigrandum de vita. Proh dolor ingens!
Quot pia plebs lachrymis quàm triſtibus ora rigauit?
Quàm grauiter regni proceres planxere cubantem?
Anglia tota iacet mœrens, lugubris & amens,
Nil opis apportant medici, nil profuit herba,
Quæ ſolet humanis membris adferre ſalutem,
Pharmaca nil proſunt, præbetur potio fruſtra:
Heu nulla triſtis mors eſt medicabilis arte.

The deſcription of king Henrie the eight.

This noble prince was right fortunate in all his doings, ſo that commonlie whatſoeuer he attemted, had good ſucceſſe, as well in matters of peace as of wars. Of perſonage he was tall and mightie, in his latter daies ſomwhat groſſe, or as we tearme it, bourlie: in wit and memorie verie perfect: of ſuch maieſtie tempered with humanitie, as beſt became ſo noble and high an eſtate: a great fauorer of learning, as he that was not ignorant of good letters himſelfe: he was of great magnificence and liberalitie, inſomuch that Iohn Leland that worthie antiquarie, hauing taſted of his roiall bountifulneſſe, hath left no leſſe teſtified to the world in a proper epigram, which I will not omit, leaſt I ſhould wilfullie conceale a manifeſt proteſtation of his thankfulneſſe left witneſſed vnto the world in writing:

Ad Henricum octauum, regem Angliæ, maximum ſtudioſorum amatorem.

Antè ſuos Phœbus radios oſtendere mundo
Deſinet, & claras Cynthia pulchra faces:
Antè fluet rapidum tacitis ſine piſcibus æquor,
Spinifer & nullam ſentis habebit auem:
Antè ſacræ quercus ceſſabunt ſpargere ramos,
Floráq; ſollicita pingere prata manu:
Quàm rex diue tuum labatur pectore noſtro
Nomen, quod ſtudijs portus & aura meis.

And the ſame Iohn Leland, who deſeruedlie had taſted the fruits of the kings largeſſe, was not vnacquainted with the fame of his renowme, which had made it ſelfe knowne by reſtles flight to nations far and neare, ſome to their ſmart hauing felt the valor of his forces, and others ſubmitting themſelues for feare of vtter deſolation. Wherevpon he became a terror to his enimies, and yet none more deſirous of peace than he, if by anie other meanes (beſides violence) the ſame might haue beene obteined. Sufficient cannot be ſaid in his high & merited commendation, conſidering that as his victories were ſingular, ſo were they alſo manifold; and hard it is for the pen of a cunning rhetorician to paint him out according to his dignitie: howbeit the ſaid Iohn Leland hath left in writing a proper epigram, deuiſed in praiſe of this moſt excellent king, by way of compariſon, to his immortall commendation, as here followeth:

Comparatio in gloriam Henrici octaui regis potentiſsimi.

Quantum puniceis nouo roſetis

1547

Shortlie herevpon the earle of Hertford with other of the lords reſorted to Hatfield, where the yoong king then laie, from whence they conducted him with a great and right honorable companie to the Tower of London. During the time of his abode there, for the good gouernement of the realme, the honour and ſuertie of his maieſties perſon, his vncle Edward earle of Hertford, was by order of the councell, and the aſſent of his maieſtie (as one moſt meeteſt to occupie that roome) appointed gouernour of his roiall perſon, and protector of his realmes, dominions and ſubiects, and ſo proclamed the firſt of Februarie by an herald at armes, and ſound of trumpet through the citie of London in the vſuall places thereof, as it was thought expedient.

The earle of Hertford choſen protector.

The ſixt daie of Februarie the earle of Hertford lord protector adorned king Edward with the order of knighthood, remaining then in the Tower, and therewith the king ſtanding vp, called for Henrie Hubblethorne lord maior of the citie of London, who comming before his preſence, the king tooke the ſword of the lord protector, and dubbed the ſaid Hubblethorne knight, he being the firſt that euer he made. The ſeauenteenth of Februarie the lord protector was created duke of Summerſet, the earle of Eſſex was created marqueſſe of Northhampton, the lord Liſle high admerall of England was created earle of Warwike and high chamberlaine of England, ſir Thomas Wriotheſleie lord chancellour was created earle of Southhampton, ſir Thomas Seimer was aduanced to the honour of lord of Sudleie and high admerall of England, which office the earle of Warwike then reſigned, ſir Richard Rich was made lord Rich, and ſir William Willoughbie was created lord Willoughbie of Parrham, ſir Edmund Sheffield was made lord Sheffield of Butterwike; and as ſaith a late writer of this action:

Lord protector made duke of Summerſet

Vt quiſque eſt ditione potentior, auctus honore,
Et noua virtutis ſumens inſignia fulget.

The king rideth through London to weſtminſter.

At the ſame time great preparation was made for the kings coronation, ſo that the foure and twentith of Februarie next inſuing, his maieſtie came from the Tower, and ſo rode through London vnto Weſtminſter, with as great roialtie as might be, the ſtreets being hoong, and pageants in diuerſe places erected, to teſtifie the good willes of the citizens, reioiſing that it had pleaſed God to deale ſo fauourablie with the Engliſh nation to grant them ſuch a towardlie yoong prince to their king and ſoueraigne thus to ſucceed in place of his noble father. ¶ Now as he rode through London toward Weſtminſter, and paſſed on the ſouth part of Pauls churchyard, an Argoſine came from the battlements of the ſteeple of Paules church vpon a cable, being made faſt to an anchor by the deanes gate, lieng on his breaſt, aiding himſelfe neither with hand nor foot, and after aſcended to the middeſt of the cable, where he tumbled and plaied manie pretie toies, whereat the king and the nobles had good paſtime.]

K. Edward crowned.

The morrow after being Shrouesundaie and the fiue and twentith of Februarie, his coronation was ſolemnized in due forme and order, with all the roialtie and honour which thereunto apperteined. Shortlie after the coronation, to wit, the ſixt of March, the erle of Southhampton, lord chancellour of England, for his too much repugnancie (as was reported) in matters of councell to the reſidue of the councellors about the king, was not onelie depriued of his office of chancellor, but alſo remooued from his place and authoritie in councell, and the cuſtodie of the great ſeale was taken from him, and deliuered vnto ſir William Paulet lord Saint-Iohn, that was lord great maiſter of the kings houſhold.

The lord chancellor diſcharged of his roome.

Alſo ſhortlie after his coronation, the kings maieſtie by the aduiſe of his vncle the lord protector and other of his priuie councell, minding firſt of all to ſeeke Gods honor and glorie, and therevpon intending a reformation, did not onelie ſet forth by certeine commiſſioners, ſundrie iniunctions for the remoouing of images out of all churches, to the ſuppreſſing and auoiding of idolatrie and ſuperſtition within his realmes and dominions, but alſo cauſed certeine homilies or ſermons to be drawne by ſundrie godlie & learned men, that the ſame might be read in churches to the people, which were afterward by certeine of theſe commiſſioners ſent forth as viſitors, accompanied with certeine preachers, tho-

At Eaſter next following, he ſet out alſo an order thorough all the realme, that the ſupper of the lord ſhould be miniſtred to the laie people in both kinds. ¶ On the fiftéenth of Maie doctor Smith recanted at Paules croſſe.]

Rich. Grafton.

All theſe things doone concerning religion (as before is ſaid) the lord protector and the reſt of the councell, calling to mind the euill dealing and craftie diſſimulation of the Scots, concerning the matter of marriage betwixt the kings maieſtie, and the quéene of Scotland (which marriage as ye haue heard, in the fiue and thirtith yeare of king Henrie the eight, was by authoritie of parlement in Scotland fullie concluded) thought it not to ſtand with the kings honor to be in ſuch maner by them deluded, and withall conſidering how greatlie it ſhuld turne to the quietneſſe and ſafetie of both realmes to haue theſe two princes conioined in matrimonie, they did deuiſe ſundrie waies and meanes how the ſame might be brought to paſſe, and the rather (as ſome doo write) for that king Henrie (before his death) had giuen them in ſpeciall charge by all indeuours to procure that the ſaid marriage might take place, as wholie wiſhing by the coniunction of thoſe two yong princes, the vniting of the two kingdoms in perpetuall amitie and faithfull league of loue; as our poet ſaith:

Optat coniugio duo regna coire fideli,
Aeternam pacem hinc æternáque fœdera iungi.

But the lords of Scotland were ſo inueigled and corrupted by the French king, and abuſed by cardinall Beton, archbiſhop of ſaint Andrewes, and other of their clergie, that they not onelie ſhranke from that which they had promiſed, but alſo ſought to deſtroie thoſe that fauored the king of Englands part: wherevpon a great and puiſſant armie was now prepared to paſſe by land into Scotland, and likewiſe a nauie to paſſe by ſea to attend vpon the ſame: whereof the great gallie and foure and twentie tall ſhips were thoroughlie furniſhed with men and munition for the warres, beſides manie merchants ſhips and other ſmall veſſels, which ſerued for carriage of vittels, and other neceſſaries.

Chiefteines in the armie.

But now to ſhew what noble men and other were ordeined officers, and aſſigned to haue the conduction as well of the armie by land, as of the fléete by ſea; ye ſhall vnderſtand, that firſt the duke of Summerſet, lord protector, tooke vpon him to go himſelfe in perſon, as generall of the whole armie, and capteine alſo of the battell or middle-ward, wherin were foure thouſand footmen. The marſhall erle of Warwike appointed lord lieutenant of the ſame armie, led the fore-ward conteining thrée thouſand footmen. The lord Dacres gouerned in the rere-ward, wherein were other thrée thouſand footmen. The lord Greie of Wilton was ordeined high marſhall of the ſaid armie & capteine generall of all the horſſemen, being in number ſix thouſand. Sir Rafe Sadler knight treaſuror of the armie. Sir Francis Brian knight, capteine of the light horſſemen, in number two thouſand.

Sir Rafe Vane knight lieutenant of all the men of armes and demilances. Sir Thomas Darcie knight capteine of all the kings maieſties penſioners, and men at armes. Sir Richard Leigh knight deuiſer of the fortifications. Sir Peter Mewtas knight capteine of the harquebutters, which were in number ſix hundred. Sir Peter Gamboa knight, capteine of two hundred harquebutters on horſſebacke. Sir Francis Fleming knight was maſter of the ordinance. Sir George Blaag & ſir Thomas Holcroft commiſſioners of the muſters. Edward Shelleie, the lord Greies lieutenant of the men of armes of Bullongne, who was the firſt that gaue the onſet in the daie of battell, and died moſt honorablie in the ſame. Iohn Brenne capteine of the pioners being in number a thouſand foure hundred. Thomas Audeleie and Edward Chamberleine harbengers of the field.

The chiefteins that commanded in the nauie by ſea were theſe.

The lord Edward Clinton admerall of the fléet: ſir William Woodhouſe knight his viceadmerall. There were in the armie of great ordinance fiftéene péeces, and of carriages nine hundred carts, beſide manie wagons, whereof the commiſſarie generall was George Ferrers. As ſoone as the armie by land was in a readineſſe, and ſet forward to come to Berwike at a daie appointed, the nauie likewiſe tooke the ſea, and by the helpe of Gods good guiding had ſo proſperous ſpeed in their paſſage, that they arriued at Berwicke in time conuenient, whither vpon the thirtith of Auguſt being tueſdaie, the lord protector came, and laie in the caſtell with ſir Nicholas Strelleie knight, capteine there. The next daie commandement was giuen that euerie man ſhould prouide himſelfe for foure daies vittels to be caried forth with them in carts.

The lord protector cauſeth Aimouth riuer to be ſounded.

On thurſdaie the firſt of September the lord protector, not with manie more than with his owne band of horſſemen, rode to a towne ſtanding on the ſea coaſt, a ſix miles from Berwike within Scotland called Aimouth, whereat there runneth a riuer into the ſea, which he cauſed to be ſounded, and finding the ſame well able to ſerue for an hauen, cauſed afterwards a fortreſſe to be raiſed there, appointing Thomas Gower, that was marſhall of Berwike, to be capteine thereof. On fridaie, all ſauing the councell departed the towne of Berwike, and incamped a two flight ſhoots off, by the ſea ſide, toward Scotland. And the ſame daie the lord Clinton with his fléet tooke the ſeas from Berwike, to the end that in caſe the wind ſhould not ſerue them to kéepe courſe with the armie by land; yet were it but with the driuing of tides, they might vpon anie néed of munition or vittels be ſtill at hand, or not long from them.

Sir Rafe Sadler treaſuror of the Engliſh armie.

A proclamation.

The ſame daie the earle of Warwike, and ſir Rafe Sadler treaſuror of the armie, came to Berwike from Newcaſtell, where they had ſtaid till then, for the full diſpatch of the reſt of the armie, and the next daie the earle of Warwike incamped in field with the armie. On which daie a proclamation with ſound of trumpet was made by an herald in thrée ſeuerall places of the campe, ſignifieng the cauſe of the comming of the kings armie at that preſent into Scotland, which in effect was, to aduertiſe all the Scotiſh nation, that their comming was not to depriue them of their liberties, but to aduance the marriage alreadie concluded and agréed vpon betwixt the kings maieſtie of England and their quéene, and no hoſtilitie ment to ſuch as ſhould ſhew themſelues furtherers thereof. On the fourth of September being ſundaie, the lord protector came from out of the towne, and the armie raiſed, and marched that daie a ſix miles, and camped by a village called Roſtan in the baronrie of Boukendall.

The order of the armie in marching forward.

The order of their march was this. Sir Francis Brian capteine of the light horſſemen, with foure hundred of his band, tended to the ſkout a mile or two before. The carriages kept along the ſea coaſt, and the men at armes and demilances diuided into thrée troops, anſwering the thrée wards, rid in araie directlie againſt the cariages a two flight ſhots aſunder from them. The thrée foot battels kept order in place betwixt them both. The fore-ward foremoſt, the battell in the middeſt, the rere-ward hindermoſt, ech ward hauing his trope of horſſemen and gard of ordinance, his aid of pioners for amendment of waies, where néed ſhould be. The fift of September they marched an eight miles, vntill they came to the Peaths, a clough or vallie, running for a ſix miles weſt ſtreight eaſtward, and toward the ſea a twentie ſcore brode from banke to banke aboue, and a fiue ſcore in the bottome, wherein runnes a little riuer. Stéepe is this vallie on either ſide, and déepe in the bottome.

The Peaths.

The Scots had caſt trenches ouerthwart the ſide waies on either ſide, in manie places, to make the paſſage more cumberſome: but by the pioners the ſame were ſoone filled, and the waie made plaine, that the armie, carriage, & ordinance were quite ſet ouer ſoone after ſun ſet, & there they pitched downe their campe. Whileſt the armie was thus paſſing ouer this cumberſome paſſage, an herald was ſent from the lord protector, to ſummon a caſtell, that ſtood at the end of the ſame vallie, a mile from the place where they paſſed downe towards the ſea. Matthew Hume capteine thereof, a brothers ſonne of the lord Humes, vpon his ſummons required to ſpeake with the lord protector. It was granted, and he came, whome the lord protector handled in ſuch ſort with effectuall words, putting him in choiſe whether he would yéeld, or ſtand to the aduenture, to haue the place woone of him by force, that he was contented to render all at his graces pleaſure.

An Engliſh herald ſent from the lord protector to ſummon a caſtell.

And ſo being commanded to go fetch his companie out of the houſe, he went and brought them, being in all one and twentie perſons. The capteine and ſix other were ſtaied and commanded to the kéeping of the marſhall, the reſidue were ſuffered to depart whither they thought good. After this ſurrender, the lord John Greie brother to the marques Dorſet, was appointed to ſeize & take poſſeſſion of the houſe, being capteine of a great number of demilances, as for his approoued worthineſſe and valiancie right well he might, agréeable to the deſerued report remaining of him in print in forren ſpéech as followeth:

———Graius heros
Ob ſummam belli cataphractis præfuit artem.

The ſpoile was not rich ſure, but of white bread, oten cakes, and Scotiſh ale indifferent good ſtore, and ſoone beſtowed among my lords ſoldiors; for ſwords, bucklers, pikes, pots, pans, yarne, linnen, hempe, and heaps of ſuch baggage, which the countrie people there about had brought into that pile, to haue it in more ſuretie, the ſoldiors would ſcarſe vouchſafe to ſtoope and take the ſame vp.

In the meane time the lord protector appointed the houſe to be ouerthrowne, which by the capteine of the pioners was doone, though with ſome trauell, by reaſon the walles were ſo thicke, and the foundation ſo déepe, and thereto ſet vpon ſo craggie a plot. Tueſdaie the ſixt of September, the armie diſlodged and marched forward. In the waie as they ſhould go, a mile and an halfe from Dunglas northward were two piles or holds, Thornton & Anderwike, ſet both on craggie foundations, & diuided a ſtones caſt a ſunder by a déepe gut, wherein ran a little riuer. Thornton belonged to the lord Hume, and was kept by one Thom Trotter, who vpon ſummons giuen him to render the houſe, lockt vp a ſixtéene poore ſoules like the ſoldiors of Dunglas faſt within the houſe, tooke the keies with him, commanding them to defend the place till his returne, which ſhould be on the morrow, with munition and releefe: and this doone, he and his prickers prickt (as ſaith maiſter Patten) quite their waies.

The caſtell of Dunglas ouerthrowne:

Thornton. Anderwike.

Thom Trotter.

Anderwike perteined to the lord of Hambleton, and was kept by his ſon and heire, whome of cuſtome they call the maſter of Hambleton, & eight more gentlemen for the moſt part, as was reported. The lord protector at his comming nigh, ſent vnto both theſe places, which vpon ſummons refuſing to render, were ſtreight aſſailed; Thornton by batterie of foure great péeces of ordinance, and certeine of ſir Peter Mewtas hackbutters, and Anderwike by a ſort of the ſame hackbutters, who ſo well beſtirred them, that where theſe kéepers had rammed vp their outer doores, cloied and ſtopt their ſtaires within, and kept themſelues for defenſe of their houſe about the battlements, the hackbutters got in, and fired them vnderneath, whereby being greatlie troubled with ſmoke, they cried for mercie, which the lord protector meant to grant them; but yer the meſſenger came, the hackbutters were got vp to them, & killed eight of them aloft: one leapt ouer the walles, and running more than a furlong, was after ſlaine without in a water.

The lord of Hambleton.

The pile of Anderwike woone.

All this while at Thornton was the aſſault on the Engliſh part, and the defenſe by them within ſtoutlie continued: but at length when they perceiued in what danger they ſtood, and how little able they were to helpe themſelues, or to annoie the aſſailants, they pluckt in a banner which they had hoong forth, in token of defiance, and put forth a white linnen clout tied to a ſtickes end, crieng all with one tune for mercie: but hauing anſwer by the whole voices of the aſſailers that they were traitors, and that it was too late, they pluckt in their ſticke, and ſet vp againe their banner of defiance, and ſhot off, hurled ſtones, & did what elſe they could with great courage of their ſide, & ſmall hurt of the aſſailants. Wherefore perceiuing that they could not long kéepe out, being on the one ſide battered, and mined on the other, kept in with hackbutters on ech ſide, and ſome of the Engliſhmen being got into the houſe below, for they hauing ſhopt vp themſelues alſo in the higheſt of their houſe, pluckt in againe their banner, and cried eftſoones for mercie, but being anſwered generallie by the aſſailants, that they ſhould neuer looke for it, they fell to make this petition, that if they ſhould néeds die, they might rather ſuffer by hanging, and ſo reconcile themſelues to God, than to die in malice with ſo great danger of their ſoules.

This ſute was ſo furthered to the dukes grace by ſir Miles Partrige that was néere at hand when they made this ſute, that it was granted; and they comming forth, humbled themſelues, and without more hurt they were but commanded to the prouoſt marſhall, who kept them for a time, and were after releaſed. The houſe was ſhortlie after ſo blowen with pouder, that more than the one halfe of it fell ſtreight downe to duſt and rubbiſh, the reſt ſtood all to ſhaken with rifts and chinks. Anderwike alſo was burned, and all the houſes of office, and ſtacks of corne about them both. While this was in doing the dukes grace, in turning but about, ſaw the fall of Dunglas, which likewiſe was vndermined and blowen vp with pouder.

Sir Miles Partrige.

Thornton yéelded.

The piles of Thornton and others defaced.

This doone, about noone the armie marched, and paſſing by Dunbar, the caſtell ſent them diuerſe ſhots of artillerie, but all in vaine. The Scotiſh prickers ſhewed themſelues in the field with proffer of ſkirmiſh, but to no great purpoſe, one of them being killed with a ſhot of one of Barteuils men an hackbutter on horſſebacke. The armie hauing marched that daie a ten miles, lodged at night néere vnto Tantallon, and had a blind alarum. Marching the next morning a two miles, they came to a riuer called Lin, where there is a ſtone bridge, named Linton bridge of a towne thereby on the right hand as the armie marched, and ſtanding eaſtward vpon the ſame riuer: the horſſemen and carriages paſſed through the water, for it was not verie déepe, and the footmen ouer the bridge. The paſſage was ſtreict for an armie, and therfore the longer in ſetting ouer.

Hailes caſtell.

Beyond this bridge about a mile weſtward vpon the ſame riuer, on the ſouth ſide ſtandeth a proper caſtell called Hailes, perteining to the earle of Bothwell, but kept as then by the gouernors appointment, who held the earle in priſon. Out of this caſtell as the lord protector paſſed forward in following the fore-ward, there were roundlie ſhot off (but without hurt) ſix or ſeuen péeces, the which before that (though ſome of the armie had béene verie nigh) yet kept they all couert. In the meane time roſe a thicke miſt, which cauſed a great diſorder in the rere-ward, by reaſon they could not ſée about them. The earle of Warwike therefore doubting leaſt the enimies, who had béen pricking vp and downe néere to the armie, and offered ſkirmiſh the ſame morning, ſhould now by occaſion of the miſt attempt ſome feat to the annoiance of the Engliſhmen in their paſſage, his lordſhip himſelfe ſcant with ſixtéene horſſes (whereof Barteuill, and Iohn de Ribaud Frenchmen were two, ſeuen or eight light horſſemen more, and the reſt being his owne ſeruants) returned toward the paſſage to ſée the arraie againe.

A ſubtile practiſe of the Scots.

The Scotiſh horſſemen perceiuing our horſſemen to haue paſſed on before, and thinking (as the truth was) that ſome capteine of honor did ſtaie for the looking to the order of this rere-ward, they kéeping the ſouth ſide of the riuer, did call ouer to ſome of the armie, to know whether there were anie noble man nigh there? They were aſked whie they aſked? One of them anſwered, that he was ſuch a one whoſe name the Engliſhmen knew to be honorable among the Scots, and would come in to the dukes grace, ſo that he might be ſure to come in ſafetie. Some yoong ſoldiors nothing ſuſpecting the craftie falſhood of the Scots, told him that the earle of Warwike was nigh there, by whoſe tuition he ſhould be ſafelie brought to my lord protectors preſence. They had cand their leſſon & fell to their practiſe, which was this. Hauing come ouer the water, in the waie as the earle ſhould paſſe, they had cowched about two hundred of their prickers, and had ſent fortie beſide to ſearch where my lord was, whome when they had found, part of them prickt verie nigh, whome ten or twelue of the earles ſmall companie did boldlie incounter, and droue them well-nigh home to their ambuſh, fléeing perchance not ſo much for feare as for falſhood, to bring them within their danger. But hereby informed that the earle was ſo nigh, they ſent out a bigger number, and kept the reſt more ſecret vpon this purpoſe, that they might either by a plaine onſet diſtreſſe him, or elſe by faining of flight to haue trained him within danger of their ambuſh. And thus inſtructed, they came pricking toward his lordſhip apaſe. Whie (quoth he) & will not theſe knaues be ruled? Giue me my ſtaffe. The which then with ſo valiant a courage he charged at one (as it was thought) Dandie Car, a capteine among them, that he did not onelie compell Car to turne, and himſelfe chaſed him aboue twelue ſcore togither, all the waie at the ſpeares point, ſo that if Cars horſſe had not béene excéeding good and wight, his lordſhip had ſurelie run him through in this race, but alſo with his little band cauſed all the reſt to flée amaine. After whome as Henrie Vane, a gentleman of the ſaid earles, and one of his companie did fiercelie purſue foure or fiue Scots, ſuddenlie turned, and ſet vpon him, and though they did not altogither eſcape his hands frée, yet by hewing and mangling his head, bodie, and manie places elſe, they did ſo cruellie intreat him, as if reſcue had not come the ſooner, they had ſlaine him outright. Here was Barteuill run at ſideling, and hurt in the buttocke, and one of the Engliſhmen ſlaine: of Scots againe none ſlaine, but thrée taken priſoners, whereof one was Richard Maxwell, and hurt in the thigh; who had béene long in England not long before, and had receiued right manie benefits, both of the late kings liberalitie, and of the earle of Warwike, and of manie other nobles and gentlemen in the court beſide.

But to conclude, if the earle of Warwike had not thus valiantlie incountred them, yer they could haue warned their ambuſh how weaklie he was garded, he had béene beſet round about by them yer he could haue bin aware of them, or reſcued of other. Whereas hereby his lordſhip vndoubtedlie ſhewed his wonted valor, ſaued his companie, and diſcomfited the enimie. As Barteuill the Frenchman that daie had right honeſtlie ſerued, ſo did the lords right honorablie acquite it: for the earle of Warwike did get him a ſurgion, and dreſſed he was, ſtreight after laid and conueied in the lord protectors owne chariot. The reſt that were hurt were here alſo dreſt, Scots and others.

Lang Nuddreie.

The armie hauing marched that ſame daie nine miles, incamped at night by a towne ſtanding on the Frith called Lang Nuddreie. The next morning being thurſdaie the eight of September, in time of the diſlodging of the Engliſh campe, ſigne was made to ſome of the ſhips (whereof the moſt part and chiefeſt laie a ten or twelue miles in the Forth, beyond vs, ouer againſt Lieth & Edenborough) that the lord admerall ſhould come a ſhore, to ſpeake with the lord protector. In the meane time, ſomewhat earlie as our gallie was comming toward vs, about a mile and more beyond our campe, the Scots were verie buſie, wafting here on ſhore toward them with a banner of ſaint George that they had, ſo to traine them to come on land there: but the earle of Warwike ſoone diſappointed the policie, for making toward that place where the lord admerall ſhould come on ſhore, the Engliſhmen on the water by the ſight of his preſence, did ſoone diſcerne their friends from their foes.

Order taken for the placing of the ſhips.

The lord admerall herevpon came to land, and riding backe with the earle vnto the lord protector, order was taken, that the great ſhips ſhould remoue from before Lieth, and come to lie before Muſkelborough; and the Scotiſh campe which laie there in field alreadie aſſembled, to reſiſt the Engliſh power that marched thus towards them. The ſmaller veſſels that were vittelers were appointed to lie néerer to the armie. The lord admerall herevpon, being returned to the water, & the armie marching onward a mile or two, there appéered aloft on a hill, that laie longwiſe eaſt and weſt, and on the ſouth ſide of them, vpon a ſix hundred of their horſſemen prickers, whereof ſome within a flight ſhot, directlie againſt the Engliſhmen, ſhewed themſelues vpon the ſame hill, & more further off.

The Scotiſh prickers ſhew themſelues.

Toward theſe, ouer a ſmall bridge that laie ouer a little riuer there, verie hardlie did ride about a dozen haquebutters on horſſebacke, and held them at baie ſo nie to their noſes, that whether it were by the goodneſſe of the ſame haquebutters, or the badneſſe of them, the Scots did not onelie not come downe to them, but alſo verie courteouſlie gaue place, and fled to their fellowes. The armie went on, but ſo much the ſlowlier, bicauſe the waie was ſomewhat narrow, by meanes of the Forth on the one ſide, and certeine mariſhes on the other. The Scots kept allwaies paſe with them, till there were ſhot off two field péeces twiſe, wherewith there was a man killed, and the leg of one of their horſſes ſtriken off, which cauſed them to withdraw, ſo that the Engliſhmen ſaw no more of them, till they came to the place where they meant to incampe, for there they ſhewed themſelues againe aloft on the fore remembred hill, ſtanding as it were to view and take muſter of the armie: but when the lord Greie made towards them, minding to know their commiſſion, they wiſelie went their waie, and would not once abide the reaſoning.

Little elſe was doone that daie, but that George Ferrers, one of the duke of Summerſets gentlemen, and one of the commiſſioners of the cariages in the armie, perceiuing where certeine Scots were got into a caue vnder the earth, ſtopping ſome of the vents, and ſetting fire on the other, ſmothered them to death, as was thought it could be none other, by coniecture of the ſmoke breaking forth at ſome of the other vents. The Engliſh ſhips alſo taking their leaue from before Lieth, with a ſcore of ſhot or more, and as they came by ſaluting the Scots in their campe alſo, with as manie, came and laie according to appointment. The armie hauing marched this daie about a fiue miles, incamped at Salt Preſton by the Forth. On fridaie the ninth of September, the Engliſh armie lieng in ſight & view of the Scotiſh campe, that laie two miles or therabouts from them, had the Forth on the north, and the hill laſt remembred on the ſouth, the weſt end whereof is called Faurſide Braie, on the which ſtandeth a ſorie caſtell, and halfe a ſcore houſes of like worthineſſe by it, and had weſtward before the Engliſhmen, the Scots lieng in campe. About a mile from the Engliſh campe were the Scots horſemen verie buſie, pranking vp and downe, & faine would haue beene a counſell with the Engliſhmens doings; who againe, bicauſe the Scots ſeemed to ſit to receiue them, did diligentlie prepare that they might ſoone go to them, and therfore kept within their campe all that daie.

Faurſide Braie.

The lord protector and the councell ſitting in conſultation, the capteines and officers prouiding their bands, ſtore of vittels, and furniture of weapons, for furtherance whereof our veſſels of munition and vittels were here alreadie come to the ſhore. The Scots continued their brauerie on the hill, the which the Engliſhmen not being ſo well able to beare, made out a band of light horſſemen, and a troope of demilances to backe them: the Engliſhmen and ſtrangers that ſerued among them, got vp aloft on the hill, and thereby of euen ground with the enimie rode ſtreight toward them with good ſpeed and order, whom at the firſt the Scots did boldlie countenance and abide: but after, when they perceiued that our men would needs come forward, they began to pricke, and would faine haue beene gone, yer they had told their errand. But the Engliſhmen haſted ſo ſpeedilie after, that euen ſtreight they were at their elbowes, and did ſo ſtoutlie then beſtirre them, that what in the onſet at the firſt, and after in the chaſe, which laſted a three miles welnie to as far as the furtheſt of their campe on the ſouth ſide, they had killed of the Scots within a three houres, aboue the number of thirteene hundred, and taken the maiſter of Hume, the lords Humes ſonne and heire, two prieſts and ſix gentlemen, whereof one by ſir Iaques Granado, and all vpon the higheſt and welneere nigheſt of the hill toward the Scots, within the full ſight of their whole campe.

The Scots horſſemen diſcomfited and put to flight.

Engliſhmen taken.

On the Engliſh part one Spaniſh haquebutter hurt, and taken ſir Raſe Bulmer knight, Thomas Gower marſhall of Berwike, and Robert Crouch, all capteins of ſeuerall bands of the Engliſh light horſſemen, and men of right good courage and approued ſeruice, & at this time diſtreſſed by their owne too much forwardneſſe, and not by the enimies force. To conclude, of fifteene hundred horſſemen for ſkirmiſh, and fiue hundred footmen to lie cloſe in ambuſh, and to be readie at need, which came that morning out of their campe, there returned not home aboue ſeuen hundred, and diuerſe of thoſe ſore hurt, and among other, the lord Hume himſelfe, for haſt in the flight, had a fall from his horſſe, and burſt the canell bone of his necke, that he was faine to be caried ſtreight to Edenborough, and finallie there departed this life of that hurt. So that it is true which C. O. ſaith, that in this ſkirmiſh manie a good rider was diſmounted, their horſſes with emptie ſaddles and looſe bridles running vp hill and downe dale, as if they had beene ſtarke mad, and to conclude (ſaith he)

The lord Hume hurt with a fall in the chaſe.

Then after this, the lord protector, and the earle of Warwike, and other of the councell, with a ſmall gard, mounting vp the hill where the ſlaughter had beene made, about halfe a mile ſoutheaſt from the Scotiſh campe, tooke full view therof, the plot where they laie, ſo choſen for ſtrength, as in all their countrie (ſome thought) not a better, ſaue on the ſouth by a great mariſh, & on the north by the Forth, which ſide they fenſed with two field peeces, and certeine haquebutters a crooke, lieng vnder a turffe wall, Edenborough on the weſt at their backes, and eaſtward betweene the Engliſhmen and them ſtronglie defended by the courſe of a riuer called Eſke, running north into the Forth, which as it was not verie deepe of water, ſo were the bankes of it ſo high and ſteepe, as a ſmall ſort of reſiſtants might haue beene able to keepe downe a great number of commers vp. About a twelue ſcore from the Forth, ouer the ſame riuer, is there a ſtone bridge, which they did keepe alſo well garded with ordinance.

When the lord protector, and the earle of Warwike had viewed euerie thing, as they thought expedient, they returned home towards their campe, alongſt before the campe of the enimies, within leſſe than two flight ſhoots, entring into a lane of thirtie foot broad, fenſed on either ſide with a wall of turffe, an ell of heigth. The Scots did often ſhoot at them in the waie as they paſſed thus homewards, without hurt, ſauing the killing of an horſſe among three hundred, the rider eſcaping elſe harmeleſſe. And as the dukes grace was paſſed welnie halfe the waie homewards, a Scotiſh herald with a cote of his princes armes vpon him (as the maner is) and with him a trumpetter, ouertooke them.

A Scotiſh herald deliuereth a meſſage to the duke of Summerſet.

The herald declaring this meſſage to the lord protector, pretended to come from the gouernour, to inquire of priſoners taken, and therewith to proffer honeſt conditions of peace. And after he had told his tale, then began the trumpetter, and ſaid, how he was ſent from the earle of Huntleie: My lord my maiſter (ſaith he) hath willed me to ſhew your grace, that bicauſe this matter maie be the ſooner ended, and with leſſe hurt, he will fight with your grace for the whole quarell, twentie to twentie, ten to ten, or elſe himſelfe alone with your grace man to man. The lord protector hauing kept with him the lord lieutenant, had heard them both throughlie, and then in anſwering, ſpake ſomewhat with lowder voice, than they had doone their meſſages. Wherevpon they that were the riders by, thinking that his grace would haue it no ſecret, were ſomewhat the bolder to come neerer, the words whereof were vttred ſo expeditelie with honour, and ſo honourablie with expedition, that the ſtanders by were mooued to doubt whether they might rather note in them the promptneſſe of a ſingular prudence, or the boldneſſe of a noble courage: and they were thus.

The lord protectors anſwer.

Your gouernour maie know, that the ſpeciall cauſe of our comming hither was not to fight, but for the thing that ſhould be the weale, both of vs and you. For God we take to record, we mind no more hurt to the realme of Scotland, than we doo to the realme of England, and therefore our quarell being ſo good, we truſt God will proſper vs the better. But as for peace, he hath refuſed ſuch conditions at our hands, as we will neuer proffer againe: and therefore let him looke for none, till this waie we make it: and thou trumpetter, ſaie to thy maiſter, he ſeemeth to lacke wit ſo to make this chalenge to me, being of ſuch eſtate, by the ſufferance of God, as to haue ſo weightie a charge of ſo pretious a iewell, the gouernance of a kings perſon, & then the protection of all his realms, whereby in this caſe I haue no power of my ſelfe, which if I had, as I am true gentleman, it ſhould be the firſt bargaine I would make: but there be a great ſort amongſt vs his equals, to whome hee might haue made this chalenge without refuſall.

The earle of Warwikes requeſt and meſſage to the earle of Huntleie.

Then quoth the lord lieutenant to them both, He ſheweth his ſmall wit to make this chalenge to my lords grace, and he ſo meane, but if his grace will giue me leaue, I ſhall receiue it: and trumpetter bring me word thy maiſter will ſo doo, and thou ſhalt haue of me an hundred crownes. Naie (quoth my lords grace) the earle of Huntleie is not meet in eſtate with you, my lord: but herald ſaie to the gouernor, and him alſo, that we haue beene a good ſeaſon in this countrie, and are here now but with a ſober companie, and they a great number, and if they will meet vs in field, they ſhall be ſatiſfied with fighting inough: and herald bring me word if they will ſo doo, and by my honour I will giue the a thouſand crownes. Ye haue a proud ſort among you, but I truſt to ſee your pride abated ſhortlie, and of the erle Huntleies too: Iwis he is a glorious yoong gentleman.

This ſaid, the earle of Warwike continued his requeſt, that he might receiue this chalenge: but the lord protector would in no wiſe grant it. Theſe meſſengers had their anſwers, and therewith leaue to depart. The Scots in midſt of this meſſage, dooing contrarie to the order of warre, which as it granteth ſafetie to heralds and trumpetters, to paſſe betwixt armie and armie: ſo during the time of anie ſuch meſſage, as this was, hoſtilitie on both parts ought to ceaſſe, but it ſkilled not. On the morow after, they had their guns taken from them (as ſaith maiſter Patten) and put into their hands that could vſe them with more good maner. But now concerning the meſſage of the herald, it was thought that he was ſent therewith, not for that it was beleeued of them, that it would be accepted; but rather that whileſt he was dooing his errand, he might ſurueie the Engliſh power: or elſe for that vpon refuſall of the offer, they might vſe the victorie (whereof they accounted themſelues aſſured) with more crueltie.

The order of war touching heralds violated.

Of nothing they doubted more, than leaſt the Engliſhmen would haue beene gone backe, and gotten to the water, before they ſhould haue incountered them, and therefore they had appointed to haue giuen the Engliſh armie a camiſado in the night before the daie of the battell: but peraduenture, vnderſtanding that the Engliſhmen had warning of their intention, and were prouided for them if they had come, they ſtaied and came not at all. But in the morning, they were vp verie timelie, and being put in order of battell, they marched ſtreight towards the Engliſh campe, againſt whome then, though they ſaw the Engliſh horſſemen readilie to make: yet could not be perſuaded, but that it was for a policie to ſtaie them, till the Engliſh footmen and cariages might fullie be beſtowed a ſhipboord, and that for the ſame purpoſe the Engliſh ſhips were come backe from before Lieth.

The vaine doubt of the Scots.

In the night of this daie, the dukes grace appointed, that earlie in the next morning part of the ordinance ſhould be planted in the lane (wherof mention before is made) vnder the turfe of the wall, next to their campe, and ſome alſo to be ſet vpon the hill nie to Vndreſke church afore remembred: and this to the intent we ſhould with our ſhot cauſe them either wholie to remooue their campe, or elſe much to annoie them in that place where they laie. It was not the leaſt of the Engliſhmens meaning alſo to win from them certeine of their ordinance, that laie neereſt vnto this church. And herewith the ſame morning, being the tenth of September, and Saturday, ſomewhat before eight of the clocke, the Engliſh armie diſlodged, & marched ſtreight toward the church of Vndreſke, as well for intent to haue incamped neere the ſame, as for placing their ordinance, and other conſiderations afore remembred.

Ordinance plãted againſt the enimie.

Saturday, the tenth of September, the daie of the battell.

The Scots either for feare of the Engliſhmens departing, or hope of their ſpoiling, were out of their campe comming toward them, paſſed the riuer, gathered in araie, and well neere at this church, yer the Engliſhmen were halfe waie to it, ſo quite diſappointing the Engliſhmens purpoſe. Which at the firſt ſeemed verie ſtrange in their eies, as altogither beſide their expectation, as they that thought they would neuer haue forſaken their ſtrength, to meet them in the field. But after it was knowne that they did not onelie thus purpoſe to doo, but alſo to haue aſſailed them in their campe, as they laie if they had not beene ſtirring the timelier, and hauing cauſed all their tents to be let flat downe to the ground, yer they came out, bicauſe none ſhould lie lurking behind them in their campe, and as well the nobles as other, leauing their horſſes behind them (except ſuch as were appointed to ſerue on horſſebacke) marched on with their ſouldiors on foot.

They came ſpeedilie forwards on both ſides, the one till then no whit aware of the others intent: but the Scots indeed with a rounder paſe betweene two hillocks, betwixt the Engliſhmen and the church, muſtred ſomewhat brim, at whome as they ſtaied, the Engliſh gallie ſhot off, & ſlue the maiſter of Greime, with fiue and twentie others neere by him, and therewith ſo ſkard foure thouſand Iriſh archers, brought by the earle of Argile, that where (as it was ſaid) they ſhould haue beene a wing to the fore-ward, they could neuer after be made to come forward. Herevpon did their armie haſtilie remooue, & from thence declining ſouthward, tooke their direct waie toward Fauxſide braie. Of this, ſir Raſe Vane, lieutenant of all the Engliſh horſſemen, firſt of all, or with the firſt, noting it, quicklie aduertiſed the lord protector, who thereby did readilie conceiue their meaning, which was to win the hill, and thereby the wind and ſunne, the gaine of which three things (as is thought) whether partie in ſight of battell can hap to obteine, hath his force doubled againſt his enimie.

The Engliſh men & Scots march the one armie toward the other.

The gallie.

The Iriſh archers.

In all this enterpriſe, they vſed for haſte ſo little the helpe of horſſe, that they plucked foorth their ordinance by draught of men, which at that preſent began freelie to ſhoot off towards the Engliſh armie, whereby it was perceiued they ment more than a ſkirmiſh. Herewith euerie man began to applie himſelfe in his charge and dutie which he had to doo. And herewith the lord protector, and other of the councell on horſſebacke as they were, fell ſtreight in conſultation. The ſharpeneſſe of whoſe circumſpect wiſedoms, as it quicklie eſpied out the enimies intents, ſo did it among other things promptlie prouide therin remedie, to preuent them (as needfull it was) for the time aſked no leiſure.

Conſultation of the Engliſh lords on horſſebacke.

Their deuiſe was, that the lord Greie of Wilton, marſhall of the armie, with his band of Bulleners, and with the lord protectors band, and the earle of Warwikes, all to the number of eighteene hundred horſſemen, on the left hand on the eaſt halfe, and ſir

The deuiſe of the lords vpon their conſultation.

Raſe

Raſe Vane, with ſir Thomas Darcie capteine of the penſioners, and men of armes, and the lord Fitzwaters, with his band of demilances, all to the number of ſixtéene hundred, to be readie and euen with the lord marſhall, on the weſt halfe. And thus all theſe togither afore to incounter the enimies afront, whereby either to breake their araie, and that waie to weaken their power by diſorder, or at the leaſt to ſtop them of their gate, and force them to ſtaie, while the fore-ward might wholie haue the hilles ſide, and the battell and rere-ward be placed in grounds next that in order, and beſt for aduantage. And after this, that the ſame horſſemen ſhould retire vp to the hilles ſide to come downe in order afreſh, and infeſt them on both ſides, whileſt the foot battels ſhould occupie them in fight afront.

Which enterpriſe, though it ſéemed right dangerous to the aſſailers, yet was it not more wiſelie deuiſed by the councell, than valiantlie and willinglie executed of the lord marſhall, & the others. For euen there taking their leaues of the councell, the ſaid lord marſhall requiring onelie, that if it went not well with him, the dukes grace would be good to his wife & children, he ſaid he would méet thoſe Scots, and ſo with their bands the foreſaid capteins tooke their waie, and made towards the enimie. By this time were the fore-wards on either part aduanced within two flight ſhoots in ſunder. The Scots came on ſo faſt, that it was thought of the moſt part of the Engliſhmen, they were rather horſſemen than footmen. The Engliſhmen againe were led the more with ſpéed, to ſhew that they were as willing as the Scots to trie the battell. The maſter of the ordinance to their great aduantage pluckt vp the hill at that inſtant certeine péeces, and ſoone after planted two or thrée canons of them welnigh vpon the top there, wherby hauing ſo much the helpe of the hill, he might ouer the Engliſhmens heads ſhoot nieſt at the enimie. As the lord protector had ſo circumſpectlie taken order for the araie and ſtation of the armie, and for the execution of euerie mans office beſide, he being perfectlie appointed in faire armour, accompanied onelie with ſir Thomas Chaloner knight, one of the clearkes of the kings priuie councell, got him to the hight of the hill, to tarrie by the ordinance, where hée might beſt ſuruéie the whole field, and ſuccour with aid where moſt he ſaw néed, and alſo by his preſence to be a defenſe to the thing that ſtood weakeſt in place, and alſo moſt in daunger, the which how much it ſtood in ſtead, anon ye ſhall heare further.

The lord Greies requeſt to the lord protector.

As he was halfe vp the hill, the erle of Warwike was ware the enimies were all at a ſudden ſtaie, and ſtood ſtill a good while, ſo that it ſéemed to him that they perceiuing now their owne follie in leauing their ground of aduantage, had no will to come anie further forward, but gladlie would haue bin whence they came. The reaſons were theſe. Firſt bicauſe at that time, beſide the full muſter of the Engliſh footmen, of whome they thought there had béene none there in field, but all to haue béene either ſhipt, or a ſhipping; then they ſaw plaine that the Engliſhmen were ſure to haue the gaine of the hill, and they the ground of diſaduantage out of their hold, and put from their hope: and hereto, for that their herald gaue the lord protector no warning, the which by him (if they had ment to fight it out) who would not haue preſumed that for the eſtimation of their honor, they would little haue ſtucke to haue ſent; and he againe, and it had béene but for his thouſand crowns, would right gladlie haue brought? Well yet how ſo euer their meaning changed, finallie conſidering belike the ſtate they ſtood in, that as they had left their ſtrength too ſoone, ſo now to be too late to repent, vpon a change of countenance, they made haſtilie forward againe, and (as it ſéemed) with no leſſe ſtoutneſſe of courage, than ſtronglie in order, whoſe maner, armour, weapon, and order in fight in thoſe daies and alſo before (though now ſomewhat changed as well as amongeſt other nations) was as inſueth.

The Scots at a ſtaie vpō the ſudden,

Harquebutters had they few, and appointed their fight moſt commonlie alwaies on foot. They vſed to come to the field well furniſhed, with iacke and ſkull, dagger, buckler, and ſwords, all notablie brode and thin, of excéeding good temper, and vniuerſallie ſo made to ſlice, as hard it is to deuiſe the better: hereto euerie man his pike, and a great kercher wrapped twiſe or thriſe about his necke, not for cold but for cutting. In their araie toward the ioining with the enimie, they thruſt ſo nie in the fore-ranke, ſhoulder to ſhoulder, togither with their pikes in both hands, ſtreight afore them, and their followers in that order ſo hard at their backes, laieng their pikes ouer their foregoerrs ſhoulders, that if they doo aſſaile vndiſſeuered, no force can well withſtand them.

The order of the Scots in warres both touching their furniture and diſpoſition.

Standing at defenſe, they thruſt ſhoulders likewiſe ſo nie togither, the fore-ranks well nie to knéeling ſtoope low before, for their fellowes behind, holding their pikes in both hands, and therewith in their left their bucklers, the one end of their pike againſt their right foot, the other againſt the enimie breaſt high, their followers croſſing their pike points with them before, and thus each with other, ſo nie as place and ſpace will ſuffer, through the whole rankes ſo thicke, that as eaſilie ſhall a bare finger pearſe through the ſkin of an angrie hedgehog, as anie incounter the front of their pikes. Thus prouided, they (I meane the Scots) addreſſed themſelues to incounter inflamed with a heat of furious hatred, but not aduiſed whether the cauſe were iuſt or vniuſt, for the which they were vp in armes: which fooliſh madneſſe the poet pointeth at, and painteth ont, ſaieng:

Arma Scotus poſcit, valida contendere vi vult,
Is nec habet penſi ſit id æquum an prorſus iniquum.

The lord marſhall notwithſtanding, whome no danger detracted from dooing his enterpriſe, with the companie and order afore appointed, came full in their faces from the hill ſide towards them. Herewith waxed it verie hot on both ſides, with pitifull cries, horrible rore, and terrible thundering of guns, beſide the daie darkened aboue head with ſmoke of the artillerie, the ſight and appéerance of the enimie euen at hand before, the danger of death on euerie ſide elſe, the bullets, pellets and arrowes flieng each where ſo thicke, and ſo vncerteinelie lighting, that no where was there anie ſuretie of ſafetie, euerie man ſtriken with a dreadfull feare, not ſo much perchance of death, as of hurt, which things though they were but certeine to ſome, yet doubted of all, aſſured crueltie at the enimies hands, without hope of mercie, death to flie, and danger to fight.

The incounter is verie hot betwéene both ſides.

The whole face of the field on both ſides vpon this point of ioining, both to the eie and to the eare ſo heauie, ſo deadlie, lamentable, furious, outragious, terrible, confuſe, and ſo quite againſt the quiet nature of man, as if to the nobilitie the regard of their honor and fame, to the knights and capteines the eſtimation of their worſhip and honeſtie, and generallie to them all the naturall motion of bounden dutie, their owne ſafetie, hope of victorie, and the fauour of God, that they truſted vpon for the equitie of their quarrell, had not béene a more vehement cauſe of courage, than the danger of death was cauſe of feare, the verie horrour of the thing had béene able to haue made anie man to forget both prowelle and policie. But the lord marſhall and the others, with preſent mind and courage warlie and quicklie continued their courſe towards them. The enimies were in a fallow field, whereof the furrowes laie ſidelong toward the Engliſhmen, next to whome by the ſide of the ſame furrowes, ⁊ a ſtones caſt from the Scots, was there a croſſe ditch or ſlough, which the Engliſhmen muſt néeds paſſe to come to them, wherein manie that could not leape ouer ſtucke faſt, to no ſmall danger of themſelues, and ſome diſorder of their fellowes.

The order of the Scotiſh battels.

The enimie perceiuing the Engliſhmen faſt to approch, diſpoſed themſelues to abide the brunt, and in this order ſtood ſtill to receiue them. The earle of Angus next to the Engliſhmen in the Scotiſh foreward as capteine of the ſame, with an eight thouſand men, and foure or fiue péeces of ordinance on his right hand, and a foure hundred horſſemen on his left. Behind him weſtward, the gouernour with ten thouſand Inland men (as they call them) the choiſeſt ſoldiers counted of their countrie. And the earle of Huntleie in the rere-ward, welnie euen with the battell on the left ſide with eight thouſand. The foure thouſand Iriſh archers as a wing to them both, laſt indéed in order, ⁊ firſt (as they ſaid) that ran awaie. The battell and alſo the rere-ward were garded likewiſe with their ordinance according.

Edward Shelleie.

The lord Iohn Greie.

Edward Shelleie lieutenant vnder the lord Greie of his band of Bulleners, was the firſt that paſſed ouer the ſlough. The lord Greie himſelfe next, with the lord Iohn Greie and others in the foremoſt ranke, and ſo then after two or thrée rankes of their former bands. But badlie yet could they make their raſe, by reaſon the furrowes laie trauerſe to their courſe. That notwithſtanding, and though alſo they were nothing likelie well to be able thus afront to come within them to doo them hurt, as well bicauſe the Scotiſhmens pikes were as long or longer than their ſtaues, as alſo for that their horſſes were all naked without bards, whereof though there were right manie among them, yet not one put on, for as much as at their comming forth in the morning, they looked for nothing leſſe than for battell that daie: yet did thoſe worthie gentlemen, the lord Greie of Wilton, the lord Iohn Greie, and maiſter Shelleie with the reſidue, ſo valiantlie ⁊ ſtronglie giue the charge vpon them, that whether it were by their proweſſe or power, the left ſide of the enimies that his lordſhip did ſet vpon (though their order remained vnbroken) was yet compelled to ſwaie a good waie backe, and giue ground largelie, and all the reſidue of them beſide to ſtand much amazed.

The Engliſh horſſemen repelled.

Beſide this, as the Engliſhmen were welnie at their enimies, they ſtood verie braue and bragging, ſhaking their pike points, ⁊ crieng; Come lounds, come héere tikes, come heretikes; and ſuch like rhetorike they vſed. But though (ſaith maſter Patten) they meant but ſmall humanitie, yet ſhewed they thereby much ciuilitie, both of faire plaie, to warne yer they ſtroke, and of formall order, to chide yer they fought. The Engliſh capteines that were behind, perceiuing at eie, that both by the vnéuenneſſe of the ground, by the ſturdie order of the enimie, and for that their fellowes were ſo nie and ſtreight before them, they were not able to anie aduantage to mainteine this onſet, did therefore according to the deuiſe in that point appointed, turne themſelues, and made a ſoft retire vp toward the hill againe. Howbeit, to confeſſe the truth, ſome of the number that knew not the prepenſed policie of the counſell in this caſe, made of a ſober aduiſed retire, an haſtie, raſh, and vnaduiſed flight: howbeit, without capteine or ſtandard, ⁊ vpon no cauſe of néed, but of a méere vndiſcretion and madneſſe. A madneſſe indéed, for firſt the Scots were not able to purſue, bicauſe they were footmen; and then if they could, what hope by flight ſo farre from home in their enimies land, where was no place of refuge?

Gentlemen ſlaine.

The lord Greie hurt.

The valiant lord Greie, Edward Shelleie, little Preſton, Brampton, and Ierningham, Bulleners, Ratcliffe, the lord Fitzwaters brother, ſir Iohn Cleres ſonne and heire, Rawleie a gentleman of right commendable proweſſe, Digs of Kent, Ellerker a penſioner, Segraue: of the duke of Summerſets band, Standleie, Woodhouſe, Coniſbie, Horgill, Norris, Denis, Arthur, and Atkinſon, with other in the fore-ranke, not being able in this earneſt aſſault, both to tend to their fight afore, and to the retire behind: the Scots againe well conſidering herby how weake they remained, caught courage afreſh, ran ſharplie forward vpon them, and without anie mercie, ſlue the moſt part of them that abode furtheſt in preaſe a ſix more of Bulleners, and other than before are named, in all to the number of twentie ſix, and moſt part gentlemen. My lord Greie yet and my lord Iohn Greie, and likewiſe my lord Edward Seimer (as ſome grace was) returned againe; but neither all in ſafetie, nor without euident markes they had bin there: for the lord Greie with a pike through the mouth was raſed a long from the tip of the toong, and thruſt that waie verie dangerouſlie more than two inches in the necke; and the other two had their horſſes vnder them with ſwords ſore wounded. Like as alſo a little before this onſet, ſir Thomas Darcie vpon his approch to the enimies, was ſtriken glanſing wiſe on the right ſide, with a bullet of one of their field péeces, and thereby his bodie bruſed with the bowing in of his armour, his ſword hilts broken, and the forefinger of his right hand beaten flat. Euen ſo vpon the parting of this fraie, was ſir Arthur Darcie ſlaſht at with ſwords, and ſo hurt vpon the wedding finger of his right hand alſo, as it was counted for the firſt part of curing to haue it quite cut awaie.

Sir Andrew Flammocke.

The lord Fitzwaters.

* Quéene Elizabeth.

Caluerleie ⁊ Clement Paſton.

Don Philip a Spaniard.

About the ſame time, certeine of the Scots ran on haſtilie to the kings ſtandard of the horſſemen (the which ſir Andrew Flammocke bare) and laieng faſt hold vpon the ſtaffe therof, cried, A king, a king, that if both his ſtrength, his hart, and his horſſe had not béene good, and herewith ſomewhat aided at this pinch by ſir Rafe Coppinger a penſioner, both he had béene ſlaine, and the ſtandard loſt, which the Scots neuertheleſſe held ſo faſt, that they brake and bare awaie the nether end of the ſtaffe to the burrell, and intended ſo much to the gaine of the ſtandard, that ſir Andrew (as hap was) ſcaped home all ſafe, and elſe without hurt. At this buſineſſe alſo the lord Fitzwaters, both earle of Suſſex and lord chamberleine to the* quéenes maieſtie, capteine there of a number of demilances was vnhorſt, but ſoone mounted againe, ſcaped yet in great danger, and his horſſe all hewen. Hereat further were Caluerleie the ſtandard-bearer of the men at armes, and Clement Paſton a penſioner, thruſt each of them into the leg with pikes, and Don Philip a Spaniard into the knée, diuerſe others maimed and hurt, and manie horſſes ſore wounded beſide.

The placing of the Engliſh vantgard.

The battell.

The rere-ward.

By this time had the Engliſh fore-ward accordinglie gotten the full vantage of the hilles ſide, and in reſpect of their march ſtood ſideling toward the enimie: who neuertheleſſe were not able in all parts to ſtand full ſquare in arraie; by reaſon that at the weſt end of them vpon their right hand, and toward the enimie, there was a ſquare plot incloſed with turffe (as their maner of fenſing in thoſe parts, as well as in diuerſe other is) one corner whereof did let the ſquare of the ſame arraie. The battell in good order next them, but ſo as in continuance of arraie, the former part thereof ſtood vpon the hils ſide, the taile vpon the plaine, and the rere-ward wholie vpon the plaine. So that the placing and countenance of the Engliſh armie in this wiſe, they ſhewed themſelues in maner to compaſſe in the Scots battels, that they ſhould no waie eſcape them: but how little able they were to doo it with power and number, you may eaſilie coniecture.

Thoſe horſſemen that were ſo repelled, and in their comming backe vnorderlie brake their arraie from the reſidue, ran ſo haſtilie through the ranks of the Engliſh fore-ward as it ſtood, that it did both diſorder manie, feared manie, and was a great incouragement to the enimie. The worthie earle of Warwike, who had the guiding of this fore-ward, right valiantlie had conducted the ſame to their ſtanding, and there did verie noblie incourage and comfort them with ſuch chéerefull words, offering to liue and die among them, that doubtleſſe his preſence, demening himſelfe in ſuch manlike ſort, ſtood the whole companie in great ſtead. Neither wanted there the chearefull diligence of thoſe capteines, with whome his honor was furniſhed in that fore-ward likewiſe to incourage their bands, nor the worthie behauiour of other in the battell and rere-ward, euerie one according to his calling, ſhewing ſuch proofe of his dutie, as the moſt part certeinlie deſerued to haue their names regiſtred in the kalendar of fame, where no ruſt of cankered obliuion might fret out the remembrance of their commendable demeanours: and therefore if anie among them ſhould haue ſhewed anie lacke of courage, their diſpraiſe had béene the more, ſith by others they ſaw ſuch worthie example giuen, and were to ſtand vpon this reſolution, to haue harts hardened againſt all hazzards in a iuſt cauſe, whereof they hoped almightie God had vndertaken the managing and direction, vnto whome they had committed the ſame; as the poet truelie ſaith:

The preſence of the earle of warwike greatlie incouraged the ſouldiers.

Iuſta Deo commiſſa Anglorum cauſa tonanti,
Audaces animos fecit impauidóſque pericli.

But ſith there were ſo manie that did well, & therfore deſeruing a longer proceſſe to be made of their high valiancies ſhewed in that dangerous ſeruice, than this volume may permit, I will procéed to the battell. The Scots were ſomewhat diſordred with their comming out about the ſlaughter of the Engliſhmen, the which they did ſo earneſtlie follow, that they tooke not one to mercie. The dukes grace placing himſelfe (as yée haue heard) on the hill of Faurſide braie, and therewith perceiuing the great diſorder of the ſtragling horſſemen, that had in the retire broken arraie, hemmed them in from further ſtraieng, whome ſir Rafe Vane, and others of the capteins ſoone after with great dexteritie brought into good order and arraie againe, and with all the reſt of the ſtrengths of the whole armie, by the policie of the lords, and diligence of euerie capteine and officer beſide, were ſo fitlie and aptlie applied in their feat, that where this repulſe giuen by the enimie to the horſſemen was doubted of manie, to turne to the whole loſſe of the field, the ſame was wrought and aduanced according as it was deuiſed, to the great certeintie of gaine and victorie. For firſt at this ſlough, where moſt of the horſſemen had ſtood, ſir Peter Mewtas capteine of all the harquebutters a foot did verie valiantlie conduct & place a good number of his men, in maner hard at the faces of the enimies, wherevnto ſir Peter Gamboa a Spaniard, capteine of two hundred harquebutters, Spaniards, and Italians on horſſebacke did readilie bring his men alſo, who with the hot continuance of their ſhot in both parts, did ſo ſtoutlie ſtaie the enimies, that they could not well come further forward: then the archers that marched in arraie on the right hand of the footmen, and next to the enimies, pricked them ſharpelie with arrowes as they ſtood. Therewith the maſter of the ordinance, to their great annoiance, did gall them with haſle ſhot and other out of the great ordinance, directlie from the hill top, and certeine other gunners with their péeces a flanke from the rere-ward, moſt of the artillerie and miſſiue engines then wholie thus at once, with great puiſſance and vehemencie occupied about them, herewith the full ſight of the Engliſhmen, all ſhadowed from them before by the horſſemen, and duſt raiſed, whome then they were ware in ſuch order to be ſo néere vpon them, and to this the perfect arraie of the horſſemen againe comming couragiouſlie to ſet on them afreſh, miſerable men, perceiuing themſelues then all too late, how much too much they had ouerſhot themſelues, began ſuddenlie to ſhrinke.

The archers.

The maiſter of the ordinance.

Their gouernour and other the principall capteins that had brought them to the bargaine, tooke their horſſes and fled amaine, which other perceiuing did quicklie follow, and with the formoſt of that crue their Iriſhmen, and therewith turned all the whole rout, caſt downe their weapons, ran out of their wards, off with their iackes, and with all that euer they might, betooke them to the race that their gouernour began. The Engliſhmen at the firſt had found them (as what could ſcape ſo manie eies) and ſharpelie and quicklie with an vniuerſall outcrie, They flie, they flie, purſued after in chaſe ſo egerlie, and with ſuch fierceneſſe, that they ouertooke manie, and ſpared indéed but few, that when they were once turned, it was a woonder to ſée how ſoone, and in how ſundrie ſorts they were ſcattered. The place they ſtood on like a wood of ſtaues ſtrewed on the ground, as ruſhes in a chamber, vnpaſſable (they laie ſo thicke) for either horſſe or man. Here at the firſt had they let fall all their pikes, and after that, euerie where ſcattered ſwords, bucklers, daggers, iackes, and all things elſe that was of anie weight, or might be any let to their courſe: which courſe among them, thrée waies ſpeciallie they made, ſome along the ſands by the Frith towards Lith, ſome ſtreight towards Edenburgh, whereof part through the parke there (in the walles whereof, though they be round about of flint ſtone, yet were there manie holes alreadie made) and part of them by the high waie that leadeth along by the abbaie of Holierood houſe; and the reſidue and moſt part of them towards Daketh, which waie by means of the mariſh our horſſemen were worſt able to follow.

The Scots flie and are ſharplie purſued.

The enimies caſt awaie their munition and furniture the lightlier to flie and be gone.

Sundrie ſhifts, ſome ſhrewd, ſome ſorie, made they in their running: diuerſe of them in their courſes, as they were ware they were purſued but of one, would ſuddenlie ſtart backe, and laſh at the legs of the horſſe, or foine him in the bellie, and ſometime did they reach at the rider alſo, whereby Clement Paſton in the arme, and diuerſe in other parts of their bodies otherwiſe in this chaſe were hurt. Some other laie flat in a furrow as they were dead, thereby paſt by of the Engliſhmen vntouched, and (as was reported) the earle of Angus confeſſed he couched in that ſort till his horſſe hapt to be brought him. Other ſome were found to ſtaie in the riuer, couring downe his bodie vnder the root of ſome willow trée, with ſcant his noſe aboue water for breath. Some for lightneſſe caſt awaie ſhoos and doublets, and ran in their ſhirts, and ſome were ſéene in this race all breathleſſe to fall flat downe, and haue run themſelues to death.

The earle of Angus.

Before this, at the time of the onſet, which the Engliſh horſſemen gaue, there came eaſtward fiue hundred of the Scotiſh horſmen vp along this Faurſide braie, ſtreight vpon the Engliſh ordinance and cariage. The lord protector (as yée haue heard) moſt ſpeciallie for doubt hereof, placing himſelfe by the ſame, cauſed a péece or two to be turned toward them, with a few ſhots whereof they were ſoone turned ned alſo and fled to Daketh. But had they kept on their purpoſe, they were prouided for accordinglie. For one parſon Keble a chapleine of his graces, and two or thrée other, by and by diſcharged foure or fiue of the carts of munition, and therewith beſtowed pikes, billes, bowes and arrowes, to as manie as came; ſo that of carters and other, there were ſome weaponed about a thouſand, whome parſon Keble and the other did verie handſomlie diſpoſe in arraie, and made a pretie muſter.

The maner of the ſlaughter.

The number of Scots ſlaine.

To returne now after this notable ſtrewing of their footmens weapons, began a pitifull ſight of the dead corpſes, lieng diſperſed abrode, ſome their legs off, ſome but hought, and left lieng halfe dead, ſome thruſt quite through the bodie, others their necks halfe a ſunder, manie their heads clouen, with other thouſand kinds of killing. After that, and further in chaſe all for the moſt part killed, either in the head, or in the necke, for the horſſemen could not well reach them lower with their ſwords. And thus with bloud and ſlaughter of the enimie, this chaſe was continued fiue miles in length, weſtward from the place of their ſtanding, which was in the fallow fields of Vndreſke, vntill Edenburgh parke, and well nigh to the gates of the towne it ſelfe, and vnto Lith, and in breadth nie foure miles, from the Forth ſands vp toward Daketh ſouthwards: in all which ſpace, the dead bodies laie as thicke as a man may note cattell graſing in a full repleniſhed paſture. The riuer ran all red with bloud (a ſigne of great ſlaughter) ſo that in the ſame chaſe were ſlaine to the number of ten thouſand men, ſome ſaie aboue fouretéene thouſand, as I doo find by this report concerning the battell:

Millia bis ſeptem ſunt morte abſumpta Scotorum,
Cætera pars certam quærit fugiendo ſalutem.

The cauſes why ſo few Scots were taken.

The Scotiſhmens vow.

Paniar hough.

The apparell of the Scots.

To conclude, conſidering the ſmalneſſe of the Engliſhmens number, and ſhortneſſe of the time (which was ſcant fiue houres, from one till well nigh ſix) the mortalitie was ſo great (as it was thought) the like afore time had not béene ſéene. One great cauſe whie the Engliſhmen ſpared ſo few of them, was thought to be their tyrannous vow by them made (which the Engliſhmen certeinly heard of) that whenſoeuer they fought and ouercame, they would kill ſo manie, and ſpare ſo few: a ſure proofe whereof they plainelie had ſhewed at the firſt onſet giuen, where they killed all, and ſaued not a man that came within their danger. An other reſpect was, to reuenge their great and cruell tyrannie ſhewed at Paniar hough, where they ſlue the lord Euers, whome otherwiſe they might haue taken priſoner and ſaued, and cruellie killed as manie elſe of our men as came into their hands. An other occaſion alſo was their armor among them ſo little differing, all clad alike in iacks couered with white leather, doublets of the ſame, or of fuſtian, and moſt commonlie all white hoſen, not one with either chaine, brooch, ring, or garment of ſilke, vnleſſe chains of latten drawne foure or fiue times along the vpper ſtocks, or to vſe maſter Pattens words, the thighs of their hoſen and doublet ſléeues for cutting.

The earle of Huntleie taken.

Other priſoners taken.

This lacke for difference in apparell was the chiefeſt cauſe that ſo manie of their great men and gentlemen were killed, and ſo few ſaued. The outward ſhew, the reſemblance or ſigne, whereby a ſtranger might diſcerne a poore man from a gentleman, was not among them to be ſéene: as for words and goodlie profers of great ranſoms, were as rife in the mouths of the one as the other. And it came here to paſſe, that after at the examination and counting of the priſoners, there were found taken aboue twentie of their common countrie people, to one of their gentlemen, whome no man néed to doubt the Engliſhmen had rather haue ſpared than the other, if they could haue ſéene anie difference betwéene them in taking. And yet verelie conſidering the caſe as it ſtood, the Engliſhmen ſhewed more grace, and tooke more to mercie, than the reſpects before mentioned might ſéeme to haue required. For beſide the earle of Huntleie, who in good armor appointed likeſt a gentleman of anie among them, but could not then eſcape bicauſe he lacked his horſſe, and hapned to be taken by ſir Rafe Vane, and beſide the lord of Yeſter, Hobbie Hambleton capteine of Dunbar, the maſter of Sanpoole, the lard of Wimmes taken by John Bren, a brother of the earle of Caſſils, and beſides one Montrell, taken by Cornelius comptrollor of the ordinance in the armie, and one Camals an Iriſh gentleman, and beſide manie other Scotiſh gentlemen more, taken by diuerſe others.

The number of the priſoners.

The lord protector not deſirous of ſlaughter.

Sir Rafe Sadler.

The ſpoile of the Scotiſh campe.

The priſoners reckoned in the marſhals booke were numbred to aboue fiftéene hundred. Touching the ſlaughter, ſure they killed not ſo manie, as for the time & oportunitie they might, if they had minded crueltie. For the lord protector mooued with pitie at the ſight of the dead bodies, and rather glad of victorie than deſirous of ſlaughter, ſoone after (by geſſe) fiue of the clocke, ſtaid the ſtandard of his horſſemen at the furtheſt part of their campe weſtward, & cauſed the trumpets to ſound a retreat. Whereat alſo ſir Rafe Sadler treaſuror (whoſe great diligence at that time, and readie forwardneſſe in the chiefeſt of the fraie before, did worthilie merit no ſmall commendation) cauſed all the footmen to ſtaie; and then with much trauell & great paine made them to be brought in ſome order againe: which was a thing not eaſilie doone, by reaſon they all as then were ſomewhat buſie in applieng their market, the ſpoile of the Scotiſh campe, where was found good prouiſion of white bread, ale, otencaks, otemeale, mutton, butter in pots, chéeſe, and in diuerſe tents good wine alſo, and in ſome tents among them was found ſome ſiluer plate and chalices, which with good deuotion ye maie be ſure were plucked out of their cold clowts, and thruſt into their warme boſoms.

A ſhowt in ſigne of victorie.

The feature of the Scotiſhmens perſonages.

Prieſts or kirkmen.

The plot of their campe called Edmonſton edge, nigh Gilberton a place of the lord of Brimſtons, halfe a mile beyond Muſkelburgh, and foure miles on this ſide Edenburgh, occupied in largeneſſe with diuerſe tents and tenticles, that ſtood in ſundrie places out of ſquare, about a miles compaſſe, wherein as the Engliſhmen vpon the ſound of the retreat ſomewhat aſſembled, they all with a lowd and entire outcrie and hallowing, in ſigne of gladneſſe and victorie, made an vniuerſall noiſe and ſhowt, the ſhrilneſſe whereof (as after was reported) was heard vnto Edenburgh. It was a woonder to ſée, but (as they ſaie) manie hands make light worke, how ſoone the dead bodies were ſtripped out of their garments ſtarke naked, euen from as farre as the chaſe went, vnto the place of the onſet, whereby the perſonages of the enimies might by the waie eaſilie be viewed and conſidered, the which for the talneſſe of their ſtature, cleanneſſe of ſkin, bigneſſe of bone, with due proportion in all parts was ſuch, as the beholders, if they had not ſéene it, would not haue beléeued that there had béene ſo many of that ſort in all their countrie. Among them laie manie prieſts, and kirkmen, as they call them, of whome it was bruted that there was a whole band of thrée or foure thouſand, but it was found afterwards not to be altogither ſo.

A banner of a papiſts deuiſe.

Among other banners, ſtandards, and pennons, a banner of white ſarſenet was found, vnder which it was ſaid theſe kirkmen came, whereupon was painted a woman with hir haire about hir ſhoulders, knéeling before a crucifix, & on hir right hand a church, after that written in great Romane letters, Afflictæ ſponſæ ne obliuiſcaris. It was ſaid that this was the abbat of Dunfirmlings banner, but whether it was his or the biſhop of Dunkels, the gouernours brother, who (as was ſaid) were both in the field, his meaning was, to ſignifie that the church made interceſſion to Chriſt hir huſband, not now to forget hir his ſpouſe, being at that time afflicted and perſecuted by the Engliſhmen. But whoſe deuiſe ſoeuer it was, it maie ſéeme, that this church comming thus to battell, full appointed with weapon, and garded with ſuch a ſort of deacons to fight, howſoeuer in painting he had ſet hir out, a man might well thinke, that in condition, he had rather framed hir like a curſt queane, that would plucke hir huſband by the pate, except ſhe had hir will; than like a méeke ſpouſe, that went about humblie by ſubmiſſion and praier to deſire hir huſbands helpe, for redreſſe of things amiſſe.

what was the ſignification and meaning of the baner ſo inſcribed.

But now to leaue this prelat with his Afflicta ſponſa, and to make an end with this battell. There was vpon Faurſide braie, a little caſtell or pile, which was verie buſie all the time of the battell, as anie of the Engliſhmen came nigh it, to ſhoot at them, with ſuch artillerie as they had; which was none other than of handguns and harquebuts, & of them not a dozen neither. Little hurt they did, but as they ſaw their fellowes in the field thus driuen and beaten awaie before their faces, they plucked in their péeces, and couched themſelues within all mute: but by and by the houſe was ſet on fire, and they for their good wils burned and ſmothered within. Thus (ſaith maſter Patten) through the fauour of Gods bountie, by the valiancie and policie of the lord protector, by the forward indeuour of all the nobles and councell there beſide, and by the willing diligence of euerie capteine, officer, and true ſubiect elſe, they moſt valiantlie wan the victorie ouer their enimies, of whome ſuch ſlaughter was made in the field, as ye haue heard, amongeſt whome (as the priſoners reported) beſide the lord Fleming, the lard of Loghenware, the maſter of Greim, the maſter of Arſkin, the maſter of Oglebie, the maſter of Auendale, the maſter of Rouen, and manie other of noble birth amongeſt them, there were of lards, lards ſons, and other gentlemen ſlaine aboue twentie ſix hundred, & among the priſoners alſo there were manie gentlemen, ſpeciallie of name theſe: the earle of Huntleie lord chancellor of the realme, the lord of Yeſter, Hobbie Hamilton capteine of Dunbar, the maſter of Sanpoole, the lord of Wimmes, and a brother of the earle of Caſſils. Two thouſand by lurking and lieng (as they had béene dead) ſcaped awaie in the night all maimed and hurt. Herewith of weapons and armor more was found than the Engliſhmen did vouchſafe to giue carriage for: & yet were there conueied thenſe by ſhip into England, of iacks ſpeciallie and ſwords, aboue thirtie thouſand.

A little caſtle or pile verie buſie with the Engliſh.

what men of name and account were ſlaine in the battell and taken priſoners.

Armor and weapons caried into England.

This night the Engliſhmen with great gladneſſe and thankſgiuing to God (as good cauſe they had) about ſeauen of the clocke pitched their campe at Edgebuckling braie, beſide Pinkerſlough, and a mile beyond the place they camped at before. Now after the battell, among other queſtions, one was mooued who killed the firſt man that daie in the field, the glorie whereof one Ieronimo an Italian would gladlie haue had, a gentleman ſure that had ſerued that daie right valiantlie: howbeit it was after well tried, that Cutbert Muſgraue, a gentleman of the earle of Warwiks, deſerued the praiſe of killing the firſt enimie that died that daie, who right hardlie ſlue a guner at his péece in the Scots fore-ward, yer euer they began anie whit to turne. As for the ordinarie ſoldiors, it was a pleaſure vnto them to make rehearſall of their aduentures paſt, and to record what dangers (in maner ineuitable) they had eſcaped, according to the poets report in that caſe, ſaieng:

Ieronimo an Italian.

The next daie being ſundaie the eleuenth of September, ſomewhat before noone, the armie remooued, & marching along the Forth ſide toward Lieth, about thrée of the clocke in the after noone pitched their field, a pricke ſhot on this ſide that towne on the ſoutheaſt halfe, ſomewhat ſhadowed from Edenburgh by a hill, but yet the moſt part of it laie within the full ſight and ſhot of the caſtell there, and in diſtance ſomewhat aboue a quarter of a mile. The lord marſhall, and the moſt part of the horſſemen were beſtowed and lodged in the towne of Lieth. The dukes grace, the lord lieutenant, and the reſt of the armie in the campe. On tueſdaie the thirtéenth of September, the ſmaller veſſels of the Engliſh fléet burned Kinkorne, and a towne or two ſtanding on the north ſhore of the Forth againſt Lieth.

The Engliſh armie incampeth by Lieth.

In the after noone the dukes grace rowed vp the Forth a ſix or ſeuen miles weſtward, as it runneth into the land, and tooke in his waie an Iland there called ſaint Cooms ins, which lieth foure miles beyond Lieth, and a good waie néerer the north ſhore than the ſouth, yet not within a mile of the néereſt. It is but halfe a mile about, and had in it an abbeie, but the moonks were gone: freſh water inough, and ſtore of conies, and is ſo naturallie ſtrong, that but by one waie it can be entred; the plot whereof the lord protector conſidering, did quicklie caſt to haue it kept, whereby all traffike of merchandize, all commodities elſe comming by the Forth into their land, and vtterlie the whole vſe of the Forth it ſelfe, with all the hauens vpon it, ſhould quite be taken from them.

S. Cooms ins.

The next daie the lord protector riding backe againe eaſtward, to view diuerſe things and places, tooke Daketh in his waie, where a houſe of George Dowglas did ſtand, and comming ſomewhat néere it, he ſent Summerſet his herald with a trumpet to know who kept it, and whether the kéepers would hold or yéeld it to his grace? Anſwer was made, that there were thrée ſcore perſons within, whome their maiſter lieng there ſaturdaie at night after the battell, did will that they, the houſe, and all that was in it, ſhould be at his graces commandement. Whereupon the chiefeſt came, and in name of all the reſt humbled himſelfe to the dukes will. From thenſe his grace paſſed to the place where the battell had béene ſtricken, and ſo by Muſkleburgh returned backe to the campe.

The caſtell of Daketh.

On thurſdaie being the fiftéenth of this moneth, the lord Clinton high admerall, taking with him the gallie whereof Richard Brooke was capteine, and foure or fiue other ſmaller veſſels beſides, as well appointed with munition and men, rowed vp the Forth a ten miles weſtward, to an hauen towne ſtanding on the ſouth ſhore called Blacke Neſſe, whereat toward the water ſide is a caſtell of a pretie ſtrength; as nigh wherevnto as the depth of the water would ſuffer, the Scots for ſafegard had laid the Marie Willoughbie, and the Anthonie of Newcaſtell, two tall ſhips, which with extreme iniurie they had ſtollen from the Engliſhmen before time, when no war was betwixt vs: with theſe laie there alſo an other large veſſell called the Boſſe, and ſeauen more, whereof part laden with merchandize. The lord Clinton and his companie with right hardie approch, after a great conflict betwixt the caſtell and his veſſels, by fine force wan from them thoſe thrée ſhips of name, and burnt all the reſidue before their faces.

their counſell for cauſe of communication, and returned againe to them, hauing with him Norreie an herald and king at armes of ours, who found them with the old quéene at Sterling. On ſaturdaie the ſeauentéenth of September, ſir John Luttrell in the after noone departed toward ſaint Cooms ins, hauing with him an hundred harquebutters, fiftie pioners, & two row barks well furniſhed with munition, and thrée ſcore and ten mariners to remaine there, & kéepe that from inuaſion of the enimies, againſt whom the Engliſh were ſo ſharplie whetted, that when they came to incounter, they gaue proofe of their manhood by wounds and bloudſhed, according to the report of C.O. in theſe verſes following:

———Anglorum pectora Mauors
Belliger exacüit, creſcunt ad vulnera vires.

The earle of Bothwell.

In the time whileſt the armie laie thus in the campe betwéene Lieth and Edenburgh, manie lards and gentlemen came in to the lord protector to require his protection, the which his grace to whome he thought good did grant. This daie came the earle of Bothwell to his grace, who hauing béene kept in priſon by the gouernour, the night after the battell was ſet at libertie, and comming thus to the lord protector, was friendlie welcomed and interteined; and hauing this night ſupped with his grace, he departed.

Lieth burned.

Lieth was ſet on fire this ſaturdaie, whereas it was meant, that there ſhould haue béene but one houſe onelie burnt, belonging to one Barton that had plaid a ſlipperie part with the lord protector. But the ſoldiors being ſet a worke to fire that houſe, fired all the reſt. Six great ſhips alſo that laie in the hauen, which for their age and decaie were not ſo apt for vſe, were likewiſe ſet on fire and burnt. On ſundaie the eightéenth of September, the lord protector (for conſiderations moouing him to pitie) hauing all this while ſpared Edenburgh from hurt, did ſo leaue it, but Lieth and the ſhips burning, ſoone after ſeauen of the clocke in the morning, cauſed the campe to diſlodge, and as they were raiſed and on foot, the caſtell ſhot off a peale, with chambers hardlie and all, of foure and twentie péeces. Paſſing that daie ſeauen miles, they camped earlie for that night at Crainſton by a place of the lard of Brimſtons.

The armie diſlodged.

Crainſton.

Broughticrag.

The ſame morning the lord protector made maiſter Andrew Dudleie knight, brother to the earle of Warwike, diſpatched my lord admerall and him by ſhips full fraught with men and munition toward the winning of an hold in the eaſt ſide of Scotland called Broughticrag, which ſtood in ſuch ſort in the mouth of the riuer of Taie, as that being gotten, both Dundée, ſaint Johns towne, and diuerſe other townes ſtanding vpon the ſame riuer the beſt of the countrie in thoſe parts, ſet vpon the Taie, ſhould either become ſubiect vnto this hold, or elſe be compelled to forgo the whole vſe of the riuer, for hauing anie thing comming in or outward. The lord admerall, and the ſaid ſir Andrew ſped themſelues with ſuch good ſucceſſe and diligence in that enterpriſe, that on the wedneſdaie following, being the one and twentith of September, after certeine of their ſhot diſcharged againſt that caſtell, the ſame was yéelded vnto them, the which ſir Andrew did then enter, and after kept, as capteine to his high praiſe and commendation.

Broughticrag yéelded to the Engliſhmen.

Lawder.

Hume caſtell.

But now to the armie. On mondaie the ninetéenth of September, they marched ten miles, and incamped a little on this ſide a market towne called Lawder. Here as they were ſetled in their lodging, the herald Norrie returned from the Scotiſh councell, with the lard of Brimſton, and Roſe their herald, who vpon their ſute to the lord protector, obteined that fiue of their councell ſhould haue his graces ſafe conduct, that at anie time and place within fiftéene daies, during his abode in their countrie, or at Berwike, the ſame fiue might come and commune with fiue of the Engliſh councell, touching matters in controuerſie betwéene them. Roſe the herald departed earlie with his ſafe conduct, the campe raiſed, and that daie they went ſeauen miles till as far as Hume caſtell, where they camped on the weſt ſide of a rockie hill that they call Hare crag, ſtanding about a mile weſtward from the caſtell.

Hume caſtell beſieged and yéelded vp to the lord protector.

Summerſet the dukes herald.

The conditions of the ſurrendring of Hume caſtell.

Here they did ſo much by ſhewing that they ment indéed to win the caſtell by force, if otherwiſe they might not haue it, cauſing a certeine number of harquebutters vpon appointment before to beſet the caſtell, and to watch that none ſhould paſſe in or out, that in the end, the ladie of the houſe, and other that were within in charge with it, yéelded it vp to the lord protectors hands: for the ladie doubting the loſſe of hir ſon that was priſoner with the Engliſhmen, hauing the firſt daie béene with the lord protector, and got reſpit till the next daie at noone, in the meane time conſulted with hir ſonne, and other hir friends the kéepers of the caſtell, returned at the time appointed the next daie, being the one and twentith of that moneth, and made ſute for a longer reſpit till eight of the clocke at night, and therewith ſafe conduct for Andrew Hume hir ſecond ſon, and John Hume lard of Coldan Knows, a kinſman of hir huſbands, capteins of this caſtell, to come and ſpeake with his grace in the meane while. It was granted hir. Wherevpon theſe capteins about thrée of the clocke came to the lord protector, and after other couenants (with long debating on both parts) agréed vpon, ſhe and theſe capteins concluded to giue their aſſent to render the caſtell, ſo far foorth as the reſt of the kéepers would therewith be contented, for two or thrée within (ſaid they) were alſo in charge with kéeping it as well as they, for knowledge of whoſe minds the duke ſent Summerſet his herald with this ladie to the caſtell vnto them; who as the herald had made them priuie to the articles, would faine haue had leiſure for foure and twentie hours longer, to ſend to their lord to Edenburgh, where he laie hurt (as before you haue heard) and in danger of death, which followed of the fall that he caught at the fridaies ſkirmiſh before the battell, to know his will and pleſure in this point of rendering vp the caſtell: but being wiſelie and ſharplie called vpon by the herald, they agréed to the couenants afore by their ladie and capteins concluded on: whereof part (as the ſequele ſhewed) were theſe. That they ſhould depart thenſe the next daie in the morning by ten of the clocke with bag and baggage, as much as they could carie, leauing all munition and vittels behind them in the caſtell. Howbeit, to be aſſured of them, the lord protector prouiding ech waie to be readie for them, cauſed eight péeces of ordinance fenſed with baſkets of earth to be planted on the ſouthſide toward the caſtell within power of batterie, and the harquebutters to continue their watch and ward.

The lord Greie receiueth the poſſeſſion of Hume caſtell.

On thurſdaie morning being the two and twentith of September, the lord Greie was appointed to receiue the rendring of the caſtell into his hands, and ſir Edward Dudleie now lord Dudleie after to be capteine there. They both departed to it, and at the time ſet Andrew Hume, and foure other of the chiefeſt there with him came out, and yéelding the caſtell, deliuered the keies to the ſaid lord Greie: his lordſhip cauſing the reſidue to come out then, ſauing ſix or ſeuen to keepe their baggage within, who all were in number ſeuentie and eight, entred the ſame with maiſter Dudleie, and diuerſe other gentlemen with him. He found there indifferent good ſtore of vittels and wine, & of ordinance two baſtard culuerings, one ſacre, alſo thrée falconets of braſſe, and of iron eight péeces beſide. The kéeping of this caſtell the lord Greie betaking vnto ſir Edward Dudleie accordinglie returned to the campe. This doone, the next daie being fridaie, and the thrée and twentith of September, they diſlodged, and went that morning to Rockeſburgh, incamping in a great fallow field, betwixt Rockeſburgh and Kelſeie, ſtanding eaſtward a quarter of a mile off. Here at Rockeſburgh they began to build a fort within the compaſſe of an old ruinous caſtell, the plot and ſite whereof ſtandeth naturallie verie ſtrong, vpon a hill eaſt and weſt of an eight ſcore in length, and thrée ſcore in breadth, drawing to a narrowneſſe at the eaſt end, the whole ground whereof the old walles did yet inuiron. Beſide the heigth and hardneſſe to come to, it is ſtronglie fenſed on either ſide with the courſe of two great riuers, Tiuet on the north, and Twéed on the ſouth, both which ioining ſomwhat nigh togither at the weſt end of it. Tiuet by a large compaſſe about the fields (in which the campe laie) at Kelſeie, dooth fall into this Twéed, which with great depth and ſwiftneſſe runneth from thenſe eaſtward into the ſea at Berwike. Ouer this betwixt Kelſeie and Rockeſburgh there hath béene a great ſtone bridge with arches, the which the Scots in times paſt haue all to broken, becauſe the Engliſhmen ſhould not that waie come to them.

The determination in what ſort Rockeſburgh ſhould be fortified.

Soone after the lord protectors ſurueie of the plot, and determination to doo as much in déed for making it defenſible, as ſhortneſſe of the time & ſeaſon of the yéere could ſuffer (which was) that one great trench of twentie foot broad with depth according, and a wall of like depth, bredth, and heigth, ſhould be made croſſe within the caſtell from the one ſide wall to the other, and fortie foot from the weſt end: and that a like trench and wall ſhould likewiſe be caſt a trauerſe within, about a coits caſt from the eaſt end, and hereto that the caſtell walles on either ſide where néed was, ſhould be mended with turffe, and made with lowps, as well for ſhooting directlie forward as for flanking at hand: the worke of which deuiſe did make that (beſide the ſafegard of theſe trenches and walles) the kéepers ſhould alſo be much defended from the enimies force by both the end walles of the caſtell: the pioners were ſet a worke, and diligentlie applied in the ſame.

Lards.

Gentlemen.

The lard of Seſſeforth, and manie other lards and gentlemen of Tiuidall and the Mers, hauing come and communed with the lord protector and the councell, made an aſſurance, or as it were a truce for that daie, till the next daie at night; and on the next daie, while aſſurance laſted, theſe lards and gentlemen being the chiefeſt in the whole Mers and Tiuidale, came in againe, whome the dukes grace with wiſedome and policie without bloudſhed did win then vnto the kings obedience, for the which they did willinglie then receiue an oth: whoſe names in part inſue. The lard of Seſſeforth, the lard of Fernihurſt, the lard of Gréenehead, the lard of Hunthill, the lard of Huntleie, the lard of Markeſton by Merſide, the lard of Boniedworth, the lard of Ormeſton, the lard of Maileſtaine, the lard of Warmeſeie, the lard of Linton, the lard of Egerſton, the lard of Marton, the lard of Mow, the lard of Reddell, the lard of Reamerſide. George Trombull, Iohn Holliburton, Robert Car of Greiden, Adam Kirton, Andrew Kirton, Andrew Meither, Sander Spur of Erleſton, Marke Car of Littleden, George Car of Faldenſide, Alexander Makdowell, Charles Rotherford, Thomas Car of the Yere, Iohn Car of Meinthorne, Walter Holiburton, Richard Hanganſide, Andrew Car, Iames Dowglas of Cauers, Iames Car of Merſington, George Hoppringle, William Ormeſton of Enmerden, Iohn Grimſlow. Manie more there were beſide, but ouerpaſſed by maiſter Patten, for that they remained in the regiſter with theſe, as he ſaith.

The diligence of the duke of Summerſet to further the fortification to Rockeſburgh.

The duke of Summerſet tendred the furtherance of the worke ſo much, that he forbare not to laie his owne hand to the ſpade and ſhouell, thereby to incourage others: ſo as there were but few lords, knights, and gentlemen in the field, but with ſpade, ſhouell, or mattocke did therein their parts.

A Scotiſh herald.

The fiue and twentith of September being ſundaie, the Scots began to bring vittels to the campe, & were ſo well intreated and paied for the ſame, that during the time of the Engliſhmens abode there, they wanted not of the commodities which their countrie could miniſter. The eight and twentith of September a Scotiſh herald accompanied with certeine Frenchmen, that were perchance more deſirous to marke the armie than to wit of their welfare, came and declared that within a ſeauen-night after, their commiſſioners, to whome ſafe conduct had béene granted, ſhould come and commune with our councell at Berwike; whoſe comming the earle of Warwike, and ſir Rafe Sadler with other the commiſſioners appointed, did ſo long while there abide. But what the Scots ment by breaking promiſe I cannot ſaie, howbeit come they did not, & therfore eſcaped not the iuſt note of diſſimulation, howſoeuer elſe they could colour the matter in their owne excuſe.

Edward Seimer the duke of Summerſets ſon.

Sir Francis Fleming.

The ſame daie after noone, the duke of Summerſet adorned with titles of dignitie diuerſe lords, knights, and gentlemen, the names and promotions of whom maſter Patten hath ſet downe out of the heralds booke, as followeth: Sir Rafe Sadler treaſuror, ſir Francis Brian capteine of the light horſſemen, ſir Rafe Vane lieutenant of all the horſſemen: theſe knights were made banerets, a dignitie aboue a knight, and next to a baron. The lord Greie of Wilton high marſhall, the lord Edward Seimer the duke of Summerſets ſon, the lord Thomas Howard, the lord Waldike a Cleuelander, ſir Thomas Dacres, ſir Edward Haſtings, ſir Edmund Bridges, ſir Iohn Thin, ſir Miles Patridge, ſir Iohn Conweie, ſir Giles Poole, ſir Rafe Bagnoll, ſir Oliuer Laurence, ſir Henrie Gates, ſir Thomas Chaloner, ſir Francis Fleming maſter of the ordinance, ſir Iohn Greſham, ſir William Skipwith, ſir Iohn Buts, ſir George Blaag, ſir William Francis, ſir Francis Knolles, ſir William Thornburrow, ſir George Howard, ſir Iames Wilford, ſir Rafe Coppinger, ſir Thomas Wentworth, ſir Iohn Meruen, ſir Nicholas Strange, ſir Charles Sturton, ſir Hugh Aſkue, ſir Francis Salmin, ſir Richard Tounleie, ſir Marmaduke Coneſtable, ſir George Audleie, ſir Iohn Holcroft, ſir Iohn Southworth, ſir Thomas Danbie, ſir Iohn Talbot, ſir Rowland Clarke, ſir Iohn Horſleie, ſir Iohn Forſter, ſir Chriſtopher Dies, ſir Peter Negro, ſir Alanzo de Vile, ſir Henrie Huſſeie, ſir Iames Granado Brabander, ſir Walter Bonham, ſir Robert Brandling maior of Newcaſtell, and made knight there at the duke of Summerſets returne.

Order taken for defenſe of the fort gained and built in this voiage.

But now that Rockeſburgh was ſufficientlie made defenſible (the which to ſée it ſéemed the duke of Summerſet had vowed before he would thence depart) his grace and the councell did firſt determine that my lord Greie ſhould remaine vpon the borders there as the kings lieutenant, and then tooke order for the forts: that ſir Andrew Dudleie capteine of Broughticrag had left with two hundred ſoldiers of harquebutters & others, and a ſufficient number of pioners for his works: ſir Edward Dudleie capteine of Hume caſtell thréeſcore harquebutters, fortie horſſemen, and a hundred pioners: ſir Raſe Bulmer capteine of Rockeſburgh thrée hundred ſoldiers of harquebutters and others, and two hundred pioners. As things were thus concluded, and warning giuen ouer night on this wedneſdaie being Michaelmaſſe euen, on the next morrow being Michaelmaſſe daie euerie man fell to packing apaſe and got them homewards, paſſing ouer the Twéed there with ſome trouble and danger alſo, by reaſon of raine that latelie fell before, & had raiſed the ſtreame, which being ſwift of it ſelfe, and the chanell vneuen in the bottome with great ſtones made the paſſage cumberſome, ſo that manie as well horſſemen as footmen were in no ſmall perill as they paſſed thorough, and one or two drowned, and manie cariages ouerthrowne, and in great hazzard of loſing.

The armie returneth homewards.

The danger of the ſoldiers in paſſing the riuer of Twéed.

The duke of Summerſet rode ſtreight to Newcaſtell, and thence homewards. The earle of Warwike, my lord Greie, and ſir Raſe Sadler, with diuerſe other rode to Berwike, to abide the comming of the Scotiſh commiſſioners. In the meane time of their tarieng there, the earle of Warwike made ſix knights; ſir Thomas Neuill the lord Neuils brother, ſir Andrew Corbet, ſir Anthonie Strelleie, ſir Arthur Manering, ſir Richard Verneie, ſir Iohn Berteuille. After that the earle of Warwike had taried for the comming of the Scots the full terme of the appointment, which was vntill the fourth of October, and perceiued they came not, the next daie he departed homewards.

Knights made.

Here ye haue to vnderſtand alſo, that in part of the meane time whileſt the duke of Summerſet was in dooing of theſe exploits in Scotland (as ye haue heard rehearſed) the earle of Lenox, and the lord Wharton warden of the weſt marches, with an armie of fiue thouſand men, entred Scotland on that ſide, and firſt paſſing two miles after a daie and a nights defenſe, they wan the church of Annan, tooke ſeuentie & two priſoners kéepers of the ſame, burnt the ſpoile for cumber of cariage, and cauſed the church to be blowen vp with powder, paſſing thence a ſixtéene miles within the land, they wan the caſtell of Milke, the which they left furniſhed with munition and men, and ſo returned. But of this ye ſhall find more in the hiſtorie of Scotland, by the ſufferance of God, where we intreat of the dooings there in this yeare.

Thus much haue I collected out of maſter Pattens booke, or rather exemplified the ſame, not much digreſſing from his owne words, except where I haue bin forced to abridge his worke in ſome places, wiſhing to haue inſerted the whole, if the purpoſe of this volume would haue ſo permitted, as well for the full vnderſtanding of euerie particular point, by him remembred, as alſo for his pleaſant and apt maner of penning the ſame. Whileſt the lord protector was abrode thus in wars againſt the Scots, the lords of the councell that remained at home, chiefelie by the good and diligent calling on and furtherance of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and others of the cleargie, tooke order for the aduancement of religion, cauſing the bookes of homilies and the paraphraſe of Eraſmus to be ſet foorth and had in churches.

The homilies & paraphraſe of Eraſmus.

At the comming backe of the lord protector from his iourneie into Scotland, the citizens of London determined to haue receiued him with great triumph: but he hearing thereof, forbad them in anie wiſe ſo to doo: for (ſaid he) if anie thing hath béene doone to the honour of the realme, it was Gods dooing, and therefore willed them to giue him the praiſe. Neuertheleſſe the maior and aldermen, with certeine of the commoners in their liueries and their hoods, hearing of his approch to the citie, the eight daie of October met him in Finneſburie field, where he tooke each of them by the hand, and thanked them for their good wils. The lord maior did ride with him till they came to the pound in Smithfield, where his grace left them, and rode to his houſe of Shene that night, and the next daie to the king to Hampton court. The fourth daie of Nouember began a parlement, called and holden at Weſtminſter, which continued till the foure and twentith of December next following, & was then proroged. In this parlement, all colleges, chanteries, and frée chappels were giuen to the king, and the ſtatute of the ſix articles was repealed, with diuerſe others tending to the like end. Moreouer, during this parlement viſiters being appointed to viſit in London, the ſixtéenth of Nouember began to take downe the images in Paules church: and ſhortlie after all the images in euerie church, not onelie through London, but alſo throughout the whole realme, were pulled downe and defaced.

A parlement.

Anno Reg. 2.

The lord protector and others of the councell, conſidering now in what ſort they had got foothold in Scotland, by reaſon of ſuch peeces as they had taken and fortified within the realme, did deuiſe for the more ſuertie of thoſe places, which they had alreadie got, and the better to bring the reſt of the countrie vnto reaſon, to haue ſome holds alſo more within the land, and therefore firſt they cauſed a fort to be builded at Lowder, where ſir Hugh Willoughbie was appointed capteine with a conuenient garriſon of ſoldiers to kéepe it. Beſide this, it was thought expedient to fortifie the towne of Hadington, wherevpon the lord Greie lieutenant of the north parts, with ſir Thomas Palmer, and ſir Thomas Holcroft, were appointed to go thither with a conuenient number of men of warre & pioners to ſée that towne fenſed with trenches, rampiers, and bulworks, as ſhould ſéeme to his lordſhip neceſſarie and behoouefull; who therefore entring into Scotland the eightéenth of Aprill, paſſed forth to Hadington, where he began to fortifie, and there remained to ſée the worke brought to ſome perfection. During his abode there, diuerſe exploits were both valiantlie attempted and luckilie atchiued by his martiall conduct and politike direction, as occaſions offred might moue him, which I would gladlie haue ſet downe at large, if I could haue come to the true vnderſtanding thereof; but ſith I cannot get the ſame, in ſuch full manner as I haue wiſhed, that yet which I haue learned by true report (as I take it) I haue thought good to impart to the reader.

Lowder fortified.

Sir Hugh Willoughbie.

Hadington fortified by the lord Greie.

The eight and twentith of Maie, his lordſhip wan the caſtell of Yeſter, after he had beaten it right ſore with terrible batterie of canon ſhot for the time it laſted, and therewith hauing made a reaſonable breach for the ſoldiers to enter, they within yéelded with condition to haue their liues ſaued: which the lord Greie was contented to grant to them all, one onelie excepted, who during the ſiege vttered vnſéemelie words of the king, abuſing his maieſties name with vile and moſt opprobrious termes. They all comming foorth of the caſtell in their ſhirts, humbled themſelues to my lord Greie (as became them) and vpon ſtrait examination who ſhould be the railer that was excepted out of the pardon, it was knowne to be one Newton a Scot: but he to ſaue himſelfe, put it to one Hamilton, and ſo theſe two gentlemen accuſing one an other, the truth could not be decided otherwiſe than by a combat, which they required, and my lord Greie therevnto aſſented, and pronounced iudgement ſo to haue it tried: which he did the rather, bicauſe all men doo ſéeme reſolute in the triall of truth (as in a verie good cauſe) by loſſe of life to gaine an endleſſe name; as one ſaith:

Mors ſpernenda viris vt fama perennis alatur.

Yeſter caſtell wonne.

Vlpian Fulwell in the flower of fame.

Newton and Hamilton two Scotiſh gentlemen accuſe each other.

At the appointed time they entered the liſts, ſet vp for that purpoſe in the market place of Hadington, without other apparell ſauing their doublets and hoſen, weaponed with ſword, buckler and dagger. At the firſt entrie into the liſts, Hamilton kneeling downe, made his hartie praier to God, that it might pleaſe him to giue victorie vnto the truth, with ſolemne proteſtation that he neuer vttred anie ſuch words of king Edward of England, as his aduerſarie charged him with. On the other ſide Newton being troubled (as it ſeemed) with his falſe accuſation, argued vnto the beholders his guiltie conſcience. Now were the ſticklers in a readineſſe, and the combattors with their weapons drawne fell to it, ſo that betwixt them were ſtriken ſix or ſeuen blowes right luſtilie. But Hamilton being verie fierce and egre, vpon truſt of his innocencie, conſtreined Newton to giue ground almoſt to the end of the liſts; and if he had driuen him to the end in deed, then by the law of armes he had woone the victorie. Newton perceiuing himſelfe to be almoſt at point to be thus ouercome, ſtept forwards againe, and gaue Hamilton ſuch a gaſh on the leg, that he was not able longer to ſtand, but fell therewith downe to the ground, and then Newton falling on him, incontinentlie ſlue him with a dagger.

A combat fought betweene them.

Hamilton vanquiſhed and ſlaine.

There were gentlemen preſent that knowing as they tooke it for certeine, how Newton was the offendor (although fortune had fauoured him in the combat) would gladlie haue ventured their liues againſt him man for man, if it might haue beene granted: but he chalenging the law of armes, had it granted by my lord Greie, who gaue him alſo his owne gowne beſide his owne backe, and a chaine of gold which he then ware. Thus was he well rewarded how ſo euer he deſerued: but he eſcaped not ſo, for afterwards as he was riding betwixt the borders of both the realms, he was ſlaine and cut in peeces. On the fourth of Iune, the towne of Dawketh was burnt, and the caſtell woone by force, where fourteene Scots were ſlaine, and three hundred taken priſoners, amongſt whome were theſe men of name; the maiſter of Morton, ſon in law to ſir George Dowglaſſe, the lard of Blengarnie, the lard of Wedderburne, and one Alexander Hume, a man of good reputation among them. The ſame daie the Engliſh horſſemen burnt all the mils round about Edenburgh, within the compaſſe of ſix miles on each ſide the towne. The ſeuenth of Iune they burnt Muſkelburgh. Now after that my lord Greie had fortified Hadington, and furniſhed it with vittels, and munitions ſufficient, the twelfe of Iune he departed from thence homewards, leauing there in garriſon about two thouſand footmen, and fiue hundred horſſemen.

Newton rewarded by my lord Greie.

Newton ſlaine by his aduerſaries.

Muſkelburgh burnt.

In this meane time, Henrie the French king ſucceeding his father Francis the firſt (who departed this life the laſt of March in the yere laſt paſt, to wit, 1547) made prouiſion of an armie, with a nauie of ſhips and gallies, to paſſe into Scotland to the aid of the queene and other of his faction. And firſt he had ſent thither monſieur de la Chapelle de Biron, a gentleman of good account, to aſſiſt the gouernour with his aduiſe and counſell, which gouernour deſirous to recouer the caſtell of Broughticrag, and loth to ſee it poſſeſſed by the Engliſhmen. raiſed a power of eight thouſand men, and with eight peeces of artillerie came before that fortreſſe, meaning to win it by ſiege; but by the valiant prowes of ſir Andrew Dudleie, and the hardie manhood of ſuch Engliſh ſouldiors as ſerued there vnder him, the Scots were repelled, and driuen to leuie their ſiege with diſhonor.

The French king prepareth an armie in aid of the Scots.

Broughticrag beſieged.

Yet not thus contented, the earle of Argile with an armie of his Iriſh Scots, or Hieland men (if I maie ſo call them) after this likewiſe came and beſieged the place, but glad to take truce for a time with ſir Andrew. Before the tearme of the ſame truce was expired, there came new ſuccours to him, and therevpon the earle in the end was conſtrained to leuie his ſiege, and ſuffer the Engliſhmen to become maiſters of a little hill not farre off from the caſtell, where afterwards they builded a fortreſſe. But to returne to the French armie which was prepared to paſſe into Scotland, ye ſhall vnderſtand that when their ſhips and prouiſions were once readie, and the capteins with their bands come downe to Breſt in Britaine, where the nauie was rigged to receiue them, monſieur de Deſſe generall of all the armie, reckoned to conteine ſeuen or eight thouſand men, imbarked himſelfe with all his people, and ſailed forth on his iournie, till they arriued in the Forth, and there tooke land at Lieth the ſixteenth of Iune.

Shortlie after, hauing got their great artillerie on land, and taken aduiſe with the lord gouernour & other of the Scotiſh nobilitie, whome they found at Edenburgh, how to proceed in proſecuting the war againſt the Engliſhmen, it was reſolued that without delaie they ſhuld trie their forces about the recouerie of Hadington, and go to beſiege that towne, before they attempted anie further exploit. The gouernour and other of the Scotiſh lords, hauing with them ſeuen or eight hundred light horſſemen, offred to go with them, to the better aduancing forward of that enterpriſe. Herevpon ſetting forward, and comming to Muſkelburgh, the capteins with a certeine number of horſſemen and footmen, as well of Scots as Frenchmen, were appointed to go before to view the ſaid towne of Hadington. Vpon their approch neere to the towne, there iſſued forth certeine Engliſhmen and Italians, that were of Tiberios band, which ſkirmiſhed with them right ſtoutlie, till at length the Frenchmen and Scots retired backe to Lauret a little from Muſkelburgh (where their armie incamped for that night) and the Engliſhmen and Italians returned backe to their fortreſſe.

The Frenchmen reſolue to beſiege Hadington.

The next daie the Frenchmen and Scots with their whole power came before Hadington, where they were welcomed with a right ſharpe and hot ſkirmiſh, in which was ſlaine with an harquebuſe ſhot, one of the French capteins called Villeneufue. In the meane time whileſt this ſkirmiſh continued, the Reinſgraue with his Almans incamped himſelfe on the one ſide of the towne, where the maiſter of the ordinance in the French armie, named monſieur Duno, cauſed trenches to be caſt for the ſafe placing of the artillerie: the Engliſhmen ſtill kept them occupied on each ſide the towne with ſkirmiſhing, to the annoiance of the aduerſaries. To conclude, they incamped before the towne, caſt trenches, lodged their ordinance, & laid their ſiege to the moſt aduantage, ſo far as they might be ſuffered. Shortlie after that this ſiege was planted, there came to the aid of the French, the earle of Argile, with a great number of Iriſh Scots, and monſieur de la Chapelle brought an eight or nine hundred Scotiſh pioners, which began a trench on the left hand of the abbeie gate, and likewiſe a trauerſe to couer their ſouldiors that ſhould watch and ward, from danger of the ſhot out of the towne on that ſide.

At one of the which ſkirmiſhes Piero Strozzi, coronell of three enſigns of Italians, was ſtriken with a muſket ſhot. Yet monſieur de Deſſe inforcing the ſiege to the vttermoſt of his power, cauſed one night with helpe of baſkets filled with earth, ſix peeces of artillerie to be planted in batterie faſt at the towne ſide, which at the breake of daie began to ſhoot off, and diſcharged that preſent daie thrée hundred and fortie ſhots. But after they perceiued that they did litle hurt to the fortifications of the towne in that place where this batterie was laid: the next night, the baſkets & péeces of artillerie were remoued lower, and not paſt thrée ſcore paſes from the ditches of the towne, where the next daie two hundred ſhots were diſcharged againſt the rampire. To conclude, they made ſuch breaches in ſundrie places for eaſie entrie into the towne, that it was greatlie maruelled whie they durſt not aſſaie to giue a generall aſſault.

The valiancie of the Engliſhmen.

They lodged ſo neare within the verie ditches, that there were deuiſed certeine plummets of lead, tied with cords to a truncheon of a ſtaffe, like to an handſtaffe of a flaile, wherewith the ſouldiors that watched and warded within the towne on the rampire, ſlue diuerſe of the Frenchmen being their lodged within their ditches. Thus notwithſtanding that the Frenchmen with their artillerie had broken downe the fortifications, ſo as the breaches were made verie reaſonable and eaſie for them to enter; yet durſt they not preſume once to giue the aſſault: for the Engliſhmen although their powder was ſore ſpent, and that for want of matches they were conſtreined to teare their ſhirts, and vſe the ſame in ſted of matches; yet they ſhewed themſelues ſo valiant in defending the towne thus beaten & made weake on each hand, that there was no hope left to their aduerſaries to win it of them by force. Although the French power on the one ſide, and eight thouſand Scots on an other had ſo inuironed it, that the Engliſhmen within were driuen to moſt hard ſhifts, for want of things neceſſarie & requiſite for their maintenance and defenſe of that towne.

Succours entring the towne.

But yet whileſt they remained thus in ſuch diſtreſſe and neceſſitie of things, two hundred Engliſhmen vnder the conduct of capteine Windham, Warham Seintleger, and Iohn Car of Warke, found meanes one night to paſſe through all the watches on that ſide where the Scots laie, and entering the towne, and bringing with them great plentie of powder, and other neceſſaries, greatlie relieued them within, & ſo incouraged them, that they ſéemed to make ſmall account of their enimies forces. Herevpon within few daies after, the Scots (fiue or ſix hundred light horſſemen onelie excepted) brake vp their campe and returned home. After this, my lord Greie remaining at Berwike, ment to make a voiage himſelfe in perſon for the reliefe of them that were thus beſieged in Hadington. Now when all things were ſo farre in a readineſſe as the next daie he ment to haue ſet forward, letters were brought that night from the court, willing him to performe that ſeruice by a deputie, and to ſtaie himſelfe till the comming of the earle of Shreweſburie, who was appointed with an armie to come verie ſhortlie as generall into thoſe parties.

Sir Robert Bowes ſent to ſuccour Hadington.

My lord Greie herevpon appointed in his ſtead ſir Robert Bowes, and ſir Thomas Palmer, to go thither, who comming to Dunglas, left there certeine bands of footmen, and with the horſſemen being in number thirtéene hundred (whereof ſeuen hundred lances were appointed vnder the charge of ſir Thomas Palmer) they rode forward to accompliſh their enterpriſe: but the French capteins hauing knowledge of their comming, they prouided the beſt they could to repell them, appointing foure venlins or enſignes of lanceknights to kéepe a ſtanding watch that night in the trenches, and the like number of French enſignes to watch about their campe. All the other of their bands were commanded to take reſt, but yet with their armour on their backs.

The lord Hume.

Dandelot.

Their generall monſieur de Deſſe himſelfe, monſieur de Mailleraie admerall of their fléet, monſieur Dandelot coronell of the French footmen, Piero Strozzi coronell of the Italians, the Reinſgraue coronell of the lanceknights, and all other the noble men and capteins of honour among them were all night long in armour, trauelling vp and downe, ſome on horſſebacke, and ſome on foot, to viſit the watches and ſcouts, ſet in places and waies by the which they ſuſpected that the Engliſhmen ment to come. The lord Hume riding abrode to learne what he might of the Engliſhmens demeanour, earlie in the morning returned to the campe, and certified monſieur de Deſſe, that they were at hand. Herewith were the Scotiſh and French horſſemen that kept the ſcout called in, and monſieur Dandelot with great expedition ranged his battell of footmen in order, and ſo likewiſe did the Reinſgraue his Almans.

Monſieur Etauges.

The Engliſh horſſemen diſcomfited.

* Quéene Elizabeth.

The Engliſhmen diuided into two bands came and ſhewed themſelues in the ſight of the towne, and charging ſuch Scots and Frenchmen as came foorth to incounter them, gaue them the ouerthrow at two ſeuerall charges: but finallie preſuming too farre vpon their good lucke thus chancing to them in the beginning, followed in chaſe thoſe that fled before them, vntill at length they were incloſed and ſhut vp betwixt the French footmen on the one ſide, and the Almans on the other. And herewith the Scotiſh horſmen vnder the conduct of the lords, Humes & Dune, & the French horſſemen led by monſieur de Etauges their generall, being aſſembled togither eftſoones, after they had béene ſo repelled, were now readie to come forward againe: and perceiuing their footmen ſo to haue inuironed the Engliſhmen, that they were not able to recouer themſelues, nor to get out of danger, but by diſordring their ranks to take them to flight, followed amaine, ſo that thoſe which eſcaped the Frenchmens hands were taken by the Scots that purſued them in chaſe, ſo that few were ſaued that were not either ſlaine or taken. My lord Greis loſt thréeſcore and twelue great horſſes, and an hundred geldings, with all the men vpon them, armed with his lordſhips owne furniture, onelie foure or fiue of his men came home, of the which Thomas Cornwallis now groome porter to the * quéenes maieſtie was one, and Robert Car eſquier an other then page to my ſaid lord Greie.

The Frenchmen remoue their campe.

The vnaduiſed raſhneſſe of ſir Thomas Palmer was thought to be the chiefe occaſion of this diſtreſſe of thoſe horſſemen, who after they had doone ſufficientlie for that time, would néeds haue them to giue a new charge, and ſo were diſcomfited. After this ouerthrow and chaſe of our horſſemen, the armie that was leuied to paſſe into Scotland was haſted forward with all ſpéed poſſible: for although before the comming of the Engliſh horſſemen, the French, vpon aduertiſement giuen that they meant to come, had plucked backe their great artillerie, and ſent the ſame vnto Edenburgh, kéeping onelie with them ſix field-péeces, and herewith remoued their campe further off from the towne: yet by foreſtalling vitels and all other neceſſarie things from them within, they were driuen to ſuch diſtreſſe, that they muſt of force haue left the towne to the enimies, if ſome power had not come within a while to remoue the ſiege that laie thus to annoie them.

When therefore the armie was come to Newcaſtell, & the earle of Shreweſburie generall lieutenant of the ſame was there arriued, they paſſed forward to Berwike, and from thenſe marched ſtreight towards Hadington. The number of the Engliſhmen and ſtrangers was reported at the point of fifteene thouſand, whereof thrée thouſand were Almans vn-

Beſide this armie by land, there was alſo furniſhed forth a fleet by ſea, vnder the conduct of the lord Clinton high admerall of England, and other capteins of great experience in affaires and ſeruice by ſea. This fleet was appointed ſo to keepe courſe with the armie by land, that the one might be euer in ſight of the other. Monſieur de Deſſe aduertiſed of the comming forward of this armie, durſt not abide their comming, but raiſed his field, and retired with his armie toward Edenburgh: howbeit they were no ſooner diſlodged, but that a great troope of the Engliſh horſſemen were got within ſight of them, and coaſted them all the waie as they marched for the ſpace of ſeuen or eight miles, in maner to as farre as Muſkelburgh, where the Frenchmen ſtaied, and incamped in a place choſen forth to their moſt aduantage.

The earle of Shreweſburie commeth to Hadington.

The patience of the Engliſh men in ſuſteining all wants of releefe.

The earle of Shreweſburie, and the lord Greie with the armie comming vnto Hadington, were ioifullie receiued of the capteins and ſoldiours within: where it might appeare how valiantlie they had defended that towne during the ſiege, being ſo deſtitute of all things neceſſarie for their releefe; and the fortifications ſo weake, that if the noble proweſſe of their worthie generall ſir Iames Wilford, and the incomparable manhood of the reſt of the capteins and ſoldiours had not ſupplied all other wants, it was thought impoſſible that they ſhould haue defended the place ſo long a time againſt ſuch forces as had beene there imploied againſt them. But ſuch was the vndanted valiancie of that noble crue and garriſon, that euen the verie enimies themſelues could not but yeeld high commendations to the capteins and ſoldiours for the hardie forwardneſſe and manhood, which at all times they had found and tried in them at all points of ſeruice, when they came to deale with them. And verelie their fame deſerueth to be had in memorie for euer, not onelie for their worthie atchiued exploits, doone by force of hand, to the beating backe and repelling of the enimies, but alſo for their patient ſuſteining of hunger, thirſt, continuall watching, nakedneſſe, ſickeneſſe, and all other ſuch calamities and miſeries, as want of things neceſſarie for the releefe and maintenance of mans life is woont to bring, to thoſe that are incloſed in ſuch wiſe by the enimie. All which extremities they were well content to ſuſteine, ſo that it might turne to the benefit and renowme of their countrie, in compariſon whereof they eſteemed all things elſe verie vile and contemptible, were the ſame neuer ſo good, as the poet ſaith:

Tantus amor patriæ mortalia pectora tangit,
Nataliſque ſoli, præ quo bona cætera ſordent.

The earle of Shreweſburie marcheth towards the enimies.

The noble earle of Shreweſburie could not forbeare to ſhed teares, to vnderſtand and perceiue that ſuch worthie ſoldiours ſhould ſuffer ſuch great diſtreſſe, whoſe valiant hearts could not be quailed with anie afflictions. Thus with mournefull imbracings intermixed with pitifull regards they met. The earle entering the towne, furniſhed it with new bands of men, good ſtore of vittels, munition, and all other things conuenient, and as then thought requiſit. Thus hauing refreſhed the towne, within two daies after he paſſed forth towards the enimies, appointing by the aduiſe of that noble chiefteine the lord Greie, certeine bands of horſſemen to keepe themſelnes cloſe togither in ambuſh, and to ſend a few to the French campe, to trie if they might traine the Frenchmen out of their ſtrength. And as they wiſhed, it partlie came to paſſe: for diuerſe of their horſſemen iſſued forth of their campe, and proffered the ſkirmiſh. The Engliſhmen ſuffered themſelues to be chaſed, vntill they had got their enimies within danger of their ambuſh, and then whirling about, gaue them the charge, inforcing them to make their careir backe, with more than an eaſie gallop; ſo that hauing the Frenchmen thus in chaſe, they ſlue and tooke diuerſe, and among the priſoners were two capteins, Pierre Longue, and one Lucinet. The others that eſcaped, returned with this loſſe to their campe.

The Frenchmen chaſed.

The armie of the Scots come to ioine with the Frenchmen.

The earle of Shreweſburie profereth the enimies battell.

The Frenchmen durſt not come forth of their campe.

Ships burned.

A fortreſſe built at Dunglas.

The lord Greie entereth againe into Scotland.

In the meane time, whileſt theſe things were thus in dooing, there came to the aid of the Frenchmen fourteene or fifteene thouſand Scots, accounting herewith the Iriſh Scots which came with the earle of Argile. Theſe Scots were ſcarſe lodged, when ſuddenlie the earle of Shreweſburie & the lord Greie came with their armie diuided into three battels of footmen, garded with two troops of horſſemen, preſenting themſelues before the faces of their enimies in the ſame place, where their auant currors the daie before had ſhewed themſelues to draw forth the Frenchmen. Here the armie thus ranged in arraie of battell, ſtaied aboue the ſpace of an houre, looking if the enimies durſt haue come forth to haue giuen battell: but when they perceiued that by no meanes the Frenchmen meant to forſake their ſtrength, they returned backe to their campe. The Engliſh nauie being entered now into the Forth, was not idle: for comming to Brent Iland they ſet fire on foure ſhips, which they found there, and after paſſing by Lieth ſaluted them within the towne with cannon ſhot, and after intending to burne ſaint Minets, were repelled from thenſe by the lord of Dune, and after returned to attend on the armie. The earle of Shreweſburie, and my lord Greie hauing executed ſo much as their commiſſion would beare, and refreſhed Hadington with all things needfull, departed homewards; and comming to Dunglas, began there to build a fortreſſe. The Engliſh Almans as the armie paſſed by Dunbar, burned the towne. Theſe Almans alſo, and certeine bands of Engliſhmen, as well horſſemen as footmen, were left at Dunglas, vntill the Forth there begun was in ſome ſtrength. The earle of Shreweſburie with the reſt of the armie came backe into England. My lord Greie remaining on the borders lieutenant of the north parts, after the earle of Shreweſburie was returned home, aſſembled all the horſſemen then lieng on the borders, and being backed with the Almane footmen, entered againe with the ſame horſſemen into Scotland, burning and waſting in the countries of Tiuidall, and Liddeſdall, for the ſpace of twentie miles, both houſe, corne, haie, and all other things that came within their reach, and after returned without incounter.

A camiſado giuen to Hadington.

The ninth of October being tueſdaie, monſieur de Deſſe, with his Frenchmen and Almans, came in the morning long before daie to Hadington, meaning to haue woone the towne by ſtealth. And verelie the enterpriſe was gouerned in ſuch ſecret maner, that the Frenchmen had killed the Engliſh ſcouts, and were entered the baſe court, yer anie alarum was raiſed: and hauing ſlaine the watch, ſome of them ran to a place behind a church, where the Engliſhmen had their vittels and munitions, and ſome thruſt vp to the towne gate, inforſing with great violence to breake it open, crieng with noiſe and ſhouts, Victorie, victorie, whereof in deed they accounted themſelues then aſſured. And queſtionles the Engliſhmen being thus wakened out of their ſleeps on the ſudden, were in ſome great diſorder; ſo that manie of them came running forth without either armour or apparell, their ſhirts excepted; & others ran they wiſt not well whither, nor where to take heed. But yet as the Frenchmen were thronged togither at the gate to breake it open, a Frenchman (as their writers doo report) that ſerued within the towne, but as other ſaie Tiberio capteine of the Italians, with his match light gaue fier to a double canon, that laie readie bent againſt the gate, ſo that the ſame ſhooting off, made ſuch a lane among the Frenchmen, that they were glad to giue place, and with ſuch a fearefull crie, that thoſe which were behind, not vnderſtanding what loſſe their fellowes before had ſuſteined, brake their arraie and fled amaine.

The Frenchmen repelled.

The Engliſhmen herewith paſſed through a priuie poſterne into the baſe court, and comming vpon them with their halberds, and blacke bils, ſlue of them great plentie, and droue the reſt that eſcaped ouer the wall in ſuch haſt, that happie was he that could tumble ouer firſt. Monſieur de Deſſe yet gathering them togither againe, gaue that morning thrée ſharpe aſſaults to the towne, but was repelled with great loſſe, for they caried awaie with them ſixtéene carts and wagons laden with hurt perſons and dead carcaſſes, beſides thrée hundred that were found in the baſe court, which they could not come to, after they were beaten out, to take awaie with them. And thus was monſieur de Deſſe conſtreined to returne, repenting himſelfe of that his bold attempted enterpriſe, hauing loſt no ſmall number of his Frenchmen and Almans, being ſlaine in the place. In this meane time, the kings maieſtie ſummoned his high court of parlement, to be holden vpon prorogation at Weſtminſter the fourth of Nouember, where it continued till the fourtéenth of March next inſuing.

A parlement.

In the meane time, the procéedings for the Scotiſh wars was not forgotten, wherevpon in the déepe of the winter, there were conueied certeine bands of the Engliſh lancequenets, and ſome number of Engliſhmen, both horſemen and footmen by ſea vnto Broughticrag; and paſſing from thence vnto Dundée, a two miles from thence, entred the towne, and began to fortifie it: but ſhortlie after by the comming of the French armie with monſieur de Deſſe, they left it, firſt ſpoiling the houſes, and after ſet them on fire at their departure. The Reinſgraue coronell of the Almans, and monſieur de Etauges, being ſent by monſieur de Deſſe before, entered Dundée, and lodged within it. Within two daies after their comming thither, they tooke certeine of their bands, and going forth did view and ſurueie the new fort, which the Engliſhmen had begun to make on the hill, a ſmall diſtance from the caſtell. But the Engliſhmen and their Almans iſſuing forth againſt them, were at their elbowes yer they were halfe well aduiſed that they were got ſo neare them, whereby being driuen haſtilie to retire, they hardlie eſcaped out of danger, being ſo hotlie purſued, that if the Reinſgraue had not ſhewed his approoued valiancie, guided with no leſſe policie than manhood, the whole troope had béene (as was thought) vtterlie diſtreſſed.

Dundée ſpoiled.

The Reinſgraue conſtreind to retire.

In Chriſtmaſſe this yéere the caſtell of Hume was recouered out of the Engliſhmens hands, through treſon of certeine aſſured Scots, that vſing to bring vittels to the Engliſhmen that kept it, had marked all the manner of the ſcouts and watches, with the places of the wall where the clime was moſt eaſie. Wherevpon in the night ſeaſon, certeine of the Scots ſecretlie comming into the ditches, got vp to the heigth of the wals, and entring the place, ſlue and tooke vpon the ſudden all that were within it. The ſixtéenth of Ianuarie, ſir Thomas Seimer baron of Sudleie, lord admerall, and brother to the duke of Summerſet lord protector, was arreſted and ſent to the tower, and after by authoritie of parlement he was attainted, and the twentith of March next inſuing, in the third yeare of this kings reigne beheaded at tower hill. Moreouer in this parlement, the vſe of the maſſe was clearlie prohibited, and a booke for the vniformitie of diuine ſeruice, and right adminiſtration of the ſacraments, was ſet forth and eſtabliſhed.

Sir Thomas Seimer ſent to the tower.

Anno Reg. 3.

The maſſe aboliſhed.

Yée haue heard how the Frenchmen fortified the towne of Dundée, where monſieur de Etauges, with his companie of horſemen lieng in garriſon chanced in a ſkirmiſh to be taken by the Engliſhmen that laie in Broughticrag, to the great reioiſing of them that tooke him, and no leſſe gréefe of the French and Scots, for the tried valiancie that was throughlie knowne to reſt in him. Moreouer, the Engliſhmen that kept the towne of Hadington all this while againſt the enimies, could not come by anie vittels, but onelie by a conuoie of ſome conuenient power to gard the cariages that brought the ſame from the borders. And as it fortuned at one time when the conuoie came and paſſed by Dunbar, a ſkirmiſh was proffered by the French which laie within that caſtell in garriſon. And as ſir Iames Wilford that was there amongſt other vpon this occaſion (according to his wonted valiancie) ſhewed himſelfe verie forward and egre againſt the enimie, he was incloſed by an ambuſh, which the Frenchmen had laid on ech ſide the ſtréet within the towne, that he could by no means eſcape out of their hands, but hauing his horſſe there ſlaine vnder him, was taken priſoner euen by a Gaſcoigne of the countrie of Baſque named Pellicque, that woone no ſmall commendation for that his good hap, in taking ſuch a priſoner, whoſe name for his often approoued proweſſe was verie famous euen among the enimies, who ſaw well inough a reſoluteneſſe in the man rather by perillous aduentures to purchaſe the perpetuitie of renowme, than by defect of courage or negligent ſeruice to looſe both life and fame. Which perſuaſion ſhould enter into the hart of euerie ſeruitor in the field, if they will be counted right valiant indéed, conſidering that he which in his life time dooth performe nothing worthie memorie, is like a plaier entring vpon the ſtage, but ſhewing nothing either in ſpéech or in action, as the poet verie fitlie ſaith:

Monſieur de Etauges taken priſoner.

Sir Iames Wilford taken priſoner.

Qui nullum facinus tota memorabile vita
Ediderint, obſcuri homines migrare videntur
Hinc, vt qui ſtructa nil dixerit hiſtrio ſcena.

Some haue written that he was taken through default of thoſe that were appointed to follow him, ſith he vndertooke to charge the enimie, in hope that by them he ſhould haue béene aſſiſted. But ſuerlie thoſe that had the charge of this conuoie, doubting by aduenturing too far, to put all in hazard, thought it wiſedome rather to ſuffer the loſſe of one, than to ieopard the whole; not perceiuing which waie to remedie the matter at that preſent. Now after that the generall of Hadington was thus taken priſoner, to the great griefe vndoubtedlie, not onelie of all the garriſon there, but alſo of all ſuch as tendered the aduancement of the kings maieſties ſeruice, ſir Iames Crofts was thought a man moſt méet to ſupplie the place, and therefore by the lord protector and others of the councell was ordeined generall of that towne of Hadington, and the garriſon there, in which roome he bare himſelfe ſo worthilie, as if I ſhould not be ſuſpected of flatterie, for that he liueth yet, and in ſuch credit (as the world knoweth) I might moue my ſelfe matter to ſaie rather much than ſufficientlie inough in his due and right deſerued commendation.

Sir Iames Crofts generall of Hadington.

The king by the aduiſe of his councell meaning to proſecute the wars in Scotland, with great forces reteined a new power of lancequenets, and other ſtrangers, vnder the conduct of diuers & ſundrie capteines: but in the meane time the French king meaning ning to breake with the king of England, thought to haue ſtolen the fortreſſe of Bullognberg, ſo that a choſen power of men of warre, to the number of ſeuen thouſand, vnder the conduct of monſieur de Chatillon, being ſent downe about that exploit on Maie daie at night, came forward with their ladders, and all other furniture meet for the purpoſe, approching about the houre of midnight neere to the fort, within the which were not at that time manie aboue three hundred and fiftie ſoldiers, vnder the gouernement of ſir Nicholas Arnalt knight generall of that peece, a capteine of great courage, and no leſſe diligence in his charge.

Sir Nicholas Arnalt capteine of Bullognberg.

And as it chanced, there were among the Frenchmen three or foure Engliſhmen, which hauing matched themſelues in marriage with women of that countrie, after the peace was concluded betwixt France and England, were diſcharged out of the king of Englands wages; and remaining with their wiues, got interteinement among the Frenchmen, and were with monſieur de Chatillon, now comming towards this enterpriſe. Whervpon one of the ſame Engliſhmen named Carter, that had aforetime giuen intelligence to the ſaid ſir Nicholas of the Frenchmens doings, ſo farre as he might learne and vnderſtand the ſame, would gladlie haue aduertiſed ſir Nicholas Arnalt of the Frenchmens purpoſe at this time: but monſieur de Chatillon kept the matter ſo ſecret, that Carter nor any of the other Engliſhmen had knowledge thereof, till they were now marching forward, ſo that Carter could not get awaie from them, till they were approched within leſſe than a quarter of a mile of Bullognberg, and then ſlipping aſide from among them, came running ſo faſt as he might towards the fort, crieng; Bowes, bowes, as lowd as his voice would ſerue, & ſo gaue the alarum to them within the fort.

Carter an Engliſhman ſeruing amōg the Frenchmen, but to their diſaduantage.

One of the ſoldiers called Morgaine Deaton, that chanced to be there at hand in ſcout with three or foure other, ſtreight knew him, and brought him to the draw-bridge, where ſir Nicholas Arnalt cauſed him to be drawen vp betwixt two pikes, vnto whome he declared how the Frenchmen were at hand, meaning to aſſaile his fort now vpon the ſudden, in hope ſo to ſurpriſe it. Herewith, it needed not to will ſir Nicholas to beſtirre him, to cauſe euerie man to make readie, and place themſelues as was thought moſt expedient. And vndoubtedlie the noble courage of that worthie gentleman, furthered much, to cauſe euerie capteine and ſoldier vnder him, to put awaie all feare, and to haue a regard to doo his dutie, for the receiuing of the enimies; ſo as they ſeemed glad of the occaſion, whereby they might ſhew proofe of their accuſtomed manhood againſt the enimie, that thus came to ſteale on them without warning, in purpoſe to kill euerie man that fell into their hands, if their intention had taken place, making now ſuch haſt forward, that before the Engliſhmen could be well readie with their armour and weapons in their appointed places, the Frenchmen were got to the ditches, and appointing three thouſand of their numbers, the moſt part gentlemen and double paies, with targets, battell axes, and piſtols, to haue the firſt ſcale, ſaluted them within vpon their verie approch, with ſeuen hundred harquebuts ſhot at the firſt volee.

Sir Nicholas Arnalts valiantneſſe.

The Frenchmen aſſaile Bullognberg.

The Engliſhmen by order giuen by ſir Nicholas, kept themſelues cloſe, till the Frenchmen by their ſcaling ladders, which they brought with them, and had quickelie raiſed againſt the walles, began to mount vp, and enter vpon them; at which inſtant, off went the flankers. Thoſe of ſir Nicholas Arnalts monts diſcharged verie well at the firſt, but at the ſecond volee the morters burſt. Albeit there were two braſſe peeces that were planted aloft on the ſame mont, of the which the one diſcharged fiue & twentie ſhot by the maiſter, and the other ſeuen and twentie by his maieſtie. Sir Nicholas Arnalt here being accompanied with his capteins and ſoldiers about him, ſtood at defenſe ſo ſtoutlie as was poſſible, dooing ſo valiantlie, that their fame deſerueth to liue for euer. There were burſt vpon the faces of the enimies (ouer and beſide the ſhot that was beſtowed among them) to the number of fifteene hundred pikes and blacke bils. The Frenchmen verelie ſtucke to it to the vttermoſt, and did what laie in the verie laſt point of their powers to enter vpon the Engliſhmen, ſupplieng ſtill the places of their dead and wearie men with freſh ſuccors.

The number of pikes and bils broken vpon the Frenchmen.

Carter that came to bring word of their comming, with a pike in his hand, ſtood at the place of the bulworke where they thus gaue the aſſault, & fought right valiantlie, giuing manie wounds, and receiuing ſome againe: for he was hurt both in the thigh and arme, who ſuerlie of a priuat ſoldier (if he were priuat and ordinarie) ſeemed verie ſeruiceable at all aſſaies, conſidering into what deſperat aduentures and hazzards he did as it were caſt himſelfe, eſteeming leſſe the loſſe of life and lim, than the reproch and diſhonor of his countrie, the glorie & renowme wherof (aboue all worldlie things which are but temporall) all men are naturallie bound with might & maine both to ſeeke and ſaue; as one verie well ſaith:

Carter an hardie ſoldier and a good ſeruitor.

Naſcimur vt patriam vitáque operáque iuuemus.

Sir Nicholas Arnalt himſelfe was hurt with a pike in the noſe. Capteine Warren ſtanding on the ſame bulworke with ſir Nicholas, receiued two ſhots in his corſelet, and one of them droue two or three links of his chaine into his necke. Capteine Broughton had there ſixteene of his armed men, euerie of them hauing their corſelets perſed through. The number of the Engliſhmen that were ſlaine, was reckoned to be fiue and twentie, and hurt eight and fiftie. Of Frenchmen there were ſlaine a great number, beſide thoſe that were hurt, and at length through ſhot, caſting downe of ſtones and timber vpon their heads, ſcalding water and handblowes they were repelled, retiring out of the trenches ſhortlie after the breake of the daie, hauing continued the aſſault from midnight till that time, ſtill renewing their forces, in hope to atchiue their wiſhed preie: but being thus beaten off, they gathered togither their dead men, and lading fifteene waggons with their carcaſſes, they returned backe, without making anie further attempt at that time.

The Frenchmen repelled.

Fifteene wagons laden with French carcaſſes.

And ſo by the high valiancie of ſir Nicholas Arnalt, and the other capteins that ſerued in that fort vnder him, and chieflie by the aſſiſtance of almightie God, the giuer of all victories, the enimies were repelled, to their great diſhonor, and the peece reſerued to the immortall renowme of the defendants. Within a daie or two after, the generall of the Frenchmen ſent to know of priſoners taken; but ſir Nicholas Arnalt anſwered the meſſenger, that he knew of no warre: and therefore if anie had attempted to make a ſurpriſe of his peece by ſtealth, they were ſerued accordinglie to their malicious meanings. Indeed (ſaid he) we haue taken none of your men, but we haue got ſome of your braue guilt armour & weapons. Well (ſaid the meſſenger) it is not the cowle that maketh the moonke, and no more is it the braue armour or weapon that maketh the man of warre: but the fortune of warre is ſuch, ſometime to gaine, and ſometime to loſe. Sir Nicholas receiuing him into the fort, made him good cheere, and gaue him fiftie crownes in reward, and ſo he departed.

But concerning the liberalitie of ſir Nicholas, I might here ſpeake further thereof, how bountifullie he rewarded the ſouldiers for their great manhood ſhewed at that time, in defending ſo ſharpe an aſſault, to their great honour, and no leſſe confuſion of the aduerſaries. The daie after the ſaid aſſault, there came to Bullognberg from Guiſnes, a ſupplie of thrée or foure hundred men, vnder the leading of ſir William Cobham, now lord Cobham and others. Within a while after, ſir Nicholas Arnalt ſent forth thrée hundred footmen, and fiue and twentie horſſemen, conducted by the ſaid ſir William Cobham, capteine Mutton of the Old man, & capteine More of Bullognberg, with certeine cariages, to go vnto a wood not farre off, called the North wood, to fetch fagots and bruſh, to repare and mainteine the rampires.

The lord Cobham with a new ſupplie of ſoldiers.

These capteins with their bands being paſſed forward, about two miles in diſtance from the fort, met with certeine of their ſcouts that were ſent forth that morning, who told them that they had diſcouered the tract of a great number of horſſemen. Wherevpon the Engliſhmen now being almoſt come to the wood ſide, retired with all ſpéed: and herewith the French horſſemen brake out of the wood, and following them, fell in ſkirmiſh with them. The Engliſhmen caſting themſelues in a ring, kept them off with their pikes, wherewith they impailed themſelues, and hauing their ſmall troope lined with ſhot, they alſo galled the Frenchmen right ſore therewith, as they ſtill approched them. Neuertheleſſe, thoſe horſſemen gaue thrée maine onſets vpon the Engliſhmen, with the number of a thouſand horſſe at two of the firſt onſets, and the third they gaue with all their whole power, being eſtéemed a fiftéene hundred horſſemen in all.

The great valiãcie of the Engliſhmen vnder the conduct of their noble capteins

But ſuch was the valiant proweſſe of the Engliſh ſouldiers, incouraged with the comfortable preſence of ſir William Cobham, and other their capteins, that conducted them in ſuch order as ſtood moſt for their ſafegard, exhorting them with ſuch effectuall words as ſerued beſt to purpoſe, that the enimie to conclude was repelled with loſſe of ſeuentie of their great horſſes that laie dead there in the field, within the ſpace of halfe a mile. There were alſo foure thouſand French footmen that came forward, but could not reach, and ſo marching about the fort, returned in vaine, after they once perceiued that the Engliſhmen were ſafelie retired within their fort. The councell thus perceiuing the French kings purpoſe, which he had conceiued to worke ſome notable damage to this realme, as well in ſupport of his friends in Scotland, as in hope to recouer thoſe péeces which the Engliſh held at Bullongne, and in thoſe marches, doubted alſo of ſome inuaſion meant by him to be attempted into this realme, bicauſe of ſuch great preparation as he had made, for leuieng of his forces both by ſea and land.

The preparation for warre as well in England as France.

The councell therefore made likewiſe prouiſion to be readie to reſiſt all ſuch attempts, as anie waie forth might be made, to the annoiance of the realme. But as things fell out, the ſame ſtood in good ſtead, not againſt the forren enimie, but againſt a number of rebellious ſubiects at home, the which forgetting their dutie and allegiance, did as much as in them laie (what ſoeuer their pretenſe was) to bring this noble realme and their naturall countrie vnto deſtruction. But firſt, for that it maie appeare, that the duke of Summerſet then protector, and other of the councell, did not without good ground and cauſe mainteine the warres againſt the Scots, I haue thought good to ſet downe an epiſtle exhortatorie, as we find the ſame in the great chronicle of Richard Grafton, ſent from the ſaid protector and councell vnto the Scots, to mooue them to haue conſideration of themſelues, and of the eſtate of their countrie, by ioining in that friendlie bond and vnitie with England, as had béene of the kings part and his fathers continuallie ſought, for the benefit of both realmes, the copie of which exhortation here inſueth.

Rich. Grafton in fol. 1294.

The lord protectors right honorable ſtile.

Edward by the grace of God, duke of Summerſet, earle of Hertford, vicount Beauchampe, lord Seimer, vncle to the kings highneſſe of England, gouernor of his moſt roiall perſon, and protector of all his realmes, dominions, & ſubiects, lieutenant generall of all his maieſties armies, both by land and ſea, treaſuror and earle marſhall of England, gouernor of the Iles of Gerneſeie and Ierſeie, and knight of the moſt noble order of the garter, with others of the councell of the ſaid moſt high and noble prince Edward, by the grace of God of England, France, and Ireland king, defender of the faith, and in earth vnder Chriſt the ſupreame head of the churches of England and Ireland. To the nobilitie and councellors, gentlemen and commons, and all other the inhabitants of the realme of Scotland, greeting and peace.

The epiſtle exhortatorie ſent to the Scots.

COnſidering with our ſelues the preſent ſtate of things, and weieng more déepelie the maner and tearmes wherein you and we doo ſtand, it maketh vs to maruell, what euill & fatall chance dooth ſo diſſeuer your hearts, and maketh them ſo blind and vnmindfull of your profit, and ſo ſtill conciliate and heape to your ſelues moſt extreame miſchiefs, the which we whome ye will néeds haue your enimies, go about to take awaie from you, and perpetuallie to eaſe you therof. And alſo by all reaſon & order of neceſſitie, it ſhould be rather more conuenient for you to ſéeke and require moderate agréements of vs, whome God hath hitherto according to our moſt iuſt, true, and godlie meanings and intents, proſpered and ſet forward, with your affliction and miſerie, than that we being ſuperiours in the field, maiſters of a great part of your realme, ſhould ſéeke vpon you. Yet to the intent that our charitable minds and brotherlie loue ſhould not ceaſe, by all meanes poſſible to prouoke and call you to your owne commoditie and profit, euen as the father to the ſon, or the elder brother to the yoonger; and as the louing phyſician would doo to the miſtruſtfull and ignorant patient: we are content to call and crie vpon you to looke on your eſtate, to auoid the great calamitie that your countrie is in, to haue vs rather brothers than enimies, and rather countrimen than conquerors. And if your gouernor or capteins ſhall reteine and kéepe from you this our exhortation, as heretofore they haue doone our proclamation, tending to the like effect, for their owne priuat wealth & commoditie, not regarding though you be ſtill in miſerie, ſo they haue profit and gouernance ouer you, and ſhall ſtill abuſe you with feined and forged tales: yet this ſhall be a witneſſe before God, and all chriſtian people, betwéene you and vs, that we profeſſing the goſpell of Ieſus Chriſt, according to the doctrine thereof, doo not ceaſe to call and prouoke you from the effuſion of your owne bloud, from the deſtruction of the realme of Scotland, from perpetuall enimitie and hatred, from the finall deſtruction of your nation, and from ſeruitude to forren nations, to libertie, to amitie, to equalitie with vs, to that which your writers haue alwaies wiſhed might once come to paſſe.

Herein appeereth the lord protectors care for their good eſtate.

Who that hath read the ſtories in times paſt, and dooth marke & note the great battels paſt fought betwixt England & Scotland, the incurſions, rodes, & ſpoiles, which haue béene doone on both parties: the realme of Scotland fiue times woone by one king of England,

Scotland wonne fiue times by one king of England.

England, the Scotiſh kings ſome taken priſoners, ſome ſlaine in battell, ſome for verie ſorrow and diſcomfort vpon loſſe, dieng and departing the world: and ſhall perceiue againe, that all nations in the world, that nation onelie beſide England, ſpeaketh the ſame language: and as you and we be annexed and ioined in one Iland, ſo no people are ſo like in maners, forme, language, and all conditions as we are: ſhall not he thinke it a thing verie vnmeet, vnnaturall, and vnchriſtian, that there ſhould be betwixt vs ſo mortall war, who in reſpect of all other nations, be and ſhould be like as two brethren of one Iland of great Britaine? And though he were a ſtranger to both, what ſhould he thinke more meet, than if it were poſſible one kingdome to be made in rule, which is one in language, and to be diuided in rulers, which is all one in countrie?

The caſe of the coniunctiō in mariage of the two yoong princes touched.

And for ſo much as two ſucceſſors cannot concurre and fall into one, by no other maner of meanes than by marriage, wherby one bloud, one linage, one parentage is made of two, and an indefenſible right giuen of both to one, without the deſtruction and aboliſhing of either. If God ſhould grant that whatſoeuer you would wiſh, other than that which now not by fortune hath chanced, but by his infinit mercie and moſt inſcrutable prouidence, as carefull for you he hath giuen vnto you. The which thing that you ſhould alſo thinke to come of his diſpoſition, and not by blind fortune, how vnlike hath it beene, and how ſuddenlie hath it turned, that the power of God might be ſhewed: your laſt king being a prince of much excellencie and yoong, whom you know after a promiſe broken contrarie to his honor, & miſfortune by Gods iuſt iudgement following vpon it, God either by ſorrow or by ſome meanes otherwiſe at his inſcrutable pleaſure, did take awaie from you, had three children, did not almightie God (as it were) to ſhew his will and pleaſure to be, that the long continued warre and enimitie of both the nations ſhould be taken awaie, and knit in perpetuall loue and amitie, take the two men-children of thoſe babes being diſtant the one from the other, and in diuerſe places, both as it were at one time, and within the ſpace of foure and twentie houres, leauing but one maidenchild and princeſſe?

The courſe of Gods iuſt iudgement in this example notable.

When the moſt wiſe and victorious prince late our king and maiſter, king Henrie the eight, in other of his mariages not moſt fortunate, had by his moſt lawfull and moſt vertuous wife, queene Iane, his other two wiues before that mariage departed this world, and neuer ſurmiſe nor queſtion made of that mariage, ſince that time to this daie, nor ſo much as all hir life time, name or motion to or of anie other wife, one prince of ſo high expectation, of ſo great gifts of God, the right and vndoubted heire of the realme of England and his maieſtie onelie of male iſſue left behind him to ſucceed the imperiall crowne. If nothing elſe had beene doone, what can anie wiſe or anie chriſtian man that thinketh the world to be gouerned by Gods prouidence and not by fortune, thinke otherwiſe, but that it was Gods pleaſure it ſhould be ſo, that theſe two realmes ſhould ioine in mariage, and by a godlie ſacrament, make a godlie, perpetuall and moſt friendlie vnitie & concord, whereby ſuch benefits as of vnitie and concord commeth, may through his infinit grace come vnto theſe realmes. Or if anie man of you or of anie nation doubteth hereof, except you looked for miracles to be doone herein, and yet if ye marke all the poſſibilities of the natures of the two princes, the children alreadie had, the doubtfull chance, leaſt each of them ſhould haue a ſonne, or both daughters, or not of meet ages, with other circumſtances both of the partie of this realme of England, and that of Scotland, which hath not chanced in eight hundred yeares, it muſt needs be reckoned a great maruell and a miracle.

The lord protector inforceth by pithie perſuaſions a perpetuall vnitie betweene the two realms by the foreſaid mariage.

But let it be no miracle, ſeeing that God dooth not now ſpeake in oracles, as amongeſt the Iewes he did: and preſent propheſies now adaies be but either not certeine, or elſe not plaine: what more certeine can be had of Gods will in this caſe, than the before rehearſed dooth bring? But if God himſelfe ſhould ſpeake, what could he ſpeake more, than he ſpeaketh in theſe? Call you them prouidences or chances, if you be ſtill afflicted and puniſhed? Maie he not ſaie: I of mine infinite mercie and loue to your nation, had prouided a right heire and a prince to the one, and a right heire and princeſſe to the other, to be ioined in my holie lawes, and by the lawe of nature and the world to haue made an vnitie, concord and peace, in the which Iſle of both the realmes you refuſed it; you loued better diſſention than vnitie, diſcord than agreement, warre than peace, hatred than loue and charitie. If you doo then therefore ſmart for it, whome can you blame but your owne election?

The lord protector ſtill vrgeth peace and amitie.

But becauſe ſome of thoſe, who make thereunto impediments, cannot but confeſſe, that there appeareth Gods prouidence herein, and opportunitie and occaſion giuen to vnitie of both the realmes, yet may hereafter ſay, and heretofore haue ſaid, that the fault herein is, that we ſeeke not equalitie, nor the mariage, but a conqueſt: we would not be friends but the lords. Although our proclamation at the laſt warres dooth inough declare the contrarie, yet here we proteſt and declare vnto you and all chriſtian people, to be the kings maieſties mind our maiſters, by our aduiſe and counſell not to conquer, but to haue in amitie; not to win by force, but to conciliate by loue; not to ſpoile and kill, but to ſaue and keepe; not to diſſeuer and diuorſe, but to ioine in mariage, from high to low both the realms, to make of one Iſle one realme, in loue, amitie, concord, peace and charitie, which if you refuſe, and driue vs to conquer, who is guiltie of the bloudſhed? Who is the occaſion of the warre? Who maketh the battels, the burning of houſes, and the deuaſtation which ſhall follow?

The Scots by the conſent of a parlement granted their great ſeale for the confirmation of a mariage to be had betweene Marie the heire of Scotland, & prince Edward heire of England.

Can it be denied but that we haue the great ſeale of Scotland granted by the parlement of Scotland, for the mariage which ſhould be made, with aſſurances and pledges, vntill the performance? And thus in the time that the late king of moſt famous memorie our ſouereigne lord king Henrie the eight did reigne, and in the time of the ſame your gouernour, who now is the earle of Arrane, who then being a chiefe dooer and laborer therin, for the high and ineſtimable benefit of that realme, ſo ſoone as he was by the late cardinall of ſaint Andrews and others, with certeine vaine feares and hopes & greedineſſe of dignitie peruerted, reuolted from his firſt agreement, and put all the realme to the loſſe of ſuch holds and fortreſſes as are now taken from you, and to the loſſe of a foughten field, for the which we are ſorie, if otherwiſe peace might haue bin concluded, for his owne priuat lucre and retchleſneſſe of that noble realme. And what end can you looke for of theſe manner of proceedings, but ſuch ſucceſſe as heretofore hath beene experimented & aſſaied? We offer loue, we offer equalitie and amitie, we ouercome in warre, and offer peace: we win holds, and offer no conqueſt: we get in your land, and offer England.

What offers are made to the Scots.

What can be more offered and more proffered, than intercourſe of merchandizes, and interchange of mariages, the aboliſhing of all ſuch our lawes, as prohibiteth the ſame, or might be impediment to the mutuall amitie. We haue offered not onelie to leaue the authoritie, name, title, right or chalenge of conquerour, but to receiue that which is the ſhame of men ouercommed, to leaue the name of the nation, and the glorie of anie victorie (if anie we haue had, or ſhould haue of you) and to take the indifferent old name of Britains againe, becauſe nothing ſhould be left on our part to be offered, nothing on your part vnrefuſed, whereby ye might be inexcuſable. And all the world might teſtifie all other meanes, not being able to doo anie thing, after manie other waies and remedies attempted, battell of vs to be taken as an extreame refuge, to atteine right and reaſon among chriſtian men: if anie man may rightfullie make battell for his eſpouſe and wife. The daughter of Scotland was by the great ſeale of Scotland promiſed to the ſonne & heire of England.

Britaine was the firſt name of England and Scotland.

If it be lawfull by Gods lawe to fight in a good quarrell, and for to make peace, this is to make an end of all warres, and to conclude an eternall and perpetuall peace; which to confirme, we ſhall fight, and you to breake, is it not eaſie to diſcerne who hath the better part? God and the ſword hath alreadie, and ſhall hereafter (if there be no remedie) trie it. Who ſo willeth the mariage to go forward; who ſo mindeth the peace and tranquillitie of both the realmes; who willeth no conqueſt to be had, but amitie and loue to go forward, we refuſe no man: let him bring his name and his pledge of good ſeruice in this quarrell, he ſhall not onelie be receiued to the amitie; but ſhall haue ſufficient defenſe againſt the aduerſaries, and recompenſe of his liuing, if he ſuſteine anie loſſe. We neither doo nor intend to put anie man from his lands, taxes, or offices, vnleſſe he will néeds reſiſt, and ſo compell vs therevnto.

A verie good, lawfull, and bountifull offer.

What face hath this of conqueſt? We intend not to diſherit your quéene, but to make hir heires inheritors alſo to England. What greater honour can ye ſéeke vnto your quéene, than the mariage offered? What more méeter mariage than this with the kings highnes of England? What more ſure defenſe in the nonage of your quéene for the realme of Scotland, than to haue England your patrone and garriſon? We ſéeke not to take from you your lawes nor cuſtomes; but we ſéeke to redreſſe your oppreſſions, which of diuerſe ye doo ſuſteine. In the realme of England, diuerſe lawes and cuſtomes be according to the ancient vſage thereof. And likewiſe, France, Normandie, and Gaſcoigne haue ſundrie kind of orders. Haue all the realmes and dominions that the emperour now hath, one cuſtome and one ſort of lawes? Theſe vaine feares and fantaſies of expulſion of your nation, of changing the lawes, of making a conqueſt, be driuen into your heads, of thoſe, who in déed had rather you were all conquered, ſpoiled, and ſlaine, than they would loſe anie point of their will, of their deſire of rule, of their eſtimation, which they know in quietneſſe would be ſéene what it were, as it were in a calme water.

The caſe of the foreſaid mariage ſtill vrged.

The lord protector telleth the Scots who they be that put doubts into their heads, &c.

Now in this tumult of diſorder, when the realme is toſſed vp and downe with waues and ſurges of battell, famine, and other miſchiefes which the warre bringeth, they thinke they cannot be eſpied; but looke on them you that haue wit and prudence, and conſider the ſtate of your quéene and realme, you will not kéepe hir ſole and vnmaried, the which were to you great diſhonor. If you maried hir within the realme, that cannot extinguiſh the title which we haue to the crowne of Scotland. And what diſſention, enuie, grudge, and malice that ſhall bréed among you, is eaſie to perceiue. You will marrie hir out of the realme, our title remaineth, you be ſubiects to a forren prince of another countrie, and of another language, and vs ye haue your enimies, euen at your elbow, your ſuccours farre off from you: and be we not in the bowels now of the realme? Haue we not a great part thereof, either in ſubiection or in amitie and loue? Who ſhall come into your realme, but he ſhall be met with, and fought with, if néede be, euen of your owne nation, who be faithfull and true to the realme of England in the waie of this moſt godlie vnion by mariage.

And if anie forren power, prince, or potentate, or whoſoeuer be your aider to nouriſh ſtill diſcord, ſend you an armie alſo, how ſhall they oppreſſe you, fill your houſes, waſte your grounds, ſpend and conſume your vittels, hold you in ſubiection, & regard you as ſlaues, which without them could not liue, & will take your quéene to beſtow as they luſt, & ſpeciallie if their ruler or king (as perchance he may be) in other warres be otherwiſe occupied, to be a preie to vs, & a true conqueſt, then it ſhould be too late to ſaie; We will haue a mariage and no conqueſt, We wiſh peace & amitie, We are wearie of battell and miſerie. The ſtubborne ouercommed muſt ſuffer the victors pleaſure, and pertinacitie will make the victorie more inſolent, whereof you your ſelfe haue giuen the cauſe, if they ſend monie and capteines, but no ſouldiers. Firſt if they be capteins, who ruleth and who dooth obeie? Who ſhall haue the honor of the enterpriſe, and if it be well atchiued? But whether it be well atchiued or no, which number is that which ſhall be ſlaine? Whoſe bloud ſhall be ſhed? Their monie peraduenture ſhalbe conſumed, & their commandements obeied. But whoſe bodies ſhall ſmart for it? Whoſe lands ſhall be waſted? Whoſe houſes burned? What realme made deſolate? Remember what it is to haue a forren power within you, a ſtrong power of your enimies vpon you, you (as it were) the campe & plaine betwixt them to fight on, & to be troden vpon, both of the victor, and of the ouercommed. And imagine you ſée before your eies your wiues & daughters in danger of wantonneſſe & inſolencie of the ſoldiors, the proud looks of the capteins & ſoldiors, whom you call to helpe you, the contempt you ſhall bring your nation in, then take héed leaſt indéed that follow which you feare, that is, that you ſhall be by them conquered, that ye ſhall be by them put from your holds, lands, taxes & offices, that your laws by them ſhall be altered, that your nation ſhall be by them deſtroied. Conſider in this realme, did not the Britons call in the Saxons for helpe, & by them were put out? Where be the Picts, once a gret nation betwixt you and vs? How did the nation of France put out the Galles out of all France? How got the Turk firſt all Grecia, & now of late all Hungarie, but being called in for to aid & helpe? And did not the Goths by like meanes get all Italie, and the Lombards one part therof now called Lombardie? What looke you for more? Néedie ſoldiors, & hauing their weapons in their hands, and knowing that you cannot liue without them, what will not they command you to doo? What will they not incroch vpon you? What will they not thinke they may doo? And what will they thinke that you dare doo? This forren helpe is your confuſion, that ſuccour is your detriment, the victorie ſo had is your ſeruitude: what is then to be thought of loſſe taken with them? The ſtrangers and forren ſoldiors ſhall oppreſſe you within, our power and ſtrength without; and of your owne nation, ſo manie as loue quietneſſe, godlines, and wealth of your realme, ſhall helpe alſo to ſcourge and afflict you. Is it not better to compoſe and acquite all this calamitie and trouble by marriage, to end all ſorrows and battels by ſuch and ſo honorable a peace? Hath not the emperor Spaine & Burgundie by title of marriage? How holdeth the French king Britaine now latelie annexed to that crowne,

Two meanes or waies of making one regiment or rule.

but by title of marriage? How haue all the great princes of the world happilie and with quiet made of two kingdoms one, of diuerſe lordſhips one, of nations alwaies at warre with themſelues, or elſe in doubtfull peace, one well gouerned kingdome, rule, and dominion, but by that godlie, moſt quiet, and moſt amiable compoſition of marriage? Two meanes there be of making one rule, wherto title is pretended, and perfect agréement betwixt two nations, either by force or ſuperioritie, which is conqueſt; or by equalitie and loue, which is by parentage & mariage: you hate the one, that is, conqueſt; and by refuſing the other, you inforce vpon you hatred & malice.

The lord protector proteſteth what the kings determination is.

An item to the Scotiſh gouernor and kirkemen, &c.

What England & Scotland might do being made one by amitie.

Nothing required of the Scots that was not promiſed by them.

Fire & ſword Gods angrie angels.

You will not haue peace, you will not haue aliance, you will not haue concord; and conqueſt commeth vpon you whether you will or no. And yet if all things were conſidered, we feare it will appéere that it were better for you to be conquered of vs, than ſuccoured of ſtrangers, leſſe loſſe to your goods, leſſe hurt to your lands, leſſe diſhonor to your realme; this nation which is one in tong, one in countrie and birth, hauing ſo little diuerſitie to occupie the whole, than other powers come in to you, neither like in language, nor yet like in behauior, who ſhould rule ouer you, and take you to be but their ſlaues. But we eftſoons and finallie declare and proteſt vnto you, that although for the better furtherance of this godlie purpoſe of vniting the realmes, and for the ſure defenſe of them which fauour the marriage, we are compelled for the time to kéepe holds, and to make fortifications in your realme: yet the kings maieſties mind and determinat pleaſure is, with our aduiſe and counſell to be as before is declared, that where fauour may be ſhewed, not to vſe rigor, if by conditions you will receiue this amitie offered, not to follow conqueſt: for we deſire loue, vnitie, concord, peace and equalitie. Let neither your gouernor nor your kirkemen, nor thoſe, who ſo often haue falſified their faith and promiſe, and by treacherie and falſhood be accuſtomed to proroge the time, féed you forth with faire words, and bring you into the ſnare from whence they cannot deliuer you. They will peraduenture prouide for themſelues with penſions in ſome other realme, and ſet ſoldiors ſtrangers in your holds to kéepe you in ſubiection, vnder the pretenſe to defend them againſt vs. But who prouideth penſions for you? How are you defended when they are fled away? Who conquereth you when the ſtrange capteins haue your holds, when your land is waſted, and the realme deſtroied, and the more part kept from you? Who will ſet by the mariage of the quéene to buie a title with the war of England; to marrie the name, an other mightie king holding the land? If we two being made one by amitie, be moſt able to defend vs againſt all nations, and hauing the ſea for wall, the mutuall loue for garriſon, & God for defenſe, ſhould make ſo noble and well agréeing monarchie, that neither in peace we may be aſhamed, nor in war afraid of anie worldlie or forren power: whie ſhould not you be as deſirous of the ſame, and haue as much cauſe to reioiſe at it as we? If this honor of ſo noble a monarchie doo not moue you to take and accept amitie, let the griefe and the danger of the aforenamed loſſes feare you to attempt that thing which ſhall diſpleaſe God, increaſe warre, danger your realme, deſtroie your land, vndoo your children, waſt your grounds, deſolate your countries, and bring all Scotland either to famine & miſerie, or to ſubiection and ſeruitude of an other nation. We require but your promiſed quéene, your offered agréement of vnitie, the ioining of both the nations, which God of his infinite clemencie and tender loue that he hath declared to beare to both the nations, hath offered vnto vs both, and in manner called vs both vnto it, whoſe calling and prouocation we haue, and will folow to the beſt of our powers, and in his name, and with his aid, admonition, exhortation, requeſts, and ambaſſages, not being able to doo it, and to find ſtableneſſe in promiſes, we ſhall not willing, but conſtreined purſue the battell, chaſtiſe the wicked & malicious by the angrie angels of God, fire and ſword.

An argument of vpright meaning that refuſeth no witneſſe.

Wherefore we require and exhort you all, who haue loue to the countrie, pitie of that realme, a true hart to your quéene and miſtreſſe, regard of your honors and promiſes made by the great ſeale of Scotland, and who fauoureth the peace, loue, vnitie, and concord, and that moſt profitable marriage to enter and come to vs; and declaring your true and godlie harts therevnto, to aid vs in this moſt godlie purpoſe and enterpriſe. To be witneſſe of our doings we refuſe no man, temporall nor ſpirituall, lord ne lard, gentleman nor other, who will aid this our purpoſe, and miniſh the occaſion of ſlaughter and deſtruction, to whom we ſhall kéepe the promiſes heretofore declared, and further ſée reward and recompenſe made according to the deſert.

The kings grant as a proofe of the beginning of loue betwéene England and Scotland.

And for a more ſure proofe and plainer token of the good mind and will which we beare vnto you, that which neuer yet was granted to Scotland in anie league, truce, or peace betwixt England and Scotland, becauſe yée ſhall haue proofe of the beginning of loue and amitie of both the realmes: the kings highnes conſidering the multitude of them which are come to his maieſties deuotion, and of them that be well-willers and aiders of this godlie enterpriſe, hath by our aduiſe and counſell granted, and by theſe preſents doth grant, that from henceforth all maner of merchants and other Scotiſhmen, who will enter their names with one of the wardens of the marches, & there profeſſe to take part with vs in this before named godly purpoſe, to his owne commoditie, & to ſerue all ſuch as be of the ſame agréement, may lawfullie and without anie trouble and vexation enter into anie port, créeke, or hauen of England, and there vſe their traffike of merchandize, buie and ſell, bring in the commodities of Scotland, and take and carrie forth the commodities of England, as liberallie and as fréelie, and with the ſame and none other cuſtome or paiments therefore, than Engliſhmen and the kings ſubiects doo at this preſent: minding further vpon the ſucceſſe hereof to gratifie ſo the furtherers of this moſt godlie enterpriſe and vnion, that all the world may be witneſſe of the great zeale and loue which his highneſſe dooth beare toward you and your nation. And all this the kings highneſſe, by our aduiſe and counſell, hath willed to be declared vnto you; and giuen in commandement vnto vs, and all his lieutenants, wardens, rulers, and other head officers, miniſters, and ſubiects, to ſée executed and doone, according to the true purport, effect, and meaning thereof. Fare you well.

The Scots reiect the benefit of this exhortation.

Although this admonition and wholſome exhortation might haue moued the Scots to haue regarded their owne ſtate, yet it litle auailed, as by the ſequele it appeared. For hauing both great promiſes made by the French, and now conſidering therewith the hurlie burlies and tumults that ſprong vp in England, they continued in their obſtinat purpoſes, not to yéeld vnto ſuch reaſonable motions as had béene offered, if they would haue ſhewed themſelues conformable thereto, and not haue ſo ſtubbornlie denied to ſubmit themſelues to that which of right they were bound vnto. So that herein they ſhewed themſelues verie peruerſe and wilfull, reiecting not onelie the good aduiſe that the duke gaue them, but alſo not ſo much as once thinking what might inſue to their great miſchéefe vpon their refuſall, and what benefit redound to them by admitting the offer: naie, they were of opinion and beléefe, that if ſo braue a bootie might befall England, it would be an occaſion of great ruth and wretchedneſſe to Scotland: as one of late hath affirmed in his poeticall ſuppoſall:

———ſi hæc præda Britannis
Cederet, ô miſeræ Scotiæ miſerabile regnum,
Genti infelici nihil eſt niſi flere relictum.

A proclamation for the laieng open of incloſures.

But now to let the Scots alone for a time, we will returne to the rebellion which followed in this yéere, to the whole diſappointing of the plot laid by the councell, for the preſent ſubduing of the Scots, as it was verie like that it ſhould haue ſo come to paſſe, if none other let had come. So it was, that the kings maieſtie, by the aduiſe of his vncle the lord protector, and other of the councell, thought good to ſet forth a proclamation againſt incloſures, and taking in of fields and commons that were accuſtomed to lie open, for the behoofe of the inhabitants dwelling néere to the ſame, who had gréeuouſlie complained of gentlemen and others for taking from them the vſe of thoſe fields and commons, and had incloſed them into parks and ſeuerall paſtures for their priuat commodities and pleaſures, to the great hinderance and vndooing of manie a poore man.

The meaning of the foreſaid proclamation.

This proclamation tending to the benefit and reléefe of the poore, appointed that ſuch as had incloſed thoſe commons, ſhould vpon a paine by a daie aſſigned laie them open againe. But how well ſoeuer the ſetters forth of this proclamation meant, thinking thereby peraduenture to appeaſe the grudge of the people that found themſelues grieued with ſuch incloſures; yet verelie it turned not to the wiſhed effect, but rather miniſtred occaſion of a foule and dangerous diſorder. For wheras there were few that obeied the commandement, the vnaduiſed people preſuming vpon their proclamation, thinking they ſhould be borne out by them that had ſet it forth raſhlie without order, tooke vpon them to redreſſe the matter: and aſſembling themſelues in vnlawfull wiſe, choſe to them capteins and leaders, brake open the incloſures, caſt downe ditches, killed vp the deare which they found in parkes, ſpoiled and made hauocke, after the maner of an open rebellion. Firſt they began to plaie theſe parts in Summerſetſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Northhamptonſhire, Kent, Eſſex, and Lincolneſhire.

Commotions in Summerſetſhire, and other places.

In Summerſetſhire they brake vp certeine parks of ſir William Herbert, and the lord Sturton: but ſir William Herbert aſſembling a power togither by the kings commiſſion, ſlue and executed manie of thoſe rebellious people. In other places alſo, by the good diligence and policie vſed by the councell, the rebels were appeaſed and quieted. But ſhortlie after, the commons of Deuonſhire and Cornewall roſe by waie of rebellion, demanding not onelie to haue incloſures laied open, and parkes diſparked: but alſo thorough the inſtigation and pricking forward of certeine popiſh prieſts, ceaſed not by all ſiniſter and ſubtill meanes, firſt vnder Gods name & the kings, and vnder the colour of religion, to perſuade the people to aſſemble in routs, to chooſe capteins to guide them, and finallie to burſt out into open rebellion. Their chiefe capteins were theſe, Humfrie Arundell eſquier, gouernour of the Mount, Iames Roſogan, Iohn Roſogan, Iohn Paine, Thomas Vnderhill, Iohn Soleman, and William Segar. Moreouer, of prieſts which were principall ſtirrers, and ſome of them chiefe gouernors of the camps, and after executed, there were to the number of eight, whoſe names we find to be as follow: Robert Bocham, Iohn Thompſon, Roger Barret, Iohn Wolcocke, William Alſa, Iames Mourton, Iohn Barrow, Richard Benet, beſides a multitude of other prieſts which ioined with them.

Rebellion in Deuonſhire. Iohn Fox in Acts & Monuments.

The names of the capteins of the rebels.

The number of the rebels in Deuonſhire.

The whole companies of theſe rebels amounted little leſſe than to the number of ten thouſand ſtout and valiant perſonages, able indéed (if their cauſe had béene good and fauoured of the Lord and giuer of victories) to haue wrought great feats. But being (as they were) ranke and malicious traitors, the almightie God confounded their deuiſes, and brought them to their deſerued confuſion. A ſtrange caſe, that thoſe miſchéefous and wicked traitors could not be warned by the euill ſucceſſe of their diueliſh attempted outrage, in the yeare laſt paſt: at what time certeine ſeditious perſons in Cornewall fell vpon one of the kings commiſſioners named maſter Bodie, ſent thither with others for the reformation of matters in religion, in like manner as other were ſent at the ſame time into other ſhires of the realme, for the which murther a prieſt being apprehended, arreigned, and condemned, was drawne into Smithfield, and there hanged and quartered the ſeauenth daie of Iulie, in the ſaid laſt yeare before mentioned, to wit, 1548. Other of his complices and aſſociats were executed and put to death in diuerſe other parts of the realme.

Their hope in others failed them.

But now touching theſe other that roſe in this preſent ſummer. At the firſt they were in great hope that the other diſordered perſons, which ſtirred in other parts of the realme, would haue ioined with them, by force to haue diſappointed and vndoone that which the prince by law and act of parlement, in reformation of religion, had ordeined and eſtabliſhed. But afterwards perceiuing how in moſt places ſuch miſchéefous mutinies and diueliſh attempts, as the commons had begun, partlie by force and partlie by policie were appeaſed, or that their cauſe being but onelie about plucking downe of incloſures, and inlarging of commons, was diuided from theirs; ſo that either they would not, or could not ioine with them in aid of their religious quarrell: they began ſomewhat to doubt of their wicked begun enterpriſe. Notwithſtanding now, ſith they had gone ſo farre in the matter, they thought there was no ſhrinking backe: and therefore determining to procéed, they fell to new deuiſes, as firſt before all things to bring into their hands all ſuch places of force, wealth, and defenſe, as might in anie reſpect ſerue for their aid and furtherance. Herevpon the ſecond of Iulie, they came before the citie of Exceſter, incamping about the ſame in great numbers, and vſed all waies and meanes they could deuiſe how to win it by force, ſometimes aſſaulting it right ſharplie, ſometimes firing the gates, otherwhiles vndermining the wals, and at other times (as occaſions ſerued) procuring ſkirmiſhes.

The great loialtie of the citizens of Exceſter.

Finallie, nothing was left vndoone which the enimie could imagine to ſerue his purpoſe for the winning of that citie. And albeit there wanted not luſtie ſtomachs among the citizens to withſtand this outward force of the enimie: yet in proceſſe of time, ſuch ſcarſitie of bread and vittels increaſed, that the people waxed wearie & loth to abide ſuch extremitie of famine. Howbeit the magiſtrats (though it gréeued them to ſée the multitude of the citizens in ſuch diſtreſſe) yet hauing a ſpeciall regard of their dutie toward the prince, and loue to the common-wealth, left no waies vnſought to quiet the people, & ſtaie them in their dutifull obedience to reſiſt the enimies: ſo that comforting the people with faire promiſes, and reléeuing their neceſſities verie liberallie, ſo farre as their power might extend, did in ſuch ſort vſe the matter, that euerie of them within reſolued with one generall conſent to abide the end, in hope of ſome ſpéedie reléefe. And in the meane while, when their corne and meale was conſumed, the gouernors of the citie cauſed bran and meale to be moulded vp in cloth, for otherwiſe it would not ſticke togither.

Alſo they cauſed ſome excurſions to be made out of the citie, to take and fetch into the citie ſuch cattell as were found paſturing abroad neere to the wals, which being brought in, were diſtributed among the poore. To conclude, into ſuch extremitie were the miſerable citizens brought, that albeit mans nature can ſcarſelie abide to feed vpon anie vnaccuſtomed food; yet theſe ſillie men were glad to eat horſſe fleſh, and to hold themſelues well content therewith. Whileſt the ſiege thus remained before Exceſter, the rebels ſpoiled and robbed the countrie abroad, and laieng their traitorous heads togither, they conſulted vpon certeine articles to be ſent vp to the king. But herein ſuch diuerſitie of heads and wits was among them, that for euerie kind of braine there was one maner of article: ſo that neither appeared anie conſent in their diuerſitie, nor yet anie conſtancie in their agreement. Some ſeemed more tollerable, others altogither vnreaſonable, ſome would haue no iuſtices, ſome no ſtate of gentlemen. The prieſts euer harped vpon one ſtring, to ring the biſhop of Rome into England againe, and to hallow home cardinall Poole their countriman. After much a doo, at length a few articles were agreed vpon, to be directed vnto the king, with the names of certeine of their heads ſet therevnto, the copie whereof here inſueth.

See Iohn Fox in the Acts & Monuments.

The articles of the commons of Deuonſhire and Cornewall, ſent to the king, with anſwers afterward following vnto the ſame.

Sacrament of baptiſme.

FIrſt, forſomuch as man, except he be borne of water, and the Holie-ghoſt, can not enter into the kingdome of God, and forſomuch as the gates of heauen be not open without this bleſſed ſacrament of baptiſme; therefore we will that our curats ſhall miniſter this ſacrament at all times of need, as well on the weeke daies, as on the holie daies.

Confirmation.

2 Item, we will haue our children confirmed of the biſhop, whenſoeuer we ſhall within the dioceſſe reſort vnto him.

Conſecrating of the Lords bodie.

3 Item, forſomuch as we conſtantlie beleeue, that after the prieſt hath ſpoken the words of conſecration being at maſſe, there celebrating and conſecrating the ſame, there is verie reallie the bodie and bloud of our ſauiour Ieſus Chriſt God and man, and that no ſubſtance of bread and wine remaineth after, but the verie ſelfe ſame bodie that was borne of the virgin Marie, and was giuen vpon the croſſe for our redemption: therefore we will haue maſſe celebrated as it hath beene in times paſt, without anie man communicating with the prieſts, forſomuch as manie rudelie preſuming vnworthilie to receiue the ſame, put no difference betweene the Lords bodie & other kind of meat; ſome ſaieng that it is bread before and after, ſome ſaieng that it is profitable to no man except he receiue it: with manie other abuſed termes.

Reſeruation of the lords bodie conſecrated.

4 Item, we will haue in our churches reſeruation.

Holie bread and holie water.

5 Item, we will haue holie bread and holie water in the remembrance of Chriſts precious bodie and bloud.

6 Item, we will that our prieſts ſhall ſing or ſaie with an audible voice, Gods ſeruice in the quier of the pariſh churches, and not Gods ſeruice to be ſet forth like a Chriſtmaſſe plaie.

The ſingle life of prieſts.

7 Item, forſomuch as prieſts be men dedicated to God for miniſtring and celebrating the bleſſed ſacraments, and preaching of Gods word, we will that they ſhall liue chaſt without marriage, as ſaint Paule did, being the elect and choſen veſſell of God, ſaieng vnto all honeſt prieſts; Be you followers of me.

The ſix articles to be renewed.

8 Item, we will that the ſix articles, which our ſoueraigne lord king Henrie the eight ſet forth in his latter daies, ſhall be vſed and ſo taken as they were at that time.

9 Item, we praie God ſaue king Edward, for we be his both bodie and goods.

The capteins appointed to go againſt the Deuonſhire rebels.

For the pacifieng of theſe rebels, were appointed by the king and his councell, ſir Iohn Ruſſell knight lord priuie ſeale, the lord Greie of Wilton, ſir William Herbert after earle of Penbroke, ſir Iohn Paulet, ſir Hugh Panlet, ſir Thomas Speake, and others, with a conuenient power of men of warre both on horſſebacke and foot. Amongſt others, there were certeine ſtrangers that came with my lord Greie, as capteine Germane an Hennower, with a band of horſſemen, moſt part Albanoiſes and Italians. Alſo capteine Paule Baptiſt Spinola an Italian borne of a noble houſe in Genoa, with a band of Italian footmen. But now the lord priuie ſeale that was ordeined by the king and his councell, generall of that armie, vpon his firſt approching towards them, ſent vnto them the kings maieſties proclamation: the effect whereof was, that all ſuch perſons as were vnlawfullie aſſembled, and did not within three daies next after the proclaming thereof, yeeld and ſubmit themſelues to the lord priuie ſeale (the kings lieutenant) they ſhould from thenceforth be deemed, accepted, and taken for rebels againſt his roiall perſon, and his imperiall crowne and dignitie.

A proclamation.

And further, the kings maieſtie, for a more terrour to the rebels, and the incouragement of ſuch other his louing ſubiects, as ſhould helpe and aid to apprehend anie of the ſaid rebels, he by his ſaid proclamation granted and gaue all the offices, fees, goods and poſſeſſions, which the ſaid rebels had at and before their apprehenſion. This proclamation notwithſtanding, the rebels continued in their wicked deuiſes & traitorous purpoſes, haſtening to the hazards of their owne deaths & vndoings, as the poet ſaith of the fooliſh fiſh ſwiming to the hidden hooke:

Occultum viſus decurrere piſcis ad hamum.

Hor. epiſt. lib. 1.

Wherevpon yet once againe the kings maieſtie, for the auoiding of the ſhedding of chriſtian bloud, ſent vnto them a moſt gentle and louing meſſage in writing, thereby to reduce them againe to their dutifull obedience: but all would not ſerue nor auaile to moue their obſtinate minds to leaue off their deſperate and diueliſh enterpriſe. The meſſage was as followeth.

The kings meſſage to the rebels of Cornewall and Deuonſhire.

ALthough knowledge hath beene giuen to vs, and our deereſt vncle the duke of Summerſet gouernor of our perſon, and protector of all our realms, dominions, and ſubiects, and to the reſt of our priuie councell, of diuerſe aſſemblies made by you, which ought of dutie to be our louing ſubiects, againſt all order of law, and otherwiſe than euer anie louing or kind ſubiects haue attempted againſt their naturall and liege ſoueraigne lord: yet we haue thought it meet, at this verie firſt time, not to condemne and reiect you, as we might iuſtlie doo; but to vſe you as our ſubiects, thinking that the diuell hath not that power in you, to make you of naturall borne Engliſhmen, ſo ſuddenlie to become enimies to your owne natiue countrie of our ſubiects, to make you traitors, or vnder pretenſe to relieue your ſelues, to deſtroie your ſelues, your wiues, children, lands, poſſeſſions, and all other commodities of this your life. This we ſaie, that we truſt, that although ye be ignorantlie ſeduced, ye will not be vpon knowledge, obſtinate.

And though ſome amongſt you (as euer there is ſome cockle amongſt good corne) forget God, neglect their prince, eſteeme not the ſtate of the realme, but as careleſſe & deſperat men delite in ſedition, tumults & wars: yet neuertheleſſe the greater part of you will heare the voice of vs your naturall prince, and will by wiſedome and counſell be warned, and ceaſe your euils in the beginning, whoſe ends will be euen by God almighties order your owne deſtruction. Wherfore as to you our ſubiects by ignorance ſeduced, we ſpeake and be content to vſe our princelie authoritie like a father to his children, to admoniſh you of your faults, not to puniſh them; to put you in remembrance of your duties, not to auenge your forgetfulneſſe. Firſt, your diſorder to riſe in multitudes, to aſſemble your ſelues againſt our other louing ſubiects, to arraie your ſelues to the war, who amongſt you all can anſwer for the ſame to almightie God, charging you to obeie vs in all things? Or how can anie Engliſh good hart anſwer vs, our lawes, and the reſt of our verie louing and faithfull ſubiects, who in deed by their obedience make our honour, eſtate, and degree?

Diſorder in ſubiects.

Abuſing of the kings name.

Ye vſe our name in your writings, and abuſe the ſame againſt our ſelfe. What iniurie herein doo you vs, to call thoſe which loue vs, to your euill purpoſes, by the authoritie of our name? God hath made vs your king by his ordinance and prouidence, by our bloud and inheritance, by lawfull ſucceſſion, and our coronation: but not to this end, as you vſe our name. We are your moſt naturall ſouereigne lord & king, Edward the ſixt, to rule you, to preſerue you, to ſaue you from all your outward enimies, to ſee our lawes well miniſtred, euerie man to haue his owne, to ſuppreſſe diſordered people, to correct traitors, theeues, pirats, robbers, & ſuch like, yea to keepe our realms from other princes, from the malice of the Scots, of Frenchmen, of the biſhop of Rome. Thus good ſubiects, our name is written, thus it is honored and obeied, this maieſtie it hath by Gods ordinance, not by mans. So that of this your offenſe we cannot write too much. And yet doubt not but this is inough from a prince to all reaſonable people, from a roiall king to all kindharted & louing ſubiects, frō the puiſſant K. of England, to euerie naturall Engliſhman.

Falſe cauſes.

Your pretenſe, which you ſaie, moueth you to doo thus, and wherewith you ſeeke to excuſe this diſorder, we aſſure you is either falſe, or ſo vaine, that we doubt not, that after that ye ſhall hereby vnderſtand the truth thereof, ye will all with one voice acknowlege your ſelues ignorantlie led, and by errour ſeduced. And if there be anie one that will not, then aſſure you the ſame be ranke traitors, enimies of our crowne, ſeditious people, heretikes, papiſts, or ſuch as care not what cauſe they haue to prouoke an inſurrection, ſo they may doo it, nor in deed can war ſo rich with their owne labors & with peace, as they can doo with ſpoiles, with wars, with robberies and ſuch like, yea with the ſpoile of your owne goods, with the liuing of your labors, the ſweat of your bodies, the food of your owne houſeholds, wiues and children: ſuch they be, as for a time vſe pleaſant perſuaſions to you, and in the end will cut your throtes for your owne goods.

Baptiſme.

You be borne in hand, that your children, though neceſſitie chance, ſhall not be chriſtened but vpon the holie daies: how falſe this is, learne you of vs. Our booke which we haue ſet forth by free conſent of our whole parlement in the Engliſh toong teacheth you the contrarie, euen in the firſt leafe, yea the firſt ſide of the firſt leafe of that part which intreateth of baptiſme. Good ſubiects (for to other we ſpeake not) looke & be not deceiued. They which haue put this falſe opinion into your eares, they meane not the chriſtening of children, but the deſtruction of you our chriſtened ſubiects. Be this knowne vnto you, that our honor is ſo much, that we may not be found faultie of one iote or word: proue it, if by our laws you may not chriſten your children when ye be diſpoſed vpon neceſſitie, euerie daie or houre in the weeke, then might you be offended: but ſeeing you may doo it, how can you beleeue them that teach you the contrarie? What thinke you they meane in the reſt, which moue you to breake your obedience againſt vs, your king & ſouereigne, vpon theſe ſo falſe tales & perſuaſions in ſo euident a matter? Therfore all you which will acknowledge vs your ſouereigne lord, and which will heare the voice of vs your king, may eaſilie perceiue how you be deceiued, and how ſubtillie traitors and papiſts, with their falſehood ſeeke to atchiue and bring their purpoſe to paſſe with your helpe. Euerie traitor will be glad to diſſemble his treaſon, and feed it ſecretlie; euerie papiſt his poperie, and nouriſh it inwardlie; and in the end make you our ſubiects partakers of treaſon and poperie, which in the beginning was pretended to be a commonweale and holineſſe.

Sacrament of the bodie, &c.

And how are you ſeduced by them, which put in your heads the bleſſed ſacrament of Chriſtes bodie, ſhould not differ from other common bread? If our lawes, proclamations, and ſtatutes be all to the contrarie, whie ſhall anie priuat man perſuade you againſt them? We doo our ſelfe in our owne hart, our councell in all their profeſſion, our lawes and ſtatutes in all purpoſes, our good ſubiects in all our doings moſt highlie eſteeme that ſacrament, and vſe the communion thereof to our moſt comfort. We make ſo much difference thereof from other common bread, that we thinke no profit of other bread, but to mainteine our bodies: but this bleſſed bread we take to be the verie food of our ſoules to euerlaſting life. How thinke you, good ſubiects, ſhall not we being your prince, your lord, your king by Gods appointment, with truth more preuaile, than certeine euill perſons with open falſehood? Shall anie ſeditious perſon perſuade you that the ſacrament is deſpiſed, which is by our lawes, by our ſelfe, by our councell, and by all our good ſubiects eſteemed, vſed, participated, and dailie receiued? If euer ye were ſeduced, if euer deceiued, if euer traitors were beleeued, if euer papiſts poiſoned good ſubiects, it is now. It is not the chriſtening of children, nor the reuerence of the ſacrament, nor the health of your ſoules that they ſhoot at, good ſubiects: it is ſedition, it is high treaſon, it is your deſtruction they ſeeke. How craftilie, how pitiouſlie, how cunninglie ſo euer they doo it, with one rule iudge yee the end, which of force muſt come of your purpoſes.

Diſobedience to a king is diſobedience to almightie God.

Almightie God forbiddeth vpon paine of euerlaſting damnation, diſobedence to vs your king, and in his place we rule in earth. If we ſhould be ſlow, would God erre? If your offenſe be towards God, thinke you it is pardoned without repentance? Is Gods iudgement mutable? Your paine is damnation, your iudge is incorruptible, your fault is moſt euident. Likewiſe are ye euill informed in diuerſe other articles, as for confirmation of your children, for the maſſe, for the maner of your ſeruice of mattins and euenſong. Whatſoeuer is therein ordered, hath beene long debated, and conſulted by manie learned biſhops, doctors, and other men of great learning in this realme concluded, in nothing ſo much labour and time ſpent of late time, nothing ſo fullie ended. As for ſeruice in the Engliſh tong hath manifeſt reaſons for it, and yet perchance ſeemeth to you a new ſeruice, and yet in deed is none other but the old. The ſelfe ſame words in Engliſh which were in Latin, ſauing a few things taken out, ſo fond that it had beene a ſhame to haue heard them in Engliſh, as all they can iudge which liſt to report the truth.

Seruice in the Engliſh tong.

The difference is, that we ment godlie, that you our ſubiects ſhould vnderſtand in Engliſh, being our naturall countrie tong, that which was heretofore ſpoken in Latine, then ſeruing onelie them which vnderſtand Latine, & now for all you that be borne Engliſh. How can this with reaſon offend anie reaſonable man, that he ſhould vnderſtand what anie other ſaith, and ſo to conſent with the ſpeaker? If the ſeruice in the church were good in Latine, it remaineth good in Engliſh: for nothing is altered, but to ſpeake with knowledge, that before was ſpoken with ignorance: and to let you vnderſtand what is ſaid for you, to the intent you maie further it with your owne deuotion, an alteration to the better, except knowledge be worſe than ignorance. So that whoſoeuer hath mooued you to miſlike this order, can giue you no reaſon, nor anſwer yours, if ye vnderſtand it.

Knowledge is better than ignorance.

Wherefore you our ſubiects, remember we ſpeake to you, being ordeined your prince and king by almightie God, if anie wiſe we could aduance Gods honour more than we doo, we would doo it, and ſee that ye become ſubiects to Gods ordinance. Obeie vs your prince, and learne of them which haue authoritie to teach you, which haue power to rule you, and will execute our iuſtice, if we be prouoked. Learne not of them whoſe fruits be nothing but wilfulneſſe, diſobedience, obſtinacie, & deſtruction of the realme. For the maſſe, we aſſure you, no ſmall ſtudie & trauell hath beene ſpent by all the learned clergie therin, and to auoid all contention thereof, it is brought euen to the verie vſe as Chriſt left it, as the apoſtles vſed it, as holie fathers deliuered it: indeed ſomwhat altered from that which the popes of Rome for their lucre brought to it. And although you maie heare the contrarie of ſome popiſh and euill men, yet our maieſtie, which for our honor maie not be blemiſhed nor ſtained, aſſureth you, that they deceiue you, abuſe you, and blow theſe opinions into your heads for to furniſh their owne purpoſes.

The maſſe.

And ſo likewiſe iudge you of confirmation of children, and let them anſwer you this one queſtion. Thinke they that a child chriſtened is damned, bicauſe he dieth before biſhopping? Marke good ſubiects, what inconuenience hereof commeth. Our doctrine therefore is founded vpon true learning, and theirs vpon ſhameleſſe errors. To conclude, beſide our gentle maner of information to you, whatſoeuer is conteined in our booke, either for baptiſme, ſacrament, maſſe, confirmation and ſeruice in the church, is by parlement eſtabliſhed, by the whole clergie agreed, yea by the biſhops of the realme deuiſed, & further by Gods word confirmed. And how dare you truſt, yea how dare you giue eare without trembling, to anie ſingular perſon to diſalow a parlement; a ſubiect to perſuade againſt our maieſtie, or anie man of his ſingle arrogancie againſt the determination of the biſhops, and all the cleargie, anie inuented argument againſt the word of God?

Confirmation of children.

But now you our ſubiects, we reſort to a greater matter of your vnkindneſſe, a great vnnaturalnes, and ſuch an euill, that if we thought it had not beene begun of ignorance, and continued by perſuaſion of certeine traitors amongſt you, which we thinke few in number, but in their doings buſie, we could not be perſuaded but to vſe our ſword and do iuſtice:and as we be ordeined of God for to redreſſe your errors by auengement. But loue and zeale yet ouercommeth our iuſt anger, but how long that will be, God knoweth, in whoſe hand our heart is; and rather for your owne cauſes, being our chriſtened ſubiects, we would ye were perſuaded than vanquiſhed, taught than ouerthrowne, quietlie pacified than rigorouſlie perſecuted. Ye require to haue the ſtatute of ſix articles reuiued. And know you what ye require? Or know ye what eaſe ye haue with the loſſe of them? They were lawes made, but quicklie repented; too bloudie they were to be borne of our people, yet at the firſt in deed made of ſome neceſſitie. Oh ſubiects how are ye trapped by euill perſons? We of pitie, bicauſe they were bloudie, tooke them awaie, and you now of ignorance will aske them againe. You know full well that they helped vs to extend rigour, and gaue vs cauſe to draw our ſword verie often.

Six articles.

And ſince our mercie mooued vs to write our lawes with milke and equitie, how are ye blinded to aske them in bloud? But leauing this maner of reaſoning, and reſorting to the truth of our authoritie, we let you wit, the ſame hath beene adnulled by parlement with great reioiſe of our ſubiects, and not now to be called in queſtion. And dareth anie of you with the name of a ſubiect, ſtand againſt an act of parlement, a law of the realme? What is our power if lawes ſhould be thus neglected? Or what is your ſuertie if lawes be not kept? Aſſure you moſt ſuerlie, that we of no earthlie thing vnder the heauen make ſuch reputation as we doo of this one, to haue our lawes obeied, & this cauſe of God to be throughlie mainteined, from the which we will neuer remoue a heares bredth, nor giue place to anie creature liuing: but therein will ſpend our whole roiall perſon, our crowne, treaſure, realme, and all our ſtate, whereof we aſſure you of our high honor. For herein reſteth our honor, herein doo all kings knowledge vs a king. And ſhall anie one of you dare breath or thinke againſt our kingdome and crowne?

The authoritie of a parlement.

In the end of this your requeſt (as we be giuen to vnderſtand) ye would haue them ſtand in force till our full age. To this we thinke, that if ye knew what ye ſpake, ye would not haue vttred the motion, nor neuer giuen breath to ſuch a thought. For what thinke you of our kingdome? Be we of leſſe authoritie for our age? Be we not your king now as we ſhall be? Shall ye be ſubiects hereafter, and now are ye not? Haue we not the right we ſhall haue? If ye would ſuſpend and hang our doings in doubt vntill our full age, ye muſt firſt know, as a king we haue no difference of yeares, but as a naturall man and creature of God we haue youth, and by his ſufferance ſhall haue age. We are your rightfull king, your liege lord, the ſouereigne prince of England, not by our age, but by Gods ordinance; not onelie when we ſhall be one and twentie yeares of age, but when we were of ten yeers. We poſſeſſe our crowne not by yeares, but by the bloud and deſcent from our father king Henrie the eight. If it be conſidered, they which moue this matter, if they durſt vtter themſelues, would denie our kingdome.

But our good ſubiects know their prince, and will increaſe, not diminiſh his honor, inlarge his power, not abate it, knowledge his kingdome, not deferre it to certeine yeares. All is one, to ſpeake againſt our crowne, and to denie our kingdome, as to require that our lawes maie be broken vnto one and twentie yeares. Be we not your crowned, annointed, and eſtabliſhed king? Wherein be we of leſſe maieſtie, of leſſe authoritie, or leſſe ſtate, than our progenitors kings of this realme, except your vnkindnes, your vnnaturalneſſe will diminiſh our eſtimation?

We haue hitherto ſince the death of our father, by the good aduiſe and counſell of our deare and intirelie beloued vncle the duke of Summerſet, and gouernor and protector, kept our eſtate, mainteined our realme, preſerued our honour, defended our people from all enimies. We haue hitherto béene feared and dread of our enimies, yea of princes, kings, and nations. Yea herein we be nothing inferiour to anie our progenitors, which grace we acknowledge to be giuen vs from God, and how elſe, but by good obedience, good counſell of our magiſtrates, and by the authoritie of our kingdome?

England hitherto hath gained honour during our reigne: it hath woone of the enimie, and not loſt. It hath béene maruelled that wée of ſo yoong yeares haue reigned ſo noblie, ſo roiallie, ſo quietlie. And how chanceth that you our louing ſubiects of that our countrie of Cornewall and Deuonſhire, will giue occaſion to ſlander this our realme of England, to giue courage to the enimie, to note our realme of the euill of rebellion, to make it a preie to our old enimies, to diminiſh our honour which God hath giuen, our father left, our good vncle and councell preſerued vnto vs? What greater euill could ye commit, than euen now when our forren enimie in Scotland, and vpon the ſea ſeeketh to inuade vs, to doo our realme diſhonour, than to ariſe in this maner againſt our law, to prouoke our wrath, to aſke our vengeance, and to giue vs an occaſion to ſpend that force vpon you, which we meant to beſtow vpon our enimies, to begin to ſlaie you with that ſword that we drew forth againſt Scots, and other enimies, to make a conqueſt of our owne people, which otherwiſe ſhould haue béene of the whole realme of Scotland?

Thus farre we haue deſcended from our high maieſtie, for loue to conſider you in your ſimple ignorance, and haue béene content to ſend you an inſtruction like a father, who of iuſtice might haue ſent you your deſtructions like a king to rebels. And now we let you know, that as you ſée our mercie abundantlie, ſo if ye prouoke vs further, we ſweare to you by the liuing God, ye ſhall féele the power of the ſame God in our ſword, which how mightie it is, no ſubiect knoweth; how puiſſant it is, no priuat man can iudge; how mortall, no Engliſhman dare thinke. But ſuerlie, ſuerlie, as your lord and prince, your onlie king and maiſter, we ſaie to you, repent your ſelues, and take our mercie without delaie: or elſe we will forthwith extend our princelie power, and execute our ſharpe ſword againſt you, as againſt infidels and Turks, and rather aduenture our owne roiall perſon, ſtate, and power, than the ſame ſhould not be executed.

And if you will proue the example of our mercie, learne of certeine which latlie did ariſe, as they perceiuing pretended ſome griefes, and yet acknowledging their offenſes, haue not onelie moſt humblie their pardon: but féele alſo by our order, to whome onelie all publike order apperteineth, preſent redreſſe of their griefes. In the end, we admoniſh you of your duties to God, whome ye ſhall anſwere in the daie of the Lord, & of your duties toward vs, whom ye ſhall anſwere by our order, and take our mercie whileſt God ſo inclineth vs, leaſt when ye ſhall be conſtreined to aſke, we ſhall be two much hardened in heart to grant it you. And where ye ſhall heare now of mercie, mercie, and life; ye ſhall then heare of iuſtice, iuſtice, and death. Written the eight of Iulie, in the third yeare of our reigne.

A godlie and princelie admonition.

Although the rebels receiued this princelie meſſage, & wholeſome admonition from the kings maieſtie, yet would they not reforme themſelues, as dutifull ſubiects ought to haue doone, but ſtood ſtill in their wicked begun rebellion, offering to trie it at the weapons point. There wanted not prieſtes and other buſie bodies among them, ſuch as by all waies and meanes poſſible ſought to kindle the coles of malice and hatred betwixt the king and his ſubiects; which as the maner is among all the like wicked diſpoſed people, contriued to raiſe and ſtrew abroad falſe forged tales, and feined rumors, giuing it out, that the people ſhould be conſtreined to paie a ratable taſke for their ſhéepe and cattell, and an exciſe for euerie thing that they ſhould eate or drinke. Theſe and ſuch other ſlanderous brutes were ſpred abroad by thoſe children of Beliall, whereby the cankered minds of the rebels might the more be hardened and made ſtiffe from plieng vnto anie reſonable perſuaſion, that might be made to moue them to returne vnto their dutifull obedience, as by the lawes both of God and man they were bounden: and ſo it came to paſſe. For the rebellious rout were growne to an obſtinacie, ſéeming ſo far from admitting perſuaſions to ſubmiſſion, that they became reſolute in their peſtilent actions; wilfullie following the worſt, which they knew full well would redound to their detriment; and auoiding the beſt, which they doubted not might turne to their aduantage, agreable in ſenſe and meaning vnto that of the poet:

Falſe rumors

Quæ nocüere ſequar, fugiam quæ profore credam.

Hor. in Epiſt. lib. 1.

Herevpon when no hope was left to procure them by anie quiet meanes to laie downe armes, the lord priuie ſeale, and the lord Greie, with their forces, although not comparable with the rebels in number, about the latter end of Iulie ſet vpon them, and by great manhood put them from their ground, notwithſtanding they fought verie ſtoutlie, & gaue it not ouer for a little: and although they were thus driuen to giue place at this firſt onſet, yet they got togither againe, and aboad a new charge, defending their ground, & dooing what they could to beat backe and repell thoſe that came to aſſaile them. But neuertheleſſe through the power of the almightie God fauouring the rightfull cauſe, the rebels were diſtreſſed, and followed in chaſe with great ſlaughter for the ſpace of two miles. This was about the beginning of Auguſt.

The rebels put from their ground.

Their chiefe capteines, to wit, Humfreie Arundell, Whinſland, Holms, and Burie, were taken and brought vp to London. There were taken alſo others of their capteins, as Thomas Vnderhill, Iohn Soleman, William Segar, Tempſon, and Barret, which two laſt were prieſts; alſo Boier and Henrie Lée, two maiors, all the which were executed in one place or other, as they had well deſerued. The ſaid Boier being maior of Bodmin in Cornewall, (as Grafton reporteth) had béene a buſie fellow among the rebels, to ſet them forward in miſchiefe: howbeit ſome that loued him ſought to excuſe him, as if he had béene forced hereto againſt his will by the rebels, who would haue killed him, and burnt his houſe, if he had not conſented to them. But howſoeuer it was, ſir Anthonie Kingſton that was prouoſt marſhall in the kings armie vnder the lord priuie ſeale, wrote his letter vnto the ſaid maior, ſignifieng to him, that he and other with him would come and dine with him ſuch a daie. The maior ſéeming to be glad thereof, made the beſt purueiance he could to receiue them, and at the time appointed, ſir Anthonie Kingſton came with his companie, and were right hartilie welcomed of the maior. But before they ſat downe to dinner, calling the maior aſide, he told him that there muſt be execution doone in that towne, and therefore willed him that a paire of gallowes might be framed and ſet vp with ſpéed, ſo that they might be readie by that time that they ſhould make an end of dinner.

John Fox. The capteins of the rebels taken.

Sir Anthonie Kingſton prouoſt marſhall.

The maior with all diligence cauſed the ſame to be doone: ſo that when dinner was ended, ſir Anthonie calling the maior to him, and aſking whether the gallowes were ſet vp accordinglie as he had willed, the maior anſwered that they were readie. Wherewith ſir Anthonie taking the maior by the hand, deſired him to bring him to the place where they ſtood, and comming thither and beholding them, he ſaid to the maior; Thinke you maiſter maior that they be ſtrong inough? Yea ſir, quoth he, that they are. Well then ſaid ſir Anthonie, get you euen vp vnto them, for they are prouided for you. The maior greatlie abaſhed herewith, ſaid; I truſt you meane no ſuch thing to me. Sir ſaid he, there is no remedie, ye haue béene a buſie rebell, and therefore this is appointed for your reward: and ſo without reſpit or ſtaie, there was the maior hanged.

The maior of Bodmin hanged.

At the ſame time, & néere the ſame place dwelled a miller that had béene a great dooer in that rebellion, for whom alſo ſir Anthonie Kingſton ſought: but the miller being thereof warned, called a good tall fellow that he had to his ſeruant, and ſaid vnto him: I haue buſineſſe to go from home, if anie therefore come to aſke for me, ſaie thou art the owner of the mill and the man for whome they ſhall ſo aſke, and that thou haſt kept this mill for the ſpace of thrée yeares, but in no wiſe name me. The ſeruant promiſed his maiſter ſo to doo. And ſhortlie after came ſir Anthonie Kingſton to the millers houſe, and calling for the miller, the ſeruant came forth, and anſwered that he was the miller. How long, quoth ſir Anthonie, haſt thou kept this mill? He anſwered thrée yeares. Well then ſaid he, come on, thou muſt go with me, and cauſed his men to laie hands on him, and to bring him to the next trée, ſaieng to him; Thou haſt béene a buſie knaue, and therefore here ſhalt thou hang. Then cried the fellow out, and ſaid that he was not the miller, but the millers man. Well then, ſaid ſir Anthonie, thou art a falſe knaue to be in two tales, therefore ſaid he, hang him vp: and ſo incontinentlie hanged he was in déed. After he was dead, one that was preſent, told ſir Anthonie; Surelie ſir this was but the millers man. What then ſaid he, could he euer haue doone his maiſter better ſeruice than to hang for him?

A millers man hanged for his maiſter.

This was a hard procéeding, though the partie had béene nocent.

Manie other were executed by order of the marſhall law, & a great part of the countrie abandoned to the ſpoile of the ſouldiers, who were not ſlouthfull to gleane what they could find for the time their libertie laſted. ¶ Thus far the report of this rebellious broile, wherevpon it firſt kindled, by what meanes the ſame ſparkled and became a flame, and what deuiſes were vſed to extinguiſh & quench it. Wherein we ſée how prone the people are to riſe by routs vpon occaſions of diſcontentments; how haſtie and headie to vndertake dangerous enterpriſes, how wilfull and obſtinate to perſiſt in their pernicious procéedings, how cold-harted and hopeleſſe when they ſée the courſe of their plots of perilous policie either interrupted, vndermined, or ouerthrowne; and finallie, what a reprochfull reward redoundeth both to the ringleaders in rebellions, as alſo what falleth to the ſhares of all ſuch as ſhake hands and become confederats to the furthering and ſtrengthening of riots, mutinies, inſurrections, commotions, and hurlieburlies. Wherby the ſtate is diſquieted, & (that more is) the prince drawne into a conceipt of ſuſpecting his ſubiects loialties; beſides a wicked preſident to poſterities, without feare of ſhame, remorſe of conſcience, regard to allegiance, or foreſight of afterclaps, to attempt the like. Now it reſteth, that for the further truth and knowledge hereof, we adde a new report (new I meane, in reſpect of the publication, hauing not heretofore béene printed) though old enough, and ſufficientlie warranted by the reporter, who vpon his owne notice hath deliuered no leſſe in writing, than himſelfe vpon verie good and infallible grounds obſerued, and hath left teſtified in the diſcourſe following; wherein there is not one word either added, or inuerted: but all things (from point to point) agréeable to the written copie.

Abr. Fl. introduction into the next narration being a new addition, touching this rebellion.

The addition following being a large diſcourſe, was neuer heretofore publiſhed.

The deſcription of the citie of Exceſter, and of the ſundrie aſſaults giuen to the ſame: collected and gathered by Iohn Vowell (alias Hooker) gentleman and chamberleine of the ſame.

EXceſter or Exceter is a famous and an ancient citie, being the metropole and Emporium of the weſt parts of England, ſituated and lieng in the prouince ſometime called Dumnonia, that is to ſaie, the countrie of vallies: for whereas are manie hilles (as that countrie is full of hilles and mounteins) there are manie vallies. But now corruptlie it is named Deuonia, or Deuonſhire, and not Daneſhire of the Danes, as ſome would haue it. Of the firſt foundation thereof, by reaſon of the ſundrie inuaſions of forren nations, who with their hoſtilities and cruell warres did burne and deſtroie the ſame, there remaineth no certeine memoriall, neither among the records of the ſaid citie, ne yet in anie one other writer.

Dumnonia, the countrie of vallies.

Deuonia, Deuonſhire.

But moſt certeine it is, that it was firſt builded and founded by the Britons or Brutes. For the names which they gaue and vſed, are yet at this preſent had in remembrance, as well among the chronographers of this land, as alſo among the Corniſh people, who were ſometimes one with this prouince; but now in a countie of themſelues, and next bordering to this, and in the ſame dioceſſe. And they are the remanent of the bloud of Brutus. For when Cadwallader king of this land, by reaſon of a great famine and peſtilence was driuen to forſake the ſame, & to flie into little Britaine named Armorica, which is now vnder the dition of the French king: diuers & the moſt part of his people fled, ſome into Wales, and ſome into Cornwall, where euer ſince they and after them their poſteritie haue remained and continued.

The old chronographers, ſearchers, and writers of antiquities doo find, that this citie was called Corinia, and thereof the cathedrall church of the ſame was (as Bale ſaith) named Eccleſia Corinienſis: which name, if it were firſt giuen by Corinus (as Leland writeth) who after the arriuall of Brutus into this land, was made the firſt duke of this whole weſt countrie of Deuon and Cornewall, which were both compriſed vnder the name of Corinia, and wherof this citie euer hath béene and is the metropole, and alwaies parcell ſometime of the kingdome, then of the duchie, and after of the earledome, and now againe of the duchie of Cornwall: then out of doubt this citie is of no leſſe antiquitie than the ſaid names doo import. It was alſo called Auguſta. Of this name there were diuerſe cities, ſo named by the Romans; but this onelie was named Auguſta Britannorum, and ſo called (as ſome thinke) by the Romans at the concluſion of the peace made at the ſiege of this citie betwéene king Aruiragus and Veſpaſian coronell of the Romane armie vnder Claudius Auguſtus. The Britons in their tong or language doo call this citie by ſundrie names; the firſt and eldeſt in remembrance is cair Penhulgoile, that is to ſaie, the proſ-perous chiefe towne in the wood, as dooth appeere by Geffreie of Monmouth, and Ponticus Virunnius. It was alſo called Pennehaltecaire, that is, the chiefe citie or towne vpon the hill; as dooth appeere in a trauerſe betweene the biſhop, deane, and chapiter of this citie of the one partie; and the maior, bailiffe, and communaltie of the other partie, concerning their liberties. But the names which the Corniſh people doo at theſe preſents remember & reteine, are ſpeciallie three, Pennecaire, Caireruth, Caireiſke. Pennecaire ſignifieth, and is to ſaie, the cheefe citie. Caireruth ſignifieth the red or reddiſh citie, ſo called and taking the name of the ground and ſoile wherevpon it is ſituated, which is a red earth. Caireiſke is the citie of Iſke, being ſo called of the riuer, which the Britons name Iſke, and floteth faſt by the ſame. And of this name Houeden in his chronicle maketh mention, ſaieng thus: Anno Domini 877 exercitus Danorum ab Wareham nocte quadam, fœdere dirupto, ad Exeanceſtre diuerterunt, quod Britannicè dicitur Caireiske.

The ſite of Exceſter and circuit.

The citie is full of water ſprings.

The rebels breake and ſpoile the pipes of lead for waters.

Ptolomeus the famous aſtronomer, who was about the yeere of our Lord 162, Coell being king of this land, nameth this citie Iſca; and the riuer Iſca. And Bale the ſearcher of antiquities following the ſame opinion, dooth alſo name the citie Iſca, and the inhabitants therein Iſcans. But vnder correction be it ſpoken, a man maie well thinke that Ptolomeus being in Alexandria, and ſo farre diſtant from this land, was miſinformed, or the print miſtaken. For it is moſt likelie that the riuer ſhould be named Iſca according to the Britiſh ſpeech, wherein it was called Iſca; and which name by tranſpoſing of the two middle letters, dooth at this preſent remaine being now named Icſa or Exa. But whatſoeuer the cenſures and opinions of Ptolomeus and of Bale, who wrote onelie vpon report, be herein, it is certeine, that the names which the Brutes or Britons gaue, were of longeſt continuance. And this citie was called by their denominations, by the ſpace of fifteene hundred yeeres, vntill the comming of the Saxons, the Picts, and the Scots into this realme, which was about the yeere of our Lord foure hundred and fiftie. For they, where, and whenſoeuer they preuailed in anie place, did for the moſt part alter and change the names of all places & townes, accounting it a great renowme, as alſo a perpetuall memoriall of their chiualrie, to giue new names, either of their owne deuiſes, or of their owne natiue countries; for ſo is it writen of them: Picti, Scoti, Angli, Daci, & Normanni in hac inſula rerum potiti, cuncta immutârunt, pro tropheis habentes, locis à ſe deuictis noua imponere nomina. The Saxons therfore as of all other cities & townes (few excepted) ſo of this alſo they changed and altered the old names and called it Monketon; and by which name it was ſo called by the ſpace of three hundred and od yeeres, and vntill the time of king Athelſtane: for he about the yeere of our Lord nine hundred thirtie and two, being much greeued and vnquieted with the rebellion of the Corniſh people, becauſe they refuſed and denied to acknowledge him for their lawfull king, did bend his force, & conduct his armie againſt them. And hauing ſubdued and preuailed ouer them, he returned to this citie: and while he reſted here, he repared the ſame; and the walles which before were but mightie ditches of earth, and the banks ſet with great poles of timber now deſtroied, he builded all of ſquare ſtone, as it is recorded: Hanc vrbem primus Athelſtanus in poteſtatem Anglorum fugatis Britonibus reductam, turribus muniuit, & muro ex quadratis lapidibus tandem cinxit. And then he altered and changed the former names, and called it after the name of the riuer Eſſeterra or Exeterra, that is to ſaie, Exeter. For ſo is it written, Eſt Exonia vrbs Deuoniæ comitatus, loco præcelſo ad occidentem verſus poſita: abluiturq́ flumine Exi, à quo nomen habet. Others name it of the riuer floting by it, which they ſaie is named Exceſtrum, & thus they write: Clariſſima vrbium eſt Exceſtria, quæ ab amni Exceſtro qui eandem præterfluit eſt ſic nuncupata. I find it alſo written in an old chronicle, that it is named Exanceſtria or Exanceſtre: which ſhuld ſeeme to be ſo called by the Saxons. For the moſt part of the cities, townes, & forts, which they builded or reedified, did end in ceſtre: as Gloceſtre, Leceſtre, Mancheſtre, Wincheſtre, Oſceſtre, Worceſtre, Colcheſtre, Ciceſtre, Ilceſtre, Biceſtre, & this citie of Exceſtre, with others. For Caire in Britiſh & Ceſtre in Saxoniſh are one thing, & doo ſignifie in Engliſh a fort, towre, or caſtell. This citie (as is before ſaid) being walled about with ſtone by king Athelſtane is not altogither foure ſquare, but declineth ſomewhat toward a roundneſſe, and conteineth in circuit or compaſſe ſixteene hundred whole paſes, after fiue foot to a paſe; which accounting after the Italian maner one thouſand paſes to a mile, it is a mile and halfe about, & ſomewhat more. The ſituation of this citie is verie pleaſant and delicate, being ſet vpon a little hill among manie hilles. For the whole countrie round about is mounteinous and full of hilles. It is pendent towards the ſouth and weſt parts, after and in ſuch ſort, that be the ſtreets neuer ſo foule or filthie, yet with a ſhoure of raine they are clenſed and made ſweet. And albeit hilles are commonlie drie, yet nature is ſo beneficiall to this litle hill, that it is in euerie quarter full of water ſprings: & by that meanes the whole citie is throughlie furniſhed with wels and tirpits; the great good benefit and commoditie whereof hath well appeered in ſundrie times of neceſſitie, and eſpeciallie in the time of the late commotion, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1549. For albeit the enimie, by breking and ſpoiling of the pipes or canales, whereby water was conueied to the founteins of the citie, from certeine ſprings diſtant not a mile from the ſame, did abridge them of that water: yet moſt comfortablie they did inioy without impeachment the wels and tirpits within the walles, which abundantlie floted with waters to the ſatiſfieng of all people therein.

The conduits for water.

Saint Peters conduit.

The great conduit.

There are alſo within this citie certeine founteins or conduits, wherevnto, through certeine canales or pipes of lead, the waters from certeine ſprings, riſing in the fields not far from the citie, are brought and conueied. And theſe waters are of moſt price, becauſe by the carriage thereof they are purified, and made lighter than are the other waters ſpringing within the citie: and by that means more meet for dreſſing of meats. Of theſe conduits two are ſpeciall, the one of them ſtandeth and is within the cemiterie or churchyard of the cathedrall church of the ſaid citie, and is called ſaint Peters conduit: the other being of great antiquitie ſtandeth in the middle of the citie, at the meeting of foure principall ſtreets of the ſame, and whereof ſometimes it tooke his name, being called the conduit at Quatrefois or Carfox; but now the great conduit.

Caſtell Rugemont.

The ſite of the caſtell.

The caſtell builded by the Romans.

At the higher end of this citie is a verie old and ancient caſtell, named Rugemont, that is to ſaie the red hill, taking that name of the red ſoile or earth wherevpon it is ſituated. The ſite or ſituation of it is eminent and aboue both the citie and countrie adioining: for they doo all lie as it were vnder the lee thereof. It hath a goodlie and pleaſant proſpect towards the ſeas: for betweene that and it is no hill at all. It is ſtronglie ditched round about, and was firſt builded (as ſome thinke) by Iulius Ceſar: but rather and in truth by the Romans after him when they had their recourſe to it for their defenſe, refuge, and abode, manie yeares. The ſame was ſometimes the palace of ſuch kings, as vnto whome the kingdome of Weſtſex or Weſtſaxons was alotted vnto: and after them, it was the habitation of the earles of Cornewall, and laſt of all of the dukes of Exceſter. It was alwaies parcell and of the inheritance of the earledome, but now of the duchie of Cornewall: it is in great ruine and decaie, and not eaſilie to be gotten with force, if it were reedified and inuironed.

The riuer of Exe.

At the lower end and part of this citie, without the wals, floteth a goodlie and a pleaſant riuer, which the Britons called Iſk; Ptolomeus by miſinformation nameth it Iſaca: but the other old writers named it Eſſe, Exe, Exa, or Exceſtrum: and theſe names be reteined at theſe preſents. It hath his head or ſpring in a certeine moore or deſert diſtant from the citie neere about foure and twentie miles, called Exmoore. It floweth into the maine ſeas about eight miles from the citie, at a place named Exmouth, and by the waie it is increaſed with ſundrie riuers, brooks & lakes, the chiefe of which are Creedie and Collome. It is well ſtored and is plentifull of ſamon, trout, peale, dace, pike, and other like freſhwater fiſhes: which albeit they be verie good and delicate, and eſpeciallie the ſamon and pike: yet they are the leſſe eſteemed, bicauſe the ſeas being ſo neere doo furniſh the citie & countrie verie abundantlie with ſundrie kinds of ſea fiſhes moſt delicate.

Exe riſeth in Exmore.

The hauen of Exceſter.

The maine ſeas are not diſtant from the citie aboue eight miles, out of which commeth an arme ſeruing for the port of the ſame: which (as dooth appeare by certeine old and ancient records) did ſometimes flow vp to the verie wals of the citie, where boats and veſſels were woont to be laden and vnladen of all kind of wares and merchandizes, at a proper place appointed for the ſame: which at theſe preſents keepeth his old and ancient name, and is called the watergate. The decaie thereof hapned about the yeare of our Lord 1312, by one Hugh Courtneie the third of that name, and earle of Deuon: who being offended and incenſed againſt this citie, his wrathfull humor could not be ſatiſfied, vntill by ſome meanes he did impaire and annoie the ſtate of the common wealth of the ſame. And ſeeing that among other commodities, the vſe of the hauen and watercourſe to the citie to be one of the chiefeſt, he was neuer quiet vntill he had deſtroied the ſame: wherefore minding to performe what he had conceiued, he did in the yeare of our Lord 1313, the fift yeare of king Edward the ſecond, enterpriſe & begin his pretended deuiſe and miſcheefe.

The decaie of the hauen of Exceſter. Hugh Courtneie the firſt deſtroier of the hauen.

And firſt whereas the ladie Iſabella de Fortibus, counteſſe of Aumerle and of Deuon, his anceſtrix had builded certeine weers vpon the riuer of Exe (the propertie and ſeignorie whereof did apperteine to the citie) the one of the weſt ſide of the riuer of Exe in Exminſter pariſh, and the other of the eaſt ſide of the ſame riuer in the pariſh of Topeſham; leauing betweene the ſaid two weers a certeine aperture or open ſpace of thirtie foot, thorough which all boats and veſſels without let or hinderance might haue and had their vſuall paſſage and repaſſage, to and from the citie vnto the ſeas: the ſaid earle to abridge and deſtroie this great benefit and commoditie, did leuie and build a new weere in the ſaid aperture or open roome, ſtopping, filling, and quirting the ſame, with great trees, timber, and ſtones, in ſuch ſort, that no veſſell nor veſſels could paſſe or repaſſe.

Edward Courtneie.

After him Edward Courtneie earle of Deuon, and nephue to the ſaid Hugh, did not onelie mainteine and continue the doings of his anceſtor, by his dailie reparing and defending the ſame: but alſo to worke an vtter deſtruction for euer, of anie paſſage or repaſſage to be had thenſeforth to and from the ſaid citie; vnder pretenſe to build and make certeine mils, did erect two other weeres, the one at ſaint James ouerthwart the whole riuer, and the other at Lampreford: by meanes whereof not onelie the citie did ſuſteine the whole loſſe of the hauen, but the whole countrie alſo was ſurrounded about it, and in proceſſe of time altogither, and as it is at theſe preſents couered with ſalt waters. For which greefs and iniuries vpon complaints made thereof, diuerſe & ſundrie writs and commiſſions of inquirie were awarded and granted by the king; and the ſaid earles by ſundrie inquiſitions and verdicts found giltie. And yet notwithſtanding, ſuch was their power and authoritie, and ſuch was the iniquitie of thoſe daies, as no iuſtice could take place, nor law haue his due courſe againſt them.

Sundrie inquiſitions and iuries taken againſt the earles of Deuon for deſtroieng of the hauen.

Furthermore alſo the foreſaid Hugh, to incroch the gaine and commoditie of the lading & vnlading of merchandizes within the port & riuer to himſelfe, did build a keie and a crane in the riuer at his towne of Topeſham, diſtant from the citie about three miles: and by power did inforce and compell all maner of merchants arriuing within that port to vnlade & lade all their wares and merchandizes brought within that port (to be laden and vnladen) there onelie. And from thenſe, euer ſince, all wares and merchandizes haue beene caried and recaried to and from the citie by horſſe, cart, and waine, though to the gaine of the earle and his tenants, yet to the great trouble and hinderance of the citie and merchants of the ſame. Neuertheleſſe, the port hath euermore and yet dooth keepe his old and ancient name, being called the port of the citie of Exceſter: and alwaies hath beene and preſentlie is paied a tribute vnto the citie, by the name of the towne cuſtome, for all kind of wares and merchandizes, diſcharged within that port or riuer, or the members thereof.

A keie firſt builded at Topeſham. The merchants compelled to lade and vnlade at Topeſham keie.

And although the watercourſe thus being deſtroied can hardlie be reſtored to his old priſtinate and naturall eſtate; for that thorough long continuance the old courſe can not be diſcerned: yet now at length after manie attempts and with great expenſes, a watercourſe and paſſage begun in the yeare 1564, is recouered, and by certeine ſluces, boats, and veſſels of fifteene or ſixteene tuns are conueied and brought vp to the citie, and there diſcharged at the old and ancient place, called the watergate: & where is builded a verie faire large keie or wharfe, as alſo an engine called a crane fit for the purpoſe.

The hauen is recouered and renewed againe.

A keie and a crane builded at Exceſter.

Within the citie were ſomtimes but few pariſh churches, vntill the time of Innocentius the third: who when in the yeare 1198 he had eſtabliſhed the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation, and had made it an article of the ſymbole, as appeareth in the decretals, Titulo de ſumma trinitate, canone Firmiter: then his next ſucceſſor Honorius the third, in the yeare 1218 did not onelie confirme the ſame, but alſo by decree did eſtabliſh reſeruation, candlelight, and praieng for the dead, as dooth appeare, Decret. tit. de celebratione miſſarum, canone Sane cum, & Sane cum creatura: by which meanes the number of ſacrificing & maſſing prieſts did not onelie increaſe, but churches alſo and chapels began in all places and euerie where to be builded and erected.

And among others in this citie in the yeare 1222 and the ſixt yeare of king Henrie the third, the pariſh churches were limited, and increaſed to the number of nineteene churches within the citie and ſuburbs, and were called by the name of the chriſtianitie euen to this daie. Euerie of which in times paſt was a ſufficient and competent liuing to mainteine a maſſing ſacrificer; for ſuch and ſo great was the blind deuotion of the people then in that Romiſh religion: but the ſame now being aboliſhed, and the goſpell preached, the liuelihoods are ſo ſmall, as not ſufficient for the moſt part to mainteine a poore clerke or ſcholar, & by reaſon thereof, the moſt part of them do lie void and vacant, without incumbent.

A monaſterie of ſaint Benets order builded in Exceſter.

Beſides theſe pariſh churches, there was alſo a monaſterie, ſometimes of monks of ſaint Benets order, but ſince a cathedrall church, being of a verie faire and ſumptuous building of freeſtone and with beautifull pillers of graie marble. It ſtandeth and is ſituated in the eaſt part of the citie; and (as ſome report) was firſt founded and built by king Etheldred, the third ſonne to king Ethelwolphus. Some thinke that king Edgar did it. True it is that euerie of them builded a houſe for religious perſons within this citie, of which the one was ſpoiled and burned by the Danes, and the other in proceſſe of time was vnited to the monaſterie, which is now the cathedrall church. But the cathedrall church it ſelfe was founded & builded by king Athelſtane, the ſonne to king Edward the elder: for ſo is it recorded in the hiſtorie of the ſame church, the words whereof are theſe: Athelſtanus ſubiugatis Cornugualenſibus, reuerſus eſt ad ciuitatem, quæ antiquitùs Monketon vocabatur, nunc autem Exeter: ac ibi ſedens, anno Dom. 932, non tam lacerata eiuſdem ciuitatis mœnia reparabat, quin & manſum quoddam dedit ad fundandum monaſterium pro monachis, Deo & ſancto Petro famulantibus.

King Etheldred the firſt founder of the monaſterie.

King Edgar founder of a religious houſe in Exceſter.

The cathedrall church was firſt a monaſterie and founded by king Athelſtane.

Chronica eccleſiæ.

This king beſides his great charges and expenſes in building of this church, which at the firſt was but ſmall, and that part which is now called the Ladie chapell, he placed therein monkes of S. Benets order, prouided liuelihoods for them, and appointed a ruler or gouernour ouer them, and who was called by the name of an abbat, towards whoſe diet and liuelihood he gaue Morkeſhull and Treſurors beere: and which at theſe preſents do remaine to the ſaid church and are annexed to the dignitie of the treaſurorſhip of the ſame. The church being thus begun, kings, princes, & noble men were from time to time gladlie and willinglie verie liberall contributors to the abſoluing and finiſhing of the ſame. For about foure ſcore years after king Athelſtane, king Knoght who was alſo named Cahutus or Canutus, at the earneſt ſute of one of his dukes named Atheldred, did confirme and grant to Athelwood then abbat of the ſaid church, and to his ſucceſſors manie and ſundrie priuileges and liberties, vnder his letters patents, dated the ſecond yeare of his reigne, Anno Domini, 1019.

King Canutus confirmeth the priuileges of the monaſteries.

K. Edward the confeſſor remooued the monks vnto weſtminſter, and made this a cathedrall church. Leofricus the firſt biſhop of Exceſter.

After him about thirtie yeares, king Edward the confeſſor remooued the monkes vnto Weſtminſter, and made this church a cathedrall church, and remooued the biſhops ſee which was then at Crediton vnto this citie, making Leofricus biſhop therof, and whom he and his wife queene Edith did put in poſſeſſion of the ſame, as appeareth by his letters patents dated the eight yeare of his reigne, Anno Dom. 1050, Howbeit the monke of Burie, Polydorus, and others do affirme and write, that this ſhould be doone about the twelfe yeare of William the conqueror, for thus they do write: Habitum eſt Londini, ſub Lanfranco, antiſtitum & ſacerdotum comitium, in quo decretum eſt, quòd aliquot ſedes epiſcopales, quæ in oppidulis & pagis anteà fuerant, in vrbibus & locis celeberrimis collocarentur, vnde factum eſt vt Bathonia, Lincolnia, Sariſburia, Exonia, Ceſtria, & Ciceſtria vrbes, huiuſmodi nouis epiſcoporum domicilijs ſunt nobilitatæ.

The charter of the church.

But the reuerence of theſe writers reſerued, this cannot be true concerning this church, bicauſe the words of the charter thereof do witneſſe the contrarie, and declare expreſſelie, how that king Edward and queene Edith his wife did put Leofricus the firſt biſhop in poſſeſſion, the one by the one hand and the other by the other hand, leading him betweene them vp to the high altar, and there put his hands vpon the ſame. And yet it may be true, that at the foreſaid councell, this remoouing and placing of this biſhop might be ratified and confirmed. Likewiſe William the conqueror, in the third yeare of his reigne 1069, did not onelie confirme the former charter, but alſo at the inſtance and requeſt of William Warewest, then his chapleine, but afterwards biſhop of the ſame ſee, did giue vnto it the ſeigniories of Plimpton, Brampton, and S. Stephans in Exceſter, which the ſaid William Warewest being afterwards biſhop did diſtribute, giuing Plimpton to the religious canons, whome he placed there: Brampton was annexed to the deanerie, but S. Stephans was reſerued alwaies to the biſhop, and to his ſucceſſors, whereby they are barons, and ſo lords in the parlement houſe.

The conqueror confirmeth the charters of the church, and inlargeth the poſſeſſions of it.

The cathedrall church was foure hundred yeres in building.

It was alſo inlarged from time to time with great poſſeſſions, reuenues, buildings, riches, priuileges, and ſundrie other commodities, by kings, princes, prelats, biſhops, and ſundrie others. And this one thing is to be noted, that albeit there were about foure hundred yeares diſtant from the firſt foundation and building thereof, vnto the ending and finiſhing of the ſame; yet it is ſo vniformelie and decentlie compact and builded in one mould, as though it had beene doone at one inſtant. The biſhop is diſtinct from the chanons both in houſe and reuenue: his liuelihoods being no part nor parcell of that which apperteineth to the deane and chapter. It was ſometimes of great reuenues and large poſſeſſions, but the more part thereof hath beene conſumed and exhauſted by a waſtfull biſhop. The biſhop and chanons haue verie faire houſes, which are ſituated about the church & cemiterie, and are incloſed euerie night by ſhutting faſt of certeine gates, by which occaſion it is called a cloſe, A claudendo: and which gates are to be ſhut euerie night (except at certeine times) and to be opened euerie morning at certeine hours appointed, as it appeareth by a compoſition made for the ſame betweene the communaltie of Exceſter, and the biſhop and deane of the ſame. In the middle of the cemiterie or churchyard is a verie faire founteine or conduit of water conueied by certeine pipes of lead from out of the ſame feelds, as is the cities conduit. And albeit the ſprings of both waters are in the ſame field, and not farre diſtant: yet this doth excell the other. Out of this well or founteine waters are conueied to ſundrie of the chanons houſes, as alſo of late vnto the biſhops houſe, and yet it ſerueth beſides the whole cloſe and citie. The citie it ſelfe is verie populous, and was ſometimes cheefelie inhabited with clothiers & clothworkers of broad clothes, ſeruing much for the Spaniſh and ſouth countries; and which in thoſe daies were of ſuch goodneſſe & ſubſtance, that the names of them do remaine in thoſe countries: but now it is cheeflie inhabited with merchants, kerſie-clothiers, and all ſorts of artificers, among whom the merchants are the cheefe & welthieſt.

The inhabitants of this citie.

The gouernement of this citie.

The gouernement of this citie was ſometimes by foure bailiffes, which before the conqueſt were called portgreues, that is, the cheefeſt lords or rulers of the towne: for porta is taken for a towne, and greue in Saxonie is Dominus or maior: but after the conqueſt they were after the French tong named Prouoſtres, that is to ſaie Præfecti or rulers, and now ſtewards. Not long after the conqueſt there was ordered and conſtituted a ſenate of ſix and thirtie perſons, but of later yeares by king Henrie the ſeauenth of foure & twentie perſons, out of which number yearelie there was and is choſen one to be the cheefeſt gouernour for the yeare following; and is called by the name of a maior, whome the Saxons called Meregreue, that is, Maior dominus, or the cheefe ruler. This maior aſſociated with the foure prouoſts or bailiffes, hath the hearing, decerning, and determining in all ciuill cauſes betwéene partie and partie, and for which they kéepe wéekelie vpon euerie mondaie a court in the Guildhall of the ſaid citie: but the bailiffes reteining their old and ancient cuſtome, doo kéepe the like courts, and in the like cauſes diſtinctlie from the maior by themſelues, at all time and times (the mondaies and feſtiuall daies excepted) as it ſhall pleaſe them to aſſigne, and with their court is called by the name of the prouoſt court.

The good inclination and dutifulneſſe of the citizens.

Thus the maior and bailiffes both iointlie and ſeuerallie haue iuriſdiction to decerne and determine in ciuill matters. But if the matters doo touch and concerne the prince, the crowne, the common peace, anie criminall matter, or the publike ſtate of the citie and common-wealth of the ſame, then the ſame are decided by the maior and iuſtices, or by the maior and common councell, or by the maior himſelfe, or by ſome other officer or officers, according to the nature and qualitie of the cauſe and offenſe. But bicauſe it requireth a large and ſpeciall courſe, to deſcribe the gouernement of this citie and common-wealth of the ſame, the charge of euerie officer, the diuerſitie of officers, their ſeuerall iuriſdictions, and a number of other things incident vnto their charges: there is a particular booke imprinted, and at large the ſame is ſet out, in ſuch order as is requiſite, and apperteining to the gouernement: whereby euerie man may know his office and charge, and what to him dooth apperteine. And let it ſuffice, that partlie through good gouernement, and partlie of a good inclination, the people of this citie haue béene alwaies dutifull and obedient to the king and the lawes: and haue in great awe and reuerence their gouernours and magiſtrats for the time being. And this one thing is not ſo ſtrange as worthie to be noted, that euen from the beginning, from time to time they haue béene carefull for their common-wealth, and vigilant for the preſeruation of the ſame. And as in times of peace and quietneſſe the ſame hath béene well gouerned: ſo in times troubleſome and vnquiet, it hath béene moſt valiantlie defended againſt the inuaſions and aſſaults of the enimies, as by ſundrie hiſtories it may appeare: whereof for example theſe few may ſerue.

Veſpaſian landeth in Torrebaie, and laieth ſiege to this citie.

King Aruiragus reſcueth this citie and incountereth the enimie.

Annales eccleſiæ cathed.

1 First Aruiragus king of this land, then named Britaine, minding to ſtaie the land in his ancient eſtate, fréedome and libertie, did withdraw and denie to paie vnto the Romans the tribute which they did require and demand: wherefore Claudius the emperor ſent Veſpaſian then duke of the Romane armie, into this realme with a great hoaſt, either to recouer the tribute, or to ſubdue the land. This Veſpaſian is he, who in the foure and twentith yeare after this his iourneie, did deſtroie Ieruſalem. Wherfore this duke landing in Torrebaie, then named Totoneſium littus, came to this citie, laid ſiege vnto it, and gaue continuall aſſaults thereunto, for eight daies continuallie togither. Aruiragus the king, being then in the eaſt parts of the land, and hearing of this, with a great armie and power marcheth towards this citie to remooue the ſiege, and incountereth with the enimie. The Romane after long fight, and not able to preuaile, is contented to come to parlée, and in the end a compoſition was concluded, as it dooth appeare, and is ſet downe and written by ſundrie hiſtoriographers. The chronicle of the cathedrall church of the ſaid citie hath theſe words: Anno Domini 49, Veſpaſianus cum Romano exercitu ciuitatem nunc vocatam Exeter, octo diebus obſedit, ſed minimè præualuit, Aruirago rege ciuibus auxilium præſtante.

Penda king of Mertia.

Edwin king of Northumberland.

King Cadwallo is driuen to flée into Ireland.

Pellitus a witch dooth foretell to king Edwin of things to come.

And yet Matthew of Weſtminſter writeth that it was beſieged by Penda king of Mertia, in the yeare of our Lord 632, in the time of Cadwallin one of the laſt kings of the Britons. The hiſtorie is this. Edwin the Saxon king of the Northumbers, hauing wars againſt Cadwallin or Cadwallo, did ſo preuaile and had ſuch conqueſts ouer him, that Cadwallo was driuen to forſake his realme of Wales, and to flie into Ireland, where he being, was verie carefull and penſifull how to recouer his countrie againe.. Wherefore he repareth his armie and gathereth a new force, and gaue ſundrie attempts to atchiue to his purpoſe: but all was in vaine, for he could neuer ſet foot on land in his countrie. But Edwin was alwaies at hand and in a readineſſe to ſtop and reſiſt the ſame, for this Edwin had about him in his ſeruice a man named Pellitus, who was a magician and verie ſkilfull in necromancie, and who by his art and ſcience did foreſhew and declare vnto Edwin what things were a dooing and attempted againſt him.

King Cadwallo ſaileth into Armorica.

Brienus the kings nephue is ſent to kill Pellitus.

Cadwallo hauing continuallie euill ſucceſſe, was in vtter deſpaire and diſtruſt to preuaile againſt Edwin, and therefore as one giuing ouer all, ſaileth ouer the ſeas into Armorica now called little Britaine, vnto Salomon the king thereof, and vnto him dooth diſcloſe his miſerable eſtate and fortune, as alſo greatlie complaineth of Pellitus and of his ſorceries. When theſe two kings had throughlie conſulted and debated the matter, it was at length concluded and thought beſt, that ſome one man being bold and wittie ſhould be ſent ouer to the court of king Edwin, & to giue the aduenture to kill Pellitus. Wherevpon the matter being diſcouered to Brienus nephue to king Cadwallo, he taketh vpon him to enterpriſe the matter, and to couer himſelfe from all ſuſpicion, apparelleth himſelfe in a poore beggers wéed, and ſo ſaileth ouer into England, and trauelleth forthwith towards king Edwins court, who then laie at Yorke, and there ioineth and accompanieth himſelfe among the poore people, whoſe cuſtome and maner was, to lie about the kings gates at dinner and ſupper times, waiting for the almeſſe vſuallie giuen and wont to be diſtributed amongſt the poore.

Brienus killeth Pellitus.

Pellitus being the kings almoner, and hauing the charge to diſtribute the ſaid almeſſe, commeth forth and ſetteth the poore folke in order. Brienus being there and amongſt them, watcheth his time to worke his purpoſe, and thruſting himſelfe in the middle of the preſſe of the people, ſuddenlie with his poinado or weapon which for the purpoſe he had prepared, thruſteth Pellitus into the bodie, & gaue him a deadlie wound whereof he died, and forthwith (the thing in ſuch a thruſt not perceiued) ſhifteth himſelfe awaie priuilie, and through woods, hils, thickets, and dales out of the common waie, commeth to this citie of Exceſter, & declareth vnto the citizens (who were then Britons) what he had doone: whereof they were verie glad and ioifull, and in good hope that their king Cadwallo ſhould yet againe returne; and therefore vpon good aduiſe doo prepare and make readie both themſelues and the citie, aſwell for the reſiſting of the enimie, as for the receiuing, ſuccouring and aiding of their king.

King Penda beſiegeth Exceſter.

King Penda aduertiſed of this murther, and vnderſtanding the whole courſe of the matter and practiſe, taketh in griefe the iniurie thus doone to his neighbor and countriman king Edwin. And therefore to reuenge the ſame muſtereth his ſubiects and gathereth a great armie; and vnderſtanding that Brienus was come to this citie marcheth towards the ſame, and in the end laieth his ſiege round about it, minding the vtter ſubuerſion thereof. But the citizens manfullie withſtanding his force, did defend and kéepe both themſelues and their citie, vntill that king Cadwallo, who before was aduertiſed both of the fact of Brienus and of this preparation of Penda, did with his force and armie come to the citie, who did not onelie reſcue the ſame; but alſo ioining the battell with his enimie gaue him the ouerthrow, and ſo deliuered his countrie, and recouered himſelfe and his kingdome.

Polyd. lib. 5.

It was alſo in greater troubles in the time of king Alured or Alfred the fourth ſonne to king Ethelwolphus. For Polydorus and others doo write, that in the fift yeare of the ſaid kings reigne, the Danes concluded a peace with the ſaid king, and gaue hoſtages for the true kéeping thereof. And yet notwithſtanding moſt perfidiouſlie and falſelie contrarie to the ſame, they aſſembled themſelues, and vpon a ſudden marched to this citie, and perforce entered and tooke the ſame: Daci etenim qui religionem & fidem pro ſuo commodo poſtponendam ducebant, Londino ſe mouent, & maximis itineribus Exoniam proficiſcuntur, vrbémq; per vim capiunt. But long they inioied not the ſame, for after that winter paſſed, the king to be reuenged marcheth with a great power to this citie, which the Danes vnderſtanding and thinking themſelues too weake to withſtand the K. as alſo vtterlie diſtruſting the citizens, ſhifted themſelues awaie, of which ſome fled vnto Dartmouth and there tooke ſhipping, and who for the moſt part were drowned in a tempeſt at the ſeas. Some fled to Chipenham or (as ſome ſaie) to Briſtow, but the king followed and purſued theſe ſo ſharplie, that he neuer left nor gaue ouer, vntill he had ouercome and ſlaine the capteins Hubbert and Hungar.

The Danes are ouerthrowne and their capteins are ſlaine.

Likewiſe in the ninetéenth yeare of the reigne of the ſaid king, the Danes contrarie to their faith, pledges, and promiſes, did againe come to this citie, and laid ſiege to the ſame: Danorum exercitus anno 877, ab Wareham nocte quadam, fœdere dirupto, ad Exanceſtre, quod Britannicè dicitur Caieriſke diuerterunt, at audito regis aduentu, ad puppes fugerunt, & in mari prædantes manebant.

Noua chronica.

It was alſo beſieged by the ſaid Danes in the ninetéenth yéere of king Egelred, in the yéere of our Lord 1001. For the Danes, which were in Normandie, being aduertiſed of the good lucke, ſucceſſe, and great ſpoiles which their companions and countriemen in England had, and their téeth ſet on edge therewith, ſuddenlie prepared ſhipping, and came ouer the coaſts and landed in Deuon, and forthwith marched and tooke their courſe towards the citie of Exceſter; thinking to haue found the citizens napping & to haue taken them ſuddenlie and vnawares; Sed ciuibus viriliter reſiſtentibus receſſerunt. The people & cõmons of Deuon, Cornewall, Summerſet & Dorſet, aduertiſed hereof, aſſembled themſelues, & minding to reſcue the citie, as alſo to incounter & aduenture the field with the Danes, met with them at a place néere the citie called Pinneho, and ioined battell with them, betwéene whome the fight was cruell and the ſlaughter great. And thus dooth Houeden teſtifie, whoſe words be theſe: Memoratus paganorum exercitus de Normannia in Angliam reuectus, oſtium fluuij Exe ingreditur, & mox ad extinguendam vrbem Exanceſtre egreditur, ſed dum murum illius deſtruere moliretur, ac ciuibus vrbem viriliter defendentibus repellitur, vnde nimis exaſperatus more ſolito villas ſuccendendo, agros depopulando, hominéſque cædendo per Domnoniam vagatur, quare Domnonenſes in vnum congregati, in loco qui dicitur Pinho certamen cum eis ineunt.

King Sweno inuadeth and ſpoileth the land.

King Sweno being in Denmarke, and aduertiſed hereof, as alſo giuen to vnderſtand how king Elfred aliàs Etheldred or Egelred had cauſed all the Danes in the realme to be ſuddenlie ſlaine in one night, being much gréeued therewith, did prepare and prouide a great armie for the reuenge thereof. And in the yeare of our Lord 1002, he landed in ſundrie and diuerſe parts of this realme, vſing great hoſtilitie, and making great ſpoiles, and brought the whole land to an vnſpeakeable miſerie and diſtreſſe: but at length, receiuing a tribute for a peace, he returned home into his owne countrie. Howbeit the citizens of Exceſter hearing of this crueltie vſed in the eaſt parts, made themſelues ſtrong: and doubting of ſo mightie an enimie, did make themſelues readie, and prepared the citie to withſtand him, if he ſhould haue attempted anie force or hoſtilitie againſt them.

Hugh earle of Deuon as a falſe mã to his countrie, dooth betraie the citie.

But the Dane being gone and returned home, and knowing nothing of this preparation, one Hugh then earle of Deuon (as princes lacke no fawners) ſent his letters into Denmarke to king Sweno, certifieng him both of the ſtate and wealth of this citie, as alſo of the great preparation which had bene made to withſtand him, perſuading him not to ſuſteine ſuch an iniurie. And as coles will be ſoone kindled: euen ſo the Dane vpon this aduertiſement was in a great heat, and forthwith arreareth his armie, and repareth all things in readineſſe to croſſe the ſeas anew to worke his will againſt this citie.

And accordinglie when time ſerued, in the yeare following, being the yeare of our Lord 1003, he tooke the ſeas and landed vpon the coaſts of Deuon and Cornewall, and marched forthwith to this citie, and laid his ſiege againſt the ſame in the beginning of the moneth of Auguſt, and continued the ſame vntill the kalends of September: during which time were ſundrie ſharpe, fierce, and cruell aſſaults giuen by the Dane, and as valiantlie reſiſted by the citizens.

But in continuance of time, when they ſaw themſelues dailie more and more to be weakened, vittels to faile, the fire round about them, their walles beaten downe, themſelues ſlaughtered and murthered, and the enimie to increaſe and be ſtrong, and in all theſe diſtreſſes, their king Eldred being fled into Normandie, to haue no care of them, nor to prepare anie reſcue, aid, or helpe for them: it was not to be maruelled, if in ſo heauie a diſtreſſe they were amazed and aſtoniſhed. And yet conſidering with themſelues that Sweno was a Dane, a cruell enimie, a bloudie murtherer, an vſurping tyrant, hauing no other title to the crowne of England, but the ſword, did with one conſent agrée and conclude, neuer to yéeld nor giue ouer whileſt anie were left liuing able to withſtand the ſame, wiſhing rather to die manfullie for their common wealth, than to liue in reproch and infamie; and by death to reape an immortall fame, than by life to become ignominious & infamous, and in the end alſo to be the miſerable ſlaues of a cruell and vſurping tyrant.

King Eldred as one forlorne forſaketh his countrie.

The ſtoutnes and courage of the citizens.

When therefore after manie aſſaults, all or the moſt part of the ableſt men were ſpent and conſumed, and none or few left aliue to withſtand ſo mightie and ſo manie enimies: the Dane on the ſeuen and twentith daie of Auguſt, with force entered the citie, And after that he had ſerued and ſatiſfied his bloudie appetits, in deflowring the women, murthering the children, and making hauocke of all the people, hée ſpoiled the citie, burned the houſes, raſed the walles, bet downe the temples, and left nothing to be doone which might by fire, ſword, and ſpoiles be conſumed: and this is ſo witneſſed by ſundrie writers. Reinulph of Cheſter writeth thus: Daci cum ſuo rege Sweno Exceſtriam venerunt, & vrbem funditùs deſtruxerunt, nulla re incolumi relicta, quæ aut ferro aut igni vaſtari poterat: & omnia ſpolia cineribus tantùm relictis ſecum deportauerunt. Huntington hath theſe words: Daci ira exarſerunt ſicut ignis quem velit aliquis ſanguine extinguere: aduolantes igitur quaſi multitudo locuſtarum, quidam Exceſtriam venerunt, & vrbem funditùs deſtruxerunt: & omnia ſpolia cineribus tantùm relictis ſecum deportauerunt.

King Sweno entereth and taketh the citie, & vtterlie deſtroieth it.

Houeden thus ſaith: Rex Danorum Sweni periurium & proditionem Normannici comitis, quem Emma Domnaniæ præfecerat, ciuitatem Exon infregit, ſpoliauit, & murum ab orientali vſq; ad occidentalem portam deſtruxit, & cum ingenti præda naues repetijt. It was alſo beſieged by William the Conquerour in the firſt yeare of his reigne Anno 1068. For when he firſt entered this land, and by dint of ſword ſought the conqueſt thereof; the citizens of this citie, and the noble and gentlemen of all the countrie about, entered into one common league, concluſion and promiſe, to ioine togither and to withſtand the enimie to the vttermoſt. And this confederacie being confirmed by a publike oth, preparation on all parts was made accordinglie, for the accompliſhing of the ſame. But the conquerour hauing preuailed, and ſubdued in a maner the whole land, was aduertiſed that this citie ſtood vpon their gard, and would not yéeld nor ſubmit themſelues vnto him. Wherevpon he ſent his armie from London and beſieged the ſame: and perceiuing the ſiege to continue, marched and came himſelfe vnto the ſame, but rather came no further than Saliſburie. In the meane time the citizens were aduertiſed how the whole realme had yéelded, and ſéeing alſo how their confederats did dailie ſhrinke awaie from them, and by that meanes they to grow weaker & weaker, and therefore the leſſe able to withſtand ſo great a force, and to kéepe out ſo puiſſant an armie as was round about them; and conſidering alſo, that ſmall mercie or fauor ſhould they find if the citie by force were taken; did by way of intreatie offer ſubmiſſion, and deſire peace, which in the end they obteined: and ſo paieng a grieuous fine, they and the citie were reſtored. But yet in token of his conqueſt, the king altered and changed the gates of the caſtell, and tooke an oth of all the citizens to be his liege and true ſubiects.

Houeden in his hiſtorie maketh mention, that Githa king Harolds mother ſhould be within this citie, during the time that this ſiege and aſſault laſted: and perceiuing the bent of the people to ſubmit and yéeld themſelues, ſecretlie conueied hirſelfe awaie. For theſe be his words: Hyeme minuente, rex Wilhelmus de Normannia in Angliam redijt, & Anglis importabile tributum impoſuit: deinde in Dunmoniam hoſtiliter profectus eſt ad ciuitatem Exceſtriam, quam ciues & nonnulli Anglici miniſtri contra illum retinebant: & obſedit, & infregit. Githa verò comitiſſa, mater ſcilicet Haroldi regis Anglorum, & ſoror Swani regis Danorum, cum multis de ciuitate fugiens, euaſit & Flandriam petijt, ciues autem dextris acceptis regi ſe dederunt. Alſo in the ſecond yeare of king Stephan Anno 1137, the lords and péeres of the realme, remembring the oth which they had before made to king Henrie the firſt, to whom they ſware to be true to Mawd the kings onelie daughter and heire, and to hir heires, and yet contrarie to the ſame had ſworne themſelues to king Stephan, began to repent themſelues, & conſulted how to reſtore Mawd the empreſſe, and to expell Stephan. Wherefore they aſſembled themſelues in armor, & diuided themſelues into ſundrie cities, townes and caſtels.

Q. Mawd is friendlie to the citie.

It was alſo in great troubles in the eleuenth yere of king Richard the ſecond, Anno 1387. For a controuerſie being fallen betwéene the king & his two vncles, the dukes of Yorke & Gloceſter, none were then ſo highlie in the kings fauour, as were Robert Vere marques of Dublin, and Michaell de la Poole earle of Suffolke, & others of their faction. To theſe the king gaue in commandement, to collect and muſter an armie, as it were for his defenſe, againſt his ſaid vncles: which when they had partlie doone, whether it were bicauſe they miſtruſted their owne parts, or whether they doubted of the ſequele of their dooings, they left their iourneie towards London, as it was firſt appointed, and came towards this citie. The two dukes who ſtood vpon their owne gard and defenſe, hauing aduertiſement hereof, followed and perſuaded them with all haſte and ſpéed: and hauing ouertaken them at this citie, they ioined the fight with the marques and the earle. But they truſting more to their féet than to their hands, ſecretlie gaue the ſlip and fled awaie, making no ſtaie before they came to Scotland; and from thence into Flanders, where they died.

The marques of Dublin, and the earle of Suffolke, come to Exon and are purſued by the dukes of Yorke and Gloceſter.

It was moreouer in troubles in the tenth yere of king Edward the fourth Anno 1469, when the ſtates of this king, and of king Henrie the ſixt were doubtfull, and the whole realme diuided: ſome following king Henrie, and ſome king Edward. In time of which troubles the duches of Clarence, the lord Dineham, the lord Fitzwaren, and the baron of Carew, who followed and tooke part with king Henrie, came to this citie, being accompanied and aſſiſted with a thouſand fightingmen. The duches was great with child, and lodged in the biſhops palace, but the lords were in other houſes within the cloſe among the chanons, and here ſtaied themſelues. But ſir Hugh Courtneie knight, who then fauoured and was on the part of king Edward, hearing of this aſſemblie, raiſeth an armie of his friends and alies, approcheth therewith vnto this citie, beſiegeth it, breaketh the bridges, and ſtoppeth all the waies leading to the ſame, and by which means no vittels could bée brought to the markets: and being thus incamped about this citie, ſendeth to the maior, requiring him either to open the gates and to giue him entrie, or to deliuer vnto him the gentlemen that were therein. On the other ſide, the gentlemen which were within, they either miſtruſting the maior and citizens, or not willing to ſtand to his courteſie, and be vnder his gouernement, required the keies of the citie gates to be deliuered vnto their cuſtodie, and that all things to be doone by their order and appointment.

The maior is required to deliuer the keies of the citie, and refuſeth ſo to doo.

In theſe doubts and perplexities conſulting what were beſt to be doone, they did at length reſolue & conclude neither to yéeld to the requeſts of them who were without, nor yet to ſatiſfie the demands of them which were within the citie: but pacifieng both parties with ſuch good words, and in ſuch good order as they might, did reſerue to themſelues the kéeping and ſafe cuſtodie of the citie, being the chamber of the king, & parcell of the reuenues of the crowne, to the onlie vſe of the king and crowne, as to them in dutie and allegiance did apperteine. And therefore forthwith they rampired vp the citie gates, fortified the walles, appointed ſouldiers, and did ſet all things in ſuch good order as in that caſe was requiſit; leauing nothing vndoone which might be for the preſeruation of the ſtate & commonwealth of the citie.

The maior and citizens doo fortifie the citie.

But yet for want of forecaſting, in proceſſe of time the prouiſion within the citie wared ſhort, and vittels to be ſcant; whereof it was doubted there would inſue ſome famine, which the common people neither could nor would indure, if ſome remedie were not in due time had and prouided. The magiſtrats did their beſt indeuor euerie waie, aſwell by diligence in following, as by counſelling, in perſuading euerie man to continue firme and true to the publike ſtate, and their owne priuate commonweale. And albeit the common people were vnpatient to abide troubles, and loth to indure the preſent ſtate of want and famine; yet they had that reſpect to their owne truth, faith, and ſafetie, as euerie man yéelded himſelfe contented to abide and indure the time of their deliuerance: and by the good will of God it followed, and the ſame tooke good effect.

The ſiege raiſed, and the citie deliuered.

The duke of Clarence and the Earle of Warwike came from Edgecourt field to this citie, and from hence to Dartmouth.

For about twelue daies after this ſturre begun, by waie of intreatie and mediation of certeine chanons of the cathedrall church of this citie, the ſiege was remoued and raiſed; wherevpon verie ſhortlie after did inſue the field of Edgecourt, where the duke of Clarence and the earle of Warwike being put to the worſt, did flée vnto this citie, and made their entrie into the ſame the third daie of Aprill, 1470, and laie in the biſhops palace for a few daies, vntill they had cauſed to be prouided ſhips at Dartmouth for their paſſage ouer into Calis.

The king being aduertiſed which waie his enimies were gone, followed and purſued them with an armie of fortie thouſand men, and came to this citie the fourtéenth of Aprill 1470, hauing with him in his companie ſundrie & diuerſe great lords and eſtates, as namelie the biſhop of Elie lord treſuror of England, the duke of Norffolke earle marſhall of England, the duke of Suffolke, the earle of Arundell, the earle of Wiltſhire ſon to the duke of Buckingham, the earle of Shrewesburie, the earle Riuers, the lord Haſtings, the lord Greie of Codner, the lord Audleigh, the lord Saie, the lord Sturton, the lord Dacres, the lord Mountioie, the lord Stanleie, the lord Ferris, & the baron of Dudleigh, with a number of knights and gentlemen. But they all came too late; for the duke and the earle were both departed and gon to the ſeas before their comming.

Wherefore the king, after that he had reſted and reposed himſelfe here thrée daies, he departed and returned to London. It was alſo in great troubles, 11 being beſieged in the twelfe yeare of king Henrie the ſeuenth: by one Perkin Warbecke, 1470, who in the beginning of the moneth of September came to this citie, and incamped about it with his whole armie with ordinance battered the walls, fired the gates, vndermined it, and with mightie ladders ſcaled them, and left nothing vndoone which might be to compaſſe their attempt: thinking and ſuppoſing that ſmall would be the reſiſtance againſt them. But ſuch was the noble courage and valiant ſtomach of the citizens, that they manfullie reſiſted and defended thoſe forces, and indured the ſame to the vttermoſt, vntill that the king being aduertiſed thereof, did ſend the lord Edward Courtneie, earle of Deuon and the lord William his ſonne, with ſundrie others well appointed, who came and reſcued the citie: but in certeine conflicts the ſaid earle and others were hurt; notwithſtanding the enimie had the repulſe, and was driuen to raiſe his campe and to depart.

Perkin Warbecke commeth to Excester and beſiegeth it.

The earle of Deuon ſent to reſcue the citie and is hurt.

12 Finallie & laſt of all, it was beſieged in the third yeare of king Edward the ſixt, 1549, by the commons of Deuon and Cornewall: the hiſtorie whereof, for ſo much as hitherto it hath not béene fullie and at large ſet forth by anie man, & wherat I John Hooker the writer herof was preſent, and Teſtis oculatus of things then doone, I will ſomewhat at large diſcourſe & ſet downe the whole courſe & maner of the ſame. It is apparant and moſt certeine, that this rebellion firſt was raiſed at a place in Deuon named Sampford Courtneie, which lieth weſtwards from the citie about ſixtéene miles; vpon mondaie in the Whitſun wéeke being the tenth daie of Iune 1549. The cauſe thereof (as by the ſequele it did appeare) was onelie concerning religion; which then by act of parlement was reformed, and to be put in execution on Whitſundaie the ninth of Iune. The which daie being now come, and the ſtatute made for the ſame to be put in execution throughout the whole realme: it was accordinglie with all obedience receiued in euerie place, and the common people well inough contented therewith euerie where; ſauing in this weſt countrie, and eſpeciallie at the ſaid Sampford Courtneie.

The rebellion or commotion in Deuon.

The rebellion firſt began at Sampford Courtneie.

The cauſe of this rebellion was for religion.

For albeit at the daie appointed by ſtatute, they had heard and were preſent at the diuine ſeruice ſaid, and had according to the new reformed order, and could not in anie reſpect, find fault, or iuſtlie reprehend the ſame: yet (as old bottels which would not receiue new wine) would rather wallow in the old dreggs and puddels of old ſuperſtition, than to be fed and refreſhed with the wholſome and heauenlie manna. Wherefore they confederated themſelues, vtterlie to renounce, reiect, and caſt off the ſame, not onelie to the great offenſe of God, whome they ought in all truth and veritie to reuerence and honor; and to the great diſpleaſure of the king, whome in all dutifulneſſe they ought to haue obeied: but alſo to the raiſing of open rebellion, the cauſe of the ſpoile of the whole countrie, and the vndoing of themſelues, their wiues, and children; as in ſequele and in the end it fell out and came to paſſe.

And here doth appeare what great detriments doo come and inſue to the church of God, and what great troubles trouble to the publike and commonweale: when as learned preachers doo want to teach and inſtruct the people; and well perſuaded magiſtrats to gouerne the common ſtate. For theſe people lacking the one, & not ſtored with the other, were left to themſelues, and to their owne diſpoſitions: and thereby partlie of ignorance, but more of a froward and a rebellious diſpoſition, they doo now vtterlie condemne to accept, and doo openlie reſiſt to receiue the reformed religion, now put, and to be put in vre and execution. For vpon the ſaid mondaie, the prieſt being come to the pariſh church of Sampford, & preparing himſelfe to ſaie the ſeruice according to the booke & reformed order ſet foorth, & as he had doone the daie before: ſome of the pariſhioners, namelie one William Vnderhill a tailor, and one Segar a laborer, and others who had conſulted and determined before of the matter, went to the prieſt, and demanded what he ment to doo, and what ſeruice he would ſaie? Who anſwered that according to the lawes ſet forth, he would ſaie the ſame ſeruice as he had doone the daie before. Then they ſaid, that he ſhould not ſo doo, ſaieng further, that they would kéepe the old and ancient religion, as their forefathers before them had doone; and as king Henrie the eight by his laſt will and teſtament had taken order, that no alteration of religion ſhould be made, vntill king Edward his ſonne were come vnto his full age. And therefore, for ſomuch as he was now but a child, and could doo nothing, they alſo would not haue anie change.

The want of preaching was the cauſe of the rebellion.

The prieſt was compelled, becauſe he would be compelled to ſaie maſſe.

In the end, all the pariſhioners ioining and taking parts togither, were all of the ſame mind, willing and charging the prieſt that he ſhould vſe and ſaie the like ſeruice as in times paſt he was wont to doo: who in the end, whether it were with his will, or againſt his will, he relied to their minds, and yéelded to their wils: and foorthwith rauiſheth himſelfe in his old popiſh attire, and ſaith maſſe, and all ſuch ſeruices as in times paſt accuſtomed. Theſe newes, as a cloud caried with a violent wind, and as a thunder clap ſounding at one inſtant through the whole countrie, are caried and noiſed euen in a moment through out the whole countrie: and the common people ſo well allowed and liked thereof, that they clapped their hands for ioie, and agréed in one mind, to haue the ſame in euerie of their ſeuerall pariſhes.

The iuſtices reſort to Sampford and doo no good.

The iuſtices of peace dwelling not far from Sampford, being aduertiſed how diſorderlie, & contrarie to the lawes, things had béene doone in the church of Sampford; and how that the common people were cluſtered and aſſembled togither, to continue and to mainteine their lewd & diſordered behauiour: ſuch of them, namelie, ſir Hugh Pollard knight, Anthonie Haruie, Alexander Wood, and Marke Slader eſquiers came & met at Sampford, minding to haue had conference with the chiefe plaiers in this enterlude, aſwell for the redreſſe of the diſorder alreadie committed, as alſo to perſuade and pacifie the reſt of the people. But they partlie vnderſtanding before hand of the iuſtices comming, were ſo addicted and wholie bent to their follies, that they fullie reſolued themſelues, wilfullie to mainteine what naughtilie they had begun. And therefore, when the iuſtices were come to the place, and requeſted to talke with them, they refuſed it; vnleſſe the ſaid gentlemen would leaue all their men behind, and go with them into a certeine ſeuerall cloſe not far off; and ſo they would be contented to conferre with them.

Theſe gentlemen were afraid of their owne ſhadowes.

The gentlemen, albeit they and their men were the greater number, and ſufficient to haue repreſſed the ſmall companie of the commoners then & there aſſembled: yet whether it were becauſe they thought in ſuch a caſe to vſe all the beſt & quieteſt waie for the pacifieng of them; or whether ſome of them being like affected as they were, did not like the alteration, as it was greatlie ſuſpected: they yéelded, and according to the motion made, they left their men in the towne, & went into the foreſaid cloſe, & there hauing had conference a pretie while togither, did in the end depart without anie thing doone at all. Whereof as there appéered ſome weakeneſſe in the ſaid iuſtices which were ſo white liuered, as they would not, or durſt not to repreſſe the rages of the people (which they might haue done) ſo therof alſo inſued ſuch a ſcab as paſſed their cure, and ſuch a fire as they were not able to quench. For the commons hauing now their willes, were ſet vpon a pin, that the game was theirs, and that they had woone the garland before they had runne the race; nothing forecaſting what might inſue, nor yet accounting what follie it is to triumph before the victorie. Wherfore they aſſemble & confederat themſelues throughout the whole ſhire in great troops and companies, and doo aſſociat and flocke vnto them the Corniſh people, minding to ioine togither, and fooliſhlie to mainteine what raſhlie they had begun.

Sir Peter Carew and ſir Gawen Carew ſent into Deuon.

The king and councell then occupied in the weightie cauſes concerning the ſtate of Scotland, being aduertiſed of this towards rebellion, & reſpecting the ſpéedie redreſſe thereof, ſent foorthwith for ſir Peter Carew knight, who then was in Lincolneſhire, and for ſir Gawen Carew, who was then attendant at the court: and to them commandement was giuen, that foorthwith, and with all ſpéed they ſhould haſten and depart into Deuon, and there to vſe, by the aduiſe of the iuſtices, all the beſt meanes and waies that they might for the appeaſing of this rebellion, quieting of the people, and pacifieng of the countrie; and to cauſe euerie man quietlie to returne to his home, and to refer the cauſes of their griefs and complaints (if they had anie) vnto the king and councell: and if they then refuſed ſo to doo, they to vſe ſuch other good means and waies as might be for the ſuppreſſing of them. And the councell being dailie more and more aduertiſed, that theſe begun rebellions did more and more increaſe; and doubting of the ſequele thereof, by reaſon that in other places of the realme the like tumults were begun, though not for the like cauſes; doo direct and giue an order to the lord Ruſſell, then lord priuie ſeale, and after earle of Bedford, that he alſo ſhould follow and diſpatch himſelfe into Deuon; and he had a commiſſion to deale in ſuch order as he might beſt doo for the pacifieng of the ſaid tumults and vprores.

The iuſticiaries doo aſſemble all at Exceſter.

Sir Peter Carew by the aduiſe of the iuſtices rideth to Kirton.

The foreſaid two knights, hauing receiued their commiſſion vnder the kings hand, came in poſt into the countrie, and making their repaire to this citie, doo foorthwith ſend for ſir Péers Courtneie then ſhiriffe and the iuſtices of the peace of the countrie; and vnderſtanding, that a great companie of the commons were aſſembled at Crediton, which is a towne diſtant about ſeauen miles from Exceſter, and that among them were the Sampford men: & who were the chiefe of them tooke councell & aduiſe what was beſt to be doone, and what waie méeteſt to be taken. In the end it was concluded, that the ſaid ſir Peter and ſir Gawen with others ſhould ride to Crediton, & there to haue conference and ſpéeches with the ſaid commons, and to vſe all the good waies and meanes they might to pacifie & appeaſe them, they then ſuppoſing, and being perſuaded, that by good ſpéeches and gentle conferences they ſhould haue béene able to haue compaſſed and perſuaded the ſaid commons. But the people being by ſome ſecret intelligence aduertiſed of the comming of the gentlemen towards them, and they fullie reſolued not to yéeld one iote from their determinations, but to mainteine their cauſe taken in hand, do arme and make themſelues ſtrong, with ſuch armors and furnitures as they had; they intrench the high waies, and make a mightie rampire at the townes end, and fortifie the ſame, as alſo the barns next adioining to the ſaid rampires with men and munition, hauing perſed the walles of the barns with loopes and holes for their ſhot.

The people at Kirton do arme themſelues ⁊ rampire vp the waies.

The foreſaid gentlemen knowing nothing hereof, rode on their iournie, and being come almoſt to the towne, they were aduertiſed how the waies were ſtopped and rampired, and that they could not ride into the towne. Wherevpon they alighted from their horſſes, and after a little conference had, they agréed to go into the towne on foot, nothing thinking leſſe that they ſhould be ſtopped or denied to go in on foot. But when they came to the rampires they found the contrarie: for they not onelie were denied to come néere the rampire, but vtterlie were refuſed to be talked withall: no offers of perſuaſions nor motions of conference at all could be allowed. For the ſun being in cancer, ⁊ the midſummer moone at full, their minds were imbrued in ſuch follies, and their heads caried with ſuch vanities, that as the man of Athens they would heare no man ſpeake but themſelues, and thought nothing well ſaid but what came out of their owne mouths.

The gentlemen vpon ſuch checks, taking the matter in euill part, to be ſo vnreuerentlie and diſcourteouſlie intreated, with one conſent do agree to make waie ouer the rampire. But in the aduenture thereof they were ſo galled both by them which kept the rampires, and ſpeciallie by ſuch as were within the barnes, that they were faine to retire and giue place, with the loſſe of ſome, and the hurt of manie. In which diſtreſſe, a certeine ſeruingman named Fox, and reteining to ſir Hugh Pollard, ſuddenlie ſet one of the barnes on fire: wherevpon not onelie ſuch as were therein, but all they alſo which were in the rampires fled and ran awaie. And then the gentlemen hauing recouered the rampire went into the towne; but there they found none except a few poore and old people, the reſidue truſting better to their héeles than to their armes were fled to a further place: and then they returned againe to Excester without anie thing doone.

The barns at the townes end at Kirton are ſet on fire.

The noiſe of this fire and burning was in poſt haſt, and as it were in a moment carried and blazed abroad throughout the whole countrie; and the common people vpon falſe reports, and of a gnat making an elephant, noiſed and ſpread it abroad, that the gentlemen were altogither bent to ouer-run, ſpoile, and deſtroie them. And in this rage, as it were a ſwarme of waſps they cluſter themſelues in great troops and multitudes, ſome in one place, and ſome in an other, fortifieng and intrenching themſelues as though the enimie were readie to inuade and aſſaile them. And among other places one was at a village belonging to the lord Ruſſell named S. Marie Cliſt diſtant from Excester about two miles, where the commons of the countrie thereabout had begun to fortifie the towne for their defenſe ⁊ ſafetie.

An aſſemblie of the people at Cliſt Marie or biſhops Cliſt.

The cauſe and pretenſe of their dooings herein, was not onelie the burning of the barnes at Crediton aforeſaid, which all the commons generallie did vſe for a cloke of this their riſing and rebellion: but this one thing alſo increaſed their diſpoſition. It happened that a certeine gentleman named Walter Raleigh dwelling not far from thenſe, as he was vpon a ſide holie daie riding from his houſe to Excester, ouertooke an old woman going to the pariſh church of ſaint Marie Cliſt, who had a paire of beads in hir hands, and aſked hir what ſhe did with thoſe beads? And entring into further ſpéeches with hir concerning religion, which was reformed, ⁊ as then by order of law to be put in execution, he did perſuade with hir that ſhe ſhould as a good chriſtian woman and an obedient ſubiect yéeld therevnto; ſaieng further; that there was a puniſhment by law appointed againſt hir, and all ſuch as would not obeie and follow the ſame, and which would be put in execution vpon them.

A cauſe whie they roſe at biſhops Cliſt.

This woman nothing liking, nor well digeſting this matter, went forth to the pariſh church, where all the pariſhioners were then at the ſeruice: and being vnpatient, and in an agonie with the ſpéeches before paſſed betwéene hir and the gentleman, beginneth to vpbraid in the open church verie hard and vnſéemelie ſpéeches concerning religion, ſaieng that ſhe was threatned by the gentleman, that except ſhe would leaue hir beads, and giue ouer holie bread and holie water, the gentlemen would burne them out of their houſes and ſpoile them; with manie other ſpéeches verie falſe and vntrue, and whereof no talke at all had paſſed betwéene the gentleman and hir. Notwithſtanding ſhe had not ſo ſoon ſpoken, but that ſhe was beléeued: and in all haſt like a ſort of waſps they fling out of the church, and get them to the towne which is not far from thenſe, and there began to intrench and fortifie the towne, ſending abroad into the countrie round about, the news aforeſaid, and of their dooings in hand, flocking, and procuring as manie as they could to come and to ioine with them.

And they fearing or miſtruſting, leaſt the gentlemen which were then at Excester, would come vpon them, they firſt fortified the bridge, which lieth at the end of the towne towards the citie, and laid great trées ouerthwart the ſame, as alſo planted certeine péeces of ordinance vpon the ſame, which they had procured and fetched from Topſham a towne not far from thenſe. But before they came into the towne, they ouertooke the gentleman maiſter Raleigh aforeſaid, and were in ſuch a choler, and ſo fell in rages with him, that if he had not ſhifted himſelfe into the chappell there, and had béene reſcued by certeine mariners of Exmouth which came with him, he had béene in great danger of his life, and like to haue béene murdered. And albeit he eſcaped for this time, yet it was not long before he fell into their hands, and by them impriſoned and kept in priſon in the towre and church of ſaint Sidwelles, without the eaſt gate of the citie of Excester, during the whole time of the commotion, being manie times threatned to be executed to death. But to the matter.

The towne of Cliſt is fortified, and the bridge rampired.

Walter Raleigh eſquier in danger of the rebelles.

Theſe the dooings of the commons being aduertiſed to ſir Peter Carew, who then was in Excester, aſſembleth all the iuſtices ⁊ the gentlemen, ⁊ conferreth with them what were beſt to be doone; and in the end, concluded ⁊ agréed that he, ſir Gawen Carew, ſir Thomas Denis, ſir Hugh Pollard, and ſundrie others ſhould ride to Cliſt, and there to vſe all the beſt meanes they might, for the pacifieng and quieting of them. And accordinglie in the next morning being ſundaie they all rode thither: and being come almoſt to the bridge, they perceiued the ſame to be rampired, ⁊ no waie to be open for them to paſſe into the towne. Wherevpon ſir Peter Carew alighted from his horſſe, and miſtruſting nothing, was going on foot toward the bridge. But ſuch was the rancor and malice conceiued againſt him, partlie for religion, and partlie for the burning of the barns at Crediton, which was laid altogither to his fault, that the gunner whoſe name was Iohn Hamon an alien and a ſmith, and dwelling then at Woodburie, not far from Cliſt, by the procurement and abetting of ſome there, hauing charged his péece of ordinance there lieng, leuelled the ſame, to haue ſhot and diſcharged it at him: which he had doone, if one Hugh Oſborne ſeruant then to ſergeant Prideox had not let him and ſtaied his hand.

The gentlemen perceiuing they could not paſſe into the towne, doo ſend in a meſſenger vnto the towne, aduertiſing them that they were come to talke friendlie with them, as alſo to ſatiſfie them if they had anie cauſe of griefe, or were by anie bodie miſuſed. They at this meſſage and motion ſtaggered a while and caſt manie doubts: but in the end they ſent word that they were contented, that if ſir Thomas Denis, ſir Hugh Pollard, and Thomas Yard eſquier, would come into the towne to them and leaue their men behind them, as alſo would take order, and giue their faith and promiſe that no hurt ſhould be doone or offered to be doone vnto them, whiles they were thus in conference togither: that then vpon theſe conditions they would be contented to talke with them. Upon which promiſe made and aſſured vnto them, the foreſaid thrée gentlemen went into the towne about ten of the clocke in the forenoone, and there taried and ſpent the moſt part of the daie in much talke and to no purpoſe: as in the end it fell out.

The conference of the gentlemen with the commoners at Cliſt.

The other knights and gentlemen, which in the meane while taried without, and waited a long time euen vntill the daie did draw toward night, began to miſlike of the matter, ſome ſpeaking one thing and ſome an other; yea and ſome of them in plaine ſpéeches ſaid they would ride ouer the water and iſſue into the towne. But the friends and ſeruingmen of the two knights, reſpecting the promiſe made before their entrie into the towne, but eſpeciallie their maſters ſafetie, which by breach of promiſe might be put in perill, did vtterlie miſlike and were grieued with thoſe ſpéeches, and whereof began a little quarrelling among themſelues, but foorthwith pacified and quieted. And yet ſome one or two of the companie rode to the waters ſide, & with their ſtaues ſearched the depth thereof: for at that bridge the water at euerie tide (by reaſon that the ſeas are ſo néere) ſwelleth vp and reboundeth. Which thing when they in the towne did ſée, foorthwith cried out alarum, and made much a doo; and ſome of them began and grew into ſuch rages, that the gentlemen within the towne began to diſtruſt their ſafetie.

A mutinie towards among the ſeruingmen.

This man was named Richard Carwithian ſeruant to ſir Peter Carew.

Neuertheleſſe the conference and talke herewith ended, and they came awaie; who as ſoone as they were come to ſir Peter Carew, they were demanded what they had doone, and how they had ſped: who anſwered; Well inough: & giuing no other anſwer they rode all togither to Exceſter, deferring the diſcouerie of their dooings vntill their comming thither. The ſame night they ſupped all togither, & after ſupper ended, and all the ſeruingmen auoided out of that roome, ſir Peter Carew demanded of them what they had doone, and what agréement they had made: who anſwered that the commons had promiſed, and were contented to kéepe themſelues in good & quiet order, and to procéed no farther in their attempts: ſo that the king and the councell would not alter the religion, but ſuffer it to remaine and tarie in the ſame ſtate as king Henrie the eight left it, & vntill the king himſelfe came to his full age. Sir Peter Carew and all the reſidue nothing liking this anſwer, being farre from their expectation, were for the time in a great dumpe or ſtudie; but in the end miſliked and diſcommended both the matter and the maner of their dealings: inſomuch that ſir Peter Carew, and ſir Péerce Courtneie, then ſhiriffe of Deuon, openlie, ſharpelie, and in plaine termes inueied againſt them for their ſlender, or rather ſiniſter dealings in ſo weightie a cauſe: wherein they all ought rather to haue vſed all meanes to haue ſuppreſſed their outrages, than to haue mainteined their follies: and therefore as there was a blame in them, ſo was there a plaine rebellion in the other.

The agréement offered by the commoners.

But though the two knights would haue excuſed the matter, and haue purged their ſinceritie herein; yet on ech ſide words were ſo multiplied, that they brake aſunder without anie further dealings, and euerie man ſhifted for himſelfe, ſome one waie ſome an other waie. The commons vnderſtanding hereof ſtop all the high waies, caſting great trenches, and laieng great trées ouerthwart the ſame, and doo watch & ward the ſame: and by that meanes ſundrie gentlemen ſuſpecting no ſuch matter, and making waie to their appointed places, were intrapped, taken, and put in priſon; and manie of them kept in durance, during the whole time of the commotion, & abode great hardneſſe, and were in perill of life and limme: manie were taken bicauſe they would be taken, & found fauour; & manie forſaking their houſes and home, were driuen to ſequeſter and hide themſelues in woods & ſecret places. In the citie none or verie few remained or taried, ſauing ſix or ſeuen perſons then knowne of: for by conference had before with the maior, it was knowne that the citie was vnprouided of ſufficient vittels, méet for ſuch a companie as the foreſaid gentlemen were.

The gentlemen depart aſunder and euerie man ſhifteth for himſelfe.

The high waies are ſtopped and intrenched.

Sundrie gentlemen taken and impriſoned.

The gentlemen which taried and remained in the citie; namelie, ſir Roger Blewet knight, John Beauchampe, Bartholomew Forteſcute, John Courtneie, & John Peter cuſtomer, eſquiers, and others, did verie good ſeruice as well in their perſons, as in their good aduiſes and counſels, ſauing ſuch as ſecretlie kept themſelues cloſe in certeine houſes then vnknowne. Sir Peter Carew verie earlie in the next morning tooke his horſſe, and the high waies being then not ſtopped he eſcaped and rode vnto George Henton, a place of ſir Hugh Paulets in Summerſetſhire: where was the lord Ruſſell, being then newlie come from London, and vnto him he gaue to vnderſtand, how all things had paſſed: who foorthwith diſpatched and ſent him awaie to the king and councell to aduertiſe them of the ſame. The king at the firſt hearing of the matter, was verie much grieued, & in great perplexitie in two reſpects; the one bicauſe at this inſtant the like tumults and rebellions (though for an other cauſe) were now raiſed and begun in other places; the other was bicauſe he was inforced to leaue and giue ouer the appointed attempt for the conqueſt of Scotland, and to imploie now thoſe ſoldiors and ſtrangers, whome he had reteined for that ſeruice, for the quenching of this fire kindled at home.

A few gentlemen taried in the citie.

Sir Peter Carew rideth to the lord Ruſſell being at George Henton.

Sir Peter Carew rideth to the court & aduertiſed the king & councell.

The king grieued to heare of the commotion.

The determined conqueſt of Scotland was hindered by the rebellion.

Neuertheleſſe minding to follow the firſt, and to appeaſe the laſt, he ſent verie courteous letters, gratious proclamations, and manie mercifull offers vnto all the commons of theſe parties, to haue pacified and ſatiſfied them, if they had had ſo much grace ſo to haue accepted it. The commons being now entered in their follies, and hauing driuen the gentlemen to the flight, doo openlie ſhew themſelues traitors & rebels: and therefore aſſembling themſelues doo appoint out capteins to direct & order both themſelues, and all their procéedings, and as the common prouerbe is, Like lips like lettice, as is their cauſe, ſo are the rulers, the one being not ſo bold and euill, as they wicked or woorſe. The capteins then are theſe: Underhill a tailor, Maunder a ſhoomaker, Seager a labourer, and Aiſheredge a fiſhdriuer, with ſundrie other ſuch like, the woorſt men and the reffuſe of all others, thought moſt méet in this ſeruice. Howbeit it was not long before, that certeine gentlemen and yeomen of good countenance and credit both in Deuon and Cornewall were conſented, not onelie to be aſſociats of this rebellion: but alſo to carrie the croſſe before this proceſſion, and to be capteins and guiders of this wicked enterpriſe, as namelie in Deuon ſir Thomas Pomeroie knight, Iohn Burie and one Coffin gentlemen: & in Cornewall Humfrie Arundell and Winneſlade eſquiers, & Holmes a yeoman, with ſundrie others, who for the moſt part were in the end executed and put to death: and their facts to the memoriall of their perpetuall infamie recorded in chronicles.

The principall & chiefe capteins in Deuon being fullie reſolued by their owne power and authoritie to mainteine & continue the religion, according to the Romiſh church, & vtterlie to impugne the reformatiſion therof, eſtabliſhed by act of parlement; & to ſupport the authoritie of the idoll of Rome (whome they neuer ſaw) in contempt of their true and lawfull king, whome they knew and ought to obeie: theſe I ſaie ſent their meſſengers vnto the maior of this citie, whoſe name was Iohn Blackaller, to mooue and praie him to ioine with them, they thinking that they hauing by theſe meanes the libertie to haue frée acceſſe to and from the citie, and the helpe of the citizens, ſhould not want monie or armor, or anie thing elſe to ſerue their turne: the maior forthwith aduertiſed vnto his brethren this motion. And albeit ſome and the chiefeſt of them did like & were well affected to the Romiſh religion: yet reſpecting their dutie to God, their obedience to the king, their fidelitie to their countrie, and ſafetie of themſelues, gaue their full reſolute and direct anſwer, that they would not ioine nor deale with them at all.

The rebels ſend to the maior of the citie to ioine with them.

The maior & citizens refuſe to ioine or to deale with the rebels.

This anſwer was nothing liked, and therefore ſent they their ſecond meſſenger, requiring and commanding them to mainteine the old catholike religion with them, and to doo as they did; or elſe they would beſiege them, and perforce compell them therevnto. The maior and his brethren returned their former anſwer, adding moreouer that they in their doings were wicked & bad men; & they did & would repute them for enimies and rebels againſt God, their king, and countrie: and ſo renounced them. The one ſide therefore as they prepare to beſiege the citie, and to worke all the extremities they can, by force to take that which by words they can not obteine: ſo on the other ſide the maior and his brethren vpon good aduiſe, garded and watched the citie with ſufficient men, armed both by daie and by night. The rebels (according to their determination) relieng themſelues vpon a vaine hope, thinking that notwithſtanding the anſwer before made; yet becauſe the moſt part of the citizens were of their opinions, and of the like affections in religion, would not reſiſt them: as alſo that they had manie friends within the citie, more readie to ioine with them, than to follow the maior, if they might haue the choiſe what to doo: they came being in number about two thouſand perſons, to the citie, vpon the ſecond of Iulie 1549, firſt making proclamation that if the citie would not yéeld, and ioine with them, they would enter with force and take the ſpoile of it, & ſo then they vpon the deniall compaſſed the ſame round about, and gained vnto them at the firſt all the ſuburbs.

Preparation is made on both ſides to withſtand the one the other.

The citie of Exon beſieged.

And hereof they conceiued ſuch a vaine hope to haue their full deſire vpon the citie, that not onelie the number in hope did dailie more & more increaſe, but alſo manie of them brought their wiues, horſſes, and paniers; perſuading themſelues, and promiſing them, by ſuch a daie and vpon ſuch a daie to enter into the citie, and then to meaſure veluets and ſilks by the bow, and to lade their horſſes home with plate, monie, and other great riches. The maior and his brethren forecaſting the perils which might in ſuch a caſe inſue, doo prouide all things neceſſarie and méet therewith to defend themſelues, and to annoie the enimie. The citie therefore is viewed for armor, men are muſtered, ſoldiers are reteined, capteins in euerie ward appointed, warders for the daie and watchmen for the night aſſigned, great péeces of ordinance laid in euerie gate, and placed in all conuenient places of the wals; mounts in ſundrie places erected, as well for laieng of ordinance, as for ſauing of the ſoldiers & watchmen from the enimies ſhot: and nothing was left vndoone, which in anie reſpect that preſent ſtate and neceſſitie required.

The vaine perſuaſions of the rebels to haue the ſpoile of the citie.

The citie is viewed for armor and all things are prepared for defenſe of the citie.

The rebels likewiſe intrench the high waies, plaſh downe trées, breake downe bridges, kéepe watches and wards in euerie place; ſo that no man could paſſe to or from the citie without their ſufferance. The markets are ſtopped, vittels are kept from it, and all dealings and intercourſes ſhut and cut off: and hauing (as they bragged) penned and ſhut vp the towneſmen in a coope or mew, they plant their ordinance againſt euerie gate, and in all other ſuch places as beſt to ſerue their turne, and to hurt them within: they burnt the gates, they brake vp the pipes and conduits, aſwell for the taking awaie of the water comming to the citie, as alſo to haue the led to ſerue for their ſhot and pellets. But for the burning of the gates, there followed rather a benefit than a hurt thereof: for forthwith there were made certeine rampiers within the gate, which were farre ſtronger and of more defenſe than the gates, as alſo there were fiers continuallie kept euerie night betwéene the rampiers and the gates: and as for water, the citie ſo ſtandeth vpon a little hill, that it is full of ſprings in euerie quarter within the ſame, and by that means full and plentifull of euerie good and ſwéet waters. Alſo they in ſundrie places did vndermine the wals, minding thereby with gunpowder and with other matters fit for fier to haue blowne vp the wals, and ſo to haue entered in that waie: but herein they were alſo preuented by this means and in this maner.

The rebels ſtop vp all the waies comming to the citie.

The rebels plant their ordinance againſt the citie & breake vp the conduit pipes, and burne one of the gates.

The gates of the citie were kept open continuallie and rampired within ſide, as alſo fiers kept burning all night in the ſame.

The citie being full of water ſprings they want no water.

The citie it ſelfe (as is before ſaid) is ſet vpon a little hill, and lieth verie ſtéeping towards two of the gates. And at one of theſe named the weſt gate, the ſaid rebels had vndermined on the one ſide, and filled the place with certeine barels of powder, pitch, and other ſtuffe, méet and apt to receiue fier, and had appointed the night when the ſame ſhould be ſet on fier, and ſo to haue blowne the wals vp. At the ſame time there was a certeine tinner in the citie, whoſe dwelling was at Teingemouth, named Iohn Newcombe, who depended much vpon the goodwill and fréendſhip of maiſter William Hurſt one of the aldermen of the citie; and he vnderſtanding of ſuch an vndermining to be in working, aduertiſed the ſame to maiſter Hurſt, and maketh him priuie how he would preuent the ſame, which was doone in this maner. For whereas he by a noiſe vnder the ground did ſuſpect the vndermining to be in working, he tooke a pan of water, & did put the ſame on the ground, & by ſhaking of the water in the pan, he by remoouing the pan from place to place, came at length to the verie place, whereas the miners were working, and forthwith he countermined againſt the ſame, and wrought ſo néere vnto it, vntill that he might and did ſée & looke into it. That doone, he cauſed all the wals and tirpits in the citie towards euerie ſtréet, hauing a fall that waie to be drawne at one time, and euerie man to fill therewith a great tub of water at his foredoore; which being doone, he cauſed them all at one inſtant to be caſt out and emptied, which water running in great abundance towards the ſaid weſt gate, was conueied into the place countermined, & ſo entered and drowned the place, which before was mined:

The citie wals at the weſt gate were vndermined, but by countermining the ſame was preuented.

The vnderminings of the wals how it was found and deſtroied.

mined: at which time alſo by the goodneſſe of God, there fell a great ſhowre, as the like for the time had not beene ſeene manie years before, and which at that inſtant greatlie ſerued this turne.

A prettie ſtratagem of the rebels.

The citie gates kept alwaies open.

The ſuburbs burned and the houſes beaten downe.

The citie diuided within it ſelfe into two factions of religion.

The rebels perceiuing themſelues diſappointed of their purpoſe, gaue ouer to deale anie further in thoſe attempts: howbeit otherwiſe they left nothing vndone which might be to annoie the citizens. For ſometimes they made alarums, as though they with all might and maine would haue giuen the ſcale: and indeed they had prouided ladders for the ſame purpoſe. Sometimes they by policies would ſeeke to come to the gates to burne them, and herein they vſed this ſtratagem. They prouided carts laden with old haie, & driuing the wheeles before them would come to the gate without danger, and ſo ſet fier in the gate. But notwithſtanding they eſcaped not ſcotfree, for both at the weſt gate and at the ſouthgate, their commings being perceiued, the great port peeces were charged with great bags of flintſtones and haileſhot: and as they were approching vnto the gates, the gates were ſecretlie opened, and the ſaid port peeces diſcharged, and ſo they were ſpoiled diuerſe of them, & by that means they had ſmall pleaſure to follow thoſe deuiſes; as alſo the citizens to preuent the ſame, did from thenſefoorth keepe the gates open. Likewiſe they would keepe themſelues cloſe in ſundrie houſes, in the ſuburbs neere the wals, and would ſo watch the garrets, that if anie within the citie would looke out at the garrets, was in the danger of their ſhot, and ſome thereby were killed, and manie hurt. Vpon which occaſion the citizens ſet ſome part of the ſuburbs on fier, and ſome part which was next to the wals they beat and brake downe, and ſo draue the rebels out of thoſe holes. Beſides this, they had in ſundrie places their great ordinance, ſo ſet and placed, that in certeine ſtreets and places none could go but in perill and danger of their ſhot, which their deuiſes were choked, by making of certeine mounts to ſhadowe the ſtreets from the ſame. Diuerſe other deuiſes they practiſed to the continuall annoiance of the citie, which though they were greeuous and dangerous, yet not to be compared vnto the perils which were within the walles among themſelues, and whereof had inſued the confuſion of the whole citie, had not the Lord God of his goodneſſe kept and preſerued the ſame. For the ſerpent of diuiſion, and the fier of malice, was entered into the citie, manie being inuenomed with the one, but more ſcaulded with the other.

The affection and diſpoſition of the Romiſh faction.

In the citie there were two ſorts of people, the one and the greater number were of the old ſtampe, and of the Romiſh religion. The other being of the leſſer number were of a contrarie mind and diſpoſition, for they wholie relied themſelues to the reformed religion, and to the kings proceedings, and indeuoured themſelues to obeie and follow the ſame. The firſt were ſo addicted to their owne fantaſies, and their bottels were ſo farre ſeaſoned with the old wines, that they cannot abide to heare of anie other religion, than as they were firſt nuzled in. Wherfore to keepe and obſerue that, was their onelie endeuor, and in reſpect whereof they regarded not king nor Keiſar, paſſed not for kin nor freendſhip, regarded not countrie nor commonwealth, but were wholie of the opinion of the rebels, and would haue no reformation in religion; and how ſo euer all other things fared, that muſt needs remaine as in times paſt had beene vſed.

The diſcretion and great circumſpection of the magiſtrates.

The ſecret conferences of the papiſts.

The magiſtrates and cheefeteins of the citie, albeit they were not as yet fullie reſolued and ſatiſfied in religion, yet they not reſpecting that, but cheefelie their dutifulneſſe to the king and commonwealth, nothing like the rebellion, nor beare with the ſame, but they doo all things to defend the citie and themſelues againſt their rebellious attempts, and likewiſe doo their beſt indeuour to keepe their owne citizens in peace and quietneſſe. Wherevpon the fauourers of the old Romiſh religion, being inwardlie greeued, that they could not haue their will, nor obteine to haue the gates to be opened, that thoſe good and religious men (as they termed them) might come in, they vſed priuat conferences with them, ſometimes by ſecret conferences ouer the wals, ſomtimes by priuat letters priuilie conueied too and fro, by meſſengers lurking and attending for the ſame, ſometimes by open ſpeeches in times of truce, and manie times by bils and letters bound faſt about arrowes, and ſo ſhot to and fro: and by theſe and other ſuch like means they diſcouered ech one to the other their purpoſes and wicked deuiſes and practiſes: all which tended to this effect, to betraie the citie, and to ſet vp the religion.

A fond enterpriſe of an expert citizen.

Howbeit, theſe things were not ſo ſecretlie doone, but the ſame were knowne, & manifeſt arguments and proofes thereof did appeare. And among ſundrie ſome one of them being one of good credit and countenance, and of the number of the common councell, whoſe name was John Wolcot a merchant, was ſo farre inchanted herein, that vpon a certeine daie he being (as his courſe came about) a capteine for the daie, and to ward one of the gates that daie, preſuming that partlie by reaſon of his charge that daie, and partlie for that he was one of the common councell, he might doo more than in deed did apperteine to him, he vpon his firſt comming to the weſt gate in the morning met with certeine of his confederats, and after conference had with them, went ſuddenlie out at the wicket of the gate (which gate as then was not rampired) and carrieng the keies with him, went vnto the rebels, and had a long conference with them. But it tooke ſmall effect, for he promiſed (as it after appeared) more than he could performe, which turned to his great diſcredit: both for that he himſelfe verie hardlie eſcaped their hands who were bent to haue kept and reteined him, as they did the two others, who went out with him: as alſo when he came in, was both checked and blamed for his doings.

This Tailor died after in priſon for debt.

What man purpoſeth God diſpoſeth.

A wicked practiſe to receiue the rebels into the caſtell.

At an other time the maior vpon an occaſion aſſembled all the commoners vnto the Guildhall, euerie man being in his armor, and the papiſts bein then the greater number, ſome one of them named Richard Tailor a clothier, thinking by making of a tumult or an vprore they ſhould be too hard for the others, and ſo atteine to their purpoſes, hauing his bowe bent, did nocke his arrow, minding to haue ſtriken the man to whom he leuelled the ſhot: but gaging his hand, and miſſing his marke, he ſtroke his owne and beſt freend John Peter the kings cuſtomer, a gentleman of good countenance and credit, who had died thereof, had not the arrow lighted vpon one of his rib bones: a great muttering was like to haue bred a tumult, but the matter knowne it was appeaſed. Alſo at an other time there was a practiſe made with the ſouldiers, who had the charge and cuſtodie of the caſtell, that they ſhould receiue in at the poſterne of the ſaid caſtell, a certeine number of the rebels; wherevnto the ſaid ſouldiers through corruption had giuen their conſent. The daie and time were appointed for the ſame: but whether the ſame by ſecret aduertiſement were diſcouered, or whether the matter were miſtruſted, or whether it pleaſed God to moue the harts of certeine men to take the view of the caſtell, & of the maner of the ſouldiers vſages there: it is moſt certeine that by the repaire & reſort of certeine men, vnder the colour to walke and ſee the trecherie, it was eſpied, and the practiſes diſcouered, red, and their whole deuiſes preuented. Likewiſe manie times and often there were truces made, and ſundrie parlees and conferences had with the rebels, which were procured to the onlie end that they might compaſſe their deuiſes. And this was a common practiſe with them, that when ſoeuer the parlee was appointed, there ſhould be hoſtages or pledges put in on both parties: and they as men vpon whom the greateſt weight of the matter did depend, would require to haue the beſt and moſt choſen citizens, to be hoſtages with them, in ſteed and for the ſafetie of thoſe which they would ſend to the parlee for them, who for the moſt part were the reffuſe, the ſcumme, and the raſcals of the whole countrie, and yet ſuch they were in this caſe, as who ruled the roſt and bore the whole or chiefeſt ſwaie; and the worſſe the man, the greater his authoritie among them, which was good inough for ſo wicked a matter taken in hand, according as the common adage is; Dignum patella operculum, Like lips like lettice.

The chiefeſt rulers & capteins among the commons were the worſt men.

But during the time of theſe truces and parlees, there being then a time and ſcope of libertie to talke and conferre with them euerie man at his pleaſure, there wanted no deuiſes vnder colour of freendlie conferences, to deuiſe how to compaſſe their intents: howbeit it pleaſed the eternall God, ſo to carrie and rule the hearts of the magiſtrats, that albeit being nuzled in the Romiſh religion they were affected therevnto, yet they ſo much reſpected their dutie to their prince, and the ſafetie to their commonwealth, that they openlie profeſſed they would neuer yeeld the citie ſo long as they liued, and were able to keepe and defend the ſame.

Great practiſe vſed to procure the citizens to ioine with the rebels.

For the maior himſelfe maiſter William Hurſt, maiſter Iohn Buller, maiſter Iohn Britnall, maiſter William Periam, & others of the ancienteſt of the citie, were by ſundrie means, waies, deuiſes, and reaſons, perſuaded to conioine themſelues in this rebellion with the commoners. They all with one mind and one voice gaue a flat anſwer that in the citie they had beene brought vp, there they had gotten their liuings, there they had ſworne their fidelitie and allegiance to their king and prince, there they had faithfullie hitherto ſerued him, and there would ſo continue ſo long as they could to the vttermoſt of their powers, all which their promiſes & auowries (the Lord be praiſed) they performed.

The faithfull and flat determination of the citizens to refuſe the cõioining with the rebels.

But to the matter. Sundrie other trecheries & deuiſes were practiſed, which particularlie to recite were verie tedious & to no purpoſe. The laſt but the moſt perillous practiſe was this. When theſe malecontents ſaw themſelues to be preuented in all their deuiſes, which before they had but ſecretlie and priuatlie practiſed, now they conioining themſelues togither doo openlie ſhew and declare themſelues, being perſuaded that bicauſe they were the greater number, and that alſo the moſt part of the poore people were wearie, and for want of vittels would not indure to be pinned in anie longer, that therefore manie would ioine againſt a few, and that the game would go on their ſide.

The laſt and perilous practiſe of the rebels.

And ſo on a ſundaie, being but two dais before the deliuerie of the citie, about eight of the clocke in the forenoone, a companie of them in euerie quarter of the citie, hauing their conſorts in a readines to ioine & ſerue with them (if need ſo required) get into the ſtreets, walking with their weapons and in their armour, as to fight with their enimies, and crie out;
“ Come out theſe heretikes and twopenie bookemen;
“ Where be they? By Gods wounds & bloud we will “ not be pinned in to ſerue their turne; We will go out
“ and haue in our neighbors, they be honeſt, good, and “ godlie men. Their pretenſe and meaning being then, that if anie of the contrarie ſide had come out, they would haue quarelled with them, and haue taken occaſion to ſet vpon him and ſo raiſe a new tumult.

A peſtilent practiſe.

But by the prouidence and goodneſſe of God it ſo fell out, that ſome being in their houſes, and ſome at their pariſh churches, the maior and magiſtrates were firſt aduertiſed herof, before the others heard anie thing of the matter: and they according to their wiſedoms pacified the matter, and ſent Iohn Vincent, Iohn Sharke, and others the bellwedders of this flocke vnto their houſes. Howbeit in the ſouth gate ſtreet and at the ſouth gate, there was a little ſtur, which being ſoone ſtopped there inſued no hurt therof, other than a broken pate or two: for as it fell out, the warders of that gate at that time were againſt them and of the greater companie. Theſe and manie other like practiſes were dailie and continuallie vſed on the one ſide, which in the end came to no effect, bicauſe the Lord kept the citie.

The papiſts were diſappointed of their purpoſes.

The others on the other ſide being altogither bent to honor God, obeie the king, and to ſerue in their commonwealth, were fullie reſolued to keepe and defend the citie, whoſe cauſe being iuſt and good, was ſufficient of it ſelfe to keepe them in that mind: and yet their courage was the more, for that they ſaw the good bent of the maior and magiſtrates; who, howſoeuer they were affected otherwiſe in religion, yet they were wholie bent and determined to keepe and defend the citie: and therefore they ſeeing the induſtrie, carefulneſſe, ſeruice and painefulneſſe, of theſe men, doo fauour, incourage, and countenance them, and (to ſaie the truth) by the induſtrie and good ſeruice of them, the citie was cheeflie kept and preſerued.

The determination of the honeſt & good citizens.

For there was no ſeruice to be doone within, nor exploit to be aduentured without vpon the enimie (as manie times there were ſallies giuen) but theſe were the chiefeſt and commonlie the onelie dooers: for which cauſe the contrarie ſide maruelouſlie maligned at them, and ſought by all means how to impeach and indanger them. Which thing being dailie perceiued more and more by ſundrie arguments, and as wiſe men ſeeking how to preuent the ſame, did manie and ſundrie times confer among themſelues herein, and in the end made a couenant and a faithfull promiſe among themſelues (being then about the number of one hundred perſons) that they would ſtand firmelie and faithfullie to the defenſe and keeping of the citie to their vttermoſt powers.

The beſt citizens confederated.

And if it ſo fell out, that the rebell and enimie ſhould haue acceſſe and entrie into the citie, that then they ſhould all meet at the lord Ruſſels (now the earle of Bedfords) houſe, and there to iſſue out at the poſterne of the garden, and to giue the aduenture to paſſe and to eſcape awaie, as alſo if they were reſiſted that then they to ſtand togither to their defenſe. And for this purpoſe they had then named ſome one man to be their capteine for this enterpriſe. And in the meane time, to doo all things circumſpectlie for the preſeruation of the citie, & by a particular couenant among themſelues, did take order, that during the whole beſeeging of the citie and their aboad therein, a certeine number by courſe and beſides the ordinarie ſet watch, ſhould watch, ward, and walke about continuallie both by daie and night, by which means no ſleight nor treacherie could be practiſed, but that they ſhould haue an inkeling and vnderſtanding thereof, and which in deed ſtood and came to ſuch effect that it was the chiefeſt (if not the onelie) cauſe of the preſeruation of the citie for that time. For there was no ſeruice, no diligence, no care, nor anie thing wanting or left vndoone, which by theſe men was not doone.

The carefulneſſe of the good citizens.

Howbeit the diuell, the author of all diuiſion and ſtrife, who cannot abide anie vnitie, concord and agreement in good cauſes, did here alſo hurle in a bone among theſe men, whereof had inſued a great detriment to the common ſtate, and an ouerthrow to themſelues, had it not in due time beene preuented. There were two gentlemen within this citie, and both of this companie, the one was borne of a honorable houſe and parentage, named John Courtneie a yonger ſonne to ſir William Courtneie of Porederham knight, and a man of verie good knowledge and experience in ſeruice. The other alſo was a man of verie good ſeruice, practiſe, and experience, his name was Barnard Duffeld, & ſeruant to the lord Ruſſell, and keeper of his houſe in Exceſter. Both of theſe were verie forward and carefull in this preſent ſeruice againſt the rebels. But there fell an emulation betweene them, which albeit it be verie commendable in good things, & he praiſeworthie who can beſt excell therein: yet when the ſame ſhall tend to a diuiſion of a publike ſtate, the diſſolution of a commonwealth, the breach of common ſocietie, or the maintenance of anie euill, it is vtterlie to be ſhunned and lamented.

A variance betweene John Courtneie & Barnard Duffeld.

It happened vpon an occaſion offered, that certeine of this companie vpon a time iſſued out at the forſaid poſterne and made a ſallie vpon the enimies, and had ſuch good ſucceſſe, that ſome of them they ſlue, ſome they tooke priſoners, as alſo ſpoiled them of their goods, and brought awaie with them ſome of their ordinance, namelie baſſes and ſlings: howbeit they all ſcaped not ſcotfree, for ſome of them were taken, ſome alſo were hurt, as namelie John Drake, who the yeare before was the receiuer of the citie was ſhot through the cheekes with an arrow, which he brought into the citie with him, and one John Simons a cooke was ſo hurt that he died thereof.

A ſallie made vpon the rebels.

But among them all one John Goldſmith being of that companie and ſeruant to Richard Helierd of the ſame goldſmith, and a Fleming borne, had the beſt ſucceſſe: for in the ſame ſkirmiſh he was taken priſoner by one of the rebels, who offered in taking of him with his bill to haue ſlaine him. With that this John Goldſmith fell downe & yeelded himſelfe, hauing then in his hand his peece or handgun charged, & ſuddenlie the other not miſtruſting nor marking the ſame, he diſcharged into his verie bellie and ſo ſlue him, tooke the ſpoile of him, and brought the ſame into the citie with him.

This ſkirmiſh though it were not cleere gaines to this companie, yet it ſo incouraged them, that from time to time they conſulted, and in the end determined to make a freſh ſallie and to giue a new aduenture: wherevpon there fell and grew a diſagreement betweene the two foreſaid John Courtneie & Barnard Duffeld, the one affirming that the ſame was not to be permitted in anie fort or citie, which ſtood vpon defenſe or gard, without a verie ſpeciall order of the generall or cheefe capteine, or ſome vrgent neceſſitie, eſpeciallie in that preſent diſtreſſe and extremitie, wherein the citie as then did ſtand. But Barnard Duffeld being verie loth to looſe anie part of his credit, or to deſiſt from that he with others had determined, could by no meanes be perſuaded to the contrarie, but plainelie affirmeth that what he had determined ſhould be performed.

Wherevpon the foreſaid John Courtneie reſorteth to the maior, aduertiſeth vnto him the matter, & dealeth ſo fullie and with ſuch perſuaſions with him, that the maior aſſembleth his brethren, and ſendeth for the foreſaid Duffeld: who being come, the matter was at full debated and diſcourſed, and in the end concluded that it was verie hurtfull and dangerous to that preſent ſtate, that anie ſuch iſſuing out ſhould be granted or permitted: and therefore praied the ſaid Duffeld to ſtaie his determination, and to be contented. But he being vnpatient, & thinking his credit to be ſtained, if he ſhould be debarred or denied to doo that which he had faithfullie promiſed, did vtterlie refuſe to yeeld to this the maiors requeſt, as alſo by continuing of talkes, fell out in foule and diſordered ſpeaches. Wherevpon to auoid a further inconuenience, he was commanded to ward. The daughter of this Duffeld, whoſe name was Francis, hearing that hir father was in ward, and taking in greefe that ſo great an iniurie (as ſhe tearmed it) ſhould be doone to hir father, came more haſtilie than aduiſedlie vnto the maior, ſomewhat late in the euening, & required to haue hir father out of the ward. Which thing being denied vnto hir, ſhee wared ſo warme, that not onelie ſhe vſed verie vnſeemelie tearmes and ſpeaches vnto the maior, but alſo contrarie to the modeſtie and ſhamefaſtnes required in a woman, ſpeciallie yoong and vnmarried, ran moſt violentlie vpon him, and ſtrake him in the face. This was taken in ſo euill a part, and fearing that it had beene a ſet match of ſome further inconueniences, the common bell was foorthwith roong out: and alſo a rumour ſpread that the maior was beaten, or killed.

A broile towards.

Francis the daughter of Barnard Duffeld ſtrake the maior in the face.

The whole commons immediatlie in great troops, & the moſt part in armor, ran to the Guildhall, where the maior was, who though he was ſafe, yet were they ſo greeued with this iniurie, that they would in all haſt haue run to the lord Ruſſels houſe, where ſhe was then gone, and haue fetched hir out: but the maior forecaſting what inconueniences might inſue, and reſpecting the neceſſitie of the preſent ſtate, was not onlie contented patientlie to wrap vp theſe iniuries, but alſo earneſtlie requeſted the commoners to doo the like: who being ſo pacified, he went home, and they conducted him into his owne doores. The chanons of the cathedrall church which at that time were reſident in their houſes within the cloſe there, namelie archdeacon Pollard, treaſuror Southron, chancellor Luſon, and maſter Holwell, with others of the ſaid church, who ioined with the maior and citizens in this ſeruice for the ſafegard of the citie, and did keepe both watches and wards, and their men readie at all times to ſerue in euerie alarum and ſkirmiſh: they at the hearing of this diſordered part were verie much greeued therewith, and they likewiſe forthwith aſſembled all their men, and being well armed and appointed, they went to the maior, who was then gone home to his houſe, and then and there verie friendlie did comfort him, and offred to ſtand by him and to aſſiſt him in all the beſt ſeruice they were able to doo for his defenſe, and ſafetie of the citie.

The ſaid archdeacon offered, that in proper perſon he would herein ſtand in his behalfe againſt all perſons whatſoeuer, that would attempt or offer to doo him anie wrong. And in the end, after ſundrie friendlie and good ſpeaches, they departed to their homes. And the ſaid archdeacon, euerie daie after, would either come or ſend to the maior. This maior being a merchant, and onelie exerciſed in that trade, had ſmall reach in matters of policie or martiall affaires: he was maior of the citie three times, and in euerie yeare there grew ſome troubles in the citie, but he had ſuch a ſpeciall care & regard to his charge and gouernment, that he would neuer attempt nor doo anie thing therein, but by the aduiſe and counſell of wiſe, graue, and expert men: and God ſo bleſſed him that he proſpered and had good ſucceſſe in all his doings.

Beſides theſe and ſundrie other former perils, the which the citie manie and oftentimes ſtood in, and by the goodnes and prouidence of God ſtill ouercomed, there befell and happened a third one, which exceeded all the reſt, and whereof the greateſt danger and perill was feared: and this was famine, or penurie, which of all other turmoils and perils is moſt dangerous, & no other plague to be compared to it. For no force is feared, no lawes obſerued, no magiſtrate obeied, nor common ſocietie eſtéemed, where famine ruleth. For as the poet ſaith: Neſcit plebs ieiuna timere. The ſtore of vittels within the citie, for want of prouiſion in due time, and by reaſon of the reſtreint of the markets, vpon a ſudden was verie ſlender and ſmall, and the ſame in verie ſhort time ſpent and conſumed. And albeit there were good ſtore of drie fiſh, riſe, prunes, raſins, and wine, at verie reaſonable prices, yet bread which as the prophet ſaith, Confirmat cor hominis, Strengtheneth mans hart, that wanted: neither was anie to be had. And in this extremitie the bakers and houſholders were driuen to ſéeke vp their old ſtore of puffins and bran, wherewith they in times paſt were wont to make horſſebread, and to féed their ſwine and poultrie, and this they moulded vp in clothes, for otherwiſe it would not hold togither, and ſo did bake it vp, and the people well contented therewith. For (as Plutarch writeth) Fames reddit omnia dulcia, nihilq; contemnit eſuriens: Hunger maketh all things ſwéet, and the hungrie bellie ſhunneth nothing.

Vittels wax ſcant within the citie.

Bread made of bran and of puffins.

But when this alſo was ſpent, and nothing now left, and the common people being not acquainted with ſo hard a diet as famine preſcribeth, were verie vnpatient to indure the continuall barking of their hungrie bellies, and therefore they were verie ſoone & eaſie to be perſuaded, or rather of themſelues contented to yéeld vnto the enimie, to be fed for a time with the ſtollen fat of his fleſh pot, than to abide for a ſhort time a little penurie in hope of a deliuerie, and then to be filled with ſaturitie and plentie. But the magiſtrats and graue ſenators, who in all other cauſes had ſhewed themſelues wiſe, carefull and diſcreet; and who hauing receiued ſundrie iniuries, did yet without rigour, reuenge or malice, wrap the ſame vp, reſpecting rather the common ſtate than their owne priuat cauſe; ſo in this matter alſo being of a great importance doo verie wiſelie & politikelie deale with the ſaid people: who the poorer they were, the better they were conſidered, and the more carefullie prouided for. Firſt, there was a generall collection ſet and rated throughout the whole citie for their reliefe, and therby they were liberallie euerie wéeke conſidered: which thing being ſome increaſe to their ſtocke and ſtore, was the better to their content. Then all ſuch vittels as were to be had within the citie, they either had it fréelie, or for a verie ſmall price.

The godlie and politike dealings of the magiſtrates with the poore.

The poore are wéekelie liberallie relieued.

All vittels fetched into the citie were diſtributed among the poore.

Beſides this, manie times when anie cattell came néere vnto the walles of the citie, ſome ſhift was made to haue them, or by ſkirmiſhing & iſſuing out for them, or by ſome other means. And this alſo what ſo euer it was, was altogither diuided among them. And as for the priſoners faſt fettered in the gaols, they had alſo their portions, as farre as it would ſtretch: notwithſtanding in the end, for want they were fed with horſſefleſh, which they liked and were well contented withall. For as the prouerbe is, Hunger findeth no faults but all things are ſwéet. Beſides, if anie wrong were offered or iniurie doone to anie of them, it was forthwith vpon complaint redreſſed: but if anie of them did diſorder themſelues, it was borne withall, and they in all gentle and curteous meanes intreated: as alſo from time to time perſuaded with good words patientlie to abide and be contented: not miſtruſting but that God ſhortlie would ſend a deliuerance.

The priſoners in the gaole did and were driuen to eate horſſes.

The gentle intreating of the poorer ſort.

And thus, and by theſe means, in hope almoſt againſt hope, they continued dutifull and obedient, from the ſecond daie of Iulie 1549, vntill the ſixt daie of Auguſt then folowing, the ſame being fiue whole wéekes, vpon which daie they were deliuered by the comming and entrie into the citie of the lord Ruſſell: and which daie in memoriall for euer to endure is kept for a high and holie feaſt amongſt the citizens yearelie vpon the ſixt daie of Auguſt. Immediatlie vpon which deliuerance of the citie, the firſt care that euerie man had, was to ſhift and to make prouiſion for vittels, whereof ſome hungrie bellies were ſo gréedie, that ouercharging their emptie ſtomachs too haſtilie, they died therewith.

The lord Ruſſell after that the citie had béene beſieged fiue wéekes turneth to this citie vpon the ſixt of Auguſt, and deliuereth the ſame.

Thus hauing declared ſomething of the ſtate of the citie, and of the doings therein during the time of this rebellion, though much more might be therein ſaid, let vs now returne to the lord priuie ſeale, who after the departure of ſir Peter Carew to the court, remooued from George Henneton, and came to Honiton, minding from thence to haue paſſed vnto Excester, if waie had béene open. But being aduertiſed that the citie was beſieged, and that all the waies leading thitherwards were ſtopped, he remained ſtill in Honiton. Sir Peter Carew in the meane time, according to the former order betwéene them taken, was ridden to London, and being before the king, declareth the whole matter at large. Which the king, not liking the diſloialtie of his people, promiſed to ſéeke a ſpéedie remedie: and ſo commanded him to the councell for the ſame: and being before them, and hauing at full diſcourſed the ſtate of the matter, the duke of Summerſet being much gréeued with the matter, would haue reiected the whole on ſir Peter, charging him that by reaſon he had cauſed the houſes to be burned at Crediton, it was the onelie cauſe of the commotion. But thereunto he anſwered the neceſſitie of that ſeruice, as alſo declared that he had doone nothing but by a good warrant, and therewith ſhewed forth the kings letters vnder his hand and priuie ſignet.

Sir Peter Carew aduertiſeth the king & councel of the rebelliõ.

The duke of Summerſet charged ſir Peter Carew of the rebelliõ.

The lord Rich then lord chancellor replied and ſaid, that the kings letters were no ſufficient warrant, vnleſſe he had his commiſſion vnder the brode ſeale: and therefore if he had right, he ſhould by the lawes be hanged for his doings. But to this ſir Peter anſwered ſo ſtoutlie, and charged the duke ſo déepelie, that in the end he was willed to returne into the countrie, being promiſed that ſufficient helpe both of men & monie ſhould be with ſpéed ſent downe into the countrie. And to this effect he had both the kings and the councels letters vnto the lord priuie ſeale, and ſo tooke his iournie backe againe into the countrie, and deliuered his letters to the ſaid lord Ruſſell, who in hope of the ſupplie promiſed, ſtaied and remained ſomtimes at Mohoneſotre, but moſt commonlie at Honiton, ſtill looking for that ſupplie and furniture that was promiſed. But hauing long looked for the ſame in vaine, he was dailie more and more forſaken of ſuch of the common people, as who at the firſt ſerued and offered their ſeruice vnto him. And hauing but a verie ſmall gard about him, he liued in more feare than he was feared: for the rebels dailie increaſed, and his companie decreaſed and ſhrunke awaie, and he not altogither aſſured of them which remained.

The king his letters vnder his priuie ſignet counted to be no ſufficiẽt warrant.

The ſtout anſwer of ſir Peter Carew

Sir Peter Carew being promiſed of helpe returneth home.

The lord Ruſſell is almoſt left forſaken.

Wherefore diſtruſting himſelfe, & by a falſe rumor being aduertiſed that the citie was taken, & in the poſſeſſion of the rebels; as alſo how that there was a new ſturre or rebellion begun about Sariſburie; he tooke aduiſe and counſell of the gentlemen and ſuch as were with him what were beſt to be doone. The gentlemen of Dorſetſhire were of the mind, and gaue him aduiſe, that it were beſt for him to returne into Dorſetſhire, and there to remaine for a time; becauſe it was a place of a more ſafetie, vntill ſuch time as he were better prouided. And accordinglie the next daie following he tooke his iournie, & rode backe againe with the ſaid Dorſetſhire gentlemen.

Sir

The lord Ruſſell diſtruſting himſelfe, is vpon his departure from out of Deuon; but by ſir Peter Carew is recouered backe againe.

Sir Peter Carew then being at Mohoroſoton, and aduertiſed hereof, tooke his horſſe and came againſt the ſaid lord Ruſſell, & met him vpon Blacke downe, where was a long conference betweene them both: and in the end he ſo perſuaded the lord, and with ſuch pithie reaſons he caried him, that leauing his former determination, he doth returne againe into Honiton; & where he continued thenceforth, ſauing one night ſpent at Oterie ſaint Marie, where as it fell out he was in more feare than perill. At his being in Honiton, and dailie waiting and looking for the promiſed helpe and ſupplie which came not; he was in an agonie, & of a heauie cheere: not onelie for the want of the men & monie which he had long in vaine looked for, but alſo becauſe he had ſpent all that he had brought with him, and could not tell how otherwiſe to helpe and prouide to ſupplie his preſent need: but as it fell out all happened for the beſt.

The merchants of Exon procure and borow monie to helpe the lord Ruſſell.

For it chanced that there were then three merchants of the citie, following and attending vpon him; Thomas Preſtwood not long before maior of the citie, John Bodlie, and John Periam, men of great wealth. Theſe men vnderſtanding of the heauineſſe and griefe of his lordſhip, make their reſort vnto him, and promiſe to helpe and relieue his agonie and want: and forthwith did procure vpon their credit from the merchants of Briſtow, Linne, Tawnton, and elſewhere, ſuch a maſſe of monie, as which when he had receiued, his griefe was eaſed. For forthwith he ſo prouided and furniſhed himſelfe with ſuch neceſſaries, and with a greater number of men; that he was now in the better ſafetie, as alſo the better able to incounter with the enimie: and it was not long after, but that he had a further ſupplie from the king, euen to his content. And being now ſomewhat reuiued, newes was brought vnto him, that the rebels vnderſtanding of his diſtreſſed ſtate, were comming, and marching toward Honiton to aſſaile him; and were come as far as Fenington bridge, which is about three miles. Wherevpon, he tooke aduiſe with ſir Peter Carew, ſir Gawen Carew & others what were beſt to be done. And in the end, after manie ſpeeches, it was concluded that they ſhould march towards them, and giue the onſet vpon them, & accordinglie, without further delaies or much talke, it was doone out of hand. For vpon the next morning being a holie daie, they ſet forth, and came to the bridge aforeſaid, where the rebels were indeed: ſome at the bridge, but the greateſt companie in a medow beneath the bridge: who, as ſoone as they perceiued the lord Ruſſell and the gentlemen with all their troope to be come, they make themſelues readie to the fight. But the riuer & the bridge being betweene them, the lord Ruſſell vſeth all the policies that he can, how to recouer the bridge; which by bold aduenturing he did in the end: but with the hurt of ſundrie of his companie, amongſt whome ſir Gawen Carew was one, being hurt with an arrow in the arme.

The lord Ruſſell marcheth towards Fenington bridge.

Sir Gawen Carew is hurt at Fenington bridge.

And hauing recouered the bridge, and the riuer, all the rebels (ſuch as were eſcaped) were gathered togither in a medow neere adioining in the lower ſide of the bridge, vpon whome they ſo fiercelie followed, and gaue the onſet; that though not without good ſtore of blowes and bloudſhed, they in the end gaue the enimie the ouerthrow, and had the vpper hand. And thinking that the victorie was cleere with them, and that the enimie was cleane gone, the ſouldiers and ſeruingmen gaue themſelues all to the ſpoile; and being in the middle of their game, and they nothing thinking leſſe than of anie more enimies to be comming towards, euen ſuddenly march towards a new crue of Corniſhmen, to the number of two hundred, or two hundred and fortie perſons, vnder the conduct of one Robert Smith of ſaint Germans in Cornewall gentleman; and who taking theſe ſpoilers napping, manie of them paied deerelie for their wares. The lord Ruſſell forthwith ſetteth all his companie in good araie, as the others did the like, and gaue the onſet vpon them: betweene whome the fight for the time was verie ſharpe and cruell. For the Corniſhmen were verie luſtie and freſh, and fullie bent to fight out the matter: neuertheleſſe in the end they were ouerthrowne, and their capteine, whoſe combe was cut, ſheweth a faire paire of heeles and fled awaie. In theſe two fights, there were reported to be ſlaine about three hundred rebels, which were verie tall men, luſtie, and of great courage; and who in a good cauſe might haue doone better ſeruice.

The rebels are ouerthrowne at Fenington.

The Corniſh rebels giue an onſet, and are ouerthrowne at Fenington; their capteine flieth awaie.

The lord Ruſſels companie followed the chaſe neere three miles, & he himſelfe then throughlie minded and bent to haue paſſed through to the citie. But one Joll his foole, who was then in haſt come from Honiton, and where he had heard, as alſo by the waie as he came did heare bels ringing in ſundrie pariſh churches, and ſuppoſing the ſame to be alarum, came with a foule mouth to my lord, and cried that all the countrie behind him were vp, and comming vpon him. Which his report (conſidering the cruell fights paſt) was credited, and thought that a new companie was in preparing to follow the former quarels. Wherevpon they all retired and returned againe to Honiton; and from thenſe his lordſhip ſent his comfortable letters ſecretlie by a boy apointed and accuſtomed for the ſame, vnto the maior of his ſucceſſe, as alſo aduertiſing him of his determination that he would be ſhortlie with him for the deliuerance of the citie. Which letters (the citie being then but in a doubtfull and diſmaied eſtate) came in verie good ſeaſon; and yet in the end ſcarſelie credited by ſome men, becauſe his comming was not ſo ſpeedie as was looked for.

The lord Greie and Spinola come with a ſupplie to the lord Ruſſell.

Within verie ſhort time after this ouerthrowe was giuen, the lord Greie of Wilton with a crue of horſſemen, and one Spinola an Italian with three hundred ſhot, came to my lord; who being aduertiſed of the ouerthrow of the enimie, and that there were ſlaine about three hundred perſons of them, they were in a great chafe, and much bewailed their euill lucke, that they had not come ſooner to haue beene partakers of that ſeruice. My lord being now of a verie good comfort & courage, aſwell for the good ſucceſſe which he had ouer the enimie, & that his long looked ſupplie was come, ſendeth his other letters to the maior, comforting him, as alſo as before promiſing him to be with him verie ſhortlie; willing him that he ſhould now take but a little patience for a little time. And accordinglie about ſix daies after, on ſaturdaie the third of Auguſt, in good order he ſet forth out of Honiton, and marched towards Excester, his companie being aboue a thouſand of good fightingmen; and leauing the direct high waie, draweth ouer the downs towards Woodburie, and there lodged and pitched his campe that night, at a windmill apperteining to one Gregorie Carie gentleman. Which when the rebels of ſaint Marie Cliff heard of, forthwith, with all their force and power came forth, and marched onwards, vntill they came to the foreſaid mill where they offer the fight: and notwithſtanding they were of verie ſtout ſtomachs, & alſo verie valiantlie did ſtand to their tackels, yet in the end they were ouerthrowne, and the moſt part of them ſlaine.

The lord Ruſſell marcheth towards Excester for their deliuerance.

The rebels are ouerthrowne at the windmill.

Where after the victorie thus gotten, one Miles Couerdale then the preacher, and attending vpon my lord in this iournie made a ſermon, and cauſed a generall thankſgiuing to be made vnto God: but before all was ended, there began a new alarum; and forthwith euerie man to horſſe & to harneſſe againe. The rebels which remained in the towne of ſaint Marie Cliſt, hearing of the euill ſucceſſe befallen to their neighbours, and they doubting that their turne would be next to receiue the like; doo ſpread abroad the newes, and requeſt to be aided and aſſiſted. Wherevpon, forthwith in great troopes reſorted vnto them a number of their companions out of euerie quarter, to the number (as it was ſaid) of ſix thouſand men: and in all haſt, they make themſelues and all things in a readineſſe to abide the brunt. Vpon the next morning being ſundaie, my lord minding to follow on his courſe, commandeth the trumpet to ſound, & euerie man to make readie to march forwards. And about nine of the clocke in the ſame morning, they come to Cliſt; where the armie is diuided into three parts, and in three ſeuerall places doo appoint to make entrie into the towne. For in ſo manie places they had fortified the towne, and made great rampires for their defenſe.

Miles Couerdale preacher.

The kings armie marcheth towards biſhops Cliſt.

Theſe rampires were after ſome bickering recouered, and ſir William Francis of Summerſetſhire was named to be the firſt that gaue the aduenture, & made the entrie. The commons being driuen from the ſaid rampires, ran all into the towne; and there ioine themſelues togither to abide the pulſe. And as the kings armie was in good order marching into the towne, one of the chiefe capteins of theſe rebels, named ſir Thomas Pomeroie knight, kept himſelfe in a furze cloſe, and perceiuing the armie to be paſt him, and hauing then with him a trumpeter, and a drumſlade, commanded the trumpet to be ſounded, and the drumme to be ſtricken vp. At which ſound, the lord priuie ſeale, and his companie were amazed, ſuppoſing verelie that there had beene an ambuſh behind them to haue intrapped and incloſed them. Wherevpon, they forthwith retire backe in all the haſt they maie: which when they in the towne perceiued, they follow after, and neuer ſtaied vntill they came to the wagons then being in the high waie; & which now by flieng and retiring of the armie, are the formoſt and next to the towne. And theſe being laden with munition, armour, and treaſure, they take and bring into the towne, where they rifle as much as they could, ſauing the peeces of the ordinance, which with the ſhot and pouder they beſtowed in places conuenient, and emploied the ſame againſt my lord and his companie.

Sir William Francis firſt entreth the rampire.

The kings armie retireth.

The rebels take the kings wagons, munition and treaſure.

The armie hauing recouered the hill, did there pauſe a while, and finding themſelues to be deceiued, march backe againe towards the towne: but before they came thither, it was aduertiſed vnto my lord, that the towne and euerie houſe therein was fortified and full of men, and that it was not poſſible for anie to paſſe that waie without great perill and danger, except the towne were ſet on fire. Wherevpon order was giuen, that as they paſſed and entered into the towne, notwithſtanding it was my lords owne, they ſhould ſet the houſes on fire. Sir William Francis being in the fore-ward was formoſt, and leauing the waie which he tooke before, tooke now an other waie, the which waie was both deepe and narrow. The enimies being vpon the banks vpon euerie ſide of the waie, with their ſtones ſo beat him, that they ſtroke his headpeece faſt to his head and whereof he died. The armie being come into the towne, they ſet fire on euerie houſe as they paſſed by. But the rebelles conioining themſelues in the middle of the towne, doo ſtand at their defenſe, where the fight was verie fierce and cruell; and bloudie was that daie: for ſome were ſlaine with the ſword, ſome burned in the houſes, ſome ſhifting for themſelues were taken priſoners, and manie thinking to eſcape ouer the water were drowned: ſo that there were dead that daie one with an other about a thouſand men.

Sir William Francis ſlaine.

Biſhops Cliſt towne ſet on fire and burnt.

The rebels ouerthrowne in the towne.

The towne thus being recouered, and the ouerthrow giuen, the lord Greie deſireth to paſſe ouer the riuer, and to be in the open field, which is a great heath named Cliſt heath: & this he could not doo, but that he muſt paſſe ouer either the water or the bridge, both which were ſomewhat dangerous, for the water was ſomewhat mirie and muddie, as alſo at that time verie deepe, by reaſon of the flowing of the ſeas, which cauſeth the ſame at euerie tide to ſwell. Howbeit one John Yard a gentleman, and who had dwelled thereabouts, knowing the ſaid water, gaue the firſt aduenture ouer, and found waie neere vnto a mill aboue the bridge; and after him others doo followe. But this was not for all the reſt of the armie, who muſt needs paſſe ouer the bridge, which as then they could not doo, by reaſon that the ſame was ſo ouerlaid with great trees and timber, as alſo there ſtood the gunner with his peece readie charged. Wherevpon proclamation was made, that whoſoeuer would aduenture and make waie ouer the bridge, ſhould haue foure hundred crownes for his labor. Then one forthwith more reſpecting the gaine, than forecaſting the perill, gaue the aduenture: but the gunner rewarded him, for he diſcharged his peece vpon him, and ſlue him. And then before he could againe charge his peece, one of the companie, who before was paſſed ouer the water, came and entred the bridge at the further end, and comming behind him ſlue him; who forthwith calleth companie vnto him, and caſteth aſide all the trees and timber, and maketh the bridge cleere, and ſo the whole armie paſſeth ouer the bridge into the heath.

The lord Greie paſſeth ouer the riuer into Cliſt heath.

John Yard firſt giueth the aduenture and findeth waie ouer the water.

A proclamation, that whoſoeuer recouereth firſt the bridge to haue foure hundred crownes.

The bridge recouered.

The lord Greie as ſoone as he was paſſed ouer the water, he rode forthwith to the top of the hill, which is in the middle of the heath; and from thenſe did make a view of all the countrie about him: and looking backe towards Woodburie, he ſaw and eſpied vpon Woodburie hill a great companie aſſembled; & marching forward, & ſuſpecting that they were a new ſupplie appointed to follow and come vpon them, and aduertiſed the lord Ruſſell therof. Wherevpon it was concluded, that the priſoners whom they had before taken at the windmill and in the towne, who were a great number, and which if they were newlie ſet vpon, might be a detriment and a perill vnto them, ſhould be all killed: which forthwith was doone, euerie man making a diſpatch of his priſoners; and then the night approching, there they incamped themſelues for that night.

All the priſoners before taken are committed to the ſword.

The rebelles, which were and laie about Exceſter, were aduertiſed out of hand of this the euill ſucceſſe of their neighbors, wherefore they with as manie as they could get, in all haſt came to Cliſt heath: and in the lower ſide thereof next to the high waie, doo intrench and fortifie a place faſt by a hedge, and ſecretlie there, in the night, doo place their ordinance, & make themſelues in readineſſe to abide the brunt: and as ſoone as the daie light ſerued, diſcharge and ſhoot off their peeces vnto the armie incamped about the top of the hill. The lords and capteins to end the quarrell, doo determine to giue the onſet vpon them; and according to the nature of warres, doo politikelie diuide themſelues into three parts, and euerie one hath his place aſſigned and order appointed vnto him.

The lord Ruſſell, hauing no waie open before him, cauſeth his pioners to make waie ouer the hedges & incloſed grounds, and by that means dooth at length recouer vpon the verie backe of the enimies: and they were ſo intrapped on euerie ſide, that they could not by anie meanes eſcape, but muſt yeeld or fight. The one they would not, and in the other they preuailed not. For notwithſtanding valiantlie and ſtoutlie they ſtood to their tackle, and would not giue ouer as long as life and lim laſted: yet in the end they were all ouerthrowen, and few or none left aliue. Great was the ſlaughter, and cruell was the fight; and ſuch was the valor and ſtoutneſſe of theſe men, that the lord Greie reported himſelfe, that he neuer in all the wars that he had béen in did know the like.

The rebelles are ouerthrowen vpon Cliſt heath.

Sir William Francis buried at Exceſter.

This fight being doone, and all things ſet in good order, the whole armie marched vnto Topſham, which was about a mile off, and laie in that towne all that night, and carried with them in a horſlitter the bodie or corps of ſir William Francis, and from thenſe carried it to Exceſter, where it was buried in martiall manner verie honorablie in the bodie of the cathedrall church of ſaint Peters. When the rebels who laie about the citie heard how their neighbors had ſped, and from time to time had the worſe ſide, and were ſtill ouerthrowen: then as men deſpairing to preuaile, ſecretlie gaue ouer the ſiege and ran apaſe euerie man his waie. The gentlemen, which were kept priſoners in the churches and in other places about the citie, being now at libertie, came ſtraight to the walles about midnight, & gaue knowledge thereof to the watch; and they forthwith did the like vnto the maior. The ioie and comfort whereof was ſo great, and the deſire of freſh vittels ſo much perſed, that manie not abiding till the daielight, gat and ſhifted themſelues out of the gates, but more for vittels than for ſpoile, and yet they were glad of both: howbeit ſome did not long enioie the ſame, for manie being more gréedie of meat than meaſurable in féeding, did ſo ouercharge themſelues in ſurfetting, that they died thereof.

The rebels forſake the citie.

The next morow being tueſdaie and the ſixt of Auguſt, the lord priuie ſeale thinking it long before he came to the citie, commanded the trumpets verie earlie to ſound, and euerie man to make readie and to prepare awaie. And accordinglie all things being doone, he marcheth towards Exceſter, and about eight of the clocke being tueſdaie the ſixt of Auguſt 1549 he came to the ſame, to the great ioy & comfort of the long captiuated citizens, who were no more glad of their deliuerie, than was his lordſhip and all good ſubiects ioyfull of his victorie. But at his comming he entred not into the citie: for being aduertiſed from the maior that the citie was altogither vnfurniſhed of vittels, order was taken that no ſtranger, nor one nor other ſhould enter into the citie, but lie in the campe for a time. Then his lordſhip pitched his tents without the wals in S. Iohns fields, next to Southing haie, & vpon the cities wals next to the poſterne of his houſe was the kings ſtandard of the red dragon ſet vp. As ſoone as he was entred into his tent, the maior & all his brethren in moſt ſéemelie & decent order went vnto him, who moſt louinglie embraſed them, moſt thankefullie accepted them, and moſt highlie commended them for their truth, dutie, and ſeruice, which vpon his fidelitie and honor he did promiſe ſhould be well conſidered by the kings maieſtie, and which in the end was performed. For the king being aduertiſed thereof, he did not onelie thankefullie accept and highlie commend their ſeruices, but alſo rewarded and conſidered the ſame, both by confirmation of their charters, inlarging of their liberties, and augmenting of their reuenues, in giuing vnto them the manor of Exilond, which as was ſaid was ſometimes their ancient inheritance, but by power of the earles of Deuon by force taken, and by wrong and iniurie kept from them.

The lord Ruſſell commeth to Exceſter.

The maior and his brethren ſalute the lord Ruſſell, and he embraceth them.

The king thankefullie accepteth the ſeruice of the citie, and liberallie rewardeth the ſame.

Immediatlie after his comming, ſir William Herbert then maſter of the kings horſſes, and after earle of Penbroke, came with a thouſand Welſhmen: who though they came too late to the fraie; yet ſoone inough to the plaie. For the whole countrie was then put to the ſpoile, and euerie ſoldier ſought for his beſt profit: a iuſt plague of the Lord vpon rebels and diſloiall perſons. But the citie being as yet altogither deſtitute of vittels, and the Welſhmen at their firſt comming ſéeing the ſame, they did by their ſpeciall induſtries & trauels fraught & furniſh the ſame within two daies with corne, cattels, and vittels, verie plentifullie, to the great reléefe and comfort of the people therin, & to the benefit of themſelues. The lord priuie ſeale remained and continued in this citie aboue twelue daies before he remooued: ſetting all things in good order, rewarding the good & puniſhing the euill. To ſir Peter Carew he gaue all Wineſlades land, to ſir Gawen Carew Humfrie Arundels lands, to William Gibbes eſquier Beries lands, and to manie others which had doone good ſeruices he gaue priſoners, both bodies, goods, and lands.

The Welſhmen came too late to the fight, but ſoone inough to the ſpoile.

The lord priuie ſeale tarieth at Exon, rewardeth the good and puniſheth the euill.

Sir Peter Carew, ſir Gawen Carew, William Gibbes, rewarded with traitors lands.

On the other ſide he commanded forches and gallowes to be ſet vp in ſundrie places, as well within the citie as alſo in the countrie; and did command and cauſe manie to be executed and put to death, eſpeciallie ſuch as were noted to be chiefe and buſie dooers & ringleaders in this rebellion. Among them all there was no one ſo exalted as was Welſh the vicar of ſaint Thomas néere the Exbridge at Exceſter, who was preferred and preſented to that benefice by the lord Ruſſell patrone thereof. This man had manie good things in him, he was of no great ſtature, but well ſet and mightilie compact: he was a verie good wreſtler, ſhot well both in the long bow as alſo in the croſſebow, he handled his handgun and péece verie well, he was a verie good woodman and a hardie, and ſuch a one as would not giue his head for the polling nor his beard for the waſhing, he was a companion in anie exerciſes of actiuitie, & of a courteous and gentle behauiour, he deſcended of a good honeſt parentage, being borne at Penxarin in Cornewall; and yet in this rebellion an archcapteine and a principall dooer. He was charged with thrée principall crimes. The firſt was, that he did not onelie perſuade the people to the contemning of the reformed religion, according to the kings procéedings, and to kéepe and obſerue the Romiſh and popiſh religion: but alſo did erect, kéepe, and vſe the ſame in his pariſh church. Secondarilie, he was a capteine and a principall dealer in the cauſe of the rebellion, which was chieflie directed by him, his order, & aduiſe. Thirdlie, he cauſed one Kingwell a tinner of Chagford, and ſeruant to maſter Iohn Charels of Taueſtoke to be hanged, bicauſe ſecretlie he had conueied letters betwéene my lord and his maſter, and was earneſt in the reformed religion, which was then termed the kings procéedings, & an enimie to the popiſh ſtate. And being a ſharpe inueier againſt the one, and an earneſt mainteiner of the other, it procured vnto him great hatred and malice: when the rebellion was begun he ſought by all the meanes he could how to eſcape awaie: but he was ſo narrowlie watched, that he could neuer haue anie oportunitie ſo to doo.

Thrée things laid to the charge of the vicar of ſaint Thomas.

The rebels hang Kingwell.

They vſed all the deuiſes they could to recouer him to their opinions, ſometimes with faire words, ſometimes with threatenings, and ſometimes with impriſonments: but ſtill he inueied againſt them, calling them rebels and traitors both againſt God and the king, and foreprophecied vnto them that deſtruction and confuſion would be the end & reward of their doings. Thus when they could not reclame him to their diſpoſition, then by the order and iudgement of this vicar Welſh, he was fetched out of the priſon, and forthwith brought forth before Caiphas and Pilat, and condemned to be hanged: which was executed vpon him forthwith, and he brought to an elme tree in Exilond, without the weſt gate of the citie, before the houſe of one Nicholas Caue, and there hanged. The like crueltie or rather tyrannie was doone at Sampford Courteneie, where when a certeine Frankelin a gentleman, named William Hellions, who comming to Sampford to haue ſome communication with them for the ſtaie of their rebellion, and for the pacifieng of them in their due obedience, was at the townes end taken priſoner, & caried to the churchhouſe, where he ſo earneſtlie reprooued them for their rebellion, & ſo ſharplie threatened them an euill ſucceſſe; that they all fell in a rage with him, and not onlie with euill words reuiled him: but alſo as he was going out of the churchhouſe & going downe the ſtaires, one of them named Githbridge with a bill ſtrake him in the necke, and immediatlie notwithſtanding his pitifull requeſts and lamentations, a number of the reſt fell vpon him, ſlue him, and cut him into ſmall peeces: and though they counted him for an heretike, yet they buried him in the church-yard there, but contrarie to the common maner, laieng his bodie north and ſouth.

These things being called to remembrance and obiected againſt this vicar, although ſome men in reſpect of his vertues and good gifts did pitie and lament his caſe, and would haue gladlie beene ſutors for his pardon: yet the greatneſſe of his lewdneſſe and follies conſidered, they left him vnto his deſerts: & ſo was by order of the marſhall law condemned to death. And yet this one thing by the waie I muſt ſpeake in his commendation. There was among the rebels a ſtranger and an alien, who was a verie ſkilfull gunner, & could handle his peece verie well, and did much harme vnto the citie, & among others ſlue one Smith ſtanding at a doore in northgateſtreet with a great ſhot from ſaint Dauids hill. This fellow tooke vpon him, that he would ſet the whole citie on fire, and it ſhould be cleane burned within foure houres, doo they what they could. This his offer was ſo well liked, that the date and time was appointed when this ſhould be doone.

The rebels appoint to ſet fire on the citie and to burne it.

The vicar hearing thereof, aſſembleth vnto him as manie men as he could make and haue, & came to this companie when this fire ſhould be kindled, and was ſo hot and earneſt againſt their attempts, that he would in no wiſe ſuffer ſo lewd an act and wicked a thing to be doone. For (ſaith he) doo you what you can by policie, force, or dint of ſword to take the citie, I will ioine with you, and doo my beſt: but to burne a citie which ſhall be hurtfull to all men and good to no man, I will neuer conſent therevnto, but will here ſtand with all my power againſt you. And ſo ſtout he was in this matter, that he ſtopped them from their further enterpriſing of ſo wicked a fact. But to the matter. The execution of this man was committed to Barnard Duffeld, who being nothing ſlacke to follow his commiſſion, cauſed a paire of gallowes to be made, and to be ſet vp vpon the top of the tower of the ſaid vicars pariſh church of S. Thomas: and all things being readie and the ſtage perfected for this tragedie, the vicar was brought to the place, and by a rope about his middle drawne vp to the top of the tower: and there in chains hanged in his popiſh apparell, and had a holie water bucket and ſprinkle, a ſacring bell, a paire of beads, & ſuch other like popiſh traſh hanged about him, and there he with the ſame about him remained a long time. He made a verie ſmall or no confeſſion, but verie patientlie tooke his death, he had beene a good member in his common-wealth, had not the weeds ouergrowne the good corne, and his foule vices ouercommed his vertues.

The vicar of ſaint Thomas letteth and will not conſent to the burning of the citie.

The vicar is hanged in chaines vpon the top of the tower with his popiſh traſh and ornaments about him.

The lord priuie ſeale remaining ſtill in Exceſter was continuallie occupied in ſetting things in order, he was verie ſeuere and ſharpe againſt ſuch offendors as were chiefe and principall ringleders of this rebellion: but to the common ſort who were led and carried, and who did humble themſelues, he was pitifull and mercifull, and did dailie pardon infinite numbers. And his lordſhip thinking verelie that all things were now quieted, & the rebels pacified, ſuddenlie newes were brought vnto him that there aſſembled at Sampford Courtneie, both Deuonſhiremen and Corniſhmen; and who were fullie bent to mainteine their quarrell and abide the battell. Theſe newes ſo troubled and tickled my lord, that all buſineſſe ſet apart, he commandeth forthwith the trumpet to be ſounded, and the drumme to be ſtriken vp, and all his armie to be forthwith muſtered: which was then the greater, by reaſon of the Welſhmen and gentlemen of the countrie and of the commoners, who vpon ſubmiſſion had obteined pardon, and increaſed to the number of eight or ten thouſand men, and forthwith he marcheth towards Sampford Courtneie, where ſir William Herbert requeſted to haue the fore-ward for that daie, which was granted him.

The rebels aſſembled at Sampford Courtneie.

And being come thither, albeit the great companie of ſo manie good ſouldiers and well appointed might haue diſmaied them, being nothing nor in order, nor in companie, nor in experience, to be compared vnto the others: yet they were at a point they would not yeeld to no perſuaſions, nor did, but moſt manfullie did abide the fight: and neuer gaue ouer, vntill that both in the towne and in the field they were all for the moſt taken or ſlaine. At which time one ap Owen a Welſh gentleman, more boldlie than aduiſedlie giuing the aduenture to enter the rampier at the townes end, was there ſlaine by the rebels, and after carried backe to Exon, where after the maner of wars he was honorablie buried in the bodie of ſaint Peters church, few of the kings ſide beſides him then ſlaine: and ſo of a traitorous beginning they made a ſhamefull ending. Neuertheleſſe manie eſcaped and they fled towards Summerſetſhire: after whom was ſent ſir Peter Carew, and ſir Hugh Paulet then knight marſhall: with a great companie attending vpon them, and followed them as far as to King Weſton in the countie of Summerſet: where they ouertooke them and ouerthrew them, and alſo tooke one Coffin a gentleman their capteine priſoner and brought him vnto Exceſter.

The rebels ouerthrowne at Sampford Courtneie.

Sir Peter Carew purſueth the rebels which fled to King Weſton.

The lord Ruſſell himſelfe minding to make all things ſure, taketh his iorneie, and marcheth into Cornewall; and following his former courſe, cauſeth execution to be doone vpon a great manie, and eſpeciallie vpon the cheefe belwedders and ringleaders: but the cheefe and principall capteins he kept as priſoners, and brought them with him to Exceſter. And when this lord had ſet all things in good order, he returned to Exceſter, & remained there for a time; but after departed towards London, where he was receiued with great ioy and thanks: and being come before the king, he forgat not to commend vnto his maieſtie the good ſeruice of this citie in this rebellion, which (as is before ſaid) was liberallie rewarded and conſidered. After his departure, and according to his order and appointment, the cheefe capteins and principall heads of this rebellion, whome he left in priſon in the kings goale at Exceſter, were caried to London and commanded to the tower, and in their due time were afterwards executed to death, namelie Humfreie Arundell eſquier, Wineſlade eſquier, Iohn Berrie and Coffin gentlemen, and Holmes yeoman; which Coffin and Holmes were ſeruants to ſir John Arundell knight. Of the number of them who were ſlaine, there is no certeintie knowne, but manie more be found lacke then numbred: howbeit it was accounted by ſuch as continued in the whole ſeruice of this commotion to be about foure thouſand men. But what number was of the contrarie ſide diſpatched, nothing is reported, albeit it be well knowne that they eſcaped not ſcotfrée, and eſpeciallie the Burgonians, who were abhorred of the one partie, and nothing fauoured of the other. Thus much concerning the deſcription of the citie, and of the ſundrie inuaſions and aſſaults againſt the ſame, and eſpeciallie of the laſt rebellion or commotion in the yeare of our Lord 1549, wherein much more might be ſpoken, but this may ſuffice for this matter. And for as much as the cathedrall church of this citie, called by the name of S. Peters, is a parcell of the citie, and compaſſed within the wals of the ſame, though in reſpect of certeine priuileges diſtinct from the iuriſdiction thereof; I thought it good to ſubnect hereunto the deſcription of the ſaid church, and of the antiquitie of the ſame.

The antiquitie, foundation, and building of the cathedrall church of ſaint Peters in Exceſter.

After that corrupt religion and ſuperſtition was crept and receiued into the church, and the people become deuout therein, then began the erecting of religious houſes and monaſteries in euerie countrie. And as this was vniuerſall throughout all chriſtendome vnder the gouernement of the Romane biſhop: ſo alſo was it generallie doone throughout all England, in which generalitie this citie was of a particularitie; for in this citie from time to time as opportunitie ſerued ſundrie religious houſes and monaſteries were erected and builded, of which there were thrée within the ſite, circuit, and place now called the cloſe of S. Peters, and which in time accrued and were vnited into one. The firſt was a houſe for women called moniales or nuns, which is now the deanes houſe or Kalendar haie. The other was a houſe of moonks, ſuppoſed to be builded by king Ethelred, the third ſonne to king Ethelwolph, and theſe two were vnited by biſhop Leofricus vnto the cathedrall church. The third was a houſe for moonks of the order of S. Benet, which was builded and founded by king Athelſtane, about the yeare of our Lord 932: and this is that part of the cathedrall church now called the ladie chappell. For the ſaid king, hauing driuen out of this citie the Britons then dwelling therein, and minding to make a full conqueſt both of them and of this their countrie which they then inhabited, did ſo fiercelie follow and purſue them euen into Cornewall, that in the end he conquered them, and had the victorie. After which he returned to this citie, and here ſtaieng and ſoiourning for a time, did reedifie the citie, incompaſſed it with a ſtone wall, and founded the cathedrall church, which he then appointed for a monaſterie for moonks of S. Benets order. For ſo is it written: Hanc vrbem rex Adelſtanus primus in poteſtatem Anglorum, effugatis Britonibus redactam turribus muniuit, & muro ex quadratis lapidibus cinxit, ac antiquitùs vocatam Munketon nunc Exeſter vocari voluit: ac ibi ſedens manſum quoddam dedit ad fundandum monaſterium pro monachis Deo & ſancto Petro famulantibus. Beſides the charges which he was at the building of the ſaid church, he gaue alſo lands and reuenues vnto them ſufficient for maintenance and liuelihoods, whereof Morkeſhull and Treaſurors béere are parcell, and which now are appendant and apperteining to the treaſuror of the cathedrall church.

After the time of king Athelſtane, the Danes with great hoſtilitie and crueltie hauing ouerrun this whole land, they alſo came to this citie, and in ſpoiling the ſame, did alſo ranſacke and ſpoile the ſaid church, whoſe continuall inuaſions the moonks being not able to indure, fled and forſooke their houſe and home, and ſought places of better ſafetie. By which meanes this monaſterie for ſundrie yeares was left deſtituted, vntill the time of king Edgar; who on a time made a progreſſe into theſe weſt parts, to viſit his father in law Odogarus then earle of Deuon, and founder of the abbeie of Tauiſtoke, whoſe daughter he had married. And being come to this citie, did here reſt and ſtaie himſelfe, where when he ſaw the diſtreſſed ſtate of the ſaid church, & pitieng the ſame, cauſed ſearch and inquirie to be made of the moonks which were ſcattered and yet left: and when he had gotten them togither, he reſtored them vnto their houſe and liuelihoods, and appointed Sidemannus who was afterwards biſhop of this dioceſſe to be abbat of the ſame. And from thenſfoorth they continued togither (though ſometimes in troubles) vntill that king Swanus or Sweno the Dane, with a mightie and a huge armie came to this citie, beſieged, tooke, ſpoiled, and deſtroied it with ſword and fier. Howbeit not long after it was reſtored againe by king Cahutus or Canutus, who being aduertiſed of the great cruelties which his father Sweno had doone to the ſaid monaſterie, did at the requeſt of Athelredus one of his dukes, make reſtitution vnto Athelwoldus then abbat of all their lands, liuings and priuileges: as dooth appeare by his charter dated in the yeare of our Lord 1019.

King Edgar reſtoreth the abbat and moonks to their houſe.

Sidemannus abbat of this church, and after biſhop of this dioceſſe.

K. Canutus reſtoreth both lands & priuileges to the church.

After this, about thirtie yeares, king Edward the Confeſſor came to this citie, and he by the aduiſe and at the motion of Leofricus biſhop of Crediton, and who ſometimes was lord chancellor of England vnder the ſaid king, and one of his priuie councell, partlie for the better ſafetie of the biſhop and his ſucceſſors, who lieng and hauing their houſes in the countrie, were ſubiect to manie and ſundrie perils, and partlie to prouide a more conuenient place for the moonks, did remooue the biſhops ſée from Crediton, and remooued the moonks vnto Weſtminſter: and he the king in his owne perſon, togither with quéene Edith his wife, did inſtall the ſaid Leofricus in poſſeſſion of this his new church and ſée. The biſhop thus remooued from the old, and placed in the new ſée and church, dooth endow the ſame with all thoſe lands and liuelihoods which he had of the gift of the ſaid king, and which before did apperteine to his former church, and to reduce and make his ſanctuarie to his mind, pulleth downe the two monaſteries néere adioining, the one being of moonks and the other of nuns, and addeth and vniteth them vnto his owne church, and hauing brought all things to effect according to his mind, deuiſeth and maketh lawes, orders, and ordinances for the good gouernment of his church and cleargie.

The biſhops ſée remooued from Crediton to Exon.

Leofricus the firſt biſhop of Exceſter.

After the death of Leofricus, all his ſucceſſors for the moſt part procure the augmentation and increaſe of this their new erected ſée and church, ſome in liuelihoods, ſome in liberties and priuileges, ſome in buildings, and ſome in one thing, and ſome in another. William Wareweſt the third biſhop of this church, who had ſometimes béene chapleine to the Conqueror, and to his two ſonnes William and Henrie, was in ſuch fauor and good liking with the Conqueror, that at his requeſt he gaue vnto him and to this his church, Plimpton, Brampton, and S. Stephans in Exceſter, which gift his ſaid ſonnes being kings of England did ratifie and confirme. And then the ſaid biſhop, hauing the ordering and diſtributing thereof, giueth Plimpton to the regular monkes there, for whom he had founded and builded a monaſterie, and wherein he himſelfe ſhortlie after leauing and yéelding vp his biſhoprike, became and was a monke. Brampton was reſerued to the church, and which afterwards was annexed to the deanerie. And S. Stephans with the fée to the ſame apperteining, he reſerued to himſelfe and to his ſucceſſors, & whereby they are barons and lords of the parlement. This biſhop in the yeare of our Lord 1112, firſt began to inlarge his cathedrall, and laid the foundation of that part, which is now the chore or quier: for before that time it was no bigger than that, which ſince and now is called the ladie chapell. After him William Brewer the biſhop made and eſtabliſhed in the yeare of our Lord 1235, a deane and a chapter of foure and twentie prebendaries: and for the deane (whome he appointed, and whoſe name was Serlo) and for his ſucceſſors, he gaue and impropriated Brampton and Coliton Rawleigh, and for the prebendaries he purchaſed lands, alloting and aſſigning to euerie of them Pro pane & ſale the like portion of foure pounds.

Peter Quiuell the biſhop finding the chancell of his church to be fullie builded and ended, beginneth to found and build the lower part or the bodie of his church, in the yeare of our Lord 1284, from the chancell of his church vnto the weſt end of the ſaid church. This man firſt appointed a chanter and a ſubdeane to be in his church. To the one of them he impropriated Paineton and Chudleie, and to the other the perſonage of Egloſchaile in Cornewall. After him Iohn Grandiſſon, in the yeare of our Lord 1340, did increaſe the length of the bodie of the church from the funt weſtwards, as alſo vaulted the roofe of the whole church, and did fullie end and finiſh the ſame. And albeit from the time of king Athelſtane the firſt founder in the yeare of our Lord 932, vntill the daie of the death of this biſhop Grandiſſon, which was in the yeare 1369, there were about 437 yeares diſtant, and in the meane time this church was continued in building by ſundrie perſons: yet it is ſo decentlie and vniformelie compacted, as though it had béene builded at one verie time and inſtant.

After this, about the yeare of our Lord 1400, and in the time of biſhop Stofford, the cloiſter was added to the church, and builded at the moſt part of the charges of the deane and chapiter. And not long after Edmund Lacie biſhop began to build the chapiter houſe, which being not ended in his time, his next ſucceſſor George Neuill, in the yeare of our Lord 1456, did fullie end and abſolue the ſame: and which is a verie faire, beautifull, and a ſumptuous worke. And thus much concerning the antiquitie, foundation, and building of this cathedrall church. Thus far Iohn Hooker.

About the ſame time that this rebellion (whereto all the foreſaid diſcourſe tendeth) began in the weſt, the like diſordered hurles were attempted in Oxfordſhire, and Buckinghamſhire: but they were ſpéedilie appeaſed by the lord Greie of Wilton, who comming downe that waie to ioine with the lord priuie ſeale, chaſed the rebels to their houſes, of whome two hundred were taken, and a dozzen of the ringleaders to him deliuered, whereof certeine afterwards were executed. Moreouer, in diuerſe other parts of the realme, namelie in the ſouth and eaſt parts, did the people (as before ye haue heard) aſſemble themſelues in rebellious maner, committing manie foule diſorders: but yet by good policie and holeſome perſuaſions they were appeaſed, except in Norffolke, where after there was a rumour ſpred, that the commons in Kent had throwne downe the diches and hedges, wherewith certeine paſture grounds were incloſed, and had laid the ſame open. Diuerſe ſeditious perſons and buſie fellowes began to complaine that the like had not béene doone in Norffolke, and ceaſed not to practiſe how to raiſe the people to an open rebellion; meaning not onelie to laie open parkes and incloſures, but to attempt other reformations, as they termed them, to the great danger of ouerthrowing the whole ſtate of the common-wealth.

Herevpon diuerſe of them, namelie the inhabitants of Atilborough, and other of their neighbors, conceiuing no ſmall diſpleaſure, for that one Gréene of Wilbie had taken in a parcell of the common paſture, as was ſuppoſed, belonging to the towne of Atilborough, and adioining to the common paſture of Harſham, riotouſlie aſſembled togither, and threw downe certeine new diches made by the ſaid Gréene, to incloſe in the ſaid parcell of commons.

The beginning of the rebellion in Norffolke.

This was doone before Midſummer, and ſo it reſted till the ſixt of Iulie, at which time there ſhould be a publike plaie kept at Wimondham, a towne diſtant from Norwich ſix miles, which plaie had béene accuſtomed yearelie to be kept in that towne, continuing for the ſpace of one night and one daie at the leaſt. Wherevpon the wicked contriuers of this vnhappie rebellion, tooke occaſion by the aſſembling of ſuch numbers of people as reſorted thither to ſée that plaie, to enter further into their wicked enterpriſe: and vpon conference had, they immediatlie aſſembled at Morleie a mile from Wimondham, & there they caſt downe certeine diches of maiſter Hubbords on the tueſdaie, and that night they repaired to Wimondham againe, where they practiſed the like feats. But as yet they tooke no mans goods by violence.

A conference to further this rebellion in the méeting at a publike plaie.

Herevpon one Iohn Flowerdew of Hetherſet gentleman, finding himſelfe grieued with the caſting downe of ſome diches, came vnto ſome of the rebels, and gaue to them fortie pence to caſt downe the fenſes of an incloſure belonging to Robert Ket, alias Knight, a tanner of Wimondham (which paſture lieth néere to the faire Wounge at Wimondham aforſaid) which they did. And that night conſulting togither, the next morning they tooke their iourneie to Hetherſet, by the procurement of the ſaid Robert Ket, in reuenge of the diſpleaſure which he had conceiued againſt the ſaid Flowerdew, and ſet them in hand to plucke vp and caſt downe hedges and diches, wherewith certeine paſture grounds belonging to the ſaid Flowerdew were incloſed.

Iohn Flowerdew.

Robert Ket.

Here was ſomwhat adoo. For maiſter Flowerdew did what he could to haue cauſed them to deſiſt from that attempt, in ſomuch that manie ſharpe words paſſed betwixt Ket and the ſaid maiſter Flowerdew. But Ket being a man hardie and forward to anie deſperat attempt that ſhould be taken in hand, was ſtreight entered into ſuch eſtimation with the commons thus aſſembled togither in rebellious wiſe, that his will was accompliſhed: and ſo thoſe hedges and diches belonging to the paſture grounds of maiſter Flowerdew were throwne downe and made plaine. Herevpon was Ket choſen to be their capteine and ringleader, who being reſolued to ſet all on ſix and ſeuen, willed them to be of good comfort, and to follow him in defenſe of their common libertie, being readie in the common-wealths cauſe to hazard both life and goods.

Ket choſen to be capteine of the rebels.

Herewith they paſſed the water betwixt Cringelford and Eiton, and comming to Bowthorpe, caſt downe certeine hedges and diches in that place, and their number being now greatlie increaſed, they incamped there that night. Here ſir Edmund Windam knight, being high ſhiriffe of Norffolke and Suffolke, came and proclamed them rebels, commanding them to depart in the kings maieſties name. With which proclamation they were greatlie offended, and attempted to haue got him into their hands: but he being well horſſed, valiantlie brake through them that had compaſſed him in: howbeit he eſcaped from them and got into Norwich, being not paſt a mile off. The ſame night there came a great number of lewd people vnto them, as well out of the citie of Norwich as out of the countrie, with weapon, armour, and artillerie.

The citizens of Norwich.

Thomas Cod.

The daie before that Ket came to this place, a great number of the meaner ſort of the citizens of Norwich had throwne downe a quickſet hedge, and filled vp the diches, wherewith the foreſaid commons were on the one ſide incloſed, to kéepe in the cattell of the citizens that had the ſame going before their common neatherd: and ſo that fenſe which by good and prouident aduiſe of their forefathers, had béene raiſed and made for the common profit of the whole citie, was thus by a ſort of lewd perſons defaced and caſt downe at that preſent. And ſcarſe had they throwne downe the dich in the vpper end of this paſture, but that a companie of euill diſpoſed perſons ſtale out of the citie, and got them to Kets campe. The maior of the citie named Thomas Cod aduertiſed hereof, doubting what might follow of this miſchiefous begun rebellion, thought good to trie if he might perſuade the rebels to giue ouer their traitorous enterpriſes: and therfore taking certeine of the aldermen with him, he went to Kets campe, vſing what perſuaſions he could to reduce them vnto their dutifull obedience, & to depart home to their houſes. But his trauell was in vaine, and therefore returned backe to the citie without hope to doo anie good with that vnrulie rout.

The rebels requeſt licence to paſſe thorough Norwich.

After whoſe departure, they conſidering in what danger they ſtood to be ſurpriſed, if they ſhould ſcatter abroad in ſuch ſort as till then they had doone, ſéeking to waſt and ſpoile the countrie about them, without kéeping togither in anie warlike order, thought it ſtood moſt with their ſuertie to draw into one place, and to fortifie the ſame for their further ſtrength. Upon this reſolution they determined to go with all ſpéed vnto Mouſehold, a place as they tooke it méet for their purpoſe, and therefore ſent to the maior of Norwich, requeſting him of licence to paſſe through the citie, bicauſe it was their néereſt waie, promiſing not to offer anie iniurie or violence to anie perſon, but quietlie to march through the citie vnto their place appointed. But the maior did not onlie denie them paſſage, but alſo with ſharpe and bitter ſpeach reprouing their rebellious doings, told them what would follow thereof, if they gaue not ouer in time from further procéeding in ſuch wicked attempts.

Sir Roger Woodhouſe.

The next daie being thurſdaie, ſir Roger Woodhouſe with ſeuen or eight of his houſhold ſeruants, came to them, bringing with him two carts laden with béere, and one cart laden with other vittels: for a recompenſe whereof he was ſtripped out of his apparell, had his horſſes taken from him, and whatſoeuer elſe he had, the rebels accounting the ſame a good preie, he himſelfe was cruellie tugged and caſt into a dich of one Mores of nether Arleham by Heileſdonbridge; where the ſame daie the rebels, being diſappointed of their purpoſe to paſſe through Norwich, found meanes to paſſe, and comming to maiger Corbets houſe of Sprowſton, intended to haue burnt the ſame houſe. But yet being perſuaded to ſpare it from fire, they ſpoiled his goods, defaced a douehouſe of his, which had béene a chappell, and afterwards got them to Mouſehold, and comming to S. Leonards hill, on which the erle of Surrie had built a ſtatelie houſe called mount Surrie, they inkennelled themſelues there on the ſame hill; and in the woods adioining that lie on the weſt and the ſouth ſide of the ſame hill, as the commons or paſture called Mouſehold heath lieth on the eaſt ſide, which conteineth foure or fiue miles in length, & thrée or foure in bredth.

Mount Surrie.

Mouſehold.

They put ſir Roger Woodhouſe, and other priſoners whom they had caught, in ſtreict ward within the foreſaid houſe of mount Surrie, on the which they ſeized, and ſpoiled whatſoeuer they found within it. In the meane time, the maior of Norwich taking aduiſe with his brethren the aldermen, what was beſt to doo in this caſe, whether preſentlie to iſſue forth, and diſtreſſe the rebels now in the beginning, leaſt time might giue them meane to increaſe their power: or rather to ſtaie till they had aduertiſed the councell of the whole matter. In the end they agréed that this laſt aduiſe was moſt ſureſt, and ſo they diſpatched a poſt with all ſpéed to the court. Beſide this great campe (as they termed it) at Mouſehold, there was a leſſer at Riſing chaſe neare to Lin: but the rebels there, by the good diligence and circumſpect policie of the iuſtices and gentlemen of thoſe parts, were ſpéedilie repreſſed, and driuen from thence. Notwithſtanding afterwards they aſſembled togither at Watton, & there remained about a fortnight, ſtopping alſo the paſſage at Thetford and Brandon ferrie, within nine miles of the ſaid Watton: and at length came and ioined themſelues with theſe other at Mouſehold, by appointment of their generall capteine (as they tooke him) the foreſaid Robert Ket.

Riſing chaſe.

Watton.

Moreouer, there came flocking from Suffolke and other parts, a great multitude of lewd diſpoſed perſons, raiſed by firing of beacons, and ringing of bels. Alſo a number of raſcals & naughtie lewd perſons ſtale out of the citie of Norwich, and went to campe. And thus being got togither in great multitudes, they added one wickedneſſe to another, as hauing no ſtaie of themſelues after their downefall, nor holding them content with the committing of one villanous treſpaſſe and horrible tranſgreſſion, according vnto the poets words to the like purpoſe:

Quiſnam hominum eſt, quem tu contentum videris vno
Flagitio?———

Counterfeit religion.

Now to cloke their malicious purpoſe with a counterfeit ſhew of holineſſe, they cauſed one Coniers vicar of ſaint Martins in Norwich to ſaie ſeruice morning and euening, to praie to God for proſperous ſpéed in that their vngodlie enterpriſe. Moreouer they went about to ioine to their cauſe diuerſe honeſt men, and right commendable for religion, doctrine, vertue, and innocencie of life; amongſt whome were Robert Watſon a preacher, Thomas Cod maior of Norwich, and Thomas Alderich of Mangréene hall. Theſe thrée, although ſore againſt their willes, were conſtreined to be preſent with them in all matters of counſell, and to take vpon them (as aſſociats with capteine Ket) the adminiſtration and order of euerie thing: which happened well for manie. For when either Ket himſelfe, or anie other of the capteins, through ſetting on of the outragious multitude, purpoſed anie miſchéefe (as often it came to paſſe) in one place or other, through their graue aduiſe, and approued induſtrie, their furie was ſundrie times ſtaied and calmed. Although Ket bent to all vngratiouſnes, would diuerſe times grant forth commiſſions, abuſing now and then the names of honeſt men thereby, appointing his vnthriftie mates to fetch in vittels to furniſh their campe withall. The tenor of one of the which commiſſions here inſueth.

The forme of a warrant granted out by the rebels to take vp vittels.

WE the kings friends & deputies, doo grant licence to all men, to prouide and bring into the campe at Mouſehold, all maner of cattell, and prouiſion of vittels, in what place ſoeuer they may find the ſame: ſo that no violence or iniurie bee doone to any honeſt or poore man. Commanding all perſons as they tender the kings honor and roiall maieſtie, and the releefe of the common welth, to be obedient to vs the gouernors, and to thoſe whoſe names inſue.

Signed Robert Ket.

Then followed in order a long liſt of names, for the number of the gouernors was great, as they that beſide the cheefe capteins had choſen out of euerie hundred two, and there were ſix and twentie hundreds. By vertue of ſuch commiſſions, manie that were of good worſhip and credit in the countrie, whom the rebels in their rage had condemned, were fetched from their houſes, and other places where they might be found, and being brought to the campe, were committed to priſon. Alſo the ditches and hedges, wherewith the commons abrode in the countrie were incloſed, were throwne downe, & manie were warned and called forth from ſundrie parts, to come and take part with them in theſe tumultuous vprores. And all theſe things were doone, the maior, maiſter Watſon, and maiſter Aldrich not onlie holding their peace and winking thereat, but alſo ſometime after a maner giuing their conſent to the ſame. For to haue reſiſted them had beene but follie, and the waie to haue put themſelues in danger of deſtruction, and their countrie too.

Gentlemen impriſoned.

The honeſt citizens of Norwich in this meane while remained in great perplexitie, hearing nothing from the king nor his councell. They therefore being vncerteine what to doo, abode in the citie, till they might vnderſtand what order it ſhould pleaſe the king to take for the quieting of theſe troubles. The cauſe why the councell was thus ſlacke in prouiding remedie againſt the Norffolke rebels, was: for that they were buſie in quieting the troubles in the inner part of the realme about London, and other places (as before ye haue heard) by meanes whereof the power of theſe Norffolke rebels ſtill increaſed, ſo that there were aſſembled togither into Kets campe, to the number of ſixteene thouſand vngratious vnthrifts, who by the aduiſe of their capteins fortified themſelues, and made prouiſion of artillerie, powder and other abiliments, which they fetched out of ſhips, gentlemens houſes, and other places where any was to be found, and withall ſpoiled the countrie of all the cattell, riches and coine, on which they might laie hands.

The number of the rebels.

But bicauſe manie (as in ſuch caſe is euer ſeene) did prouide for themſelues, and hid that which they got, laieng it vp for their owne ſtore, and brought it not forth to further the common cauſe, Ket and the other gouernors (for ſo would they be called) thought to prouide a remedie, and by common conſent it was decreed, that a place ſhould be appointed, where iudgements might bee exerciſed, as in a iudiciall hall. Wherevpon they found out a great old oke, where the ſaid Ket, and the other gouernors or deputies might ſit and place themſelues, to heare and determine ſuch quareling matters as came in queſtion. Afore whom ſometime would aſſemble a great number of the rebels, and exhibit complaints of ſuch diſorders, as now and then were practiſed among them; and there they would take order for the redreſſing of ſuch wrongs and iniuries as were appointed, ſo that ſuch greedie vagabounds as were readie to ſpoile more than ſeemed to ſtand with the pleaſure of the ſaid gouernors, and further than there commiſſions would beare, were committed to priſon. This oke they named the tree of reformation.

Rebels and theeues can not keepe togither without miniſtration of iuſtice.

The tree of reformation.

The maior, maiſter Aldrich and others, whome they had receiued into the number of their gouernours, would oftentimes go vp into this tree, and make diuerſe pithie orations to perſuade the outragious multitude to giue ouer their riotous rapines and ſpoilings. There were alſo certeine diuines which did vſe all waies poſſible to withdraw them from their wicked attempts, and to reduce them to peace and quietneſſe, although this was not doone without danger of their liues. Neuertheleſſe, theſe in the daie time vſed to preach in the churches, and in the night to watch with armour vpon their backes, leauing nothing vndoone that might ſeeme to apperteine vnto the dutie of godlie and vertuous diuines, or faithfull and obedient ſubiects. Among theſe was doctor Matthew Parker, afterward archbiſhop of Canturburie, whoſe wiſdome, faithfulneſſe, and integritie was moſt apparant.

Doctor Parker.

He comming on a daie into the campe with his brother Thomas Parker, that was after maior of Norwich, found them before the tree at common praier, the foreremembred Coniers vicar of ſaint Martins in Norwich ſaieng the Letanie. Wherevpon doctor Parker thinking the time to ſerue for his purpoſe, went vp into the tree, where he made a ſermon, diuiding it into three ſeuerall parts. In the firſt he exhorted them to vſe with moderation thoſe vittels which they had prouided & brought into their campe, and not riotouſlie nor lauiſhlie to waſt and conſume them. In the ſecond he aduiſed them in no wiſe to ſeeke reuenge of priuat diſpleaſures, and not to chaine or keepe in irons thoſe perſons whom they held in ward, nor to take anie mans life from him. Laſtlie, he wiſhed that they ſhould haue regard to themſelues, & leaue off their raſh begun enterpriſe, giuing eare to ſuch heralds or other meſſengers as came from the king, and to ſhew ſuch honour vnto his maieſtie now in his yoong and tender yeares, as they might inioy him hereafter being growne vp in vertue, to their great ioy, comfort, and gladneſſe. As he was handling this matter, with manie good and effectuall reaſons, hauing the auditorie attentiue to his words, one lewd fellow among the reſt cried out and ſaid; How long ſhall we ſuffer this hireling doctor, who being waged by gentlemen, is come hither with his toong, which is ſold and tied to ſerue their appetite? But for all his prating words, let vs bridle them, and bring them vnder the orders of our law.

He preacheth to the rebels.

The rebels threaten doctor Parker.

Then began the multitude to ſtir and make a noiſe, threatening the preacher, ſome of them ſaieng; It were well, that for his faire told tale we ſhould bring him downe with a miſchiefe, with arrowes and iauelings. This ſpeech brought doctor Parker in no ſmall feare, and the more, for that he heard a noiſe and clattering of weapons vnder him, ſo that he looked for preſent death among them. But herein he was deceiued: for there was not a man that ſtood next him within the compaſſe of the tree, would him anie harme. And immediatlie the foreſaid vicar of

S.

Doctor Parker conueieth himſelfe from among the rebels.

S. Martins that executed the office of the miniſter, began with helpe of ſome ſingingmen that were preſent, the canticle Te Deum, wherewith the vnrulie multitude ſéemed partlie to quiet themſelues. Which occaſion doctor Parker perceiuing to ſerue his turne, thought not longer to tarie amongſt them, but quietlie got him downe from the trée, and with his brother made haſt towards the citie. But before he came to Pockthorp gate, there were of the rebels that came to him, and began to queſtion with him about his licence, whereby he was authoriſed to preach: but he perceiuing that there was no reaſon to be conceiued of them, ſlipt his waies, and left his brother to argue the matter with them.

Yet the next daie he entring into ſaint Clements church, tooke occaſion to expound ſomewhat out of one of the leſſons that was read that daie, concerning theſe wicked hurliburlies; manie of the rebels comming about him, but not interrupting him a whit, hearing the end of his exhortation, although they ſéemed greatlie therewith offended. But as he came out of the church, they followed him, and told him that (as they vnderſtood) he had thrée or foure able geldings to ſerue the king: and therefore charged him that after dinner they might be readie for them to occupie. But doctor Parker made them no great anſwer, but calling to him his horſſekéeper, commanded him to plucke off the ſhooes from ſome of his geldings, and to pare their hooues vnto the quicke; and that he ſhould annoint the other with neruall, as if they had béene lamed with trauell. The rebels perceiuing this, when they ſaw the ſame geldings had forth as it had béene to paſture, made no further buſineſſe. Wherevpon doctor Parker ſhortlie after, feining as if he went abroad to walke two miles off from the citie, at Crinkleford bridge found his horſes readie as he had appointed, with his ſeruants, and mounting vp, tooke his iourneie towards Cambridge, with as much ſpéed as was poſſible, eſcaping thither out of all danger, although by the waie they met with and ſaw diuerſe of the rebels plaieng their parts in their wonted outragious maner. Thus did doctor Parker eſcape the hands of the wicked rebels, who deſpiſing his wholeſome admonitions, did afterwards by Gods iuſt iudgement proue his words to be moſt true.

The policie of doctor Parker to beguile the rebels.

But in the meane time procéeding from one miſchiefe to another, after they had practiſed to ſpoile the gentlemen of the countrie of their goods, they began to attach their bodies, and by force to bring them into their campe: ſo that ſuch as eſcaped their hands, were glad to flée, and hide themſelues in woods and caues, where they might beſt kéepe themſelues out of their aduerſaries reach and intended dangers. But to ſpeake of all the horrible practiſes by theſe vngratious people exerciſed, it would be too long a proceſſe. What ſhifts they found to cloake their doings, and that euen vnder the kings authoritie, it is woonderfull. For whereas there were certeine commiſſions directed vnto diuerſe gentlemen in the countrie, to take order for the appeaſing of theſe tumults; they getting the ſame into their hands, tooke vpon them the authoritie committed to the gentlemen, vnto whome the ſame commiſſions were ſent; and taking off the ſeales from the other, faſtened the ſame vnto their counterfeit writings. To conclude, they grew to ſuch vnmeaſurable diſorder, that they would not in manie things obeie neither their generall capteine, nor anie of their gouernors, but ran headlong into all kind of miſchiefe, & made ſuch ſpoile of vittels which they brought out of the countrie adioining vnto their campe, that within few daies they conſumed (beſide a great number of béefes) twentie thouſand muttons, alſo ſwans, géeſe, hens, capons, ducks, & other foules ſo manie as they might laie hands vpon. And furthermore, they ſpared not to breake into parks, and kill what déere they could. Such hauocke they made of all that came in their waie, and ſuch number of ſhéepe ſpeciallie they brought into their campe, that a good fat weather was ſold for a groat. The woods, groues, and trées that were deſtroied I paſſe ouer, and make no mention thereof. Herewith, what crueltie was ſhewed by them in fettering and manacing ſuch gentlemen as they caught, and committed to priſon for ſome miſliking they had conceiued of them, it was a miſerable caſe to behold. Some there were whom they brought forth, as it had béene to iudgement before the trée of reformation, there to be tried afore the gouernors, as if they had béene guiltie of ſome heinous and gréeuous crime. And when it was aſked of the commons, what ſhould be doone with thoſe priſoners, they would crie with one voice; Hang them, hang them. And when they were aſked why they gaue ſo ſharpe iudgement of thoſe whome they neuer knew, they would roundlie anſwer, that other cried the ſame crie; and therefore they ment to giue their aſſent with other, although they could yéeld no reaſon, but that they were gentlemen, & therefore not worthie to liue.

The falſifieng of the kings commiſſions.

The hauocke which the rebels made.

The outragious dealing againſt gentlemen.

Sir Edmund Kneuets ſeruice.

Whileſt the rebels thus raged abroad in the countrie at Hengham eleuen miles from Norwich, ſir Edmund Knenet knight, with a ſmall companie of his owne meniall ſeruants, ſet vpon the nightwatch of the rebels that were placed there, & brake through, ouerthrowing diuerſe of them: and hauing ſome of his owne men alſo vnhorſſed by the rebels, and in danger to be hewen in péeces among them, yet he recouered them, & eſcaped their hands through great manhood. After which good nights ſeruice, as they would haue it eſtéemed, they repaired to their great capteine Ket, to ſhew their hurts receiued, & to complaine of their griefes. It was talked among them, that they would go to ſir Edmund Kneuets houſe called Buckenham caſtell, to aſſault it, and to fetch him out of it by force. But it was doubted of ſome, leaſt it were too ſtrong for them; and other feared ſharpe ſtripes, if they ſhould attempt that exploit, being at the leaſt twelue miles from their maine campe: and ſo that enterpriſe went not forward, the moſt part thinking it beſt to ſléepe in whole ſkins.

Leonard Southerton.

There was at London the ſame time a citizen of Norwich, one Leonard Southerton fled from thence for feare of his life, whome the councell ſent for, to come to ſpeake with them: and being aſked what he knew touching the ſtate of the rebels, he declared to them from point to point the maner of all their outragious procéedings: but yet that as he vnderſtood, there were manie among them that would laie aſide their armour, if they might be aſſured of the kings pardon: and therefore if it would pleaſe the king to ſet forth a proclamation, that all ſuch as would depart from the campe and be quiet, ſhould haue their pardon for all that was paſt, he doubted not but that thoſe routs ſhould be diſperſed. His aduiſe was allowed, and therevpon was an herald ſent with all ſpéed in companie with the ſaid Southerton vnto Norwich; & comming into the campe the laſt of Iulie, and ſtanding before the trée of reformation, apparelled in his cote of armes, pronounced there before all the multitude, with lowd voice, a frée pardon to all that would depart to their homes, and laieng aſide their armour, giue ouer their traitorous begun enterpriſe.

Pardon proclamed by an herald at armes.

After he had made an end of his proclamation, in maner all the multitude cried, God ſaue the king. And manie of them falling downe vpon their knées, could not forbeare with teares guſhing from their eies, but commend the kings great and vnſpeakable mercie thus fréelie offered vnto them, which vndoubtedlie they had at that time all of them receiued, if the wicked ſpéech of ſome of the raſcall ſort, and namelie the traitorous perſuaſions of that wicked caitife Ket himſelfe, had not ſtaied them from their dutifull inclinations. But after that Ket had with lowd voice before declared, that kings & princes were accuſtomed to grant pardons to ſuch as are offendors, and not to others; he truſted that he néeded not anie pardon, ſith he had doone nothing but that belonged to the dutie of a true ſubiect: and herewith he beſought them not to forſake him, but to remember his promiſe, ſith he was readie to ſpend his life in the quarell. The herald herevpon called him traitor, and commanded Iohn Petibone the ſwordbearer of Norwich to attach him for treaſon. Then began a great hurlie burlie among the multitude, ſo that the herald, perceiuing they began to ſhrinke from their former purpoſe of receiuing the kings pardon, departed from them with theſe words; All ye that be the kings friends, come awaie with me. The maior & maiſter Alderich, with a great number of other gentlemen & honeſt yeomen that were readie to obeie the kings commandement, followed him.

The citizens fauouring the rebels.

The maior being thus returned to the citie, cauſed the gates to be ſhut, and ſuch gentlemen as had béene committed to priſon within the caſtell, or other places in the citie, he cauſed to be ſet at libertie, & with their aduiſe tooke order how the rebelles might be kept out. But as he was buſie about ſuch matters, certeine of the citizens that fauored the rebelles had receiued a great multitude of them into the citie, which did put the citizens in ſuch feare, that it was thought the moſt ſuretie for the gentlemen that had béene now releaſed out of priſon, to be ſhut vp againe, leaſt the rebelles finding them abroad, ſhould haue murthered them. Yet after this, when the rebels were departed out of the citie againe, the maior & aldermen fell in hand to rampire vp the gates, to plant ordinance, and to make all neceſſarie prouiſion that for them was poſſible.

At length they fell to ſhooting off their artillerie as well from the citie as from the campe, dooing their beſt to annoie ech other. But when the rebelles ſaw that they did little hurt to the citie with their great ordinance lieng vpon the hill, they remoued the ſame downe to the foot of the ſame hill, and from thenſe began to beat the walles. Notwithſtanding, ſhortlie after they made ſute for a truce to indure for a time, that they might paſſe to and fro through the citie, to fetch in vittels, whereof ſome want began to pinch them in the campe. The maior and aldermen flatlie denied their requeſt, proteſting that they would not permit anie traitors to haue paſſage through their citie.

The rebels ſore kindled in wrath with this anſwer, and deniall of their ſute, came running downe from the hill, and aſſaulting the gates, were beaten off with ſhot of arrowes and other weapons. And yet ſuch rage appéered among the rebels, that the boies and yoong lads ſhewed themſelues ſo deſperat in gathering vp the arrowes, that when they ſaw and felt the ſame ſticking in ſome part of their bodies, they would plucke them foorth, and deliuered them to their bow-men, that they might beſtow the ſame again at the citizens. In all this broile (a thing noteworthie) the ſeditious ſort minding nothing more than the compaſſing of their purpoſe, had as little ſtaie of themſelues in this their outrage, as a bull at the ſight of a cow, or a ſtoned horſſe at the view of a mare; according vnto the old ſaieng of the poet:

Non facile eſt taurum viſa retinere iuuenca,
Fortis equus viſæ ſemper adhinnit equæ.

In the meane time, whileſt they were thus buſie vpon one ſide of the citie, an alarum roſe at the defendants backes, crieng that the rebels were entred the citie on the contrarie ſide: and ſo euerie man ſhrinking awaie, and running thither to repell the enimie there, that part was left void of defendants where the firſt aſſault began. Whereof the rebels being aduiſed, ruſhed into the riuer that runneth before biſhops gate, got to the gates, and breaking them open, entred without anie great reſiſtance. For all the citizens were withdrawne to their houſes and other places, where they hoped beſt to hide themſelues from the furie of their enimies.

The rebelles conueie artillerie and munition out of the citie to their campe.

The rebels hauing thus entred the citie by force, conueied all the guns and artillerie, with other furniture of warre out of the citie into their campe. The herald that was yet abiding in the citie, to ſée if the rebels would before the daie prefixed for their pardons, being not yet expired, giue ouer their enterpriſe, came with the maior into the market place, and in the hearing of a great multitude of people that were come foorth and ſtood about him, he eftſoons gaue commandement in the kings name, that they ſhould laie armes aſide, and get them home to their houſes: which to ſo manie as did, he pronounced a generall pardon, and to the reſt extreme puniſhment by death.

The heralds proclamation in Norwich.

The rebels that ſtood by and heard him, when he had once made an end of his proclamation, bade him get him thenſe with a miſchiefe: for it was not his faire offers, nor his ſwéet flattering words that ſhould beguile them, ſith they made no account of ſuch manner of mercie, that vnder a colour of pardon, ſhould cut off all their ſafetie and hope of preſeruation. The herald perceiuing how obſtinatelie they were bent, and ſet on all miſchiefe, and that it was vnpoſſible to bring them from their outragious treaſon, either through feare of puniſhment or hope of pardon, departed; without hauing brought that to paſſe for which he was ſent. Immediatlie after his departure, the rebels ſought for Leonard Southerton, purpoſing to haue apprehended him, and committed him to priſon, for accompanieng the herald thitherwards. But he hauing knowledge of their meaning, hid himſelfe from them.

The traitorous refuſall of the rebels to accept the kings pardon.

After this, there were by Kets commandement apprehended diuerſe perſons, as the maior, Robert Watſon, William Rogers, Iohn Homerſton, William Brampton, and manie others, which were brought out of the citie, and committed to priſon in mount Surrie. Ket perceiuing well that he muſt either now obteine a bloodie victorie by force againſt his countrie, or elſe to taſt ſuch an end as his vngratious attempts did well deſerue, got togither ſo manie wicked perſons as he might procure to come vnto him from ech ſide, with great rewards and faire promiſes: ſo that it was a ſtrange matter to conſider what a multitude of vnthrifts and raſcalles came to him vpon the ſudden.

Priſoners committed to ward in mount Surrie.

Kets power increaſeth.

The citizens of Norwich were ſore diſpleaſed, that their maior (being an honeſt man, and one greatlie beloued among them) ſhould be impriſoned, and ſo remaine in danger of life among the rebels: for they threatned him ſore, & ieſting at his name, would ſaie one to another; Let vs all come togither to morrow, for we ſhall ſée a * cods hed ſold in the campe for a penie. Whervpon the citizens fearing leaſt through the malice and rage of the rebels, their maior might chance to be made awaie among them, procured maiſter Thomas Alderich (whoſe authoritie was great among them) to be a meane for his deliuerance: who comming to Ket with ſharpe and bitter words reproued him for his cruell dealing, by impriſoning ſo honeſt a man as the maior was, and withall commanded him to releaſe him: which either for ſhame, or rather through feare of a guiltie conſcience that pricked him, he cauſed incontinentlie to be doone: who therevpon might now and then go and come at his pleaſure to and fro the citie. But bicauſe he could not ſtill remaine in the citie, but was conſtreined to continue for the moſt part in the campe, he appointed Auguſtine Steward to be his deputie, who with the aſſiſtance of Henrie Bacon, and John Atkinſon ſhiriffes, gouerned the citie right orderlie, and kept the moſt part of the citizens in due obeiſance.

Auguſtine Steward.

The lord marqueſſe of Northampton ſent into Norffolke to repreſſe the rebels.

The councell aduertiſed now vpon the heralds returne, that there was no waie to reduce theſe Norffolke rebels vnto quiet otherwiſe than by force, appointed the marqueſſe of Northampton with fifteene hundred horſſemen to go downe vnto Norwich to ſubdue thoſe ſtubborne traitors that ſo vndutifullie refuſed the kings mercifull pardon, freelie offered by his officer at armes, and others. There went with the lord marqueſſe diuerſe honorable and worſhipfull perſonages, as the lord Sheffeld, the lord Wentworth, ſir Anthonie Dennie, ſir Henrie Parker, ſir Richard Southwell, ſir Rafe Sadler, ſir John Clere, ſir Rafe Rowlet, ſir Richard Lee, ſir John Gates, ſir Thomas Paſton, ſir Henrie Bedingfield, ſir John Sulfard, ſir William Walgraue, ſir John Cuts, ſir Thomas Cornewallis knights, togither with a great manie of other knights, eſquiers and gentlemen, and a ſmall band of Italians, vnder the leading of a capteine named Malateſta.

Norwich ſummoned.

The lord marqueſſe being approched within a mile of Norwich, ſent ſir Gilbert Dethicke knight, now Garter, then Norrie, king at armes, vnto the citie, to ſummon them within to yeeld it into his hands, or vpon refuſall to proclame warre againſt them. Herevpon Auguſtine Steward the maiors deputie ſent to the maior that was in the campe with Ket, aduertiſing him what meſſage he had receiued from the marqueſſe. The maior ſent word againe, that nothing was more greeuous vnto him, than to ſee into what miſerie the citie and countrie about were brought by the rage of theſe commotions; and declaring in what caſe he ſtood, being kept by force among the rebels, wher as otherwiſe he would (according to his dutie) haue come to his honor. But as for the citie, he had committed the gouernance vnto Auguſtine Steward, who ſhould be readie to ſurrender it into his lordſhips hands: and that if Ket would giue him leaue, he would come himſelfe to his honor, ſubmitting all things wholie to his lordſhips order and diſpoſition.

This meſſage being brought backe by the ſaid Norrie, Auguſtine Steward the maiors deputie with the ſhiriffs, and a great number of the citizens, came to the lord marqueſſes campe, and deliuered vp the ſword to his lordſhip, declaring how the maior himſelfe would gladlie haue come, if he could haue got from the rebels: and that although a great rowt of the lewd citizens were partakers with the rebelles, yet a number of the ſubſtantiall & honeſt citizens would neuer conſent to their wicked doings, but were readie to receiue his lordſhip into their citie. The lord marqueſſe giuing good words to the citizens, and willing them to be of good comfort, ſith he truſted to appeaſe theſe troubles verie ſhortlie, deliuered the ſword vnto ſir Richard Southwell, who bare it before the lord marqueſſe as he paſſed forth towards the citie, entring the ſame by ſaint Stephans gate. And incontinentlie was proclamation made that they ſhould all reſort into the market place, where they conſulted togither how they might beſt defend the citie againſt the enimies, and to repreſſe their furie. Herevpon was order giuen for the placing of watch and ward about the gates and the wals, as might ſeeme expedient. The lord marqueſſe ſupped that night and lodged in the maiors deputies houſe; but his lordſhip as well as other kept their armour on their backs all that night, for doubt of ſome ſudden aſſault to be made againſt the citie by the rebels. Here it chanced that the ſtrangers, either by appointment or otherwiſe, went forth, and offered ſkirmiſh to the rebels vpon Magdalen hill.

Sir Richard Southwell.

The ſtrãgers offer ſkirmiſh to the rebels.

The rebels came forth with their horſſemen: but it ſeemed that they were better practiſed to fetch in booties, than to make their manage or careire, and therefore not able to match the ſtrangers, which being perceiued of their fellowes that were footmen, they put forth their archers before their horſſemen, and ſuch numbers herewith came ſwarming forth of their campe, meaning to compaſſe in thoſe ſtrangers, that they perceiuing the maner and purpoſe of the enimies, caſt themſelues in a ring, and retired backe into the citie againe. But they left one of their companie behind them, a gentleman that was an Italian, who more valiantlie than warilie ventured too farre among the enimies, and through euill hap being ouerthrowne beſide his horſſe, he was inuironed about with a great multitude of thoſe rebels, that tooke him priſoner, and like vile wretches ſpoiling him of his armor and apparell, hanged him ouer the wals of mount Surrie. Which act well ſhewed what courteſie might be looked for at ſuch cruell traitors hands, that would thus vnmercifullie put ſuch a gentleman and worthie ſouldior to death: for whoſe ranſome, if they would haue demanded it, they might haue had no ſmall portion of monie to haue ſatiſfied their greedie minds. But it ſeemed that their beaſtlie crueltie had bereft them the remembrance of all honeſt conſideration and dutifull humanitie.

An Italian hanged by the rebels.

The marqueſſe of Northampton cauſing (as before yee haue heard) diligent watch to be kept vpon the walles, and at the gates, appointed the ſame to be viſited right often, that through negligence no miſhap ſhould follow. Moreouer, beſides the watch at the gates and walles, the reſidue of the ſoldiors making a mightie huge fire in the market place, ſo as all the ſtreets were full of light, they remained there all that night in their armour, readie vpon anie occaſion to reſiſt the enimies if they ſhould make anie attempt. Sir Edward Warner marſhall of the field gaue the watch-word, ſir Thomas Paſton, ſir John Clere, ſir William Walgraue, ſir Thomas Cornwallis, and ſir Henrie Bedingfield were appointed to the defenſe of other parts of the citie. And now when euerie thing was thought to be ſafelie prouided for, and that the lord marqueſſe and other were laid to take their reſt, the rebels about the middeſt of the night began to ſhoot off their great artillerie towards the citie, ſo thicke as was poſſible: but the bullets paſſed ouer their heads that were lodged in the citie, without dooing anie great hurt at all.

Sir Edward Warner.

The lord marqueſſe, by reaſon of the often alarums that were giuen, whileſt the enimies thus ceaſed not to rage with continuall ſhot of ordinance, was called vp by the marſhall ſir Edward Warner; and comming into the market place, accompanied with the nobles and gentlemen of the armie, fell in councell with them, how to foreſee that the citie in ſuch danger might be ſafelie defended againſt the enimies with ſuch ſmall power as he had there with him. It was therefore determined, that all the gates which were on the contrarie part of the towne from the rebels campe, and likewiſe the ruinous places of the walles ſhould be rampired vp, that if the enimies ſhould chance to giue an aſſault to the citie, they might more eaſilie be repelled.

But as theſe things were in dooing, and almoſt brought to end, in a manner all the whole multitude of the rebelles came out of their cabins, running downe in moſt furious maner to the citie, and with great ſhouts and yelling cries went about to ſet fire on the gates, to clime ouer the walles, to paſſe the riuer, and to enter the citie at ſuch places where the walles were through age decaied and ruinous. The ſoldiors that were there with the lord marqueſſe, did ſhew their vttermoſt indeuor to beat backe the enimies. This fight in moſt cruell wiſe continued for the ſpace of thrée houres without ceaſing, the rebels forcing themſelues to the vttermoſt of their powers to enter perforce vpon them, and they within the citie ſhewed no leſſe courage to repell them backe. The hardie manhood of diuerſe knights, and other men of worſhip was here right apparant. It was ſtrange to ſée the deſperat boldneſſe of the rebelles, that when they were thruſt through the bodies or thighs, and ſome of them hough-ſinewed, would yet ſéeke reuenge in ſtriking at their aduerſaries; when their hands were ſcarſe able to hold vp their weapon; thinking themſelues ſomewhat ſatiſfied if the humor of their enuie and deadlie ſpite might be fed but with a drop of their aduerſaries bloud; with ſuch a malignant ſpirit (tending wholie to vengeance) theſe deſperat rebels were poſſeſſed, according to the poets ſpéech in the like ſenſe and meaning:

The deſperatneſſe of rebelles.

Iuuenal. ſat. 13.

Inuidioſa dabit minimus ſolatia ſanguis.

But ſuch was the valiancie of the gentlemen and ſoldiers, which were there with the lord marqueſſe, that in the end the enimies which were alreadie entered the citie, were beaten out againe, and driuen backe to their accuſtomed kennell holes with loſſe of thrée hundred of their numbers. They within the towne hauing thus repelled the enimies, & accounting themſelues in more ſafetie than before, for the reſt of the night that yet remained, which was not much, they gaue themſelues to refreſh their wearied bodies with ſome ſléepe. The next daie, the lord marqueſſe was informed by ſome of the citizens, that there were no ſmall number in Kets campe that would gladlie come from him, if they might be ſure of their pardon; and that at Pockethorpe gate there were foure or fiue thouſand, that wiſhed for nothing more than for pardon: and that if the ſame were offered them, there were no doubt (as they beléeued) but that they would ſubmit themſelues to the kings mercie.

The rebels beaten backe.

The marqueſſe was glad to vnderſtand ſo much, & incontinentlie diſpatched Norreie king at armes, with a trumpetter, to aſſure them on the kings behalfe, that they ſhould be pardoned for all offenſes paſt, and that had béene committed in time of this rebellion, if they would laie armes aſide. Norreie and the trumpet comming to the gate, found not a man there: but the trumpetter ſounding his trumpet, there came running downe from the hill a great multitude of their people, & amongſt other as chiefe, one Flotman, whome Norreie commanded to ſtaie. Wherevpon the ſaid Flotman aſked him what was the matter, and wherefore he had called them togither by ſound of trumpet? Go thy waies (ſaid he) & tell thy companie from my lord marqueſſe of Northhampton, the kings maieſties lieutenant, that he commandeth them to ceaſſe from committing anie further outrage: and if they will (ſaith he) obeie his commandement, all that is paſt, ſhall be forgiuen and pardoned.

Flotman.

Pardon offered to the rebels.

Flotman hauing heard Norreies declaration, as he was an outragious and buſie fellow, preſumptuouſlie made anſwer, that he cared not a pins point for my lord marqueſſe, and withall, like a rebellious traitor, railed vpon his lordſhip, and mainteined, that he and the reſt of the rebels were earneſt defendors of the kings roiall maieſtie, and that they had taken weapon in hand not againſt the king, but in his defenſe, as in time it ſhould appeare, as they that ſought nothing but to mainteine his maieſties roiall eſtate, the libertie of their countrie, and the ſafetie of their commonwealth, &c. To conclude, he vtterlie refuſed the kings pardon, and told Norreie certeinelie, that they would either reſtore the common-wealth from decaie, into the which it was fallen, being oppreſſed thorough the couetouſneſſe and tyrannie of the gentlemen; either elſe would they like men die in the quarrell.

Flotmans preſumptuous and traitorous allegations.

Scarſelie had he made an end of his tale, when ſuddenlie a fearefull alarum was raiſed thorough-out the citie: for whileſt Flotman was thus in talke with the king of armes at Pockethorpe gate, the rebels in great rage entring the citie by the hoſpitall, went about to bring all things to deſtruction: but being incountered néere to the biſhops palace, by the lord marqueſſe his men, there inſued a bloudie conflict betwixt them, which continued long with great fierceneſſe and eger reuenge on both parts. There died about ſeuen ſcore of the rebels, and of the ſoldiers that ſerued againſt them ſome number, beſide a great multitude that were hurt and wounded on both parts. But the pitifull ſlaughter of the lord Sheffeld, who hauing more regard to his honor than ſafetie of life, deſirous to ſhew ſome proofe of his noble valiancie, entering amongſt the enimies, as he fought right hardilie, though not ſo warilie as had béene expedient, fell into a dich as he was about to turne his horſſe: & herewith being compaſſed about with a number of thoſe horrible traitors, was ſlaine amongeſt them: although he both declared what he was, and offered largelie to the vilans, if they would haue ſaued his life. But the more noble he ſhewed himſelfe to be, the more were they kindled in outragious furie againſt him. And as he pulled off his head péece, that it might appeare what he was, a butcherlie knaue named Fulks, who by occupation was both a carpenter & a butcher, ſlat him in the head with a club, and ſo moſt wretchedlie killed him. A lamentable caſe, that ſo noble a yoong gentleman, indued with ſo manie commendable qualities, as were to be wiſhed in a man of his calling, ſhould thus miſerablie end his daies by the hands of ſo vile a vilan.

The rebels enter the citie.

The lord Sheffeld wofullie ſlaine.

Diuerſe other gentlemen and worthie ſoldiers came to the like end among thoſe outragious rebels, and amongſt other, Robert Woluaſton, that was appointed to kéepe the doore of Chriſts church, was killed by the ſame Fulks, who tooke him for ſir Edmund Kneuet, againſt whome the rebels bare great malice, for that he ſought to annoie them ſo farre as by anie meanes he might, as partlie ye haue heard. But the ſlaughter of that noble man the lord Sheffeld, ſore diſcouraged the reſidue of the ſoldiers that were come with the lord marqueſſe. And on the other part, the rebels were aduanced thereby, in greater hope to preuaile againſt them, and therevpon preaſſed forward with ſuch hardineſſe, that they cauſed the lord marqueſſe and his people to giue place, and to forſake the citie, euerie man making the beſt ſhift he could to ſaue himſelfe. But yet diuerſe gentlemen of good account and worſhip remaining behind, and abiding the brunt, were taken priſoners, as ſir Thomas Cornewallis, and others, whome the rebels afterwards kept in ſtreict durance, vntill the daie came of their ouerthrow by the kings power, vnder the conduction of the earle of Warwike.

Alexander Neuill.

The lord marqueſſe and the reſidue that eſcaped, made the beſt ſhift they could to get out of danger; and at length, he and the moſt part of them that went foorth with him, came to London. The rebels hauing thus repelled the lord marqueſſe & his power, ſet fire on the citie, whereby manie faire buildings were conſumed and burnt. It happened yet well the ſame time, that there fell great abundance of raine, the which holpe in part to quench the rage of the fire. Neuertheles, all the houſes on either ſide of Holmes ſtréet, and the hoſpitall of the poore; alſo Biſhops gate, Pockthorpe gate, Magdalene gate, and Bearestréet gate, with manie other houſes in other parts of the citie, were burned, and fowlie defaced with fire. The citizens were brought into ſuch extreame miſerie, that they knew not which waie to turne them. Some there were that fled out of the citie, taking with them their gold and ſiluer, and ſuch ſhort ware as they might conueie awaie with them, abandoning wife and children, to reſt at the mercie of the rebels. Other hid their goods in wels, priuies, and other ſuch ſecret places out of the waie.

The miſerable eſtate of Norwich.

The rebels entering into the houſes of ſuch as were knowne to be wealthie men, ſpoiled and bare awaie all that might be found of anie value. But to ſpeake of all the cruell parts which they plaied, it would be tedious to expreſſe the ſame, their doings were ſo wicked and outragious. There was ſhooting, howling, and wringing among them, wéeping, and crieng out of women and children. To be ſhort, the ſtate of the citie at that preſent was moſt miſerable. The maiors deputie kept himſelfe cloſe in his houſe, and might behold all this miſchiefe and deſtruction of the citie, but durſt not come abroad, nor go about to ſtaie them: at length, a great multitude of the rebels that were come downe frō their campe, entering by ſaint Auguſtines gate, came ſtraight to his houſe, and ſtroue to breake open the doores: but when they could not eaſilie bring their purpoſe to paſſe that waie foorth, they began to fire the houſe. Wherevpon for feare to be burned within his owne lodging, he ſet open the doores, and in came thoſe vnmanerlie gheſts, tooke him, plucked his gowne beſide his backe, called him traitor, and threatened to kill him, if he would not tell them where the lord marqueſſe of Northampton had hidden himſelfe.

The aldermans deputie roughlie handled to tell where the lord marqueſſe had hidden himſelfe.

And when he had told them that vndoubtedlie he and all his companie were gone, they were in a great rage, and with terrible noiſe and rumbling they ſought euerie corner of the houſe for him, and taking what they found, they departed. But yet manie of them afterwards partlie pacified for a péece of monie, and other things which they receiued of the maior, and partlie reproued for the wrongfull robberies by ſome that were in credit among them, they brought againe ſuch packs and fardels as they had truſſed vp togither, and threw them into the ſhops of thoſe houſes, out of the which they had taken the ſame before: but yet there were diuers of the citizens that were ſpoiled of all that they had by thoſe rebels, that entered their houſes vnder a colour to ſéeke for the marqueſſe of Northamptons men. Namelie, the houſes of thoſe citizens that were fled, were ſpoiled and ranſacked moſt miſerablie, for they reputed and called them traitors and enimies to their king and countrie, that thus had forſaken their houſes and dwellings in time of ſuch neceſſitie: yet manie of the citizens bringing foorth bread, béere, and other vittels vnto the rebels to refreſh them with, ſomewhat calmed their furious rage, and ſo eſcaped their violent hands, although no ſmall number were ſo fléeſed (as before yée haue heard) that they haue liued the worſe for it all the daies of their life ſince that time.

Reliefe miniſtred to the rebels for feare of force.

But now the rebels hauing thus got poſſeſſion of the citie, & chaſed awaie the kings people, they tooke order to haue the gates kept hourelie with watch and ward of the citizens themſelues, thretning them with moſt ſhamefull death, if they omitted the ſame. Theſe vnrulie perſons were ſo farre ſtept into all kind of beaſtlie outrage, that when it rained, they would kenell vp themſelues in the churches, abuſing the place appointed for the ſeruice and worſhipping of the almightie God, in moſt prophane and wicked manner, and neither praier nor yet threats of men or women that aduiſed them to modeſtie could take place. The kings maieſtie aduertiſed therefore, that there was no waie to tame their diueliſh and traitorous outrage, but by force: with the aduiſe of his councell cauſed a power to be put in a readineſſe, as well of his owne ſubiects as of ſtrangers, namelie lancequenets, which were come to ſerue his maieſtie againſt the Scots.

But now it was thought expedient to vſe their ſeruice againſt theſe rebels, whoſe power and deſperate boldneſſe was ſo farre increaſed, that without a maine armie, guided by ſome generall of great experience, and noble conduct, it would be hard and right dangerous to ſubdue them: wherein violence and force was to be vſed, ſith they had ſhewed themſelues in an extremitie of ſtubbornneſſe, like buls that by baiting are to be tamed, or like ſtiffenecked ſtallons which with bit & bridle muſt be managed; as one ſaith:

Aſper equus duris contunditur ora lupatis.

Héerevpon that noble chéefteine and valiant erle of Warwike, latelie before appointed to haue gone againſt the Scots and Frenchmen into Scotland, was called backe, and commanded to take vpon him the conduction of this armie againſt the Norffolke rebels: for ſuch was the opinion then conceiued of that honorable earle, for the high manhood, valiant proweſſe, and great experience in all warlike enterpriſes, ſufficientlie tried, and knowne to reſt in him, that either they might be vanquiſhed and ouercome by him, or by none other.

The earle of Warwike appointed to go againſt the Norffolke rebels.

Capteine Ket and his rebellious armie, hauing ſome aduertiſement by rumors ſpred, of this preparation and comming of an armie againſt them; they were not ſlacke to make themſelues ſtrong and readie to abide all the hazard that fortune of warre might bring. The earle of Warwike then, after that his men and prouiſions were readie, did ſet forward, and came vnto Cambridge, where the lord marqueſſe of Northampton and other met his lordſhip. Héere alſo diuerſe citizens of Norwich came to him, and falling downe vpon their knees before him, beſought him to be good lord vnto them; and withall declared their miſerable ſtate, great gréefe and ſorrow, which they had conceiued for the wretched deſtruction of their countrie: beſéeching him to haue pitie vpon them. And if in ſuch extremitie of things as had happened vnto their citie, they had through feare or ignorance committed anie thing contrarie to their dutifull allegiance, that it might pleaſe his honor to pardon them their offenſes in ſuch behalfe, ſith if anie thing were amiſſe on their parts, the ſame came to paſſe ſore againſt their wils, and to their extreame gréefe and ſorrow.

The earle of Warwike commeth to Cambridge.

The earle of Warwike told them, that he knew indéed in what danger they had béene among thoſe vnrulie ribalds; and as for anie offenſe which they had committed, he knew not: for in leauing their citie ſith matters were growne to ſuch extremitie, they were to be borne with, but in one thing they had ouerſhot themſelues: for that in the beginning they had not ſought to repreſſe thoſe tumults, ſith if they had put themſelues in defenſe of their countrie, to reſiſt the rebels at the firſt, ſuch miſchiefs as were now growne, might eaſilie haue béene auoided. But neuertheleſſe, vpon this their humble ſubmiſſion, he granted them all the kings mercifull pardon, and commanding them to prouide themſelues of armour and weapon, appointed them to march forth with the armie, wearing certeine laces or ribons about their necks for a difference, that they might be knowne from others. There were in this armie vnder the earle of Warwike diuerſe men of honor and great worſhip, as lords, knights, eſquiers, and gentlemen in great numbers. Firſt the lord marqueſſe of Northampton, and ſundrie of them that had béene with him before, deſirous to be reuenged of his late repulſe, the lords Willoughbie, Powes and Braie, Ambroſe Dudleie, ſonne to the ſaid earle, and at this preſent worthilie adorned with the title (which his father then bare) of earle of Warwike, and his brother lord Robert Dudleie now erle of Leiceſter; alſo Henrie Willoughbie eſquier, ſir Thomas Treſham, ſir Marmaduke conſtable, William Deuereux ſonne to the lord Ferrers of Chartleie, ſir Edmund Kneuet, ſir Thomas Palmer, ſir Andrew Flammocke, and diuerſe other knights, eſquiers, and gentlemen: all which plaid their parts as time and occaſion was miniſtred vnto them to giue triall of their manhood.

The earle of Warwike, and ſuch as were come with him to Cambridge, marched directlie from thence towards Norwich, and came vnto Wimondham the two and twentith of Auguſt, where and by the waie the moſt part of all the gentlemen of Norfolke that were at libertie, came vnto him. The next daie betimes he ſhewed himſelfe vpon the plaine, betwixt the citie of Norwich and Eiton wood, and lodged that night at Intwood, an houſe belonging to ſir Thomas Treſham knight, a two miles diſtant from Norwich. Héere they reſted that daie and night following, not once putting off their armour, but remaining ſtill in a readineſſe, if the enimies ſhould haue made anie ſudden inuaſion againſt them. The earle of Warwike in the meane time ſent the afore remembred king of armes Norreie, to ſummon the citie, either to open the gates that he might quietlie enter; or elſe to looke for warre at his hands that would then aſſaie to win it by force, and ſuch reward as rebels (that wilfullie withſtand their ſoueraigne) ought to receiue.

Norwich ſummoned.

When Ket vnderſtood that the herald was come to the gates, he appointed the maiors deputie Auguſtine Steward, and Robert Rug, two of the chéefeſt citizens, to go to him and to know his errand. They paſſing forth at a poſterne, and hearing his meſſage, made anſwer, that they were the miſerableſt men that were then liuing, as they themſelues beléeued, ſith that hauing ſuffered ſuch calamities as they could not but tremble at in calling to remembrance, they could not now haue libertie to declare the loiall dutie which they bare & ought to beare to the kings highneſſe: ſo that they accompted themſelues moſt vnfortunate, ſith their hap was to liue in that ſeaſon, in which they muſt either ieopard loſſe of life, or the eſtimation of their good name, although they truſted the kings maieſtie would be gratious lord vnto them, ſith they had giuen no conſent vnto ſuch wicked rebellion as was thus raiſed againſt his highneſſe, but with loſſe of goods and perill of life ſo farre as in them laie, had doone what they could to kéepe the citizens in good order and dutifull obedience.

What anſwer was made to the herald by the citizens of Norwich, whom Ket aſſigned therevnto.

One thing more they would humblie deſire of my lord of Warwike, that whereas there was no ſmall number of Kets armie in the citie without armour or weapon, and as it ſhould ſéeme irkeſome and wearie of that which had béene alreadie doone, it might pleaſe him once againe to vouchſafe to offer them the kings pardon, and if he ſhould thus doo, they had great hope that the rebels would gladlie accept it, and ſo the matter might be pacified without more bloudſhed. Norreie returned to the earle of Warwike, and declared what anſwer he had receiued. The earle deſirous of nothing more than to haue the matter thus taken vp, as well for other conſiderations, as for feare leaſt the gentlemen remaining priſoners with the rebels, ſhould be vnmercifullie murthered by their kéepers, if they came to the vttermoſt triall of battell, he reſolued to proue if it would thus come to paſſe. And héerevpon was Norreie with a trumpet ſent to offer them a generall pardon, who being entered the citie, met about fortie of the rebels on horſſebacke, riding two and two togither verie pleaſant and merrie, and ſo paſſing from S. Stephans gate vnto Biſhops gate, the trumpetter ſounded his trumpet, and with that, a great multitude of the rebels came thronging downe togither from the hill: to whome the horſmen ſpéedilie riding, commanded that they ſhould diuide themſelues, and ſtand in order vpon either ſide the waie. And as Norreie and the trumpetter, with two of the chéefe citizens entred betwixt them, they were receiued with great noiſe and clamour, for euerie of them putting off their hats or caps, cried; God ſaue king Edward, God ſaue king Edward.

Norreie the herald deliuereth his anſwer to the earle of Warwike.

Norreie king of armes ſent to offer the rebels their pardon.

Norreie and the two citizens, highlie commending them herein, requeſted them to kéepe their place and order wherein they ſtood for a while: and then Norreie paſſing forth about two hundred and fiftie paſes, came to the top of the hill, and putting on his coate armour, ſtaied a while (for Ket was not yet come) and at length began to declare vnto them in what maner diuers times ſince firſt they had taken armes in hand, the kings maieſtie by ſundrie perſons, as well heralds as other, had ſought to reduce them from their vnlawfull and rebellious tumults, vnto their former dutie and obedience; and yet neuertheleſſe, they had ſhewed themſelues wilfull and ſtubborne, in refuſing his mercifull pardon fréelie offered vnto them, and deſpiſed the meſſengers which his grace had ſent vnto them to pronounce the ſame. He willed them therefore to call themſelues now at length to remembrance, and to behold the ſtate of the common-wealth, which they ſo often to no purpoſe had ſtill in their mouths, and neuertheleſſe by them miſerablie defaced, & brought in danger of vtter ruine and decaie.

Norreie the herald maketh a long diſcourſe to the rebels, for the reducing of them to good order.

And herewith diſcourſing at large of the horrible, wicked, and heinous murthers, riots, burnings, and other crimes by them committed, he willed them to conſider into what ſea of miſchéefes they had throwne themſelues, and what puniſhment they ought to looke for as due to them for the ſame; ſith as well the wrath of God as the kings armie was hanging ouer their heads, and readie at hand, which they were not able to reſiſt. For his grace had reſolued no longer to ſuffer ſo great and preſumptuous a miſchéefe as this, to be foſtered in the middle of his realme: and therefore had appointed the right honourable earle of Warwike, a man of noble fame and approoued valiancie, to be his generall lieutenant of that his roiall armie, to perſecute them with fire and ſword; and not to leaue off, till he had vtterlie diſperſed and ſcattered that wicked and abhominable aſſemblie. And yet ſuch was the excéeding greatneſſe of the kings bountifull mercie and clemencie, that he that was by him appointed to be a reuenger of their heinous treaſons committed againſt his maieſtie, if they continued in their obſtinate wilfulneſſe, ſhould be alſo the interpretor and miniſter of his gratious and frée pardon, to ſo manie as would accept it. Which vnleſſe they now imbraſed, the ſaid earle had made a ſolemne vow, that they ſhould neuer haue it offered to them againe; but that he would perſecute them till he had puniſhed the whole multitude according vnto their iuſt deſerts.

How the rebels were affected after the heralds diſcourſe was ended.

Manie that heard him, hauing due conſideration of their miſerable eſtate, were touched with ſome remorſe of conſcience, fearing at length to taſt the reuenge of ſuch horrible crimes as they had been partakers of with others in committing the ſame. But the more part finding themſelues highlie offended with his words, began to iangle (as they had doone before vnto other that had béene ſent to offer them pardon) that he was not the kings herald, but ſome one made out by the gentlemen in ſuch a gaie coate, patched togither of veſtments and church-ſtuffe, being ſent onelie to deceiue them, in offering them pardon, which would proue nought elſe but halters; and therefore it were well doone, to thruſt an arrow into him, or to hang him vp. Although other ſéemed dutifullie to reuerence him, and diuerſe that had ſerued in Scotland and at Bullongne, remembring that they had ſéene him there and knew him, told and perſuaded their fellowes, that he was the kings herald indéed. Wherevpon they became more mild, and offered him no further iniurie: but yet they could not be perſuaded that this pardon tended to anie other end, but to bring them to deſtruction; and that in ſtéed of pardon, there was prepared for them nought elſe but a barrell full of halters.

The herald is grudged at & miſtruſted of ſome, &c.

Such lewd ſpéech was amongſt them, ſauouring altogither of malicious miſtruſt, and moſt wilfull treaſon. Norreie neuertheleſſe departing from thenſe, accompanied with Ket, came to another place, where he made the like proclamation: for the multitude was ſuch that he could not be heard of them all in one place. Héere, before he had made an end of his tale, there was a vile boie (as ſome write) that turned vp his bare taile to him, with words as vnſéemelie as his geſture was filthie: with which ſpitefull reproch thus ſhewed towards the kings maieſties officer at armes, one (which in companie of ſome other that were come ouer the water to view things) being greatlie offended, with an harquebuſe ſhot ſtroke that vngratious lad through the bodie a little aboue the reins.

Alexander Neuill.

The iuſt reward of a wretched boie.

Which when ſome of the rebels had ſéene, a dozen of their horſſemen came galloping out of the wood, crieng; We are betraied fréends, we are betraied, if you looke not about you: doo you not ſée how our fellowes are ſlaine with guns before our faces? What may we hope if we diſarme our ſelues, that are thus vſed being armed? This herald goeth about nothing elſe, but to bring vs within danger of ſome ambuſh, that the gentlemen may kill and beate vs all downe at their pleaſure. Héerevpon they all ſhranke awaie, and fled, as they had béene out of their wits: yet did their great capteine Robert Ket accompanie Norreie, meaning (as hath béene ſaid) to haue gone to the earle of Warwike himſelfe, to haue talked with him: but as he was almoſt at the foot of the hill, there came running after him a great multitude of the rebels, crieng to him, and aſking him whither he went; We are readie (ſaid they) to take ſuch part as you doo, be it neuer ſo bad: and if he would go anie further, they would (as they ſaid) ſurelie follow him.

Ket meant to haue talked with the earle of Warwike.

Norreie then perceiuing ſuch numbers of people following them, deſired Ket to ſtaie them: who returning backe to them, they were incontinentlie appeaſed, and ſo they all returned with him backe to their campe. When the earle of Warwike vnderſtood that they were thus altogither ſet on miſchéefe, and neither with praier, proffer of pardon, threatening of puniſhment, nor other meanes they could be reduced to quietneſſe, he determined to procéed againſt them by force. And héerevpon bringing his armie vnto ſaint Stephans gate, which the rebels ſtopped vp, with the letting downe of the portculice, he commanded thoſe that had charge of the artillerie, to plant the ſame againſt the gate, and with batterie to breake it open.

S. Stephans gate.

As theſe things were in hand, he vnderſtood by Auguſtine Steward the maiors deputie, that there was an other gate on the contrarie ſide of the citie, called the Braſen gate, which the rebels had rammed vp, but yet not ſo, but that it might be eaſilie broken open. Herewith were the pioners called, and commanded to breake open that gate alſo: which being doone, the ſoldiers entered by the ſame into the citie, and ſlue diuerſe of thoſe rebels that ſtood readie to defend and reſiſt their entrie. In the meane time had the gunners alſo broken in ſunder with their ſhot the portculice, and néere hand the one halfe of the other gate, by the which the marques of Northampton, and capteine Drurie, alias Poignard (that being ſent from London met my lord of Warwike by the waie) entered with their bands, and droue backe the rebels with ſlaughter, that were readie there to reſiſt them.

The Braſen gate.

Moreouer, the maiors deputie cauſed Weſtwike gate to be ſet open: at the which the earle of Warwike himſelfe entring with all his armie, and finding in manner no reſiſtance, came to the market place. Here were taken a thréeſcore of the rebels, the which according to the order of martiall law were incontinentlie executed, according to the qualitie of their offenſe, confeſſing (no doubt) in conſcience, that their puniſhment was proportioned to their treſpaſſe, and that in dieng the death (were the ſame neuer ſo extreame & dredfull) they had but their deſert; and therefore might well ſaie with the poet:

Supplicia & ſcelerum pœnas expendimus omnes. Virgil.

Shortlie after, the carriages belonging to the armie were brought into the citie by the ſame gate, and paſſing through the citie, by negligence & want of order giuen to them that attended on the ſame carriage, they kept on forward till they were got out at Biſhops gate towards Mouſehold. Whereof the rebels being aduiſed, they came downe, & ſetting vpon the carters, and other that attended on the cariages, put them to flight, and droue awaie the carts laden with artillerie, powder, and other munition, bringing the ſame into their campe, & greatlie reioiſing thereof, bicauſe they had no great ſtore of ſuch things among them: but yet capteine Drurie with his band comming in good time to the reſcue, recouered ſome of the carts from the enimies, not without ſome ſlaughter on either ſide. Moreouer, the enimies as yet being not fullie driuen out of the citie, placed themſelues in croſſe ſtréets, & were readie to aſſaile the ſoldiers as they ſaw their aduantage, part of them ſtanding at S. Michaels, part at S. Stephans, and part at S. Peters, and ſome of them alſo ſtood in Wimers ſtréet.

Cartes laden with munition taken by the rebels.

Here they aſſailing ſuch as vnaduiſedlie were entered within their danger, they ſlue diuerſe, and among other thrée or foure gentlemen, before they could be ſuccoured from anie part. The erle of Warwike aduertiſed hereof, paſſed forth with all his forces to remoue the enimie, and comming to S. Andrew in Iohns ſtréet, was receiued with a ſharpe ſtorme of arrowes: but capteine Drurie his harquebuſiers galled them ſo with their ſhot, that they were glad to giue place, and ſo fled amaine. There were ſlaine a hundred and thirtie, and diuerſe of them ſhrinking aſide into churchyards and other places vnder the walles, were taken and executed. All the reſt got them vp to their campe at Mouſehold, and ſo the citie was rid of them for that time. Then did the erle of Warwike take order for the ſafe keeping of the citie, appointing watch and ward to be kept on the walles, and in euerie ſtreet. Alſo that all the gates ſhould be rammed vp, except one or two that ſtood towards the enimies, at the which were planted certeine peeces of the great artillerie.

Alexander Neuill.

But the rebels vnderſtanding that the earle of Warwike wanted powder and other things apperteining to the vſe of the great ordinance, and withall perceiuing that the Welſhmen which were appointed to the gard of the ſaid great peeces of artillerie were no great number, and therefore not able to reſiſt anie great force that ſhould come againſt them, they came downe the hill vpon the ſudden as it were wholie togither in moſt outragious maner. And withall one Miles that was a verie perfect gunner, and maruellous ſkilfull in the feat of ſhooting of great artillerie, and at that time remaining among the rebels, ſhot off a peece; and ſlue one of the kings principall gunners, that was attending vpon thoſe peeces of artillerie, which ſtood thus before the gate. Whom when the rebels perceiued thus to be ſlaine, they made forward with more courage, and gaue ſuch a deſperate onſet vpon them that garded the ſaid artillerie, that their ſmall number, being not able to withſtand their aduerſaries great and huge multitude preſſing in ſuch furious rage vpon them, that they were conſtreined to flee backe, and to leaue the artillerie for a preie vnto the enimies, who ſeizing vpon the ſame, conueied them awaie with certeine carts laden with all manner of munition for wars vp to their campe: a matter (as was thought) of no ſmall importance, ſith the enimies thereby were furniſhed now with ſuch things, whereof before they ſtood moſt in need, and now hauing ſtore thereof, they ſpared not liberallie to beſtow it againſt the citie, beating downe not onlie the higheſt top of Biſhops gate, but alſo a great part of the wals on that ſide.

The rebels take certeine peeces of artillerie from the earle of Warwike.

Capteine Drurie.

And here trulie the good ſeruice of capteine Drurie is not to be forgotten, who now as earſt being readie to reuenge this iniurie, following vpon the enimies, put them to flight, and recouered much of that which they had taken from the earls ſouldiers. The earle of Warwike after this cut off the entries at the gates, and rampired them vp, placed at the bridges and turnings of the waies and ſtreets diuers bands of ſoldiers to keepe the paſſages, brake downe the White friers bridge, and at Biſhops gate he appointed the lord Willoughbie with a great number of ſoldiers to defend that part, & in this ſort he made prouiſion to defend the citie from the rebels, if they ſhould attempt to make anie ſurpriſe vpon the ſudden.

Councell giuen to the erle of Warwike to abandon the citie.

The next daie yet they paſſing ouer the riuer, ſet fire on certeine houſes at Conneſforth, burning the more part of all the houſes of two pariſhes: and ſo great was the rage of the fire, that catching hold vpon an houſe wherein the merchants of Norwich vſe to laie vp ſuch wares and merchandize as they conueie to their citie from Yermouth, the ſame houſe with great ſtore of wheat and other riches was miſerablie conſumed and defaced. Thus whileſt euerie thing ſeemed to chance and fall out in fauour of the rebels, there were ſome in the earle of Warwiks armie, that deſpairing of the whole ſucceſſe of their iourneie, came to the earle of Warwike, and began to perſuade with him, that ſith the citie was large, and their companies ſmall (for in deed the whole appointed numbers as yet were not come, neither of ſtrangers nor Engliſhmen) it was vnpoſſible to defend it againſt ſuch an huge multitude as were aſſembled togither in Kets campe, and therefore beſought him to regard his owne ſafetie, to leaue the citie, and not to hazard all vpon ſuch an vncerteine maine chance.

The earles anſwere.

The earle of Warwike as he was of a noble and inuincible courage, valiant, hardie, and not able to abide anie ſpot of reproch, whereby to loſe the leaſt peece of honour that might be, made this anſwer: Whie (ſaith he) and doo your harts faile you ſo ſoone? Or are you ſo mad withall, to thinke that ſo long as anie life reſteth in me, that I will conſent to ſuch diſhonour? Should I leaue the citie, heaping vp to my ſelfe and likewiſe to you ſuch ſhame and reproofe as worthilie might be reputed an infamie to vs for euer? I will rather ſuffer whatſoeuer either fire or ſword can worke againſt me. Theſe words being vttered with ſuch a courage as was maruellous to conſider, he drew out his ſword. Which other of the honorable and worſhipfull that were then preſent likewiſe did, whome he commanded that each one ſhould kiſſe others ſword, according to an ancient cuſtome vſed amongſt men of war in time of great danger: and herewith they made a ſolemne vow, binding it with a ſolemne oth, that they ſhould not depart from thence, till they had either vanquiſhed the enimies, or loſt their liues in manfull fight for defenſe of the kings honour.

Lancequenets come to the earle of Warwike.

The rebels truſt in vaine propheſies.

Whileſt theſe things were in dooing, the rebels brake into the citie on that ſide, where was no ſuſpicion of their entring at all; but being come almoſt to the bridges, they were incountered by the ſoldiers, beaten backe, and chaſed out by the ſame waie they came. The next daie being the ſix and twentith of Auguſt, there came to the earle 1400 lancequenets. The rebels notwithſtanding that ſuch reinforcement of the earles power might haue ſomewhat diſcouraged them, yet truſting altogither to certeine vaine propheſies, which they had among them, and ſet out in verſes by ſuch wiſards as were there with them in the campe, they had conceiued ſuch a vaine hope of proſperous ſucceſſe in their buſineſſe, that they little eſteemed anie power that might come againſt them. Among other of thoſe ſame verſes, theſe were two:

The countrie gnuffes, Hob, Dick, and Hick, with clubs and clowted ſhoone,
Shall fill vp Duſsin dale with bloud of ſlaughtered bodies ſoone.

The rebels remoue.

Vpon hope therefore of this and other vaine propheſies, the rebels through the diuels procurement, that had nouriſhed and pricked them forward all this while in their wicked proceedings, determined to remoue thither, to the end that they might with more ſpeed make an end of the matter, before they ſhould be driuen to diſperſe themſelues by famine. For the earle of Warwike had taken order to haue the paſſages ſtopped, in ſuch wiſe as no vittels could eaſilie be conueied to their campe, the want whereof began alreadie to pinch them. Herevpon ſetting fire on their cabins, which they had raiſed and built here and there of timber and buſhes (the ſmoke whereof couered all the grounds about them) they came downe with their enſignes into the vallie called Duſſin dale, where with all ſpeed that might be they intrenched themſelues about, and raiſing a rampire of a good height, ſet ſtakes alſo round about them, to keepe off the horſſemen.

The earle of Warwike goeth forth to giue the enimies battell.

Pardon offered.

The earle of Warwike perceiuing their doings, the next daie being the ſeuen and twentith of Auguſt with all his horſſemen, and the Almans with capteine Druries band, iſſued forth of the citie, marching ſtreight towards the enimies. Yet before he approched in ſight of them, he ſent ſir Edmund Kneuet & ſir Thomas Palmer knights, with others, to vnderſtand of them, whether now at length they would ſubmit themſelues, & receiue the kings pardon; which if they would doo, he offred to grant it freelie to all the whole multitude, one or two of them onelie excepted:

red: but they with generall voices refuſing it, the earle fell in hand to incourage his people vnto the battell, and hauing appointed as well the horſſemen as footmen in what order they ſhould giue the charge, they paſſed forward in approching the enimies. The rebels beholding them thus to come forward, put themſelues in order of battell, in ſuch manner, that all the gentlemen which had béene taken priſoners, and were kept in irons for ſtarting awaie, were placed in the fore ranke of their battell, coupled two and two togither, to the end they might be killed by their owne friends that came to ſéeke their deliuerance: but yet as God would haue it, the moſt part of them were ſaued. Miles the maiſter gunner among the rebels, leuieng a péece of ordinance, ſhot it off, and ſtroke him that caried the kings ſtandard in the thigh, and the horſſe through the ſhoulder.

The earle of Warwike and others ſore grieued therewith, cauſed a whole volie of artillerie to be ſhot off at the rebels: and herewith capteine Drurie with his owne band, & the Almans or lanceknights, whether ye liſt to call them, on foot, getting néere to the enimies, hailſed them with their harquebut ſhot ſo ſharplie, and thruſt forward vpon them with their pikes ſo ſtronglie, that they brake them in ſunder. The gentlemen, who (as we haue ſaid) were placed in the fore ranke, found meanes (as good hap was) to ſhrinke aſide, and eſcaped the danger for the more part, although ſome indéed were ſlaine by the Almans, and other that knew not what they were. The light horſſemen of the kings part herewith gaue in amongſt them ſo roundlie, that the rebels not able to abide their valiant charge, were eaſilie put to flight, and with the formoſt their grand capteine Robert Ket galloped awaie ſo faſt as his horſſe would beare him. The horſſemen following in chaſe, ſlue them downe on heapes, euer ſtill as they ouertooke them; ſo that the chaſe continuing for the ſpace of thrée or foure miles, there were ſlaine to the number of thrée thouſand fiue hundred at the leaſt: beſide a great multitude that were wounded as they fled here and there ech waie foorth, as ſéemed beſt to ſerue their turne for their moſt ſpéedie eſcape out of danger. Yet one part of them that had not béene aſſailed at the firſt onſet, ſéeing ſuch ſlaughter made of their fellowes, kept their ground by their ordinance, and ſhranke not: determining as men deſperatlie bent, not to die vnreuenged, but to fight it out to the laſt man.

The number of the rebels ſlaine.

They were ſo incloſed with their carts, carriages, trenches (which they had caſt) and ſtakes pitched in the ground to kéepe off the force of horſſemen, that it would haue béene ſomewhat dangerous to haue aſſailed them within their ſtrength. But ſure they were that now they could not eſcape, ſéeing no ſmall part of their whole numbers were cut off and diſtreſſed, and they inuironed on ech ſide, without hope of ſuccour or reléefe of vittels, which in the end muſt néeds haue forced them to come foorth of their incloſure to their vndoubted ouerthrow and deſtruction. The earle of Warwike yet pitieng their caſe, and loth that the king ſhould loſe ſo manie ſtout mens bodies as were there amongſt them, which might doo his maieſtie and their countrie good ſeruice, if they could be reclamed from this their deſperat follie vnto due obedience, ſent Norreie vnto them, offering them pardon of life if they would throw downe their weapons and yéeld: if not, he threatened that there ſhould not a man of them eſcape the deſerued puniſhment. Their anſwer was, that if they might be aſſured to haue their liues ſaued, they could be contented to yéeld: but they could haue no truſt that promiſe ſhould be kept with them. For notwithſtanding all ſuch faire offers of pardon, they tooke it that there was nothing meant but a ſubtill practiſe, to bring them into the hands of their aduerſaries the gentlemen, that had prepared a barrell of ropes and halters, with which they purpoſed to truſſe them vp: and therefore they would rather die like men, than to be ſtrangled at the wils and pleaſures of their mortall enimies.

Pardon oftſones offered.

The earle of Warwike right ſorie to ſée ſuch deſperat minds among them, ſent to the citie, and cauſed the moſt part of the footmen which he had left there to defend the ſame, to come foorth now in battell araie, that they might helpe to diſtreſſe thoſe wilfull rebels that thus obſtinatelie refuſed the kings pardon. And hauing brought as well them as the Almans and the horſſemen in order of battell againe, and readie now to ſet vpon the rebels, he eftſoones ſent vnto them to know that if he ſhould come himſelfe and giue his word, that they ſhould haue their pardon, whether they would receiue it or not. Herevnto they anſwered, that they had ſuch confidence in his honor, that if he would ſo doo, they would giue credit thereto, and ſubmit themſelues to the kings mercie. Incontinentlie herevpon he went vnto them, and commanded Norreie to read the kings pardon fréelie granted to all that would yéeld. Which being read, euerie man threw downe his weapon, and with one whole and entier voice cried; God ſaue king Edward, God ſaue king Edward. And thus thorough the prudent policie, and fauourable mercie of the erle of Warwike, a great number of thoſe offendors were preſerued from the gates of death, into the which they were readie to enter.

Pardon once againe offered.

They yéeld to the earle of Warwike.

Thus were the Norffolke rebels ſubdued by the high proweſſe, wiſedome, and policie of the valiant earle of Warwike, and other the nobles, gentlemen, & faithfull ſubiects there in the kings armie: but not without loſſe of diuers perſonages of great worſhip, beſide other of the meaner ſort, namelie maſter Henrie Willoughbie eſquier, a man ſo well beloued in his countrie for his liberalitie in houſekéeping, great courteſie, vpright dealing, aſſured ſtedfaſtnes in friendſhip, & modeſt ſtaiedneſſe in behauiour, that the countries where his liuings laie lament the loſſe of ſo worthie a gentleman euen to this daie. There died alſo maſter Lucie eſquier, maſter Forſter eſquier, and maſter Throckmorton of Northamptonſhire, gentlemen of no ſmall credit and worſhip in their countries. The battell being thus ended, all the ſpoile gotten in the field was giuen to the ſoldiers, who ſold the moſt part thereof openlie in the market place of Norwich. The next daie the earle of Warwike was aduertiſed that Ket, being crept into a barne, was taken by two ſeruants of one maſter Riches of Swanington, and brought to the houſe of the ſame Riches. Herevpon were twentie horſſemen ſent thither to fetch him, who brought him to Norwich. The ſame daie examinations were taken of them that were the principall beginners and ſetters foorth of this vnhappie rebellion, and diuerſe being found giltie were hanged, and nine of the chiefeſt procurers of all the miſchiefe (Robert Ket and his brother William onelie excepted) were hanged vpon the oke of reformation, Miles the gunner & two of their prophets being thrée of that number.

Execution.

Some others of them were drawne, hanged, and quartered, & their heads and quarters ſet vp in publike places for a terror to others. But yet the earle of Warwike ſpared manie, where ſome would gladlie haue perſuaded him, that there might haue béene a great number more executed. But his lordſhip perceiuing them importunate in that vncharitable ſute, told them (as it were in fauour of life of thoſe ſillie wretches, whoſe miſerable caſe he ſéemed to pitie) that meaſure muſt be vſed in all things, & in puniſhing

The earle of Warwike ſheweth mercie.

“ ing of men by death (ſaith he) we ought alwaies to beware that we paſſe not the ſame. I know well that “ ſuch wicked doings deſerue no ſmall reuenge, and that the offendors are worthie to be moſt ſharplie “ chaſtiſed. But how farre yet ſhall we go? Shall we “ not at length ſhew ſome mercie? Is there no place for pardon? What ſhall we then do? Shall we hold “ the plough our ſelues; plaie the carters and labour
the ground with our owne hands. These and ſuch like “ words taſting altogither of mercie and compaſſion in that noble earle, did quench the cruell deſire of reuenge in them that were altogither kindled in wrath and wiſhed nothing more than to ſee the whole multitude executed: but now moued with the earles wiſe and mercifull anſwer to their rigorous ſute, they became more mild and mercifull towards the miſerable creatures.

This alſo is not to be forgotten, that when information was giuen againſt ſome of the rebels, for that they had beene buſie fellowes, & great doers in time of thoſe vprores, ſo as it was thought of ſome, that it ſtood with good reaſon to haue them puniſhed by death, when the earle of Warwike vnderſtood by credible report of Norreie king at armes, that vpon the offer of the kings pardon, they were the firſt that threw downe their weapons, and ſubmitted themſelues to the kings mercie, the earle would not in anie wiſe conſent that they ſhould die, but proteſted frankelie that he would keepe promiſe with them, and that he would be as good to them as his word: and ſo they had their liues ſaued. The ſame daie was order giuen by the earle that the bodies of them that were ſlaine in the field ſhould be buried. On the morrow being the nine and twentith of Auguſt, the earle of Warwike, with the nobles and gentlemen of the armie, and others in great numbers, both men and women, went to ſaint Peters church, and there gaue praiſes and thanks to God for the victorie obteined. And this doone, he with all the armie departed out of the citie, and returned homewards with high commendation of citizens & others, that acknowledged the ſaid earle to be the defendor of their liues, and recouerer of their wiues, children, houſes, and liuings.

The ſlaine carcaſes buried.

It was afterwards ordeined, that vpon the ſame daie in the which the rebels were thus ſubdued, the citizens yearelie ſhould repaire to their churches, and there to heare ſeruice, and to haue a ſermon abrode, to the which they ſhould come togither, to giue thanks to God for their deliuerance as that daie, and this is obſerued till theſe our times. Robert Ket and his brother William Ket were brought vp to London, where they were committed to the tower, and ſhortlie after arreigned of their treaſon and found guiltie, were brought to the tower againe, where they continued till the nine and twentith of Nouember, on which daie they were deliuered to ſir Edmund Windham high ſhiriffe of Norffolke and Suffolke, to be conueied downe into Norffolke, where Robert Ket was hanged in chains vpon the top of Norwich caſtell: and William Ket his brother on the top of Windmondham ſteeple, in which towne they had both dwelled, and conſpired with others to go forward with their wicked rebellion.

The two Kets executed.

This William Ket (as was thought) had beene ſure of his pardon, if he had not plaied the traitorous hypocrite: for vpon his ſubmiſſion at the firſt to my lord marqueſſe of Northampton, at his comming downe to ſuppreſſe this rebellion, he was ſent to his brother to perſuade him and the reſt to yeeld, and receiue the kings pardon: but he (like a diſſembling wretch, although he promiſed to my lord to doo what he could in that behalfe) vpon his comming to his brother into the rebels campe, & beholding the great multitude that were there about him, he did not onelie not diſſuade him and them from their traitorous rebellion, but incouraged them to perſiſt and continue in their doings, declaring what a ſmall number of ſouldiers the marqueſſe brought with him, nothing able to reſiſt ſuch a puiſſance as was there aſſembled. So that if it had not beene thorough the wicked perſuaſion of him, and ſome others at that time, not onelie Robert Ket himſelfe, but alſo all the multitude beſide, would haue ſubmitted themſelues, and receiued the kings pardon, to the preſeruation of manie a good mans life that after died in the quarrell.

William Ket a diſſembling traitor.

But now to returne ſomewhat backe to the doings in Scotland. In the meane while that ſuch hurls were in hand here in England, ye ſhall vnderſtand that in the beginning of this ſummer, the king by aduiſe of his councell ſent forth a nauie by ſea towards Scotland, the which arriuing in the Forth, and comming before Lieth, ſaluted the towne with cannon ſhot, & remaining there ten or twelue daies, tooke in the meane time the Ile of Inſketh, leauing therein foure enſignes of Engliſhmen, and one of Italians, with certeine pioners to fortifie the place. But the Frenchmen (as in the Scotiſh hiſtorie yee ſhall find more at large) after the departure of the Engliſh nauie, recouered that Ile againe out of the Engliſhmens poſſeſſion (after they had kept it ſixteene daies) with the ſlaughter of capteine Cotton their generall, capteine Applebie, & one Jaſper that was capteine of the Italians, beſide others. After the recouering of this Ile, monſieur de Deſſe returned into France, leauing his charge to monſieur de Thermes latelie before there arriued: who after the departure of the ſaid Deſſe, with a campe volant did what he could to ſtop the Engliſhmen within Hadington from vittels. But notwithſtanding the earle of Rutland being lieutenant of the north, did not onlie vittell it, but put the French armie in danger of an ouerthrow, as it was thought muſt needs haue folowed, if they had not with more ſpeed than is vſed in a common march ſlipt awaie, after they perceiued the Engliſh armie ſo neare at their elbowes.

Moreouer, beſide theſe inordinate vprores and inſurrections aboue mentioned, about the latter end of the ſaid moneth of Julie, in the ſame yeare, which was 1549, an other like ſturre or commotion began at Semer in the northriding of Yorkeſhire, and continued in the eaſtriding of the ſame, and there ended. The principall doers and raiſers vp thereof, was one William Ombler of Eaſtheſlerton yeoman, and Thomas Dale pariſh clearke of Semer, with one Steeuenſon of Semer, neighbour to Dale and nephue to Ombler, which Steeuenſon was a meane or meſſenger betweene the ſaid Ombler and Dale, being before not acquainted togither, and dwelling ſeuen miles one from the other: who at laſt by the trauell of the ſaid Steeuenſon, and their owne euill diſpoſitions, inclined to vngratiouſneſſe and miſchiefe, knowing before one the others mind by ſecret conference, were brought to talke togither on ſaint James daie, Anno 1549.

An other rebellion or tumult begun in Yorkeſhire.

The chiefe ſtirrers of this rebellion.

The cauſes mouing them to raiſe this rebellion, were theſe. Firſt & principallie their traitorous harts grudging at the kings moſt godlie proceedings, in aduancing and reforming the true honour of God and his religion. An other cauſe alſo was, for truſting to a blind and a fantaſticall propheſie, wherwith they were ſeduced, thinking the ſame propheſie ſhuld ſhortlie come to paſſe, by hearing the rebellions of Norffolke, of Deuonſhire, and other places. The tenour of which propheſie and purpoſe togither of the traitors was, that there ſhould no king reigne in England, the noblemen and gentlemen to be deſtroied, and the realme to be ruled by foure gouernours,

The cauſes mouing the Yorkſhiremen to rebellion.

A blind propheſie among the northerne men.

nours, to be elected and appointed by the commons, holding a parlement in commotion, to begin at the ſouth and north ſeas of England, ſuppoſing that this rebellion in the north, and the other of the Deuonſhire men in the weſt, méeting (as they intended) at one place, to be the meane how to compaſſe this their traitorous diueliſh deuiſe. And therfore laieng their ſtudies togither, how to find out more companie to ioine with them in that deteſtable purpoſe, and to ſet forward the ſturre, this deuiſe they framed: to ſturre in two places, the one diſtant ſeuen miles from the other, and at the firſt ruſh to kill and deſtroie ſuch gentlemen and men of ſubſtance about them, as were fauourers of the kings procéedings, or which would reſiſt them.

The deuiſe of the rebels how to compaſſe their purpoſe.

But firſt of all for the more ſpéedie raiſing of men, they deuiſed to burne beacons, ⁊ thereby to bring the people togither, as though it were to defend the ſeacoaſts: and hauing the ignorant people aſſembled, then to powre out their poiſon, firſt beginning with the rudeſt and poreſt ſort, ſuch as they thought were pricked with pouertie, and were vnwilling to labor, and therefore the more readie to follow the ſpoile of rich mens goods, blowing into their heads that Gods ſeruice was laid aſide, and new inuentions neither good nor godlie put in place, and ſo féeding them with faire promiſes, to reduce into the church againe their old ignorance and idolatrie, thought by that means ſoneſt to allure them to rage and run with them in this commotion. And furthermore, to the intent they would giue the more terror to the gentlemen at the firſt riſing, leaſt they ſhould be reſiſted, they deuiſed that ſome ſhould be murthered in churches, ſome in their houſes, ſome in ſeruing the king in commiſſion, and other as they might be caught, and to picke quarels at them by alteration of ſeruice on the holie daies: and thus was the platforme caſt of their deuiſe, according as afterward by their confeſſion at their examinations was teſtified, and remaineth in true record.

The deuiſe of the rebels that they might be feared.

Thus they being togither agréed, Ombler and Dale, with others, by their ſecret appointment, ſo laboured the matter in the pariſh of Semer, Wintringham, and the townes about, that they were infected with the poiſon of this confederacie, in ſuch ſort that it was eaſie to vnderſtand wherevnto they would incline, if a commotion were begun, the accompliſhment whereof did ſhortlie follow. For although by the words of one drunken fellow of that conſpiracie named Caluerd, at the alehouſe in Wintringham, ſome ſuſpicion of that rebellion began to be ſmelled before by the lord preſident and gentlemen of thoſe parties, and ſo preuented in that place where the rebels thought to begin: yet they gaue not ouer ſo, but drew to another place at Semer by the ſeacoaſt, and there by night rode to the beacon at Straxton, and ſet it on fire, and ſo gathering togither a rude rout of raſcals out of the townes neare about, being on a ſturre, Ombler, Thomas Dale, Barton, and Robert Dale, haſted forthwith with the rebels to maiſter Whites houſe to take him: who notwithſtanding being on horſſebacke, minding to haue eſcaped their hands, Dale, Ombler, and the reſt of the rebels tooke him, and Clopton his wiues brother, one Sauage a merchant of Yorke, and one Berrie ſeruant to ſir Walter Mildmaie. Which foure without cauſe or quarell, ſauing to fulfill their ſeditious propheſie in ſome part, and to giue a terror to other gentlemen, they cruellie murthered, after they had caried them one mile from Semer towards the Wold, and there after they had ſtripped them of their clothes ⁊ purſes, left them naked behind them in the plaine fields for crowes to féed on: vntill Whites wife and Sauages wife, then at Semer, cauſed them to be buried.

The rebels increaſe their number ⁊ rebellious band.

The kings pardon offred, receiued, refuſed.

Long it were and tedious to recite what reuell theſe rebels kept in their raging madneſſe, who ranging about the countrie from towne to towne, to inlarge their vngratious and rebellious band, taking thoſe with force which were not willing to go, ⁊ leauing in no towne where they came anie man aboue the age of ſixtéene yeares, ſo increaſed this number, that in ſhort time they had gathered thrée thouſand to fauour their wicked attempts, and had like to haue gathered more, had not the Lords goodneſſe through prudent circumſpection of ſome interrupted the courſe of their furious beginning. For firſt came the kings gratious and frée pardon, diſcharging ⁊ pardoning all them and the reſt of the rebels, of all treaſons, murthers, felonies, ⁊ other offenſes done to his maieſtie before the one ⁊ twentith of Auguſt, 1549. Which pardon although Ombler contemptuouſlie reading, perſiſted ſtill in his wilfull obſtinacie, diſſuaded alſo the reſt from the humble accepting of the kings ſo louing ⁊ liberall pardon: yet notwithſtanding with ſome it did good, who of likelihood ſubmitted themſelues, aſſuredlie beleeuing if they perſeuered in their enterpriſe, there was no way with them but one, namelie deſerued death, wherewith there was no diſpenſing after the contempt of the princes pardon and refuſall of his mercie; ſo that in this heauie caſe they might verie well complaine and saie:

Funditus occidimus, nec habet fortuna regreſſum. Virgil.

Ombler capteine of the rebels taken.

The names of the rebels taken and executed at Yorke.

To make ſhort, it was not long after this, but Ombler as he was riding from towne to towne, twelue miles from Hummanbie, to charge all the coneſtables and inhabitans where he came, in the kings name to reſort to Hummanbie: by the waie he was eſpied, and by the circumſpect diligence of John Word the yonger, James Aſlabeie, Raſe Twinge, and Thomas Coneſtable gentlemen, hée was had in chaſe, and at laſt by them apprehended, and brought in the night in ſure cuſtodie vnto the citie of Yorke, to anſwer vnto his demerits. After whome within ſhort time, Thomas Dale, Henrie Barton, the firſt chiefteins and ringleaders of the former commotion, with John Dale, Robert Wright, William Pecocke, Weatherell, and Edmund Buttrie, buſie ſtirrers in this ſedition, as they trauelled from place to place, to draw people to their faction, were likewiſe apprehended, committed to ward, lawfullie conuicted, and laſtlie executed at Yorke the one and twentith of September, in the yere of our Lord 1549. Ex actis iudicij publici a regiſtro exceptis & notatis.

Whileſt theſe wicked commotions and tumults through the rage of the vndiſcréet commons were thus raiſed in ſundrie parts of the realme, to the great hinderance of the common-wealth, loſſe and danger of euerie good and true ſubiect, ſundrie wholſome and godlie exhortations were publiſhed, to aduertiſe them of their dutie, and to laie before them their heinous offenſes; with the ſequele of the miſchiefs that neceſſarilie followed thereof, the which if they ſhould conſider togither, with the puniſhment that hanged ouer their heads, they might eaſilie be brought to repent their lewd begun enterpriſes, and ſubmit themſelues to the kings mercie. Among other of thoſe admonitions, one was penned and ſet forth by ſir John Chéeke, which I haue thought good here to inſert, as a neceſſarie diſcourſe for euerie good Engliſh ſubiect. Wherein, to a reader of iudgement and capacitie, ſuch learning and wiſedome, with a true loiall ſubiects heart bewraieth it ſelfe to haue béene ſetled in that gentleman; as the verie reading of this treatiſe is able to turne a rebellious mind to méekeneſſe: if reaſon be not altogither led awaie captiue by luſt.

¶ The hurt of ſedition how greeuous it is to a common-wealth, ſet out by ſir Iohn Cheeke knight, in the yeare 1549.

The true ſubiect to the rebell.

AMong ſo manie and notable benefits, wherewith God hath alreadie and plentifullie indued vs, there is nothing more beneficiall, than that we haue by his grace kept vs quiet from rebellion at this time. For we ſee ſuch miſeries hang ouer the whole ſtate of the common-wealth, through the great miſorder of your ſedition, that it maketh vs much to reioiſe, that we haue beene neither partners of your doings, nor conſpirers of your counſels. For euen as the Lacedemonians for the auoiding of drunkenneſſe did cauſe their ſons to behold their ſeruants when they were drunke, that by beholding their beaſtlineſſe, they might auoid the like vice: euen ſo hath God like a mercifull father ſtaied vs from your wickedneſſe, that by beholding the filth of your fault, we might iuſtlie for offenſe abhorre you like rebels, whome elſe by nature we loue like Engliſhmen. And ſo for our ſelues, we haue great cauſe to thanke God, by whoſe religion and holie word dailie taught vs, we learne not onelie to feare him trulie, but alſo to obeie our king faithfullie, and to ſerue in our owne vocation like ſubiects honeſtlie. And as for you, we haue ſurelie iuſt cauſe to lament you as brethren, and yet iuſter cauſe to riſe againſt you as enimies, and moſt iuſt cauſe to ouerthrow you as rebels.

What the Lacedemonians did to make their ſons deteſt drunkenneſſe.

For what hurt could be doone either to vs priuatlie, or to the whole common-wealth generallie, that is now with miſchiefe ſo brought in by you, that euen as we ſee now the flame of your rage, ſo ſhall we neceſſarilie be conſumed hereafter with the miſerie of the ſame. Wherefore conſider your ſelues with ſome light of vnderſtanding, and marke this greeuous and horrible fault, which ye haue thus vilelie committed, how heinous it muſt needs appeare to you, if ye will reaſonablie conſider that which for my duties ſake, and my whole countries cauſe, I will at this preſent declare vnto you. Ye which be bound by Gods word not to obeie for feare like men-pleaſers, but for conſcience ſake like chriſtians, haue contrarie to Gods holie will, whoſe offenſe is euerlaſting death, and contrarie to the godlie order of quietneſſe, ſet out to vs in the kings maieſties lawes, the breach whereof is not vnknowne to you, taken in hand vncalled of God, vnſent by men, vnfit by reaſon, to caſt awaie your bounden duties of obedience, and to put on you againſt the magiſtrats, Gods office committed to the magiſtrats, for the reformation of your pretenſed iniuries. In the which dooing ye haue firſt faulted grieuouſlie againſt God, next offended vnnaturallie our ſoueraigne lord, thirdlie troubled miſerablie the whole common-wealth, vndoone cruellie manie an honeſt man, and brought in an vtter miſerie both to vs the kings ſubiects, and to your ſelues being falſe rebels. And yet ye pretend that partlie for Gods cauſe, and partlie for the common-wealths ſake, ye doo ariſe, when as your ſelues cannot denie; but ye that ſeeke in word Gods cauſe, doo breake in deed Gods commandements; and ye that ſeeke the common-wealth, haue deſtroied the common-wealth: and ſo ye marre that ye would make, & breake that ye would amend, becauſe ye neither ſeeke anie thing rightlie, nor would amend anie thing orderlie.

Rebellion a verie greeuous and horrible offenſe againſt God, the prince, and the ſtate.

He that faulteth, faulteth againſt Gods ordinance, who hath forbidden all faults, and therefore ought againe to be puniſhed by Gods ordinance, who is the reformer of faults. For he ſaith, Leaue the puniſhment to me, and I will reuenge them. But the magiſtrate is the ordinance of God, appointed by him with the ſword of puniſhment to looke ſtreightlie to all euill dooers. And therefore that that is doone by the magiſtrate, is doone by the ordinance of God, whome the ſcripture oftentimes dooth call God, becauſe he hath the execution of Gods office. How then doo you take in hand to reforme? Be ye kings? By what authoritie? Or by what occaſion? Be ye the kings officers? By what commiſſion? Be ye called of God? By what tokens declare ye that? Gods word teacheth vs, that no man ſhould take in hand anie office, but he that is called of God like Aaron. What Moſes I praie you called you? What Gods miniſter bad you riſe?

The authoritie of the magiſtrats great and peremptorie.

Ye riſe for religion. What religion taught you that? If ye were offered perſecution for religion, ye ought to flie: ſo Chriſt teacheth you, and yet you intend to fight. If ye would ſtand in the truth, ye ought to ſuffer like martyrs, and you would ſleie like tyrants. Thus for religion you keepe no religion, and neither will follow the counſell of Chriſt, nor the conſtancie of martyrs. Why riſe ye for religion? Haue ye anie thing contrarie to Gods booke? Yea, haue ye not all things agreeable to Gods word? But the new is different from the old, and therefore ye will haue the old. If ye meaſure the old by truth, ye haue the oldeſt; if ye meaſure the old by fanſie, then it is hard: becauſe mens fanſies change, to giue that is old. Ye will haue the old ſtill. Will ye haue anie older than that as Chriſt left, & his apoſtles taught, & the firſt church after Chriſt did vſe? Ye will haue that the chanons doo eſtabliſh. Why that is a great deale yoonger than that ye haue, of later time, and newlier inuented. Yet that is it that ye deſire. Why then ye deſire not the oldeſt. And doo you preferre the biſhops of Rome afore Chriſt, mens inuentions afore Gods law, the newer ſort of worſhip before the older? Ye ſeeke no religion, ye be deceiued, ye ſeeke traditions. They that teach you, blind you, that ſo inſtruct you, deceiue you. If ye ſeeke what the old doctors ſaie, yet looke what Chriſt the oldeſt of all ſaith. For he ſaith; Before Abraham was made I am. If ye ſeeke the trueſt way, he is the verie truth; if ye ſeeke the readieſt waie, he is the verie waie; if ye ſeeke euerlaſting life, he is the verie life. What religion would ye haue other now, than his religion?

Rebellion vnlawfull in defenſe of true religion, Ergo much more vnlawfull in maintenance of falſe religion, &c.

You would haue the bibles in againe. It is no maruell, your blind guides would leade you blind ſtill. Why, be ye howlets and backs, that ye cannot looke on the light? Chriſt ſaith to euerie one, Search ye the ſcriptures, for they beare witneſſe of Chriſt. You ſaie, Pull in the ſcriptures, for we will haue no knowledge of Chriſt. The apoſtles of Chriſt will vs to be ſo readie, that we maie be able to giue euerie man an account of our faith. Ye will vs not once to read the ſcriptures, for feare of knowing of our faith. Saint Paul praieth that euerie man may increaſe in knowledge: ye deſire that our knowledge might decaie againe. A true religion ye ſeeke belike, and worthie to be ſought for. For without the ſword indeed nothing can helpe it, neither Chriſt, nor truth, nor age can mainteine it. But why ſhould ye not like that which Gods word eſtabliſheth, the primitiue church hath authoriſed, the greateſt learned men of this realme haue drawen, the whole conſent of the parlement hath confirmed, the kings maieſtie hath ſet forth? Is it not trulie ſet out? Can ye deuiſe anie truer than Chriſtes apoſtles vſed? Ye thinke it is not learnedlie doone. Dare ye commons take vpon you more learning, than the choſen biſhops and clearks of this realme haue? Thinke ye follie in it? Ye were woont to iudge your parlement wiſeſt, & now will ye ſuddenlie excell them in wiſdome? Or can ye thinke it lacketh authoritie, which the king, the parlement, the learned, the wiſe haue iuſtlie approued? Learne, learne, to know this one point of religion, that God will be worſhipped as he hath preſcribed, and not as we haue deuiſed; and that his will is wholie in his ſcriptures, which be full of Gods ſpirit, and profitable to teach the truth, to reproue lies, to amend faults, to bring one vp in righteouſneſſe, that he that is a Gods man may be perfect & readie to all good works. What can be more required to ſerue God withall? And thus much for religion, rebels.

A principall point of religion for rebels ſpeciallie to learne.

The other rable of Norffolke rebelles, ye pretend a common-wealth. How amend ye it? By killing of gentlemen, by ſpoiling of gentlemen, by impriſoning of gentlemen? A maruellous tanned common-wealth. Whie ſhould ye thus hate them? For their riches or for their rule? Rule they neuer tooke ſo much in hand as ye doo now. They neuer reſiſted the king, neuer withſtood his councell, be faithfull at this daie when ye be faithleſſe, not onelie, to the king, whoſe ſubiects ye be, but alſo to your lords whoſe tenants ye be. Is this your true duetie, in ſome of homage, in moſt of fealtie, in all of allegiance; to leaue your duties, go backe from your promiſes, fall from your faith, and contrarie to law and truth to make vnlawfull aſſemblies, vngodlie companies, wicked and deteſtable campes, to diſobeie your betters, and to obeie your tanners, to change your obedience from a king to a Ket, to ſubmit your ſelues to traitors, and breake your faith to your true king and lords? They rule but by law, if otherwiſe, the law, the councell, the king taketh awaie their rule. Ye haue orderlie ſought no redreſſe, but ye haue in time found it. In countries ſome muſt rule, ſome muſt obeie, euerie man maie not beare like ſtroke: for euerie man is not like wiſe. And they that haue ſeene moſt, and be beſt able to beare it, and of iuſt dealing beſide, be moſt fit to rule. It is an other matter to vnderſtand a mans owne greefe, and to know the common-wealths ſore; and therfore not they that know their owne caſe, as euerie man doth, but they that vnderſtand the common-welths ſtate, ought to haue in countries the preferment of ruling. If ye felt the paine that is ioined with gouernance, as ye ſee and like the honor, ye would not hurt others to rule them, but rather take great paine to be ruled of them. If ye had rule of the kings maieſtie committed vnto you, it were well doone ye had ruled the gentlemen: but now ye haue it not, and cannot beare their rule, it is to thinke the kings maieſtie fooliſh and vniuſt, that hath giuen certeine rule to them. And ſeeing by the ſcripture, ye ought not to ſpeake euill of anie magiſtrate of the people, why doo ye not onelie ſpeake euill of them whome the kings maieſtie hath put in office, but alſo iudge euill of the king himſelfe, and thus ſeditiouſlie in field ſtand with your ſwords drawen againſt him?

The rebelles of Norffolke pretended the common-wealth the cauſe of their riſing.

Whie all muſt not looke to beare like rule.

Magiſtrates are to be honored both in ſpeech and maners.

If riches offend you, becauſe yee wiſh the like, then thinke that to be no common-wealth, but enuie to the common-wealth. Enuie it is to appaire an other mans eſtate, without the amendment of your owne. And to haue no gentlemen, bicauſe ye be none your ſelues, is to bring downe an eſtate, and to mend none. Would ye haue all alike rich? That is the ouerthrow of labour, and vtter decay of worke in this realme. For who will labour more, if when he hath gotten more, the idle ſhall by luſt without right take what him luſt from him, vnder pretenſe of equalitie with him. This is the bringing in of idleneſſe, which deſtroieth the common-wealth; and not the amendment of labour, that mainteineth the common-wealth. If there ſhould be ſuch equalitie, then ye take awaie all hope from yours to come to anie better eſtate than you now leaue them. And as manie meane mens children doo come honeſtlie vp, and are great ſuccour to all their ſtocke: ſo ſhould none be hereafter holpen by you, but bicauſe ye ſeeke equalitie, whereby all can not be rich. Ye would that (belike) whereby euerie man ſhould be poore; and thinke beſide that riches and inheritance be Gods prouidence, and giuen to whome of his wiſdome he thinketh good: to the honeſt for the increaſe of their godlineſſe, to the wicked for the heaping vp of their damnation, to the ſimple for a recompenſe of other lackes, to the wiſe for the greater ſetting out of Gods goodneſſe. Whie will your wiſdome now ſtop Gods wiſdome, and prouide by your lawes, that God ſhall not inrich them, whome he hath by prouidence appointed as him liketh? God hath made the poore, & hath made them to be poore that he might ſhew his might, and ſet them aloft when he liſteth for ſuch cauſe as to him ſeemeth, & plucke downe the rich to this ſtate of pouertie by his power, as he diſpoſeth to order them. Whie doo not we then being poore beare it wiſelie, rather than by luſt ſeeke riches vniuſtlie, and ſhew our ſelues content with Gods ordinance, which we muſt either willinglie obeie, and then we be wiſe, or elſe we muſt vnprofitablie ſtriue withall, and then we be mad?

To haue all degrees alike, & no inequalitie how inconuenient.

Riches and inheritance from whom, to whom, and to what end giuen.

But what meane yee by this equalitie in the common-wealth? If one be wiſer than an other, will ye baniſh him, becauſe yee intend an equalitie of all things? If one be ſtronger than another, will yee ſlaie him, bicauſe ye ſeeke an equalitie of all things? If one be well fauourder than an other, will yee puniſh him, becauſe yee looke for an equalitie of all things? If one haue better vtterance than another, will ye pull out his toong to ſaue your equalitie? And if one be richer than an other, will ye ſpoile him to mainteine an equalitie? If one be elder than an other, will ye kill him for this equalities ſake? How iniurious are ye to God himſelfe, who intendeth to beſtow his gifts as he himſelfe liſteth: and ye ſeeke by wicked inſurrections to make him giue them commonlie alike to all men as your vaine fanſie liketh? Whie would ye haue an equalitie in riches & in other gifts of God? There is no meane ſought. Either by ambition ye ſeeke lordlineſſe much vnfit for you; or by couetouſneſſe ye be vnſatiable, a thing likelie inough in ye; or elſe by follie ye be not content with your eſtate, a fanſie to be plucked out of you.

The vnconſcionable wiſhing of equalitie how hurtfull.

But if we being wearie of pouertie would ſeeke to inrich our ſelues, we ſhould go a farre other waie to worke than this, and ſo ſhould we rightlie come to our deſire. Dooth not S. Peter teach vs afore God a right waie to honour, to riches, to all neceſſarie and profitable things for vs? He ſaith, Humble your ſelues that God might exalt you, and caſt all your care on him, for he careth for you. He teacheth the waie to all good things at Gods hand, is to be humble, and you exalt your ſelues. Ye ſeeke things after ſuch a ſort, as if the ſeruant ſhould anger his maſter, when he ſeeketh to haue a good turne of him. Ye would haue riches (I thinke) at Gods hand who giueth all riches, and yet ye take the waie cleane contrarie to riches. Know ye not that he that exalteth himſelfe, God will throw him downe? How can ye get it then by thus ſetting out your ſelues? Ye ſhuld ſubmit ye by humilitie one to another, and ye ſet vp your ſelues by arrogancie aboue the magiſtrates. See herein how much ye offend God. Remember ye not that if ye come nigh to God, he will come nigh vnto you? If then ye go from God, he will go from you. Dooth not the pſalme ſaie, He is holie with the holie, and with the wicked man he is froward? Euen as he is ordered of men, he will order them againe. If ye would follow his will, and obeie his commandements, ye ſhould eat the fruits of the earth, ſaith the prophet; if not, the ſword ſhall deuour you. Ye might haue eaten the fruits of this ſeaſonable yéere, if ye had not by diſobedience rebelled againſt God. Now not onelie ye can not eat that which your ſelues did firſt ſowe by labour, and now deſtroie by ſedition; but alſo if the kings maieſties ſword came not againſt you, as iuſt policie requireth, yet the iuſt vengeance of God would light among you, as his word promiſeth, and your cruell wickedneſſe deſerueth.

The precept of S. Peter teaching the right waie to riches and honor.

The act of rebellion aggrauated, & proued moſt wicked and horrible.

For whatſoeuer the cauſes be that haue moued your wild affections herin, as they be vniuſt cauſes, & increaſe your faults much, the thing it ſelfe, the riſing I meane, muſt néeds be wicked and horrible before God, and the vſurping of authoritie, and taking in hand of rule, which is the ſitting in Gods ſeat of iuſtice, and a proud climing vp into Gods high throne, muſt néeds be not onelie curſed newlie by him, but alſo hath béene often puniſhed afore of him. And that which is doone to Gods officer, God accounteth it doone to him. For they deſpiſe not the miniſter, as he ſaith himſelfe, but they deſpiſe him: and that preſumption of chalenging Gods ſeat, dooth ſhew you to haue bin Lucifers, and ſheweth vs that God will puniſh you like Lucifers. Wherfore rightlie looke, as ye dulie haue deſerued, either for great vengeance for your abhominable tranſgreſſion, or elſe earneſtlie repent, with vnfeined minds, your wicked doings; and either with example of death be content to dehort other, or elſe by faithfulneſſe of obedience declare how great a ſeruice it is to God, to obeie your magiſtrats faithfullie, and to ſerue in ſubiection trulie.

An exhortation to rebels.

Diſobedience to the prince is a moſt abhominable ſinne, and that we are bound by dutie to obeie.

Well, if ye had not thus grieuouſlie offended God, whome ye ought to worſhip, what can ye reaſonablie thinke it, to be no fault againſt the king, whom ye ought to reuerence? Ye be bound by Gods word to obeie your king, and is it no breach of dutie to withſtand your king? If the ſeruant be bound to obeie his maiſter in the familie, is not the ſubiect bound to ſerue the king in his realme? The child is bound to the priuat father, and be we not all bound to the common-wealths father? If we ought to be ſubiect to the king for Gods cauſe, ought we not then I praie you to be faithfullie ſubiect to the king? If we ought dutifullie to ſhew all obedience to heathen kings, ſhall we not willinglie and trulie be ſubiect to chriſtian kings? If one ought to ſubmit himſelfe by humilitie to another, ought we not all by dutie to be ſubiect to our king? If the members of our naturall bodie all follow the head, ſhall not the members of the politicall bodie all obeie the king? If good maners be content to giue place the lower to the higher, ſhall not religion teach vs alwaie to giue place to the higheſt? If true ſubiects will die gladlie in the kings ſeruice, ſhould not all ſubiects thinke it dutie to obeie the king with iuſt ſeruice. But you haue not onelie diſobeied like ill ſubiects, but alſo taken ſtoutlie rule vpon you like wicked magiſtrates.

A notable and rhetoricall clauſe, and to the purpoſe.

Ye haue béene called to obedience by counſell of priuat men, by the aduiſe of the kings maieſties councell, by the kings maieſties frée pardon. But what counſell taketh place, where ſturdineſſe is law and churliſh anſwers be counted wiſdome? Who can perſuade where treaſon is aboue reaſon, and might ruleth right, and it is had for lawfull whatſoeuer is luſtfull, and commotioners are better than commiſſioners, and common wo is named common-wealth? Haue ye not broken his lawes, diſobeied his councell, rebelled againſt him? And what is the common-wealth worth, when the law which is indifferent for all men, ſhall be wilfullie and ſpitefullie broken of head-ſtrong men, that ſéeke againſt laws to order lawes; that thoſe may take place, not what conſent of wiſe men hath appointed, but what the luſt of rebels hath determined? What vnthriftineſſe is in ill ſeruants, wickednes in vnnaturall children, ſturdineſſe in vnrulie ſubiects, crueltie in fierce enimies, wildnes in beaſtlie minds, pride in diſdainfull harts; that floweth now in you, which haue fled from houſed conſpiracies, to incamped robberies, and are better contented to ſuffer famine, cold, trauell, to glut your luſts, than to liue in quietneſſe to ſaue the common-wealth, and thinke more libertie in wilfulneſſe, than wiſedome in dutifulneſſe, and ſo run headlong not to the miſchiefe of other, but to the deſtruction of your ſelues, and vndoo by follie that ye intend by miſchiefe, neither ſéeing how to remedie that ye iudge faultie, nor willing to ſaue your ſelues from miſerie: which ſtifneckedneſſe cannot doo, but honeſtie of obedience muſt frame.

The rebels fullie fraught with moſt vilanous qualities, &c.

The kings councell of greateſt authoritie, and why; yet are they diſobeied: note.

If authoritie would ſerue vnder a king, the councell haue greateſt authoritie; if wiſedome and grauitie might take place, they be of moſt experience; if knowledge of the common-wealth could helpe, they muſt by dailie conference of matters vnderſtand it beſt: yet neither the authoritie that the kings maieſtie hath giuen them, nor the grauitie which you know to be in them, nor the knowledge which with great trauell they haue gotten, can mooue you either to kéepe you in the dutie ye ought to doo, or to auoid the great diſorder wherin ye be. For where diſobedience is thought ſtoutneſſe, and ſullennes is counted manhood, and ſtomaching is courage, and prating is iudged wiſedome, and the eluiſheſt is moſt méet to rule; how can other iuſt authoritie be obeied, or ſad counſell be followed, or good knowledge of matters be heard, or commandements of counſellors be conſidered? And how is the king obeied, whoſe wiſeſt be withſtanded, the diſobedienteſt obeied, the high in authoritie not weied, the vnſkilfulleſt made chiefe capteins, to the nobleſt moſt hurt intended, the braggingeſt braller to be moſt ſafe? And euen as the viler parts of the bodie would contend in knowledge & gouernement with the fiue wits: ſo doo the lower parts of the common-wealth enterpriſe as high a matter, to ſtriue againſt their dutie of obedience to the councell.

The action of rebellion proued by reaſon to be moſt heinous, intollerable, and diuelliſh.

But what talke I of diſobedience ſo quietlie? Haue not ſuch mad rages run in your heads, that forſaking and burſting the quietneſſe of the common peace, ye haue heinouſlie and traitorouſlie incamped your ſelues in field, and there like a bile in a bodie, naie like a ſinke in a towne, haue gathered togither all the naſtie vagabonds and idle loiterers to beare armour againſt him, whome all godlie and good ſubiects will liue and die withall. If it be a fault when two fight togither, and the kings peace broken, and puniſhment to be ſought therefore; can it be but an outragious and a deteſtable miſchiefe, when ſo manie rebels in number, malicious in mind, miſchiefous in enterpriſe, fight not among themſelues, but againſt all the kings true and obedient ſubiects; and ſéeke to proue whether rebellion may beat downe honeſtie, and wickedneſſe may ouercome truth or no? If it be treaſon to ſpeake heinouſlie of the kings maieſtie, who is not hurt thereby, and the infamie returneth to the ſpeaker againe; what kind of outragious & horrible treaſon is it, to aſſemble in campe an armie againſt him, and ſo not onelie intend an ouerthrow to him, and alſo to his common-wealth; but alſo to caſt him into an infamie, through all outward and ſtrange nations, and perſuade them that he is hated of his people, whome he can not rule; and that they be no better than vilans, which will not with good orders be ruled?

What

No death cruell enough for rebels and traitors.

A deſperat malecontents behauiour.

What death can be deuiſed cruell enough for thoſe rebels, who with trouble ſeeke death, and can not quench the thirſt of their rebellion, but with the bloud of true ſubiects; and hate the kings mercifull pardon, when they miſerablie haue tranſgreſſed, and in ſuch an outrage of miſchiefe will not by ſtubbornneſſe acknowledge themſelues to haue faulted, but intend to broile the common-wealth with the flame of their treaſon, and as much as lieth in them not one to annoie themſelues, but to deſtroie all others? He that is miſcontented with things that happen, and bicauſe he cannot beare the miſerie of them, renteth his heare, and teareth his ſkin, & mangleth his face, which caſeth not his ſorrow, but increaſeth his miſerie; maie he not be iuſtlie called mad and fantaſticall, and worthie whoſe wiſedome ſhould be ſuſpected? And what ſhall we ſaie of them, who being in the common-wealth, feeling a ſore greeuous vnto them, and eaſie to haue beene amended, ſought not the remedie, but haue increaſed the greefe, and like frantike beaſts raging againſt their head, doo teare and deface as much as lieth in them his whole authoritie in gouernement, and violentlie take to themſelues that rule vpon them, which he by policie hath granted vnto other?

Rebels and traitors worſe then brute beaſts.

And who weieng well the heauineſſe of the fault, maie not iuſtlie ſaie and hold them to be worſe herein than any kind of brute beaſts? For we ſee that the ſheepe will obeie the ſhepheard, and the neat be ruled by the neatheard, and the horſſe will know his keeper, and the dog will be in aw of his maiſter, and euerie one of them feed there, and of that, as his keeper and ruler dooth appoint him, & goeth from thenſe, and that, as he is forbidden by his ruler. And yet we haue not heard of, that anie heard or companie of theſe haue riſen againſt their heardman or gouernour, but be alwaies contented not onelie to obeie them, but alſo to ſuffer them to take profit of them. And we ſee furthermore, that all heards, & all ſorts, be more egre in fierceneſſe againſt all kind of ſtrangers, than they be againſt their owne rulers, & will eaſilier offend him who hath not hurt them, than touch their ruler who ſeeketh profit on them.

The application of the former compariſons implieng obedience.

But ye that ought to be gouerned by your magiſtrates, as the heards by the heardman, and ought to be like ſheepe to your king, who ought to be like a ſheepeheard vnto you, euen in the time when your profit was ſought, and better redreſſe was intended, than your vpſtirs and vnquietneſſe could obteine, haue beyond the crueltie of all beaſts fowlie riſen againſt your ruler, and ſhewed your ſelues worthie to be ordered like beaſts, who in kind of obedience will fall from the ſtate of men. A dog ſtoopeth when he is beaten of his maiſter, not for lacke of ſtomach, but for naturall obedience: you being not ſtriken of your head but fauoured, not kept downe but ſuccoured and remedied by law, haue violentlie againſt law not onelie barked like beaſts, but alſo bitten like helhounds. What? Is the miſchiefe of ſedition either not knowne vnto you, or not feared? Haue not examples aforetimes both told the end of rebels, and the wickedneſſe of rebellion it ſelfe? But as for old examples, let them paſſe for a while, as things well to be conſidered. But at this preſent one thing more to be weied.

The preſumptuous & arrogant vſurped rule of the rebels noted to the impeachment of princelie prerogatiue.

Looke vpon your ſelues, after ye haue wickedlie ſtept into this horrible kind of treaſon, doo ye not ſee how manie bottomleſſe whirlepooles of miſchiefe yee be gulft withall, and what lothſome kinds of rebellion ye be faine to wade through? Ye haue ſent out in the kings name, againſt the kings will, precepts of all kinds, & without commandement commanded his ſubiects, and vnrulilie haue ruled where yee liſted to command, thinking your owne fanſies the kings commandements, and rebels luſts in things to be right gouernement of things, not looking what ſhould follow by reaſon, but what your ſelues follow by affection. And is it not a dangerous and a cruell kind of treaſon, to giue out precepts to the kings people? There can be no iuſt execution of lawes, reformation of faults, giuing out of commandements, but from the king. For in the king onelie is the right herof, & the authoritie of him deriued by his appointment to his miniſters. Ye hauing no authoritie of the king, but taking it of your ſelues, what thinke ye your ſelues to be? Miniſters ye be none, except ye be the diuels miniſters, for he is the author of ſedition.

The rebels outragious and intollerable demeanor deſcribed.

Their diſobedience notorious.

The rebels offend againſt the law of iuſtice & equitie.

The former matter vehementlie vrged.

The kings maieſtie intendeth to mainteine peace, and to oppreſſe warre; ye ſtirre vp vprores of people, hurliburlies of vagabonds, routs of robbers. Is this anie part of the kings miniſterie? If a vagabond would doo what he luſt, and call himſelfe your ſeruant, and execute ſuch offices of truſt, whether yee would or no, as yee haue committed vnto another mans credit, what would euerie one of you ſaie or doo herein? Would ye ſuffer it? Ye wander out of houſes, ye make euerie daie new matters as it pleaſeth you, ye take in hand the execution of thoſe things, God by his word forbidding the ſame, which God hath put the magiſtrates in truſt withall. What can ye ſaie to this? Is it ſufferable thinke ye? If ye told a priuat meſſage in another mans name, can it be but a falſe lie I praie you? And to tell a feined meſſage to the common-wealth, and that from the king, can it be honeſt thinke ye? To command is more than to ſpeake: what is it then to command ſo traitorous a lie? This then which is in word a deceitfull lie, and in deed a traitorous fact, noiſome to the common-wealth, vnhonourable to the king, miſchiefous in you, how can ye otherwiſe iudge of it, but to be an vnheard of and notable diſobedience to the king: and therefore by notable example to be puniſhed, and not with gentleneſſe of pardon to be forgiuen? Ye haue robbed euerie honeſt houſe, and ſpoiled them vniuſtlie, and pitiouſlie wronged poore men being no offendors, to their vtter vndooing, and yet ye thinke ye haue not broken the kings lawes. The kings maieſties law and his commandement is, that euerie man ſhould ſafelie keepe his owne, and vſe it reaſonablie to an honeſt gaine of his liuing: ye violentlie take and carie awaie from men without cauſe, all things whereby they ſhould mainteine, not onelie themſelues, but alſo their familie, & leaue them ſo naked, that they ſhall feele the ſmart of your curſſed enterpriſe, longer than your owne vnnaturall & vngodlie ſtomachs would well vouchſafe. By iuſtice ye ſhould neither hurt nor wrong man, and your pretenſed cauſe of this monſtruous ſturre is to increaſe mens wealth. And yet how manie, and ſaie truth, haue ye decaied and vndoone, by ſpoiling and taking awaie their goods? How ſhould honeſt men liue quietlie in the common-wealth at anie time, if their goods, either gotten by their owne labor, or left to them by their friends, ſhall vnlawfullie and vnorderlie, to the feeding of a ſort of rebels, be ſpoiled and waſted, and vtterlie ſcattered abrode? The thing that ye take is not your right, it is an other mans owne. The maner of taking againſt his will is vnlawfull, & againſt the order of euerie good common-wealth. The cauſe why ye take it is miſchiefous and horrible, to fat your ſedition. Ye that take it be wicked traitors, and common enimies of all good order.

If he that deſireth an other mans goods or cattell, doo fault: what dooth he (thinke you) whoſe deſire taking followeth, and is led to and fro by luſt, as his wicked fanſie void of reaſon dooth guide him? Hee that vſeth not his owne well and charitablie, hath much to anſwer for: and ſhall they be thought not vniuſt, who not onelie take awaie other mens, but alſo miſuſe and waſt the ſame vngodlie? They that take things priuilie awaie, and ſteale ſecretlie and couertlie other mens goods, be by law iudged worthie death: and ſhall they that without ſhame ſpoile things openlie, and be not affeard by impudencie to profeſſe their ſpoile, be thought either honeſt creaturs to God, or faithfull ſubiects to their king, or naturall men to their countrie? If nothing had moued you but the example of miſcheefe, and the foule practiſe of other moued by the ſame, ye ſhould yet haue abſteined from ſo licentious and vilanous a ſhew of robberie, conſidering how manie honeſter there be, that being loth their wickedneſſe ſhould be blazed abrode, yet be found out by prouidence, and hanged for deſert. What ſhall we then thinke or ſaie of you? Shall we call you pickers, or hid theeues; naie more than theeues, daie theeues, heard ſtealers, ſhire ſpoilers, and vtter deſtroiers of all kinds of families, both among the poore and alſo among the rich. Let vs yet further ſee. Be there no mo things wherein ye haue broken the kings laws, and ſo vilelie diſobeied him, flat contrarie to your bounden dutie and allegiance?

The rebels are ſtill charged with their rapines, and violentlie inferred wrongs.

Ye haue not onelie ſpoiled the kings true ſubiects of their goods, but alſo ye haue impriſoned their bodies, which ſhould be at libertie vnder the king, and reſtreined them of their ſeruice, which by dutie they owe the king, and appaired both ſtrength and health, wherewith they liue and ſerue the king. Is there anie honeſt thing more deſired than libertie? Ye haue ſhamefullie ſpoiled them thereof. Is there anie thing more dutifull than to ſerue their lord and maiſter? But as that was deſired of the one part, ſo was it hindered and ſtopped on your part. For neither can the king be ſerued, nor families kept, nor the common-wealth looked vnto, where freedome of libertie is ſtopped, and diligence of ſeruice is hindered; and the helpe of ſtrength and health abated. Mens bodies ought to be free from all mens bondage and crueltie, and onelie in this realme be ſubiect in publike puniſhment to our publike gouernour, and neither be touched of *headleſſe capteins, nor holden of brainleſſe rebels. For the gouernement of ſo pretious a thing ought to belong vnto the moſt noble ruler, and not iuſtlie to be in euerie mans power, which is iuſtlie euerie liuing mans treaſure. For what goods be ſo deare to euerie man, as his owne bodie is, which is the true veſſell of the mind, to be meaſurablie kept of euerie man for all exerciſes & ſeruices of the mind? If ye may not of your owne authoritie meddle with mens goods, much leſſe you may of your owne authoritie take order with mens bodies.

Libertie deſired aboue all things.

*Fit epithets and terms for head and taile of this rebellion.

For what be goods in compariſon of health, libertie, and ſtrength, which be all ſetled and faſtened in the bodie? They that ſtrike other, doo greatlie offend, and be iuſtlie puniſhable: and ſhall they that cruellie and wrongfullie torment mens bodies with irons and impriſonments, be thought not of others but of themſelues honeſt, and plaine, and true dealing men? What ſhall we ſay by them, who in a priuat buſineſſe will let a man to go his iourneie in the kings high waie? Doo they not (thinke ye) plaine wrong? Then in a common cauſe not onelie to hinder them, but alſo to deale cruellie with them, and ſhut them from dooing their ſeruice to the king, and their dutie to the common-wealth, is it not both diſobedience, crueltie, and miſchiefe thinke ye? What an hinderance is it, to haue a good garment hurt, anie iewell appaired, or anie eſteemed thing to be decaied? And ſeeing no earthlie thing a man hath is more pretious than his body, to cauſe it to be cruellie tormented with irons, feebled with cold, weakened with ordering: can it be thought anie other thing but wrong to the ſufferer, crueltie in the doer, & great diſobedience and tranſgreſſion to the king? How then be ye able to defend it? But ſeeing ye ſo vnpitifullie vexe men, caſt them in priſon, lade them with irons, pine them with famine, contrarie to the rule of nature, contrarie to the kings maieſties lawes, contrarie to God holie ordinances, hauing no matter but pretenſed and fained gloſes, ye be not onelie diſobedient to the king like rebels, but withſtanding the law of nature like beaſts, and ſo worthie to die like dogs, except the kings maieſtie, without reſpect of your deſeruing, doo mercifullie grant you of his goodneſſe that which you cannot eſcape by iuſtice.

The offenſe of excluding the kings ſubiects from the benefit of libertie aggrauated.

A pithie concluſion inferred vpon the premiſſes, in forme of ſentence definitiue.

Yet ye being not content with this, as ſmall things enterpriſe great matters, and as though ye could not ſatiſfie your ſelues, if ye ſhould leaue anie miſchiefe vndone, haue ſought bloud with crueltie, and haue ſlaine of the kings true ſubiects manie, thinking their murder to be your defenſe, when as ye haue increaſed the fault of your vile rebellion, with the horror of bloudſhed, and ſo haue burdened miſchiefe with miſchiefe, whileſt it come to an importable weight of miſchiefe. What could we doo more, in the horribleſt kind of faults, vnto the greateſt tranſgreſſours and offendors of God and men, than to looke ſtrictlie on them by death, and ſo to rid them out of the common-wealth by ſeuere puniſhment, whome ye thought vnworthie to liue among men for their doings? And thoſe who haue not offended the king, but defended his realme, and by obedience of ſeruice ſought to puniſh the diſobedient, and for ſafegard of euerie man put themſelues vnder dutie of law, thoſe haue ye miſerablie and cruellie ſlaine, and bathed you in their bloud, whoſe doings ye ſhould haue followed, & not to haue appaired the common-wealth, both by deſtruction of good men, and alſo by increaſe of rebels. And how can that common-wealth by anie meanes indure, wherin euerie man without authoritie, may vnpuniſhed ſlea whome he liſt, and that in ſuch caſe as thoſe who be ſlaine ſhew themſelues moſt noble of courage, and moſt readie to ſerue the king and the common-wealth, and thoſe as doo ſlea be moſt vilanous and traitorous rebels that anie common-wealth did euer ſuſteine?

The rebels charged with the murder and bloudſhed of the kings liege people.

A licentious common-wealth cannot indure.

For a citie and a prouince be not the faire houſes, and the ſtrong walles, nor the defenſe of anie engine, but the liuing bodies of men, being able in number and ſtrength to mainteine themſelues by good order of iuſtice, & to ſerue for all neceſſarie & behouable vſes in the common-wealth. And when as mans bodie being a part of the whole common-wealth, is wrongfullie touched anie way, and ſpeciallie by death, then ſuffereth the common-wealth great iniurie, and that alwaies ſo much the more, how honeſter and nobler he is, who is iniuriouſlie murdered. How was the lord Sheffeld handled among you, a noble gentleman, and of good ſeruice, both fit for counſell in peace, and for conduct in war, conſidering either the grauitie of his wiſedome, or the authoritie of his perſon, or his ſeruice to the common-wealth, or the hope that all men had in him, or the need that England had of ſuch, or among manie notablie good, his ſingular excellencie, or the fauor that all men bare toward him, being loued of euerie man, and hated of no man?

Wherein and whereof conſiſteth a citie, prouince, or politike bodie.

Lord Sheffelds ſlaughter laid to the rebels charge.

Conſidered ye who ſhould by dutie be the kings ſubiects, either how ye ſhould not haue offended the K. or after offenſe haue required the kings pardon, or not to haue refuſed his goodneſſe offered, or at length, to haue yeelded to his mercie, or not to haue ſlaine thoſe who came for his ſeruice, or to haue ſpared thoſe who

Lord Sheffelds wofull end in this rebellion pithilie vrged.

The knitting of mans bodie and mind Gods worke, and to whome the diſſoluing thereof belongeth.

who in danger offered ranſome. But all theſe things forgotten by rage of rebellion, becauſe one madneſſe cannot be without infinit vices, ye ſlew him cruellie, who offered himſelfe manfullie, nor would not ſo much as ſpare him for ranſome, who was worthie for nobleneſſe to haue had honour, & hewed him bare whome ye could not hurt armed, and by ſlauerie ſlue nobilitie, in déed miſerablie, in faſhion cruellie, in cauſe diueliſhlie. Oh with what cruell ſpite was violentlie ſundred ſo noble a bodie from ſo godlie a mind? Whoſe death muſt rather be reuenged than lamented, whoſe death was no lacke to himſelfe, but to his countrie, whoſe death might euerie way béene better borne, than at a rebels hand. Violence is in all things hurtfull, but in life horrible. What ſhould I ſpeake of others in the ſame caſe, diuerſe and notable, whoſe death for manhood and ſeruice can want no worthie praiſe, ſo long as theſe vglie ſturrers of rebellion can be had in mind. God hath himſelfe ioined mans bodie and his ſoule togither, not to be departed aſunder, afore he euer diſſeuer them himſelfe, or cauſe them to be diſſeuered by his miniſter.

Hereby he ſheweth the rebels conſciences ſéered vp as it were with an hot iron.

And ſhall rebels and héedleſſe camps, being armed againſt God, and in field againſt their king, thinke it no fault to ſhed bloud of true ſubiects, hauing neither office of God, nor appointment of miniſters, nor cauſe of rebellion? He that ſtealeth anie part of a mans ſubſtance, is worthie to loſe his life. What ſhall we thinke then of them, who ſpoile men of their liues, for the maintenance whereof, not onelie ſubſtance & riches be ſought for, but alſo all commonwelths be deuiſed? Now then, your owne conſciences ſhould be made your iudges, & none other ſet to giue ſentence againſt ye. Séeing ye haue béene ſuch bloudſhedders, ſo heinous manquellers, ſo horrible murderers, could ye doo anie other than plainlie confeſſe your foule and wicked rebellion to be gréeuous againſt God, and traitorous to the king, and hurtfull to the common-wealth? So manie gréeuous faults méeting togither in one ſinke, might not onelie haue diſcouraged, but alſo driuen to deſperation, anie other honeſt or indifferent mind.

The rebels couetouſneſſe and ambition inſatiable.

A bréefe capitulation of the rebels diſloiall atempts and purpoſes.

But what féele they, whoſe hearts ſo déepe miſchéefe had hardened, and by vehemencie of affection be made vnſhamefaſt, and ſtop all diſcourſe of reaſon, to let at large the full ſcope of their vnmeaſurable madneſſe? Priuat mens goods ſéeme little to your vnſatiable deſires, yée haue waxed gréedie now vpon cities, and haue attempted mightie ſpoiles, to glut vp (and yée could) your waſting hunger. Oh how much haue they néed of, that will neuer be contented, and what riches can ſuffice anie that will attempt high enterpriſes aboue their eſtate? Ye could not mainteine your camps with your priuat goods, with your neighbours portion, but yée muſt alſo attempt cities, bicauſe ye ſought great ſpoiles with other mens loſſes, and had forgotten how yée liued at home honeſtlie with your owne, and thought them worthie death that would diſquiet yée in your houſe, and plucke awaie that which yée by right of law thought to be your owne. Héerein ſée what yée would haue doone, ſpoiled the kings maieſties ſubiects, weakened the kings ſtrength, ouerthrowne his townes, taken awaie his munition, drawne his ſubiects to like rebellion, yea and as it is among forren enimies in ſacking of cities, no doubt thereof, yée would haue fallen to ſlaughter of men, rauiſhing of wiues, deflouring of maidens, chopping of children, fiering of houſes, beating downe of ſtréets, ouerthrowing of altogither.

An argument from the leſſe to the greater.

The vſe and neceſſarie ſeruice of towns, & what it is to ouerthrow them.

For what meaſure haue men in the increaſe of madneſſe, when they can not at the beginning ſtaie themſelues from falling into it. And if the beſetting but of one houſe to rob it, be iuſtlie déemed worthie death: what ſhall we thinke of them that beſiege whole cities for deſire of ſpoile? We liue vnder a king to ſerue him at all times when he ſhall néed our ſtrength: and ſhall ye then not onlie withdraw your ſelues, which ought as much to be obedient as we be, but alſo violentlie plucke other awaie too, fro the dutie vnto the which by Gods commandement all ſubiects be ſtrictlie bound, and by all lawes euerie nation is naturallie led? The townes be not onelie the ornament of the realme, but alſo the ſeat of merchants, the place of handicrafts, that men ſcattered in villages, and néeding diuerſe things, maie in little roome know where to find the lacke. To ouerthrow them then, is nothing elſe but to waſt your owne commodities, ſo that when ye would buie a neceſſarie thing for monie, ye could not tell where to find the ſame.

The vſe and ſeruice of munition.

Wherein appéereth the faithfull ſeruice of cities.

A good ſubiects wiſh, and the reaſon thereof.

Excester commended for loue & loiall ſeruice to the king & eſtate.

Norwich vpbraided with the example of Excester.

Some citizens of Norwich excuſable of this rebellion, but moſt chargeable therwith in a high degrée of diſloialtie.

Munition ſerueth the king not onelie for the defenſe of his owne, but alſo for the inuaſion of his enimie. And if ye will then ſo ſtrictlie deale with him, that ye will not let him ſo much as defend his owne, ye offer him double iniurie; both that ye let him from dooing anie notable fact abrode, and alſo that ye ſuffer not him quietlie to inioie his owne at home. But herein hath notablie appéered what cities haue faithfully ſerued and ſuffred extreme danger, not onelie of goods, but alſo of famine & death, rather than to ſuffer the kings enimies to enter: and what white liuered cities haue not onlie not withſtood them, but alſo with ſhame fauored them, and with miſchiefe aided them. And I would I might praiſe herein all cities alike! which I would doo, if all were like worthie. For then I might ſhew more faith in ſubiects than ſtrength in rebelles; and teſtifie to men to come, what a generall faith euerie citie bare to the kings maieſtie, whoſe age although it were not fit to rule, yet his ſubiects hearts were willing to obeie, thinking not onelie of the hope, which all men conceiue hereafter to be in him, but alſo of the iuſt kind of gouernment, which in his minoritie his councell dooth vſe among them. And here, how much and how worthilie maie Excester be commended, which being in the middeſt of rebels, vnuittelled, vnfurniſhed, vnprepared for ſo long a ſiege, did noblie hold out the continuall and dangerous aſſault of the rebell? For they ſuſteined the violence of the rebell, not onlie they had plentie enough of vittels, but alſo eleuen or twelue daies after the extreme famine came on them, and liuing without bread, were in courage ſo manfull, & in dutie ſo conſtant, that they thought it yet much better to die the extreme death of hunger, ſhewing truth to their king, and loue to their countrie, than to giue anie place to the rebell, and fauor him with aid, although they might haue doone it with their leſſe danger. Whoſe example if Norwich had followed, & had not rather giuen place to traitor Ket, than to kéepe their dutie; and had not ſought more ſafegard than honeſtie, and priuat hope more than common quietneſſe: they had ended their rebellion ſooner, and eſcaped themſelues better, and ſaued the loſſe of the worthie lord Shefféeld, in whome was more true ſeruice for his life, than in them for their goods. And although this can not be ſpoken againſt a certeine honeſt ſort that were amongſt them, whoſe praiſe was the greater, bicauſe they were ſo few: yet the greater number was ſuch, that they not onelie obeied the rebell for feare, but alſo followed him for loue, and did ſo traitorouſlie order the kings band vnder my lord marqueſſe, that they ſuffered more damage out of their houſes by the townſmen, than they did abrode by the rebelles. Whoſe fault as the kings maieſtie maie pardon, ſo I would either the example might be forgotten, that no citie might hereafter follow the like, or the déed be ſo abhorred, that others hereafter would auoid the like ſhame, & learne to be noble by Exceſter, whoſe truth dooth not onelie deſerue great praiſes, but alſo great reward.

Exceſter noble and true.

Who then that would willinglie defend ye, can ſay anie thing for ye, which haue ſo diuerſlie faulted, ſo traitorouſlie offended, not onlie againſt priuat men ſeuerallie, but alſo generallie againſt whole townes, and that after ſuch a ſort, as outward enimies full of deadlie feud could not more cruellie inuade them? And thus the kings maieſtie diſhonored, his councell diſobeied, the goods of the poore ſpoiled, the houſes of the wealthie ſacked, honeſt mens bodies impriſoned, worthie mens perſonages ſlaine, cities beſieged and threatned, and all kind of things diſordered, can ye without teares and repentance heare ſpoken of, which without honeſtie and godlineſſe ye practiſed, and not find in your hearts now to returne to dutie, which by witchcraft of ſedition were drowned in diſorder? Haue ye not in diſorder firſt gréeuouſlie offended God, next traitorouſlie riſen againſt your king, and ſo neither worthie euerlaſting life, as long as ye ſo remaine, nor yet ciuill life being in ſuch a breach of common quietneſſe? If euerie one of theſe cannot by themſelues plucke you backe from this your lewd and outragious enterpriſes, yet let them altogither ſtir ye; or at leaſt be a fearfull example to others, to beware by your vnmeaſurable follie, how they doo ſo far prouoke God, or offend man: and find by your miſtemper to be themſelues better ordered, and learne ſtill to obeie, bicauſe they would not repent, and ſo to liue with honeſtie, that they would neither willinglie offend Gods law, nor diſobeie mans.

A collection or beadroll of certeine outrages doone by the rebels.

Perſuaſions to obedience and loialtie.

But and ye were ſo much bleared, that you did thinke impoſſible things, and your reaſon gaue ye againſt all reaſon, that ye neither diſpleaſed God herein, nor offended the king, yet be ye ſo blind, that ye vnderſtand not your owne caſe, nor your neighbors miſerie, nor the ruine of the whole commonwealth, which dooth euidentlie follow your ſo foule and deteſtable ſedition? Doo ye not ſée how for the maintenance of theſe vngodlie rablements, not onlie cities and villages, but alſo ſhires and countries be vtterlie deſtroied? Is not their corne waſted, their cattell fetcht awaie, their houſes rifled, their goods ſpoiled, and all to féed your vpriſing without reaſon, and to mainteine this tumult of rebellion inuented of the diuell, continued by you, and to be ouerthrowen by the power of Gods mightie hand? And whie ſhould not ſo hurtfull waſting and harrieng of countries be iuſtlie puniſhed with great ſeueritie, ſéeing robbing of houſes, and taking of purſes, doo by law deſerue the extremitie of death? How manie ſuffer iniurie when one hundred of a ſhire is ſpoiled? And what iniurie thinke ye is doone, when not onelie whole ſhires be deſtroied, but alſo euerie quarter of the realme touched? Haue ye not brought vpon vs all pouertie, weakneſſe, and hatred within the realme, & diſcourage, ſhame, and damage without the realme? If ye miſerablie intended not onelie to vndoo other, but alſo to deſtroie your ſelues, and to ouerthrow the whole realme, could ye haue taken a readier waie to your owne ruine than this is?

The hurts & miſchiefes that befall cities, &c: by mainteining rebelles.

Rebellion is woorthilie to be puniſhed,

A further view of the inconueniences bred by rebellion.

And firſt if ye be anie thing reaſonable, lift vp your reaſon, and weigh by wiſdome, if not all things, yet your owne caſes, and learne in the beginning of matters to foreſée the end, and iudge aduiſedlie yer ye enter into anie thing haſtilie. Sée ye not this yeare the loſſe of harueſt? And thinke ye can grow to wealth that yéere when ye loſe your thrift and profit? Barns be poore mens ſtorehouſes, wherein lieth a great part of euerie mans owne liuing, his wiues and childrens liuing, wherwith men mainteine their families, paie their rents: and therefore be alwaies thought moſt rich when they haue beſt crops. And now when there is neither plentie of haie, nor ſufficient of ſtraw, nor corne inough, and that through the great diſorder of your lewd rebellion, can ye thinke ye doo well, when ye vndoo your ſelues, and iudge it a common-welth when the commons is deſtroied, and ſéeke your hap by vnhappineſſe, and eſtéeme your owne loſſe to be your owne forwardnes, and by this iudgement ſhew your ſelues, how little ye vnderſtand other mens matters, when ye can ſcarſelie conſider the weightieſt of your owne? Hath not the haie this yeare, as it roſe from the ground, ſo rotted to the ground againe: and where it was woont by mens ſeaſonable labor to be taken in due time, and then ſerue for the maintenance of horſſe and cattell wherwith we liue, now by your diſordered miſchéefe hath béene by mens idleneſſe and vndutifulneſſe let alone vntouched, and ſo neither ſerueth the poore to make monie of, nor anie cattell to liue with. The corne was ſowne with labour, and the ground tilled for it with labour, and looked to be brought home againe with labour; and for lacke of honeſt laborers it is loſt on the ground; the owners being loiterers, and ſéeking other mens, haue loſt their owne, and hoping for mounteins, lacked their preſent thrift, neither obteining that they ſought, nor ſéeking that they ought.

The loſſe of harueſt. Barns be poore mens ſtorehouſes.

Haie rotting on the ground.

Loſſe of corne for lacke of reaping.

And how ſhall men liue when the maintenance of their prouiſion is lacking? For labouring and their old ſtore is waſted by wildneſſe of ſedition, and ſo neither ſpare the old nor ſaue the new. How can men be fed then or beaſts liue, when as ſuch waſtfull negligence is miſerablie vſed? And miſpending the time of their profit, in ſhamefull diſorder of inobedience, they care not greatlie what becommeth of their owne, bicauſe they intend to liue by other mens? Haie is gone, corne is waſted, ſtraw is ſpoiled; what reckoning of harueſt can ye make, either for the aid of others, or for the reléefe of your ſelues? And thus haue ye brought in one kind of miſerie, which if yée ſaw before, as ye be like to féele after, although ye had hated the common-welth, yet for loue of your ſelues ye would haue auoided the great enormitie thereof, into the which ye wilfullie now haue caſt your ſelues.

The loſſe of one yeares harueſt verie hurtfull.

An other no leſſe is, that ſuch plentie of vittels as was abundantlie in euerie quarter for the reléefe of vs all, is now waſtfullie and vnthriftfullie ſpent, in mainteining you vnlawfull rebels, and ſo with diſorder all is conſumed, which with good huſbandrie might long haue indured. For, ſo much as would haue ſerued a whole yeare at home with diligence and ſkilfull héed of huſbandrie, that is wilfullie waſted in a moneth in the campe, through the rauening ſpoile of vilanie. For what is vnordered plentie, but a waſtfull ſpoile, whereof the inconuenience is ſo great, as ye be worthie to féele, and bringeth in more hardnes of liuing, greater dearth of all things, & occaſioneth manie cauſes of diſeaſes? The price of things muſt néeds increaſe much, when the number of things wareth leſſe, and by ſcarſitie be inhanſed, & compelleth men to abate their liberalitie in houſe, both to their owne, and alſo to ſtrangers. And where the rich wanteth, what can the poore find, who in a common ſcarſitie liueth moſt ſcarſelie, and féeleth quicklieſt the ſharpneſſe of ſtaruing, when euerie man for lacke is hungerbitten. Which if ye had well remembred before, as ye now maie after perceiue, ye would not I thinke ſo ſtiffe-neckedlie haue reſiſted and indangered your ſelues in the ſtorme of famine, whereof ye moſt likelie muſt haue the greateſt part, which moſt ſtubbornlie reſiſted, to your owne

Waſtfull ſpending of vittels by the rebels inconuenient to the whole ſtate.

A neceſſitie of inhanſing the price of things.

ſhame and confuſion.

After a great dearth commeth a great death, a reaſon why.

Experience teacheth vs, that after a great dearth commeth a great death; for that when men in great want of meat eat much ill meat, they fill their bodies with ill humors, and caſt them from their ſtate of health, into a ſubiection of ſickeneſſe: bicauſe the good bloud in the bodie is not able to keepe his temper, for the multitude of the ill humors that corrupteth the ſame. And ſo grow great & deadlie plagues, and deſtroie great numbers of all ſorts, ſparing no kind that they light on, neither reſpecting the poore with mercie, nor the rich with fauour. Can ye therefore thinke herein, when ye ſee decaie of vittels, the rich pinch, the poore famiſh, the following of diſeaſes, the greatneſſe of death, the mourning of widowes, the pitifulneſſe of the fatherleſſe, and all this miſerie to come thorough your vnnaturall miſbehauiour, that ye haue not dangerouſlie hurt the commons of your countrie with a dolefull and vncurable wound? These things being once felt in the common-wealth, as they muſt needs be, euerie man ſeeth by and by what followeth: euen a great diminiſhment of the ſtrength of the realme, when the due number that the realme dooth mainteine is made leſſe, and thereby we be made rather a preie for our enimies, than a ſafetie for our ſelues.

A briefe rehearſall or ſummarie of miſchiefes iſſuing from rebellion.

A great decaie of people.

And how can there be but a great decaie of people at the length, when ſome be ouerthrowne in warre, ſome ſuffer for puniſhment, ſome pine for famine, ſome die with the campes diet, ſome be conſumed with ſickeneſſe? For although ye thinke your ſelues able to match with a few vnprepared gentlemen, and put them from their houſes, that ye might gaine the ſpoile: doo ye iudge therefore your ſelues ſtrong inough, not onelie to withſtand a kings power, but alſo to ouerthrow it? Is it poſſible that ye ſhould haue ſo mad a frenſie in your head, that ye ſhould thinke the number ye ſee ſo ſtrong, that all ye ſee not ſhould not be able to preuaile to the contrarie? With what reaſon could ye thinke, that if ye bode the hot brunt of battell, but ye muſt needs feele the ſmart, ſpeciallie the kings power comming againſt you: which if ye feare not, belike ye know not the force thereof? And ſo much the greater number is loſt in the realme, that both the ouercommer and the ouercommed be parties, although vnlike, of one realme: and what loſſe is not onelie of either ſide, but of both, that dooth plainlie redound to the whole.

Rebels can not preuaile againſt the princes power.

A neceſſarie conſequent that rebels are ſeuerelie to be puniſhed, and that ſuch puniſhment is good and neceſſarie.

Then where ſo great and ſo horrible a fault is committed, as worſe can not be mentioned of from the beginning, and bringeth in withall ſuch penurie, ſuch weakenes, ſuch diſorder in the common-wealth, as no miſchiefe beſides could doo the like: can anie man thinke with iuſt reaſon, that all ſhall eſcape vnpuniſhed that ſhall eſcape the ſword, and not manie for terrour and examples ſake ſhould be looked vnto, who haue beene either great dooers in ſuch a diſordered vilanie, or great counſellors to ſuch an outgrowne miſchiefe; ſeeing the onelie remedie of redreſſing wilfull faults is a iuſt and ſeuere puniſhment of ſuch, whoſe naughtie deeds good men ought to abhorre for duties ſake, and ill men maie dread for like puniſhments ſake, and a free licence to doo miſchiefe vnpuniſhed is ſo dangerous, that the ſufferance of one is the occaſion of the fall of a great number, and womaniſh pitie to one is a deceitfull crueltie to the whole, intiſing them to their owne deſtruction by ſufferance, which would haue auoided the danger by fore puniſhment.

Againſt fooliſh pitie forbearing and forgiuing a wilfull offendor.

And in ſuch a barrenneſſe of vittels, as muſt needs come after ſo rauening a ſpoile, it muſt needs be, that ſome (though few) ſhall be ſo nipt with egerneſſe of famine, that they ſhall not recouer againe themſelues out of ſo fretting a danger. So in a generall weakeneſſe, where all ſhall be feebled, ſome muſt needs die, and ſo diminiſh the number, and abate ſuch ſtrength as the realme defended it ſelfe withall before. Which occaſion of neuer ſo few, comming of ſo great a cauſe, if ye ſhould make iuſt amends for, not of recompenſe which ye could not, but of puniſhment which ye ought; how manie, how diuerſe and how cruell deaths ought euerie one of ye often ſuffer? How manie came to the camps from long labour to ſudden eaſe, and from meane fare to ſtroieng of vittels: and ſo fell in a maner vnwares to ſuch a contrarie change, that nature hir ſelfe abiding neuer great and ſudden changes, can not beare it without ſome grounds entered of diſeaſes to come, which vncircumſpect men ſhall ſooner feele than thinke of, and then will ſcarſelie iudge the cauſe, when they ſhall be vexed with the effect?

Rebels puniſhable with manie deaths.

Idleneſſe and meat of other mens charge.

It is little maruell that idleneſſe and meat of an other mans charge will ſoone feed vp & fat like men: but it is great maruell if idleneſſe and other mens meat doo not abate the ſame by ſickeneſſe againe, and ſpeciallie comming from the one, and going to the other: contrarie in thoſe who violentlie ſeeke to turne in a moment the whole realme to the contraris. For while their mind changeth from obedience to vnrulineſſe, and turneth it ſelfe from honeſtie to wildneſſe, and their bodies go from labour to idleneſſe, from ſmall fare to ſpoile of vittels, and from beds in the night to cabins, and from ſweet houſes to ſtinking camps, it muſt needs be by changing of affections which alter the bodie, and by vſing of reſt that filleth the bodie, and by glutting of meats which weakeneth the bodie, & with cold in the nights which accraſeth the bodie, and with corrupt aire which infecteth the bodie, that there follow ſome grieuous tempeſt not onelie of contagious ſickeneſſe, but alſo of preſent death to the bodie.

The force of peſtilence following famine.

The greateſt plucke of all is, that vehemencie of plague, which naturallie followeth the dint of hunger, which when it entereth once among men, what darts of pangs, what throwes of paines, what ſhowts of death dooth it caſt out? How manie fall, not aſtonied with the ſickeneſſe, but fretted with the paine? How beateth it downe not onelie ſmall townes, but alſo great countries? This when ye ſee light firſt on your beaſts which lacke fodder, and after fall on men whoſe bodies gape for it, and ſee the ſcarſeneſſe of men to be by this your foule enterpriſe, and not onelie other men touched with plagues, but alſo your owne houſe ſtoong with death, and the plague alſo raiſed of your riſing, to fire your ſelues: can ye thinke you to be anie other but mankillers of other, and murtherers of your ſelues, and the principals of the ouerthrow of ſo great a number, as ſhall either by ſword or puniſhment, famine, or ſome plague or peſtilence be conſumed and waſted out of the common-wealth?

The plague & peſtilence occaſioned by rebellion.

Rebels enimies & murtherers of their countrie.

And ſeeing he that decaieth the number of cottages or plowes in a towne, ſeemeth to be an enimie to the common-wealth: ſhall we not count him, not onelie an enimie, but alſo a murtherer of his countrie, who by harebrained vnrulineſſe cauſeth vtter ruine and peſtilent deſtruction of ſo manie thouſand men? Grant this follie then and ouerſight to be ſuch as worthilie ye maie count it, and I ſhall go further in declaring of other great inconueniences, which your dangerous and furious miſbehauiour hath hurtfullie brought in; ſeeing diuerſe honeſt and true dealing men, whoſe liuing is by their owne prouiſion, hath come ſo before hand by time, that they haue beene able well to liue honeſtlie in their houſes, & paie beſide the rents of their farmes trulie, and now haue by your crueltie and abhorred inſurrections loſt their goods, their cattell, their har-ne I, which they had gotten before, and wherwith they intended to liue hereafter, & now be brought to this extremitie, that they be neither able to liue, as they were woont at home before; nor to paie their accuſtomeable rent at their due time. Whereby they be brought into trouble and vnquietneſſe, not onlie muſing what they haue loſt by you, but alſo curſing you by whome they haue loſt it, and alſo in danger of loſing their holds at their lords hands, except by pitie they ſhew more mercie, than the right of the law will grant by iuſtice.

The fruits of honeſt mens trauels long in gathering, quickelie ſpoiled by rebellion.

An argument from equitie & vpright dealing euen with the vniuſt.

And what a griefe is it to an honeſt man, to labor trulie in youth, and to gaine painefullie by labour, wherewith to liue honeſtlie in age, and to haue this, gotten in long time, to be ſuddenlie caught awaie by the violence of ſedition, which name he ought to abhorre by it ſelfe, although no miſerie of loſſe followed to him thereby. But what greater griefe ought ſeditious rebels to haue themſelues, who if they be not ſtriken with puniſhment, yet ought to pine in conſcience, and melt awaie with the griefe of their owne faults, when they ſée innocents and men of true ſeruice hindered and burdened with the hurt of their rebellion, & who in a good commonwealth ſhould for honeſties ſake proſper, they by theſe rebels onlie meanes be caſt ſo behind the hand, as they can not recouer eaſilie againe by their owne truth, that which they haue loſt by thoſe traitors miſchiefe? And if vniuſt men ought not ſo to be handled at anie mans hands, but onelie ſtand to the order of a law: how much more ſhould true and faithfull ſubiects, who deſerue praiſe, féele no vnquietneſſe, nor be vexed with ſedition, who be obedientlie in ſubiection, but rather ſéeke iuſt amends at falſe rebels hands, and by law obteine that they loſt by diſorder, and ſo conſtreine you to the vttermoſt, to paie the recompenſe of wrongfull loſſes, bicauſe ye were the authors of theſe wrongfull ſpoiles.

Multitudes of vagabonds and roges procured by rebellions.

Then would ye ſoone perceiue the commonwealths hurt, not when other felt it who deſerued it not, but when you ſmarted who cauſed it, and ſtood not & looked vpon other mens loſſes which ye might pitie, but tormented with your owne which ye would lament. Now I am paſt this miſchiefe, which ye will not hereafter denie, when ye ſhall praiſe other mens foreſight, rather than your wicked doings, in bewailing the end of your furie, in whoſe beginning ye now reioiſe. What ſaie ye to the number of vagabonds and loitering beggers, which after the ouerthrow of your campe, and ſcattering of this ſeditious number, will ſwarme in euerie corner of the realme and not onelie lie loitering vnder hedges, but alſo ſtand ſturdilie in cities, and beg boldlie at euerie doore, leauing labour which they like not, and following idleneſſe which they ſhould not? For euerie man is eaſilie and naturallie brought from labour to eaſe, from the better to the worſe, from diligence to ſlothfulneſſe: and after warres it is commonlie ſéene, that a great number of thoſe which went out honeſt, returne home againe like roiſters, and as though they were burnt to the wars bottome, they haue all their life after an vnſauorie ſmacke thereof, & ſmell ſtill toward daieſléepers, purſepickers, highwaie-robbers, quarrelmakers, yea and bloudſheders too.

To what ſhifts ſoldiers fall after diſcamping and ceaſſing from warres.

Againſt loittering lubbers that can not awaie with labour.

Doo we not ſée commonlie in the end of warres more robbing, more begging, more murdering than before, and thoſe to ſtand in the high waie to aſke their almes, whome ye be affraid to ſaie naie vnto honeſtlie, leaſt they take it awaie from you violentlie, and haue more cauſe to ſuſpect their ſtrength, than pitie their néed? Is it not then dailie heard, how men be not onelie purſued, but vtterlie ſpoiled, & few maie ride ſafe by the kings highwaie, except they ride ſtrong, not ſo much for feare of their goods, which men eſtéeme leſſe, but alſo for danger of their life, which euerie man loueth. Worke is vndoone at home and loiterers linger in ſtréets, lurke in alehouſes, range in highwaies, valiant beggers plaie in towns and yet complaine of néed, whoſe ſtaffe if it be once hot in their hand, or ſluggiſhneſſe bred in their boſome, they will neuer be allured to labour againe, contenting themſelues better with idle beggerie, than with honeſt and profitable labour. And what more noiſome beaſts be there in a commonwealth? Drones in hiues ſucke out the honie, a ſmall matter, but yet to be looked on by good huſbands. Caterpillers deſtroie the fruit, an hurtfull thing, and well ſhifted for by a diligent ouerſéer. Diuerſe vermine deſtroie corne, kill pulleine, engines and ſnares be made for them.

A loiterer deſcribed.

The ſight of manie flies in a yeare a naturall prognoſtication of a plague like to follow.

But what is a loiterer? A ſucker of honie, a ſpoiler of corne, a ſtroier of fruit, a waſter of monie, a ſpoiler of vittels, a ſucker of bloud, a breaker of orders, a ſéeker of breakes, a queller of life, a baſiliſke of the commonwealth, which by companie and ſight doth poiſon the whole countrie, and ſtaineth honeſt minds with the infection of his veneme, and ſo draweth the commonwealth to death and deſtruction. Such is the fruits of your labour and trauell for your pretenſed commonwealth, which iuſtice would no man ſhould taſte of but your ſelues, that yée might trulie iudge of your owne miſchéefe, and fraie other by example from preſuming the like. When we ſée a great number of flies in a yeare, we naturallie iudge it like to be a great plague, and hauing ſo great a ſwarming of loitering vagabonds, readie to beg and brall at euerie mans doore, which declare a greater infection, can we not looke for a gréeuouſer and perillouſer danger than the plague is? Who can therefore otherwiſe déeme, but this one deadlie hurt, wherewith the commonwelth of our nation is wounded, beſide all other is ſo peſtilent, that there can be no more hurtfull thing in a well gouerned eſtate, nor more throwne into all kind of vice and vnrulineſſe: and therefore this your ſedition is not onelie moſt odious, but alſo moſt horrible, that hath ſpotted the whole countrie with ſuch a ſtaine of idleneſſe.

Diſorder in euerie degrée cauſed by rebellion.

Magiſtrats diſobeied, and neglect of dutie in generall by rebellion.

Obſeruing of order in euerie eſtate ſupporteth a commonwealth, & contrariwiſe the hurt of diſorder.

There can be none end of faults, if a man rehearſe all faults that doo neceſſarilie follow this vnrulie ſturdineſſe. For not onelie vagabonds wandering and ſcattering themſelues for miſchéefe, ſhall run in a mans eies, but alſo diſorder of euerie degrée ſhall enter into a mans mind, and ſhall behold hereby the commonwealth miſerablie defaced by you, who ſhould as much as other haue kept your ſelues in order in it. Neither be the magiſtrats dulie obeied, nor the lawes iuſtlie feared, nor degrées of men conſidered, nor maiſters well ſerued, nor parents trulie reuerenced, nor lords remembred of their tenants, nor yet either naturall or ciuill law much regarded. And it is plainlie vnpoſſible that that countrie ſhall well ſtand in gouernement, and the people growe to wealth, where order in euerie ſtate is not fitlie obſerued: and that bodie cannot be without much gréefe of inflammation, where anie leſt part is out of ioint, or not duelie ſet in his owne naturall place.

Wherefore order muſt be kept in the commonwealth like health in the bodie, and all the drift of policie looketh to this end, how this temper may be ſafelie mainteined, without anie exceſſe of vnmeaſurableneſſe, either of the one ſide, or of the other. And eaſie inough it is to kéepe the ſame, when it is once brought into the meane, and to hold it in the ſtaie it is found in: but when it burſteth out once with a vehemencie, and hath gotten into an vnrulie diſorder, it ſpreadeth ſo faſt, and ouerfloweth all honeſt mens reſiſting ſo violentlie, that it will be hard to recouer the breach of long time againe, except with great and wiſe counſell, which no doubt ſhall be in ſeaſon vſed, there be wonderfull remedies ſought therefore. And euen as a man falling, is eaſier holden vp by ſtaie, than when he is fallen downe he is able to riſe againe: ſo is the commonwealth ſlipping, by the foreſight of wiſedome better kept from ruine; than when it is once fallen into anie kind of miſerie, the ſame may be called againe to the old and former ſtate. Doo we not euidentlie know, that a man may better keepe his arme or his leg from breaking or falling out of ioint, afore hurt come to it; than after the hurt it may ſafelie and quietlie be healed, and reſtored to the former ſtrength and health againe? And now through your ſeditious means, things that were afore quiet and in good order, laws feared and obeied, ſubiects ruled and kept in dutie, be all now in a great diſorder, and like (if it be not holpen) to grow to wildneſſe, and a beaſtlineſſe; ſeeing that neither common dutie can be kept, which nature preſcribeth, nor common law can be regarded, which policie requireth. How can yee keepe your owne if yee keepe no order? Your wiues and children, how can they be defended from other mens violence, if yee will in other things breake all order? By what reaſon would yee be obeied of yours as ſeruants, if yee will not obeie the king as ſubiects? How would yee haue others deale orderlie with you, if yee will vſe diſorder againſt all others? Seeing then there is ſuch a confuſion now of things, ſuch a turmoile of men, ſuch a diſorder of faſhions; who can looke to liue quietlie a great while, who can thinke but that yee haue miſerablie toſſed the commonwealth, and ſo vexed all men with diſorder, that the inconuenience hereof cannot onelie nip others, but alſo touch you?

Rebels are againſt their owne profit.

Equalitie of iuſtice.

But now ſee how that not onelie theſe vnlooked for miſcheefes haue heauilie growne on yee, but alſo thoſe commodities, which yee thought to haue holpen your ſelues and others by, be not onelie hindered, but alſo hurt thereby. The kings maieſtie by the aduiſe, &c: intended a iuſt reformation of all ſuch things as poore men could trulie ſhew themſelues oppreſſed with, thinking equalitie of iuſtice to be the diademe of his kingdome, and the ſafegard of his commons. Which was not onelie intended by wiſedome, but alſo ſet on with ſpeed, and ſo entered into a due conſidering of all ſtates, that none ſhould haue iuſt cauſe to grudge againſt the other, when as euerie thing rightfullie had, nothing could be but vnrightfullie grudged at. And this would haue beene doone, not onelie with your glad and willing aſſent: but alſo beene doone by this daie almoſt throughout the whole realme: ſo that quietlie it had beene obteined without inconuenience, and ſpeedilie without delaie. And whatſoeuer had beene doone by the kings maieſties authoritie, that would by right haue remained for euer, and ſo taken in law, that the contrarie partie neither could by iuſtice, neither would by boldneſſe haue enterpriſed the breach thereof.

Rebels hurt themſelues.

Priuat men are not to inforce a reformation.

Rebellion hurteth the whole realme.

The benefit of rebellion in one reſpect.

But leaſt wicked men ſhould be wealthie, and they whoſe hearts be not truelie bent to obedience, ſhould obteine at the kings hands that they deſerued not in a commonwealth, yee haue maruellouſlie and worthilie hurt your ſelues, and greeuouſlie prouided (except the kings goodneſſe be more vnto you than your owne deſerts can claime) that yee be not ſo much worthie as to be benefited in anie kind, as yee be worthie to loſe that yee haue on euerie ſide. Yee haue thought good to be your owne reformers belike, not onelie vnnaturallie miſtruſting the kings iuſtice, but alſo cruellie and vnciuillie dealing with your owne neighbours. Wherein I would as yee haue hurt the whole realme, ſo yee had not enterpriſed a thing moſt dangerous to your ſelues, & moſt contrarie to the thing yee intended. If yee had let things alone, thought good by your ſelues to be redreſſed, and dutifullie looked for the performance of that, the kings maieſtie promiſing reformation, they ſhould not haue beene vndoone at this time, as in a great ſort of honeſt places they be; nor whole countries, who for their quietneſſe be moſt worthie to be looked on, ſhould haue beene vnprouided for at this date. But this commoditie hath happened by the waie, that it is euidentlie knowne by your miſcheefe, and others dutie, who be moſt true to the king, and moſt worthie to be doone for, and who be moſt pernicious and traitorous rebels. And it is not to be doubted, but they ſhall be conſidered with thanks, and find iuſt redreſſe without deſerued miſerie, & you puniſhed like rebels, who might haue had both praiſe & profit like ſubiects.

Reformation intended by rebels, like ſores cured by ill ſurgions.

For that as yee haue valiantlie doone of your ſelues, thinke yee it will ſtand anie longer, than men feare your rage, which cannot indure long; and that yee ſhall not then bide the rigor of the law for your priuat iniuries, as yee vſed the furie of your braines in other mens oppreſſions? Will men ſuffer wrong at your hands, when law can redreſſe it, & the right of the commonwealth will mainteine it, and good order in countries will beare it? Yee amend faults as ill ſurgions heale ſores, which when they ſeeme to be whole aboue, they rankle at the bottome, and ſo be faine continuallie to be ſore, or elſe be mended by new breaking of the ſkin. Your redreſſe ſeemeth to you perfect and good, yee haue pulled downe ſuch things as yee would, yee thinke now all is well: yee conſider no further, yee ſeeke not the bottome, yee ſee not the ſore, that yee haue doone it by no law, yee haue redreſſed it by no order, what then? If it be no otherwiſe ſearched than by you, it will not tarie long ſo: either it will be after continuallie as it was afore your comming, or elſe it muſt be (when all is doone) amended by the king.

Greefes inſuing to the rebels vpon this rebellion.

Reformation ought to be no priuat mans but the princes action

Thus haue yee both lacked in the time, and miſt in the dooing, and yet beſides that ye haue done, which is by your dooing to no purpoſe. Yee haue doone the things with ſuch inconueniences, as hath beene both before rehearſed, and ſhall be after declared; that better it had beene for you, neuer to haue enioied the commoditie, if there be anie; than to ſuffer the greefs that will inſue, which be verie manie. In euerie quarter ſome men (whom yee ſet by) will be loſt, which euerie one of you (if ye haue loue in ye) would rather haue lacked the profit of your incloſures, than cauſe ſuch deſtruction of them, as is like by reaſon & iudgement neceſſarilie to follow. What commonwealth is it then, to doo ſuch abhominable enterpriſes after ſo vile a ſort, that yee hinder that good yee would doo, and bring in that hurt yee would not, and ſo find that yee ſeeke not, and follow that yee loſe, and deſtroie your ſelues by follie; rather than yee would be ordered by reaſon, and ſo haue not ſo much amended your old ſores, as brought in new plagues, which yee your ſelues that deſerue them will lament, and we which haue not deſerued them may curſſe you for? For although the kings maieſtie, &c: intended for your profits a reformation in his commonwealth: yet his pleaſure was not, nor no reaſon gaue it, that euerie ſubiect ſhould buſilie intermeddle with it of their owne head, but onelie thoſe whome his councell thought moſt meet men for ſuch an honeſt purpoſe.

The kings maieſtie, &c: hath godlie reformed an vncleane part of religion, and hath brought it to the true forme of the firſt church that followed Chriſt, thinking that to be trueſt, not what later mens fanſies haue of themſelues deuiſed, but what the apoſtles and their felowes had at Chriſtes hand receiued, and willeth the ſame to be knowne and ſet abroad to all his people. Shall euerie man now that liſteth and fanſieth the ſame, take in hand vncalled, to be a miniſter, and to ſet forth the ſame, hauing no authoritie? Naie, though the thing were verie godlie that were doone, yet the perſon muſt néeds doo ill that enterpriſeth it, bicauſe he dooth a good thing after an ill ſort, and looketh but on a little part of dutie, conſidering the thing, and leaueth a great part vnaduiſed, not conſidering the perſon: when as in a well and iuſtlie doone matter, not onelie theſe two things ought well to be weighed, but alſo good occaſion of time, and reaſonable cauſe of the dooing, ought alſo much to be ſet before euerie dooers eies. Now in this your déed, the manner is vngodlie, the thing vnſufferable, the cauſe wicked, the perſon ſeditious, the time traitorous: and can ye poſſiblie by anie honeſt defenſe of reaſon, or anie good conſcience religiouſlie grounded, denie that this malicious and horrible fault, ſo wickedlie ſet on, is not onelie ſinfull afore God, and traitorous to the king, but alſo deadlie and peſtilent to the whole common-wealth of our countrie, and ſo not onelie ouerfloweth vs with the miſerie, but alſo ouerwhelmeth you with the rage thereof?

What things in a well and iuſtlie doone matter ought well to be weighed.

Yet further ſée and ye be not wearie with the multitude of miſeries, which ye haue maruellouſlie mooued, what a yoke ye wilfullie doo bring on your ſelues, in ſtirring vp this deteſtable ſedition, and ſo bring your ſelues into a further ſlauerie, if ye vſe your ſelues into a further ſlauerie, if ye vſe your ſelues often thus inobedientlie. When common order of the law can take no place in vnrulie and diſobedient ſubiects, and all men will of wilfulneſſe reſiſt with rage, and thinke their owne violence to be the beſt iuſtice; then be wiſe magiſtrats compelled by neceſſitie to ſéeke an extreame remedie, where meane waies helpe not, and bring in the martiall law where none other law ſerueth. Then muſt ye be contented to bide puniſhment without proceſſe, condemnation without witneſſe, ſuſpicion is then taken for iudgement, and diſpleaſure may be iuſt cauſe of your execution, and ſo without fauor ye find ſtrictneſſe, which without rule ſéeke violence. Ye thinke it a hard law and vnſufferable. It is ſo indéed, but yet good for a medicine.

The yoke that rebels wilfullie bring vpon themſelues.

Deſperat remedies for deſperat diſeaſes.

Rebels worthie to ſuffer extremitie of puniſhment.

The greateſt ſhame that can come to a common-wealth.

Deſperate ſickneſſes in phyſicke muſt haue deſperate remedies, for meane medicines will neuer helpe great griefes. So if ye caſt your ſelues into ſuch ſharpe diſeaſes, ye muſt néeds looke for ſharpe medicines againe at your phyſicians hands. And worthie ye be to ſuffer the extremitie in a common-wealth, which ſéeke to doo the extremitie, and by reaſon muſt receiue the like ye offer, and ſo be contenred to bide the end willinglie which ſet on the beginning wilfullie. For no greater ſhame can come to a common-welth, than that thoſe ſubiects which ſhould be obedient euen without a law, can not be contented to be ordered by the law, and by no means kept within their dutie, which ſhould euerie waie offend rather than in their dutie. It is a token that the ſubiects lacke reaſon, when they forſake law, and thinke either by their multitude to find pardon, which cannot iuſtlie ſtretch to all, or elſe by ſtrength to beare the ſtroke, which cannot proſper againſt a king.

They muſt néeds little conſider themſelues, who bring in this neceſſitie, rather to ſtand to the pleaſure of a mans will, than to abide the reaſon of the law; and to be indangered more when an other man liſteth, than when himſelfe offendeth. And this muſt neceſſarilie folow if your rebellion thus continue: and while ye ſéeke to throw downe the yoke, which ye fanſie your ſelues burdened withall, ye bring your ſelues in a greater bondage, leauing ſafetie and folowing danger, and putting your ſelues vnder the iuſtice of them whoſe fauour ye might eaſilie haue kept, if ye would willinglie and dutifullie haue ſerued. Now the gentlemen be more in truſt, bicauſe the commons be vntruſtie, and they get by ſeruice, which ye looſe by ſtubbornneſſe, and therefore muſt néeds, if ye thus continue, haue more authoritie from the king: bicauſe ye would be in leſſe ſubiection to the king, and that as ye will not doo of your ſelues, ye muſt be compelled to doo by others, and that ye refuſe to doo willinglie, thinke ye muſt be drawne to doo the ſame conſtreinedlie. Which when it commeth to paſſe, as wiſedome ſéeth in your faults that it muſt néeds, what gaine ye then, or what profit can ariſe to you by riſing, which might haue found eaſe in ſitting ſtill? And what ſhall ye be at length the better for this turmoile, which beſide diuerſe other incommodities rehearſed, ſhall be thus clogged with the vnſufferable burden of the martiall law.

Gentlemen more truſtie bicauſe the commons be vntruſtie.

Martiall law a burden vnſufferable.

Yet there is one thing behind, which me thinketh your ſelues ſhould not forget, ſéeing that ye haue giuen the cauſe, ye ſhould dulie looke for the effect. Ye haue ſpoiled, impriſoned, and threatened gentlemen to death, and that with ſuch hatred of mind, as may not well be borne. The cauſe therof I ſpeake not on, which tried, will happilie be not ſo great: but ſée the thing, ſet murther aſide, it is the heinouſeſt fault to a priuat man. What could more ſpitefullie haue béene doone againſt them, than ye haue vſed with crueltie? Can this doo anie other but bréed in their ſtomachs great grudge of diſpleaſure toward you, and ingender ſuch an hatred, as the weaker and the ſufferer muſt néeds beare the ſmart thereof.

Crueltie and extremitie ſhewed to the gentlemen by the rebels.

The kings beſt kind of gouernment is ſo to rule his ſubiects, as a father ordereth his children, and beſt life of obedient ſubiects is one to behaue himſelfe to an other, as though they were brethren vnder the king their father. For loue is not the knot onelie of the common-wealth, whereby diuerſe parts be perfectlie ioined togither in one politike bodie, but alſo the ſtrength and might of the ſame, gathering togither into a ſmall roome with order, which ſcattered would elſe bréed confuſion and debate. Diſſention we ſée in ſmall houſes, and thereby may take example to great common-wealths, how it not onelie decaieth them from wealth, but alſo abateth them from ſtrength. Thinke ſmall examples to take place in great matters, and the like though not ſo great to follow in them both, and there by learne to iudge of great things vnknowne, by ſmall things perceiued. When brethren agrée not in a houſe, goeth not the weakeſt to the walles; and with whome the father taketh part withall, is not he likeſt to preuaile? Is it not wiſedome for the yoonger brother, after the good will of the parents, to ſéeke his eldeſt brothers fauour, who vnder them is moſt able to doo for him? To ſéeke them both with honeſtie is wiſedome, to looſe them both by ſullenneſſe is madneſſe.

The kings beſt kind of gouernment.

The fruits of diſſention.

Haue there not béene dailie benefits from the gentlemen to you, in ſome more, and in ſome leſſe, but in none conſidered, which they haue more friendlie offered, than you haue gentlie requited? This muſt ye loſe, when ye will not be thankefull, and learne to gaine new good will by deſert, when ye forſake the old friendſhip vnprouoked. And ye muſt thinke that liuing in a common-wealth togither, one kind hath néed of an other: and yet a great ſort of you more néed of one gentleman, than one gentleman of a great ſort of you. And though all be parts of one common-wealth, yet all be not like worthie parts, but all being vnder obedience, ſome kind in more ſubiection one waie, and ſome kind in more ſeruice an other waie. And ſéeing ye be leſſe able by monie and liberalitie to deſerue good will than others be, and your onelie kind of deſert is to ſhew good will, which honeſt men doo well accept as much worth as monie, haue ye not much hindered & hurt your ſelues herein,

The rebels had cauſe to beare with the gentlemen and to haue loued them.

All the parts of a common-wealth be not of like worthineſſe: Ergo gentlemen more worthie than yeomen, &c.

herein, loſing that one kind of humanitie which ye haue onelie left, and turning it into crueltie, which ye ought moſt to abhor, not onelie bicauſe it is wicked of it ſelfe, but alſo moſt noiſome to you.

A bréefe enumeration of the inconueniences flowing from this rebellion.

I can therefore for my part thinke no leſſe herein, if ye follow your ſtiffeneſſe ſtill, & muſt néeds iudge that ye haue wilfullie brought on your ſelues ſuch plagues, as the like could not haue fallen on you, but by your ſelues. Séeing then thus manie waies ye haue hurt the common-welth of this whole countrie within, by deſtruction of ſhires, loſing of harueſt, waſting of vittels, decaieng of manhood, vndooing of farmers, increaſing of vagabonds, mainteining of diſorders, hindring of redreſſes, bringing in of martiall law, and bréeding continuall hatred among diuerſe ſtates: what thinke ye, I praie you? Iudge ye not that ye haue committed an odious and deteſtable crime againſt the whole common-wealth, whoſe furtherance ye ought to haue tendered by dutie, and not to haue ſought the hurt thereof with your owne damage?

Outward miſchances inſuing vpon rebellions to the ſhame of the land and eſtate wherin they be raiſed.

King contemned.

Beſides all theſe inward griefes, which euerie one ſeuerallie muſt néeds féele with miſerie, there happeneth ſo manie outward miſchances among ſtrangers to vs with diſdaine; that if there were nothing ill within the realme which we ſhould féele, yet the ſhame which dooth touch vs from other countries, ſhould not onelie mooue, but alſo compell you hartilie to forethinke this your rebellious ſedition. For what ſhall ſtrangers thinke, when they ſhall heare of the great miſorder which is in this realme with ſuch confuſion, that no order of law can kéepe you vnder, but muſt be faine to be beaten downe with a kings power? Shall they not firſt thinke the kings maieſtie, in whoſe mind God hath powred ſo much hope for a child, as we may looke for gifts in a man; either for his age to be little ſet by, or for lacke of qualities not to be regarded, or for default of loue to be reſiſted, and no notable grace of God in him conſidered, nor the worthineſſe of his office looked vpon, nor naturall obedience due to him remembred?

Rulers little eſtéemed.

Subiects diſordered.

Shall they not next ſuppoſe, ſmall eſtimation to be giuen to the rulers, to whom vnder the king we owe due obedience, that can not in iuſt and lawfull matters be heard, nor men to haue that right iudgement of their wiſedome, as their iuſtice in rule, and foreſight in counſell requireth: but rather prefer their owne fanſies before others experience, and déeme their owne reaſon to be common-wealth, and other mens wiſedome to be but dreaming? Shall they not trulie ſaie the ſubiects to be more vnfaithfull in diſobedience, than other ſubiects worſſe ordered be; and licence of libertie to make wild heads without order, and that they neither haue reaſon that vnderſtand not the miſchiefe of ſedition, nor dutie which follow their beaſtlineſſe, nor loue in them which ſo little remember the common-wealth, nor naturall affection which will dailie ſéeke their owne deſtruction?

The whole countrie ill ſpoken of.

Nothing redreſſable by diſorder changeable.

Thus the whole countrie lacking the good opinion of other nations, is caſt into great ſhame by your vnrulineſſe, and the procéedings of the countrie, be they neuer ſo godlie, ſhall be ill ſpoken of, as vnfit to be brought into vſe; and good things hereby that deſerue praiſe, ſhall bide the rebuke of them that liſt to ſpeake ill, and ill things vntouched ſhall be boldlier mainteined. Nothing may with praiſe be redreſſed, where things be meaſured by changeable diſorder, rather than by neceſſarie vſe; and that is thought moſt politike, that men will be beſt contented to doo, and not that which men ſhould be brought vnto by dutie. And with what dutie or vertue in ye, can ye quench out of memorie this foule enterpriſe, or gather a good report againe to this realme, who haue ſo vilelie with reproch ſlandered the ſame, and diuerſlie diſcredited it among others, and abated the good opinion which was had of the iuſt gouernement and ruled order vſed heretofore in this noble realme, which is now moſt grieuous, bicauſe it is now moſt without cauſe.

Further outward hurt beſides voice ingendered of rebellions.

He meaneth the Scots & French with whome we haue had alwaies incomberance.

If this outward opinion (without further inconuenience) were all, yet it might well be borne, and would with eaſe decaie as it grew: but it hath not onlie hurt vs with voice, but indangered vs in déed, and caſt vs a great deale behind the hand, where elſe we might haue had a iollie foredeale. For that oportunitie of time which ſeldome chanceth, and is alwaies to bée taken, hath béene by your froward meanes loſt this yeare, and ſo vainlie ſpent at home for bringing downe of you, which ſhould elſe profitablie haue béene otherwiſe beſtowed, that it hath béene almoſt as great a loſſe to vs abrode, to lacke that we might haue obteined, as it was combrance at home, to go about the ouerthrow of you, whoſe ſedition is to be abhorred. And we might both conuenientlie haue inuaded ſome, if they would not reaſonablie haue growne to ſome kind of friendſhip, and alſo defended others which would beſide promiſe for times ſake vniuſtlie ſet vpon vs, and eaſilie haue made this ſtormie time a faire yeare vnto vs, if our men had béene ſo happie at home, as our likelihood abrode was fortunat.

Note in a few words of force the dangerous qualitie of rebellion.

A reaſon drawne from the leſſe to the greater.

But what is it (I praie you) either to let ſlip ſuch an occaſion by negligence, or to ſtop it by ſtubbornneſſe, which once paſt awaie, can be by no means recouered; no not though with diligence ye go about to reinforce the ſame againe? If ye would with wickednes haue forſaken your faith to your naturall countrie, and haue ſought craftie means to haue vtterlie betraied it to our common enimies: could ye haue had anie other ſpéedier waie than this is, both to make our ſtrength weake, and their weakeneſſe ſtrong? If ye would haue ſought to haue ſpited your countrie, and to haue pleaſed your enimie, and follow their counſell for our hinderance: could ye haue had deuiſed of them anie thing more ſhamefull for vs, and ioifull to them? If they which lie like ſpials, and hearken after likelihoods of things to come, bicauſe they declare oportunitie of times to the enimie, are to be iudged common enimies of the countrie; what ſhall we reaſonablie thinke of you, who doo not ſecretlie bewraie the counſels of other, but openlie betraie the common-wealth with your owne déeds, and haue as much as lieth in you, ſought the ouerthrow of it at home: which if ye had obteined at Gods hand, as he neuer alloweth ſo horrible an enterpriſe, how could yée haue defended it from the ouerthrow of others abrode?

Rebellion maketh paſſage to forren inuaſion, & weakeneth our owne region.

For is your vnderſtanding of things ſo ſmall, that although ye ſée your ſelues not vnfit to get the vpper hand of a few gentlemen, that ye be able to beat downe afore the kings power: ye and by chance ye were able to doo that, would ye iudge your ſelues by ſtrength mightie enough, to reſiſt the power of outward nations, that for praiſe ſake would inuade ye? Naie, thinke trulie with your ſelues, that if yée doo ouercome, ye be vnſure both by ſtrength abrode, and diſpleaſure of honeſt men at home, and by the puniſhment of God aboue. And now ye haue not yet gotten in déed, that your vaine hope looketh for by fanſie: thinke how certeinlie ye haue wounded the common-wealth with a ſore ſtroke, in procuring our enimies by our weakeneſſe to ſéeke victorie, and by our outward miſerie to ſéeke outward glorie with inward diſhonor. Which howſoeuer they get, thinke it to be long of you, who haue offered them victorie before they began warre: bicauſe ye would declare to men hereafter (belike) how dangerous it is to make ſturres at home, when they doo not onelie make our ſelues weake, but alſo our enimies ſtrong.

Rebellion animateth the papiſts, & each one beſide that is offended at true religion.

Beſide theſe, there is another ſort of men deſirous of aduantage, and diſdainefull of our wealth, whoſe gréefe is moſt our greateſt hap, and be offended with religion, bicauſe they be drowned in ſuperſtition, men zealed toward God, but not fit to iudge, meaning better without knowledge, than they iudge by their meaning, worthier whoſe ignorance ſhould be taken awaie, than their will ſhould be followed; whome we ſhould more rebuke for their ſtubborneſſe, than deſpiſe for their ignorance. Theſe ſéeing ſuperſtition beaten downe, and religion ſet vp, Gods word taking place, traditions kept in their kind, difference made betwéene Gods commandements and mans learning, the truth of things ſought out according to Chriſtes inſtitution, examples taken of the primitiue churches vſe, not at the biſhop of Romes ordinance, and true worſhip taught, and wil-worſhip refuſed, doo by blindneſſe rebuke that as by truth they ſhould follow, and by affection follow that as by knowledge they ſhould abhorre, thinking vſage to be truth, and ſcripture to be error, not weieng by the word, but miſconſtruing by cuſtome.

Religion beareth the blame and is counted the cauſe of rebellion, but amiſſe.

And now things be changed to the better, and religion trulier appointed, they ſée matters go awrie, which hurteth the whole realme, and they reioiſe in this miſchéefe as a thing worthilie happened, miſtaking the cauſe, and ſlandering religion, as though there were no cauſe whie God might haue puniſhed, if their vſed profeſſion might ſtill haue taken place. They ſée not that where Gods glorie is trulieſt ſet forth, there the diuell is moſt buſie for his part, and laboureth to corrupt by lewdneſſe, that as is gotten out by the truth, thinking that if it were not blemiſhed at the firſt, the reſidue of his falſehood ſhould after leſſe preuaile. So he troubleth by biwaies, that he cannot plainlie withſtand, and vſeth ſubtiltie of ſophiſtrie, where plaine reaſon faileth, and perſuadeth ſimple men that to be a cauſe, which in déed can not be tried and taken for a cauſe. So he cauſeth religion which teacheth obedience, to be iudged the cauſe of ſedition; & the doctrine of loue, the ſéed of diſſention; miſtaking the thing, but perſuading mens minds, and abuſing the plaine meaning of the honeſt to a wicked end of religions ouerthrow.

The diuels ſophiſtrie.

Examples.

The huſbandman had not ſo ſoone throwne ſéed in his ground, but ſteppeth vp the enimie, and hée ſoweth cockle too, and maketh men doubt whether the good huſband had doone well or no, and whether he had ſowne there good ſéed or bad. The faithfull Iewes in Egypt would not beléeue Ieremie, but thought their plague and their miſerie to come by his meanes; and leaning of idolatrie to be the cauſe of penurie, wherfore by wilfull aduiſe they intended to forſake the prophets councell, and thought to ſerue God moſt trulie by their rooted & accuſtomed idolatrie. When the chriſtian men were perſecuted in the primitiue church, & dailie ſuffered martyrdome for Chriſts profeſſion, ſuch faire ſeaſon of weather was for thrée or foure yeares togither, that the heathen iudged therevpon God to be delighted with their crueltie, and ſo were perſuaded that with the bloud of the martyrs they pleaſed God highlie. Such fanſies light now in papiſts, and irreligious mens heads, and ioine things by chance happening togither, and conclude the one to be the cauſe of the other, and then delight in true worſhippers hurt, bicauſe they iudge curſedlie the good to be bad, and therefore reioiſe in the puniſhment of the godlie. For they being fleſhlie, iudge by outward things, and perceiue not the inward, for that they lacke the ſpirit and ſo iudge amis, not vnderſtanding God, what diuerſitie he ſuffereth to blind ſtill the ſinfull, and how through all dangers he ſaueth his forechoſen.

The Iewes aſcribe their miſerie to a falſe cauſe.

The heathens fond opinion of gods fauouring their crueltie againſt chriſtians.

The papiſts by rebellion haue an euill opinion of Gods holie truth.

And thus haue ye giuen a large occaſion to ſtubborne papiſts, both to iudge amiſſe, and alſo to reioiſe in this wicked chance, contented with our miſchéefe, not liking our religion, and thinking God dooth puniſh for this better change, and haue thereby an euill opinion of Gods holie truth, confirmed in them by no ſure ſcripture, but by following of miſchance, which they ought to thinke to come for the pride and ſtubbornneſſe of the people, who dooth not accept Gods glorie in good part, nor giue no due praiſe to their Lord and maker. What ſhould I ſaie more? Ye hurt euerie waie, the dangers be ſo great, and the perils ſo manie, which doo dailie follow your diueliſh enterpriſe, that the more I ſéeke in the mater, the more I continuallie ſée to ſaie. And what words can worthilie declare this miſerable beaſtlines of yours, which haue intended to diuide the realme, and arme the one part for the killing of the other? For euen as concord is not onelie the health, but alſo the ſtrength of the realme: ſo is ſedition not onelie the weakneſſe but alſo the apoſtume of the realme, which when it breaketh inwardlie, putteth the ſtate in great danger of recouerie, and corrupteth the whole commonwealth with the rotten furie that it hath béene long putrified withall. For it is not in ſedition as in other faults, which being miſchéefous of themſelues, haue ſome notable hurt alwaies faſt adioined to them: but in this one is there a whole hell of faults, not ſeuerallie ſcattered, but cluſtered on a lumpe togither, and comming on ſo thicke, that it is vnpoſſible for a region armed with all kinds of wiſedome, and ſtrength thereto, to auoid the dangers that iſſue out thereof.

The hurts iſſuing from rebellion out of count.

Concord and diſcord with their differing effects.

When ſedition once breaketh out, ſée ye not the lawes ouerthrowne, the magiſtrates deſpiſed, ſpoiling of houſes, murthering of men, waſting of countries, increaſe of diſorder, diminiſhing of the realms ſtrength, ſwarming of vagabonds, ſcarſitie of laborers, and all thoſe miſchiefes plentiouſlie brought in, which God is woont to ſcourge ſeuerelie withall, warre, dearth, and peſtilence? And ſéeing ye haue theft & murther, plague & famine, confuſion and idleneſſe linked togither, can ye looke for anie more miſchéefe in one ſhamefull enterpriſe, than ye euidentlie ſée to grow herein? As for warre, although it be miſerable, yet the one part getteth ſomewhat, and reioiſeth in the ſpoile, and ſo goeth luſtier awaie: and either increaſeth his countrie with riches, or inhanſeth himſelfe with glorie: but in ſedition both parts looſe, the ouercommer cannot ſlie, the ouercommed cannot ſpoile; the more the winner winneth, the more he looſeth; the more that eſcape, the more infamous men liue; all that is gained is ſcarſelie ſaued; the winning is loſſe, the loſſe is deſtruction, both waſt themſelues, and the whole moſt waſted; the ſtrengthening of themſelues, the decaie of the countrie; the ſtriuing for the victorie, is a preie to the enimie: and ſhortlie to ſaie, the helliſh turmoile of ſedition ſo farre paſſeth the common miſerie of warre, as to ſlaie himſelfe is more heinous, than to be ſlaine of another.

The miſchiefs ſpringing frõ ſedition.

Forren war farre better than ſedition at home.

The praiſe and benefits of peace.

O noble peace, what wealth bringeſt thou in, how doo all things flouriſh in field and in towne, what forwardneſſe of religion, what increaſe of learning, what grauitie in counſell, what deuiſe of wit, what order of maners, what obedience of laws, what reuerence of ſtates, what ſafegard of houſes, what quietneſſe of life, what honor of countries, what friendſhip of minds, what honeſtie of pleaſure haſt thou alwaies mainteined, whoſe happineſſe we knew not, while now we féele thy lacke, and ſhall learne by miſerie to vnderſtand plentie, and ſo to auoid miſchiefe by the hurt that it bringeth, and learne to ſerue better, where rebellion is once knowen; and ſo to liue trulie,

The rebels neglect the right meanes of redreſſing things amiſſe, and follow their owne fanſies.

The ſtate of a countrie or land in time of ſedition and tumult.

trulie, and keepe the kings peace. What good ſtate were ye in afore ye began, not pricked with pouertie, but ſtirred with miſchiefe, to ſeeke your deſtruction, hauing waies to redreſſe all that was amiſſe? Magiſtrats moſt readie to tender all iuſtice, and pitifull in hearing the poore mens cauſes, which ſought to amend matters more than you can deuiſe, and were readie to redreſſe them better than ye could imagine: and yet for a headineſſe ye could not be contented; but in deſpite of God, who commandeth obedience, and in contempt of the king, whoſe lawes doo ſeeke your wealth, and to ouerthrow the countrie, which naturallie we ſhould loue, ye would proudlie riſe, and doo ye wot not what, and amend things by rebellion to your vtter vndooing. What ſtate leaue ye vs in now, beſieged with enimies, diuided at home, made poore with ſpoile and loſſe of our harueſt, vnordered and caſt downe with ſlaughter and hatred, hindered from amendments by our owne diueliſh haſt, indangered with ſickeneſſe by reaſon of miſorder, laid open to mens pleaſures for breaking of the lawes, and feebled to ſuch faintneſſe that ſcarſelie it will be couered.

Reaſons to withdraw the rebels from their enterpriſes of rebellion, and to allure them to loialtie.

A concluſion peremptorie againſt irreuocable rebels.

Wherefore for Gods ſake haue pittie on your ſelues, conſider how miſerablie ye haue ſpoiled, deſtroied, and waſted vs all: and if for deſperatneſſe ye care not for your ſelues, yet remember your wiues, your children, your countrie, and forſake this rebellion. With humble ſubmiſſion acknowledge your faults, and tarie not the extremitie of the kings ſword, leaue off with repentance, and turne to your duties, aſke God forgiueneſſe, ſubmit ye to your king, be contented for a common-wealth one or two to die. And ye capteins for the reſidue ſacrifice your ſelues, ye ſhall ſo beſt atteine the kings gratious pardon, ſaue the aſſemblie, and helpe the common-wealth, & to declare your doings to proceed of no ſtubborneſſe; but all this miſchiefe to grow out of ignorance, which ſeeing the miſerie, would redreſſe the fault, & to recouer beſt the blot of your diſorder, and ſtaie the great miſeries which be like to follow. Thus if ye doo not, thinke trulie with your ſelues, that God is angrie with you for your rebellion, the kings ſword drawne to defend his countrie, the crie of the poore to God againſt ye, the readineſſe of the honeſt in armor to vanquiſh ye, your death to be at hand, which ye cannot eſcape, hauing God againſt ye, as he promiſeth in his word, the kings power to ouerthrow ye, gathered in the field, the commonwelth to beate ye downe with ſtripes and with curſſes, the ſhame of your miſchiefe to blemiſh ye for euer.

¶Thus far this neceſſarie treatiſe touching rebellion, penned by ſir Iohn Cheeke, a gentleman euerie waie in complet ſort ſatiſfieng the report blazed abroad of him. For if there were no more teſtimonies extant in the world, but this onelie treatiſe diſcourſing Kets rebellion; it were enough to warrant no leſſe true, than in common ſpeech and writing is left witneſſed of him. And ſuerlie it appeareth, that as in this gentleman there was an extraordinarie heape of laudable gifts; ſo was there alſo in him the right vſe of them all. Wherby he grew in ſuch fauor with king Henrie the eight, that partlie for his abſolute knowledge in tongs, ſpeciallie the Greeke and Latine, and alſo for his integritie of life and religion; he was choſen ſchoolemaiſter to yoong prince Edward, to traine him vp in the right vnderſtanding, both of forren languages, & the purenes of Gods ſeruice. Inſomuch that by his induſtrie ſuch effects followed (God aboue proſpering his actions) that the yoong prince, when he came to the kingdome was mindfull of him, and among other (I will not ſaie gratuities, where cauſe of deſert maketh challenge of ſome recompenſe) tokens of beneuolence, aduanced him to the dignitie of knighthood; as hereafter in due place maie appeare. Of this worthie man, whoſe praiſe though neuer ſo exceſſiue (if meet for a man) is equiualent vnto his merits, Iohn Leland, vpon preſenting vnto him a booke, taketh occaſion to write this epigram, compriſing in ſumme no leſſe than is here vnder in Engliſh remembred:

The French king purpoſed to ſurpriſe Gerneſeie and Ierſeie, but is repelled.

Iohn Fox.

During the time of theſe commotions and ſtirs here within the realme, to the great danger of the ſtate; the French king hauing knowledge thereof, ment not to omit the opportunitie offered, to recouer out of the Engliſhmens hands thoſe fortreſſes which they held at Bullongne and in Bullongnois. Wherevpon he gaue ſummons to the gentlemen and men of armes, and others of his realme, to put themſelues in order with all their furniture, that they might be readie to attend him in his armie in Bullongnois by a daie appointed. And about the ſame time, that is to ſaie, in the beginning of Auguſt; the French king purpoſing to ſurpriſe the Iles of Gerneſeie and Ierſeie, appointed certeine gallies and ſhips of warre to paſſe thither; but being receiued by the king of Englands nauie that laie there, and other of the Iland, they were beaten backe and repelled, with the loſſe of a thouſand men (as ſome write) and ſo were conſtreined to retire without atchiuing their enterpriſe.

The French king is aſhamed that anie report ſhould paſſe of his euill ſucceſſe.

The French king perſeuereth in his former purpoſe, and martiall action.

Credible word was brought out of France to the lord protector, that into one towne in one veſſell were brought at the leaſt three ſcore gentlemen to be buried, & alſo an inhibition giuen out by the French king, not to ſpeake of the euill ſucceſſe of that iournie. In the meane time, the French king being come downe vnto Abuile, departed from thence the ſixteenth of Auguſt, and comming vnto Rue, lodged there that night, and the next daie came to Monſtreull, where he found the coneſtable and monſieur Daumalle. The next daie being the eighteenth of Auguſt, he came to his armie lodged foure leagues on this ſide Monſtreull at a village called Neufcaſtell, neere to the forreſt of Ardelo, vpon the waie that leadeth to Bullongne. The ſame daie were certeine pioners ſent to Pont de Bricque to repare the bridge there, and to make the waies eaſie for the artillerie to paſſe. The next daie the ſaid king with his armie paſſed by Bullongne berg, and camped that night on a little hill betwixt that forreſt and the forreſt of Suren.

In this place he cauſed trenches to be caſt about a plot of ground, after the maner of a fortreſſe, within the which he left certeine bands of men of warre to be a ſafegard vnto ſuch as ſhould paſſe to and fro with vittels to furniſh his campe. He ſtaied not there paſt a daie & a halfe, but remoued to Ardenton, a mile or little more beyond Marguiſen; from thence he came with his armie, and lodged on a hill, ſomewhat more than a mile & a halfe from Hambleteuue. The French king hauing viewed the forts, cauſed fiue and twentie peeces of artillerie to be planted againſt that fort, which was built in a place called the Almaine campe, but the Frenchmen named it Le fort de Selaque, diſtant from Hambleteuue about a quarter of a mile. The artillerie had not gone off little more than the ſpace of two houres, but that Charls Sturton capteine of that peece, and George Willoughbie a gentleman aſſociat with him, came forth to parlee with the Coneſtable, offering to yeeld the fort into his hands, vpon condition they might depart with bag and baggage. But as they were thus in hand to make their compoſition, the Frenchmen thruſt forward to the rampiers, and entered in plumps into the fortreſſe, ſlue fourescore perſons, & tooke the reſt priſoners. There might be in all within that peece two hundred and thirtie perſons, men and women. This happened the foure and twentith of Auguſt, being Bartholomew daie.

This doone, the king cauſed part of the artillerie to be planted againſt the caſtell of Hambleteuue, ſituated at the one end of the towne neere to the ſea ſide. Towards night monſieur de Vandoſme gaue an approch to the ſaid caſtell, and they within by commandement of the lord Greie retired to the maine fort to helpe to furniſh the ſame, wanting numbers ſufficient to defend it. The next daie being the fiue and twentith of Auguſt, the king cauſed approches to be made vnto the great fort, and the morrow after the batterie began moſt furiouſlie. The ſame daie after dinner, the king ſummoned them within to yeeld; but the lord Iohn Greie being generall (although he ſaw how weake the peece was of it ſelfe, & the lacke of ſufficient numbers of men to reſiſt ſuch a puiſſant force, as the French king had there with him) would not yet hearken vnto anie talke, nor ſuffer the herald to come neere; for that he ſhould not perceiue the weakeneſſe of the peece: and ſo he was commanded to get him thence with ſpeed, or elſe they would cauſe him to be packing ſmallie to his eaſe. The French king ſore offended herewith, that his herald was ſo vncourteouſlie vſed, cauſed the batterie to be reinforced with great diligence, which diſmounting their ordinance within, and beating downe their rampiers, made ſuch breaches, that my lord Iohn and the capteins within perceiued they were not able by anie meanes to defend the place anie longer. Hereupon they offered to render the fort to the king vpon compoſition: which in the end fell out to be thus, that the ſouldiers ſhould depart with their liues ſaued, and that their generall (for honor ſake) ſhould haue one horſſe to ride on in his corſlet, without ſword or dagger, and likewiſe two other capteins with him: but as for the other ſouldiers, with the women and children, ſhould depart on foot in their ſhirts, leauing all their goods and ſubſtance behind them. After it was agreed that the fort ſhould be thus ſurrendered, there entered monſieur de Chatillon that was after admerall of France, and monſieur de Deſſe, latelie returned out of Scotland. The French ſouldiers entring by ſtealth into the fort by the breaches, committed foule diſorders, not onelie in ranſacking the houſes, but alſo in ſpoiling the ſouldiers by force, intreating them in moſt rigorous maner.

The French writers confeſſe, that it was pitie to ſee the poore men and women ſo miſerablie handled and abuſed as they were by the outragious ſoldiors that thus entred the fort, and ſacked all that they could laie hands vpon. Monſieur de Deſſe ſaued a great number of women and yoong maidens from the cruell hands of their aduerſaries, cauſing them to paſſe forth by the breach, and preſented them to the king, who appointed that they ſhould be conueied in ſafetie, with all that they had about them, till they had gotten out of danger. Monſieur de Chatillon, by the kings commandement, cauſed all the reſt within the fort to come forth, who paſſing three and three in a range came before the king, who ſtood there to behold them, with the whole armie placed ſo in order on either ſide the waie as they ſhould come, that they might paſſe betwixt their ranks, as it were through a lane. They that came forth in this ſort might be (as the French writers record) about ſeuen or eight hundred in all of men and women, whereof there were manie hurt and maimed; ſome with halfe a ſhirt on to couer them, and diuerſe ſtarke naked. The lord Iohn Greie being mounted on a curtaile, paſſing by the French king, and ſaluting him, was courteouſlie of him embraced.

The French writers report of their owne countriemens crueltie and ſauageneſſe.
The number that came forth of Hambleteuue.

The morrow after was the fort of Blackneſſe or Blaconneſſe rendered to the French king, with like conditions as they of Hambleteuue had rendered theirs. This was on the tueſdaie the ſeuen and twentith of Auguſt. The nine and twentith of Auguſt ſir Nicholas Arnault conueieng all the artillerie, munition, vittels, and goods out of Bullongne berg, cauſed fire to be ſet on that fort, and retired with all his ſoldiors and other people vnto Bullongne. Whervpon ſhortlie after the Frenchmen ſeized vpon the ſaid place of Bullongne berg, & kept it. The French king leauing monſieur de Chatillon within Hambleteuue with the old bands of the French footmen, returned towards Bullongne, & approching within a mile and a halfe of the Old man, meant to build there a fort on the ſea ſide: but what through ſuch ſharpe ſkirmiſhes as the Engliſhmen continuallie were redie to make with his men, and what through the abundance of raine which fell in that ſeaſon, he was conſtreined to breake vp his campe, and leauing ſtrong garriſons both of horſſemen and footmen in all thoſe places, which he had in that ſeaſon wonne out of the Engliſhmens hands, he returned himſelfe with the princes of his bloud into France.

Cauſes that compelled the French king to breake vp his campe.

In this meane time whileſt the French king was thus occupied, to vſe the oportunitie of time in recouering of thoſe fortreſſes in Bullongnois out of the Engliſhmens hands, the kings maieſtie and his councell were buſie ſtill in quieting his rebellious ſubiects here in England: and finallie for meane of a full pacification, and to ſet all things in good frame and quiet reſt, the king publiſhed his graces moſt generall and free pardon to all rebelles, ſo that they would forthwith (vpon publication of the ſame pardon) returne euerie man to his houſe and countrie; which they gladlie did: and ſo theſe ſeditious and moſt dangerous troubles were brought to end and pacified.

The kings generall pardon.

¶ Alſo in this buſie time Marie Steward queene of Scots was conueied by ſea out of Scotland into France, and there on the nineteenth daie of Aprill 1549, was married in our ladie church in Paris (with great triumph and ſolemnitie) to Francis the Dolphin, eldeſt ſonne vnto king Henrie the ſecond of that name French king. This conueieng of the yoong queene is reported by one to haue beene priuilie wrought, at ſuch time as the councell of England were in ſome expectation and hope to obteine hir. Neuertheleſſe the ſubtill aduiſe of the French, and the trecherous forwardneſſe of the Scots, vtterlie diſappointed the honeſt and honorable purpoſe of the Engliſh. Now when the yoong queene and hir traine, with the gard of hir perſon (be they whoms you will) were vnder ſaile, the Engliſh nauie was abroade, and lieng in wait to haue intercepted hir courſe, courſe, meant not onlie to ſkirmiſh, but alſo to recouer the yong queene from the French in ſpite of their hearts, had not the king of England and the moſt of his councell flatlie forbidden them to attempt anie warlike incounter, for certeine iuſt and weightie cauſes to them knowne. But the Scots ſmarted for this their vaine lightneſſe, as in former times for like practiſes of their vile lewdneſſe, as C.O. ſaith:

The councell withdraw themſelues into priuat conferences about the lord protectors diſplacing.

Now after that theſe hurlie burlies were throughlie quieted, manie of the lords of the realme, as well councellors as other, miſliking the gouernment of the protector, began to withdraw themſelues from the court, and reſorting to London, fell to ſecret conſultation for redreſſe of things, but namelie for the diſplacing of the lord protector. And ſuddenlie vpon what occaſion manie maruelled, but few knew. Euerie lord and councellor went through the citie weaponed, and had their ſeruants likewiſe weaponed, attending vpon them in new liueries, to the great woondering of manie. And at the laſt a great aſſemblie of the ſaid councellors was made at the earle of Warwiks lodging, which was then at Elie place in Holborne, whither all the confederats in this matter came priuilie armed; and finallie concluded to poſſeſſe the tower of London, which by the policie of ſir William Paulet lord treaſuror of England was peaceablie obteined, & who by order of the ſaid confederats immediatlie remooued ſir John Markam then lieutenant of the tower, and placed in that roome ſir Leonard Chamberleine. And after that the ſaid councell was broken vp at Elie place, the earle of Warwike remooued foorthwith into the citie of London, and laie in the houſe of one John Yorke a citizen of London, who was then chéefe maiſter of the mint, kept at Suffolke place in Southworke. The lord protector hearing of the maner of the aſſemblie of this councell, and of the taking of the tower, which ſéemed to him verie ſtrange and doubtfull, did preſentlie the ſaid night remooue frō Hampton court, taking the king with him, vnto the caſtell of Windſore, and there began to fortifie the ſame, and withall wrote a letter to that noble gentleman the lord Ruſſell lord priuie ſeale remaining as yet in the weſt countrie, aduertiſing him of theſe troubles as followeth.

John Fox in the Acts and Monuments. A letter of the lord protectors to the lord priuie ſeale.

After our right hartie commendations to your good lordſhip. Here hath of late riſen ſuch a conſpiracie againſt the kings maieſtie & vs, as neuer hath béene ſéene, the which they can not mainteine, with ſuch vaine letters and falſe tales ſurmiſed, as was neuer ment nor intended on vs. They pretend and ſaie, that we haue ſold Bullongne to the French, and that we doo withhold wages from the ſoldiers, & other ſuch tales and letters they doo ſpread abroad (of the which if anie one thing were true, we would not wiſh to liue) the matter now being brought to a maruellous extremitie, ſuch as we would neuer haue thought it could haue come vnto, eſpeciallie of thoſe men towards the kings maieſtie and vs, of whome we haue deſerued no ſuch thing, but rather much fauour and loue. But the caſe being as it is, this is to require & praie you, to haſten you hither to the defenſe of the kings maieſtie, in ſuch force and power as you maie, to ſhew the part of a true gentleman, and of a verie friend: the which thing we truſt God ſhall reward, and the kings maieſtie in time to come, and we ſhall neuer be vnmindfull of it too. We are ſure you ſhall haue other letters from them, but as ye tender your dutie to the kings maieſtie, we require you to make no ſtaie, but immediatlie repaire with ſuch force as ye haue to his highneſſe in his caſtell of Windſor, and cauſe the reſt of ſuch force as ye maie make to follow you. And ſo we bid you right hartilie farewell. From Hampton court the ſixt of October.

An anſwer to the lord protectors letter.

The effect of the lord Ruſſels letter anſwering the lord protector.

To this letter of the lord protectors ſent the ſixt of October, the lord Ruſſell returning anſwer againe vpon the eight of the ſaid moneth, firſt lamented the heauie diſſention fallen betwéene the nobilitie and him, which he tooke for ſuch a plague, as a greater could not be ſent of almightie God vpon this realme being the next waie (ſaid he) to make vs of conquerors, ſlaues; and like to induce vpon the whole realme an vniuerſall thraldome and calamitie, vnleſſe the mercifull goodneſſe of the Lord doo helpe, and ſome wiſe order be taken in ſtaieng theſe great extremities. And as touching the dukes requeſt in his letters, forſomuch as he had heard before of the broile of the lords, and feared leaſt ſome conſpiracie had béene meant againſt the kings perſon, he haſted forward with ſuch companie as he could make, for the ſuertie of the king as to him apperteined. Now perceiuing by the lords letters ſent vnto him the ſame ſixt daie of October, theſe tumults to riſe vpon priuat cauſes betwéene him and them, he therefore thought it expedient, that a conuenient power ſhould be leuied, to be in a readineſſe to withſtand the worſt (what perils ſoeuer might inſue) for the preſeruation both of the king and ſtate of the realme from inuaſion of forren enimies, and alſo for the ſtaieng of bloudſhed, if anie ſuch thing ſhould be intended betwixt the parties in the heat of this faction. And this he thinking beſt for the diſcharge of his allegiance, humblie beſought his grace to haue the ſame alſo in ſpeciall regard and conſideration; firſt, that the kings maieſtie be put in no feare; and that if there be anie ſuch thing, wherein he hath giuen iuſt cauſe to them thus to procéed, he would ſo conforme himſelfe, as no ſuch priuat quarrels doo redound to the publike diſturbance of the realme: certifieng moreouer the duke, that if it were true which he vnderſtood by the letters of the lords, that he ſhould ſend about proclamations and letters for raiſing vp of the commons, he liked not the ſame. Notwithſtanding he truſted well that his wiſedome would take ſuch a waie, as no effuſion of blood ſhould follow.

And thus much being conteined in his former letters the eight of October, in his next letters againe written the eleuenth of October, the ſaid lord Ruſſell reioiſing to heare of the moſt reaſonable offers of the lord protector made to the lords, wrote vnto him and promiſed to doo, what in the vttermoſt power of him (and likewiſe of ſir William Herbert ioined togither with him) did lie, to worke ſome honorable reconciliation betwéene him & them: ſo as his ſaid offers being accepted and ſatiſfied, ſome good concluſion might inſue, according to their good hope and expectation: ſignifieng moreouer, that as touching the leuieng of men, they had reſolued to haue the ſame in readineſſe for the benefit of the realme, to occurre all inconueniences whatſoeuer, that either by forren inuaſion or otherwiſe might happen: & ſo hauing their power at hand to draw néere, wherby they might haue the better oportunitie to be ſolicitors and meanes for this reformation on both parts, &c. And thus much for the anſwer of the lord Ruſſell to the lord protectors letters.

The contents of the ſecond anſwer of the lord Ruſſell to the lord protector.

The good lord Ruſſell a ſolicitor for peace betwéene the lord protector and the lords.

The lords of the councell aſſembled againſt the lord protector.

But now to procéed and go forward with the matter of the lords, who togither with the earle of Warwike (vpon what occaſion God knoweth) were aſſembled at London (as ye haue heard) againſt the lord protector. When the king with his councell at Hampton court heard therof, firſt ſecretarie Peter with the kings meſſage was ſent vnto them, whome the lords notwithſtanding deteined ſtill with them, making as yet no anſwer to the meſſage. Wherevpon the lord protector wrote as followeth.

A letter of the lord protectors to the councell at London.

The protectors letter to the lords.

MY lords we commend vs heartilie vnto you. And wheras the kings maieſtie was informed that you were aſſembled in ſuch ſort as you doo, and now remaine, and was aduiſed by vs and ſuch other of his councell as were then here about his perſon, to ſend maſter ſecretarie Peter vnto you with ſuch a meſſage, as whereby might haue inſued the ſuertie of his maieſties perſon, with the preſeruation of his realme and ſubiects, and the quiet both of vs and your ſelues, as maſter ſecretarie can well declare to you: his maieſtie and we of his councell here doo not a little maruell, that you ſtaie ſtill with you the ſaid maſter ſecretarie, & haue not as it were vouchſafed to ſend anſwer to his maieſtie, neither by him nor yet by anie other. And for our ſelues we doo much more maruell and are ſorie, as both we and you haue good cauſe to be, to ſée the maner of your doings bent with force of violence, to bring the kings maieſtie & vs to theſe extremities.

No word hitherto ſent from the lords to the lord protector what they required of him to doo.

Which as we intend, if you will take no other waie but violence, to defend (as nature and allegiance doth bind vs) to extremitie of death, and to put all to Gods hand, who giueth victorie as it pleaſeth him: ſo if that anie reaſonable conditions & offers would take place (as hitherto none hath béene ſignified vnto vs from you, nor we doo not vnderſtand, what you doo require or ſéeke, or what you doo meane) and that you doo ſéeke no hurt to the kings maieſties perſon, as touching all other priuat matters, to auoid the effuſion of chriſtian bloud, and to preſerue the kings maieſties perſon, his realme and ſubiects, you ſhall find vs agréeable vnto anie reaſonable conditions that you will require. For we doo eſtéeme the kings wealth and tranquillitie of the realme more than all other worldlie things, yea than our owne life. Thus praieng you to ſend vs your determinate anſwer herein by maſter ſecretarie Peter, or if you will not let him go, by this bearer, we beſéech God to giue both you and vs grace to determinate this matter, as maie be to Gods honor, the preſeruation of the king, and the quiet of vs all: which maie be, if the fault be not in you. And ſo we bid you moſt hartilie farewell. From the kings maieſties caſtell of Windſor the ſeuenth of October, 1549.

Your lordſhips louing friend
Edward Summerſet.

After the receipt of theſe letters, the lords ſéeming not greatlie to regard the offers conteined therein, perſiſted in their intended purpoſe; and continuing ſtill in London conferred with the maior of London and his brethren, firſt willing them to cauſe a good and ſubſtantiall watch by night, and a good ward by daie to be kept for the ſafegard of the citie, and the ports and gates thereof: which was conſented vnto, and the companies of London in their turnes warned to watch and ward accordinglie. Then the ſaid lords and councellors demanded of the lord maior and his brethren fiue hundred men to aid them, to fetch the lord protector out of Windſor from the king. But therevnto the maior anſwered, that he could grant no aid without the aſſent of the common councell of the citie: wherevpon the next daie a common councell was ſummoned to the Guildhall in London. But in this meane time the ſaid lords of the councell aſſembled themſelues at the lord maiors houſe in London, who was then ſir Henrie Amcotes fiſhmonger, and John Yorke and Richard Turke ſhiriffes of the ſaid citie. And there the ſaid councell agréed and publiſhed forthwith a proclamation againſt the lord protector, the effect of which proclamation was as followeth.

The lords continue in their intended purpoſe againſt the lord protecto

A proclamation publiſhed againſt the lord protector.

1 That the lord protector, by his malicious and euill gouernement, was the occaſion of all the ſedition that of late hath happened within the realme.

2 The loſſe of the kings péeces in France.

3 That he was ambitious and ſought his owne glorie, as appeared by his building of moſt ſumptuous and coſtlie buildings, and ſpeciallie in the time of the kings warres, and the kings ſoldiers vnpaied.

4 That he eſtéemed nothing the graue councell of the councellors.

5 That he ſowed ſedition betwéene the nobles, the gentlemen, and commons.

6 That the nobles aſſembled themſelues togither at London, for none other purpoſe, but to haue cauſed the protector to haue liued within his limits, and to haue put ſuch order for the kings maieſtie as apperteined, whatſoeuer the protectors doings were, which (as they ſaid) were vnnaturall, ingrate, and traitorous.

7 That the protector ſlandered the councell to the king, and did what in him laie to cauſe variance betwéene the king and his nobles.

8 That he was a great traitor, and therefore the lords deſired the citie and commons to aid them to take him from the king. And in witneſſe and teſtimonie of the contents of the ſaid proclamation the lords ſubſcribed their names and titles as followeth.

Witneſſes to the contents of the ſaid proclamation.

The lord Rich lord chancellor, the lord S. John lord great maiſter and preſident of the councell, the lord marqueſſe of Northampton, the earle of Warwike lord great chamberleine, the earle of Arundell lord chamberleine, the earle of Shrewesburie, the earle of Southampton Wriotheſleie, ſir Thomas Cheinie knight treaſuror of the kings houſe and lord warden of the cinque ports, ſir John Gage knight coneſtable of the tower, ſir William Peter knight ſecretarie, ſir Edward North knight, ſir Edward Montague chéefe iuſtice of the common pléas, ſir Rafe Sadler, ſir John Baker, ſir Edward Wotton, doctor Wotton deane of Canturburie, ſir Richard Southwell.

ring the time that the lord maior and his brethren ſat in their court or inner chamber, and entered and communed a long while with them, and at the laſt the maior and his brethren came forth vnto the common councell, where was read the kings letter ſent vnto the maior and citizens, commanding them to aid him with a thouſand men, as hath maiſter Fox, and to ſend the ſame to his caſtell at Windſore: and to the ſame letter was adioined the kings hand, and the lord protectors. On the other ſide, by the mouth of the recorder it was requeſted, that the citizens would grant their aid rather vnto the lords: for that the protector had abuſed both the kings maieſtie, and the whole realme, and without that he were taken from the king, & made to vnderſtand his follie, this realme was in a great hazard: and therefore required that the citizens would willinglie aſſent to aid the lords with fiue hundred men: herevnto was none other anſwer made but ſilence. But the recorder (who at that time was a worthie gentleman called maiſter Broke) ſtill cried vpon them for anſwer.

George Stadlow citizen of London maketh anſwer to the recorder of London verie wiſelie and worthilie.

At the laſt ſtepped vp a wiſe and good citizen, named (as maiſter Fox ſaith) George Stadlow, and ſaid thus. In this caſe it is good for vs to thinke of things paſt to auoid the danger of things to come. I remember (ſaith he) in a ſtorie written in Fabians chronicle, of the warre betwéene the king and his barons, which was in the time of king Henrie the third, and the ſame time the barons (as our lords doo now) commanded aid of the maior and citie of London, and that in a rightfull cauſe for the common weale, which was for the execution of diuerſe good lawes, wherevnto the king before had giuen his conſent, and after would not ſuffer them to take place, and the citie did aid the lords. Now it came to an open battell, wherein the lords preuailed, and tooke the king and his ſonne priſoners, and vpon certeine conditions the lords reſtored againe the king and his ſonne to their liberties. And among all other conditions, this was one, that the king ſhould not onelie grant his pardon to the lords, but alſo to the citizens of London, which was granted, yea and the ſame ratified by act of parlement. But what followed?

What it is to fall into the wrath and diſpleaſure of the prince.

The aduiſe of George Stadlow.

Was it forgotten? No ſuerlie, nor yet forgiuen during the kings life. The liberties of the citie were taken awaie, ſtrangers appointed to be our heads and gouernours, the citizens giuen awaie bodie and goods, and from one perſecution to another were moſt miſerablie afflicted: ſuch it is to enter into the wrath of a prince, as Salomon ſaith; The wrath and indignation of a prince is death. Wherefore forſomuch as this aid is required of the kings maieſtie, whoſe voice we ought to hearken vnto (for he is our high ſhepheard) rather than vnto the lords: and yet I would not wiſh the lords to be clearlie ſhaken off, but that they with vs, and we with them may ioine in ſute, and make our moſt humble petition to the kings maieſtie, that it would pleaſe his highneſſe, to heare ſuch complaint againſt the gouernement of the lord protector as may be iuſtlie alledged and prooued. And I doubt not but this matter will be ſo pacified, that neither ſhall the king nor yet the lords haue cauſe to ſéeke for further aid, neither we to offend anie of them both. After this tale the commons ſtaied, and the lord maior & his brethren for that time brake vp, and afterward communed with the lords.

Sir Philip Hobbie ſent to the king by the lords.

The lord protector committed to priſon.

The lords ſat the next daie in councell in the Star chamber, and from thence they ſent ſir Philip Hobbie with their letters of credence to the kings maieſtie, beſéeching his highneſſe to giue credit to that which the ſaid Philip ſhould declare vnto his maieſtie in their names: & the king gaue him libertie to ſpeake, and moſt gentlie heard all that he had to ſaie. And trulie he did ſo wiſelie declare his meſſage, and ſo grauelie told his tale in the name of the lords, yea therewithall ſo vehementlie and gréeuouſlie againſt the protector, who was alſo there preſent by the king, that in the end, the lord protector was commanded from the kings preſence, and ſhortlie was committed to ward in a tower within the caſtell of Windſore called Beauchamps tower. And ſoone after were ſtaied ſir Thomas Smith, ſir Michaell Stanhope, and ſir Iohn Thin knights, maiſter Whalleie, maiſter Fiſher, Woolfe of the priuie chamber, Graie of Reading, and diuers other gentlemen that attended vpon the lord protector. And the ſame daie the lords of the councell came to Windſore to the king, and the next daie they brought from thence the lord protector, and the other that were there ſtaied, and conueied them through the citie of London, with as much wonderment as might be, vnto the tower, where they remained priſoners.

Abr.Fl. ex I.Stow.1044.

The lord protectour committed to the tower.

¶ Touching the manner of the dukes comming to the tower from Windſore, I find that it was on the fouretéenth of October in the after noone, at which time he was brought on horſſebacke through Holburne, in at Newgate, and ſo to the tower of London, accompanied with diuerſe lords and gentlemen with thrée hundred horſſe: the lord maior, ſir Rafe Warren, ſir Iohn Greſham, maiſter recorder, ſir William Locke, and both the ſhiriffes, and other knights, ſitting on their horſſes againſt Soper lane, with all the officers with halberds, and from Holburne bridge to the tower, certeine aldermen or their deputies on horſſebacke in euerie ſtreet, with a number of houſholders ſtanding with billes as he paſſed.] Shortlie after the lords reſorted to the tower, and there charged the protector with ſundrie articles, as followeth.

Articles obiected againſt the lord protector.

In primis, you tooke vpon you the office of a protector and gouernour, vpon condition, expreſſelie and ſpeciallie, that you would doo nothing in the kings affaires publikelie or priuatlie, but by the aſſent of the late kings executors.

2 Alſo you, contrarie to the ſaid condition, of your owne authoritie, did ſtaie and let iuſtice, and ſubuerted the lawes, as well by your letters as by your commandements.

3 Alſo you cauſed diuerſe perſons, being arreſted and impriſoned for treaſon, murther, manſlaughter and felonie, to be diſcharged and ſet at large, againſt the kings lawes and ſtatutes of this realme.

4 Alſo you haue made and ordeined lieutenants for the kings armies, and other weightie affaires vnder your owne writing and ſeale.

5 Alſo you haue communed with the ambaſſadors of other realmes, diſcourſing alone with them in the weightie cauſes of this realme.

6 Alſo you haue ſometime rebuked, checked and tawnted, as well priuatlie as openlie, diuerſe of the kings moſt honorable councellors, for ſhewing and declaring their aduiſes and opinions againſt your purpoſes in the kings weightie affaires, ſaieng ſomtimes to them, that you néed not to open matters vnto them, and would therefore be otherwiſe aduiſed: and that you would, if they were not agréeable to your opinion, put them out, and take other at your pleaſure.

7 Alſo you had and held againſt the law in your owne houſe, a court of requeſts, and thereby did inforce diuerſe the kings ſubiects to anſwer for their frée holds and goods, and determined the ſame to the ſubuerſion of the ſame lawes.

8 Alſo you being no officer, without the aduiſe of the councell, or the more part of them, did diſpoſe of the offices of the kings gift for monie, and granted leaſes and wards of the kings, and gaue preſentations to the kings benefices and biſhopriks, hauing no authoritie ſo to doo. And further, you did meddle with the ſelling of the kings lands.

9 Alſo you commanded multiplication and alcumiſtrie to be practiſed to abuſe the kings coine.

10 Alſo you cauſed a proclamation to be made concerning incloſures, whereby the common people haue made diuerſe inſurrections, and leuied open war, and diſtreined and ſpoiled diuerſe of the kings ſubiects, which proclamation went foorth againſt the will of the whole councell.

11 Alſo you haue cauſed a commiſſion with certeine articles therevnto annexed, to be made out concerning incloſures of commons, high waies, decaieng of cottages, and diuerſe other things, giuing the commiſſioners authoritie to heare and determine the ſame cauſes, to the ſubuerſion of the laws and ſtatutes of this realme: whereby much ſedition, inſurrection, and rebellion haue riſen and growne among the kings ſubiects.

12 Alſo you haue ſuffered the rebels and traitors to aſſemble and to lie in campe and armor againſt the king, his nobles, and gentlemen, without anie ſpéedie ſubduing or repreſſing of them.

13 Alſo you did comfort and incourage diuerſe of the ſaid rebels, by giuing of them diuerſe ſums of your owne monie, and by promiſing to diuerſe of them, fées, rewards, and ſeruices.

14 Alſo you in fauor of the ſaid rebels did againſt the lawes cauſe a proclamation to be made, that none of the ſaid rebels and traitors ſhould be ſued or vexed by anie perſon, for anie their offenſes in the ſaid rebellion, to the cleare ſubuerſion of the ſame lawes.

15 Alſo you haue ſaid in time of the rebellion, that you liked well the dooings and procéedings of the ſaid rebels and traitors, and ſaid that the couetouſneſſe of the gentlemen gaue occaſion to the common people to riſe: ſaieng alſo, that better it is for the commons to die, than periſh for lacke of liuing.

16 Alſo you ſaid that the lords of the parlement were loth to incline themſelues to reformation of incloſures and other things: therefore the people had good cauſe to reforme the things themſelues.

17 Alſo you after the report and declaration of the defaults and lacks reported to you by ſuch as did ſurueie Bullongne and the péeces there, would neuer amend the ſame defaults.

18 Alſo you would not ſuffer the péeces beyond the ſeas, called Newhauen and Blackneſſe, to be furniſhed with men and vittels; although you were aduertiſed of the defaults therein by the capteins of the ſame péeces and others, and were thereto aduertiſed by the kings councell: wherby the French king being the kings open enimie, was incouraged and comforted to win the ſaid péeces, to the kings great loſſe, and diſhonour of his realme.

19 Alſo you declared and publiſhed vntrulie, as well to the kings maieſtie, as other the yong lords attendant vpon his graces perſon, that the lords of the councell at London minded to deſtroie the king, and you required the king neuer to forget it, but to reuenge it: and likewiſe you required the yong lords to put the king in remembrance thereof, to the intent to make ſedition & diſcord betwéene the king and his lords.

20 Alſo where the kings maieſties priuie councell, of their loue and zeale that they did beare vnto the king and his realme, did conſult at London to haue communed with you, to the intent to moue you charitablie to amend your dooings and miſgouernement: you hearing of the ſaid aſſemblie, did cauſe to be declared by letters in diuerſe places the ſaid lords to be high traitors to the king, to the great diſturbance of the realme.

And thus much for theſe troubles of the lord protector, and articles againſt him obiected; to the end (as was doubted) that the ſame ſhould haue coſt him his life. But ſuch was the pleaſure of almightie God, diſpoſing mens hearts as ſéemeth to him beſt, that at length, to wit, the ſixt of Februarie next, he was deliuered; and that night he ſuped at ſir Iohn Yorks one of the ſhiriffes of London, alſo the proclamation before ſet foorth againſt him was reuoked & called in. And thus being againe reſtored, though not to his former office, yet vnto libertie, he continued therein for the ſpace of two yeares and two daies, till new troubles (as after ſhall appeare) chanced to him, which as they were too heauie for him either to caſt off, or carrie awaie; ſo were his loders more readie to aggrauate his burthen, than willing to eaſe him anie waie of the weight. So that this his exaltation & raiſing to dignitie, in reſpect of the ſhort continuance thereof, as alſo for the enuie wherewith it was aſſailed, had béene better not to haue happened, than with ſuch infelicitie in ſo ſhort a time to haue ended. But this fall from honor & aduancement with loſſe of life (than the which nothing more pretious, nothing more delicious) gréeued him the leſſe: bicauſe he might perceiue (as ſome ſuſpected) that rather of enuie than otherwiſe (reſeruing the courſe of Gods iudgement and vengeance to the ſecrecie of his owne counſels) the ſame was deuiſed, proſecuted, & finallie practiſed:

Nam quo quiſque magis pius eſt, ſtudioſior æqui,
Charior & regi, & quo quiſque potentior extat,
Sentiet à prauis ſe tanto odioſius iri
Dente Theonino roſum, quod fortè latenter
Fiet & occultè, linguæ ne ſentiat ictum
Læthalem, donec ſtamen trux Atropos occet,
Et vi Parcarum cœnum voluatur in imum.]

K. Edward rode through London.

¶ The ſeuentéenth of October, king Edward came from Hampton court to his place in Southworke, end there dined, and after dinner he made maiſter Yorke one of the ſhiriffes knight, and then rode thorough the citie to Weſtminſter. The lord maior of London for this yeare named ſir Rowland Hill, was a man of great charitie and compaſſion, euident and effectuall teſtimonies whereof he hath left in the world; ſome of whoſe good déeds partlie in his remembrance & partlie for others example are deſeruedlie recorded. This man cauſed to be made a cauſeie, commonlie called Ouerlane pauement in the high waie from Stone to Nantwich, in length foure miles, for horſſe and man, with diuerſe lanes on both ſides the ſame cauſeie. He cauſed likewiſe a cauſeie to be made from Dunchurch to Branſen in Warwikeſhire, more than two miles of length, and gaue twentie pounds in monie towards the making of Roitton bridge, thrée miles from Couentrie. He made the high waie to Bilborne néere to London. He made foure bridges, two of them of ſtone, conteining eightéene arches in them both, the one ouer the riuer of Seuerne, called Achambridge; the other Ternebridge, for that the water of Terne runneth vnder it; the other two of timber at Stoke, and built a good part of Stoke church. He builded one notable frée ſchoole at Draiton in Shropſhire, with maiſter and vſher, and ſufficient ſtipends for them both, beſides conuenient lodgings for the ſame. He alſo purchaſed a frée faire to the ſaid towne, with a frée market wéekelie, & alſo a frée market for cattell euerie fouretéene daies. He gaue to the hoſpitall of Chriſts church in London in his life time fiue hundred pounds in readie monie, and a hundred pounds at his deceaſſe.]

But now to returne to other doings. Whileſt theſe hurls and tumults were in hand, to the danger of the whole ſtate, the wars againſt the Scots were nothing followed, according to the former purpoſed meaning of the councell: ſo that it ſeemed neceſſarie to giue ouer the kéeping of Hadington, the ſame being in déed more chargeable (as was thought) than profitable, ſith the garriſon there could not be vitteled but with a great power to conduct the cariages in ſafetie, the enimies being ſtill readie to take their aduantage to diſtreſſe them vpon anie opportunitie offered. It was therefore reſolued, that the earle of Rutland ſhould go thither to ſée the fortifications raſed, and to conduct from thence the men & ordinance in ſafetie home into England. Héerevpon the ſaid earle with the Almans, and other ſouldiours then remaining on the borders, marched thither, and cauſed the bulworks, rampiers, and trenches to be raſed and filled flat with the ground, and bringing from thence all the men, artillerie and munition, bag and baggage, returned vnto Barwike without incounter, in peaceable and quiet maner.

Hadington raſed.

A parlement.

Shortlie after this, the kings maieſtie called his high court of parlement, which began at Weſtminſter, the foure and twentith daie of Nouember in this third yeare of his reigne, and there continued the ſame vntill the firſt daie of Februarie next following, which was in the beginning of the fourth yeare of his reigne. And among other things there enacted and concluded, one ſtatute was made for the puniſhment of rebels, and vnlawfull aſſemblies: the which law was made by occaſion of the late rebellion that happened in manner through the realme the yeare paſſed, & was not thought nor meant to haue touched anie noble man, ſpeciallie ſuch as the duke of Summerſet was, which after (as it ſhall appeare) it did, and by that ſtatute he was condemned within two yeares next after.

¶The ninteenth of Ianuarie, ſir Iohn Ruſſell lord priuie ſeale, was created earle of Bedford: and lord ſaint Iohn Lord great maiſter, was created earle of Wilſhire: and ſir William Paget, comptrollor of the kings houſe, was made lord Paget. On the ſame daie at night, were murthered by ſaint Pulchres church againſt the kings head without Newgate of London two capteins, that had ſerued the king of Bullongne and elſe-where, the one was ſir Peter Gambo, the other Filicirga. Which murther was committed by Charles Gauaro a Flemming, who came poſt from Barwike to doo that act. On the morrow, he with thrée of his companie was taken in Smithfield by the lord Paget, and ſent to Newgate, and the foure and twentith of Ianuarie they were all foure, Charles Gauaro, Balthaſar Gauaro, Nicholas Diſalueron, and Francis Deualaſco, had in a cart to Smithfield. And by the waie at the place where the murther was doone, Charles Gauaro had his right hand ſtriken off on the cart whéele, and then all hanged in Smithfield; who being exhorted to reconcile himſelfe to God and the world by confeſſing his fault, by repenting himſelfe of the offenſe, and aſking forgiueneſſe, that he might with a diſburthened conſcience reſigne his ſoule into the hands of God, obſtinatlie and deſperatlie anſwered, that he would neuer repent him of the déed.]

Anno Reg.4.

About the ſame time, monſieur de Thermes that ſuccéeded monſieur de Deſſe in gouernement as generall of the French forces in Scotland, came before Broughticrag, where he did ſo much by batterie & other kinds of inforcement, that giuing an aſſault both with his Frenchmen and certeine Scots ioined with him, the twentith of Februarie, the fort was entered by fine force, and all within it either taken or ſlaine. Sir Iohn Lutterell gouernour of that péece remained priſoner amongſt the Frenchmen. Moreouer, now after the end of the parlement, the earle of Warwike, hauing then higheſt authoritie, and the reſt of the lords of the councell, calling to remembrance how the laſt yeare in the time of rebellion, the French king had entered Bullongnois, and woone diuerſe of the Engliſh forts there, being of great importance for defenſe of the towne and countrie, the default whereof was imputed to the negligent gouernment of the lord protector: and for ſo much as they well vnderſtood that the French king vpon further practiſe had placed a capteine called the Reingraue, with diuerſe regiments of Almaine lancequenets, and certeine enſignes alſo of Frenchmen, to the number of foure or fiue thouſand at the towne of Morguiſon, being the midwaie betwéene Bullongne and Calis, to the great perill and danger as well of the countie of Bollongnois, as al of Calis, Guiſnes, and all the low countrie.

Sir Iohn Lutterell priſoner.

Erle of Warwike in higheſt authoritie.

Morguiſon the midwaie betwéene Bullen and Calis.

The king therefore for the defenſe of the ſaid frontiers, cauſed all the ſtrangers which had ſerued that yeare againſt the rebels, being to the number of two thouſand, to be tranſported ouer the ſea to the marches of Calis. And now at Chriſtmas laſt paſt, by order of the ſaid earle, and of the councellors aforeſaid, Francis earle of Huntington, and ſir Edward Haſtings his brother, ſir Iames Croft, ſir Leonard Chamberleine, and diuerſe other capteins and ſouldiers, to the number of thrée thouſand, were ſet ouer to the marches of Calis, to ioine with the ſaid ſtrangers, minding with as conuenient ſpéed as they might, to remooue the campe, and otherwiſe to annoie the French. But in the meane time through the diligent trauell of certeine perſons, ſpeciallie of one Guidoti an Italian, and a Florentine borne, there was a motion made for a treatie to be had by certeine commiſſioners, appointed betwixt the kings of England and France, for the concluſion of ſome peace, vpon ſuch reaſonable conditions and articles as might be thought expedient for the preſent time; and to ſtand with the honor and commoditie of both the princes.

It is agréed among the lords to infeſt and annoie the French.

This motion tooke ſuch effect, that about the ſeuenth daie of Februarie, certeine commiſſioners, appointed for this treatie, that is to wit, Iohn the earle of Bedford, the lord Paget, ſir William Peter the kings chéefe ſecretarie, and ſir Iohn Maſon, arriued at Calis: by reaſon of whoſe comming, the earle of Huntington, and the armie ſent ouer before for the defenſe of the frontiers were countermanded from anie attempt, ſo that little or nothing was doone in that voiage, ſauing certeine ſkirmiſhes at diuerſe times, not much materiall to be written of. Theſe commiſſioners being thus arriued, paſſed from Calis to Bullongne, there to méet with the commiſſioners appointed for the French king, where as a certeine houſe was newlie erected for the ſaid treatie to be had, which was vpon the ſide of Bullongne hauen next to France, where after diuerſe méetings & conferences of the commiſſioners of either partie, a finall peace was at laſt concluded betwixt both the realmes. But chéeflie among other things, for the reſtitution of Bullongne and Bullongnois to the Frenchmen, which were vpon certeine conditions following.

Commiſſioners ſent to treat of peace.

A peace concluded with France vpon certeine conditions.

Firſt, that the French king ſhould yéeld and paie to the king of England a certeine ſumme of monie, and the ſame to be paid at two paiments, as it was then agréed: and for the ſame ſumme the king of England ſhould render the towne of Bullongne, and all the forts thereto adioining, which he then inioied, with all ſuch artillerie and munition as was there found at the taking of the ſame to the French king. And for the ſure paiment of the ſaid ſums, the French king ſent into England for hoſtages and pledges, the counte de Anguien, Lewes the duke of Vandoſme his brother, the Uidame of Charters, and the duke de Aumale and others. And on S. Markes daie next following, being the fiue and twentith daie of Aprill, about eight of the clocke in the morning, the Engliſhmen did deliuer to the Frenchmen the poſſeſſion of Bullongne, and the caſtels and forts in the countie of Bullognois, according to the agréements and articles of peace afore mentioned. And the fiftéenth daie next following the French king entered into the ſaid towne of Bullongne with trumpets blowne, & with all the roiall triumph that might be, where he offered one great image of ſiluer of our ladie in the church there, which was called our ladie church: the which image he had cauſed ſpeciallie to be made in the honor of the ſaid ladie, and cauſed the ſame to be ſet vp in the place where the like image before did ſtand, the which before was taken awaie by the Engliſhmen at the winning of the towne.

Bullongne giuen vp to the French.

He entereth.

¶ On Candlemaſſe daie, William lord S. John earle of Wilſhire, lord great maiſter, and preſident of the councell, was made lord treaſuror. John Dudleie earle of Warwike, lord great chamberleine, was made lord great maiſter. William Parre marqueſſe of Northampton, was made lord great chamberleine. Lord Wentworth was made lord chamberleine of the houſehold. Sir Anthonie Wingfield capteine of the gard, was made comptrollor of the kings houſe. And ſir Thomas Darcie knight, was made vicechamberleine & capteine of the gard. And the earle of Arundell late lord chamberleine, with the earle of Southampton were put off the councell, and commanded to kéepe their houſes in London. ¶ On the 10 of Februarie, one Bell a Suffolke man was hanged and quartered at Tiburne, for mouing a new rebellion in Suffolke and Eſſex. This time, the lord maior of London and the aldermen purchaſed all the liberties of Southworke, which were in the kings hands.]

Soone after the aforeſaid agréement betwéene England and France was concluded, vpon the fore remembred capitulations, bicauſe of ſuſpicion of diſpleaſure and hatred that was thought to remaine betwéene the earle of Warwike and the duke of Summerſet, latelie before deliuered out of the tower, a meane was found that their fréendſhip ſhould be renewed through aliance, and a mariage was concluded betwéene the earle of Warwikes eldeſt ſonne, and the duke of Summerſets eldeſt daughter: the which marriage was ſolemnized at Shene, the king being then preſent. After the ſolemnitie of this marriage, there appeared outwardlie to the world great loue and fréendſhip betwéene the duke and the earle, but by reaſon of carietales and flatterers, the loue continued not long, howbeit manie did verie earneſtlie wiſh loue and amitie to continue betwéene them. ¶ About this time was a new rebellion in Kent, but it was ſoone ſuppreſſed, and certeine of the chiefe were apprehended and put to death, namelie Richard Lion, Goddard Gorram, and Richard Ireland. This yeare was a parlement holden at Weſtminſter, where among other things by the authoritie of the ſaid parlement, prieſts children were made legitimate, and vſurie for the loane of monie forbidden.]

Trinitie tearme was adiourned till Michaelmaſſe, for that the gentlemen ſhould kéepe the commons from commotion. The eleuenth of June being S. Barnabies daie, was kept holiedaie all London ouer: and the ſame daie at night, the high altar in Paules church was pulled downe, and a table ſet where the altar ſtood, with a veile drawne beneath the ſteps; and on the ſundaie next a communion was ſoong at the ſame table; and ſhortlie after all the altars in London were taken downe, and tables placed in their roomes. About this time there was at Feuerſham in Kent a gentleman named Arden, moſt cruellie murthered and ſlaine by the procurement of his owne wife. The which murther, for the horribleneſſe thereof, although otherwiſe it may ſéeme to be but a priuate matter, and therefore as it were impertinent to this hiſtorie, I haue thought good to ſet it forth ſomewhat at large, hauing the inſtructions deliuered to me by them, that haue vſed ſome diligence to gather the true vnderſtanding of the circumſtances. This Arden was a man of a tall and comelie perſonage, and matched in marriage with a gentlewoman, yoong, tall, and well fauoured of ſhape and countenance, who chancing to fall in familiaritie with one Moſbie a tailor by occupation, a blacke ſwart man, ſeruant to the lord North, it happened this Moſbie vpon ſome miſliking to fall out with hir: but ſhe being deſirous to be in fauour with him againe, ſent him a paire of ſiluer dice by one Adam Foule dwelling at the Floure de lice in Feuerſham.

Loue and luſt.

A paire of ſiluer dice worke much miſchiefe.

After which he reſorted to hir againe, and oftentimes laie in Ardens houſe: in ſomuch that within two yeares after, he obteined ſuch fauour at hir hands, that he laie with hir, or (as they terme it) kept hir, in abuſing hir bodie. And although (as it was ſaid) Arden perceiued right well their mutuall familiaritie to be much greater than their honeſtie, yet bicauſe he would not offend hir, and ſo looſe the benefit which he hoped to gaine at ſome of hir fréends hands in bearing with hir lewdneſſe, which he might haue loſt if he ſhould haue fallen out with hir: he was contented to winke at hir filthie diſorder, and both permitted, and alſo inuited Moſbie verie often to lodge in his houſe. And thus it continued a good ſpace, before anie practiſe was begun by them againſt maiſter Arden. She at length inflamed in loue with Moſbie, and loathing hir husband, wiſhed and after practiſed the meanes how to haſten his end.

Ardens wife attempteth meanes to make awaie hir husband.

There was a painter dwelling in Feuerſham, who had ſkill of poiſons, as was reported. She therefore demanded of him, whether it were true that he had ſuch ſkill in that feat or not? And he denied not but that he had in déed. Yea (ſaid ſhe) but I would haue ſuch a one made, as ſhould haue moſt vehement and ſpéedie operation to diſpatch the eater thereof. That can I doo (quoth he) and forthwith made hir ſuch a one, and willed hir to put it into the bottome of a porrenger, & then after to powre milke on it. Which circumſtance ſhe forgetting, did cleane contrarie, putting in the milke firſt, and afterward the poiſon. Now maiſter Arden purpoſing that daie to ride to Canturburie, his wife brought him his breakefaſt, which was woont to be milke and butter. He hauing receiued a ſpoonefull or two of the milke, miſliked the taſt and colour thereof, and ſaid to his wife; Miſtreſſe Ales what milke haue you giuen me here? Wherewithall ſhe tilted it ouer with hir hand, ſaieng, I wéene nothing can pleaſe you. Then he tooke horſſe and road towards Canturburie, and by the waie fell into extreme purging vpwards and downewards, and ſo eſcaped for that time.

Arden is poiſoned by his wife but recouereth.

After this, his wife fell in acquaintance with one Gréene of Feuerſham, ſeruant to ſir Anthonie Ager, from which Gréene maiſter Arden had wreſted a péece of ground on the backeſide of the abbeie of Feuerſham, and there had blowes and great threats paſſed betwixt them about that matter. Therefore ſhe knowing that Gréene hated hir husband, began to practiſe with him how to make him awaie; and concluded, that if he could get anie that would kill him, he ſhould haue ten pounds for a reward. This Gréene hauing doings for his maſter ſir Anthonie Ager, had occaſion to go vp to London, where his maiſter then laie, and hauing ſome charge vp with him, deſired one Bradſhaw a goldſmith of Feuerſham that was his neighbor, to accompanie him to Grauesend, and he would content him for his pains. This Bradſhaw, being a verie honeſt man, was content, and road with him. And when they came to Rainham downe, they chanced to ſée thrée or foure ſeruingmen that were comming from Léeds: and therewith Bradſhaw eſpied comming vp the hill from Rocheſter, one blacke Will, a terrible cruell ruffian with a ſword and a buckler, and an other with a great ſtaffe on his necke.

She deuiſeth another waie to diſpatch hir husband Arden.

A notorious murthering ruffian.

Then ſaid Bradſhaw to Gréene; We are happie that here commeth ſome companie from Léeds, for here commeth vp againſt vs as murthering a knaue as anie is in England: if it were not for them we might chance hardlie to eſcape without loſſe of our monie and liues. Yea thought Gréene (as he after confeſſed) ſuch a one is for my purpoſe, and therefore aſked; Which is he? Yonder is he quoth Bradſhaw, the ſame that hath the ſword and buckler: his name is blacke Will. How know you that, ſaid Gréene? Bradſhaw anſwered, I knew him at Bullongne, where we both ſerued, he was a ſoldier, and I was ſir Richard Cauendiſhes man, and there he committed manie robberies and heinous murthers on ſuch as trauelled betwixt Bullongne and France.

Marke how the diuell will not let his organs or inſtruments let ſlip either occaſiō or opportunitie to commit moſt heinous wickedneſſe.

By this time the other companie of ſeruingmen came to them, and they going all togither, met with blacke Will and his fellow. The ſeruingmen knew blacke Will, & ſaluting him, demanded of him whither he went? He anſwered; By his bloud (for his vſe was to ſweare almoſt at euerie word) I know not, nor care not, but ſet vp my ſtaffe, and euen as it falleth I go. If thou (quoth they) wilt go backe againe to Grauesend, we will giue thée thy ſupper. By his bloud (ſaid he) I care not, I am content, haue with you: and ſo he returned againe with them. Then blacke Will tooke acquaintance of Bradſhaw, ſaieng; Fellow Bradſhaw how dooſt thou? Bradſhaw vnwilling to renew acquitance, or to haue ought to doo with ſo ſhameles a ruffian, ſaid; Why doo ye know me? Yea that I doo (quoth he) did not we ſerue in Bullongne togither? But ye muſt pardon me (quoth Bradſhaw) for I haue forgotten you.

A deſperat villaine.

An honeſt man is aſhamed to renew old acquaintance with a knaue.

Then Gréene talked with blacke Will, and ſaid; When ye haue ſupped, come to mine hoſts houſe at ſuch a ſigne, and I will giue you the ſacke and ſugar. By his bloud (ſaid he) I thanke you, I will come and take it I warrant you. According to his promiſe he came, and there they made good cheare. Then blacke Will & Gréene went and talked apart from Bradſhaw, and there concluded togither, that if he would kill maſter Arden, he ſhould haue ten pounds for his labor. Then he anſwered, By his wounds that I will if I maie know him. Marie to morrow in Poules I will ſhew him thée, ſaid Gréene. Then they left their talke, & Gréene bad him go home to his hoſts houſe. Then Gréene wrote a letter to miſtreſſe Arden, & among other things put in theſe words: We haue got a man for our purpoſe, we maie thanke my brother Bradſhaw. Now Bradſhaw not knowing anie thing of this, tooke the letter of him, and in the morning departed home againe, and deliuered the letter to miſtreſſe Arden, and Gréene & blacke Will went vp to London at the tide.

The match made to murther Arden.

Simplicitie abuſed.

At the time appointed, Gréene ſhewed blacke Will maiſter Arden walking in Poules. Then ſaid blacke Will, What is he that goeth after him? Marie ſaid Gréen, one of his men. By his bloud (ſaid blacke Will) I will kill them both. Naie (ſaid Gréene) doo not ſo, for he is of counſell with vs in this matter. By his bloud (ſaid he) I care not for that, I will kill them both. Naie ſaid Gréene in anie wiſe doo not ſo. Then blacke Will thought to haue killed maiſter Arden in Poules churchyard, but there were ſo manie gentlemen that accompanied him to dinner, that he miſſed of his purpoſe. Gréene ſhewed all this talke to maiſter Ardens man, whoſe name was Michaell, which euer after ſtood in doubt of blacke Will, leſt he ſhould kill him. The cauſe that this Michaell conſpired with the reſt againſt his maiſter, was: for that it was determined, that he ſhould marrie a kinſwoman of Moſbies.

Blacke will maketh no conſcience of bloudſhed and murther.

Why Ardens man conſpired with the reſt to kill his maiſter.

After this, maiſter Arden laie at a certeine parſonage which he held in London, and therefore his man Michaell and Gréene agréed, that blacke Will ſhould come in the night to the parſonage, where he ſhould find the doores left open, that he might come in and murther maiſter Arden. This Michaell hauing his maiſter to bed, left open the doores according to the appointment. His maiſter then being in bed, aſked him if he had ſhut faſt the doores, and hée ſaid yea: but yet afterwards, fearing leaſt blacke Will would kill him as well as his maiſter, after he was in bed himſelfe, he roſe againe and ſhut the doores, bolting them faſt. So that blacke Will comming thither, and finding the doores ſhut, departed, being diſappointed at that time. The next daie blacke Will came to Gréene in a great chafe, ſwearing and ſtaring bicauſe he was ſo deceiued, and with manie terrible oths threatened to kill maiſter Ardens man firſt, whereſoeuer he met him. No (ſaid Gréene) doo not ſo, I will firſt know the cauſe of ſhutting the doores.

One murthering mind miſtruſting another, do hinder the action whereabout they agréed.

Then Gréene met and talked with Ardens man, and aſked of him, why he did not leaue open the doores, according to his promiſe? Marie (ſaid Michaell) I will ſhew you the cauſe. My maiſter yeſternight did that he neuer did before: for after I was in bed, hée roſe vp and ſhut the doores, and in the morning rated me for leauing them vnſhut. And herewith Gréene & blacke Will were pacified. Arden being redie to go homewards, his maid came to Gréene & ſaid; This night will my maiſter go downe. Wherevpon it was agréed that blacke Will ſhould kill him on Reinam downe. When maiſter Arden came to Rocheſter, his man ſtill fearing that blacke Will would kill him with his maiſter, pricked his horſſe of purpoſe, and made him to halt, to the end he might protract the time, and tarie behind. His maiſter asked him whie his horſſe halted, he ſaid, I know not. Well (quoth his maiſter) when ye come at the ſmith here before (betwéene Rocheſter and the hill foot ouer againſt Chéetam) remooue his ſhoo, and ſearch him, and then come after me. So maiſter Arden rode on: and yer he came at the place where blacke Will laie in wait for him, there ouertooke him diuerſe gentlemen of his acquaintance, who kept him companie: ſo that blacke Will miſt here alſo of his purpoſe.

The fourth attempt to make Arden awaie diſappointed.

Blacke will miſſeth his purpoſe.

After that maiſter Arden was come home, hée ſent (as he vſuallie did) his man to Shepeie to ſir Thomas Cheinie, then lord warden of the cinque ports, about certeine buſineſſe, and at his comming awaie, he had a letter deliuered ſent by ſir Thomas Cheinie to his maiſter. When he came home, his miſtreſſe tooke the letter and kept it, willing hir man to tell his maiſter, that he had a letter deliuered him by ſir Thomas Cheinie, and that he had loſt it; adding that he thought it beſt that his maiſter ſhould go the next morning to ſir Thomas, bicauſe he knew not the matter: he ſaid he would, and therefore he willed his man to be ſtirring betimes. In this meane while, blacke Will, and one George Shakebag his companion, were kept in a ſtorehouſe of ſir Anthonie Agers at Preſton, by Gréenes appointment: and thither came miſtreſſe Arden to ſée him, bringing and ſending him meat and drinke manie times. He therfore lurking there, and watching ſome opportunitie for his purpoſe, was willed in anie wiſe to be vp earlie in the morning, to lie in wait for maiſter Arden in a certeine broome cloſe, betwixt Feuerſham & the ferrie (which cloſe he muſt néeds paſſe) there to doo his feat. Now blacke Will ſtirred in the morning betimes, but miſt the waie, & taried in a wrong place.

Ardens wife viſiteth, ſuccoureth, emboldneth, and directeth black Will &c: how to accompliſh his bloudie purpoſe.

Maiſter Arden & his man comming on their waie earlie in the morning towards Shornelan, where ſir Thomas Cheinie laie: as they were almoſt come to the broome cloſe, his man alwaies fearing that blacke Will would kill him with his maiſter, feined that he had loſt his purſſe; Why ſaid his maiſter, thou fooliſh knaue, couldſt thou not looke to thy purſſe but looſe it? What was in it? Thrée pounds ſaid he. Why then go thy waies backe againe like a knaue (ſaid his maiſter) and ſéeke it, for being ſo earlie as it is, there is no man ſtirring, and therefore thou maiſt be ſure to find it, and then come and ouertake me at the ferrie. But neuertheleſſe, by reaſon that blacke Will loſt his way, maiſter Arden eſcaped yet once againe. At that time, blacke Will yet thought hée ſhould haue béene ſure to haue met him homewards: but whether that ſome of the lord wardens men accompanied him backe to Feuerſham, or that being in doubt, for that it was late to go through the broome cloſe, and therfore tooke another waie, blacke Will was diſappointed then alſo.

Note here the force of feare and a troubled conſcience.

Blacke will yet againe diſappointed.

But now ſaint Valentines faire being at hand, the conſpirators thought to diſpatch their diueliſh intention at that time. Moſbie minded to picke ſome quarrell to maiſter Arden at the faire to fight with him; for he ſaid he could not find in his heart to murther a gentleman in that ſort as his wife wiſhed: although ſhe had made a ſolemne promiſe to him, and he againe to hir, to be in all points as man and wife togither, and therevpon they both receiued the ſacrament on a ſundaie at London, openlie in a church there. But this deuiſe to fight with him would not ſerue, for maiſter Arden both then and at other times had béene greatlie prouoked by Moſbie to fight with him, but he would not. Now Moſbie had a ſiſter that dwelt in a tenement of maiſter Ardens néere to his houſe in Feuerſham: and on the faire éeuen, blacke Will was ſent for to come thither, and Gréene bringing him thither, met there with miſtreſſe Arden, accompanied with Michaell hir man, and one of hir maids. There were alſo Moſbie and George Shakebag, and there they deuiſed to haue killed him in maner as afterwards he was. But yet Moſbie at the firſt would not agrée to that cowardlie murthering of him, but in a furie flong awaie, and went vp the abbeie ſtréet toward the flower de lice, the houſe of the aforenamed Adam Foule, where he did often hoſt. But before he came thither now at this time, a meſſenger ouertooke him, that was ſent from miſtres Arden, deſiring him of all loues to come backe againe to helpe to accompliſh the mater he knew of. Herevpon he returned to hir againe, and at his comming backe, ſhe fell downe vpon hir knées to him, and beſought him to go through with the matter, as if he loued hir he would be content to doo, ſith as ſhée had diuerſe times told him, he néeded not to doubt, for there was not anie that would care for his death, nor make anie great inquirie for them that ſhould diſpatch him.

A prepenſed quarrel againſt Arden by the conſpirators.

Ardens wife, blacke will, & the knot of vilans méet and conclude vpon their former prepenſed miſchiefe.

O importunate & bloudie minded ſtrumpet!

Thus ſhe being earneſt with him, at length hée was contented to agrée vnto that horrible deuiſe, and therevpon they conueied blacke Will into maiſter Ardens houſe, putting him into a cloſet at the end of his parlour. Before this, they had ſent out of the houſe all the ſeruants, thoſe excepted which were priuie to the deuiſed murther. Then went Moſbie to the doore, and there ſtood in a night gowne of ſilke girded about him, and this was betwixt ſix and ſeuen of the clocke at night. Maſter Arden hauing béene at a neighbors houſe of his, named Dumpkin, & hauing cleared certeine reckonings betwixt them, came home: and finding Moſbie ſtanding at the doore, asked him if it were ſupper time? I thinke not (quoth Moſbie) it is not yet readie. Then let vs go and plaie a game at the tables in the meane ſeaſon, ſaid maiſter Arden. And ſo they went ſtreight into the parlor: and as they came by through the hall, his wife was walking there, and maiſter Arden ſaid; How now miſtreſſe Ales? But ſhe made ſmall anſwer to him. In the meane time one cheined the wicket doore of the entrie. When they came into the parlor, Moſbie ſat downe on the bench, hauing his face toward the place where blacke Will ſtood. Then Michaell maiſter Ardens man ſtood at his maſters backe, holding a candle in his hand, to ſhadow blacke Will, that Arden might by no meanes perceiue him comming forth. In their plaie Moſbie ſaid thus (which ſéemed to be the watchword for blacke Wils comming forth) Now maie I take you ſir if I will. Take me (quoth maiſter Arden) which waie? With that blacke Will ſtept forth, and caſt a towell about his necke, ſo to ſtop his breath and ſtrangle him. Then Moſbie hauing at his girdle a preſſing iron of fourtéene pounds weight, ſtroke him on the hed with the ſame, ſo that he fell downe, and gaue a great grone, inſomuch that they thought he had béene killed.

The practiſe to kill Arden is now ſet abroch.

Here the confederats ioine their practiſes.

The watchword to the principall murtherer.

Then they bare him awaie, to laie him in the counting houſe, & as they were about to laie him downe, the pangs of death comming on him, he gaue a great grone, and ſtretched himſelfe, and then blacke Will gaue him a great gaſh in the face, and ſo killed him out of hand, laid him along, tooke the monie out of his purſſe, and the rings from his fingers, and then comming out of the counting houſe, ſaid; Now the feat is doone, giue me my monie. So miſtres Arden gaue him ten pounds: and he comming to Gréene, had a horſſe of him, and ſo rode his waies. After that blacke Will was gone, miſtreſſe Arden came into the counting houſe, and with a knife gaue him ſeuen or eight picks into the breſt. Then they made cléene the parlor, tooke a clout, and wiped where it was bloudie, and ſtrewed againe the ruſhes that were ſhuffled with ſtrugling, and caſt the clout with which they wiped the bloud, and the knife that was bloudie, wherewith ſhe had wounded hir huſband, into a tub by the wels ſide; where afterwards both the ſame clout and knife were found. Thus this wicked woman, with hir complices, moſt ſhamefullie murdered hir owne huſband, who moſt entirelie loued hir all his life time. Then ſhe ſent for two Londoners to ſupper, the one named Prune, and the other Cole, that were groſers, which before the murder was committed, were bidden to ſupper. When they came, ſhe ſaid: I maruell where maiſter Arden is; we will not tarie for him, come ye and ſit downe, for he will not be long. Then Moſbies ſiſter was ſent for, ſhe came and ſat downe, and ſo they were merie.

Blacke will receiueth ten pounds for his reward of Ardens wife, for murdering hir huſband.

Marke what a countenance of innocencie and ignorance ſhe bore after the murdering of hir huſband.

After ſupper, miſtres Arden cauſed hir daughter to plaie on the virginals, and they danſed, and ſhe with them, and ſo ſéemed to protract time as it were, till maiſter Arden ſhould come, and ſhe ſaid, I maruell where he is ſo long; well, he will come anon I am ſure, I praie you in the meane while let vs plaie a game at the tables. But the Londoners ſaid, they muſt go to their hoſts houſe, or elſe they ſhould be ſhut out at doores, and ſo taking their leaue, departed. When they were gone, the ſeruants that were not priuie to the murder, were ſent abroad into the towne; ſome to ſéeke their maiſter, and ſome of other errands, all ſauing Michaell and a maid, Moſbies ſiſter, and one of miſtres Ardens owne daughters. Then they tooke the dead bodie, and caried it out, to laie it in a field next to the church-yard, and ioining to his garden wall, through the which he went to the church. In the meane time it began to ſnow, and when they came to the garden gate, they remembred that they had forgotten the kaie, and one went in for it, and finding it, at length brought it, opened the gate, and caried the corps into the ſame field, as it were ten paſes from the garden gate, and laid him downe on his backe ſtreight in his night gowne, with his ſlippers on: and betwéene one of his ſlippers and his foot, a long ruſh or two remained. When they had thus laid him downe, they returned the ſame way they came through the garden into the houſe.

The workers of this miſchiefe carie out Arden ſlaine into the field.

This ſhe did to colour hir wickedneſſe which by no meanes was excuſable.

They being returned thus backe againe into the houſe, the doores were opened, and the ſeruants returned home that had béene ſent abroad: and being now verie late, ſhe ſent foorth hir folks againe to make inquirie for him in diuerſe places; namelie, among the beſt in the towne where he was woont to be, who made anſwer, that they could tell nothing of him. Then ſhe began to make an outcrie, and ſaid; Neuer woman had ſuch neighbors as I haue, and herewith wept: in ſomuch that hir neighbors came in, and found hir making great lamentation, pretending to maruell what was become of hir huſband. Wherevpon, the maior and others came to make ſearch for him. The faire was woont to be kept partlie in the towne, and partlie in the abbeie; but Arden for his owne priuat lucre ⁊ couetous gaine had this preſent yeare procured it to be wholie kept within the abbeie ground which he had purchaſed; ⁊ ſo reaping all the gaines to himſelfe, and bereauing the towne of that portion which was woont to come to the inhabitants, got manie a bitter curſſe. The maior going about the faire in this ſearch, at length came to the ground where Arden laie: and as it happened, Prune the groſer getting ſight of him, firſt ſaid; Staie, for me thinke I ſée one lie here. And ſo they looking and beholding the bodie, found that it was maiſter Arden, lieng there throughlie dead, and viewing diligentlie the maner of his bodie ⁊ hurts, found the ruſhes ſticking in his ſlippers, and marking further, eſpied certeine footſteps, by reaſon of the ſnow, betwixt the place where he laie, and the garden doore.

Arden a couetous man and a preferrer of his priuat profit before common gaine.

Ardens dead bodie is deſcried by one of his acquaintance.

Then the maior commanded euerie man to ſtaie, and herewith appointed ſome to go about, ⁊ to come in at the inner ſide of the houſe through the garden as the waie laie, to the place where maiſter Ardens dead bodie did lie; who all the waie as they came, perceiued footings ſtill before them in the ſnow: and ſo it appeared plainlie that he was brought along that waie from the houſe through the garden, and ſo into the field where he laie. Then the maior and his companie that were with him went into the houſe, and knowing hir euill demeanor in times paſt, examined hir of the matter: but ſhe defied them and ſaid, I would you ſhould know I am no ſuch woman. Then they examined hir ſeruants, and in the examination, by reaſon of a péece of his heare and bloud found néere to the houſe in the waie, by the which they caried him foorth, and likewiſe by the knife with which ſhe had thruſt him into the breſt, and the clout wherewith they wiped the bloud awaie which they found in the tub, into the which the ſame were throwen; they all confeſſed the matter, and hir ſelfe beholding hir huſbands bloud, ſaid; Oh the bloud of God helpe, for this bloud haue I ſhed.

Footſteps all alongſt from the dead bodie of Arden to his dwelling houſe.

A péece of Ardens heare and his bloud ſpilt in the houſe eſpied, as alſo a bloudie knife and a clout found.

Then were they all attached, and committed to priſon, and the maior with others went preſentlie to the flower de lice, where they found Moſbie in bed: and as they came towards him, they eſpied his hoſe and purſſe ſtained with ſome of maiſter Ardens bloud. And when he aſked what they meant by their comming in ſuch ſort, they ſaid; Sée, here ye may vnderſtand wherefore, by theſe tokens, ſhewing him the bloud on his hoſe and purſſe. Then he confeſſed the déed, and ſo he and all the other that had conſpired the murder, were apprehended and laid in priſon, except Gréene, blacke Will, and the painter, which painter and George Shakebag, that was alſo fled before, were neuer heard of. Shortlie were the ſeſſions kept at Feuerſham, where all the priſoners were arreigned and condemned. And therevpon being examined whither they had anie other complices, miſtres Arden accuſed Bradſhaw, vpon occaſion of the letter ſent by Gréene from Graues end, (as before ye haue heard) which words had none other meaning, but onelie by Bradſhaws deſcribing of blacke Wils qualities; Gréene iudged him a méete inſtrument for the execution of their pretended murder. Whereto notwithſtanding (as Gréene confeſſed at his death certeine yeares after) this Bradſhaw was neuer made priuie; howbeit, he was vpon this accuſation of miſtres Arden, immediatlie ſent for to the ſeſſions, and indicted, and declaration made againſt him, as a procurer of blacke Will to kill maiſter Arden, which procéeded wholie by miſunderſtanding of the words conteined in the letter which he brought from Gréene.

Some of Ardens bloud vpon Moſbies purſſe.

The principals of this murder fled awaie.

Bradſhaw as vniuſtlie accuſed, as his ſimplicitie was ſhamefullie abuſed.

Then he deſired to talke with the perſons condemned, and his requeſt was granted. He therefore demanded of them if they knew him, or euer had anie conuerſation with him, ⁊ they all ſaid no. Then the letter being ſhewed and read, he declared the verie rie truth of the matter, and vpon what occaſion he told Greene of blacke Will: neuertheleſſe, he was condemned, and ſuffered. Theſe condemned perſons were diuerſlie executed in ſundrie places, for Michaell maiſter Ardens man was hanged in chaines at Feuerſham, and one of the maids was burnt there, pitifullie bewailing hir caſe, and cried out on hir miſtres that had brought hir to this end, for the which ſhe would neuer forgiue hir. Moſbie & his ſiſter were hanged in Smithfield at London; miſtres Arden was burned at Canturburie the foure and twentith of March. Greene came againe certeine yeares after, was apprehended, condemned, & hanged in chaines in the high waie betwixt Oſpring & Boughton againſt Feuerſham; blacke Will was burnt on a ſcaffold at Fliſhing in Zeland. Adam Foule that dwelt at the floure de lice in Feuerſham was brought into trouble about this matter, and caried vp to London, with his legs bound vnder the horſſe bellie, and committed to priſon in the Marſhalſeie: for that Moſbie was heard to ſaie; Had it not beene for Adam Foule, I had not come to this trouble: meaning that the bringing of the ſiluer dice for a token to him from miſtreſſe Arden, as ye haue heard, occaſioned him to renew familiaritie with hir againe. But when the matter was throughlie ripped vp, & that Moſbie had cleered him, proteſting that he was neuer of knowledge in anie behalfe to the murder, the mans innocencie preſerued him.

A wonder touching the print of Ardens dead bodie two yeares after he was ſlaine.

God heareth the teares of the oppreſſed and taketh vengeance: note an example in Arden.

This one thing ſeemeth verie ſtrange and notable, touching maiſter Arden, that in the place where he was laid, being dead, all the proportion of his bodie might be ſeene two yeares after and more, ſo plaine as could be, for the graſſe did not grow where his bodie had touched: but betweene his legs, betweene his armes, and about the hollowneſſe of his necke, and round about his bodie, and where his legs, armes, head, or anie other part of his bodie had touched, no graſſe growed at all of all that time. So that manie ſtrangers came in that meane time, beſide the towneſmen, to ſee the print of his bodie there on the ground in that field. Which field he had (as ſome haue reported) moſt cruellie taken from a woman, that had beene a widow to one Cooke, and after maried to one Richard Read a mariner, to the great hinderance of hir and hir huſband the ſaid Read: for they had long inioied it by a leaſe, which they had of it for manie yeares, not then expired: neuertheleſſe, he got it from them. For the which, the ſaid Reads wife not onelie exclaimed againſt him, in ſheading manie a ſalt teere, but alſo curſſed him moſt bitterlie euen to his face, wiſhing manie a vengeance to light vpon him, and that all the world might wonder on him. Which was thought then to come to paſſe, when he was thus murdered, and laie in that field from midnight till the morning: and ſo all that daie, being the faire daie till night, all the which daie there were manie hundreds of people came woondering about him. And thus far touching this horrible and heinous murder of maiſter Arden. To returne then where we left.

A parlement.

Booke of common praier confirmed.

About this time the kings maieſtie calling his high court of parlement, held the ſame at Weſtminſter the three and twentith daie of Ianuarie, in this fift yeere of his reigne, and there continued it, vntill the fifteenth daie of Aprill in the ſixt yeare of his ſaid reigne. In this parlement the booke of common praier, which in ſome part had beene corrected and amended, was newlie confirmed & eſtabliſhed.

Abr. Fl. ex I.S. pag. 1049. Sweating ſickneſſe.

John Caius.

Of this ſweat died Henrie & Charles ſons of Charles Brandon, the elder firſt, and the yonger after: ſo that they both died dukes of Suffolke.

¶ In the end of this parlement, namelie the fifteenth of Aprill the infectious ſweating ſickneſſe began at Shreweſburie, which ended not in the north part of England vntill the end of September. In this ſpace what number died, it cannot be well accounted: but certeine it is, that in London in few daies nine hundred and ſixtie gaue vp the ghoſt. It began in London the ninth of Iulie, and the twelfth of Iulie it was moſt vehement: which was ſo terrible, that people being in beſt helth, were ſuddenlie taken, and dead in foure and twentie houres, and twelue, or leſſe, for lacke of ſkill in guiding them in their ſweat. And it is to be noted, that this mortalitie fell cheeflie or rather vpon men, and thoſe alſo of the beſt age, as betweene thirtie & fortie yeers. The ſpeedie riddance of life procured by this ſicknes, did ſo terrifie people of all ſorts, that ſuch as could make ſhift, either with monie or freendſhip, changed their ſoile, and leauing places of concourſe, betooke them (for the time) to abodes, though not altogither ſolitarie, yet leſſe frequented: to conclude, manifold meanes were made for ſafetie of life. The firſt weeke died in London eight hundred perſons.

Rich. Grafton.

Remedie againſt the danger of the ſweating ſickneſſe.

The imbaſing of the coine.

Two baſes of monie.

The manner of this ſweat was ſuch, that if men did take anie cold outwardlie, it ſtroke the ſweat in, and immediatlie killed them. If they were ſuffered to ſleepe, commonlie they ſwooned in their ſleepe and departed, or elſe died immediatlie vpon their waking. But the waie to eſcape danger was cloſe keeping moderatlie with ſome aire and a little drinke, and the ſame to be poſſet-ale, and ſo to keepe them thirtie houres, & then was the danger paſt; but beware of ſudden cold. Before men had learned the manner of keeping, an infinit number periſhed. This diſeaſe at that time followed Engliſhmen & none other nation; for in Antwerpe and other countries, our Engliſhmen being there amongſt diuerſe other nations, onelie our Engliſhmen were ſicke thereof, and none other perſons. The conſideration of which thing made this nation much afraid thereof, who for the time began to repent and giue almes, and to remember God from whom that plague might well ſeeme to be ſent among vs. But as the diſeaſe in time ceaſed, ſo our deuotion in ſhort time decaied.] At this time alſo the king with the aduiſe of his priuie councell, and hauing alſo great conference with merchants and others, perceiuing that by ſuch coins and copper monies, as had beene coined in the time of the king his father, and now were commonlie currant in the realme; and indeed a great number of them not worth halfe the value that they were currant at, to the great diſhonor of the kings maieſtie & the realme, and to the deceit & no little hinderance of all the kings maieſties good ſubiects, did now purpoſe not onelie the abaſing of the ſaid copper monies, but alſo meant wholie to reduce them into bullion, to the intent to deliuer fine and good monies for them. And therefore in the moneth of Iulie by his graces proclamation, he abaſed the peece of twelue pence, commonlie called a teſton vnto nine pence, and the peece of foure pence vnto three pence. And in Auguſt next following, the peece of nine pence was abaſed to ſix pence, and the peece of three pence vnto two pence, and the pennie to an halfepennie.

Creation of honorable eſtates.

I.S. pag. 1050.

The duke of Summerſet againe apprehended, and committed to the tower.

On the eleuenth daie of October, there was a great creation of dukes and earles, as the lord marqueſſe Dorſet was created duke of Suffolke, the earle of Warwike made duke of Northumberland, and the earle of Wilſhire made marqueſſe of Wincheſter, & ſir William Herbert maiſter of the horſſe; he alſo made William Cicill his ſecretarie knight, maiſter Iohn Cheeke one of his ſchoolemaiſters knight, maiſter Henrie Dudlie knight, & maiſter Henrie Neuill knight. The ſixteenth daie of the ſaid moneth being fridaie, the duke of Summerſet was againe apprehended, & his wife alſo, & committed to the tower; with him alſo were cōmitted ſir Michaell

Stanhope,

The duke arreigned both of treaſon and felonie.

The people ſuppoſing the duke to be cléere, gaue a great ſhowt for ioie.

Stanhope, ſir Thomas Arundell, ſir Raſe Vane, ſir Miles Partrige & other for ſuſpicion of treaſon and felonie, whereof they were all ſhortlie after indicted. And ſo ſtanding indicted, the ſecond daie of December next following, the ſaid duke was brought out of the tower of London with the ax of the tower borne before him, with a great number of billes, gleaues, halberds & pollaxes attending vpon him, & ſo came into Weſtminſter hall, where was made in the middle of the hall a new ſcaffold, where all the lords of the kings councell ſate as his iudges: and there was he arreigned and charged with manie articles both of felonie and treaſon. And when after much mild ſpéech he had anſwered not guiltie, he in all humble manner put himſelfe to be tried by his péeres: who after long conſultation among themſelues, gaue their verdict that he was not guiltie of the treaſon, but of the felonie. The people there preſent (which was a great number) hearing the lords ſaie not guiltie, which was to the treaſon, thinking moſt certeinlie that he was cléerelie acquited; and chieflie for that immediatlie vpon the pronouncing of thoſe words, he that caried the ax of the tower departed with the ax, they made ſuch an outcrie and ioie, as the like hath not béene heard. Which was an euident declaration of their good willes and hartie fauors vnto him, whoſe life they greatlie deſired to haue ſaued, for that he had deſerued right well of moſt (though the good gentleman had ſome priuat enimies) and had béene as a man maie iuſtlie ſaie:

Solamen magnum patriæ, ſolamen amicis.

The duke condemned to die for felonie.

But neuertheleſſe, he was condemned to the death, whereof ſhortlie after he taſted. The felonie that he was condemned of, was vpon the ſtatute made the laſt yeare againſt rebelles, and vnlawfull aſſemblies, wherein amongſt other things is one branch, that whoſoeuer ſhall procure the death of anie councellor, that euerie ſuch attempt or procurement ſhall be felonie. And by force of that ſtatute, the duke of Summerſet, being accompanied with certeine others, was charged that he purpoſed and attempted the death of the duke of Northumberland, the lord marqueſſe, the lord of Penbroke, and others of the priuie councell, which by ſtatute was felonie.

The duke of Summerſet condemned returneth to the tower.

The people murmur at the dukes condemnatiõ.

Policie.

George Ferrers maiſter of the kings paſtimes.

After the duke was thus condemned, he was againe returned to the tower, and landed at the crane of the vinetrée, and ſo paſſed through London, where were both exclamations: the one cried for ioie that he was acquitted, the other cried out that he was condemned. But howſoeuer they cried, he was conueied to the tower of London, where he remained vntill the two and twentith daie of Ianuarie next folowing. The duke being condemned (as is aforeſaid) the people ſpake diuerſlie, and murmured againſt the duke of Northumberland, and againſt ſome other of the lords, for the condemnation of the ſaid duke: and alſo (as the common fame went) the kings maieſtie tooke it not in good part. Wherefore as well to remooue fond talke out of mens mouths, as alſo to recreat and refreſh the troubled ſpirits of the yoong king; who (as ſaith Grafton) ſéemed to take the trouble of his vncle ſomewhat heauilie: it was deuiſed, that the feaſt of Chriſts natiuitie, commonlie called Chriſtmaſſe then at hand, ſhould be ſolemnlie kept at Gréenwich with open houſhold, and franke reſort to court (which is called kéeping of the hall) what time of old ordinarie courſe there is alwaies one appointed to make ſport in the court, called commonlie lord of miſrule: whoſe office is not vnknowne to ſuch as haue béene brought vp in noble mens houſes, and among great houſe-kéepers, which vſe liberall feaſting in that ſeaſon. There was therefore by order of the councell, a wiſe gentleman & learned named George Ferrers, appointed to that office for this yeare; who being of better credit & eſtimation than cõmonlie his predeceſſors had béene before, receiued all his commiſſions and warrants by the name of the maiſter of the kings paſtimes. Which gentleman ſo well ſupplied his office, both in ſhew of ſundrie ſights and deuiſes of rare inuentions, and in act of diuerſe interludes, and matters of paſtime plaied by perſons, as not onelie ſatiſfied the common ſort, but alſo were verie well liked and allowed by the councell, and other of ſkill in the like paſtimes: but beſt of all by the yoong king himſelfe, as appéered by his princelie liberalitie in rewarding that ſeruice.

Abr. Fl. ex I. Stow 1055.

The ſhiriffes lord of miſrule.

¶ On mondaie the fourth of Ianuarie, the ſaid lord of merie diſports came by water to London, and landed at the tower wharffe, entred the tower, and then rode through tower ſtréet, where he was receiued by Vauſe lord of miſrule to Iohn Mainard one of the ſhiriffes of London, and ſo conducted through the citie with a great companie of yoong lords & gentlemen to the houſe of ſir George Barne lord maior, where he with the chéefe of his companie dined, and after had a great banket: and at his departure, the lord maior gaue him a ſtanding cup with a couer of ſiluer and guilt of the value of ten pounds for a reward, and alſo ſet a hogſhed of wine, and a barrell of béere at his gate, for his traine that followed him. The reſidue of his gentlemen & ſeruants dined at other aldermens houſes, and with the ſhiriffes, and then departed to the tower wharffe againe, & ſo to the court by water, to the great commendation of the maior and aldermen, and highlie accepted of the king and councell.]

1552

The executiõ of the duke of Summerſet.

This Chriſtmas being thus paſſed and ſpent with much mirth and paſtime, wherewith the minds and eares of murmurers were méetlie well appeaſed, according to a former determination as the ſequele ſhewed: it was thought now good to procéed to the execution of the iudgement giuen againſt the duke of Summerſet, touching his conuiction & atteindor of the fellonie before mentioned. Whervpon, the two and twentith daie of Ianuarie, then next following being fridaie, he was brought out of the tower, and according to the manner, deliuered to the ſhiriffes of London; and ſo with a great companie of the gard & others with weapons, was brought to the ſcaffold where he ſhould ſuffer, without changing either voice or countenance, other than he was accuſtomed to vſe at other times.

Meanes to reſtraine the multitude from the dukes execution.

Iohn Fox. The dukes behauiour at his death.

The ſame morning earelie, the coneſtables of euerie ward in London (according to a precept directed from the councell to the maior) ſtrictlie charged euerie houſhold of the ſame citie, not to depart anie of them out of their houſes, before ten of the clocke of that daie: meaning thereby to reſtreine the great number of people that otherwiſe were like to haue béen at the ſaid execution. Notwithſtanding, by ſeauen of the clocke, the tower hill was couered with a great multitude, repairing from all parts of the citie, as well as out of the ſuburbs. And before eight of the clocke, the duke was brought to the ſcaffold, incloſed with the kings gard, the ſhiriffes officers, the warders of the tower, & other with halberds: whereas he nothing changing neither voice nor countenance, but in a maner with the ſame geſture which he commonlie vſed at home, knéeling downe vpon both his knées, and lifting vp his hands, commended himſelfe vnto God. After he had ended a few ſhort praiers, ſtanding vp againe, and turning himſelfe toward the eaſt ſide of the ſcaffold, nothing at all abaſhed (as it ſéemed vnto thoſe that ſtood by) neither with the ſight of the ax, neither yet of the hangman, nor of preſent death, but with the like alacritie and chéerefulneſſe of mind and countenance as before times.

times he was accuſtomed to heare the cauſes & ſupplications of other, & ſpeciallie of the poore (towards whome as it were with a certeine fatherlie loue to his children he alwaies ſhewed himſelfe moſt attentiue) he vttered theſe words to the people.

The words of the duke of Summerſet at his death.

DEerelie beloued friends, I am brought hither to ſuffer death, albeit I neuer offended againſt the king, neither by word nor deed, and haue beene alwaies as faithfull and true vnto this realme, as anie man hath beene. But forſomuch as I am by law condemned to die, I doo acknowledge my ſelfe as well as others, to be ſubiect thereunto. Wherefore to teſtifie mine obedience which I owe vnto the lawes, I am come hither to ſuffer death, whereunto I willinglie offer my ſelfe with moſt hartie thanks vnto God, that hath giuen me this time of repentance, who might through ſudden death haue taken awaie my life, that I neither ſhould haue acknowledged him nor my ſelfe.

Moreouer (deerelie beloued friends) there is yet ſomewhat that I muſt put you in mind of, as touching chriſtian religion, which ſo long as I was in authoritie, I alwaies diligentlie ſet foorth, and furthered to my power. Neither doo I repent me of my doings, but reioiſe therein, ſith now the ſtate of chriſtian religion commeth moſt neere vnto the forme and order of the primitiue church. Which thing I eſteeme as a great benefit giuen of God, both to you and me, moſt hartilie exhorting you all, that this which is moſt purelie ſet foorth vnto you, you will with like thankefulneſſe accept and embrace, and ſet out the ſame in your liuing: which thing if you doo not, without doubt, greater miſchiefe and calamitie will follow.

Great feare among the people aſſembled on the tower hill. Rich. Grafton. Iohn Stow.

When he had ſpoken theſe words, ſuddenlie there was a great noiſe heard, whervpon the people were ſtreight driuen into a great feare, few or none knowing the cauſe. Wherefore I thinke it good to write what I ſaw (ſaith Iohn Stow) concerning that matter. The people of a certeine hamlet which were warned to be there by ſeauen of the clocke to giue their attendance on the lieutenant, now came thorough the poſterne, and perceiuing the duke to be alreadie on the ſcaffold, the formoſt began to run, crieng to their fellowes to follow faſt after. Which ſuddennes of theſe men, being weaponed with bils and halberds, & this running cauſed the people which firſt ſaw them, to thinke ſome power had come to haue reſcued the duke from execution, and therefore cried Awaie awaie. Wherevpon the people ran, ſome one waie, ſome an other, manie fell into the tower ditch, and they which tarried, thought ſome pardon had beene brought: ſome ſaid it thundered, ſome that the ground mooued, but there was no ſuch matter.

Abr. Fl. ex Io. Foxi martyrologio.

¶ This amazement of the people is in other words recorded by Iohn Fox in the ſtorie of this dukes troubles & death: which bicauſe they be effectuall I thinke good to interlace. When the duke had ended his ſpeech (ſaith he) ſuddenlie there was a terrible noiſe heard: wherevpon there came a great feare on all men. This noiſe was as it had beene the noiſe of a great ſtorme or tempeſt, which to ſome ſeemed to be heard from aboue: like as if a great deale of gunpowder being incloſed in an armorie, and hauing caught fire, had violentlie broken out. But to ſome againe it ſeemed as though it had beene a great multitude of horſemen running togither, or comming vpon them; ſuch a noiſe was then in the eares of all men, albeit they ſaw nothing. Whereby it happened, that all the people being amazed without any euident cauſe, and without anie violence or ſtroke ſtriken, they ran awaie, ſome into the ditches and puddles, and ſome into the houſes thereabout. Other ſome being affraid with the horrour and noiſe, fell downe groueling vnto the ground with their pollaxes & halberds, and moſt part of them cried out: Ieſus ſaue vs, Ieſus ſaue vs. Those which tarried ſtill in their places, for feare knew not where they were. And * I my ſelfe which was there preſent among the reſt, being alſo affraid in this hurlie burlie, ſtood ſtill altogither amazed, looking when anie man would knocke me on the head. It happened here, as the euangeliſts write, it did to Chriſt, when the officers of the high prieſts & Phariſeis comming with wepons to take him, being aſtonied ran backe, & fell to the ground.

A ſudden noiſe & feare of the people at the death of the duke of Summerſet.

* Namelie Iohn Fox the writer of this report.

In the meane time, whileſt theſe things were thus in dooing, the people by chance ſpied one ſir Anthonie Browne riding vnto the ſcaffold: which was the occaſion of a new noiſe. For when they ſaw him comming, they coniectured that which was not true, but notwithſtanding which they all wiſhed for, that the king by that meſſenger had ſent his vncle pardon: and therfore with great reioiſing and caſting vp their caps, they cried out; Pardon, pardon is come: God ſaue the king. Thus this good duke, although he was deſtitute of all mans helpe, yet he ſaw before his departure, in how great loue and fauour he was with all men. And trulie I doo not thinke, that in ſo great ſlaughter of dukes as hath beene in England within this few yeares, there was ſo manie weeping eies at one time: and not without cauſe. For all men did ſee in the decaie of this duke, the publike ruine of all England, except ſuch as indeed perceiued nothing.] The duke in the meane time ſtanding ſtill, both in the ſame place and mind wherin he was before, ſhaking his cap which he held in his hand, made a ſigne vnto the people that they ſhould keepe themſelues quiet: which thing being doone, & ſilence obteined, he ſpake to them the ſecond time in this maner.

The like ſtorie you ſhall read of Caius Marius in Valerius Maximus the ſecond booke and fift chapter.

The great fauour of the people to the duke of Summerſet.

The ſecond ſpeech of the duke of Summerſet to the people.

DEerelie beloued friends, there is no ſuch matter in hand, as you vainlie hope or beleeue. It ſeemeth thus good to almightie God, whoſe ordinance it is meet & neceſſarie that we be all obedient vnto. Wherfore I praie you all to be quiet, and without tumult: for I am euen now quiet, and let vs ioine in praier vnto the Lord, for the preſeruation of our noble king, vnto whoſe maieſtie I wiſh continuall health, with all felicitie and abundance & all maner of proſperous ſucceſſe: wherevnto the people cried out, Amen. Moreouer, I wiſh vnto all his councellors the grace and fauour of God, whereby they may rule althings vprightlie with iuſtice, vnto whome I exhort you all in the Lord to ſhew your ſelues obedient, the which is alſo verie neceſſarie for you, vnder the paine of condemnation, and alſo moſt profitable for the preſeruation and ſafegard of the kings maieſtie. And forſomuch as heretofore I haue had oftentimes affaires with diuers men, & that it is hard to pleaſe euerie man that hath béene offended or iniuried by me, I moſt humblie require and aſke them forgiueneſſe: but eſpeciallie almightie God, whome throughout all my life I haue moſt gréeuouſlie offended. And vnto all other, whatſoeuer they be that haue offended me, I doo with my whole heart forgiue them.

And once againe (dearelie beloued in the Lord) I require that you will kéepe your ſelues quiet and ſtill, leaſt thorough your tumult you might cauſe me to haue ſome trouble, which in this caſe would nothing at all profit me, neither be anie pleaſure vnto you. For albeit the ſpirit be willing and readie, the fleſh is fraile and wauering, and thorough your quietneſſe I ſhall be much more the quieter: but if that you fall vnto tumult, it will be great trouble & no gaine at all vnto you. Moreouer, I deſire you to beare me witneſſe, that I die héere in the faith of Ieſus Chriſt, deſiring you to helpe me with your praiers, that I maie perſeuere conſtant in the ſame vnto my liues end.

Doctor Cox the dukes ghoſtlie father.

Then he turning himſelfe about knéeled downe vpon his knées, vnto whome doctor Cox, which was there preſent, to counſell and aduertiſe him, deliuered a certeine ſcroll into his hand, wherein was conteined a briefe confeſſion to God. Which being read, he ſtood vp againe on his féet, without anie trouble of mind as it appeared, and firſt bad the ſhiriffes farewell, then the lieutenant of the tower, & certeine other that were on the ſcaffold, taking them all by the hands. Then he gaue the executioner monie, which doone, he put off his gowne, and knéeling downe againe in the ſtraw, vntied his ſhirt ſtrings: and then the executioner comming to him, turned downe his collar round about his necke, and all other things which did let and hinder him. Then he couering his face with his owne handkerchiefe, lifting vp his eies vnto heauen, where his onelie hope remained, laid himſelfe downe along, ſhewing no maner of trouble or feare; neither did his countenance change, but that before his eies were couered there began to appéere a red colour in the middeſt of his chéeks.

Abr. Fl. out of Iohn Fox in the Acts and Monuments.

The godlie end of the duke of Summerſet.

¶ Thus this moſt méeke and gentle duke lieng along and looking for the ſtroke, bicauſe his doublet couered his necke he was commanded to riſe vp and put it off: & then laieng himſelfe downe againe vpon the blocke, and calling thriſe vpon the name of Ieſus, ſaieng: Lord Ieſu ſaue me, as he was the third time repeating the ſame, euen as the name of Ieſu was in vttering, in a moment he was bereft both of head and life; and ſlept in the Lord Ieſus, being taken awaie from all the dangers and euils of this life, and reſting now in the peace of God: in the preferment of whoſe truth and goſpell he alwaies ſhewed himſelfe an excellent inſtrument and member, and therefore hath receiued the reward of his labours. Thus gentle reader thou haſt the true hiſtorie of this worthie and noble duke, and if anie man report it otherwiſe, let it be counted as a lie.]

The duke of Summerſet deſcribed.

This duke was in high fauour and eſtimation with king Henrie the eight, of whome he receiued ſundrie high & great preferments, by reaſon that the the ſaid king had married ladie Iane his ſiſter, by whome he had iſſue king Edward the ſixt. He was not onelie courteous, wiſe and gentle, being dailie attendant at the court; but forward and fortunate in ſeruice abroad, as may well appeare in his ſundrie voiages, both into France and Scotland. He was of nature verie gentle and pitifull, not blemiſhed by any thing ſo much, as by the death of the admerall his naturall brother, which could not haue béene brought to paſſe in that ſort, without his conſent. But of this good duke (to let paſſe multitude of words) maiſter Fox hath written no leſſe trulie than commendablie, & no leſſe commendablie than deſeruedlie, and no leſſe deſeruedlie than profitablie in his hiſtorie, whereto I refer the reader for further knowledge. Neuertheleſſe of this vertuous duke by waie of application I ſaie as ſomtime one ſaid (verie aptlie as ſome thinke) of the gratious ladie *An Bullen,

Diſcite vos viui, quid dira calumnia poſsit,
Inuidia alterius vitæ comes arcta beatæ,
Et falſis linguæ commiſta venena ſuſurris.

*who as it is ſuppoſed and proued ſince (ſaith Sleidan) was vniuſtlie condemned.

The protectors of England collected out of the ancient and moderne chronicles, wherin is ſet downe the yeare of Chriſt, and of the king in which they executed that function.

The collectiõ of Frãcis Thin in the yeare 1585.

Vpon the death of this duke of Summerſet protector of England, it ſhall not be vnſitting in this place to ſet downe all the protectors (whereof I can as yet haue intelligence) and who haue béene gouernors, regents, gardians, or deputies of the realme, and of the kings perſon during his minoritie and time of his inſufficiencie of gouernement; or elſe of his abſence being out of the realme: whereof I haue made an eſpeciall title in my Pantographie of England, in which this my collection of the protectors, although perhaps I ſhall not ſet downe all (for Barnardus non videt omnia) yet it is better to haue halfe a loafe than no bread, knowledge of ſome than of none at all. Thus therefore I begin.

Guendoline.

Guendoline the daughter of Corineus duke of Cornewall (after the procurement of warre againſt hir huſband wherein he was ſlaine) was by common conſent (for that hir ſonne Madrane which ſhe had by Locrine was inſufficient by reaſon of his minoritie to gouerne the kingdome) made by the Britons ruler of the Ile, in the yeare of the world 2894, and ſo continued the ſame by the ſpace of fiftéene yéeres, vntill hir ſonne came to lawfull age.

Martia.

Martia (the widow of Guenteline the king) by reaſon that Sicilius hir ſonne was not of age conuenient to weld the ſcepter (as one being but ſeuen yeares old) obteined the gouernement both of the realme and of hir ſonnes perſon, which ſhe moſt worthilie deſerued, being a woman of rare vertue and iudgement.

Eldred.

Eldred, Ethelred, or Edred (for all theſe diuerſities are found in authors) brother to Edmund king of England, while the ſonnes of Edmund (Edwine and Edgar) were for their minorities inſufficient to diſpoſe the kingdome, was appointed protector to his nephues, in the yeare of Chriſt 940, who about ſix or ſeuen yeares after his protectorſhip tooke on him the kingdome at Kingſtone on Eaſter daie, in the yeare of Chriſt, as hath Iohn Stow 946, as others haue nine hundred fortie ſeuen.

Emma.

Emma the quéene of England, the widow of king Etheldred, and of Canutus, both kings of England iointlie, with Godwine earle of Kent had the gouernement of the realme vnder Hardiknute king of England, who began his reigne in the yeare of Chriſt 1041.

Harold.

Harold the ſonne of Goodwine at the death of king Edward the Confeſſor (which fell in the yeare of Chriſt 1066, and the thrée and twentith yeare of the ſame king) was by the teſtament of the ſaid king Edward appointed regent of the yong Edgar Atheling (named heire in the life of the ſaid Edward) and of the kingdome, after the death of king Edward, during the minoritie of the ſaid Edgar. Beſide which the like commending of the kingdome to this Harold, in reſpect of the quéenes honour, as that before of the ſucceſſours right, is ſet downe by one that liued at that time, and wrote the life of king Edward, of erle Goodwine, and of his children, in theſe words. Porrectáq; manu (meaning king Edward lieng on his death bed, and ſpeaking in the behalfe of Editha the quéene, ſiſter to this Harold) ad prædictum nutricium ſuum fratrem Haroldum; Hanc inquit cum omni regno tutandam tibi commendo, vt pro domina & ſorore vt eſt fideli ſerues & honores obſequio, vt quoad vixerit à me adepto non priuetur honore debito. Commendo pariter etiam eos, qui natiuam terram ſuam reliquerunt cauſa amoris mei, mihíque hactenus fideliter ſunt obſequuti: vt ſuſcepta ab eis ſi ita volunt fidelitate eos tuearis & retineas, aut tua defenſione conductos cum omnibus quæ ſub me acquiſiuerunt cum ſalute ad propria transfretari facias, &c. But he, when king Edward was dead, vſurped the crowne to himſelfe, and ſhortlie after loſt both his life and his kingdome.

Odo biſhop of Baieux, and William Fitzoſborne earle of Hereford.

Odo biſhop of Baieux, and William Fitzoſborne the firſt, being earle of Kent, and chiefe iuſtice of England, and the ſecond being earle of Hereford, were gouernours of the realme, in the yeare of our Lord 1067, and the firſt yeare of William the Conquerour, when he went into Normandie after the conqueſt and indifferent quieting of the realme.

Lanfranke archbiſhop of Canturburie.

Lanfranke archbiſhop of Canturburie, as appeareth by Matthew Parker, writing in this ſort in the life of the ſaid Lanfranke: Abſente Gulielmo omnia Lanfranco mandabantur, qui ſumma prudentia cuncta moderatus, proceres & plebem in officio tranquillè ſine vlla motu atque tumultu continebat, adeò vt ſi quæ defectionis ſuſpicio naſcebatur, ad eam illicò compeſcendam maximus & potentiſſimus quiſque opem & adiumentum illi imperanti præſtitit.

Sir Richard Lucie chéefe iuſtice of England.

Sir Richard Lucie knight, chiefe iuſtice of England was protector of the realme in the twelfe yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the ſecond, being the yeare of our Lord 1166, in the abſence of the king when he was in Normandie, and in the parts beyond the ſeas. Which Lucie in the thirtéenth yeare of the ſame king, being the yeare of our redemption 1167, did valiantlie reſiſt, and politikelie driue backe the earle of Bullongne inuading the realme. Hée built the abbeie of Leoſnes or Weſtwood in the pariſh of Erith in Kent (and not in Southfléet as ſome haue written) in the yeare of Chriſt 1178, being about the foure and twentith yeare of king Henrie the ſecond; and further built the caſtell of Angier in Eſſex, in the dioceſſe of the biſhop of London. He had iſſue Godfreie biſhop of Wincheſter, and thrée daughters, who after the death of Godfreie their brother were his heires: the eldeſt daughter of which ſir Richard Lucie, was maried to Robert the firſt called Fitzwater: the ſecond daughter Auelina, was maried to Riuers, of whome iſſued Iohn de Riuers: the third daughter Roſe, was maried to Richard Warraine, ſon to king Iohn, as appeareth by a déed (belonging to my ſelfe, who had the rectorie of Leoſnes) beginning thus: Roſa de Douer quondam vxor venerabilis viri Richardi filij regis de Chilham.

Hugh Pudſie biſhop of Durham.

Hugh Puſaz de Puteaco or Pudſie, nephue to king Stephan, being biſhop of Durham, and erle of Northumberland, and William Longchampe biſhop of Elie, had the gouernement of the realme for Richard the firſt, vpon his departure forth of the realme to take his iournie into the holie land. For in his abſence he appointed this Hugh to haue the rule of the north parts, as chiefe iuſtice & warden of the realme from Humber to Scotland, deliuering to him alſo the kéeping of the caſtell of Wincheſter, the other parts of the realme, with the cuſtodie of the tower, he aſſigned to the gouernement of William Longchampe biſhop of Elie, whome he made chiefe iuſtice and warden of thoſe eaſt, ſouth and weſt parts, making him alſo his chancellour: who being a man of great diligence and knowledge in the adminiſtration of things, was yet verie factious and deſirous of rule, honour and riches, farre aboue all meaſure. And with theſe two biſhops hée linked in authoritie by commiſſion Hugh lord Bardolph, William Marſhall the great, earle of Chepſtow Strigull or Penbroke, Geffreie Fitzpeter, and William Brewer, barons, men of great honor, wiſdome & diſcretion. This the king did in the yeare of Chriſt 1190, and the firſt yeare of his reigne.

Walter de Conſtantijs archbiſhop of Roane.

Walter de Conſtantijs ſometime chancellor of England, biſhop of Lincolne, and now archbiſhop of Roane, vpon the miſdemeanor of the proud biſhop of Elie William Longchampe, about the yeare 1192, had the cuſtodie and gouernement of the realme committed vnto him, whileſt king Richard the firſt remained ſtill in the holie warres: who being called from that place in the yeare of Chriſt 1193 (with Eleanor mother to the king) to come to king Richard then impriſoned in Auſtria, the archbiſhop of Canturburie Hubert ſuccéeded him in the yeare 1194, whome the ſaid archbiſhop of Roane procured to be inſtalled in the ſée of Canturburie, which Walter de Conſtantijs (as hath Eueresden) was made biſhop of Lincolne in the yeare 1183, and the next yeare after biſhop of Roane.

Hubert archbiſhop of Canturburie.

Hubert Walter, or Walter Hubert (for ſuch a tanſmutation of the name is vſed amongſt hiſtoriographers) was made (vpon the diſcharge and going of Walter archbiſhop of Roane beyond the ſeas to king Richard) gouernor and protector of the realme, before the returne of Richard the firſt into England after the ſaid kings impriſonment (by the duke of Auſtria and the emperour) procured by Sauaricus biſhop of Glaſtenburie and Welles, a kinſman to the emperor, wherof our moderne printed chronicles nor our ancient writers, except one, make any mention. This Hubert died at his manor of Tenham, and was buried at Canturburie in the ſouth wall, in the yeare of our redemption 1205, the third ides of Iulie, being the ſeuenth yeare of king Iohn.

Eleanor the widow of Henrie the ſecond.

Eleanor widow to Henrie the ſecond, and mother to Richard the firſt, was made protectreſſe of England, after the departure of hir ſon into France, when he had béene deliuered out of priſon: in which office ſhe continued during the life of hir ſonne, which he ended in Poitiers in thoſe French warres, by a hurt receiued from one that diſcharged a croſſebow againſt him, on a fridaie as he beſieged Chalons. Touching whoſe death (ſith I am now in hand with the ſame) it ſhall not be amiſſe to ſet downe ſuch ſeuerall verſes compoſed by ſeuerall men in ſeuerall ſorts, as I haue read, and are not yet made common to the world, which verſes be theſe, concerning his death and place of buriall, as hereafter followeth:

Pictauus exta ducis ſepelit, tellúsque Chalucis
Corpus dat claudi ſub marmore fontis Ebraudi,
Neuſtria túq; tegis cor inexpugnabile regis,
Sic loca per trina ſe ſparſit tanta ruina,
Nec fuit hoc funus cui ſufficeret locus vnus.

Whereof alſo another compoſed theſe following verſes ſomewhat eloquentlie, as ſaith Matthew Paris (and ſo in truth they were, conſidering that age which moſtlie vſed a riming kind of Latine verſes, induced into the weſt part of the world by the barbarous Gothes) in his greater hiſtorie of the life of king Richard in manner and forme following:

Chalus quaſi caſus lucis.

Ad Chalus cecidit rex regni cardo Richardus,
His ferus, his humilis, his agnus, his leopardus,
Caſus erat lucis, Chalus per ſecula nomen
Non intellectum fuerat, ſed nominis omen
Non patuit, res clauſa fuit, ſed duce cadente
Prodijt in lucem, pro caſu lucis adepta.

Beſides which verſes of two ſeuerall men, it pleaſeth my pen to ad alſo the third mans dooing, aſwell for that the number of thrée is the holie number, as for that there is nothing ſo ſwéet, but that varietie dooth refreſh it: yet eſpeciallie ſith it is delightfull to ſée the ſeuerall inuentions of manie wits, this third poet therefore, exclaming againſt the daie in which the ſaid king Richard the firſt receiued his deaths wound (being on a fridaie) dooth thus write:

O veneris damnoſa dies! ô ſydus amarum!
Ille dies tua nox fuit, & Venus illa venenum,
Illa dedit læthum, ſed peſſimus ille dierum,
Primus ab vndecimo, quo vita victricus ipſum
Clauſit vtraq; dies: homicida tyrannide mira
Tranſigitur, clauſus excluſum, tectus opertum,
Prouidus incautum, miles inimicus inermem.

This quéene Eleanor the protectreſſe died in the yere of Chriſt 1205, being the ſeuenth of king Iohn.

Geffrie Fitz-peter earle of Eſſex.

Geffrie Fitzpeter lord Ludgerſall, who was by Richard the firſt made chiefe iuſtice of England, after the remouing of Hubert the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and was in the firſt yeare of king Iohn girded by him with the ſword of the earldome of Eſſex, was alſo protector of the realme. Who being a man of great power and authoritie, was by nature gentle, by birth noble, in the lawes cunning, in reuenues great, and to all a good iuſticer. This man was a bridle to king Iohn, to reſtreine his inſolencie; ſince he was confederat and alied in friendſhip & bloud with all the nobilitie of England: & for that cauſe was greatlie feared of the K. who ſaid of him, as he did before of the archbiſhop Hubert, that he then did fullie reigne, when they two were dead. For turning to thoſe which ſtood by him, when news was brought vnto him of the death of Fitz Geffreie, he ſware by Gods féet, that he was then king & lord of England, and not before. Which words he would not vſe, when the archbiſhop Hubert died; becauſe this man was yet liuing, whome the king (as is alreadie ſaid) greatlie feared. And therefore vpon the death of the archbiſhop, he did onelie ſaie that he began to reigne; but now vpon this mans departure out of the world, he ſaid he was become a full lord & abſolute king of England. This Geffreie Fitzpeter died in the yeare of our redemption 1212, being about the fourtéenth yeare of the reigne of the ſaid miſerablie afflicted king Iohn, who died in the yeare of Chriſt 1216: whoſe death I haue béene the willinger here to mention; becauſe I would ſet downe his epitaph (not elſe before ſet downe in our Engliſh chronicles) as I find the ſame of ancient report:

Hoc in ſarcophago ſepelitur regis imago,
Qui moriens multum ſedauit in orbe tumultum,
Et cui connexa dum vixit probra manebant,
Hunc mala poſt mortem timor eſt ne fata ſequantur.
Qui legis hæc metuens dum cernis te moriturum,
Diſcito quid rerum pariat tibi meta dierum.

This Geffreie Fitzpeter maried Beatrice, daughter and heire of William lord Saie, by whom he had iſſue, Geffreie Mandeuille earle of Eſſex, & Mawd maried to Humfreie de Bohune, by whome the Bohunes became earles of Eſſex.

William Marſhall earle of Penbroke.

William Marſhall ſurnamed the great, being erle of Penbroke, was made protector of the realme, & perſon of the king, after that the king (being nine yeares of age) was crowned in the yeare of our Lord 1216. Which office this William (being alſo marſhall of England) vſed ſo honorablie, that he recouered a great part of the nobilitie (which tooke part with Lewes ſon of the French king againſt king Iohn father to this Henrie) to aſſiſt the yoong king Henrie againſt the ſaid Lewes: who in the time of the ſaid Iohn had obteined a great part of the kingdome of England. By which meanes the ſaid Lewes was expelled, and the kingdome wholie recouered to the vſe of the ſaid yoong king Henrie the third.

This William Marſhall maried Iſabell daughter and heire to Richard Strangbow earle of Penbroke, who made him a happie father in the multitude of his children. For by hir he had fiue ſonnes, all which were in ſucceſſion marſhals of England, and earles of Penbroke; and fiue daughters. The ſonnes were William, Richard, Gilbert, Walter, and Anſelme; who all dieng without iſſue, the inheritance was deuolued to the fiue ſiſters; which were, Mawd the eldeſt, maried to Hugh Bigod, in hir right earle marſhall; Ione the ſecond, maried to Waraine Monthenſie, in hir right alſo earle of Penbroke, as hath Nicholas Triuet; Iſabell the third, maried to Gilbert de Clare earle of Gloceſter; Sibill the fourth, maried to William Ferrers erle of Darbie; & Eue the fift daughter, maried to William de Berehuſe, or de Brauſe. This William the great died in the yeare of our redemption 1219, being the third (as hath Nicholas Triuet) or the fourth (as hath Matthew Weſtminſter) yeare of the reigne of the ſaid king Henrie the third, and was buried at the new temple, on Aſcenſion daie, being the ſeuentéenth calends of Aprill: of whome was made this epitaph by Geruaſius Melckeleie, taking vpon him the perſon of the earle marſhall:

Sum quem Saturnum ſibi ſentit Hibernia, Solem
Anglia, Mercurium Normannia, Gallia Martem.

Which ſignifieth that he was a ſharpe corrector and ruler of the Iriſh, an honor & glorie to the Engliſh, a councellor and diſpatcher of the affaires of Normandie, a warlike knight and inuincible capteine againſt the Frenchmen.

Peter de la Roches.

Petrus de rupibus, or Peter of the Roch, being biſhop of Wincheſter, was after the death of William Marſhall earle of Penbroke aduanced to the protectorſhip of the king; becauſe that the yoong king was almoſt deſtitute of anie of his owne kindred that might worthilie haue the rule of his perſon. For his mother quéene Iſabell was newlie maried to Hugh Brune earle of March in France. This biſhop of Wincheſter (who was both a wiſe and a ſtout prelat) being now in poſſeſſion of the king, and miſtruſting that he had entred into a more weightie office than he might well diſcharge, if all things were not doone according to the fanſie of the nobilitie, procured diuerſe graue and honorable men to be preferred to the kings councell, and to be aſſociats to him in the adminiſtration of the weale publike; and ſo entred into the adminiſtration of his new atchiued honor. Which yet he did not long inioie.

But as the biſhop was at the firſt carefull to plant ſuch of the nobilitie about the king, for the ſupport of the realme; ſo yet himſelfe being a Gaſcoine, did after in the riper yeares of the king prefer to offices about the king ſuch Gaſcoins as both were of his owne bloud and kindred; and by their extraordinarie dealing procured the nobilitie with an hard and vndutifull courſe to oppoſe themſelues againſt the king. This Peter was aduanced to the ſeat of Wincheſter, in the yeare of our redemption 1204, being about the ſixt yeare of king Iohn. After which he went to Rome, and being a prelat more fit to fight than to preach, for Mars than for the muſes; did returne from Rome in the yeare of Chriſt 1205, being about the ſeuenth yeare of king Iohn. He remained biſhop about two and thirtie yeares, and died at his manour houſe of Fernham, on the fift ides of Iune, in the yeare of our Lord (as haue Matthew Paris and Matthew Weſtminſter) 1238, being the two & twentith yeare of Henrie the third. Who ſomewhat before his death, about the one and thirtith yeare of his biſhoprike, went into the holie land with the biſhop of Exceſter. He builded, and indued with poſſeſſions manie religious houſes: amongſt which he founded Tichfield in Hampſhire; of which Peter de la Roches, or of the rocks, Matthew Paris maketh a more large diſcourſe.

Hubert de Burow earle of Kent.

Hubert de Burow, coneſtable of Douer caſtle, earle of Kent, and chiefe iuſtice of England, being of great account in the realme for his probitie and goodneſſe, was made protector of the king and kingdome, in the yeare of our redemption 1221, being the fift yeare of king Henrie the third. This man in the yeare of Chriſt 1221 (being the ſame yeare in the which he was made protector) maried at Yorke, Margaret, ſiſter to Alexander king of Scots. And here I thinke it not amiſſe to ſaie ſomewhat touching the iſſue of this Hubert of Burow, who in a certeine nameleſſe booke (caried about in the hands of all men) treating of the nobilitie (created ſince the inuaſion of William Conqueror) is ſaid to die without iſſue: which cannot poſſiblie be ſo, if that be true which I haue ſeene: which I am led by manie reaſons to beleeue to be moſt true.

For I haue read of two children which this Hubert had, whereof the one being a ſonne, was called Richard de Burow, who was knighted by Henrie the third (as it ſeemeth to me) after the death of his father: if this Richard be not the ſame Iohn, of whome Matthew Paris writeth, that in the yeare of Chriſt 1229, Rex Anglorum Henricus, in die Pentecoſtes Iohannem filium Huberti Angliæ iuſticiarij cingulo militari donauit tertio nonas Iunij. The other child was a daughter called Margaret, maried to Richard heire to the earldome of Gloceſter, as noteth Iohn Beuer in theſe words: Richardus hæres comitis Glouerniæ Margaretam filiam Hoberti de Burgo comitis Cantiæ in vxorem accepit. This Hubert of Burow was a verie old man, who after manie perſecutions by the king, and after ſo manie chances of both fortunes, departed this world on the fourth ides of Maie, in the yeare of our redemption 1243, being the ſeuen and twentith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third at his manour of Banſtud, or Banſted. Whoſe bodie was honorablie caried to London, and there buried in the church of the frier preachers, to whom in his life he had giuen great gifts; and amongſt other things, his goodlie place which ſtood not far from the palace of earle Richard of Cornewall (as I with ſome probable reaſons coniecture) neere vnto Weſtminſter, which afterward the archbiſhop of Yorke did procure. His wife the counteſſe of Kent, being likewiſe verie old, a woman that kept verie great hoſpitalitie, and that was well beloued, died in the yeare of Chriſt 1259, being the three and fortith yeare of Henrie the third, about ſixteene years after the death of the earle hir huſband.

Walter Greie archbiſhop of Yorke.

Walter Greie archbiſhop of Yorke was made protector of the realme in this ſort. The French king hauing vniuſtlie giuen the earldome of Poitiers to his brother Adulphus; Hugh Brune earle of March (the greateſt of the nobilitie in that prouince) would not doo homage vnto Adulphus, but wrote his letters to his ſon in law king Henrie the third (whoſe mother Eleanor he had married) that if he would come into thoſe parts, he ſhould haue both aid of men, and furniture of war for the perfect reſtoring of thoſe dominions to the crowne of England. For which cauſe Henrie the third aſſembling his power, did with his brother Richard (then latelie returned frō Ieruſalem) depart the realme in the yeere of our redemption 1242, being the ſix & twentith yeare of his gouernment into Poitiers, & left the adminiſtration of the kingdome to Walter Greie archbiſhop of Yorke, whileſt he ſhould remaine in thoſe parts. Which office the ſaid archbiſhop held alſo in the yeere of Chriſt 1243, being the ſeauen and twentith yeere of king Henrie the third. Of this man is more mention made in my collection of the chancellors of England; in this place onelie further ſetting downe, that this Walter died in the yeere of Chriſt 1255, being about the nine and thirtith yeare of this Henrie the third, as hath Anonymus M. S.

Eleanor wife to king Henrie.

Eleanor daughter to Reimond earle of Prouince, wife to king Henrie the third and queene of England, with Richard earle of Cornewall the kings brother (to whoſe cuſtodie was committed Edward Longſhanks, being after king of England by the name of Edward the firſt, ſon to the ſaid king Henrie) were (in the yeere of our redemption 1253, being the ſeuen and thirtith yeere of the reigne of king Henrie the third) appointed gouernors and protectors of the realme in the kings abſence, whileſt he went into Gaſcoine, whither he went to pacifie the nobilitie, and to keepe the ſame in ſafetie from the French. And becauſe my pen hath here fallen vpon Richard earle of Cornwall, I determine to ſay ſomewhat of him in this place, not hauing other occaſion offered to me therefore. This Richard the ſon of king Iohn was borne in the yeare of Chriſt 1208, being the tenth yeare of the reigne king Iohn. He was made (and ſo called) earle of Poitiers by Henrie the third, about the ninth yeere of his reigne, in the yeere of Chriſt 1225, who alſo that yeere with his vncle William earle of Sariſburie went into Poitiers, where he was ioifullie receiued: he putteth the earle of March to flight, he recouereth that which was loſt in Gaſcoine, he went into the holie land, refuſeth the kingdome of Apulia offered vnto him, he is choſen emperor, and receiueth that honor at Colen, being there crowned king of the Romans: he ſubdued Alfonſus competitor with him for the empire, he after returneth into England: he is an enimie to Simon Montfort and the barons rebelling againſt his brother king Henrie the third; he is taken priſoner by the barons, and is afterward deliuered: he was created knight and earle of Cornwall in the yeare of our redemption 1225, as hath Matthew Weſtminſter, but as ſaith William Packington, he was created earle of Cornwall in the yeare of Chriſt 1227. He married foure wiues, if that Eliſabeth his firſt wife and Iſabell the widow of Gilbert de Clare were not all one woman. But leauing that to further knowledge, I doo for this time make them but one perſon; for ſo in truth it muſt be, whatſoeuer otherwiſe ſhall be ſhewed in miſtaking their names. Elizabeth that was his firſt wife, as noteth Leland, was buried in the queere of Belland, being that woman which is called Iſabell, and was the daughter of William Marſhall earle of Penbroke ſurnamed the great: and the widow of Gilbert de Clare earle of Gloceſter was maried to this erle of Cornwall, in the yeare of our Lord 1231 being the fifteenth yeare of king Henrie the third.

This Iſabell died in the yeare of our redemption 1240, being the foure and twentith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third, after this manner. For ſhe being great with child, and neere to the time of hir deliuerance, fell into Morbum ictericum, or the hicket, and deliuering a child into the world, which had life, and was baptiſed by the name of Nicholas, they both preſentlie died thervpon. Which thing when the earle vnderſtood being then on his iournie into Cornwall, he burſt out in teares, and greatlie lamented that loſſe. Wherefore haſtilie returning, and leauing his former iournie, he honorablie buried his wife at *Belland or Beaulen, an houſe of religion builded by king Iohn from the foundation, and repleniſhed with Charterhouſe monks.

*Bellum locum a religious houſe in Hampſhire, as is by ſome ſuppoſed.

His ſecond wife was Sinthia or Sanclia, daughter to Reimond earle of Prouince, and ſiſter to the queene of England, wife to king Henrie the third, brother to the ſaid Richard earle of Cornwall, who maried the ſaid Sinthia in the yeare of our redemption 1243, being the ſeuen and twentith yeere of the reigne of king Henrie the third. Leland alſo appointeth to him the third wife, which was Beatrix de Famaſtais, whom he calleth queene of Almaine, & wife to king Richard, brother to Henrie the third. Which ladie died in the yere of our redemption 1277, being the ſixt yeere of Edward the firſt, and was buried at the friers minors in Oxford. This noble Richard erle of Cornwall died in Februarie at Berkhamſted, in the yeare of Chriſt 1271, in the fiue and fiftith yeare of king Henrie the third, as ſaie Matthew Paris and Matthew Weſtminſter: but Nicholas Triuet referreth his death to the yeare 1270, being the foure and fiftith yeere of Henrie the third: and the chronicle belonging to Eueſham to the yeare 1272, being the ſix and fiftith yeare of Henrie the third. After whoſe death his hart was buried in the friers minors of Oxford, and his bodie committed to the earth in the monaſterie of Hales (being Charterhouſe monks) which he had builded at his charge of 10000 marks, which at this daie at fiue ſhillings the ounce of ſiluer amounteth to the ſumme of twentie thouſand pounds. He had two ſonnes, the one called Henrie by his firſt wife Iſabell; the other called Edmund de Almania by his ſecond wife Sinthia. Henrie was ſlaine by Simon and Guie of Montfort ſonnes of the laſt Simon Montfort earle of Leiceſter, in the life of his father Richard in Italie at Viterbo, in the yere of our redemption 1270. Which fact being doone in ſaint Syluesters church as he was at maſſe, occaſioned the towneſmen to paint the maner of his death on the wall of the church: and that picture being beheld by a certeine verſifier, he was vrged therevpon to compoſe theſe following verſes:

Regis Theutonici Richardi clara propago,
Sternitur Henricus, velut hæc deſignat imago,
Dum redit à Tripoli, regum fultus comitiua,
In crucis obſequio patitur ſub gente nociua,
Irruit in templum, poſt miſſam, ſtirps Guenelonis
Perfodit gladius hunc Simonis atque Guidonis,
Diſpoſuit Deus vt per eos vir tantus obiret,
Ne reuocatis his, gens Anglica tota periret,
Anno milleno Domini cum ſeptuageno,
Atque duceno, Carolo ſub rege ſereno,
Vrbe Viterbina fit in eius carne ruina,
Cæli regina precor vt ſit ei medicina.

His bones were brought into England, and buried in the monaſterie of Hales, where his father was after alſo buried: but his hart was beſtowed in a guilt cup, and placed beſide the chaine of ſaint Edward the Confeſſor in Weſtminſter abbeie. The other ſonne to this Richard earle of Cornwall was Edmund of Almaine, who after the death of his father was inueſted with the honor of the earledome of Cornwall, being borne at Berkhamſted in the yeere of our redemption 1250, being the foure and thirtith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third, to whome his vncle Bonifacius biſhop of Canturburie was godfather, and called him Edmund in the honor of ſaint Edmund archbiſhop of Canturburie and Confeſſor. This Edmund earle of Cornwall married the daughter of Richard earle of Clare, of whome ſhall be more ſpoken when we come to treat of him as protector of England.

Boniface archbiſhop of Canturburie.

Boniface the archbiſhop of Canturburie, with others which follow, were protectors of the realme after this maner, as I haue gathered. It was ordeined in the parlement at Oxford called Parlementum inſanum, that the king ſhould chooſe forth twelue perſons of the realme, and the communaltie of the land other twelue, the which hauing regall authoritie in their hands, might as gardians of the kingdome take in charge vpon them the gouernment of the realme, & ſhould from yeare to yeare prouide for the due election of iuſtices, chancellors, treaſurors, and other officers, and further prouide to ſee to the ſafe keeping of the caſtels belonging to the crowne.

Theſe foure and twentie perſons appointed to that function, began to order all things at their owne pleſure: in the meane time not forgetting to vſe things chieflie to their owne aduantage, as well in prouiding excheats and wards for their children and kinſfolks, as alſo in beſtowing of patronages of churches belonging to the kings gift, vnto their owne liking. So that theſe prouiders which ſhuld haue made carefull and beneficiall prouiſions for the realme, made ſpeedie and plentifull prouiſion for them and theirs, inſomuch that neither king nor Chriſt could get anie thing from theſe protectors. There be that write, how that there were but twelue or thirteene choſen to be gouernors at this time (which for this preſent I deeme to be the truer opinion) whoſe names are as follow: Boniface archbiſhop of Canturburie, the biſhop of Worceſter, Roger Bigod earle of Norffolke and marſhall of England, Simon de Montfort earle of Leiceſter, Richard de Clare earle of Gloceſter, Humfreie Bohune earle of Hereford, Richard Fitzalane earle of Arundell, ſir Iohn Manſell chiefe iuſtice of England, ſir Roger lord Mortimer, ſir Hugh Bigod, ſir Peter de Sauoie, ſir Iames Audleie, & ſir Peter de Montfort. To theſe (as ſome ſaie) was authoritie onlie giuen to puniſh all ſuch as treſpaſſed in the breach of anie of the conſtitutions of the parlement of Oxford. Others ſay that they were made rulers & protectors of the realme, and to diſpoſe thereof, becauſe the king was much miſſeled in the gouernment of the kingdome by the peruerſe councell of his flatterers. Which twelue gouernors I ſuppoſe did not long continue: for being euerie one priuatlie for himſelfe, and ſo not iointlie for the common-wealth, they grew diuided, and what the one labored to ſet vp, the other ſought to pull downe.

Boniface archbiſhop of Canturburie.

Boniface archbiſhop of Canturburie the ſecond time, & the biſhop of Worceſter, with ſir Philip Baſſet, or rather ſir Hugh Bigod made chiefe iuſtice of England by the barons, were appointed in the yeere of our redemption 1260, being the fortie and fourth of king Henrie the third, to haue the gouernment of the realme in the abſence of the king, whileſt he remained in France at Paris about the affaires of Normandie: at what time a peace was made betweene the kings of England and France.

Gilbert de Clare.

Gilbert de Clare the ſecond of that name that was earle of Gloceſter and Hertford, was the ſonne of Richard de Clare erle of Gloceſter and Hertford, which died in the yeere of our redemption 1262, being the fortie & ſixt yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third, and was buried at Tewkeſburie, with a great image of ſiluer and gilt vpon his toome, and the ſame ſword and ſpurres which he did weare in his life time. Of which Richard theſe verſes were compoſed for his probitie and rareneſſe of vertuous maners and conditions, and ſet vpon his tombe:

Hic pudor Hyppoliti, Paridis gena, ſenſus Vlyſsis,
Aeneæ pietas, Hectoris ira iacet.

This Gilbert (I ſaie) the ſonne of the ſaid Richard was after the death of Henrie the third (which happened in the yeare of our Lord 1277, & in the ſeuen & fiftith yeare of the reigne of the ſaid king Henrie) in the abſence of king Edward the firſt in the holie warres made gouernour of the realme, vntill the returne of the ſaid king Edward into England, to which function he was appointed by king Henrie the third, lieng on his death-bed: who cauſed the ſaid Gilbert to ſweare to kéepe the peace of the land to the behoofe of Edward his ſonne. Which he did moſt faithfullie, vntill the ſecond daie of Auguſt, in the ſecond yeare of the ſaid king, in which the ſaid king Edward landed in England, being in the yeare of our redemption 1274, at what time the king was honorablie interteined of the ſaid Gilbert, and Iohn earle of Warraine (a ſupporter to him in the charge of the kingdome) at the caſtell of Tunbridge in Kent, and Rigate in Surrie, which Gilbert with the other péers of the land, immediatlie after the death of king Henrie the third, aſſembling at the new temple brake the old ſeale of king Henrie, made a new ſeale in the name of king Edward, and appointed faithfull officers for the ſure kéeping and obſeruing of the treaſure, the riches, the peace, and the lawes of the kingdoms.

This Gilbert had two wiues, his firſt wife was Alice the daughter of Hugh le Brune erle of March, by whom he had iſſue a daughter, that was counteſſe of Fife in Scotland: his ſecond wife was Ione the daughter of king Edward the firſt, called Ione of Acres, by whome he had one ſonne, called Gilbert the third, earle of Gloceſter and Hertford, who married Mawd the daughter of Richard earle of Vlſter in the yeare of Chriſt 1308 at Waltham, by whome he had iſſue a ſonne, Iohn borne in the yeare of Chriſt 1312, being in the ſixt yeare of Edward the ſecond, that died without iſſue; after the death of which Gilbert the third, his lands and earldomes of Gloceſter and Hertford came to the ſiſter of the ſaid Gilbert the third, who was ſlaine in the battell of Strineling againſt the Scots in the ſeuenth (or as others haue the eight) yeare of king Edward the ſecond, whome the Scots would gladlie haue kept for ranſome if they had knowne him: but he had forgotten to put on his cote of armes to ſhew what he was, after which he was brought into England and was buried at Tewkeſburie, vpon whoſe death the two earledomes of Gloceſter and Hertford were ſo diſperſed, that there was neuer anie to this daie, that iointlie ſucceeded or poſſeſſed them both. Thus hauing digreſſed from Gilbert the ſecond, in treating of his ſonne Gilbert the third, let vs againe returne to him. He beſides his ſonne Gilbert the third, had by his wife Ione thrée daughters; Elenor, firſt married to Hugh Spenſer, ſecond ſonne to Hugh Spenſer earle of Gloceſter, and after his death to William Zouch; Margaret married to Piers de Gaueſton earle of Cornewall, and after to Hugh Audeleie; and Elizabeth or Iſabell married in the yeare of our Lord 1308, being the firſt yeare of Edward the ſecond, to Iohn the ſonne of Richard earle of Vlſter. This Gilbert the ſecond, before the marriage of his ſecond wife, was on the fiftéenth kalends of Auguſt diuorſed from Alice his firſt wife, in the yeare of our redemption 1271, being the ſix and fiftith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third; and after in Weſtminſter church the laſt of Aprill married his ſecond wife, about the eightéenth yeare of Edward the firſt being the yeare of Chriſt 1290, which Gilbert the ſecond, being taken awaie by vntimelie death, departed this world in the yeare of our redemption 1195 (being the thrée and twentith of the reigne of the ſaid Edward the firſt) who was in word & déed, in commandement and authoritie the greateſt perſon of the kingdome, next to king Edward the firſt: for which cauſe he well deſerued to haue his ſepulture among his worthie anceſtors.

Edmund erle of Cornewall.

Edmund earle of Cornewall, of whome there is ſomewhat ſpoken before, being the ſonne of Richard king of Almaine, and earle of Cornewall brother to Henrie the third, married Margaret the daughter of Richard de Clare erle of Gloceſter, he was made protector of the Realme by Edward the firſt in the fourtéenth yeare (as ſome ſaie) or in the fiftéenth, as others ſaie (for there is ſo much diſagréement amongſt authors for the accounts of yeares, as it paſſeth anie one man to reconcile them in all points) when the ſaid king went into Aragon to reconcile the two kings of Arragon & Naples. He continued in this office in the yeare of Chriſt 1287, or 1228, as hath Treuet, being the ſixtéenth yeare of Edward the firſt, in which he ſubdued Riſe ap Merdach the Welſh prince, rebelling againſt Edward the firſt, and ouerthrew the caſtell of Druſſllane (as hath the ſaid Nicholas Treuet) he was lord of Wallingford, did much coſt therevpon, and died without iſſue, as hath Matthew Weſtminſter, in the yeare of Chriſt 1300: but as hath Thomas Walſingham 1301, leauing the king of England his heire. Yet are there ſome pedegrées and other authors, and thoſe not the meaneſt, which ſaie that he had a daughter, Iſabell married to Morice Fitz Harding lord Barkleie: ſo that theſe authors, which ſaie that he died without iſſue, are to be vnderſtood of the iſſue male, & not of the heire generall: for they account him to die without iſſue, which leaueth no poſteritie to continue his title of honor. The which their meaning they make more plaine, in that they ſaie that after his iſſuleſſe death, the earledome came to the crowne. And here bicauſe there is mention made of Wallingford, I will ſet downe what Leland hath written touching the ſame, bicauſe I deſire to make common, and to preſerue all whatſoeuer monuments of Leland that come vnto my hands: thus therefore he writeth of Wallingford in his commentaries of England, written in the yeare of our redemption 1542, being the foure and thirtith yeare of king Henrie the eight in theſe words.

The towne of Wallingford hath béene a verie notable thing and well walled. The dich of the towne, and the creſt wherevpon the wals ſtand, be yet maniſeſtlie perceiued, and begin from the caſtell, going in compaſſe a good mile and more, and ſo continueth to Wallingford bridge, a large thing of ſtone ouer the Thames. There remaine yet the names of theſe ſtréets amongſt others. Thameſſtréet, Fiſhſtréet, Woodſtréet, Goldſmiths row. And by the patents and donation of Edmund earle of Cornewall and lord of the honour of Wallingford, it appéereth that there were fourtéene pariſh churches in Wallingford: and there be men yet aliue that can ſhew the places and churchyards where they ſtood, at this time there are but thrée pariſh churches. The towne and the caſtell was ſore defaced by the Danes warres, yet they méetlie floriſhed in the time of Richard king of the Romans earle of Cornewall, and brother to Henrie the third, he did much coſt vpon the caſtell which ioineth to the north gate of the towne, and hath thrée dikes (as vpon the creſts of the ſame may appéere) large and déepe, about each of the two firſt diches (on the creſts of the ground caſt out) runneth an embatteled wall now ſore in ruine, and for the moſt part defaced. All the goodlie buildings, with the tower and dungeon, be within the third dich. There is alſo a collegiat chapell amongeſt the buildings within the third dich. Edmund earle of Cornewall ſon to Richard king of Romans was the firſt founder and indower of this college. Prince Edward the blacke (as one told me) augmented this college. There is a deane, foure prieſts, ſix clerkes, and foure choriſters. The late deane before doctor London that now is, builded a faire ſteeple of ſtone at the weſt end of the collegiat chapell, to the making whereof he defaced (as it is ſaid without licence) a peece of the kings lodging on the eaſt end of the chapell. The deane hath a faire lodging of timber within the caſtell, and to it is ioined a place for the miniſters of the chapell. Thus much Leland for Wallingford, & thus much I for Edmund earle of Cornewall and lord of Wallingford.

Edward prince of wales.

Edward of Carnaruan prince of Wales, ſonne to Edward the firſt, was in the yeare of our redemption 1295, being the fiue and twentith yeare of Edward the firſt, protector of England, in the abſence of his father in Flanders, who becauſe he was of tender yeares, had as tutors and gouernours appointed vnto him Richard biſhop of Durham (Eulogium hath the biſhop of London) William Montacute, with diuerſe other knights, as Reignold Greie, Iohn Giffard, & Alane Plunket, being wiſe, diſcreet and expert ſoldiers.

Piers de Gaueſtone erle of Cornewall.

Piers or Peter de Gaueſtone a Gaſcoine borne, whome king Edward the ſecond ſo tenderlie loued as that he preferred him before all men, was appointed gardian of the realme in the firſt yeare of the ſaid king Edward the ſecond, being the yeare of our redemption 1308, when the king went into France and there aboad to marrie Iſabell daughter to Philip king of France, before that the ſaid Edward was crowned king of England, as hath Radulphus Higden. Of this Piers I will here ſaie litle, bicauſe I haue ſpoken more largelie of him in my pantographie of England.

Iohn de Drokenſford.

Iohn de Drokenſford biſhop of Bath and Wels, was in the yeare of our redemption 1313, being the ſirt yeare of king Edward the ſecond, made protector of the realme in the abſence of the ſaid king Edward the ſecond, and his wife queene Iſabell, who went into France to ſolemnize the coronation of Philip (ſonne to Philip king of France) who was at that inſtant created king of Nauarre. This Drokenſford was the fourteenth biſhop of Bath & Wels. Great contention was there betweene him and the deane and prieſts of that church. He ſucceeded in the biſhoprike Walter Houelſhaw. This Drokenſford held the biſhoprike about nineteene yeares, he beautified the ſame with manie goodlie buildings, procured manie priuileges vnto it, and greatlie exalted his kindred. He was buried at Welles before the high altar of ſaint Iohn Baptiſt.

Henrie Lacie earle of Lincolne.

Henrie Laſcie or Lacie earle of Lincolne, and of Saliſburie, baron of Halton and of Pontfrait, corruptlie called Pomefret, and conſtable of Cheſter, was made protector of the realme in the fift yeare of Edward the ſecond, being the yeare of our redemption 1310, whileſt the king remained in the warres of Scotland. Which Henrie died ſhortlie after in the ſame yeare, and was buried in the new worke of Paules, who carried for his armes the purple lion cõtrarie to the cote his anceſtors had borne before. This man had doone great ſeruice in the warres in the time of Edward the firſt, he married Margaret the daughter and heire of William Longeſpee earle of Saliſburie, and had by hir a daughter named Alice, married to Thomas Plantagenet earle of Lancaſter, Leiceſter, and Darbie. This Henrie (as I haue learned of other and read in Leland) had iſſue a baſtard ſonne, and hauing amongſt manie other lordſhips the manour of Grantceſter beſides Cambridge, he gaue the ſame with other lands vnto that baſtard, and commanded that the ſame Lacie ſo ſet vp in Grantceſter, ſhould for himſelfe and his ſucceſſors euer name their ſonnes and heires by the names of Henrie, which hitherto hath beene religiouſlie obſerued amongſt them. And this was the originall of the houſes of the Lacies in Grantceſter, as Leland learned of him which was then heire of thoſe lands.

Gilbert de Clare earle of Gloceſter.

Gilbert de Clare the third earle of Gloceſter of that name, after the death of Henrie Lacie, was choſen gouernour of the realme (the king being ſtill in Scotland) during the time that the king ſhuld make his abode in that countrie. Of this man ſee before in the diſcourſe of his father Gilbert the ſecond earle of Gloceſter and Hertford, and protector of the realme.

Edward prince of wales.

Edward prince of Wales and duke of Aquitane, comming out of France with Iſabell in the ſecond yeare of Edward the ſecond, his father was after his landing in England and the taking of his father made gardian of England vnder his father, which office he did not long continue: for depoſing his father from the kingdome in the yeare of Chriſt 1326 he aſſumed the crowne himſelfe in his fathers life.

walter Reinolds archbiſhop of Canturburie.

Walter Reinolds archbiſhop of Canturburie was with others appointed gardian of England on this ſort. Edward the third as before atteining to the crowne in the yeare of our redemption 1327, or as ſome others more trulie ſaie 1326, being fourteene years of age did then begin his reigne. But bicauſe he was ſo yoong (not being of power or policie to weld ſo great a charge) it was decreed in this firſt yeare of his reigne, that twelue gouernors of the greateſt lords within the realme ſhould poſſeſſe the gouernement, vntill he came to riper yeares, whoſe names were as inſueth: Walter archbiſhop of Canturburie, the archbiſhop of Yorke, the biſhop of Wincheſter, the biſhop of Hereford, Henrie earle of Lancaſter, Thomas Brotherton earle marſhall, Edmund of Woodſtocke earle of Kent, Iohn earle of Warren, the lord Thomas Wake, the lord Henrie Perſie, the lord Oliuer de Ingham, and the lord Iohn Roſſe, who were ſworne of the kings councell and charged with the gouernement of the kingdome as they would anſwere for the ſame. But this ordinance continued not long, for in the ſecond yeare of this king, Iſabell the kings mother and the lord Roger Mortimer tooke the whole rule into their hands, in ſuch ſort that the king and his councellors were in all affaires of ſtate, and otherwiſe, onelie gouerned by their direction. Of this Walter Reinolds the archbiſhop, bicauſe he was ſometime chancellor, and ſometime treaſuror, is more mention made in the large volume of the liues of the chancellors.

Iohn of Eltham earle of Cornewall.

Iohn of Eltham earle of Cornewall ſonne to Edward the ſecond, had (in the fourth yeare of king Edward the third being the yeare of our redemption 1330) the gouernement of the realme committed vnto him, whileſt king Edward the third had paſſed the ſeas onelie fifteene horſſes in his companie, apparelled in clokes like vnto merchants, which office the ſaid Iohn of Eltham executed vntill the returne of the ſaid king, and before that alſo when the ſaid Edward the third, in the ſecond yeare of his reigne, did before this time go into France to doo his homage. He was made earle of Cornewall in the ſecond yeare of ~~king~~ Edward the third, being the yeare of Chriſt 1328, and died at Barwike, others ſaie at S. Iohns towne in Scotland, in the moneth of October 1336, being the tenth yeare of Edward the third, and was honorablie buried at Weſtminſter; for the ſolemnization of whoſe buriall the king came out of Scotland about the feaſt of the Epiphanie.

Edward the Blacke prince.

Edward the Blacke prince, eldeſt ſonne to Edward the third, being about the age of nine yeares, was in the twelfe yéere of his father, being the yeare of our redenrption 1338, or as ſaith Matthew Parker 1337, made gardian of England in the abſence of his father being as then ſailed into Flanders to procure the Flemmings to aid him againſt the French king. Under which prince as ſome write (or rather as I for the time take it) equall in commiſſion to him it ſéemeth that John archbiſhop of Canturburie had the chéefeſt rule of the land, bicauſe that king Edward after his returne into England, which was about the fouretéenth or the fiftéenth of his reigne, charged the ſaid biſhop with certeine negligences which he vſed in collections of monie, whileſt he had the chiefe rule of the land, when he was in the wars of France. Wherefore the words of Matthew Parker in the life of the ſaid John Stratford (ſaieng that the king held a parlement, in which Omnem regni curam & gubernationem archiepiſcopo cõmiſit) muſt néeds be intended that he had that charge vnder or equallie with the ſaid Blacke prince, as chiefeſt councellor to ſupport the tender yeares of his ſonne.

John Stratford.

After which alſo in the yeare of our redemption, as hath the ſame Matthew Parker 1342, being about the ſixtéenth of the ſaid Edward the third, the king committed the care & gouernement of the kingdome to the ſaid archbiſhop, whileſt the king was beyond the ſeas in the warres: for thus writeth the ſaid Parker, fol. 257. Ac paulò poſt nulla purgatione indicta (ſpeaking of the ſaid biſhop vniuſtlie accuſed to the king) aut recepta, omnibus penè parlamenti ordinibus pro archiepiſcopo deprecantibus, rex eum ſua ſponte legitimè purgatum & excuſatum pronuntiauit, eúmque multo magis charum quàm antè habuit, omnibúſque gerendis in Anglia rebus ſe in militia abſente præfecit. Of which archbiſhop being ſomtime chancellor and treaſuror of England ſhall be ſet downe a more large diſcourſe in my large booke of the liues of the chancellors.

Lionell duke of Clarence.

Lionell third ſonne to Edward the third, was in the ninth yere of the reigne of the ſaid king Edward the third, being the yeare in which the word became fleſh 1345, made gardian of England, in the abſence of his father, who as then was ſailed into the parts (beyond the ſeas) of Flanders. Of this man there is more ſpoken in my following treatiſe of the dukes of England.

Henrie lord Perſie.

Henrie lord Perſie, & Rafe lord Neuill, when Edward the third was ſailed into Normandie, were in the twentith yere of the reigne of the ſaid Edward the third, being the yeare of our redemption 1346, appointed to be gardians of the realme in his abſence with the archbiſhop of Yorke, the biſhop of Lincolne, and Thomas Hatfield biſhop of Durham.

Thomas of Woodſtocke.

Thomas of Woodſtocke being verie yoong was made cuſtos or gardian of England, in the yere that God tooke on him the forme of a ſeruant 1359, being the thrée & thirtith of the reigne of the ſaid king Edward the third, when he ſailed into France with a 1100 ſhips. Of this man is more ſpoken in my diſcourſe of the dukes of England, ſet downe in the time of quéene Elizabeth: and in my treatiſe of the coneſtables of England, ſet downe in the time of Henrie the eight pag. 867.

John of Gant duke of Lancaſter.

John of Gant duke of Lancaſter, fourth ſonne of Edward the third, bicauſe the king his father was féeble and ſicklie (being now about thrée ſcore & fiue yeares of age, though Bodinus in his Methodo hiſtoriæ ſaie that he died in his climactericall yeare of thrée ſcore and thrée: for the truth is, that the ſaid Edward the third was fourtéene yeares old when he began to reigne, and he reigned about one and fiftie yeares, which make of his age thrée ſcore and fiue yeares) but eſpeciallie for the ſorrow which the king inwardlie conceiued for the death of that worthie prince his ſon, commonlie ſurnamed the Blacke prince. This John of Gaunt (after the death of the ſaid Blacke prince, which died in the yeare of Chriſt 1376, being the fiftith yeare of the reigne of Edward the third, whoſe death was déemed to be haſtned by the ſaid John of Gaunt aſpiring to the crowne, the plat whereof though it tooke not effect in the life of the ſaid John, yet it was performed in his ſonne Henrie of Bullingbrooke, who depoſed Richard the ſecond) was appointed by his father Edward the third to haue the rule of the realme vnder him, the which he continued during his fathers life, which was not a full yeare after that he had made the ſaid John of Gaunt gouernour of England. After which death of king Edward the third, when Richard the ſecond, a child of eleuen yeares of age began his reigne, in the yeare of our redemption 1377, in the firſt yeare of the ſaid Richard the ſecond, after his coronation, the ſaid John of Gaunt duke of Lancaſter, & Edmund of Langleie earle of Cambridge brother to the ſaid John of Gaunt, were appointed to haue the gouernement of the kings perſon, and the adminiſtration of the common-wealth. But ſhortlie after, in the ſame yere of the king, in the yeare of our redemption 1378, the ſaid John of Gaunt gaue vp the ſame office. Of this man is more ſaid in my treatiſe of the dukes of England.

William Courtneie biſhop of London.

William Courtneie biſhop of London (but ſhortlie after his protectorſhip aduanced vnto the ſée of Canturburie, in the yeare of Chriſt 1381, about the ninth of Januarie, being about the fourth of Richard the ſecond, was made gouernor of the realme in this maner. After (as is before ſaid) that the duke of Lancaſter had wiſelie weied the fickle eſtate of the realme, and conſidered that by the euill gouernment of the nobilitie, and inconſtant mind of the yoong king, there muſt néeds fall a change of the eſtate, & doubting that if any thing ſuccéeded otherwiſe than the nobles liked, the cauſe and negligence might be imputed to him, as one who chéeflie had the gouernment in his hands (and thanks howſoeuer the ſtate was ruled he looked for none) did in the end after a few months authoritie (wholie miſliking the maners of the court, which commonlie are not of the beſt in the minoritie of princes) ſurrender his protectorſhip, and obteined licence of the king to depart, and ſo got him quietlie to his caſtell of Kenelworth, permitting others to haue the whole ſwaie of the kingdome.

Notwithſtanding all which, in the ſecond yeare of Richard the ſecond, about the yeare of Chriſt 1379 being not altogither careleſſe of the kings well doing; this duke before his departing to Kenelworth, cauſed certeine graue perſons with his full conſent, to be ordeined, which ſhould haue the gouernement of the kings perſon, and adminiſtration of the common-wealth. The names of whome were, William Courtneie before mentioned, Edmund Mortimer earle of March, Rafe Ergume biſhop of Saliſburie, and William lord Latimer, with others, of whome for the moſt part the people had conceiued a good opinion: yet bicauſe the ſaid biſhop of Saliſburie, and the lord Latimer were aſſociat to the reſt, and of equall authoritie with them, the commons murmured greatlie againſt them. The cauſe for which they ſo miſliked the lord Latimer, was for that he had ſometimes bin too much fauouring to dame Alice Piers, concubine to king Edward the third, to whome the ſaid lord Latimer was chiefe chamberleine, & therefore was of him beſt beloued, which two perſons, the lord Latimer, and dame Alice, were by parlement in the fiftith yeare of Edward the third remoued from the king, for that they miſcounſelled him, but eſpeciallie ſith much miſchiefe grew in the realme by the ſame Alice Piers. For ſhe being now exalted in pride by ouermuch loue of K. Edward the third, would beyond the modeſtie and maner of women, ſit in iudgement with the kings iuſtices, be with the doctors in the conſiſtorie, turne ſentences to what ſide ſhe would, and require manie things diſhoneſt in themſelues, and diſhonourable to the king. Of which woman, an old written chronicle belonging to the houſe of Eueſham, hath deliuered to me theſe words: Alicia Piers regis concubina ſupra modum mulierum nimis & ſupergreſſa, ſui etiam ſexus & fragilitatis fœmineæ immemor, nunc iuxta iuſticiarios regios nunc in foro eccleſiaſtico iuxta doctores ſedendo, & pro defenſione cauſarum ſuadere, & etiam contra iura poſtulare minimè verebatur, vnde propter ſcandalum petierunt ab illo (which was the king) penitùs amoueri in parlemento tento anno Domini 1376 & 50 *Ed.*3. Thus that author.

And here before I go anie further with my protectors, bicauſe ſome curious heads that find not all theſe matters in the records of the tower, which they dailie turne with a churliſh hand, or elſe thinke that nothing maie be knowne out of the walles of their office, will ſéeme to ſéeke a knot in a ruſh, and ſaie that I in compaſſe of ſome few lines haue written a contrarietie, in ſaieng that Iohn of Gaunt thirſted after the kingdome, and for that cauſe haſtened the death of his elder brother prince Edward the blacke as Richard the third did the death of his brother George duke of Clarence, which intent could not poſſiblie be in Iohn of Gaunt, as appeareth by my owne following words: where I ſaie that he gaue ouer the protectorſhip of his nephue, bicauſe he would auoid all ſuſpicion of euill gouernement: which hée would neuer haue done if he had ſo ment, that place being ſo apt for the execution of his purpoſe, and might giue occaſion to him that neuer ment anie ſuch matter before, to attempt it being in that place, as Richard duke of Yorke did attempt, but not performe it, in the time of Henrie the ſixt; and as Richard duke of Glouceſter, being in the ſame office of protectorſhip, did not onelie attempt it, but brought to perfection. Wherevnto I anſwer, that all this is no contrarietie, but onelie a manifeſt ſhew and confirmation, the one part of my words to the other. For ſith he could not in the life of his father Edward the third before the crowning of king Richard the ſecond (as Richard the third did) atteine the crowne, he would not now attempt it (the king being once crowned, and in full poſſeſſion of the kingdome) ſo raſhlie and vnaduiſedlie (as did Richard duke of Yorke againſt Henrie, for which he was in the end ſlaine) leaſt that thereby his part might ſéeme to carie the face of a rebellion, as in truth it ſhould haue done. For whoſoeuer either for colour of God, benefit to their countrie, or for whatſoeuer cauſe, lift vp the ſword againſt a crowned king, ſitting at the ſterne of gouernement, being one of the gods of the earth, the ſame muſt néeds tend vnto a rebellion, which Iohn of Gaunt would not ſéeme to execute, & for that cauſe leauing off his purpoſe at that time, he did in the end alſo leaue the whole matter to his ſon to performe, eſpeciallie ſith he afterward perceiued Richard the ſecond ſo much to fauor and further him with monie, munition, and men, to recouer the kingdome of Caſtile & Arragon in Spaine, in the right of the wife of the ſaid Iohn of Gaunt. To whom and to his wife (as hath Henrie Knighton) king Richard the ſecond gaue a ſeuerall crowne of gold to honour them withall, & to ſhew how intierlie he loued them when they both went into Spaine. And for theſe cauſes the ſaid Iohn of Gaunt refuſed the opportunitie of time & place in the king his nephues minoritie to execute it. But did he ceaſe it for? No. For that ſparke although it were a litle cooled, was not vtterlie quenched, bicauſe he haſtened the ſame in his ſon, whom he not onelie perſuaded, but furthered (after the baniſhment of his ſaid ſonne Henrie of Bullingbrooke by Richard the ſecond in the life of the ſaid Iohn of Gaunt) to returne into England, and after his death to chalenge by ſword the earldome of Lancaſter his right inheritance, and vnder the ſame to reuenge the death of the duke of Glouceſter and others: and by that means, when Richard the ſecond was out of the realme of England in Ireland, the ſaid Henrie Bullingbrooke ſonne of Iohn of Gaunt entered the realme, put downe the king, and got the crowne which his father ſought. Thus this much digreſſing from the protectors, and to returne to that courſe which I haue in hand, I will leaue the diſcourſe of policies to obteine kingdoms, bicauſe they be no balles for me to bandie, and follow on my former intent as méeter for my ſimplicitie.

Thomas Beauchampe earle of Warwike.

Thomas Beauchampe earle of Warwike was in the third yeare of Richard the ſecond, being the yeare of our redemption 1380, made protector in this ſort. In the parlement holden the ſame yeare, at the ſpeciall ſute of the lords, and of the commons, the biſhops and barons choſen (as you haue heard) before by Iohn of Gaunt to be protectors of the realme, were remoued, and the earle of Warwike eſpeciallie elected to that function, to remaine continuallie with the king as chéefe gouernor of his roiall perſon; & one that ſhould giue anſwer to all forreners repairing thither, vpon what cauſe ſoeuer their comming were; hauing further as ample gouernment of the kingdome giuen vnto him, as the other remoued gouernors had. Being placed in that office by the duke of Lancaſter, he died the ſixt ides of Aprill, in the yeare of Chriſt 1401, being the third yeare of Henrie the fourth. He maried Margaret, the daughter of William lord Ferrers of Grobie; by whome he had iſſue, Richard earle of Warwike.

Thomas Arundell biſhop of Elie.

Thomas Fitzalane otherwiſe called Arundell biſhop of Elie, the two and twentith that inioied that ſeat, being two and twentie yeares of age, and the ſon of Richard Fitzalane earle of Arundell & Warren, was with others made protector of England in this ſort. At a parlement holden at London in the tenth yeare of Richard the ſecond, being the yeare of Chriſt 1386, were certeine gouernors of the kingdome elected, becauſe the treaſure of the realme had béene imbeſiled & lewdlie waſted, nothing to the profit of the king and kingdome, by the couetous and euill gouernment of the depoſed officers, which were Michaell de la Poole earle of Suffolke lord chancellor, Iohn Forham biſhop of Durham lord treaſuror, & diuerſe other perſons that ruled about the king.

Now the gouernors elected by this parlement were in number thirtéene; and by name Thomas Arundell biſhop of Elie, then made lord chancellor; Iohn Gilbert biſhop of Hereford made lord treaſuror; and Nicholas abbat of Waltham at that time made kéeper of the priuie ſeale; William Courtneie archbiſhop of Canturburie, Alexander Neuill archbiſhop of Yorke, Edmund Langleie duke of Yorke, Thomas of Woodſtocke duke of Glouceſter, William biſhop of Wincheſter, Thomas biſhop of Exceſter, Richard Fitzalane erle of Arundell, Iohn lord Deuereur, and Reinold lord Cobham of Starborow. Theſe were thus by parlement choſen to haue vnder the king the whole ouerſight and gouernment of the realme, as by their commiſſion in the ſtatutes of the tenth yeare of the ſaid Richard the ſecond it dooth in the printed booke appeare.

Edmund of Langleie duke of Yorke.

Edmund Langleie duke of Yorke, vncle vnto Richard the ſecond, was in the eighteenth yeare of the ſaid Richard, being about the yeare of our redemption 1395, ordeined lord gardian of England, in the kings abſence in the realme of Ireland. This protector cauſed a parlement to be aſſembled at Weſtminſter: where he dealt ſo effectuallie, notwithſtanding the vntowardneſſe of the burgeſſes, that a tenth was granted by the cleargie, and a fifteenth by the temporaltie; but not without proteſtation, that thoſe paiments were granted of a meere freewill, for the loue they bare to the king, and to haue the affaires in Ireland to ſucceed the better. After this, about foure yeares; king Richard the ſecond in the two and twentith yeare of his reigne, in the yeare of Chriſt 1399, making another viage into Ireland (being the laſt and moſt vnhappie that euer was to him, for before his returne he had in effect loſt his realme, which after his comming he loſt in deed) did againe in his abſence ſubſtitute this Edmund duke of Yorke as cheefe gouernor of England. Who in the abſence of the king, aſſembled a power of men againſt Henrie of Bullingbroke, now entered into the land to challenge the dukedome of Lancaſter after the death of his father Iohn of Gaunt, and vnder that colour to vſurpe the crowne. Which Edmund paſſing into Wales in the three and twentith yeare of Richard the ſecond, was receiued into the caſtell of Barkleie, & there remained vntill the comming of Henrie of Bullingbroke. Whom when he perceiued (for the power which the ſaid duke of Lancaſter had aſſembled from all parts of the realme) that he was not of ſufficiencie to reſiſt; he came forth into the church that ſtood without the caſtell, and there fell to parlee with the duke of Lancaſter; after which he did neuer forſake the duke of Lancaſter, vntill he came to the crowne. Who, if he had faithfullie ſtood vnto his nephue, might perhaps haue ſaued vnto him both his crowne and life. Of this man is more ſaid in my treatiſe of the dukes of England.

Ione de Namares widow to Henrie the fourth.

Ione de Namures ſometime dutches of Britaine, (widow to Philip Montfort, as ſaith Hypodigma; but Walſingham in his hiſtorie calleth him Iohn duke of Britaine; being alſo the widow of king Henrie the fourth) was ſubſtitute gouernor of the realme by hir ſon in law king Henrie the fift, king of England, in the third yeare of his reigne, being the yeare from the birth of the Meſſias 1415, when the ſaid Henrie the fift tooke his iournie into France to conquer the ſame. This woman in the ſeuenth yeare of Henrie the fift, which was in the yeare of Chriſt 1419, being ſuſpected (as ſaith Iohn Stow) to practiſe witchcraft againſt the king, was committed to the cuſtodie of Iohn Wellam, or rather Iohn Pelham, who appointed nine ſeruants to attend vpon hir, and brought hir to Peuenſeie caſtell to be gouerned vnder his prouidence. But ſhortlie after cleering hir ſelfe, ſhe was deliuered. This ladie died at Hauering at the bowre in Eſſex the ninth of Iulie in the ſeuenteenth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the ſixt, being the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred thirtie and ſeuen, and was buried at Canturburie with hir huſband king Henrie the fourth.

Iohn de Plantagenet duke of Bedford.

Iohn duke of Bedford ſon to Henrie the fourth, & brother to K. Henrie the fift, was in the fourth yeare of the reigne of the ſaid Henrie, being the yeare of our redemption 1416, by parlement appointed regent of the realme, to inioie the ſame office ſo long as the king was imploied in the French wars. Which place he poſſeſſed accordinglie; and in the ninth yeare of the victorious prince, king Henrie the fift, being gardian of England, he, with Henrie Beauford biſhop of Wincheſter vncle to Henrie the fift, and Iaqueline duches of Holland remaining then in England, were godfathers, and godmother to Henrie, after king by the name of Henrie the ſixt, the ſon of Henrie the fift; Henrie Chichleie archbiſhop of Canturburie baptiſing the child. In the tenth and laſt yeare of Henrie the fift, this Iohn with a ſtrong power conueied queene Katharine wife to Henrie the fift, from Southampton into France. This man being duke of Bedford, earle of Richmond and of Kendall, coneſtable of England, and warden of the marches of Scotland, died the fourteenth date of September at Rone in Normandie, who (hauing alſo beene regent of France, a moſt valiant gentleman, and one that kept the parts beyond the ſeas in great obedience to the crowne of England) had for his yearelie penſion 20000 crownes at the leaſt. After whoſe death all things went backeward, and the Engliſh loſt all that they had beyond the ſeas, Calis, & thoſe dominions onlie excepted.

This man (I ſaie) died in the yeare of our redemption 1435, being the thirteenth yeare of the vnfortunat gouernment of the depoſed king Henrie the ſixt, and was honorablie buried at Rone in our ladie church there. Touching whome it ſhall not greeue me to ſet downe the anſwer of a French king latelie in our age made to one of his nobilitie; ſaieng vnto the king (then being in the ſaid ladie church of Rone, and beholding the toome of this Iohn of Bedford) that it were conuenient that the ſame toome were defaced and pulled downe; ſince he was the onelie man that wrought the greateſt damage that euer happened vnto France. To whom the king ſaid; Hold thy peace foole, God forbid that euer we ſhould doo ſuch reproch to him being dead; whome the proudeſt of our nation durſt not looke in the face when he was liuing. This duke Iohn maried the ſecond yeare of Henrie the ſixt, in the yeare of Chriſt 1423, Anne the daughter of Iohn duke of Burgognie, who died in the tenth yeare of Henrie the ſixt, in the yeare of Chriſt 1433, after which he maried Iaques daughter to Peter earle of S. Paule in the ſame yeare, and yet died without iſſue. Of this man is mention made in my former diſcourſe of the coneſtables of England, pag. 868.

Humfreie duke of Gloceſter.

Humfreie duke of Gloceſter brother to Henrie the fift, and vncle to Henrie the ſixt, was in the tenth and laſt yeare of Henrie the fift, being the yeare of our Lord 1422, made regent of England, vpon the remouing and departure of Iohn duke of Bedford with queene Katharine, wife to Henrie the fift into France. In which yeare (happening the lamentable death of that worthie prince king Henrie the fift) the ſaid Henrie vpon his death-bed appointed this Humfreie to be protector of the realme; which he did exerciſe in the time of the minoritie of Henrie the ſixt, from the time of his firſt enterance into the kingdome. Who at that time taking vpon him that function, called vnto him graue and wiſe councellors; with whoſe ſupport he might with better honor to the realme, and benefit to the ſubiects, rule the ſhip of this kingdome, ſailing in the dangerous waues of the kings infancie. By which meanes holding the ſterne thereof, directed by the courſe of iuſtice, he did moſt honorablie during his life diſcharge the dutie of ſo weightie an office. Who in the fourteenth yeare of Henrie the ſixt, being the yeare of our Lord 1439, did with fiue hundred ſaile land at Calis, and for eleuen daies ſpoiled the low countries and ſo by Calis returned againe into England. This man in the fiue & twentith yeare of king Henrie ſixt, being the yeare of Chriſt 1447, was in his caſtell of Vies in Wilſhire, & comming from thence to the parlement was lodged in the hoſpitall, and arreſted by Iohn lord Beaumont high coneſtable of England. But on the foure and twentith daie of Februarie he died for ſorrow as ſome ſaid, and as Iohn Stow hath noted, bicauſe he might not come to his anſwer. Other write that he was murdered in the night by the quéens procurement, to the great griefe of the commons, and in time following to the vtter deſtruction of the king and the quéene. He was duke of Gloceſter, and alſo in the right of his wife duke of Holland and Zeland, earle of Penbroke, lord chamberleine of England, and protector of the realme, being highlie eſtéemed of learned men, himſelfe alſo not meanlie furniſhed with knowledge, hauing rare ſkill in aſtrologie, wherof beſide manie other things he compiled a ſingular treatiſe, obteining the name of Tabula directionum, touching whoſe death I haue read theſe verſes following in Iohn Whethamſted:

Aemula ſors varijs ſignanter honoribus altis
Cauſauit miſerè mala multos flere ruinæ,
Leſus erat Iulius, vndis merſus Ptolomeus,
Pulſus Tarquinius, exul factúſque Tydeus,
Dux nimis properè iam dictus tempora vitæ
Compleuit triſtis, heu indignatio regis
Cauſa fuit magna, maior detractio falſa,

Nam regis patruus, quamuis & proximus hæres,
Tunc fuerátque ſuus conſultor in ordine primus,
Vir prudénſque pius, vir doctus & ingenioſus,
Non tamen erubuit, nec pertimuit, ve pepercit

Et tamen vt prædo voto potiretur iniquo,

Sicque ducem falſi maculans cum proditione
Obtinuit votum, prædator erátque bonorum

Humfrie duke of Gloceſter.

Which duke Humfrie was buried at ſaint Albons, dieng without iſſue, after he had married two wiues; whereof the firſt wife was Iacoba or Iaqueline (daughter and ſole heire of William of Bauier) being then the lawfull wife to Iohn duke of Brabant then liuing, which wife this Humfrie married in England in the yéere of our redemption 1424 being the third yéere of king Henrie the ſixt, vpon which grew great warres, and Humfrie duke of Gloceſter challenged the combat of the duke of Burgognie, taking part with his couſine Iohn duke of Brabant. But in the end the duke of Gloceſter left his wife at Mons & returned into England, and ſhée vnto Gaunt, and ſo into Holland, & the combat ſtaid by means of the duke of Bedford brother to the duke of Gloceſter. But after (as it ſéemeth) the duke of Gloceſter was diuorſed from this dutcheſſe, and then married Eleanor Cobham (whome he had tenderlie loued as his paramour before that) in the yéere of our redemption 1428, being the ſixt yéere of the reigne of king Henrie the ſixt. This woman in the ninetéenth yéere of the ſaid Henrie the ſixt (vpon the taking of Henrie Bullingbrooke for practiſing necromancie, thereby to conſume the king) fled in the night to Weſtminſter for ſanctuarie, which cauſed hir to be ſuſpected of treaſon. Wherevpon Bullingbrooke confeſſing that he wrought the ſame at the procurement of the ſaid Eleanor, deſirous to know to what eſtate ſhe ſhould come vnto, the ſaid dame Eleanor did oftentimes for the ſame fact appéere before the biſhop, and in the end was conuicted. After which in the twentith of Henrie the ſixt ſhe did gréeuous penance therefore, and ſo eſcaped with hir life. And here becauſe I haue ſaid ſomewhat of Iaqueline dutcheſſe of Holland, I thinke it not amiſſe to adde a little more of hir, being a woman of great beautie, and deſire of change in performing the pleſures of the fleſh: wherefore I will ſet downe what I haue ſéene written vnder the pictures of hir and hir husband Francis in this ſort.

The ſubſcription vnder the pictures of the ladie Iaqueline, and of Francis hir husband.

Thomas Beaufort duke of Exceſter.

Thomas Beaufort duke of Exceſter (appointed to that office by Henrie the fift on his death-bed) was with Henrie Beaufort biſhop of Wincheſter great vncle to king Henrie the ſixt in the yéere of our redemption 1422, being the firſt yéere of the reigne of king Henrie the ſixt (then but nine months old) made protector and gardian of the perſon of the yoong king, to ſée him tenderlie and carefullie brought vp and inſtructed in all ſuch parts as were to be required in the perſon of a monarch. Which office he left about the fourth yéere of king Henrie the ſixt, and died on Newyéeres daie at his manor of Gréenwich in the ſaid fift yéere of Henrie the ſixt, being the yéere of our redemption 1446: he married Margaret the daughter of Thomas Neuill of Horneſbie.

Richard Beauchampe earle of Warwike.

Richard Beauchampe earle of Warwike ſon of the former Thomas Beauchampe, being beyond the ſeas, and there deputie for Iohn duke of Bedford (being regent of France) did (whileſt the ſaid regent was come ouer into England) obteine manie caſtels in his deputieſhip; who being thus imploied in the forren warres, was in his abſence out of his countrie (for his ſingular wiſdome and valor) ordeined by the thrée eſtates of the realme of England in open parlement, to be gouernor of the perſon of the yoong king Henrie the ſixt, in the place of Thomas Beaufort duke of Exceſter latelie deceaſed: which Richard did not yet forthwith haſten his returne into England, but remained in France for a ſeaſon, inlarging the ſame of his martiall exploits. This his election to the protectorſhip of the kings perſon, was in the fiſt yéere of Henrie the ſixt, being the yéere of our redemption 1426. He died in the yéere of our Lord 1439, being the ſeuentéenth yéere of the depoſed king Henrie the ſixt, at Rone in Normandie the laſt daie of Maie, as hath Iohn Stow; and the fourth of October next following his corps was honorablie conueied, as well by land as by water from Rone to Warwike, and there honorablie buried in the college of our ladie church founded by his noble anceſtors. He maried two wiues, the firſt Eliſabeth daughter and heire of Thomas lord Barkleie, by whome he had thrée daughters, Margaret maried to Iohn lord Talbot earle of Shrewesburie, Eleanor maried to Thomas lord Roſſe, and Eliſabeth married to George Neuill lord Latimer. His ſecond wife was Iſabell the daughter and heire of Richard lord Spenſer, by whome he had iſſus Henrie duke of Warwike, and Anne married to Richard Neuill earle of Saliſburie.

Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke.

Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke, ſonne to Richard earle of Cambrige, and father to Edward the fourth king of England, notwithſtanding that he made challenge to the crowne againſt Henrie the ſixt, then in poſſeſſion thereof, as heire to the houſe of Yorke, and was to be preferred before the houſe of Lancaſter; and notwithſtanding that he was by parlement appointed to weare the crowne after the death of Henrie the ſixt: yet after all this, in the thrée and thirtith yéere of the ſame king, being the yéere of our redemption 1455 (ſuch was the imperfection of the king to gouerne) he was appointed protector of the realme, ruling the ſame at his owne diſpoſition. Which office he did not long inioie, and that moſt worthilie: for the next yéere after being the foure and thirtith of king Henrie the ſixt, and the yéere of our redemption 1456, he was depriued from the ſame, and quéene Margaret wife to Henrie the ſixt tooke againe the abſolute regiment into hir hands: which duke after in the nine and thirtith of king Henrie the ſixt, being the yéere of our redemption 1460, the thirtith daie of December, being lord of Wakefield, was there with his ſonne the earle of Rutland ſlaine at the battell commonlie called the battell of Wakefield; of which I haue read theſe verſes in Whethamſted once abbat of ſaint Albons:

This was done 1561, counting the yeare to begin at Chriſtmas as ſome doo, or at Ianuarie as others doo.

Anno milleno centum quater quoque ſeno,

Conflictum grandem contra gentem borealem,
Ac proceres plures præerant quæ gentibus ipſis,
Quod docuit, quia ſors quod res fortuna ſecundat,

Ac comes inſignis ſors belli, ſors fuit ipſis
Obuia, ſicque fatis regni fuerat breuis hæres
Omen & id letum tulerat mutamine mæſtum
Deflendum multis, ius regni, ius fuit eius.

He maried Ciſlie daughter to Rafe Neuill firſt earle of Weſtmerland, by whome he had iſſue Edward duke of Yorke, earle of March, and after king of England by the name of Edward the fourth: George Plantagenet duke of Clarence, Richard Plantagenet duke of Gloceſter, after king of England by the name of Richard the third: thrée daughters, Anne maried to Henrie Holland duke of Exceſter, Eliſabeth married to Iohn de la Poole duke of Suffolke, and Margaret maried to Charles duke of Burgognie.

George Plantagenet duke of Clarence.

George Plantagenet duke of Clarence, and coneſtable of England, ſonne of the foreſaid duke of Yorke, and brother to king Edward the fourth, with Richard Neuill earle of Warwike (who ſet vp and pulled downe kings at his pleaſure) were after the flight of Edward the fourth out of England into Burgognie to his brother in law (in the tenth yeare of the reigne of the ſaid king Edward, being the yeare of our redemption 1470, when Henrie the ſixt had by their means readepted the kingdome) made gouernors of the land, which office they inioied not long. For the ſaid Edward the fourth returning into England, in the eleuenth yeare of his reigne, being the yeare of our redemption 1471, reconciled to him the duke of Clarence, did againe put downe king Henrie the ſixt, and ſlue the ſaid earle of Warwike (flieng awaie) at Barnet field (on Eaſter day) by one of the men of his campe. After this, on the fiftéenth daie of Ianuarie began a parlement, in the eightéenth yere of the reigne of king Edward the fourth, being the yeare of our redemption 1478, where this duke of Clarence was atteinted of treaſon, and the eleuenth of March following he ended his life in a but of malmeſeie, and was buried at Teukeſburie beſide his wife, who being with child died by poiſon a little before him. Of this man ſée more in my diſcourſe of the coneſtables of England pag. 869.

Richard Plantagenet duke of Gloceſter.

Richard Plantagenet third ſonne to Richard duke of Yorke, was coneſtable of England and gouernour of the perſon of the king, of whome is more ſpoken in my diſcourſe of the coneſtables of England pag. 869. But here mentioning the coneſtables of England, I thinke it better now than not at all, to mention alſo ſome imperfection and default in my former diſcourſe of the ſaid coneſtables, ſet downe by me before in pag. 865. Which default of mine in that place grew by reaſon of ouermuch haſt, which I vſed in ſudden ſéeking for the ſame, whereby (according to the old prouerbe) I brought forth a blind whelpe. For in the former deſcription I haue omitted diuerſe the which were coneſtables of England, the names of which were Henrie the firſt in the life of his father, Nigellus, and Robert de Oilie, with others of that line in deſcent, which Nigellus I can not as yet learne to be anie other but Nigellus de Oilie, brother to Robert de Oilie that came in with the Conqueror, who gaue Oxfordſhire vnto the ſaid Robert.

A digreſſion concerning the coneſtables of England not mentioned before in pag. 865.

Nigellus de Oilie coneſtable of England.

Beſides which, if it ſhall ſéeme to anie that I haue in my former treatiſe raſhlie written I know not what, & that here I make Henrie the firſt coneſtable in his father the Conquerors time, & by contrarietie therevnto did before make Walter coneſtable alſo in the Conquerors and William Rufus his time: let them know that there is no contrarietie herein. For Walter might firſt be coneſtable, & then Henrie the firſt, and both they in the Conquerors time, this office being taken from the firſt, and giuen to the latter by the Conqueror. After whoſe death William Rufus might take it from his brother Henrie, bicauſe he would not make him too great in England, for doubt leaſt he might hereby put the crowne in hazard, being fauoured of the people as one borne in England, and for that cauſe might reſtore that office to Walter. Againe it maie be, that ſome men reading that I haue before ſet downe, that Mawd the empreſſe gaue the coneſtableſhip to Milo the ſon of Walter in the ſixt of king Stephan, and that king Stephan tooke that office from Milo in the firſt yere of his reigne, and gaue it to Walter Beauchampe, will condemne me therefore of like vnaduiſed writing: bicauſe it ſéemeth thereby that Stephan tooke it from Milo before that Milo had it. Which is not ſo, for I can proue with ſome reaſon and authoritie, that Milo had it a little before the death of king Henrie the firſt, and alſo after his death in part of the firſt yeare of king Stephan, being witneſſe to a déed by king Stephan, made and dated the firſt of his reigne, to which he ſubſcribed his name Milo Conſtabularius. After which, king Stephan might in that yeare take that office from him, and ſo he did. Which Mawd the empreſſe vnderſtanding, and finding Milo (now fallen from king Stephan) one which aſſiſted hir, ſhe the better to confront Stephan, gaue the coneſtableſhip to Milo (accounting hir ſelfe as queene) in the ſixt of Stephan.

This being thus ſpoken in defenſe of that which before I haue written pag. 866. let vs go to our other matter concerning the coneſtables not mentioned before in the ſaid diſcourſe, wherein I find my ſelfe in a maruellous laberinth (out of which I doubt that the beſt antiquaries cannot looſe themſelues, no not he which thinketh and ſaith that he can controll all men, for I ſuppoſe he will be laine in this matter) how all theſe could be coneſtables, vnleſſe that in the time of Henrie the firſt, and of king Stephan, as it is moſt likelie, there was chopping & changing, putting in and taking out, ſetting vp and pulling downe one man in diuerſe yeares of one and the ſelfe ſame king: for king Stephan was ſometime a king, and ſometime as no king, and then againe a king. And ſo likewiſe was it with Mawd the empreſſe at the ſame time, bearing hir ſelfe ſometime as queene, and then deiected as no queene. But be it as it will be, I will here ſet downe what I find in ancient charters and pedegrees touching the coneſtables of England not before mentioned, leauing the ſame to others (either to order for ſucceſſion of time, or to amend for truth of matter) who peraduenture reading theſe things, which I haue ſeene and will here ſet downe, can beſtow them in better order than I can, which I earneſtlie praie them to doo, whereby truth maie be brought to light and perfection; which as yet touching theſe coneſtables ſet downe in this place, ſeemeth to be obſcured and confuſed vntill the time that Roger Fitz Miles had that office: for from his time the ſame is without all controuerſie ſufficientlie knowne. Wherefore, here before I enter into the deſcent of the de Oilies, who were coneſtables of England, I will ſet downe a ſtrange note of three perſons witneſſes to a deed, dated Primo Stephani, anno Dom. 1136, who doo all ſubſcribe their names as coneſtables. Which charter being the ſame wherein king Stephan gaue the manor of Sudton or Sutton to the houſe of Wincheſter, the ſame was amongſt other witneſſes thus ſigned, Robertus de Veer conſtabularius, Milo conſtabularius, Brientius filius comitis conſtabularius: all who could not be coneſtables of England at one time. Wherfore ſauing correction I ſuppoſe that it is out of all controuerſie, that neither the firſt nor the laſt of theſe three were coneſtables of England, but of ſome other places, as of Douer or other caſtels. And ſo to that which I haue further to ſaie of the kings coneſtables in one deſcent and ſucceſſion of the de Oilies, being tearmed the kings coneſtables, both in ancient charters and pedegrees, whereof Nigellus before mentioned ſeemeth to be one.

This Nigellus was coneſtable of England in the yeare of our redemption one thouſand one hundred and one, being the firſt yeere of king Henrie the firſt, as may appeare by a deed of confirmation made by Henrie the firſt touching the cathedrall church of Norwich, whereof I thinke good to ſaie ſomewhat to bring in the proofe that this Nigellus was conſtable. This church was built for the moſt part in the time of William Rufus, by Herebert de Loſinga the firſt biſhop of Norwich, who tranſlated the ſee from Tetford vnto Norwich, in the yeare of Chriſt 1094, which church being finiſhed and conſecrated to the holie trinitie, was afterward confirmed by Henrie the firſt, and Mawd his wife, in the firſt yeare of the ſaid Henrie, being the yeare of our redemption 1101, to the charter whereof ſigned by king Henrie & Mawd his wife, were manie biſhops, noblemen and abbats witneſſes, amongſt whome are theſe two ſet downe; Nigellus Conſtabularius, and Rogerus Cancellarius, of which Nigellus thus writeth Leland in his commentaries on the ſong of the ſwan in the word Iſidis inſulæ: Erat Roberto frater Nigellus nomine, de quo fama non admodum multa refert, which I ſuppoſe is this Nigellus de Oilie the coneſtable, as I before ſaid.

The foundation of the cathedrall church of Norwich.

Robert de Oilie conſtable of England.

Robert de Oilie, ſonne of the ſaid Nigellus, did ſucceed his father, and was as may appeare by ſome authors (who tearme him accordinglie) great conſtable of England. This man together with his wife Edith were the founders of the religious houſe of Oſneie, touching whome I ſhall not greeue to ſet downe what I haue gathered out of Leland and others. This Edith obteined of hir huſband to build a church in the Ile of Oſneie in Oxfordſhire, to our ſauiour Chriſt, about the yeare of our redemption 1129, being about the nine and twentith yeare of king Henrie the firſt, which church did after grow to be of great renowme and building, the occaſion of building whereof is ſet downe by others in this ſort. Edith being in great eſtimation with Henrie, firſt married the ſaid Robert de Oilie by the kings procurement, which Robert began the priorie of the blacke chanons of Oſneie by Oxford, amongſt the Iles made by the riuer of Iſis or Owſe. This Edith vſed oftentimes to walke out of Oxford caſtell with hir gentlewomen for to ſolace and recreate hir ſelfe. At what time at a certeine place, as often as ſhe came by the ſame, certeine pies aſſembled themſelues in a tree, where they chattered and as it were ſpake vnto hir. This ladie much maruelling at the matter, happening ſo continuallie at one time in one place after one order, and with one maner of foules, was manie times aſtoniſhed and feared therewith, eſteeming it a verie ſtrange woonder. Wherevpon ſhe ſent for one Radulph or Rafe a chanon of ſaint Freſwide in Oxford, a man of vertuous life & hir confeſſor, aſking his counſell vpon the ſame. To whom he anſwered (after that he had ſeene the order of thoſe pies onelie chattering at hir comming thither) that ſhe ſhould build ſome church or monaſterie in that place. Wherevpon ſhe intreated hir huſband to build a priorie, and ſo he did, making that Radulph the firſt prior of that houſe. All which matter, that is the comming of Edith to Oſneie, Radulph wating on hir, and the tree with the pies were all extant (at the generall diſſolution of the abbeies in the time of Henrie the eight) to be ſeene painted on the north ſide of the high altar, in the arch of the wall ouer Ediths toome in Oſneie priorie, vpon which toome there laie a ſtone image of Edith in the habit of a woweſſe holding a hart in hir right hand. This Robert de Oilie was buried in Oſneie in the verie middle of the presbiterie, vnder a flat marble ſtone; wherevpon was a flowred croſſe portraid, which Robert had iſſue Henrie de Oilie, baron of Hochnorton, & the kings coneſtable, which maried Margerie the daughter of Humfreie de Bohune, by whome that Henrie had iſſue Henrie de Oilie baron of Hochnorton, and the kings coneſtable which died without iſſue. Thus this much by waie of digreſſion, touching the coneſtables of England, left out in my former diſcourſe of thoſe officers. And ſo againe to the protectors.

The foundation of the abbeie of Oſneie or Owſneie in the yeare of Chriſt 1129, being about the thirtith yeare of Henrie the firſt, as ſome write.

Katharine the daughter of Ferdinando king of Spaine, and wife to king Henrie the eight, was (in the abſence of the ſaid king beyond the ſeas in the the warres of Turwine and Turneie) made regent of the realme, in the yeare of Chriſt 1513, and the fift yeare of king Henrie the eight, ſhe had beene the widow of Arthur prince of Wales, eldeſt ſonne vnto king Henrie the ſeauenth, and eldeſt brother to king

Katharine queene of England.

Henrie the eight, who after the death of that Arthur was by diſpenſation of the pope married to Henrie after king, by the name of Henrie the eight, being yoonger brother of the ſaid Arthur, from which king Henrie ſhe was afterward not onelie diuorſed, in the one and twentith of his reigne, being the yeare of Chriſt 1529, but after by parlement alſo in the foure and twentith of the kings reigne, in the yeare of Chriſt 1532, diſgraded from the name of quéene, and from thenſefoorth appointed onlie to be called the princeſſe dowager of prince Arthur, about fiue yeers after which ſhe died on the eight of Ianuarie, being the yeare of our redemption 1535, which was the ſeauen and twentith yeare of king Henrie the eight, and was honourablie buried in the abbeie of Peterborow, for which cauſe afterward in the generall diſſolution of the abbeies, when all thoſe houſes were ſpoiled, this abbeie was not onelie for hir buriall there ſpared and not defaced, but alſo further honored with a greater title, and turned into a biſhoprike, by the ſaid king Henrie the eight.

Katharine Par, the daughter of ſir Thomas Par, lord of Kirkbie Kendall, and wife to king Henrie the eight, was by patent made protectreſſe of the realme of England, when king Henrie the eight went in perſon to the wars of Bullongne, on the thirtéenth of Iulie in the yeare of our redemption 1544, being the ſix & thirtith yeare of the triumphant reigne of the ſaid king. This ladie Katharine being the lord Latimers widow, was maried to the king at Hampton court, one the twelfe of Iulie being the fiue and thirtith yeare of his reigne, and the yeare of Chriſt 1543, who hauing no iſſue by the king, was after the kings death married to Thomas Seimer knight, lord Seimer of Sudleie and high admerall of England.

Edward Seimer knight, vicount Beauchampe earle of Hertford, & after duke of Summerſet, was protector of the kings perſon, and of the kingdome, in the firſt yeare of king Edward the ſixt, his nephue which was in the yeare of our redemption 1546, the king being then but nine yeares old. Of this man is more ſpoken in my following diſcourſe of all the dukes of England by creation or deſcent ſince the conqueſt, with which duke of Summerſet, the laſt in office of protectorſhip, Francis Thin knitteth vp this ſimple diſcourſe of the protectors of England of the kings perſon.

Curteis, alderman of London committed to ward for vnreuerend words and ſignes to the lord chancellor.

¶ On the 17 of Februarie, on which daie were receiued the bookes of the reliefe of all the wards of London, towards the new hoſpitals, by the kings commiſſioners, the councell dined at maiſter Coopers the ſhiriffe, and after dinner maiſter Thomas Curteis alderman came thither to ſpeake with the lord chancellor for a matter he had depending afore him in the chancerie, but for his miſdemeanour in words and ſignes to the lord chancellor at that time, the ſaid maiſter Curteis was committed to ward in the Fléet.] The ſix and twentith of Februarie, ſir Rafe Vane and ſir Miles Patridge were hanged on the tower hill; & ſir Michaell Stanhope with ſir Thomas Arundell were beheaded thére. Doctor Ridleie preached before the king, mercie and charitie.

Not long after the death of the ſaid duke of Summerſet and his complices, it chanced the reuerend father in God maiſter doctor Ridleie then biſhop of London, to preach before the kings maieſtie at Weſtminſter. In the which ſermon he made a fruitfull and godlie exhortation to the rich, to be mercifull vnto the poore, and alſo to mooue ſuch as were in authoritie, to trauell by ſome charitable waie & meane, to comfort and reléeue them. Wherevpon the kings maieſtie being a prince of ſuch towardneſſe and vertue for his yeares, as England before neuer brought forth, and the ſame alſo being ſo well reteined and brought vp in all godlie knowledge, as well by his déere vncle the late protector, as alſo by his vertuous and learned ſcholemaiſters, was ſo carefull of the good gouernement of the realme, and chieflie to doo and prefer ſuch things as moſt ſpeciallie touched the honor of almightie God. And vnderſtanding that a great number of poore people did ſwarme in this realme, and chieflie in the citie of London, and that no good order was taken for them, did ſuddenlie and of himſelfe ſend to the ſaid biſhop as ſoone as his ſermon was ended, willing him not to depart, vntill that he had ſpoken with him (and this that I now write was the verie report of the ſaid biſhop Ridleie) who according to the kings commandement gaue his attendance. And ſo ſoone as the kings maieſtie was at leaſure, he called for him, and made him to come vnto him in a great gallerie at Weſtminſter, where (to his knowledge) and the king alſo told him ſo, there was preſent no mo perſons than they two, and therefore made him ſit downe in one chaire, and he himſelfe in another, which (as it ſéemed) were before the comming of the biſhop there purpoſelie ſet, & cauſed the biſhop (maugre his teeth) to be couered, and then entered communication with him in this ſort.

The verie report of biſhop Ridleie, wherin we may ſe what fruits followed vpon his ſermon: Ergo the hearing of the word preached is profitable.

First giuing him moſt hartie thanks for his ſermon and good exhortation, he therein rehearſed ſuch ſpeciall things as he had noted, and that ſo manie, that the biſhop ſaid; Trulie, trulie (for that was commonlie his oth) I could neuer haue thought that excellencie to haue béene in his grace, that I beheld and ſaw in him. At the laſt, the kings maieſtie much commended him for his exhortation for the reliefe of the poore. But my lord (ſaith he) ye willed ſuch as are in authoritie to be carefull therof, and to deuiſe ſome good order for their reliefe, wherein I thinke you meane me, for I am in higheſt place, and therefore am the firſt that muſt make anſwere vnto God for my negligence, if I ſhould not be carefull therein, knowing it to be the expreſſe commandement of almightie God, to haue compaſſion of his poore and néedie members, for whome we muſt make an accompt vnto him. And trulie my lord, I am before all things moſt willing to trauell that waie, and I

A moſt noble and vertuous ſaieng of king Edward to biſhop Ridleie.

" doubt nothing of your long and approoued wiſedome
" and learning, who hauing ſuch good zeale as wiſheth
" helpe vnto them, but that alſo you haue had ſome
" conference with others, what waies are beſt to be taken
" therein, the which I am deſirous to vnderſtand,
" and therefore I praie you ſaie your mind.

The biſhop thinking leaſt of that matter, and being amazed to heare the wiſdome and earneſt zeale of the king, was (as he ſaid himſelfe) ſo aſtonied, that he could not well tell what to ſaie: but after ſome pauſe, ſaid that as he thought at this preſent for ſome entrance to be had, it were good to practiſe with the citie of London, bicauſe the number of the poore there are verie great, & the citizens are manie & alſo wiſe; and he doubted not but they were alſo both pitifull & mercifull, as the maior & his brethren, & other the worſhipfull of the ſaid citie. And that if it would pleaſe the kings maieſtie to direct his gratious letter vnto the maior of London, willing him to call vnto him ſuch aſſiſtants as he ſhould thinke meet, to conſult of this matter, for ſome order to be taken therein, he doubted not but good ſhould follow thereof. And he himſelfe promiſed the king to be one himſelfe that ſhould earneſtlie trauell therein.

The citizens of London moued to be aſſiſtants in this charitable action.

The king forthwith not onelie granted his letter, but made the biſhop tarie vntill the ſame was written, and his hand and ſignet ſet thervnto, and commanded the biſhop not onelie to deliuer the ſaid letter himſelfe, but alſo to ſignifie vnto the maior, that it was the kings ſpeciall requeſt and expreſſe commandement, that the maior ſhould therein trauell, and as ſoone as he might conuenientlie giue him knowledge how farre he had proceeded therein. The biſhop was ſo ioious of the hauing of this letter, and that he had now an occaſion to trauell in that good matter, wherein he was maruellous zealous, that nothing could more haue pleaſed and delighted him: wherefore the ſame night he came to the maior of London, who then was ſir Richard Dobs knight, and deliuered the kings letter, and ſhewed his meſſage with effect.

The maior not onelie ioiouſlie receiued this letter, but with all ſpeed agreed to ſet forward this matter, for he alſo fauoured it verie much. And the next daie being mondaie, he deſired the biſhop of London to dine with him: and againſt that time, the maior promiſed that he would ſend for ſuch men, as he thought meeteſt to talke of this matter, and ſo he did. And ſent firſt for two aldermen and ſix commoners, and afterward were appointed more, to the number of foure and twentie. And in the end after ſundrie meetings (for by meane of the good diligence of the biſhop it was well followed) they agreed vpon a booke that they had deuiſed, wherein firſt they conſidered of nine ſpeciall kinds and ſorts of poore people, and thoſe ſame they brought in theſe three degrees:

The readines of the lord maior to prefer this good deed.

Degrees of poore.

Three degrees of poore.
- The poore by impotencie.
- Poore by caſualtie.
- Thriftleſſe poore.

1 The poore by impotencie are alſo diuided into three kinds, that is to ſaie:
- 1 The fatherleſſe poore mans child.
- 2 The aged, blind, and lame.
- 3 The diſeaſed perſon, by leproſie, dropſie, &c.

2 The poore by caſualtie are of three kinds, that is to ſaie:
- 4 The wounded ſouldier.
- 5 The decaied houſholder.
- 6 The viſited with greeuous diſeaſe.

3 The thriftles poore are three kinds in like wiſe, that is to ſaie:
- 7 The riotor that conſumeth all.
- 8 The vagabond that will abide in no place.
- 9 The idle perſon, as the ſtrumpet and others.

For theſe ſorts of poore were prouided three ſeuerall houſes. Firſt for the innocent and fatherleſſe, which is the beggers child, and is in deed the ſeed and breeder of beggerie, they prouided the houſe that was late Graie friers in London, and now is called Chriſtes hoſpitall, where the poore children are trained in the knowledge of God, and ſome vertuous exerciſe to the ouerthrowe of beggerie. For the ſecond degree is prouided the hoſpitall of ſaint Thomas in Southworke, & ſaint Bartholomew in weſt Smithfield, where are continuallie at leaſt two hundred diſeaſed perſons, which are not onelie there lodged and cured, but alſo fed and nouriſhed. For the third degree they prouided Bridewell, where the vagabond and idle ſtrumpet is chaſtiſed and compelled to labour, to the ouerthrow of the vicious life of idlenes. They prouided alſo for the honeſt decaied houſholder, that he ſhould be relieued at home at his houſe, and in the pariſh where he dwelled by a weekelie reliefe and penſion. And in like manner they prouided for the lazer to keepe him out of the citie from clapping of diſhes, and ringing of bels, to the great trouble of the citizens, and alſo to the dangerous infection of manie, that they ſhould be relieued at home at their houſes with ſeuerall penſions.

Now after this good order taken, and the citizens by ſuch meanes as were deuiſed, willing to further the ſame, the report therof was made vnto the kings maieſtie: and his grace for the aduancement hereof, was not onelie willing to grant ſuch as ſhould be the ouerſeers and gouernors of the ſaid houſes a corporation and authoritie for the gouernement thereof: but alſo required that he might be accounted as the chiefe founder and patrone thereof. And for the furtherance of the ſaid worke, and continuall maintenance of the ſame, he of his meere mercie and goodneſſe granted, that where before certeine lands were giuen to the maintenance of the houſe of the Sauoie, founded by king Henrie the ſeuenth, for the lodging of pilgrims and ſtrangers, and that the ſame was now made but a lodging of loiterers, vagabonds, and ſtrumpets that laie all daie in the fields, and at night were harboured there, the which was rather the maintenance of beggerie, than the reliefe of the poore, gaue the ſame lands, being firſt ſurrendred into his hands by the maiſter and fellowes there (which lands were of the yearelie value of ſix hundred pounds) vnto the citie of London, for the maintenance of the foundation aforeſaid.

K. Edward the ſixt founder of the hoſpitals in London.

And for a further reliefe, a petition being made to the kings maieſtie for a licence to take in mortmaine, or otherwiſe without licence, lands to a certeine yearelie value, and a ſpace left in the patent for his grace to put in what ſumme it would pleaſe him; he looking on the void place, called for pen and inke, and with his owne hand wrote this ſumme, in theſe words (foure thouſand marks by yeare) and then ſaid in the hearing of his councell: Lord God I yeeld thee moſt hartie thanks, that thou haſt giuen mee life thus " long, to finiſh this worke to the glorie of thy name. "
After which foundation eſtabliſhed, he liued not aboue two daies, whoſe life would haue beene wiſhed equall to the patriarchs, if it might haue pleaſed God ſo to haue protracted the ſame. But he was too good a prince for ſo bad a people, and therefore God remoued him, and tranſlated him to his owne kingdome, foreſeeing the euent of ſomething which in his ſecret counſell he had purpoſed, againſt a nation that knew not the benefit of the acceptable time of grace: wherein God by this peereleſſe princes meanes ment all good to this land, as might be gathered by the reformation of religion, wherin the kings care was exceeding great, as his deſire to eſtabliſh Gods glorie was zealous: according to that notable Sir william Cheſter. John Calthrop draper.

But to returne where we left. By example of the charitable act of this vertuous yong king, ſir William Cheſter knight and alderman of London, and John Calthrop citizen and draper of the ſaid citie, at their owne proper coſts and charges made the bricke walles and way on the backeſide that leadeth from the ſaid new hoſpitall, vnto the hoſpitall of ſaint Bartholomewes, and alſo couered and vanted the towne dich from Alderſgate to Newgate, which before was verie noiſome and contagious to the ſaid hoſpitall.

Richard Caſtel ſhoomaker.

This hoſpitall being thus erected and put in good order, there was one Richard Caſtell alias Caſteller, ſhoomaker, dwelling in Weſtminſter, a man of great trauell and labor in his facultie with his owne hands, and ſuch a one as was named the cocke of Weſtminſter, for that both winter and ſummer he was at his worke before foure of the clocke in the morning. This man thus trulie and painfullie labouring for his liuing, God bleſſed and increaſed his labours ſo abundantlie, that he purchaſed lands and tenements in Weſtminſter, to the yearelie value of fortie and foure pounds. And hauing no child, with the conſent of his wife (who ſuruiued him, & was a vertuous & good woman) gaue the ſame lands wholie to Chriſts hoſpitall aforeſaid, to the reliefe of the innocent and fatherleſſe children, and for the ſuccor of the miſerable, ſore and ſicke, harbored in the other hoſpitals about London, whoſe example God grant manie to follow.

I. Stow. 1053. A monſter.

¶The third of Auguſt, at Midlenton eleuen miles from Oxford, a woman brought forth a child which had two perfect bodies from the nauill vpward, and were ſo ioined togither at the nauill, that when they were laid in length, the one head & bodie was eaſtward, and the other weſt: the legs for both the bodies grew out at the midſt where the bodies ioined, and had but one iſſue for the excrements of both bodies: they liued eightéene daies, and were women children. The eight of Auguſt were taken at Quinborow thrée great fiſhes called dolphins: & the wéeke following at Blackewall were ſix more taken, and brought to London, the leaſt of them was more than anie horſſe.]

Great fiſhes.

Much about this ſeaſon there were thrée notable ſhips ſet forth and furniſhed for the great adventure of the vnknowne voiage into the eaſt by the north ſeas. The great dooer and incourager of which voiage was Sebaſtian Gabato an Engliſhman, borne at Briſtow, but was the ſonne of a Genowaie. Theſe ſhips at the laſt arriued in the countrie of Moſcouia, not without great loſſe and danger, and namelie of their capteine, who was a worthie and aduenturous gentleman, called ſir Hugh Willoughbie knight, who being toſſed and driuen by tempeſt, was at the laſt found in his ſhip frozen to death and all his people. But now the ſaid voiage and trade is greatlie aduanced, and the merchants aduenturing that waie, are newlie by act of parlement incorporated and indued with ſundrie priuileges and liberties.

Sebaſtian Gabato.

Thrée mariages betwéene great eſtates.

About the beginning of the moneth of Maie next following, there were thrée notable mariages concluded, & ſhortlie after ſolemnized at Durham place. The firſt was betwéene the lord Gilford Dudleie, the fourth ſonne of the duke of Northumberland, and the ladie Jane, eldeſt daughter to Henrie duke of Suffolke, & the ladie Francis his wife, was the daughter of Marie ſecond ſiſter to king Henrie the eight, firſt maried to Lewes the French king, and after to Charles Brandon duke of Suffolke. The ſecond mariage was betwéene the lord Herbert, ſon and heire to William earle of Penbroke, and the ladie Katharine, ſecond daughter of the ſaid ladie Francis, by the ſaid Henrie duke of Suffolke. And the third was betwéene Henrie lord Haſtings, ſonne and heire to Francis earle of Huntington, and ladie Katharine yongeſt daughter to the forenamed duke of Northumberland.

The euill end wherto the knitting of theſe couples in mariage tended.

Theſe mariages were compaſſed & concluded chieflie vpon purpoſe to change & alter the order of ſucceſſion to the crowne, made in the time of king Henrie the eight, from the ſaid kings daughters, Marie and Elizabeth, and to conueie the ſame immediatlie after the death of king Edward to the houſe of Suffolke, in the right of the ſaid ladie Francis: wherein the ſaid yong king was an earneſt traueller in the time of his ſickeneſſe, & all for feare that if his ſiſter Marie, being next heire to the crowne, ſhould ſucceed, that ſhe would ſubuert all his lawes and ſtatutes made concerning religion, whereof he was moſt carefull: for the continuance whereof he ſought to eſtabliſh a meet order of ſucceſſion, by the aliance of great houſes by waie of marriage, which neuertheleſſe were of no force to ſerue his purpoſe. For tending to the diſheriting of the rightfull heirs, they proued nothing proſperous to the parties: for two of them were ſoone after made fruſtrate, the one by death, the other by diuorſe.

The kings feare fell out to be true.

The kings ſickeneſſe increaſeth.

In the meane while, the king became euerie daie more ſicke than other of a conſumption in his lungs, ſo as there was no hope of his recouerie. Whervpon thoſe that then bare chiefe authoritie in councell, with other prelats and nobles of the realme, called to them diuerſe notable perſons, learned as well in diuinitie as in the lawes of the land, namelie biſhops, iudges, & other, who fell to conſultation vpon this ſo weightie cauſe, and laſtly concluded vpon the deuiſe of king Edwards will, to declare the ſaid ladie Jane, eldeſt néece to king Henrie the eight, and wife to the ſaid lord Gilford, to be rightfull heire in ſucceſſion to the crowne of England, without reſpect had to the ſtatute made in the fiue and thirtith yeare of king Henrie the eight: the true meaning of which ſtatute they did impugne and ouerthrow by diuerſe ſubtill ſiniſter conſtructions of the ſame, to diſherit the ſaid kings daughters, to whome the ſucceſſion of the crowne of England of right apperteined, as well by the common lawes of this realme, as alſo by the ſaid ſtatute made in the ſaid fiue and thirtith yeare of king Henrie, as aforeſaid. To which new order of ſucceſſion, all the ſaid kings councell, with manie biſhops, lords, doctors and iudges of the realme ſubſcribed their names, without refuſall of anie, except ſir James Hales knight, one of the iuſtices of the common plées, who being called to this councell, would in no wiſe giue his aſſent, either by word or writing, as ye ſhall heare more in the hiſtorie of quéene Marie.

In euill minded conſultation of counſellors.

Sir James Hales the od man.

The death of king Edward the ſixt.

Now when theſe matters were thus concluded, and after confirmed by a number of hands, as aforeſaid, then the noble prince king Edward the ſixt, by long lingering ſickeneſſe and conſumption of his lungs aforeſaid, approched to his death, and departed out of this life the ſixt daie of Julie, in the ſeuenth yeare of his reigne, and ſeuentéenth of his age, after he had reigned and noblie gouerned this realme ſix yeares, fiue moneths, and eight daies. And a little before his departing, lifting vp his eies to God, he praied as followeth.

The

The praier of king Edward the ſixt at his death.

LOrd God, deliuer me out of this miſerable and wretched life, take me among thy choſen: howbeit not my will, but thy will be doone. Lord I commit my ſpirit to thée, oh Lord thou knoweſt how happie it were for mée to be with thée: yet for thy choſens ſake if it be thy will, ſend me life and helth, that I maie trulie ſerue thée. Oh my Lord bleſſe thy people, and ſaue thine inheritance. Oh Lord God, ſaue thy choſen people of England. Oh my Lord God defend this realme from papiſtrie, and mainteine thy true religion, that I and my people maie praiſe thy holie name. And therewithall he ſaid, I am faint, Lord haue mercie vpon me, and take my ſpirit.

Thus did this good yoong king yéeld vp to God his ghoſt the ſixt daie of Iulie (as before is mentioned) whome if it had pleaſed God to haue ſpared with longer life, not vnlike it was, but he ſhould haue ſo gouerned this Engliſh common-wealth, that he might haue béene comparable with any of his noble progenitors: ſo that the loſſe of ſo towardlie a yoong king, greatlie diſcomforted the whole Engliſh nation, that looked for ſuch a reformation in the ſtate of the common-wealth at his hands, as was to be wiſhed for of all good ſubiects: which bred ſuch a liking in them toward him, that euen among verie traitorous rebels his name yet was had in reuerence, although otherwiſe they neuer ſo much forgat their dutie both towards him and other, appointed to gouerne vnder him, through a malicious and moſt wilfull error; as if his tender yeares had not ſufficientlie warranted his roiall authoritie, but that the ſame had béene vſurped by others againſt his will and pleaſure.

The commendation of king Edward.

And as he was intierlie beloued of his ſubiects, ſo with the like affection of kindnes he loued them againe; of nature and diſpoſition méeke, much inclined to clemencie, euer hauing a regard to the ſparing of life. There wanted in him no promptnes of wit, grauitie of ſentence, ripeneſſe of iudgement, as his age might beare, fauour and loue of religion was in him from his childhood, his ſkill and knowledge in ſciences, beſides his other excellent vertues, were ſuch, that to them he ſéemed rather borne than brought vp. It maie ſéeme verie ſtrange, that in his yoong years (as maiſter Fox reporteth of him) he could tell and recite all the ports, hauens, and créekes, not within his owne realme onelie, but alſo in Scotland, and likewiſe in France, what comming in there was, how the tide ſerued in euerie of them; moreouer, what burthen, and what wind ſerued for the comming into each hauen: alſo of all his iuſtices, magiſtrates, & gentlemen that bare any authoritie within his realme, he knew their names, their houſkéeping, their religion and conuerſation what it was. He had a ſingular reſpect to iuſtice, a vertue moſt commendable in a prince, and chieflie to the diſpatch of poore mens ſutes. Hée perfectlie vnderſtood the Latine tong, the French, the Gréeke, Italian, and Spaniſh, neither was he ignorant (ſaith Cardanus) in Logike, in the principles of naturall philoſophie, or in muſicke.

Sée Iohn Fox in the Acts & Monuments vnder the title of Edward the ſixt.

The noble memorie of king Edward and his rare wit.

To conclude, his towardlineſſe was ſuch in all heroicall vertues, noble gifts, and markable qualities conuenient for his princelie eſtate, that ſo much was hoped for in his roiall perſon(if he had liued till triall might haue béene had of the proofe) as was to be looked for in anie one prince that euer had rule ouer this noble realme. ¶ The eight of Iulie, the lord maior of London was ſent for to the court, then at Gréenwich, and to bring with him ſix aldermen, as manie merchants of the Staple, and as manie merchant aduenturers, vnto whom by the councell was ſecretlie declared the death of king Edward, & alſo whom he had ordeined to the ſucceſſion of the crowne by his leters patents, to the which they were ſworne, and charged to kéepe it ſecret.] But now to procéed with the doings that followed. Immediatlie after the death of this ſo worthie a prince king Edward, the aforeſaid ladie Iane was proclamed quéene of this realme by the ſound of trumpet, that is to ſaie, the ninth daie of Iulie, at which proclamation were preſent the lords of the councell, the maior of London, with others.

¶ The eleauenth of Iulie, Gilbert Pot, drawer to Ninion Sanders vintener, dwelling at S. Iohns head within Ludgate, who was accuſed by the ſaid Sanders his maiſter, was ſet vpon the pillorie in Cheape, with both his eares nailed, and cleane cut off, for words ſpeaking at time of the proclamation of ladie Iane. At the which execution was a trumpet blowne, and a herald read his offenſe, in preſence of one of the ſhiriffes, &c. About fiue of the clocke the ſame daie in the afternoone, Ninion Sanders, maſter to the ſaid Gilbert Pot, and Iohn Owen a gunner, comming from the tower of London, by water in a wherrie, and ſhooting London bridge, towards the blacke friers, were drowned at ſaint Marie Locke, and the wherriemen ſaued by their ores.]

A letter of the ladie Marie ſent to the lords of the councell, wherein ſhe claimeth the crowne now after the deceaſe of hir brother king Edward.

MY lords we gréet you well, and haue receiued ſure aduertiſement, that our deareſt brother the king our late ſouereigne lord is departed to Gods mercie: which newes, how they be wofull to our heart, he onelie knoweth, to whoſe will and pleaſure we muſt and doo humblie ſubmit vs, and all our wils. But in this ſo lamentable a caſe, that is to wit, now after his maieſties departure and death, concerning the crowne & gouernance of this realme of England, with the title of France, and all things thereto belonging that hath béene prouided by act of parlement, and the teſtament and laſt will of our deareſt father, beſides other circumſtances aduancing our right: you know, the realme, and the whole world knoweth, the rolles and records appeare by the authoritie of the king our ſaid father, and the king our ſaid brother, and the ſubiects of this relme, ſo that we verelie truſt that there is no true ſubiect that is, can, or would pretend to be ignorant thereof: and of our part we haue our ſelues cauſed, and as God ſhall aid and ſtrength vs, ſhall cauſe our right and title in this behalfe to be publiſhed and proclamed accordinglie. And albeit this ſo weightie a matter ſéemeth ſtrange, that the dieng of our ſaid brother vpon thurſdaie at night laſt paſt, we hitherto had no knowledge from you thereof: yet we conſider your wiſedomes and prudence to be ſuch, that hauing eftſoones amongſt you debated, pondered, and well weighed this preſent caſe with our eſtate, with your owne eſtate, the commonwealth, and all our honors, we ſhall and may conceiue great hope and truſt, with much aſſurance in your loialtie and ſeruice, and therfore for the time interpret and take things not to the worſt, and that ye yet will like noblemen worke the beſt. Neuertheleſſe, we are not ignorant of your conſultations to vndoo the prouiſions made for our preferment, nor of the great bands and prouiſions forcible, wherevnto ye be aſſembled and prepared, by whome, and to what end, God and you know, and nature can feare ſome euill. But be it that ſome conſideration politike, or whatſoeuer thing elſe hath mooued you thereto, yet doubt you not my lords, but we can take all theſe your dooings in gratious part, being alſo right readie to remit and fullie pardon the ſame, with that fréelie to eſchew bloudſhed & vengeance againſt all thoſe that can or will intend the ſame, truſting alſo aſſuredlie you will take and accept this grace and vertue in good part, as apperteineth, and that we ſhall not be inforced to vſe this ſeruice of other our true ſubiects and fréends, which in this our iuſt and rightfull caſe, God (in whome our whole affiance is) ſhall ſend vs. Wherefore my lords, we require you, and charge you, and euerie of you, that euerie of you of your allegiance which you owe to God and vs, and to none other, for our honour, and the ſuertie of our realme, onelie imploie your ſelues and forthwith vpon receit hereof cauſe our right and title to the crowne and gouernment of this realme, to be proclamed in our citie of London, and ſuch other places as to your wiſedoms ſhall ſéeme good, and as to this caſe apperteineth, not failing hereof, as our verie truſt is in you: and thus our letter ſigned with our owne hand ſhall be your ſufficient warrant in this behalfe. Yeuen vnder our ſignet at our manor of Keningall the ninth of Iulie 1553.

To this letter of the ladie Marie, the lords of the councell anſwered againe as followeth.

The lords aduertiſe the ladie Marie that the ladie Iane is quéene.

A ſubtill ſhift to proue the ladie Marie illegitimate.

Madam, we haue receiued your letters the ninth of this inſtant, declaring your ſuppoſed title, which you iudge your ſelfe to haue to the imperiall crowne of this realme, and all the dominions thereto belonging. For anſwer wherof, this is to aduertiſe you, that forſomuch as our ſouereigne ladie quéene Iane is, after the death of our ſouereigne lord Edward the ſixt, a prince of moſt noble memorie, inueſted and poſſeſſed with the iuſt and right title of the imperiall crowne of this realme, not onelie by good order of old ancient good lawes of this realme; but alſo by our late ſouereigne lords letters patents, ſigned with his owne hand, and ſealed with the great ſeale of England, in preſence of the moſt part of the nobles, councellors, iudges, with diuers other graue and ſage perſonages, aſſenting and ſubſcribing to the ſame: we muſt therefore, as of moſt bound dutie and allegiance, aſſent vnto hir ſaid grace, and to none other, except we ſhould (which faithfull ſubiects cannot) fall into gréeuous and vnſpeakeable enormities. Wherefore we can no leſſe doo, but for the quiet both of the realme and you alſo, to aduertiſe you, that forſomuch as the diuorſe made betwéene the king of famous memorie king Henrie the eight, and the ladie Katharine your mother, was neceſſarie to be had, both by the euerlaſting lawes of God, and alſo by the eccleſiaſticall lawes, and by the moſt part of the noble and learned vniuerſities of chriſtendome, and confirmed alſo by the ſundrie acts of parlements, remaining yet in their force, and thereby you iuſtlie made illegitimate, and vnheritable to the crowne imperiall of this realme; and the rules, dominions, and poſſeſſions of the ſame: you will vpon iuſt conſideration hereof, and of diuers other cauſes lawfull to be alledged for the ſame, and for the iuſt inheritance of the right line, and godlie orders taken by the late king Edward the ſixt, and greateſt perſonages aforeſaid, ſurceaſe, by anie pretenſe to vex and moleſt anie of our ſouereigne ladie quéene Iane hir ſubiects, from the true faith and allegiance due vnto hir grace; aſſuring you, that if you will for reſpect ſhew your ſelfe quiet and obedient (as you ought) you ſhall find vs all, and ſeuerall, readie to doo you anie ſeruice that we with dutie may, and to be glad of your quietneſſe, to preſerue the common ſtate of this realme, wherein you may be otherwiſe gréeuous vnto vs, to your ſelfe, and to them. And thus we bid you moſt hartilie well to fare. From the tower of London this ninth of Iulie.

Your ladiſhips freends ſhewing your ſelfe an obedient ſubiect,

Thomas Canturburie, the marqueſſe of Wincheſter, Iohn Bedford, William Northampton, Thomas Elie chancellor, Iohn Northumberland, Henrie Suffolke, Henrie Arundell, Francis Shrewesburie, William Penbroke, Cobham, R. Rich, Huntington, Darcie, Cheineie, R. Cotton, Iohn Gates, William Peter, William Cecill, Iohn Chéeke, Iohn Maſon, Edward North, Robert Bowes.

Ladie Marie remoueth frõ Keningall to Fremingham caſtell.

All theſe aforeſaid, except onelie the duke of Northumberland, and ſir Iohn Gates, were either by ſpeciall fauour, or ſpeciall or generall pardon, diſcharged for this offenſe againſt hir committed, after hir comming to be quéene. But now vpon the receit of this anſwer, vnderſtanding by hir fréends that ſhe could not lie in ſuertie at Keningall, being a place open & eaſie to be approched, ſhe remooued from thence vnto hir caſtell of Fremingham, ſtanding in a wood countrie, & not ſo eaſie to be inuaded by hir enimies. So ſoone as the councell heard of hir ſudden departure, and conſidering that all came not to paſſe as they ſuppoſed; they cauſed ſpéedilie a power of men to be gathered togither. And firſt they agréed that the duke of Suffolke father to the new made quéene, ſhould haue the conduct and leading of the armie.

Abr. Fl. ex I.S. 1059.

The councell perſuade the duke to vndertake this enterpriſe.

¶But afterward it was deuiſed and decréed vpon further conſiderations, and by the ſpeciall means of the ladie Iane his daughter, who taking the matter heauilie, with wéeping teares, made requeſt to the whole councell, that hir father might tarrie at home in hir companie. Wherevpon the councell perſuaded with the duke of Northumberland, to take that voiage vpon him, ſaieng, that no man was ſo fit therefore: bicauſe that he had atchiued the victorie in Norffolke once alreadie, and was therefore ſo feared, that none durſt once lift vp their weapon againſt him: beſides that, he was the beſt man of warre in the realme, as well for the ordering of his campes and ſouldiers, both in battell and in their tents, as alſo by experience, knowlege and wiſdome; he could both animate his armie with wittie perſuaſions, and alſo pacifie and allaie his enimies pride with his ſtout courage, or elſe to diſſuade them (if néed were) from their enterpriſe. Finallie, ſaid they, this is the ſhort and the long, the quéene will in no wiſe grant, that hir father ſhall take it vpon him: wherefore (quoth they) we thinke it good, if it may pleaſe your grace, it lieth in you to remedie the matter. With theſe & the like perſuaſions the duke was allured to put himſelfe deſperatlie vpon hazzard;

Non morte horrenda non vllis territus armis.

Inſomuch that he reioined vpon their talke, and ſaid: Well then, ſith yée thinke it good, I and mine will go, not doubting of your fidelitie to the quéenes maieſtie, which now I leaue in your cuſtodie. So that night he ſent for both lords, knights, and other that ſhould go with him, and cauſed all things to be prepared accordinglie. Then went the councell in to the ladie Iane, and told hir of their concluſion, who humblie thanked the duke for reſeruing hir father at home, and beſéeched him to vſe his diligence: whereto he anſwered, that he would doo what in him laie. The morrow following, great preparation was made, the duke earlie in the morning called for his owne harneſſe, and ſaw it made readie at Durham place, where he appointed all his retinue to méet. The ſame daie carts were laden with munition and artillerie, and field péeces were ſet forward.

Carts laden with munitiõ.

The dukes words to the lords of the councell.

The ſame forenoone the duke mooued eftſoones the councell to ſend their powers after him, as it was before determined, the ſame to méet with him at Newmarket, and they promiſed they would. He ſaid further to ſome of them: My lords, I and theſe other noble perſonages, with the whole armie that now go forth, as well for the behalfe of you & yours, as for the eſtabliſhing of the quéenes highneſſe, ſhall not onelie aduenture our bodies and liues amongſt the bloudie ſtrokes and cruell aſſaults of our aduerſaries in the open fields: but alſo we doo leaue the conſeruation of our ſelues, children, and families at home here with you, as altogither committed to your truth and fidelities: whome, if we thought ye would through malice, conſpiracie, or diſſention leaue vs your fréends in the briers, and betraie vs; we could as well ſundrie waies foreſée and prouide for our owne ſafegards, as anie of you by betraieng vs can doo for yours. But now vpon the onelie truſt and faithfulneſſe of your honors, whereof we thinke our ſelues moſt aſſured, we doo hazzard our liues. Which truſt and promiſe if yée ſhall violate, hoping thereby of life and promotion: yet ſhall not God count you innocent of our blouds, neither acqaite you of the ſacred and holie oth of allegiance, made fréelie by you to this vertuous ladie the quéenes highneſſe, who by your and our intiſement is rather of force placed therein, than by hir owne ſéeking and requeſt. Conſider alſo, that Gods cauſe, which is the preferment of his word, & feare of papiſts entrance, hath béene (as ye haue here before alwaies ſaid) the originall ground whervpon ye euen at the firſt motion granted your goodwils and conſents therevnto, as by your handwritings appeareth; and thinke not the contrarie, but if ye meane deceit, though not forthwith, yet hereafter God will reuenge the ſame.

He meaneth the new quéen after depriued and executed.

I can ſaie no more, but in this troubleſome time wiſh you to vſe conſtant hearts, abandoning all malice, enuie, and priuat affections. And therewithall the firſt courſe for the lords came vp, wherefore the duke ſhut vp his talke with theſe words. I haue not ſpoken to you in this ſort vpon anie miſtruſt I haue of your truths, of which alwaies I haue euer hitherto conceiued a truſtie confidence, but I haue put you in remembrance thereof, what chance of variance ſo euer might grow amongſt you in mine abſence: and this I praie you, wiſh me not worſſe good ſpéed in this iorneie, than yée would haue to your ſelues. My lord, ſaith one of them, if yée miſtruſt anie of vs in this matter, your grace is farre deceiued, for which of vs can waſh his hands cleane thereof? And if we ſhould ſhrinke from you as from one that were culpable, which of vs can excuſe himſelfe to be giltleſſe? Therefore herein your doubt is too farre caſt. I praie God it be (quoth the duke) let vs go to dinner: and ſo they ſat downe. After dinner the duke went in to the quéene, where his commiſſion was by that time ſealed, for his lieutenantſhip of the armie, and then tooke his leaue of hir, and ſo did certeine other lords alſo.

The concluſion of the dukes talke to the lords.

The earle of Arundell profeſſeth himſelfe ſorie that he goeth not with the duke of Northamberland.

Then as the duke came through the councell chamber, he tooke his leaue of the earle of Arundell, who praied God be with his grace, ſaieng he was ſorie it was not his chance to go with him and beare him companie, in whoſe preſence he could find in his heart to ſpend his bloud euen at his féet. Then the earle of Arundell tooke Thomas Louell the dukes boie by the hand, and ſaid; Farewell gentle Thomas with all my heart. Then the duke, with the lord marqueſſe of Northampton, the lord Greie, and diuerſe other tooke their barge, and went to Durham place, and to White hall, where that night they muſtered their men: and the next daie in the morning the duke departed with the number of ſix hundred men, or thereabouts. And as they rode through Shordich, ſaid the duke to the lord Greie; The people preaſe to ſée vs, but not one ſaith God ſpéed vs. The ſame daie ſir Iohn Gates and other went out after the duke.]

Much a do on all ſides during this ſtir broched betwéene the duke and the ladie Marie.

Now as the duke went forward on his waie (with his commiſſion from the whole councell, and his warrant vnder the broad ſeale of England, without miſtruſt of that which after fortuned to his owne deſtruction, as in the hiſtorie of quéene Marie ſhall appeare, accompanied with no ſmall number of lords and gentlemen, hauing notwithſtanding his times preſcribed, and his iourneies appointed by the councell, to the intent he would not ſeeme to doo any thing but vpon warrant) what a doo there was, what ſtirring on euerie ſide, what ſending, what riding and poſting, what letters, meſſages, & inſtructions went to and fro, what talking among the ſouldiers, what hartburning among the people, what faire pretenſes outwardlie, inwardlie what priuie practiſes there were, what ſpéeding and ſending forth ordinance out of the tower, yea euen the ſame daie that quéene Marie at euen was proclaimed quéene, what rumors, and comming downe of ſouldiers as there was from all quarters, a world it was to ſée, and a proceſſe to declare, enough to make (as ſaith maſter Fox) a whole volume, euen as big as an Ilias.

The old prouerbe verefied Delaie bréedeth danger.

The greateſt helpe that made for the ladie Marie, was the ſhort iourneies of the duke, which by commiſſion were aſſigned vnto him before, as aboue is mentioned: and happilie not without the politike forecaſt of ſome in fauour of the ladie Marie: for the longer the duke lingered in his voiage, the ladie marie the more increaſed in puiſſance, the hearts of the people being mightilie bent vnto hir. Wher vpon ſhe in the meane time remaining at Fremingham, and hearing of this preparation againſt hir, gathered togither ſuch power of the noblemen & other hir fréends in that countrie, as ſhe could get. And firſt of all, the noblemen that came vnto hir aid, were the earles of Suſſex, Bath, and Oxford, the lord Wentworth, ſir Thomas Cornewallis, ſir Henrie Ierningham, ſir William Walgraue, with diuerſe other gentlemen and commons of the counties of Norffolke and Suffolke. Here (as maſter Fox noteth) the Suffolke men being the firſt that reſorted to hir, promiſed hir their aid and helpe to the vttermoſt of their powers, ſo that ſhe would not go about to alter the religion which hir brother had eſtabliſhed, and was now vſed and exerciſed through the realme. To this condition ſhe agréed, with ſuch promiſe, as no man would haue doubted that anie innouation of matters in religion ſhould haue followed, by hir ſufferance or procurement during hir reigne: but how ſoone ſhée forgat that promiſe, it ſhall ſhortlie after plainelie appeare.

Suffolke men the firſt that reſorted to the ladie Marie.

Aſſiſtants to the ladie Marie.

In this meane ſeaſon, the lord Windſor, ſir Edmund Peckham, ſir Robert Drurie, and ſir Edward Haſtings, raiſed the commoners of the ſhire of Buckingham; vnto whome ſir Iohn Williams, which afterward was lord Williams of Thame, and ſir Leonard Chamberleine, with the cheefe power of Oxfordſhire. And out of Northamptonſhire came ſir Thomas Treſham, and a great number of gentlemen out of diuerſe parts, whoſe names were too long to rehearſe. Theſe capteins with their companies being thus aſſembled in warlike manner, marched forward towards Norffolke to the aid of the ladie Marie, and the further they went, the more their power increaſed.

Abr. Fl. ex I.S. pag.1062.

Aid by wind and wether for quéene Marie that was bent againſt hir.

¶About this time ſix ſhips well manned, that were appointed to lie before Yarmouth, and to haue taken the ladie Marie if ſhe had fled that waie, were by force of weather driuen into the hauen, where one maiſter Ierningham was raiſing power on the ladie Maries behalfe, who hearing therof, came thither. Wherupon the capteins tooke a bote and went to the ſhips, but the ſailers and ſouldiers aſked maſter Ierningham what he would haue, and whether he would haue their capteins or no, and he ſaid yea. Marrie ſaid they, ye ſhall haue them or we will throw them into the bottome of the ſea. But the capteins ſaid foorthwith, that they would ſerue quéene Marie willinglie, and ſo brought foorth their men, and conueied with them their great ordinance. Of the comming of theſe ſhips the ladie Marie was wonderfull ioious, & afterward doubted little the dukes puiſſance: but when newes thereof was brought to the tower, each man there began to draw backward: and ouer that, word of a greater miſcheefe was brought to the tower: that is to ſaie, that the noblemens tenants refuſed to ſerue their lords againſt quéene Marie.

The duke of Northumberland writeth for more ſuccours.

Doctor Ridleie perſuadeth the people in the title of quéene Iane, &c.

The duke thought long for his ſuccors, and wrote ſomewhat ſharpelie to the councell at the tower in that behalfe, as well for lacke of men as munition, but a ſlender anſwer had he againe. And from that time forward, certeine of the councell, to wit, the erle of Penbroke, and ſir Thomas Cheineie lord warden, and other, ſought to get out of the tower to conſult in London, but could not. On the ſixtéenth of Iulie, being ſundaie, doctor Ridleie biſhop of London, by commandement of the councell, preached at Paules croſſe, where he vehementlie perſuaded the people in the title of the ladie Iane, late proclamed quéene, and inueied earneſtlie againſt the title of ladie Marie, &c. The ſame ſixtéenth of Iulie, the lord treaſuror was gone out of the tower to his houſe in London at night, and foorthwith about ſeauen of the clocke the gates of the tower vpon a ſudden were ſhut vp, and the keies borne vp to the ladie Iane, which was for feare of ſome packing in the lord treaſuror: but he was fetched againe to the tower about twelue of the clocke in the night.]

The lords of the councell ſuſpecting that all would go againſt them, proclamed the ladie Marie quéen.

The lords of the councell, being in this meane while at London, after they vnderſtood how the better part of the realme were inclined, and hearing euerie daie newes of great aſſemblies, began to ſuſpect the ſequell of this enterpriſe. So that prouiding for their owne ſuertie, without reſpect of the duke (who now was at Burie) they fell to a new councell, and laſtlie by aſſent made proclamation at London in the name of the ladie Marie, by the name of Marie quéene of England, France, & Ireland, defender of the faith, & of the churches of England & Ireland ſupreme head. Of which proclamation, after the duke of Northumberland, being then at Burie, was aduertiſed by letters of diſcomfort from the councell, he incontinentlie, according to the new order receiued from them, returned with his power againe to Cambridge. Now ſo ſudden change of minds foorthwith appeared in his armie, that they which before ſéemed moſt forward in that quarrell, began firſt to flie from him, & ſo euerie man ſhifting for himſelfe, he that late before was furniſhed of ſuch multitude of ſouldiers, was ſuddenlie forſaken of all ſauing a few, whoſe perils were ioined with his.

Learned men that wrote in the reigne of king Edward.

But now before I procéed anie further in the hiſtorie of quéene Marie, who was now receiued and proclamed quéene, as then to ſuccéed hir brother, I will ſpeake ſomewhat of the learned men that wrote & publiſhed anie pamphlets or treatiſes in his daies, as in déed there were manie: but for that the more part of them died in quéene Maries time, or in the quéenes maieſties time that now is, or elſe are yet liuing, I doo omit thoſe here, meaning to ſpeake of them hereafter, if God ſhall permit, as occaſion maie ſerue. For the reſidue that ended their liues in this kings daies, theſe I find: Dauid Clapham a lawyer and well ſéene in the Latine toong, wrote ſundrie treatiſes; Robert Talbot a prebendarie of Norwich, verie ſkilfull in antiquities; Edward Hall a counſellor in the common law, but excellentlie ſéene in hiſtories, wrote a notable chronicle of the vnion of the two houſes of Yorke & Lancaſter.

Furthermore Richard Tracie of Todington in Gloceſterſhire, an eſquier, and verie well learned, ſonne to William Tracie; doctor Ioſeph an excellent preacher; George Ioie a Bedfordſhire man, that wrote diuerſe treatiſes concerning diuinitie, and died either in the laſt yeare of king Edward, or in the beginning of quéene Maries reigne, as appeareth by maſter Bale; Alexander Barkleie a Scot, a notable poet, and a good rhetorician, departed this life in the yeare one thouſand fiue hundred fiftie and two; William Hugh a Yorkeſhireman, wrote, beſides other things, a notable treatiſe called the troubled mans medicine, he deceaſſed by the burſting of a veine, in the yeare one thouſand fiue hundred fortie and nine; Thomas Sternehold borne in Southhampton, turned into Engliſh méeter ſeuen & thirtie pſalmes choſen foorth of Dauids pſalter. Of ſtrangers that liued and died here in this kings daies, excellentlie learned, and renowmed for ſuch treatiſes as they publiſhed to the world, Martine Bucer and Paulus Fagius are moſt famous. To end now with this part of the booke concerning king Edward, I haue thought good to ſet downe Ierom Cardans verſes, written as an epitaph of him (and recorded by maſter Fox in his hiſtorie) as here followeth:

Flete nefas magnum, ſed toto flebilis orbe
Mortales, veſter corruit omnis honor.
Nam regum decus, & iuuenum flos, ſpéſque bonorum,
Deliciæ ſecli, & gloria gentis erat.
Dignus Apollineis lachrymis, doctaque Minerua:
Floſculus heu miſerè concidit ante diem.
Te cumulo dabimus muſæ, ſupremáque flentes
Munera, Melpomene triſtia fata canet.

Carmen epitaphicum Cardani in obitum regis Edouardi.

Thus farre the good and vertuous yoong prince Edward the ſixt, ſucceſſor to Henrie the eight of moſt famous memorie.

Marie

Marie the eldeſt daughter of king Henrie the eight ſucceſſor to Edward the ſixt.

Marie eldeſt daughter of K. Henrie the eight, by the ladie Katharine of Spaine, his firſt wife, and ſiſter vnto king Edward the ſixt, by the fathers ſide, began hir reigne the ſixt daie of Iulie, which daie the king hir brother died, and ſhe was proclamed at London (as is before remembred in the end of the hiſtorie of king Edward the ſixt) the nineteenth daie of the ſame moneth, in the yeare of our Lord 1553: after the creation of the world 5520, in the fiue and thirtith yeare of Charles the fift, emperor of Almaine, in the ſeuenth yéere of Henrie the ſecond of that name K. of France, & in the eleuenth of Marie quéene of Scotland. The twentith of Iulie the duke of Northumberland being come backe to Cambridge, heard that the proclamation of quéene Marie was come thither, whereof he being aduertiſed, called for a trumpetter and an herald; but none could be found. Wherevpon he riding into the market place with the maior, and the lord marques of Northampton, made the proclamation himſelfe, and threw vp his cap in token of ioy. ¶ Within an houre after he had letters from the councell (as he ſaid) that he ſhould forthwith diſmiſſe his armie, and not come within ten miles of London: for if he did, they would fight with him, the rumor whereof was no ſooner abroad, but euerie man departed. And ſhortlie after, the duke was arreſted in the kings college by one maiſter Sleg ſargeant at arms.

Quéene Marie proclamed.

Abr.Fl. ex I.S.pag.1064.

At the laſt, letters were brought from the councell at London, that all men ſhould go each his waie. Wherevpon the duke ſaid to them that kept him; Ye doo me wrong to withdraw my libertie, ſée you not the councels letters without exception, that all men ſhould go whither they would? At which words they that kept him and the other noblemen, ſet them at libertie, and ſo continued they for that night: inſomuch that the earle of Warwike was readie in the morning to haue rode awaie. But then came the erle of Arundell from the quéene to the duke into his chamber, who went out to méet him. Now as ſoone as he ſaw the earle of Arundell, he fell on his knées, and deſired him to be good to him for the loue of God: Conſider (ſaith he) I haue doone nothing but by the conſents of you and all the whole councell. My lord (quoth the earle of Arundell) I am ſent hither by the quéens maieſtie, and in hir name I doo arreſt you. And I obeie it my lord (quoth he) I beſéech you my lord of Arundell (quoth the duke) vſe mercie towards me, knowing the caſe as it is. My lord (quoth the earle) ye ſhould haue ſought for mercie ſooner, I muſt doo according to commandement: herwith he committed the charge of him and the others to the gard and gentlemen that ſtood by.] The lord marques after this went to quéene Marie. On the fiue & twentith daie of the ſaid moneth, the duke of Northumberland, with Francis earle of Huntington, Iohn earle of Warwike ſon and heire to the ſaid duke, and two other of his yoonger ſons, the lord Ambroſe and the lord Henrie Dudleie, ſir Andrew Dudleie, Sir Iohn Gates capteine of the gard to king Edward the ſixt, ſir Henrie Gates brethren, ſir Thomas Palmer knights, and doctor Sands were brought to the tower by the earle of Arundell. But as they entered within the tower gate, the earle of Arundell diſcharged the lord Haſtings, taking him out of the tower with him. On the ſix & twentith of Iulie, the lord marques of Northampton, the biſhop of London, the lord Robert Dudleie, and ſir Robert Corbet were brought from the quéenes campe vnto the tower. The eight and twentith of Iulie, the duke of Suffolke was committed to the tower, but the one and twentith of the ſame moneth he was ſet at libertie by the diligent ſute of the ladie Francis grace his wife.

The duke ſubmitteth himſelfe, and is arreſted by the earle of Arundell.

The lord Haſtings diſcharged out of the tower.

Duke of Suffolke committed to the tower.

After that quéene Marie was thus with full conſent of the nobles and commons of the realme proclamed quéene, ſhe being then in Northfolke, at hir caſtell of Framingham, repaired with all ſpeed to the citie of London: and the third daie of the ſaid moneth of Auguſt ſhe came to the ſaid citie, and ſo to the tower, where the ladie Iane of Suffolke (late afore proclamed quéene) with hir husband the lord Gilford, a little before hir comming, were committed to ward, & there remained almoſt after fiue moneths. And by the waie, as the quéene thus paſſed, ſhe was ioifullie ſaluted of all the people, without anie miſliking; ſauing that it was much feared of manie, that ſhe would alter the religion ſet foorth by king Edward hir brother, whereof then were giuen iuſt occaſions: becauſe (notwithſtanding diuerſe lawes made to the contrarie) ſhe had dailie maſſe and Latine ſeruice ſaid before hir in the tower. Yea it was doubted in like ſort, that ſhe would both adnull and innouat certeine lawes and decrées eſtabliſhed by the yoong prince hir predeceſſor: which ſhe did in déed, as one hath left teſtified in a memoriall of hir ſucceſſion (but little vnto hir commendation) saieng:

Quéene Marie commeth to London.

At Maria Eduardi regni ſuccedit habenis,
Confirmans iterùm regno papalia iura,
Conciliòque nouas leges ſancire vocato
Molitur, latas à fratre peroſa priores.

At hir entrie into the tower there were preſented to hir certeine priſoners; namelie, Thomas duke of Norffolke, who in the laſt yeare of king Henrie the eight (as you haue heard) was ſuppoſed to be attainted of treaſon: but in the parlement of this firſt

Priſoners diſcharged.

yeare of quéene Marie, the ſaid ſuppoſed attaindour was by the authoritie and act of parlement, for góod and apparant cauſes alleged in the ſaid act, declared to be vtterlie fruſtrat and void. Alſo Edward Courtneie ſon and heire to Henrie marques of Exceſter, cóoſine germane to king Henrie the eight, and Cutbert Tunſtall biſhop of Durham, with other perſons of great calling; but ſpeciallie Stephan Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter, whom ſhe not onlie releaſed out of impriſonment, but alſo immediatlie aduanced and preferred to be lord chancellor of England, reſtoring him alſo to his former eſtate and biſhoprike, and remoued from the ſame one doctor Poinet, who a little before was placed therein by the gift of king Edward the ſixt.

Stephan Gardiner made lord chancellor.

Edward Courtneie created earle of Deuonſhire.

And touching Edward Courtneie, ſhe not onelie aduanced him to the earldome of Deuonſhire, but alſo to ſo much of his fathers poſſeſſions as there remained in hir hands; whereby it was then thought of manie, that ſhe bare affection to him by the waie of marriage: but it came not ſo to paſſe (for what cauſe I am not able to giue anie reaſon) but ſurelie the ſubiects of England were moſt deſirous thereof.

Biſhops reſtored, and others depriued.

Upon the receiuing of this new quéene, all the biſhops which had béene depriued in the time of king Edward the ſixt hir brother, for the cauſe of religion, were now againe reſtored to their biſhopriks; and ſuch other as were placed in king Edward his time, remoued from their ſées, and others of contrarie religion placed. Amongeſt whom, Edmund Bonner doctor of the lawes, late afore depriued from the ſée of London, and committed priſoner to the Marſhalſea by order of king Edwards councell, was with all fauour reſtored to his libertie and biſhoprike. Maiſter Nicholas Ridleie doctor in diuinitie, late before aduanced to the ſame ſée by the ſaid king, was haſtilie diſplaced, and committed priſoner to the tower of London.

Why Ridleie was more rigorouſlie handled than the reſt.
Abr. Fl. ex I.S.pag.1067.

The cauſe why ſuch extremitie was vſed towards the ſaid biſhop Ridleie, more than to the reſt, was for that in the time of ladie Iane, he preached a ſermon at Pauls croſſe by the commandement of king Edwards councell, wherein he diſſuaded the people, for ſundrie cauſes, from receiuing the ladie Marie as quéene. ¶ On the ninth of Auguſt in the afternoone, the quéene held an obſequie in the tower for king Edward, the dirge being ſong in Latine, and on the morrow a maſſe of Requiem, whereat the quéene with hir ladies offered.

The buriall of king Edward.

The ſame daie, the corps of king Edward was buried at Weſtminſter, the lord treaſuror, the earle of Penbroke, and the earle of Shrewſburie being chéefe mourners, with diuerſe other noble men and others. Doctor Daie biſhop of Chicheſter preached at the ſaid buriall, and all the ſeruice with a communion was in Engliſh. Thus was finiſhed the ſolemne funerall of that góod prince, at whoſe birth there were not ſo manie reioiſing hearts, but at his death there were by infinit ods manie more wéeping eies, & ſad ſpirits: whoſe tender bodie, though pined with ſickneſſe, & conſumed with rottenneſſe, maie perhaps leaue for ſuccéeding ages no relike to gaze vpon; yet the memorie of his name ſhall be euer gréene. For he was, as one trulie ſaith of him:

Ille erat Europæ Phœnix, quem funere acerbo
(Vt flos vere nouo viridanti carpitur horto)
Suſtulit ante diem mors immatura Britannis,
Inuidet hæc terris pietatem & iura colentes.]

Doctor Borne a chapleine of biſhop Bonner.

The thirteenth of Auguſt doctor Bonner reſtored now to his biſhoprike againe, appointed one late a chapleine of his called doctor Borne to preach at Paules croſſe, who was then promoted to the quéens ſeruice, & not long after was made biſhop of Bath. The ſaid doctor taking occaſion of the goſpell of that daie, ſpake ſomewhat largelie in the iuſtifieng of biſhop Bonner, being preſent at the ſermon, which biſhop (as the ſaid preacher then openlie ſaid) for a ſermon made vpon the ſame text, and in the ſame place the ſame daie foure yéeres afore paſſed, was moſt vniuſtlie caſt into the vile dungeon of the Marſhalſea among théeues, and there kept during the time of king Edwards reigne. This matter being ſet forth with great vehemencie, ſo much offended the eares of part of the audience, that they brake ſilence, and began to murmur and throng togither, in ſuch ſort as the maior and aldermen with other of the wiſer ſort then preſent feared much an vprore. During which muttering, one more feruent than his fellowes threw a dagger at the preacher: but who it was, came not to knowlege.

A dagger throwne at the preacher.

By reaſon of which outrage the preacher withdrew himſelfe from the pulpit, and one maiſter Bradford at the requeſt of the preachers brother and others ſtanding there, tooke the place, and ſpake ſo mildlie to the people, that with few words he appeaſed their furie: and after the ſaid maiſter Bradford and maiſter Rogers, although men of contrarie religion, conueied the ſaid preacher into Paules ſchoole, and there left him ſafelie.

The preacher at Pauls croſſe defended by the gard.

The next ſundaie following, for feare of a like tumult or worſe, order was taken that the quéens gard ſhould be preſent in place to defend the preacher with weapons. Whereupon the wiſer men perceiuing ſuch a number of weapons, and that great perill was not vnlike to inſue, by ſuch appéerance of late not accuſtomed, would not be preſent at the ſermon, by reaſon whereof there was left a ſmall auditorie. Wherefore afterward there was a commandement giuen by the lord maior, that the ancients of the companies ſhould be preſent at the next ſermon in their liueries, and ſo they were, whereby all became quiet.

The duke of Northumberlād arreigned.

The eightéenth of Auguſt next following, the duke of Northumberland, the lord marqueſſe of Northampton, and the earle of Warwike, ſon and heire to the ſaid duke, were brought into Weſtminſter hall, and there arreigned of high treaſon before Thomas duke of Norffolke high Steward of England.

The duke of Northumberland at his comming to the barre, vſed great reuerence towards the iudges: and proteſting his faith and allegiance to the quéens maieſtie, whome he confeſſed gréeuouſlie to haue offended, he ſaid that he meant not to ſpeake anie thing in defenſe of his fact, but would firſt vnderſtand th'opinion of the court in two points.

The dukes requeſt to vnderſtand the opinion of the court in two points.

Firſt whether a man dooing anie act by authoritie of the princes councell, & by warrant of the great ſeale of England, & dooing nothing without the ſame, maie be charged with treaſon for any thing which he might do by warrant thereof? Secondlie, whether anie ſuch perſons as were equally culpable in that crime, and thoſe by whoſe letters and commandements he was directed in all his dooings might be his iudges, or paſſe vpon his triall as his péeres? Whereunto was anſwered, that as concerning the firſt, the great ſeale which he laid for his warrant, was not the ſeale of the lawfull quéene of the realme, nor paſſed by authoritie: but the ſeale of an vſurper, and therefore could be no warrant to him. And to the ſecond it was alledged, that if anie were as déeplie to be touched in that caſe as himſelfe, yet ſo long as no atteindor were of record againſt them, they were neuertheleſſe perſons able in law to paſſe vpon anie triall, and not to be chalenged therefore, but at the princes pleaſure. After which anſwer the duke vſing few words, declared his earneſt repentance in the caſe (for he ſaw that to ſtand vpon vttering anie reaſonable matter, as might ſéeme, would little preuaile) and he mooued the duke of Norffolke to be a meane vnto the quéene for mercie, and without further anſwer confeſſed the indictment, by whoſe example the other priſoners arreigned with him, did likewiſe confeſſe the indictments produced againſt them, and therevpon had iudgement.

Abr. Fl. ex I.S.pag.1069. The duke of Northumberlands foure requeſts after his iudgment.

¶ Now when iudgement was giuen, the duke ſaid; I beſéech you my lords all to be humble ſuters to the quéenes maieſtie, and to grant me foure requeſts, which are theſe: firſt, that I maie haue that death which noble men haue had in times paſt, and not the other: ſecondarilie, that hir maieſtie will be gratious to my children which maie hereafter doo good ſeruice, conſidering that they went by my commandement who am their father, and not of their owne frée willes: thirdlie, that I may haue appointed to me ſome learned man for the inſtruction and quieting of my conſcience: and fourthlie, that ſhe will ſend two of the councell to commune with me, to whome I will declare ſuch matters as ſhall be expedient for hir and the common-weale: and thus I beſéech you all to praie for me.

The ninetéenth of Auguſt, ſir Andrew Dudleie, ſir John Gates, and ſir Henrie Gates brethren, and ſir Thomas Palmer knights, were arreigned at Weſtminſter; and confeſſing their indictments, had iudgement, which was pronounced by the marqueſſe of Wincheſter high treaſuror of England that ſate that daie as chiefe iuſtice.

Preacher at Pauls croſſe garded.

On the twentith of Auguſt doctor Watſon chapleine to the biſhop of Wincheſter preached at Pauls croſſe, by the quéenes appointment, & for feare of the like tumult as had béene not long before, certeine lords of the councell repaired to the ſermon, as the lord treaſuror, the lord priuie ſeale, the earle of Bedford, the earle of Penbroke, the lord Wentworth, the lord Rich, and ſir Henrie Gerningam capteine of the gard with two hundred of the gard, which ſtood about the preacher with halberts. Alſo the maior had warned the companies of the citie to be preſent in their liueries, which was well accepted of the quéenes councell: and the ſermon was quietlie ended.

On the two and twentith of Auguſt John duke of Northumberland was beheaded on the tower hill, whoſe bodie with the head was buried in the tower, by the bodie of Edward late duke of Sumerſet. So that there lieth before the high altar two dukes betwéene two quéenes, to wit, the duke of Summerſet & the duke of Northumberland betwéene quéene Anne and quéene Katharine, all foure beheaded.

Sir John Gates and ſir Thomas Palmer beheaded.

At the ſame time and place alſo was likewiſe beheaded ſir John Gates, and ſir Thomas Palmer, which ſir John Gates in that place vſed few words, but laid downe his head without anie kercher, and had the ſame ſtriken off at thrée blowes. Sir Thomas Palmer, as ſoone as he came to the ſcaffold, tooke euerie man by the hand, and deſired them to praie for him: then putting off his gowne, he leaned vpon the eaſt raile, and ſaid theſe words in effect.

The effect of ſuch words as ſir Thomas Palmer vttered on the ſcaffold at his death.

MY maiſters (quoth he) God ſaue you all. It is not vnknowne vnto you wherefore I come hither, which I haue worthilie well deſerued at Gods hands: for I know it to be his diuine ordinance, by this meanes to call me to his mercie, and to teach me to know my ſelfe, what I am, and wherevnto we are all ſubiect: I thanke his mercifull goodneſſe, for hée hath cauſed me to learne more in one little darke corner in yonder tower, than euer I learned by anie trauell in ſo manie places as I haue béene. For there (I ſaie) I haue ſéene God, what he is, & how vnſearchable his woonderous works are, & how infinit his mercies be: I haue ſéene there my ſelfe throughlie, and what I am, nothing but a lumpe of ſin, earth, duſt, and of all vileneſſe moſt vileſt: I haue ſéene there and know what the world is, how vaine, deceitfull, tranſitorie, and ſhort it is; how wicked and lothſome the works thereof are in the ſight of Gods maieſtie; how he neither regardeth the manaces of the proud men and mightie ones, neither deſpiſeth the humbleneſſe of the poore & lowlie which are in the ſame world: finallie, I haue ſéene there what death is, how nie hanging ouer all mens heds, and yet how vncerteine the time, and how vnknowne to all men, and how little it is to be feared. And ſhould I feare death or be ſad therefore? Haue I not ſéene two die before mine eies? Yea and within the hearing of mine eares? No, neither the ſprinkling of the bloud, nor the ſheading thereof, nor the bloudie ax it ſelfe ſhall make me afraid. And now taking my leaue of the ſame, I praie you all to praie for me. Come on good fellow (quoth he) art thou he that muſt doo the déed? I forgiue thée with all my hart; & then knéeling downe, & laieng his hed on the blocke, he ſaid; I will ſée how méet the blocke is for my necke, I praie thée ſtrike not yet, for I haue a few praiers to ſaie; and that doone, ſtrike on Gods name, good leaue haue thou.

His praiers ended, and deſiring ech man to praie for him, he laid downe his head againe, and ſo the executioner forthwith tooke it from him at one ſtroke.

New lord chancellor.

On the thrée and twentith of Auguſt the quéene deliuered the great ſeale to doctor Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter, and made him lord chancellor.

Latine ſeruice.

The ſeauen and twentith of Auguſt, the ſeruice began in Latine to be ſoong in Pauls church in London.

Great Harrie a ſhip burnt.

The ſix and twentith of Auguſt in the euening the notableſt ſhip in England called the great Harrie was burnt at Woolwich by negligence of the mariners, ſhe was of burthen a thouſand tuns.

Preſt to the quéene.

The firſt of September the quéene demanded a preſt of the citie of London of twentie thouſand pounds, to be repaied againe within fouretéene daies after Michaelmaſſe next folowing, which ſum was leuied of the aldermen and one hundred & twentie commoners.

New coines.

The fourth of September was proclamed certeine new coins of gold and ſiluer, a ſouereigne of gold of thirtie ſhillings, the halfe ſoueraigne fiftéene ſhillings, an angell at ten ſhillings, the halfe angell fiue ſhillings. Of ſiluer, the grote, halfe grote and pennie: all baſe coines to be currant as before.

Subſidie pardoned.

Alſo the ſame daie by proclamation was pardoned the ſubſidie of foure ſhillings the pound of lands, and two ſhillings eight pence the pound of mouable goods, granted in the laſt parlement of king Edward the ſixt.]

The archbiſhop of Canturburie committed to the tower.

Soone after this Thomas Cranmer archbiſhop of Canturburie, and late before of king Edwards priuie councell, was committed to the tower of London, being charged of treaſon, not onelie for giuing aduiſe to the diſheriting of quéene Marie, but alſo for aiding the duke of Northumberland with certeine horſſe and men againſt the quéene, in the quarrell of the ladie Jane of Suffolke: wherein (if he were culpable) he lacked the prouidence and foreſight of after-claps, which *doctor Parker in the inſurrection of Ket vſing ſaued both his life and eſtimation.

Coronation of quéene Marie, hir pompe and traine.

Who rode before and after hir.

The ladie Elizabeth and the ladie Anne of Cleue.

¶ On the ſeuen and twentith of September quéene Marie came to the tower by water, accompanied with the ladie Elizabeth hir ſiſter, and other ladies, before whoſe arriuall there was ſhot a great peale of guns. The laſt of September quéene Marie rode through the citie of London towards Weſtminſter, ſitting in a chariot of cloth of tiſſue, drawne with ſix horſſes all trapped with the like cloth of tiſſue. She ſate in a gowne of purple veluet, furred with powdered ermins, hauing on hir head a kall of cloth of tinſell, béeſet with pearle and ſtone, and aboue the ſame vpon hir head a round circlet of gold, béeſet ſo richlie with pretious ſtones, that the value thereof was ineſtimable, the ſame kall and circle being ſo maſſie and ponderous, that ſhe was faine to beare vp hir head with hir hand, and the canopie was borne ouer hir chariot. Before hir rode a number of gentlemen & knights, then iudges, then doctors, then biſhops, then lords, then the councell, after whome followed the knights of the Bath in their robes, the biſhop of Wincheſter lord chancellor, and the marques of Wincheſter lord high treaſuror, next came the duke of Norffolke, and after him the earle of Oxford, who bare the ſword before hir, the maior of London in a gown of crimſin veluet bare the ſcepter of gold, &c. After the quéenes chariot ſir Edward Haſtings led hir horſſe in his hand: then came another chariot hauing a couering of cloth of ſiluer all white, and ſix horſſes trapped with the like: therein ſate the ladie Elizabeth, and the ladie Anne of Cleue: then ladies and gentlewomen riding on horſſes trapped with red veluet, and their gownes and kirtles likewiſe of red veluet; after them folowed two other chariots couered with red ſattin, and the horſſes betrapped with the ſame, and certeine gentlewomen betwéene euerie of the ſaid chariots riding in crimſin ſattin, their horſſes betrapped with the ſame; the number of the gentlewomen ſo riding were ſix and fortie, beſides them in the chariots.

A pageant made by ſtrangers.

The condnit in Cornewall ran wine.

At Fanchurch was a coſtlie pageant made by the Genowaies: at Gracechurch corner there was an other pageant made by the Eaſterlings. At the vpper end of Graceſtréet there was an other pageant made by the Florentins verie high, on the top whereof there ſtood foure pictures, and in the middeſt of them and moſt higheſt, there ſtood an angell all in gréene, with a trumpet in his hand: and when the trumpetter (who ſtood ſecretlie in the pageant) did ſound his trumpet, the angell did put his trumpet to his mouth, as though it had béene the ſame that had ſounded, to the great maruelling of manie ignorant perſons: this pageant was made with thrée thorough faires or gates, &c. The conduit in Cornehill ran wine, and beneath the conduit a pageant made at the charges of the citie, and an other at the great conduit in Cheape, and a founteine by it running wine. The ſtandard in Cheape new painted, with the waits of the citie aloft theron plaieng. The croſſe in Cheape new waſhed and burniſhed.

The recorder of London maketh a ſhort ſpéech to the quéene paſſing by.

A Dutchman on the weathercocke of Paules.

An other pageant at the little conduit in Cheape next to Paules was made by the citie, where the aldermen ſtood, & when the quéene came againſt them, the recorder made a ſhort propoſition to hir, and then the chamberleine preſented to hir in the name of the maior and the citie, a purſe of cloth of gold, and a thouſand marks of gold in it: then ſhe rode forth, and in Paules church-yard againſt the ſchoole, one maſter Heiwood ſat in a pageant vnder a vine, and made to hir an oration in Latine & Engliſh. Then was there one Peter a Dutchman that ſtood on the weathercocke of Paules ſtéeple, holding a ſtreamer in his hand of fiue yards long, and wauing thereof, ſtood ſometimes on the one foot, and ſhooke the other, and then knéeled on his knees, to the great maruell of all people. He had made two ſcaffolds vnder him, one aboue the croſſe, hauing torches and ſtreamers ſet on it, and an other ouer the ball of the croſſe likewiſe ſet with ſtreamers & torches, which could not burne, the wind was ſo great: the ſaid Peter had ſixtéene pounds thirtéene ſhillings foure penſe giuen him by the citie for his coſts and paines, and for all his ſtuffe.

A pageant wherein the quériſters of Paules plaid on vials.

Quéene Marie crowned quéene by Stephan Gardiner.

Then was there a pageant made againſt the deane of Paules gate, where the quériſters of Paules plaied on vials and ſong. Ludgate was newlie repared, painted, and richlie hanged, with minſtrels plaieng and ſinging there. Then was there an other pageant at the conduit in Fléetſtréet, and the temple barre was newlie painted and hanged. And thus ſhe paſſed to Whitehall at Weſtminſter, where ſhe tooke hir leaue of the lord maior, giuing him great thanks for his pains, and the citie for their coſt. On the morrow, which was the firſt daie of October, the quéene went by water to the old palace, and there remained till about eleuen of the clocke, and then went on foot vpon blew cloth, being railed on either ſide, vnto ſaint Peters church, where ſhe was ſolemnlie crowned and annointed by Stephan Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter (for the archbiſhops of Canturburie and Yorke were then priſoners in the tower) which coronation and other ceremonies and ſolemnities then vſed according to the old cuſtome, was not fullie ended till it was nigh foure of the clocke at night that ſhe returned from the church, before whom was then borne thrée ſwords ſheathed, & one naked. The great ſeruice that daie done in Weſtminſter hall at dinner by diuerſe noblemen, would aſke long time to write. The lord maior of London & twelue citizens kept the high cupboord of plate as butlers: and the quéene gaue to the maior for his fée a cupboord of gold with a couer weieng ſeuentéene ounces.]

A pardon with exceptions.

At the time of this quéenes coronation, there was publiſhed a generall pardon in hir name, being interlaced with ſo manie exceptions, as they that néeded the ſame moſt, tooke ſmalleſt benefit thereby. In which were excepted by name no ſmall number, not onelie of biſhops and other of the cleargie, namelie the archbiſhops of Canturburie and Yorke, the biſhop of London, but alſo manie lords, knights, and gentlemen of the laitie, beſide the two chiefe iuſtices of England called ſir Edward Montacute, and ſir Roger Cholmeleie, with ſome other learned men in the law, for counſelling, or at the leaſt conſenting to the depriuation of quéene Marie, and aiding of the foreſaid duke of Northumberland, in the pretenſed right of the before named ladie Jane, the names of which perſons ſo being excepted, I haue omitted for ſhortneſſe ſake.

Commiſſioners.

A parlement.

As ſoone as this pardon was publiſhed, and the ſolemnitie of the feaſt of the coronation ended, there were certeine commiſſioners aſſigned to take order with all ſuch perſons as were excepted out of the pardon, and others, to compound with the quéene for their ſeuerall offenſes. Which commiſſioners ſat at the deane of Paules his houſe, at the weſt end of Paules church, and there called before them the ſaid perſons apart, and from ſome they tooke their fées and offices granted before by king Edward the ſixt, and yet neuertheleſſe putting them to their fines: and ſome they committed to ward, depriuing them of their ſtates and liuings: ſo that for the time, to thoſe that taſted thereof, it ſéemed verie grieuous. God deliuer vs from incurring the like danger of law againe. The fift daie of October next following, the quéene held hir hie court of parlement at Weſtminſter, which continued vntill the one and twentith daie of the ſaid moneth.

Treaſon. Fellonie. Premunire.

In the firſt ſeſſion of which parlement, there paſſed no more acts but one, and that was, to declare queene Marie lawfull heire in deſcent to the crowne of England by the common lawes, next after hir brother king Edward; and to repeale certeine cauſes of treaſon, fellonie, and premunire, conteined in diuers former ſtatutes: the which act of repeale was, for that cardinall Poole was eſpeciallie looked for (as after ye ſhall heare) for the reducing of the church of England to the popes obedience: and to the end that the ſaid cardinall now called into England from Rome, might hold his courts legantine without the danger of the ſtatutes of the premunire, made in that caſe, whereinto cardinall Wolſeie (when he was legat) had incurred to his no ſmall loſſe, and to the charge of all the clergie of England, for exerciſing the like power: the which act being once paſſed, forthwith the queene repaired to the parlement houſe, and gaue thereunto hir roiall aſſent, and then proroged the parlement vnto the foure and twentith date of the ſaid moneth. In which ſecond ſeſſion were confirmed and made diuerſe and ſundrie ſtatutes concerning religion, whereof ſome were reſtored, and other repealed.

The parlement proroged.

Sir Iames Hales in trouble for religion.

Sée before pag.1083.

At this time manie were in trouble for religion, and among others, ſir Iames Hales knight, one of the iuſtices of the common plées, which iuſtice being called among other by the councell of king Edward to ſubſcribe to a deuiſe made for the diſheriting of quéene Marie, and the ladie Elizabeth hir ſiſter, would in no wiſe aſſent to the ſame, though moſt of the other did: yet that notwithſtanding, for that he at a quarter ſeſſions holden in Kent, gaue charge vpon the ſtatutes of king Henrie the eight, and king Edward the ſixt, in derogation of the primaſie of the church of Rome, aboliſhed by king Henrie the eight, he was firſt committed priſoner to the Kings bench, then to the Counter, & laſt to the Fléet, where, whether it were thorough extreame feare, or elſe by reaſon of ſuch talke as the warden of the Fléet vſed vnto him, of more trouble like to inſue, if he perſiſted in his opinion (or for what other cauſe, God knoweth) he was ſo moued, troubled, and vexed, that he ſought to rid himſelfe out of this life, which thing he firſt attempted in the Fléet, by wounding himſelfe with a penknife, well néere to death. Neuertheleſſe afterward being recouered of that hurt, he ſéemed to be verie conformable to all the quéenes procéedings, and was therevpon deliuered of his impriſonment, and brought to the quéenes preſence, who gaue him words of great comfort: neuertheleſſe his mind was not quiet (as afterward well appeared) for in the end he drowned himſelfe in a riuer not halfe a mile from his dwelling houſe in Kent, the riuer being ſo ſhalow, that he was faine to lie groueling before he could diſpatch himſelfe, whoſe death was much lamented. For beſide that he was a man wiſe, vertuous, and learned in the lawes of the realme, he was alſo a good and true miniſter of iuſtice, whereby he gat him great fauour and eſtimation among all degrées.

Sore temptations in afflictions, againſt which we are to praie for patience.

He drowneth himſelfe.

A publike diſputation about the reall preſence in the ſacrament.

During the aforeſaid parlement, about the eightéenth daie of October, there was kept at Paules church in London a publike diſputation, appointed by the quéenes commandement, about the preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament of the altar, which diſputation continued ſix daies, doctor Weſton then being prolocutor of the conuocation, who vſed manie vnſéemelie checks & tawnts againſt the one part, to the preiudice of their cauſe. By reaſon whereof the diſputers neuer reſolued vpon the article proponed, but grew dailie more and more into contention, without anie fruit of their long conference, and ſo ended this diſputation, with theſe words ſpoken by doctor Weſton prolocutor: It is not the quéens pleaſure that we ſhould herein ſpend anie longer time, ” and ye are well inough, for you haue the word, and ” we haue the ſword. But of this matter ye maie read more in the booke of the monuments of the church. At this time was cardinall Poole ſent for to Rome by the quéene, who was verie deſirous of his comming, as well for the cauſes before declared, as alſo for the great affection that ſhe had to him, being hir néere kinſman, and conſenting with hir in religion.

Iohn Fox.

Cardinall Poole ſent for home.

This meſſage was moſt thankefullie receiued at Rome, and order taken to ſend the ſaid cardinall hither with great expedition: but before his comming, quéene Marie had married Philip prince of Spaine, The councell diuided about the receiuing of the cardinall.

as after ſhall appeare. But here to touch ſomwhat the comming of the ſaid cardinall. When he was arriued at Calis, there was conference had amongeſt the councellors of the queene for the maner of his receiuing: ſome would haue had him verie honourablie met and interteined, as he was in all places where he had before paſſed, not onelie for that he was a cardinall, and a legat from the pope; but alſo for that he was the queenes neere kinſman, of the houſe of Clarence. Neuertheleſſe, after much debating, it was thought meeteſt, firſt, for that by the lawes of the realme (which yet were not repealed) he ſtood attainted by parlement, and alſo for that it was doubtfull how he being ſent from Rome, ſhould be accepted of the people, who in fiue and twentie yeares before, had not beene much acquainted with the pope or his cardinals, that therefore (vntill all things might be put in order for that purpoſe) he ſhould come without anie great ſolemnitie vnto Lambeth, where (in the archbiſhops houſe) his lodging was prepared.

Cranmer archbiſhop of Canturburie arreigned of treaſon.

Ambaſſadors from the emperour.

The third of Nouember next following, Thomas Cranmer archbiſhop of Canturburie (notwithſtanding that he had once refuſed plainelie to ſubſcribe to king Edwards will, in the diſheriting of his ſiſter Marie, and alledging manie reaſons and arguments for the legitimation of both the kings ſiſters) was in the Guildhall in London arreigned and attainted of treaſon, namelie for aiding the duke of Northumberland with horſſe and men againſt the queene, as aforeſaid. At the ſame time alſo, the ladie Iane of Suffolke (who for a while was called queene Iane) and the lord Gilford hir huſband, the lord Ambroſe and lord Henrie Dudleie ſonnes to the duke of Northumberland, were likewiſe arreigned and attainted, and therevpon led backe againe to the tower. In the beginning of Ianuarie next following, Charles the fift emperor ſent into England an honorable ambaſſage, amongeſt whome was the Conte de Aiguemont admerall of the low countries, with Charles Conte de la Laing, Iohn de Montmorancie lord of Curriers, and the chancellor Nigre, with full commiſſion to conclude a mariage betweene Philip prince of Spaine his ſonne & heire, and queene Marie (as you haue heard) which ambaſſage tooke ſuch place, that ſhortlie after all things were finiſhed accordinglie.

Ab. Fl. ex I. S. pag. 1077.

Stephan Gardiner maketh an oration to the lords of the councell &c: touching the queenes marriage.

Gardiner cōmendeth the king of Spaine.

¶ On the fourteenth of Ianuarie, doctor Stephan Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter lord chancellour of England, in the chamber of preſence at Weſtminſter, made to the lords, nobilitie, and gentlemen, an oration verie eloquent, wherein he declared that the queenes maieſtie, partlie for amitie, and other weightie conſiderations had, after much ſute on the emperours and prince of Spaines behalfe made, determined by the conſent of the councell and nobilitie, to match hir ſelfe with the ſaid prince in moſt godlie and lawfull matrimonie; and declared further, that ſhe ſhould haue for hir iointer thirtie thouſand ducats by the yeare, with all the low countrie of Flanders, and that the iſſue (if there happened anie) betweene them two lawfullie begotten, ſhould be heire as well to the kingdome of Spaine, as alſo to the ſaid low countrie. He ſaid therefore that they were all bound to thanke God, that ſo noble, worthie, and famous a prince would vouchſafe ſo to humble himſelfe, as in this marriage to take vpon him rather as a ſubiect, than otherwiſe. For the queene & hir councell ſhould rule all things as ſhe did before, and that there ſhould be of the councell no ſtranger, neither to haue cuſtodie of any forts or caſtels, &c: nor to beare anie rule or office in the queenes houſe, or elſe-where in all England, with diuerſe other articles there by him rehearſed. Wherefore he ſaid the queenes pleaſure and requeſt was, that like good ſubiects for hir ſake, they would moſt louinglie receiue him with reuerence, ioie, and honour. On the next daie, the lord maior of London with his bretheren the aldermen, were ſent for to the court, and to bring with them fortie of the head commoners of the citie, vnto whome before the councell, the lord chancellor made the like oration, deſiring them to behaue themſelues like good ſubiects with all humbleneſſe and reioiſing.]

But this marriage was not well thought of by the commons, nor much better liked of manie of the nobilitie, who for this, and for the cauſe of religion, conſpired to raiſe war, rather than to ſee ſuch change of the ſtate. Of the which conſpiracie though there were manie confederats; yet the firſt that ſhewed force therein, was one ſir Thomas Wiat a knight in Kent, who in verie deed was driuen to preuent the time of the purpoſed enterpriſe by this hap. Diuerſe of the partakers in this conſpiracie, being withdrawne from London (where they had deuiſed their drift) home into their countries (amongſt whome the ſaid ſir Thomas Wiat was one) it fell out, that whileſt he was returned into Kent, where his lands and liuings chieflie laie, a gentleman of that ſhire, one to the ſaid ſir Thomas Wiat moſt deere, was by the councell for other matters committed to the Fleet. Wherevpon he verelie ſuſpecting his ſecrets were betraied, had no other ſhift (as he tooke it) but to put on armour, and to begin the attempt, before the time appointed with his complices. And herevpon giuing intelligence of his determination to his aſſociats, as well at London, as elſe-where, on the thurſdaie next following, being the fiue and twentith of Ianuarie at Maidſtone, being accompanied with maſter Thomas Iſleie and others, publiſhed a proclamation againſt the queenes marriage, deſiring all his neighbors, freends, and Engliſhmen to ioine with him and others, to defend the realme in danger to be brought in thraldome vnto ſtrangers: and herewith he gat him to Rocheſter, and met with ſir George Harper by the waie, that was one appointed afore to ioine with him in that quarrell. They brake vp the bridge at Rocheſter, and fortified the eaſt part of the towne, & ſtaid there abiding the comming of more ſtrength, and in the meane while ſuffered all paſſengers to paſſe quietlie thorough the towne to London, or to the ſea, taking nothing from them, but onelie their weapons.

Wiat publiſheth a proclamation at Maidſtone.

He commeth to Rocheſter.

Sir George Harper.

In the meane while, ſir Henrie Iſleie, Anthonie Kneuet eſquier, and his brother William Kneuet were buſie in weſt Kent to raiſe the people there; and likewiſe in eaſt Kent there were other that were of the ſame confederacie, which ſet forth the like proclamations at Milton, Aſhford, and other towns there in that part of the ſhire: and thus in each part of Kent in a maner was great ſtur. But yet ſuch was the diligence and warie circumſpection of Iohn Twine at that preſent maior of Canturburie, for that he miſliked their diſordered attempts, that there was not any of that citie knowne to ſtur, or go forth to ioine themſelues with the ſaid ſir Thomas Wiat, or with anie other of his confederats: and yet verelie the more part of the people in all other parts of that ſhire were maruellouſlie affected to the ſaid ſir Thomas Wiats quarrell, doubting that which might follow of the queenes matching hir ſelfe thus with a ſtranger. At Milton when a gentleman of thoſe parts named Chriſtopher Roper, went about to reſiſt them that ſet forth this proclamation, he was taken and conueied to Rocheſter vnto maſter Wiat. Likewiſe maiſter Tucke and maiſter Dorrell iuſtices of peace, were fetched out of their owne houſes, & likewiſe brought to Rocheſter, where they with the ſaid Roper were kept as priſoners.

Chriſtopher Roper taken.

Maiſter Dorrell & maiſter Tucke taken.

Sir Thomas Wiat writeth to ſir Robert Southwell.

Sir Thomas Wiat had written vnto ſir Robert Southwell ſhiriffe of Kent, to moue him in (reſpect of the preſeruation of the common-wealth now in danger to be ouerrun of ſtrangers, through the pretenſed marriage, if it ſhould go forward) to ioine with him and others, in ſo neceſſarie a cauſe for the diſappointing of the ſame marriage, and to worke ſo with the lord of Aburgauennie, with whom he might doo much, that it might pleaſe him alſo to ioine with them. But as well the ſaid ſir Robert Southwell, as the ſaid lord of Aburgauennie, and one George Clerke aſſembled themſelues with ſuch power as they might make againſt the ſaid ſir Thomas Wiat and his adherents; and comming to Malling on the ſaturdaie, being the market daie & ſeuen and twentith of Ianuarie, the ſaid ſir Robert Southwell hauing penned an exhortation to diſſuade the people, and to bring them from hauing anie liking to Wiats enterpriſe, did read the ſame openlie vnto all the people there aſſembled, in confuting, reprouing, and refelling the proclamations ſet forth by ſir Thomas Wiat and his adherents.

The ſhiriffe of Kent and the lord of Aburgauennie aſſemble a power againſt Wiat.

On the other part, ſir Henrie Iſleie, Anthonie Kneuet, and his brother William Kneuet being at Tunbridge, proclamed the ſhiriffe, the lord of Aburgauennie, & George Clerke gentleman, traitors to God, the crowne, and the common-welth, for raiſing the queenes ſubiects, to defend the moſt wicked & diuelliſh enterpriſe of certeine of the wicked & peruerſe councellors. And this they pronounced in their owne names & in the names of ſir Thomas Wiat, ſir George Harper, and of all the faithfull gentlemen of Kent, & truſtie commoners of the ſame. This doone, they marched to Seuennocke, mening from thence to paſſe to Rocheſter. But in the meane time the foreſaid 27 of Ianuarie, there came from the queene an herald & a trumpetter to ſir Thomas Wiat, but he was not ſuffered to paſſe the bridge, and ſo did his meſſage at the bridge end, in the hearing of ſir Thomas Wiat and diuerſe others. The effect of his meſſage was, to offer pardon to ſo manie as within foure and twentie houres would depart to their houſes, and become quiet ſubiects.

An herald ſent to Wiat.

The lord warden is ſent to Wiat.

Sir Thomas Cheineie lord warden ſent alſo vnto Wiat, with words of contempt and defiance, deſirous in deed to haue beene dooing with him, if hee had not miſtruſted his owne people, which he ſhould haue brought againſt him, as thoſe that fauoured ſo greatlie Wiats cauſe, that they would haue beene loth to haue ſeene him take anie foile. And that ſir Thomas Wiat knew well inough, and therefore deſired nothing more than to haue him come foorth, vnderſtanding that he wanted no friends, as well about him, as all other that would take in hand to repreſſe him with force gathered in that ſhire. The lord of Aburgauennie, the ſhiriffe Warram Sentleger, and diuerſe other gentlemen that were aſſembled at Malling, laie there within foure miles of Rocheſter on ſaturdaie at night, & hauing aduertiſement that ſir Henrie Iſleie, the two Kneuets, and certeine other, with fiue hundred Weldiſhmen, being at Seuennocke, meant earlie in the morning to march towards Rocheſter for the aid of Wiat againſt the duke of Norffolke, that was come to Grauesend with fiue hundred white cotes Londoners, and certeine of the gard: and further that the ſaid ſir Henrie Iſleie and the Kneuets meant in their waie to burne and ſpoile the houſe of George Clerke gentleman: they departing with fiue hundred gentlemen & likewiſe yeomen, verie earlie that ſundaie in the morning, marched out in order till they came to Wrotham heath, where they might eaſilie heare the ſound of their aduerſaries drums, and therevpon followed after them with all ſpeed, till they came to a place called Barrow greene, through which laie the right readie waie from Seuennocke towards maiſter Clerks houſe. Here the lord of Aburgauennie ſtaied for the comming of his enimies, and vnderſtanding they were at hand, placed his men in order, thinking to giue or take the ouerthrow. But they vpon their approch, miſliking (as it ſhould ſeeme) the match, ſhranke aſide as ſecretlie as they could, by a bywaie, and were ſo farre gone before the lord of Aburgauennie vnderſtood thereof by his eſpials, as for doubt of ouertaking them afore their comming to Rocheſter, he was driuen to make ſuch haſt for the ouertaking of them, as diuerſe of his footmen were farre behind at the onſet giuing.

Weldiſhmen, that is, ſuch as dwel in the Weld of Kent.

Wrotham heath.

Barrow greene.

The firſt ſight that the lord of Aburgauennie could haue of them, after they forſooke their purpoſed waie, was as they aſcended Wrotham hill, directlie vnder Yallam maiſter Pechams houſe, where they thinking to haue great aduantage by the winning of the hill, diſplaied their enſignes, thinking they had beene out of danger. But the Lord of Aburgauennie made ſuch haſt after them, that ouertaking them at a field in the pariſh of Wrotham, a mile diſtant from the verie top of the hill, called Blacke ſoll field, after ſome reſiſtance with ſhot and arrowes, and proffer of onſet made by their horſſemen, they were put to flight, and chaſed for the ſpace of foure miles, euen to Hartleie wood. Threeſcore of them were taken priſoners, and ſome on both ſides were wounded, as commonlie commeth to paſſe in an ordinarie and priuat fraie: how then is it poſſible, that a ſkirmiſh ſhould be vnſeaſoned with ſlaughter and bloudſhed, ſpeciallie in a ſedition or inſurrection, which is the plague of all common-wealths, as the poet ſaith:

Wrotham hill. Yallam.

Blacke ſoll field.

The ſkirmiſh.

———regnorum peſſima peſtis Seditio.

Sir Henrie Iſleie fled into Hampſhire, Anthonie Kneuet made ſuch ſhift, that he got that night vnto Rocheſter; and the ſame time ſir George Harper departing from ſir Thomas Wiat, and comming to the duke of Norffolke, ſubmitted himſelfe vnto his grace, & the duke receiued him. Which duke (as before ye haue partlie heard) being ſent with fiue hundred Londoners, and certeine of the gard for his better defenſe, to go againſt the Kentiſhmen thus aſſembled with ſir Thomas Wiat, was come downe to Grauesend, ſet foorth from thence on mondaie the nine and twentith daie of Ianuarie, about ten of the clocke in the forenoone, marching towards Stroud on this ſide of Rocheſter, & about foure of the clocke in the after noone of the ſame daie, he arriued at Stroud neare vnto Rocheſter, hauing with him ſir Henrie Iernigham capteine of the gard, ſir Edward Braie, ſir Iohn Fog, knights, Iohn Couert, Roger Appleton, eſquiers, Maurice Griffith the biſhop of Rocheſter, Thomas Swan gentleman, with certeine of the gard, and others, to the number of two hundred or thereabout, beſides Bret and other fiue capteins, who with their bands taried behind at ſpittle hill neere vnto Stroud, whileſt the duke went to Stroud to ſee the placing of the ordinance, which being readie charged & bent vnto the towne of Rocheſter, and perceiuing by ſir Thomas Wiat and his men by hanging out their enſignes, little to regard him, the duke commanded one of the peeces to be fired and ſhot off into Rocheſter, and as the gunner was firing the peece, ſir Edward Braies eldeſt ſon came in all haſt to the duke, and told him how the Londoners would betraie him.

The duke of Norffolke arriueth at Stroud.

Herewith turning backe, he might behold how Bret, and the other capteins of the white cotes with their bands being vpon the hill, and at his backe, made great and lowd ſhouts ſundrie times, crieng; We are all Engliſhmen, we are all Engliſhmen: faſhioning themſelues in araie, readie bent with their their weapons to ſet vpon the duke, if he had made anie reſiſtance: whervpon the duke willed the péeces that were bent againſt Rocheſter, to be turned vpon Bret and his fellowes. But vpon further conſideration the ſhot was ſpared, and the dukes grace, with the capteine of the gard, conſidering with wofull hearts their chiefe ſtrength thus turned againſt them; and being thus inuironed both behind and before with enimies, ſhifted themſelues awaie, as did alſo their companie. Sir Thomas Wiat accompanied with two or thrée, and not manie mo, came forth halfe a mile from Rocheſter, to méet Bret and the other capteins, amongſt whom was ſir George Harper, notwithſtanding his former ſubmiſſion to the duke. Their méeting verelie ſéemed right ioifull both in geſture and countenance, & therewith hauing ſaluted each other, they entered all togither into Rocheſter. The lord of Aburgauennie & the ſhiriffe were greatlie abaſhed when they vnderſtood of this miſhap, for they doubted that ſuch as were euill diſpoſed before, would not be greatlie amended thereby. The ſhiriffe being then at Maidſtone, haſted to come to Malling, where the lord of Aburgauennie laie, and vpon his comming thither, he tooke aduiſe to ride in poſt to the councell, to know their minds how they would direct them. Sir Thomas Wiat and his aſſociats were greatlie recomforted with this new ſupplie added to their ſtrength, by the reuolting thus of the Londoners: and verelie it bred no ſmall hope in all their hearts that wiſhed well to his enterpriſe, that he ſhould the better atteine vnto the hoped end of his purpoſe. But it pleaſed God otherwiſe, who neuer proſpereth anie that attempt ſuch exploits without publike and lawfull authoritie.

The duke with the capteine of the gard, &c: put to their ſhifts.

The ſhiriffe of Kent rideth to the councell.

In this meane while, the duke of Suffolke being perſuaded to ioine with other in this quarell, as he that doubted (as no ſmall number of true Engliſhmen then did) leaſt the pretended mariage with the Spaniſh king ſhould bring the whole nobilitie and people of this realme into bondage and thraldome of ſtrangers, after he was once aduertiſed that ſir Thomas Wiat had preuented the time of their purpoſed enterpriſe, he ſecretlie one euening departed from Shéene, and rode with all ſpéed into Leiceſterſhire, where in the towne of Leiceſter and other places, hée cauſed proclamation to be made in ſemblable wiſe, as ſir Thomas Wiat had doone, againſt the quéenes match which ſhe meant to make with the ſaid king of Spaine: but few there were that would willinglie hearken thereto. But now ye muſt vnderſtand, that before his comming downe, he was perſuaded that the citie of Couentrie would be opened vnto him, the more part of the citizens being throughlie bent in his fauour, in ſo neceſſarie a quarell, for defenſe of the realme againſt ſtrangers, as they were then perſuaded.

The duke of Suffolke goeth downe into Leiceſterſhire.

The citie of Couentrie.

But howſoeuer it chanced, this prooued not altogither true: for whether through the miſliking which the citizens had of the matter, or through negligence of ſome that were ſent to ſollicit them in the cauſe, or chieflie (as ſhould ſéeme to be moſt true) for that God would haue it ſo, when the duke came with ſix or ſeuen ſcore horſſemen well appointed for the purpoſe, preſenting himſelfe before the citie in hope to bée receiued, hée was kept out. For the citizens through comfort of the erle of Huntington that was then come downe, ſent by the quéene to ſtaie the countries from falling to the duke, and to raiſe a power to apprehend him, had put themſelues in armor, and made all the prouiſion they could to defend the citie againſt the ſaid duke. Whervpon perceiuing himſelfe deſtitute of all ſuch aid as he looked for among his friends in the two ſhires of Leiceſter and Warwike, he got him to his manour of Aſtleie, diſtant from Couentrie fiue miles, where appointing his companie to diſperſe themſelues, and to make the beſt ſhift each one for his owne ſafegard that he might, and diſtributing to euerie of them a portion of monie, according to their qualities, and his ſtore at that preſent, he and the lord Iohn Greie his brother beſtowed themſelues in ſecret places there within Aſtleie parke; but through the vntruſtineſſe of them, to whoſe truſt they did commit themſelues (as hath béene credible reported) they were bewraied to the earle of Huntington, that then was come to Couentrie, and ſo apprehended they were by the ſaid earle, and afterwards brought vp to London.

The duke of Suffolke kept out of Couentrie.

The duke of Suffolke apprehended.

The duke had meant at firſt to haue rid awaie (as I haue crediblie heard) if promiſe had béene kept by one of his ſeruants, appointed to come to him to be his guide; but when he either feining himſelfe ſicke, or being ſicke in déed, came not, the duke was conſtreined to remaine in the parke there at Aſtleie, hoping yet to get awaie after that the ſearch had béene paſſed ouer, and the countrie once in quiet. Howſoeuer it was, there he was taken, as is ſaid, togither with his brother the lord Iohn Greie; but his brother the lord Thomas got awaie in déed at that time, meaning to haue fled into Wales, & there to haue got to the ſea ſide, ſo to tranſport himſelfe ouer into France, or into ſome other forren part. But in the borders of Wales he was likewiſe apprehended through his great miſhap, and follie of his man that had forgot his capcaſe with monie behind him in his chamber one morning at his inne; and comming for it againe, vpon examination what he ſhould be, it was miſtruſted that his maiſter ſhould be ſome ſuch man, as he was in déed, and ſo was ſtaied, taken, and brought vp to London, where he ſuffered; as after ſhall appeare.

The lord Iohn Greie taken.

The lord Thomas Greie taken.

But now to returne vnto ſir Thomas Wiat. After that the Londoners were reuolted to him, as before ye haue heard; the next daie being tueſdaie the thirtith of Ianuarie, he marched forth with his bands, and ſix péeces of ordinance (which they had gotten of the quéenes) beſides their owne. And firſt they came to Cowling caſtell, an hold of the lord Cobhams, foure miles diſtant from Rocheſter, and not much out of the waie towards London, whither they were now fullie determined to go, in hope of friends which they truſted to find within and about the citie. At their comming to Cowling, knowing that the lord Cobham was within the caſtell, they bent their ordinance againſt the gate, breaking it with ſundrie ſhots, and burning it vp with fier, made a waie through it. The ſaid lord Cobham defended the place as ſtoutlie as he might, hauing but a few againſt ſo great a number, and ſo little ſtore of munition for his defenſe: he himſelfe yet diſcharged his gun at ſuch as approched the gate right hardilie, and in that aſſault two of his men were ſlaine. After this aſſault, and talke had with the lord Cobham, ſir Thomas Wiat marched to Graueſend, where he reſted that night.

Cowling caſtell.

The lord Cobham.

The next daie he came to Dartford with his bands, and laie there that night, whither came to him ſir Edward Haſtings maiſter of the quéenes horſſe, and ſir Thomas Cornwallis knights, both being of the quéenes priuie councell, and now ſent from hir vnto ſir Thomas Wiat, to vnderſtand the cauſe of his commotion. When he vnderſtood they were come, he tooke with him certeine of his band to the weſt end of the towne, where he had lodged his ordinance. And at the lighting downe of ſir Edward Haſtings and his aſſociat, ſir Thomas Wiat hauing a partiſan in his hand, aduancing himſelfe ſomewhat afore ſuch gentlemen as were with him, traced néere them:

to whome the maiſter of the horſſe ſpake in ſubſtance as followeth. The quéenes maieſtie requireth to vnderſtand the verie cauſe wherefore you haue thus gathered togither in armes hir liege people, which is the part of a traitor, and yet in your proclamations and perſuaſions, you call your ſelfe a true ſubiect, which can not ſtand togither I am no traitor quoth Wiat, and the cauſe wherefore I haue gathered the people, is to defend the realme from danger of being ouerrun with ſtrangers, which muſt follow, this mariage taking place.

Wiats requeſts.

Why, quoth the quéenes agents, there be no ſtrangers yet come, who either for power or number ye néed to ſuſpect. But if this be your onelie quarrell, becauſe ye miſlike the mariage; will ye come to communication touching that caſe, and the quéene of hir gratious goodneſſe is content ye ſhall be heard. I yéeld thereto, quoth ſir Thomas Wiat: but for my ſuertie I will rather be truſted than truſt, and therefore demanded, as ſome haue written, the cuſtodie of the tower, and hir grace within it; alſo the diſplacing of ſome councellors about hir, and to haue other placed in their roomes. There was long & ſtout conference betwéene them, in ſo much that the maiſter of the horſſe ſaid: Wiat, before thou ſhalt haue thy traitorous demand granted, thou ſhalt die, and twentie thouſand with thée. And ſo the ſaid maiſter of the horſſe, and ſir Thomas Cornewallis, perceiuing they could not bring him to that point they wiſhed, returned to the court, aduertiſing the quéene what they had heard of him. The ſame daie being the firſt of Februarie, proclamation was made in London by an herald, to ſignifie that the duke of Suffolkes companie of horſſemen were ſcattered, and that he himſelfe and his brethren were fled. Alſo that ſir Peter Carew, and ſir Gawen Carew knights, and William Gibs eſquire, which being parties to the conſpiracie of the ſaid duke, with ſir Thomas Wiat & others, were likewiſe fled. True it was that ſir Peter Carew, perceiuing himſelfe in danger to be apprehended, about the thrée and twentith of Ianuarie laſt paſt fled out of the realme, and eſcaped into France: but the other taried behind and were taken.

Proclamation that the duke of Suffolke and others were fled.

The emperors ambaſſadors flée from Wiat.

Moreouer, on this firſt daie of Februarie being Candlemas euen, the emperors ambaſſadors, of whome ye haue heard before, hearing of Wiats haſtie approching thus towards London, ſped themſelues awaie by water, and that with all haſt. The quéene then lieng at hir palace of White hall beſide Weſtminſter, and hearing of hir enimies ſo néere, was counſelled for hir ſafegard to take the tower of London, whereunto ſhe would by no meanes be perſuaded. Neuertheleſſe, to make hir ſelfe more ſtronger of friends in the citie, ſo ſoone as the ſaid ambaſſadors were departed, ſhe came to the Guildhall in London: againſt which time, order was taken by the lord maior, that the chiefe citizens in their liueries ſhould be there preſent. After that the quéene had taken hir place in the ſaid hall, and ſilence made, ſhe with verie good countenance vttered in effect this oration following.

Queene Maries oration in Guildhall in a ſolemne aſſemblie.

Quéene Maries oration to the Londoners.

I Am (quoth ſhée) come vnto you in mine owne perſon, to tell you that which alreadie you doo ſée and know, that is, how traitorouſlie & ſeditiouſlie a number of Kentiſh rebels haue aſſembled themſelues togither againſt both vs and you. Their pretenſe (as they ſaid at the firſt) was onelie to reſiſt a mariage determined betwéene vs and the prince of Spaine. To the which pretended quarrell, and to all the reſt of their euill contriued articles ye haue béene made priuie. Since which time, we haue cauſed diuerſe of our priuie councell to reſort eftſoones to the ſaid rebels, and to demand of them the cauſe of their continuance in their ſeditious enterpriſe. By whoſe anſwers made againe to our ſaid councell, it appeared that the mariage is found to be the leaſt of their quarrell. For they now ſwaruing from their former articles, haue bewraied the inward treaſon of their hearts, as moſt arrogantlie demanding the poſſeſſion of our perſon, the kéeping of our tower, and not onelie the placing & diſplacing of our councellors; but alſo to vſe them & vs at their pleaſures.

Demands are pretended to be ſent from M. Wiat and his companie to quéene Marie.

Now louing ſubiects, what I am, you right well know. I am your quéene, to whome at my coronation when I was wedded to the realme, and to the lawes of the ſame (the ſpouſall ring whereof I haue on my finger, which neuer hitherto was, nor hereafter ſhall be left off) ye promiſed your allegiance and obedience vnto me. And that I am the right and true inheritor to the crowne of this realme of England; I not onelie take all chriſtendoome to witneſſe, but alſo your acts of parlement confirming the ſame. My father (as ye all know) poſſeſſed the regall eſtate by right of inheritance, which now by the ſame right deſcended vnto me. And to him alwaies ye ſhewed your ſelues moſt faithfull and louing ſubiects, and him obeied and ſerued as your liege lord & king: and therefore I doubt not but you will ſhew your ſelues likewiſe to me his daughter. Which if you doo, then maie you not ſuffer anie rebell to vſurpe the gouernance of our perſon, or to occupie our eſtate, eſpeciallie being ſo preſumptuous a traitor as this Wiat hath ſhewed himſelfe to be; who muſt certeinlie, as he hath abuſed my ignorant ſubiects to be adherents to his traitorous quarrell: ſo doth he intend by colour of the ſame, to ſubdue the lawes to his will, and to giue ſcope to the raſcall and forlorne perſons, to make generall hauocke and ſpoile of your goods. And this further I ſay vnto you in the word of a prince, I cannot tell how naturallie a mother loueth hir children, for I was neuer the mother of anie; but certeinlie a prince and gouernor may as naturallie and as earneſtlie loue ſubiects, as the mother doth hir child. Then aſſure your ſelues, that I being your ſouereigne ladie & quéene, doo as earneſtlie and as tenderlie loue and fauour you. And I thus louing you, cannot but thinke that ye as hartilie and faithfullie loue me againe: and ſo louing togither in this knot of loue and concord, I doubt not, but we togither ſhall be able to giue theſe rebels a ſhort and ſpeedie ouerthrow.

How he pretended the ſpoile of their goods it appeareth in that he comming to Southworke, did hurt neither man, woman, nor child, neither in bodie nor in a pennie of their goods.

And as concerning the caſe of my intended marriage, againſt which they pretend their quarrell, ye ſhall vnderſtand that I entred not into the treatie thereof without aduiſe of all our priuie councell; yea, and by aſſent of thoſe to whome the king my father committed his truſt, who ſo conſidered & weighed the great commodities that might inſue thereof, that they not onlie thought it very honorable, but expedient, both for the wealth of our realme, and alſo of all our louing ſubiects. And as touching my ſelfe (I aſſure you) I am not ſo deſirous of wedding, neither ſo preciſe or wedded to my will, that either for mine owne pleaſure I will chooſe where I luſt, or elſe ſo amorous as néeds I muſt haue one. For God I thanke him (to whome be the praiſe thereof) I haue hitherto liued a virgine, and doubting nothing but with Gods grace ſhall as well be able ſo to liue ſtill. But if as my progenitors haue done before, it might pleaſe God that I might leaue ſome fruit of my bodie behind me to be your gouernour, I truſt you would not onelie reioiſe thereat, but alſo I know it would be to your great comfort. And certeinlie if I either did know or thinke, that this marriage ſhould either turne to the danger or loſſe of anie of you my louing ſubiects, or to the detriment or impairing of anie part or parcell of the roiall eſtate of this realme of England, I would neuer conſent therevnto, neither would I euer marrie while I liued. And in the word of a quéene I promiſe and aſſure you, that if it ſhall not probablie appéere before the nobilitie and commons in the high court of parlement, that this marriage ſhall be for the ſingular benefit and commoditie of all the whole realme; that then I will abſteine, not onelie from this marriage, but alſo from anie other, whereof perill maie inſue to this moſt noble realme. Wherefore now as good & faithfull ſubiects plucke vp your harts, and like true men ſtand faſt with your lawfull prince againſt theſe rebelles, both our enimies and yours, and feare them not: for aſſure you that I feare them nothing at all, & I will leaue with you my lord Howard, and my lord treaſuror to be your aſſiſtants, with my lord maior, for the defenſe and ſafegard of this citie from ſpoile and ſaccage, which is onelie the ſcope of this rebellious companie.

Quéene Marie excuſeth hir mariage.

The promiſe of quéene Marie touching hir marriage.

After this oration ended, the citizens ſéeming well ſatiſfied therewith, the queene with the lords of the councell returned to White hall from whence ſhe came: and forthwith the lord William Howard was aſſociate with the lord maior of London, whoſe name was ſir Thomas White for the protection and defenſe of the citie. And for more ſuertie, as well of hir owne perſon, as alſo of hir councellors and other ſubiects, ſhe prepared a great armie to méet with the ſaid rebelles in the field, of which armie William Herbert earle of Penbroke was made generall, which earle with all ſpéed requiſite in ſuch a caſe, prepared all things neceſſarie to ſuch a ſeruice belonging. The ſame daie ſir Thomas Wiat hauing with him fouretéene enſignes, conteining about foure thouſand men, although they were accounted to be a farre greater number, marched to Detford ſtrand, eight miles from Detford, and within foure miles of London; where vpon ſuch aduertiſement as he receiued by ſpiall, of the quéens being in the Guildhall, & the order of the people to hir wards, he remained that night & the next whole daie; diuerſe of his owne companie doubting by his longer tarrieng there than in other places, and vpon other preſumptions which they gathered, that he would haue paſſed the water into Eſſex.

Wiat marched to Detford ſtrand.

His priſoners Chriſtopher Roper, George Dorrell, and John Tucke eſquiers, who were kept ſomewhat ſtrict, for that they ſeemed ſicklie, and finding within the towne no conuenient harborough or attendance, were licenced by ſir Thomas Wiat, vpon promiſe of their worſhips to be true priſoners, to prouide for themſelues out from the towne, where they beſt might. But they breaking promiſe with him, ſought waies to eſcape and come no more at him. On ſaturdaie following verie earlie Wiat marched to Southworke, where approching the gate at London bridge foot, he called to them within to haue it opened: which he found not ſo readie as he looked for. After he had beene a little while in Southworke, and began to trench at the bridge foot, and ſet two peeces of ordinance againſt the gate, diuerſe of his ſoldiors went to Wincheſter place, where one of them (being a gentleman) began to fall to rifling of things found in the houſe. Wherewith ſir Thomas Wiat ſeemed ſo much offended, that he threatned ſore to hang him euen preſentlie there vpon the wharfe, and ſo as he made others to beleeue he meant to haue doone, if capteine Bret and others had not intreated for him.

Wiat ſuffereth his priſoners to go abrode vpon their word.

Wiat cõmeth into Southworke.

The lord William Howard lord admerall of England, being appointed by the queens commiſſion capteine generall, with the lord maior ſir Thomas White, watched at the bridge that night with three hundred men; cauſed the draw bridge to be hewen downe into the Thames, made rampiers and fortifications there, fenſing the ſame with great ordinance. Wiat yet aduentured the breaking downe of a wall out of an houſe ioining to the gate at the bridge foot, whereby he might enter into the leads ouer the gate, & came downe into the lodge about eleuen of the clocke in the night, where he found the porter in a ſlumber, and his wife with other waking, and watching ouer a cole; but beholding Wiat, they began ſuddenlie to ſtart as greatlie amazed. Whiſt quoth Wiat, as you loue your liues ſit ſtill, you ſhall haue no hurt. Glad were they of that warrant, and ſo were quiet, and made no noiſe. Wiat and a few with him went forth as farre as the draw bridge: on the other ſide whereof he ſaw the lord admerall, the lord maior, ſir Andrew Jud, and one or two others in conſultation for ordering of the bridge, wherevnto he gaue diligent heed and eare a good while, and was not ſéene.

Sir Thomas Wiets deſperat attempt.

This doone, he returned and ſaid to ſome of his companie; This place ſirs is too hot for vs. And herevpon falling in counſell what was beſt to doo: ſome gaue aduiſe that it ſhould be good to returne to Gréenewich, and ſo to paſſe the water into Eſſex, whereby their companie (as they thought) ſhould increaſe, and then aſſaie to enter into London by Aldgate: and ſome were of opinion, that it were better to go to Kingſton vpon Thames, and ſo further weſt. Other there were, among which ſir Thomas Wiat himſelfe was chiefe, would haue returned into Kent to méet with the lord of Aburgauenie, the lord Warden, the ſhiriffe, ſir Thomas Moile, ſir Thomas Kempe, ſir Thomas Finch, and others that were at Rocheſter, comming on Wiats backe, with a great companie well appointed, perſuading himſelfe (whether truelie or not I know not) that he ſhould find among them more friends than enimies. But whether his deſire to returne into Kent grew vpon hope he had to find aid there, or rather to ſhift himſelfe awaie, it was doubted of his owne companie; and ſome of them that knew him well (except they were much deceiued) reported not long before their execution, that his deſire to returne into Kent, was onelie to ſhift himſelfe ouer the ſea.

Wiat and his complices fall into conſultation.

The lord Warden being at Rocheſter (as yée haue heard) well furniſhed both with horſſe and men, perfectlie appointed to no ſmall number, was willing to haue followed after Wiat, and to haue ſhewed his good will againſt him in the quéens quarrell: but yet vpon deliberation had, & aduiſe taken with others that were there with him, he thought good firſt to vnderſtand the quéenes pleaſure how to proceed in his dealings; and heervpon he rode poſt to the queene himſelfe, leauing the lord of Aburgauennie and the reſt of the gentlemen with his and their bands behind till his returne. On ſundaie the fourth of Februarie, the lord admerall cauſed a ſtrong ward of three hundred men to be kept on the bridge till eight of the clocke at night, and then (for their reléaſe) entred the watch of other thrée hundred: ſo that the bridge was thus garded both daie and night with thrée hundred men in armor. It troubled Wiat and all his companie verie ſore, to ſée that London did ſo ſtiffelie ſtand and hold out againſt them: for in the aſſiſtance which they looked to haue had of that citie, all their hope of proſperous ſpéed conſiſted. But now that they ſaw themſelues greatlie diſappointed therein, they meant yet to ſet all on a hazard. And ſo the ſixt of Februarie being Shrouetueſdaie, afore ſix of the clocke in the morning, they departed out of Southworke, marching directlie towards Kingſtone ten miles diſtant from London, ſtanding vpon the Thames, where they arriued about foure of the clocke in the after noone: and finding thirtie foot or thereabout of the bridge taken awaie, ſauing the poſts that were left ſtanding; Wiat practiſed with two mariners to ſwim ouer, and to conueie a barge to him, which the mariners through great promiſes of preferment accordinglie did, wherein Wiat and certeine with him were conueied ouer: who in the meane time that the number of ſoldiors baited in the towne, cauſed the bridge to be repared with ladders, planks and beames, the ſame being tied togither with ropes and boords, ſo as by ten of the clocke in the night it was in ſuch plight, that both his ordinance and companies of men might paſſe ouer without perill. And ſo about eleuen of the clocke in the ſame night, Wiat with his armie paſſing ouer the bridge without either reſiſtance or perill, & before it could be once knowne at the court, marched toward London, meaning (as ſome haue written) to haue bin at the court gate before daie that morning. Neuertheles, before he came within ſix miles of the citie ſtaieng for a péece of his great artillerie which was diſmounted by the waie, his comming was diſcouered before daie: wherby the erle of Penbroke generall of the quéenes armie was with his men in good order of battell in S. James field beſide Weſtminſter, two or thrée houres yer Wiat could rech thither.

Wiat marcheth to Kingſtone.

The earle of Penbroke ſetteth the armie in order.

The earle hauing vnderſtanding by his eſpials, what waie Wiat would march, placed his armie in this order. Firſt, in a field on the weſt ſide of ſaint James were all his men of armes, and demilances; ouer againſt whome in the lane next to the parke, were placed all the light horſſemen. All which bands of horſſemen were vnder the charge of the lord Clinton, being marſhall of the field. The great artillerie was planted in the middeſt and higheſt place of the cauſeie next to the houſe of ſaint James, with certeine field peeces lieng on the flanke of ech battell. After that both the armies were in ſight, and that the great artillerie began to thunder from either ſide without harme (as it happened to either of both) Wiat perceiuing that he could not come vp the fore right waie without great diſaduantage, when he was come to the parke corner, he leauing the cauſeie, ſwarued, and tooke the nether waie towards ſaint James. Which being perceiued by the quéenes horſſemen, who laie on either ſide of him, they gaue a ſudden charge, and diuided his battell aſunder hard behind Wiats enſignes, whereby ſo manie as were not paſſed before with Wiat, were forced to flie backe towards Brainford: and certeine of his companie which eſcaped the charge, paſſed by the backeſide of ſaint James towards Weſtminſter, and from thenſe to the court: and finding the gates ſhut againſt them, ſtaid there a while, and ſhot off manie arrowes into the windowes, and ouer into the garden, neuertheleſſe without anie hurt there that was knowne. Wherevpon the ſaid rebels, ouer whom one Kneuet was capteine, perceiuing themſelues to be too few to doo anie great feat there, departed from thenſe to follow Wiat, who was gone before toward London: and being on their waie at Charingcroſſe, were there incountered by ſir Henrie Jerningham capteine of the quéenes gard, ſir Edward Braie maſter of the ordinance, and ſir Philip Paris knights, which were ſent by the order of the earle of Penbroke with a band of archers, and certeine field péeces for the reſcue of the court, who incountered the ſaid rebels at Charingcroſſe aforeſaid, after they had diſchaged their field péeces vpon them, ioined with thoſe rebels, halfe armed, and halfe vnarmed, at the puſh of the pike, & verie ſoone diſperſed their power; whereof ſome fled into the lane toward ſaint Giles, & ſome on the other ſide by a brewhouſe towards the Thames. In this conflict, which was the chiefe triall of that daie, there was not found ſlaine to the number of twentie of thoſe rebels. Which happened by reaſon that vpon their ioining with the quéens ſoldiors, the one part could not be diſcerned from the other, but onelie by the mire and durt taken by the waie, which ſtacke vpon their garments comming in the night: wherefore the crie on the quéenes part that daie was; Downe with the daggle tailes.

Wiat commeth to the parke corner, &c.

A ſkirmiſh at Charingcroſſe betwéen Wiats powers and the quéenes forces.

But now to returne to Wiat, of whome ye heard before, who being come to the parke corner, and perceiuing the perill apparant, if he ſhould haue marched ſtraight vpon the earls battels, which were ranged on either ſide of the cauſeie, did therefore politikelie turne from the great cauſeie, marching along the wall of the houſe of ſaint James towards London: which could not haue béene without his no little loſſe of manie of his traine, if thoſe that had the charge on that ſide the field, had béene as forward in ſeruice as the earle with his battell, and the horſſemen before ſhewed themſelues to be. Neuertheleſſe Wiat following his purpoſed enterpriſe, which was to haue entered into London, where he hoped of great aid, marched on with the ſmall companie that was left him, as far as a common inne called the Bell ſauage, néere to Ludgate, beléeuing to haue found ſome readie there to haue receiued him; wherin his hope was much deceiued, finding the ſaid gate faſt ſhut, and ſtronglie garded with a number as well of moſt honeſt citizens, as alſo of other bands of the quéenes aſſured friends. Wherevpon Wiat, who comming towards the citie, made himſelfe ſure of his enterpriſe, now deſperat of the ſame, was faine to turne his face, retiring backe againe to Temple-barre, where he with the reſt of his retinue determined (as it ſéemed) to trie their laſt fortune.

Wiat marcheth alongſt the wall of ſaint James towards London.

The earle of Penbroke (who all this while kept his force togither in the field) hearing of Wiats approch to London, ſent to him an herald called Clarenceaux, with great communication to deſiſt from his rebellious enterpriſe. Which herald did his meſſage accordinglie, albeit that ſome ſaid he promiſed the ſaid Wiat his pardon: which ſhould not ſéeme to be true, as well for that the herald had no ſuch commiſſion, as alſo that it was not like, that the ſaid Wiat being then diſarmed of all his forces, would haue refuſed mercie in ſuch a caſe. For true it is, that he with a verie few of his forlorne fellowſhip, not manie aboue the number of one hundred perſons, ſtood ſtill as men amazed at the gate of the Temple-barre, till ſuch time as ſir Maurice Barkicie knight, by chance riding towards London vpon his horſſe, with footcloth, without anie armour, finding the ſaid Wiat there, perſuaded him to repaire to the court, and to yéeld himſelfe to the quéene. Whoſe aduiſe he followed, and incontinent mounted vp on the ſaid ſir Maurice horſſe behind him, and ſo road to the court voluntarilie to yéeld himſelfe priſoner.

An herald ſent to Wiat willing him to deſiſt from his enterpriſe.

Sir Thomas Wiat ſubmitteth himſelfe to the quéene.

This comming of Wiat to the court being ſo little looked for, was great cauſe of reioiſing to ſuch as of late before ſtood in great feare of him. But more than maruell it was to ſée that daie, the inuincible heart and conſtancie of the quéene hir ſelfe, who being by nature a woman, and therefore commonlie more fearefull than men be, ſhewed hir ſelfe in that caſe more ſtout than is credible. For ſhe, notwithſtanding all the fearefull newes that were brought to hir that daie, neuer abaſhed. Inſomuch that when one or two noblemen being hir capteins, The ſtout courage of quéene Marie.

came in all haſt to tell hir (though vntrulie) that hir battels were yéelded to Wiat. She nothing moued thereat, ſaid it was their fond opinion that durſt not come néere to ſée the triall, ſaieng further, that ſhe hir ſelfe would enter the field to trie the truth of hir quarrell, and to die with them that would ſerue hir, rather than to yéeld one iot vnto ſuch a traitor as Wiat was; and prepared hir ſelfe accordinglie.

Proclamation that none ſhould kéepe in his houſe anie of Wiats faction.

But by the apprehenſion of Wiat that voiage tooke none effect: for after his comming to the court he was immediatlie committed to the Tower. As ſoone as the taking of Wiat was knowne, the armie (whereof mention is made before that laie in ſaint Iames field) was diſcharged, and euerie man licenced to depart to his home. And forthwith proclamation was made, as well in the citie of London as in the ſuburbs of the ſame, that none vpon paine of death ſhould kéepe in his or their houſes anie of Wiats faction; but ſhould bring them forth immediatlie before the lord maior, and other the quéenes iuſtices. By reaſon of which proclamation a great multitude of their ſaid poore caitifs were brought forth, being ſo manie in number, that all the priſons in London ſufficed not to receiue them: ſo that for lacke of place they were faine to beſtow them in diuerſe churches of the ſaid citie. And ſhortlie after were ſet vp in London for a terrour to the common ſort (bicauſe the white cotes being ſent out of the citie, as before ye haue heard, reuolted from the quéens part to the aid of Wiat) twentie paire of gallowes, on the which were hanged in ſeuerall places to the number of fiftie perſons, which gallowes remained ſtanding there a great part of the ſummer following to the great griefe of good citizens, and for example to the commotioners.

Abr.Fl. ex I.S. pag.1087,1088 1089.

Wiat ſent to the tower.

Sir Thomas Bridges lieutenant of the tower.

The zeale of the lieutenant ſheweth it ſelf by his hot language.

¶As for the principals of this faction, namelie Thomas Wiat, William Kneuet, Thomas Cobham, two brethren named Mantels, and Alexander Bret were brought by ſir Henrie Ierningam by water to the tower priſoners, where ſir Philip Denie receiued them at the bulworke, & as Wiat paſſed by he ſaid; Go traitor, there was neuer ſuch a traitor in England. To whom ſir Thomas Wiat turned, and ſaid, I am no traitor, I would thou ſhouldſt well know thou art more traitor than I, it is not the point of an honeſt man to call me ſo, and ſo went forth. When he came to the tower gate, ſir Thomas Bridges lieutenant tooke in through the wicket, firſt Mantell, and ſaid: Ah thou traitor, what haſt thou and thy companie wrought? But he holding downe his head ſaid nothing. Then came Thomas Kneuet, whom maſter chamberleine gentleman porter of the tower tooke in. Then came Alexander Bret, whome ſir Thomas Pope tooke by the boſome, ſaieng: Oh traitor, how couldeſt thou find in thy heart to worke ſuch a villanie, as to take wages, and being truſted ouer a band of men, to fall to hir enimies, returning againſt hir in battell. Bret anſwered Yea; I haue offended in that caſe. Then came Thomas Cobham, whome ſir Thomas Poines tooke in, and ſaid, Alas maiſter Cobham, what wind headed you to worke ſuch treaſon? And he anſwered, Oh ſir I was ſeduced. Then came in ſir Thomas Wiat, whom ſir Iohn Bridges tooke by the collar and ſaid, Oh thou villen & vnhappie traitor, how couldeſt thou find in thy hart to worke ſuch deteſtable treaſon to the quéenes maieſtie, who gaue thée thy life and liuing once alreadie, although thou diddeſt before this time beare armes in the field againſt hir, and now to yéeld hir battell, &c. If it were not (ſaith he) but that the law muſt paſſe vpon thée, I would ſticke thée through with my dagger. To the which Wiat holding his arms vnder his ſide, and looking grieuouſlie with a grim looke vpon the lieutenant, ſaid; It is no maiſterie now: and ſo paſſed on. Thomas Wiat had on a ſhirt of maile, with ſléeues verie faire, theron a veluet caſſocke, and a yellow lace, with the windlace of his dag hanging thereon, and a paire of boots on his legs, and on his head a faire hat of veluet, with a broad bone-worke lace about it. William Kneuet, Thomas Cobham, and Bret, were the like apparelled.

The duke of Suffolke and the lord Greie brought to the tower.

Sir Henrie Iſleie.

On the morrow and the next daie following were brought into the tower priſoners, George Cobham, ſir William Cobham, Anthonie Kneuet, Hugh Booth, Thomas Vane, Robert Rudſtone, ſir George Harper, Edward Wiat, Edward Fog, George Moore, and Cutbert Vaughan. The tenth of Februarie, the earle of Huntington and other gentlemen, and to the number of thrée hundred horſſemen, brought to the tower as priſoners the duke of Suffolke, and the lord Iohn Greie his brother from Couentrie, where the duke had remained thrée daies after his taking in the houſe and cuſtodie of Chriſtopher Warren alderman there. The eleuenth daie ſir Henrie Iſleie who had fled, was brought into the tower in an old fréeſe cote, an old paire of hoſen, all his apparell not worth foure ſhillings. The ſame daie came in two of the Culpepers, one Cromar, & Thomas Rampton the duke of Suffolks ſecretarie.

The lord Gilford Dudleie executed on the tower.

The behauior of the ladie Iane lead to execution.

The twelfe of Februarie being mondaie, about ten of the clocke, there went out of the tower to the ſcaffold on the tower hill, the lord Gilford Dudleie, ſonne to the duke of Northumberland, huſband to the ladie Iane Greie daughter to the duke of Suffolke; and without the bulworke gate, maiſter Thomas Offleie one of the ſhiriffes of London receiued him and brought him to the ſcaffold, where after a ſmall declaration he knéeled downe and ſaid his praiers. Then holding vp his eies & hands to heauen with teares, at the laſt he deſired the people to praie for him, & after he was beheaded. His bodie being laid in a cart, and his head in a cloth, was brought into the chappell within the tower, where the ladie Iane, whoſe lodging was in maiſter Patridges houſe, did ſée his dead carcaſſe taken out of the cart, as well as ſhe did ſée him before aliue going to his death: a ſight (as might be ſuppoſed) to hir worſe than death. By this time was there a ſcaffold made vpon the gréene ouer againſt the white tower, for the ladie Iane to die vpon, who being nothing at all abaſhed neither with feare of hir owne death, which then approched, neither with the ſight of the dead carcaſſe of hir huſband when he was brought into the chapell, came forth, the lieutenant leading hir, with countenance nothing abaſhed, neither hir eies anie thing moiſtened with teares, with a booke in hir hand, wherein ſhe praied vntill ſhe came to the ſaid ſcaffold. Whereon when ſhe was mounted, this noble yoong ladie as ſhe was indued with ſingular gifts both of learning and knowledge, ſo was ſhe as patient and mild as anie lambe at hir execution: and a little before hir death vttered theſe words.]

The words of the ladie Iane at hir death, on a ſcaffold vpon the greene ouer againſt the white tower.

GOod people I am come hither to die, and by a law I am condemned to the ſame. My offenſe againſt the quéenes highnes was onelie in conſent to the deuice of other, which now is déemed treaſon; but it was neuer of my ſéeking, but by counſell of thoſe who ſhould ſéeme to haue further vnderſtanding of things than I, which knew little of the law, and much leſſe of the titles to the crowne. But touching the procurement and deſire therof by me, or on my behalfe, I doo waſh my hands in innocencie thereof before God, and the face of all you (good chriſtian people) this daie. And therwith ſhe wrong hir hands wherin ſhe had hir booke. Then (ſaid ſhe) I praie you all good chriſtian people, to beare me witneſſe that I die a true chriſtian woman, & that I looke to be ſaued by none other meanes, but onelie by the mercie of God, in the bloud of his onelie ſonne Ieſus Chriſt; & I confeſſe that when I did know the word of God, I neglected the ſame, & loued my ſelfe and the world, and therefore this plague and puniſhment is iuſtlie & worthilie happened vnto me for my ſins, & yet I thanke God of his goodneſſe, that he hath giuen me a time and reſpit to repent. And now good people while I am aliue, I praie you aſſiſt me with your praiers.

The executioner aſked the ladie Iane forgiueneſſe.

Then kneeling downe, ſhe ſaid the pſalme of Miſerere mei Deus, in Engliſh, and then ſtood vp and gaue hir maid (called miſtreſſe Ellin) hir gloues and handkercher, and hir booke ſhe alſo gaue to maiſter Bridges then lieutenant of the tower, and ſo vntied hir gowne; and the executioner preſſed to helpe hir off with it, but ſhe deſired him to let hir alone, and turned hir toward hir two gentlewomen, who helped hir off therewith, and with hir other attires, and they gaue hir a faire handkercher to put about hir eies. Then the executioner kneeled downe and aſked hir forgiueneſſe, whom ſhe forgaue moſt willinglie. Then he willed hir to ſtand vpon the ſtraw, which doone, ſhe ſaw the blocke, & then ſhe ſaid; I praie you diſpatch me quicklie. Then ſhe kneeled downe, ſaieng; Will you take it off before I laie me downe? Wherevnto the executioner anſwered, No madame. Then tied ſhe the handkercher about hir eies, and feeling for the blocke, ſhe ſaid; Where is it, where is it? One of the ſtanders by guided hir therevnto, and ſhe laid downe hir head vpon the blocke, and then ſtretched forth hir bodie, and ſaid; Lord into thy hands I commend my ſpirit, and ſo finiſhed hir life. ¶ This was the end of the lord Gilford and the ladie Iane, whoſe deaths were the more haſtened for feare of further troubles and ſturs for hir title, like as hir father had attempted.]

I. Stow.

Iohn Fox.

Thus (as ſaith maiſter Fox) were beheaded two innocents, in compariſon of them that ſat vpon them: for they did but ignorantlie accept that which the others had willinglie deuiſed, and by open proclamation conſented to take from others, and giue to them. And verelie how vnwilling ſhe was to take it vpon hir, there are yet liuing that can teſtifie. Iudge Morgan now that gaue the ſentence againſt hir, ſhortlie after fell mad, and in his rauing cried continuallie to haue the ladie Iane taken awaie from him, and ſo ended his life. ¶ Touching this ladie Iane in the high commendation of hir godlie mind, I find this report in maiſter Foxes appendix to his Acts and Monuments, namelie that being on a time when ſhe was verie yoong at Newhall in Eſſex at the ladie Maries, was by one ladie Anne Wharton deſired to walke, and they paſſing by the chapell, the ladie Wharton made low curtſie to the popiſh ſacrament hanging on the altar. Which when the ladie Iane ſaw maruelled why ſhe did ſo, and aſked hir whether the ladie Marie were there or not? Vnto whome the ladie Wharton anſwered no, but ſhe ſaid that ſhe made hir curtſie to him that made vs all. Why quoth the ladie Iane, how can he be there that made vs all, and the baker made him? This hir anſwer comming to the ladie Maries eare, ſhe did neuer loue hir after, as is crediblie reported, but eſteemed hir as the reſt of that chriſtian profeſſion. In further witneſſe of which good ladies diſpoſition (both to God and the world) beſides the verſes of certeine learned men extant to hir praiſe, theſe following were found written by hir owne hand with a pin:

Iudge Morgan fell mad.

The duke of Suffolke.

Vpon ſaturdaie being the ſeuenteenth of Februarie the duke of Suffolke was arreigned at Weſtminſter, and there condemned to die by his peeres, the earle of Arundell being that daie chiefe iudge. Where ſome haue written that he ſhould at his laſt going downe into the countrie make proclamation in his daughters name, that is not ſo: for whereas he ſtood by in Leiceſter, when at his commandement the proclamation was there made againſt the queenes mariage with the prince of Spaine, &c: maſter Damport then maior of that towne ſaid to him: My lord I truſt your grace meaneth no hurt to the queenes maieſtie. No ſaith he maiſter maior (laieng his hand on his ſword) he that would hir anie hurt, I would this ſword were through his hart, for ſhe is the mercifulleſt prince, as I haue trulie found hir, that euer reigned, in whoſe defenſe I am & will be readie to die at hir foot. ¶ On mondaie the nineteenth of Februarie, the lord Cobhams three ſonnes, and foure other men were brought to Weſtminſter, the yoongeſt of the Cobhams, to wit maiſter Thomas Cobham was condemned with the other foure men, but the other two Cobhams came not to the barre. ¶ On the wedneſdaie the one and twentith of Februarie the lord Thomas Greie that had beene taken (as before ye haue heard) in Wales, was brought togither with ſir Iames Croft through London to the tower, by a number of horſſemen.

Iohn Fox.

The duke of Suffolke beheaded.

Vpon the fridaie the three and twentith of Februarie, about nine of the clocke, the duke of Suffolke was brought forth of the tower vnto the ſcaffold on the tower hill. And in his comming thither, there accompanied him doctor Weſton, as his ghoſtlie father: notwithſtanding (as it ſhould ſeeme) againſt the will of the ſaid duke. For when the duke went vp the ſcaffold, the ſaid Weſton being on his left hand, preſſed to go vp with him. The duke with his hand put him downe againe off the ſtaires, and Weſton taking hold of the duke forced him downe likewiſe. And as they aſcended the ſecond time, the duke againe put him downe. Then Weſton ſaid, that it was the queenes pleaſure he ſhould ſo doo: wherewith the duke caſting his hands abrode, aſcended vp the ſcaffold, and pauſed a prettie while after, and then he ſaid.

Doctor Weſton.

The duke of Suffolks words to the people at the time of his death.

MAiſters, I haue offended the queene and hir lawes, and thereby am iuſtlie condemned to die, and am willing to die, deſiring all men to be obedient; and I praie God that this my death maie be an example to all men: beſeeching you all to beare mee witneſſe that I die in the faith of Chriſt, truſting to be ſaued by his bloud onelie (and by none other trumperie) the which died for me, and for all them that doo trulie repent, & ſtedfaſtlie truſt in him. And I doo repent, deſiring you all to pray to God for me, that when ye ſee my breath depart from me, you will praie to God that he maie receiue my ſoule. And then hee deſired all men to forgiue him, ſaieng that the queene had forgiuen him.

Then maiſter Weſton declared with a lowd voice that the queenes maieſtie had forgiuen him. Then diuers of the ſtanders by ſaid with audible voice; Such forgiuenes God ſend thee, meaning doctor Weſton. Then the duke kneeled vpon his knees, and ſaid the pſalme Miſerere mei Deus, vnto the end, holding vp his hands, and looking vp to heauen. And when he had ended the pſalme, he ſaid; In manus tuas Domine commendo ſpiritum meum. Then he aroſe and ſtood vp, and deliuered his cap and ſcarffe to the executioner, and therewith the executioner kneeled downe: and aſked the duke forgiueneſſe, and the duke ſaid, God forgiue thee, and I doo: and when thou doſt thine office, I praie thee doo it quicklie, and God haue mercie to thee. Then ſtood there a man and ſaid, My lord, how ſhall I doo for the monie that you doo owe me? And the duke ſaid, Alas good fellow, I praie thee trouble me not now, but go thy waie to my officers. Then he knit a kercher about his face, and kneeled downe and ſaid, Our father which art in heauen, &c: vnto the end: and then he ſaid, Chriſt haue mercie vpon me, and laid downe his head on the blocke: and the executioner tooke the axe, and at the firſt chop ſtroke off his head, and held it vp to the people, according to the common cuſtome of execution.

The duke of Suffolke deſcribed.

Such was the end of this duke of Suffolke, a man of high nobilitie by birth, and of nature to his friend gentle and courteous, more eaſie in deed to be led than was thought expedient, of ſtomach neuertheleſſe ſtout and hardie, haſtie and ſoone kindled, but pacified ſtreight againe, and ſorie if in his heat ought had paſſed him otherwiſe than reaſon might ſeeme to beare, vpright and plaine in his priuat dealings, no diſſembler, nor well able to beare iniuries, but yet forgiuing & forgetting the ſame, if the partie would ſeeme but to acknowlege his fault, and ſeeke reconcilement. Bountifull he was and verie liberall, ſomwhat learned himſelfe, and a great fauourer of thoſe that were learned, ſo that to manie he ſhewed himſelfe a verie Mecænas: as free from couetouſneſſe, as void of pride and diſdainefull hautineſſe of mind, more regarding plaine meaning men, than clawbacke flatterers. And this vertue he had, he could patientlie heare his faults told him, by thoſe whome he had in credit for their wiſdome and faithfull meaning toward him, although ſometime he had the hap to reforme himſelfe thereafter. Concerning his laſt offenſe for the which he died, it is to be ſuppoſed, he rather tooke in hand that vnlawfull enterpriſe through others perſuaſions, than of his owne motion for any malicious ambition in himſelfe.

Great pitie that ſo manie good gifts concurring ſhould ſuffer diſgrace.

But now to let this duke reſt with God, we will proceed with the ſtorie. The ſame daie (or as ſome haue noted the day before) a number of priſoners had their pardon, and came through the citie with their halters about their necks. They were in * number aboue two hundred. Upon the ſaturdaie, the eight and twentith of Februarie, ſir William Sentlow was committed as priſoner to the maiſter of the horſſe to be kept. This ſir William was at this time one of the ladie Elizabeths gentlemen. Upon the ſundaie being the fiue and twentith of Februarie, ſir Iohn Rogers was committed to the tower. Upon the tueſdaie in the ſame weeke being the ſeuen & twentith of Februarie, certeine gentlemen of Kent were ſent into Kent to be executed there. Their names were theſe: the two Mantels, two Kneuets, and Bret: with theſe maiſter Rudſton alſo, and certeine other were condemned, and ſhould haue beene executed, but they had their pardon.

* The number of them that thus had their pardon were 240.

Gentlemen ſent into Kent to be executed.

Execution.

Sir Henrie Iſleie knight, Thomas Iſleie his brother, and Walter Mantell, ſuffered at Maidſton, where Wiat firſt diſplaied his banner. Anthonie Kneuet and his brother William Kneuet, with another of the Mantels, were executed at Seuenocke: Bret at Rocheſter was hanged in chains. On ſaturdaie the third of March, ſir Gawen Carew, and maiſter Gibs were brought thorough London to the tower, with a companie of horſſemen. The fifteenth daie of March next following, the ladie Elizabeth the queenes ſiſter, and next heire to the crowne, was aprehended at hir manour of Aſhridge, for ſuſpicion of Wiats conſpiracie. And from thence (being that time verie ſicke) with great rigour brought priſoner to London. On the ſundaie after being the ſeuenteenth of March, ſhe was commited to the tower, where alſo the lord Courtneie earle of Deuonſhire (of whome before is made mention) was for the like ſuſpicion committed priſoner.

Ladie Elizabeth and lord Courtneie priſoners in the tower.

Abr.Fl. ex Ioh.Foxi martyrologio.

¶ Touching the impriſonment of the foreſaid ladie Elizabeth, & the lord Courtneie, thou ſhalt note here for thy learning (good reader) a politike point of practiſe in Stephan Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter, not vnworthie to be conſidered. This Gardiner being alwaies a capitall enimie to ladie Elizabeth, & thinking now by the occaſion of maiſter Wiat to picke out ſome matter againſt the lord Courtneie, and ſo in the end to intangle the ladie Elizabeth, deuiſed a peſtilent practiſe of conueiance, as in the ſtorie here following maie appeare. The ſtorie is this. The ſame daie that ſir Thomas died, he deſired the lieutenant to bring him to the preſence of the lord Courtneie, who there before the lieutenant and the ſhiriffes, kneeling downe vpon his knees, beſought the lord Courtneie to forgiue him, for that he had falſelie accuſed both the ladie Elizabeth and him: and ſo being brought from thence vnto the ſcaffold to ſuffer, there openlie in the hearing of all the people cleared the ladie Elizabeth, and the lord Courtneie, to be free and innocent from all ſuſpicion of that commotion. At which confeſſion, doctor Weſton there ſtanding by, cried to the people, ſaieng: Beleeue him not (good people) for he confeſſed otherwiſe before vnto the councell.

A point of practiſe of Stephā Gardiner againſt the ladie Elizabeth.

Doctor Weſtō againſt the ladie Elizabeth.

After the execution doone of ſir Thomas Wiat, which was the eleuenth daie of Aprill, word was brought immediatlie to the lord maior ſir Thomas White a little before dinner, how maiſter Wiat had cleared the ladie Elizabeth and lord Courtneie, and the words alſo which doctor Weſton ſpake vnto the people. Whereunto the lord maior anſwering; Is this true quoth he? Said Weſton ſo? In ſooth I neuer tooke him otherwiſe but for a knaue. Upon this the lord maior ſitting downe to dinner (who dined the ſame daie at the Bridgehouſe) commeth in ſir Martine Bowes with the recorder, newlie come from the parlement houſe, who hearing of the maior and ſhiriffes this report of Wiats confeſſion, both vpon the ſcaffold and alſo in the tower, marueiled thereat, declaring how there was another tale contrarie to this, told the ſame daie in the parlement houſe, which was, that ſir Thomas Wiat ſhould deſire the lord Courtneie to confeſſe the truth, ſo as he had doone before.

The lord maiors iudgment of D. Weſton.

Upon this it followed not long after, that a certeine prentiſe dwelling in ſaint Laurence lane, named Cut, as he was drinking with one Denham a plaiſterer being one of queene Maries ſeruants, amongſt other talke, made mention how ſir Thomas

Cut prentiſe in London brought before Stephan Gardiner.

Stephā Gardiners tale in the Starchamber againſt the ladie Elizabeth.

The Lord Shandois falſe report in the Starchamber, againſt the ladie Elizabeth and lord Courtneie.

Wiat had cleared the ladie Elizabeth, and the lord Courtneie, to be no conſenters to his riſing. Which words being brought to Gardiner (by what means I know not) incontinent vpon the ſame, ſir Andrew Iud was ſent by the ſaid biſhop to the lord maior, commanding him to bring the ſaid prentiſe to the Starchamber, which was accuſed of theſe words, that he ſhould ſaie that Wiat was conſtreined by the councell to accuſe the ladie Elizabeth, & the lord Courtneie. Which fellow when he was come to the Starchamber, the aforeſaid Gardiner letting paſſe other matters that were in hand, began to declare to the whole multitude, how miraculouſlie almightie God had brought the queens maieſtie to the crowne, the whole realme in a maner being againſt hir, and that he had brought this to paſſe for this ſingular intent & purpoſe, that this realme being ouerwhelmed with hereſies, ſhe might reduce the ſame againe to the true catholike faith. And where ſhe tooke the ladie Elizabeth into hir fauour, and loued hir ſo tenderlie, and alſo the lord Courtneie, who of long time had beene deteined in priſon, and by hir was ſet at libertie, and receiued great benefits at hir hands; and notwithſtanding all this, they had conſpired moſt vnnaturallie and traitorouſlie againſt hir with that heinous traitor Wiat, as by the confeſſion of Wiat (ſaid he) and the letters ſent to and fro maie plainlie appeare: yet there was ſome in the citie of London, which reported that Wiat was conſtreined by the councell to accuſe the ladie Elizabeth, and the lord Courtneie, & yet you my lord maior (quoth he) haue not ſeene the ſame puniſhed.

The partie is here, ſaid the lord maior. Take him with you (ſaid Gardiner) and puniſh him according to his deſert, and ſaid further: My lord, take heed to your charge, the citie of London is a whirlepoole and a ſinke of all euill rumors, there they be bred, and from thence ſpred into all parts of this realme. There ſtood by the ſame time the lord Shandois, who being then lieutenant of the tower, and now hearing the biſhop thus ſpeake, to ſooth his tale, came in with theſe words as followeth: My lords (quoth he) this is a truth that I ſhall tell you, I being lieutenant of the tower when Wiat ſuffered, he deſired me to bring him to the lord Courtneie; which when I had doone, he fell downe vpon his knees before him in my preſence, and deſired him to confeſſe the truth of himſelfe, as he had doone before, and to ſubmit himſelfe vnto the queenes mercie. And thus much of this matter I thought to declare, to the intent that the reader perceiuing the proceedings of the biſhop in the premiſſes, & comparing the ſame with the true teſtimonie of Wiat himſelfe, and with the teſtimonie of the ſhiriffes, the which were preſent the ſame time when ſir Thomas Wiat aſked the lord Courtneie forgiueneſſe, maie the better iudge of the whole caſe and matter for the which the ladie Elizabeth and the lord Courtneie were ſo long in trouble.]

On ſaturdaie next following being Eaſter euen, and the foure and twentith of March, the lord marques of Northampton, the lord Cobham, and ſir William Cobham his ſonne and heire, were deliuered out of the tower, where they had remained for a time, being committed thither vpon ſome ſuſpicion about Wiats rebellion: as diuerſe others were, wherof manie were put to death, as C.O. reporteth:

Nunc iſtos læſæ nunc illos quæſtio torquet
Maieſtatis, habet multos cuſtodia clauſos
Firma viros, atro pars plurima deditur Orco.

Not long after, queene Marie partlie offended with the Londoners, as fauorers of Wiats conſpiracie, and partlie perceiuing the more part of them nothing inclined towards hir proceedings in religion, which turned manie of them to loſſe, ſummoned a parlement to be holden at Oxford, as it were to gratifie that citie, which with the vniuerſitie, towne, and countrie, had ſhewed themſelues verie forward in hir ſeruice; but ſpeciallie in reſtoring of the religion called catholike: for which appointed parlement there to be holden, great prouiſion was made, as well by the queens officers, as by the townesmen & inhabitants of the countrie round about. But the queens mind in ſhort ſpace changed, and the ſame parlement was holden at Weſtminſter in Aprill next following, wherein the queene proponed two ſpeciall matters, the one for the mariage to be had betweene hir and the prince Philip of Spaine: the other, for the reſtoring againe of the popes power and iuriſdiction in England. As touching hir mariage, it was with no great difficultie agreed vpon; but the other requeſt could not be eaſilie obteined.

A parlement ſummoned at Oxford but not holden.

All nations in the world againſt the mariage of the ſun, and why.

Howbeit, it was to be wiſhed, euen to the diſappointing of that mariage (if God in counſell had ſo prouided) that the whole bodie of the parlement had beene ſemblablie affected, as it is ſaid, that all the nations of the world were, when the ſunne would needs be maried. Againſt which purpoſe of the ſun the people of all regions aſſembling, humblie beſought Iupiter to caſt in a blocke and impediment againſt that wedding. But Iupiter demanding of them why they would not haue the ſun maried; one ſtepping vp made anſwer for the reſt, and ſaid: Thou knoweſt well enough Iupiter that there is but one ſun, and yet he burneth vs all: who, if he be maried & haue children, as the number of ſuns muſt needs increaſe; ſo muſt their heat and feruentneſſe be multiplied, whereby a generall deſtruction of all things in their kind will inſue. Herevpon that match was ouerthrowne. But God aboue ruling by prouidence all things here beneath, had purpoſed this coniunction; ſo that it was not in the power of man to withſtand or interrupt it: howbeit it was his pleaſure (to what end himſelfe beſt knoweth) to curſſe it with barrenneſſe, as he did the queene hir ſelfe with a ſhort and vnpeaceable reigne (full of ſedition and bloudſhed) as our Engliſh poet noteth:

Quæ poſt Eduardi mortem conuerſio rerum,
Tranſtulit in varias alieno pectore partes
Brutigenas, fauet hic externis, ille peroſus
Myſtarum rabiem, tantis obſtacula quærit
Opportuna malis: cùm iam proh dedecus ingens,
Seditio exoritur, regnorum peſſima peſtis.

A cat hanged in cheape.

¶ On the eight of Aprill, then being ſundaie, a cat with hir head ſhorne, and the likeneſſe of a veſtment caſt ouer hir, with hir fore feet tied togither, and a round peece of paper like a ſinging cake betwixt them, was hanged on a gallows in Cheape, neere to the croſſe, in the pariſh of ſaint Matthew: which cat being taken downe, was caried to the biſhop of London, and he cauſed the ſame to be ſhewed at Pauls croſſe by the preacher doctor Pendleton.]

The biſhops Cranmer, Latimer, and Ridleie ſent to Oxford.

Commiſſioners.

On the tenth daie of Aprill following, Thomas Cranmer archbiſhop of Canturburie, Nicholas Ridleie biſhop of London, and Hugh Latimer once biſhop of Worceſter, who had beene long priſoners in the tower, were now conueied from thence, and caried to Windſore, and afterward to the vniuerſitie of Oxford, there to diſpute with the diuines and learned men of the contrarie opinion. Two daies after their comming to Oxford, which was the twelfe daie of the ſaid moneth, diuerſe learned men of both the vniuerſities were ſent in commiſſion from the conuocation (which during this parlement was kept in Pauls church in London) to diſpute with thoſe priſoners in certeine articles of religion. The names of them that were in commiſſion were theſe following. Of Oxford, doctor Weſton prolocutor, Cole, Chadſeie, Pie, Harpeſfield, Smith. Of Cambridge, Yong, Seton, Watſon, Atkinſon, Pecknam, Sedgewike. The thirtéenth daie of Aprill theſe diſputers aſſembled themſelues in ſaint Maries church, to conuent the thrée perſons aboue named vpon certeine articles of religion, who being brought out of priſon before them, were ſeuerallie one after another examined of their opinions, vpon the articles propoſed vnto them, whereof ye maie read in the booke of monuments of the church more at large, and there find the whole procéeding in that matter.

Sir Thomas Wiat arreigned.

Sir Thomas Wiat (of whome mention is made before) was about this time brought from the tower to Weſtminſter, and there arreigned of high treaſon: the earle of Suſſex, ſir Edward Haſtings, and ſir Thomas Cornwallis, with others being his iudges. The effect of whoſe indictment among other things ſpeciallie was; that he the fourtéenth daie of Februarie laſt before, with force of armed multitude and enſignes diſplaied, had at Brainford raiſed open warres againſt our ſouereigne ladie the quéene, traitorouſlie pretending and practiſing to depriue hir of hir crowne and dignitie; and the queſtion was demanded of him, whether he was guiltie or no? Whereat he ſtaied, and beſought the iudges that he might firſt aſke a queſtion, before he anſwered directlie to the point, and he was licenced ſo to doo. The queſtion was, that if he ſhould confeſſe himſelfe guiltie, whether the ſame ſhould not be preiudiciall vnto him, ſo as he by that confeſſion ſhould be barred from vttering ſuch things as he had more to ſay? Whereunto it was anſwered by the court; Maiſter Wiat (ſaid they) ye ſhall haue both leaue and leaſure to ſaie what you can.

The effect of Wiats indictment.

Wiat anſwereth not directlie to the queſtion guiltie or vnguiltie.

Then my lords (quoth he) I muſt confeſſe my ſelfe guiltie, and in the end the truth of my caſe muſt inforce me. I muſt acknowledge this to be a iuſt plague for my ſins, which moſt gréeuouſlie I therefore haue committed againſt God, who ſuffered me thus brutiſhlie & beaſtlie to fall into this horrible offenſe of the law. Wherefore all you lords & gentlemen, with other here preſent, note well my words, lo here & ſée in me the ſame end which all other commonlie had, which haue attempted the like enterpriſe from the beginning. For peruſe the chronicles through, & you ſhall ſée that neuer rebellion attempted by ſubiects againſt their prince and countrie, from the beginning did euer proſper, or had euer better ſucceſſe, except the caſe of king Henrie the fourth: who although he became a prince, yet in his act was but a rebell, for ſo muſt I call him: & though he preuailed for a time, yet was it not long but that his heires were depriued, and thoſe that had right againe reſtored to the kingdome and crowne, and the vſurpation ſo ſharplie reuenged afterward in his bloud, as it well appeared, that the long delaie of Gods vengéance was ſupplied with more gréeuous plagues in the third and fourth generation. For the loue of God all you gentlemen that be here preſent, remember and be taught as well by examples paſt, as alſo by this my preſent infelicitie and moſt wretched caſe. Oh moſt miſerable, miſchiefous, brutiſh & beſtlie furious imaginations of mine! I was perſuaded that by the mariage of the prince of Spaine, the ſecond perſon of this realme, and next heire to the crowne, ſhould haue béene in danger; and that I being a frée borne man, ſhould with my countrie haue béene brought into the bondage and ſeruitude of aliens and ſtrangers. Which brutiſh beaſtlie opinion then ſéemed to me reaſon, and wrought in me ſuch effects, that it led me headlong into the practiſe of this deteſtable crime of treaſon.

A rebels report touching rebellion.

Wiats exhortation to loialtie by his owne example.

Wiat altereth his mind touching the quéenes marriage.

But now being better perſuaded, and vnderſtanding the great commoditie & honor which the realme ſhould receiue by this marriage: I ſtand firme and faſt in this opinion, that if it ſhould pleaſe the quéene to be mercifull vnto me, there is no ſubiect in this land that ſhould more trulie and faithfullie ſerue hir highnes than I ſhall; nor no ſooner die at hir graces féet in defenſe of hir quarrell. I ſerued hir highneſſe againſt the duke of Northumberland, as my lord of Arundell can witneſſe. My grandfather ſerued moſt truelie hir graces grandfather, and for his ſake was ſet vpon the racke in the tower. My father alſo ſerued king Henrie the eight to his good contentation, and I alſo ſerued him, and king Edward his ſon. And in witneſſe of my bloud ſpent in his ſeruice, I carrie a name. I alledge not all this to ſet forth my ſeruice by waie of merit, which I confeſſe but dutie: but to declare to the whole world, that by abuſing my wits, in purſuing my miſaduiſed opinion, I haue not onelie ouerthrowne my houſe, and defaced all the well doings of me and my anceſtors (if euer there were anie) but alſo haue béene the cauſe of mine owne death and deſtruction. Neither doo I alledge this to iuſtifie my ſelfe in anie point, neither for an excuſe of mine offenſe: but moſt humblie ſubmit my ſelfe to the quéenes maieſties mercie and pitie, deſiring you my lord of Suſſex, and you maiſter Haſtings, with all the reſt of this honorable bench, to be meanes to the quéenes highneſſe for hir mercie, which is the greateſt treaſure that maie be giuen to anie prince from God, ſuch a vertue as God hath appropriate to himſelfe. Which if hir highneſſe vouchſafe to extend vnto me, ſhe ſhall beſtow it on him, who ſhall be moſt glad to ſerue truelie, and not refuſe to die in hir quarrell. For I proteſt before the iudge of all iudges, I neuer meant hurt againſt hir highneſſe perſon.

The fruits of rebellion by Wiats confeſſion.

The quéenes attornie ſpeaketh to Wiat.

Then ſaid the quéenes attorneie; Maiſter Wiat you haue great cauſe to be ſorie, and repent for your fault, whereby you haue not onelie vndoone your ſelfe and your houſe, but alſo a number of other gentlemen, who being true men might haue ſerued their prince and countrie: yet if you had gone no further, it might haue béene borne withall the better. But being not ſo contented to ſtaie your ſelfe, you haue ſo procured the duke of Suffolke (a man ſoone trained to your purpoſe) and his two brethren alſo: by meanes whereof without the quéenes greater mercie, you haue ouerthrowne that noble houſe. And yet not ſo ſtaied, your attempt hath reached as far as in you laie to the ſecond perſon of the realme, in whom next to the quéenes highneſſe reſteth all our hope and comfort, wherby hir honor is brought in queſtion, and what danger will folow, and to what end it will come God knoweth: of all this you are the author. Wiat anſwered; As I will not in anie thing iuſtifie my ſelfe, ſo I beſéech you, I being in this wretched eſtate, not to ouercharge me, nor to make me ſéeme to be that I am not. I am loth to touch anie perſon by name; but that I haue written I haue written. Then ſaid the iudge; Maiſter Wiat, maiſter attornie hath well mooued you to repent your offenſes, and we for our parts wiſh you the ſame.

Wiats anſwer to the quéenes attorneie.

The iudge ſpeaketh.

Sir Edward Haſtings ſpéech to Wiat.

Then ſaid ſir Edward Haſtings maiſter of the quéens horſſe; Maiſter Wiat, doo ye remember when I and maiſter Cornwallis were ſent vnto you from the quéenes highneſſe to demand the cauſe of your enterpriſe, and what you required? Were not theſe your demands, that the quéenes grace ſhould go to the tower, and there remaine; and you to haue the rule of the tower and hir perſon, with the treaſure in kéeping, and ſuch of hir councell as you would require to be deliuered into your hands, ſaieng that you would be truſted and not truſt? Which words when Wiat had confeſſed, then ſaid the quéenes ſolicitor; Your preſumption was ouer great, & your attempt

Maiſter Cordall late maiſter of the rolles ſpeaketh.

tempt in this caſe hath purchaſed you perpetuall infamie, and ſhall be called Wiats rebellion, as Wat Tilers was called Wat Tilers rebellion. Then ſaid the attorneie; Maiſter Wiat, were you not priuie to a deuiſe whereby the quéene ſhould haue béene murthered in a place where ſhe ſhould walke? I doo not burthen you to confeſſe this, for thus much I muſt ſaie on your behalfe, that you miſliked that deuiſe? That deuiſe (ſaid Wiat) was the deuiſe of William Thomas, whome euer after I abhorred for that cauſe.

William Thomas meant to murther quéene Marie.

Then was a letter ſhewed, which Wiat being in Southworke had written to the duke of Suffolke, that he ſhould méet him at Kingſtone bridge, and from thenſe to accompanie him to London, although he came with the fewer number. Wiat at the firſt did not ſéeme to remember anie ſuch letter; but when it was ſhewed him, he confeſſed his hand. Then was it demanded of him among other things, whie he refuſed the quéenes pardon when it was offered him. My lords (quoth he) I confeſſe my fault and offenſe to be moſt vile and heinous, for the which firſt I aſke God mercie, without the which I cannot challenge anie thing, ſuch is my offenſe alreadie committed. And therefore I beſéech you to trouble me with no more queſtions, for I haue deliuered all things vnto hir grace in writing. And finallie here I muſt confeſſe, that of all the voiages wherein I haue ſerued, this was the moſt deſperat and painfull iorneie that euer I made. And where you aſked whie I receiued not the quéenes pardon when it was offered vnto me; Oh vnhappie man! What ſhall I ſaie? When I was entred into this diuelliſh & deſperat aduenture, there was no waie but wade through with that I had taken in hand: for I had thought that other had béene as farre forward as my ſelfe, which I found farre otherwiſe. So that being bent to kéepe promiſe with all my confederats, none kept promiſe with me; for I like a moile went through thicke and thin with this determination, that if I ſhould come to anie treatie, I ſhould ſéeme to bewraie all my friends.

Wiats confeſſion.

Wiat is ſorie that he refuſed the quéens pardon when it was offred.

But whereto ſhould I ſpend anie more words? I yéeld my ſelfe wholie vnto the quéenes mercie, knowing well that it is onelie in hir power to make me (as I haue deſerued) an open example to the world with Wat Tiler; or elſe to make me participant of that pitie which ſhe hath extended in as great crimes as mine; moſt humblie beſéeching you all to be means for me to hir highneſſe for mercie, which is my laſt and onelie refuge. The will of God be doone on me. Upon this confeſſion without further triall, he receiued the iudgement accuſtomed in caſes of treaſon, which was to be hanged, drawne and quartered. And the eleuenth of Aprill next folowing he was brought to the Tower hill, and there was pardoned of his drawing and hanging, but had his head ſtricken off, and his bodie cut in foure quarters, and ſet vp in diuerſe places about the citie, but his head was ſet vpon the gallowes at Haie hill beſide Hide parke.

The execution of ſir Thomas Wiat.

Now here by the waie is to be noted, that he being on the ſcaffold readie to ſuffer, declared that the ladie Elizabeth and ſir Edward Courtneie earle of Deuonſhire, whome he had accuſed before (as it ſéemed) were neuer priuie to his doings, as farre as he knew, or was able to charge them. And when doctor Weſton, being then his confeſſor told him that he had confeſſed the contrarie vnto the councell, he anſwered thus; That I ſaid then, I ſaid, but that which I ſaie now is true. This was the end of Wiat and his conſpiracie; as alſo the like hath béene of others attempting anie rebellion. For as their enterpriſe being, according to the proper qualitie thereof, conſidered, is flat againſt Gods ordinance, who hath ordeined magiſtracie to be reuerenced of inferiors: ſo it is vnlikelie to bring other than infortunatneſſe, and ſhamefull ouerthrowes vnto the attempters; in whome although will want not to compaſſe anie worke; yet force failing, they miſſe the marke, & all bicauſe raſhneſſe giueth them a falſe aime. Wherefore to conclude this tragicall diſcourſe of Wiat, it were to be wiſhed that the ſage and ſafe counſell of Cato were put in common practiſe of all men, which is, to vndertake & doo nothing aboue their ſtrength:

Quod potes, id tentes, operis ne pondere preſſus,
Succumbat labor, & fruſtra tentata relinquas.

Sir Nicholas Throckmorton arreigned of high treaſon cléereth himſelfe.

The ſeuenth daie of Aprill next following, ſir Nicholas Throckmorton knight was brought from the tower to Guildhall in London, and there arreigned of high treaſon, as adherent and principall counſellor to the ſaid Wiat and the duke of Suffolke, and the reſt in the fore remembred conſpiracie againſt the quéene. But he ſo ſtoutlie, and therwithall ſo cunninglie anſwered for himſelfe, as well in cléering of his cauſe, as alſo in defending & auoiding ſuch points of the lawes of the realme, as were there alleaged againſt him, that the queſt which paſſed vpon his life & death found him not giltie. With which verdict the iudges and councellors there preſent were ſo much offended, that they bound the iurie in the ſumme of fiue hundred pounds a péece, to appeare before the councell in the Starchamber, at a daie appointed. And according to their bond, they appeared there before the ſaid councell vpon Wedneſdaie, being the one and twentith of Aprill, and ſaint Marks daie; from whenſe after certeine queſtioning, they were committed to priſon, Emanuell Lucar and maſter Whetſton to the tower, and the other to the Fléet.

But now forſomuch as a copie of the order of ſir Nicholas Throckmortons arreignement hath come to my hands, and that the ſame maie giue ſome light to the hiſtorie of that dangerous rebellion, I haue thought it not impertinent to inſert the ſame: not wiſhing that it ſhould be offenſiue to anie, ſith it is in euerie mans libertie to weie his words vttered in his owne defenſe, and likewiſe the doings of the queſt in acquitting him, as maie ſéeme good to their diſcretions, ſith I haue deliuered the ſame as I haue found it, without preiudicing anie mans opinion, to thinke thereof otherwiſe than as the cauſe maie mooue him.

The order of the arreignement of ſir Nicholas Throckmorton knight, in the Guildhall of London the ſeuenteenth daie of Aprill 1554, expreſſed in a dialog for the better vnderſtanding of euerie mans part.

The names of the commiſſioners.

Sir Thomas White knight lord maior of London, the earle of Shrewesburie, the earle of Derbie, ſir Thomas Bromleie knight lord chiefe iuſtice of England, ſir Nicholas Hare knight maſter of the rolles, ſir Francis Englefield knight maſter of the court of wards and liberties, ſir Richard Southwell knight one of the priuie councell, ſir Edward Walgraue knight one of the priuie councell, ſir Roger Cholmeleie knight, ſir William Portman knight one of the iuſtices of the Kings bench, ſir Edward Sanders knight one of the iuſtices of the common plées; maſter Stanford & maſter Dier ſergeants, maſter Edward Griffin attournie generall, maſter Sendall and Peter Tichbourne clearks of the crowne. Firſt, after proclamation made, and the commiſſion read, the lieutenant of the tower, maſter Thomas Bridges, brought the priſoner to the barre; then ſilence was commanded, and Sendall ſaid to the priſoner ner as followeth.

The quéenes learned counſell gaue euidence againſt the priſoner.

Sendall. Nicholas Throckmorton knight hold vp thy hand, thou art before this time indicted of high treaſon, &c: that thou then and there didſt falſelie and traitorouſlie, &c: conſpire and imagine the death of the queenes maieſtie, &c: and falſelie and traitorouſlie diddeſt leuie warre againſt the queene within hir realme, &c: and alſo thou waſt adherent to the queenes enimies within hir realme, giuing to them aid and comfort, &c: and alſo falſelie and traitorouſlie diddeſt conſpire and intend to depoſe and depriue the queene of hir roiall eſtate, and ſo finallie deſtroie hir, &c: and alſo thou diddeſt falſelie and traitorouſlie deuiſe and conclude to take violentlie the tower of London, &c. Of all which treaſons and euerie of them in maner & forme, &c: art thou giltie or not giltie?

Throckmorton. Maie it pleaſe you my lords and maiſters, which be authoriſed by the queenes commiſſion to be iudges this daie, to giue me leaue to ſpeake a few words, which dooth both concerne you and me, before I anſwer to the indictement, and not altogither impertinent to the matter, and then plead to the indictment.

Bromleie. No, the order is not ſo, you muſt firſt plead whether you be giltie or no.

Throckmorton. If that be your order and law, iudge accordinglie to it.

Hare. You muſt firſt anſwer to the matter wherewith you are charged, and then you maie talke at your pleaſure.

Throckmorton. But things ſpoken out of place, were as good not ſpoken.

Bromleie. Theſe be but delaies to ſpend time, therefore anſwer as the law willeth you.

Throckmorton. My lords I praie you make not too much haſt with me, neither thinke not long for your dinner, for my caſe requireth leaſure, and you haue well dined when you haue doone iuſtice trulie. Chriſt ſaid, Bleſſed are they that hunger and thirſt for righteouſneſſe.

Bromleie. I can forbeare my dinner as well as you, and care as little as you peraduenture.

Shrewſburie. Come you hither to checke vs Throckmorton? We will not be ſo vſed, no no, I for mine owne part haue forborne my breakefaſt, dinner, and ſupper to ſerue the queene.

Throckmorton. Yea my good lord I know it right well, I meant not to touch your lordſhip, for your ſeruice and pains is euidentlie knowne to all men.

Southwell. Maſter Throckmorton, this talke needeth not, we know what we haue to doo, and you would teach vs our duties, you hurt your matter: go to, go to.

Throckmorton. Maſter Southwell, you miſtake me, I meant not to teach you, nor none of you, but to remember you of that I truſt you all be well inſtructed in; and ſo I ſatiſfie my ſelfe, ſith I ſhall not ſpeake, thinking you all know what you haue to doo, or ought to know: ſo I will anſwer to the indictement, and doo plead not giltie to the whole, and to euerie part thereof.

Sendall. How wilt thou be tried?

Throckmorton. Shall I be tried as I would, or as I ſhould?

Bromleie. You ſhall be tried as the law will, and therefore you muſt ſaie by God and by the countrie.

Throckmorton. Is that your law for me? It is not as I would, but ſith you will haue it ſo, I am pleaſed with it, and doo deſire to be tried by faithfull iuſt men, which more feare God than the world.

Then the iurie was called.

What time the atturnie went forthwith to maſter Cholmeleie, and ſhewed him the ſhiriffes returne, who being acquainted with the citizens, knowing the corruptions and dexterities of them in ſuch caſes, noted certeine to be challenged for the queene (a rare caſe) and the ſame men being knowne to be ſufficient and indifferent, that no exceptions were to be taken to them, but onelie for their vpright honeſties: notwithſtanding, the atturnie prompting ſergeant Dier, the ſaid ſergeant challenged one Bacon, and an other citizen peremptorilie for the queene. Then the priſoner demanded the cauſe of the chalenge? The ſergeant anſwered; We need not to ſhew you the cauſe of the chalenge for the queene. Then the inqueſt was furniſhed with other honeſt men, that is to ſaie, Whetſton & Lucar, ſo the priſoner vſed theſe words.

Throckmorton. I truſt you haue not prouided for me this daie, as in times paſt I knew an other gentleman occupieng this wofull place was prouided for. It chanced one of the iuſtices vpon gelouſie of the priſoners acquitall, for the goodneſſe of his cauſe, ſaid to an other of his companions a iuſtice, when the iurie did appeare: I like not this iurie for our purpoſe, they ſeeme to be too pitifull and too charitable to condemne the priſoner. No no, ſaid the other iudge (to wit Cholmeleie) I warrant you, they be picked fellowes for the nonce, he ſhall drinke of the ſame cup his fellowes haue doone. I was then a looker on of the pageant as others be now here: but now wo is me, I am a plaier in that wofull tragedie. Well, for theſe and ſuch other like the blacke oxe hath of late troden on ſome of their feet: but my truſt is, I ſhall not be ſo vſed. Whileſt this talke was, Cholmeleie conſulted with the atturnie about the iurie, which the priſoner eſpied, and then ſaid as here inſueth; Ah ah maſter Cholmeleie, will this foule packing neuer be left?

Cholmeleie. Whie what doo I, I praie you M. Throckmorton? I did nothing I am ſure, you doo picke quarrels to me.

Throckmorton. Well maiſter Cholmeleie if you doo well, it is better for you, God helpe you.

[The iurie then was ſworne, and proclamation made, that whoſoeuer would giue euidence againſt ſir Nicholas Throckmorton knight, ſhould come in and be heard, for the priſoner ſtood vpon his deliuerance, wherevpon ſergeant Stanford preſented himſelfe to ſpeake.]

Throckmorton. And it may pleaſe you maſter ſergeant and the others my maſters of the queenes learned councell, like as I was minded to haue ſaid a few words to the commiſſioners, if I might haue had leaue for their better remembrance of their duties in this place of iuſtice, and concerning direct indifferencie to be vſed towards me this daie: ſo by your patience I doo thinke good to ſaie ſomewhat to you, and to the reſt of the queenes learned councell, appointed to giue euidence againſt me. And albeit you and the reſt by order be appointed to giue euidence againſt me, and interteined to ſet forth the depoſitions and matter againſt me; yet I praie you remember I am not alienate from you, but that I am your chriſtian brother; neither you ſo charged, but you ought to conſider equitie; nor yet ſo priuileged, but that you haue a dutie of God appointed you how you ſhall doo your office; which if you exceed, will be greeuouſlie required at your hands. It is lawfull for you to vſe your gifts which I know God hath largelie giuen you, as your learning, art, and eloquence, ſo as thereby you doo not ſeduce the minds of the ſimple and vnlearned iurie, to credit matters otherwiſe than they be. For maſter ſergeant, I know how by perſuaſions, inforcements, preſumptions, applieng, implieng, inferring, coniecturing, deducing of arguments, wreſting and exceeding the law, the circumſtances, the depoſitions and confeſſions that vnlearned men may be inchanted to thinke and iudge thoſe that be things indifferent, or at the worſt but ouerſights to be great treaſons; ſuch power orators haue, & ſuch ignorance the vnlearned haue. Almightie God by the mouth of his prophet doth conclude ſuch aduocates be curſſed, ſpeaking theſe words: Curſſed be he that doth his office craftilie, corruptlie, and maliciouſlie. And conſider alſo, that my bloud ſhall be required at your hands, and puniſhed in you and yours, to the third and fourth generation. Notwithſtanding, you and the iuſtices excuſe alwaies ſuch erronious doings, when they be after called in queſtion by the verdict of the twelue men: but I aſſure you, the purgation ſerueth you as it did Pilat, and you waſh your hands of the bloudſhed, as Pilat did of Chriſts. And now to your matter.

Stanford. And it pleaſe you my lords, I doubt not to proue euidentlie and manifeſtlie, that Throckmorton is worthilie and rightlie indicted and arreigned of theſe treaſons, and that he was a principall deuiſer, procurer, and contriuer of the late rebellion; and that Wiat was but his miniſter. How ſaie you Throckmorton, did not you ſend Winter to Wiat into Kent, and did deuiſe that the tower of London ſhould be taken, with other inſtructions concerning Wiats ſturre and rebellion?

Throckmorton. Maie it pleaſe you that I ſhall anſwer particularlie to the matters obiected againſt me, in aſmuch as my memorie is not good, and the ſame much decaied ſince my greeuous impriſonment, with want of ſleepe, and other diſquietneſſe: I confeſſe I did ſaie to Winter that Wiat was deſirous to ſpeake with him, as I vnderſtood.

Stanford. Yea ſir, and you deuiſed togither of the taking of the tower of London, and of the other great treaſons.

Throckmorton. No, I did not ſo, proue it.

Stanford. Yes ſir, you met with Winter ſundrie times as ſhall appeare, and in ſundrie places.

Throckmorton. That granted, proueth no ſuch matter as is ſuppoſed in the indictment.

Winters confeſſion read by Stanford. Stanford read Winters confeſſion, which was of this effect, that Throckmorton met with Winter one daie in tower ſtreet, and told him, that ſir Thomas Wiat was deſirous to ſpeake with him, and Winter demanded where Wiat was, Throckmorton anſwered at his houſe in Kent, not farre from Gillingham, as I heard ſaie, where the ſhips lie. Then they parted at that time, and ſhortlie after, Throckmorton met with Winter, vnto whome Winter ſaid; Maſter Wiat doth much miſlike the comming of the Spaniards into this realme, and feareth their ſhort arriuall heere, in as much as dailie he heareth thereof, doth ſee dailie diuerſe of them arriue here, ſcattered like ſouldiors; and therefore he thinketh good the tower of London ſhould be taken by a ſleight, before the prince came, leaſt that peece be deliuered to the Spaniards. How ſaie you Throckmorton to it? Throckmorton anſwered; I miſlike it for diuerſe reſpects. Euen ſo doo I ſaid Winter. At another time Throckmorton met me the ſaid Winter in Paules, when he had ſent one to my houſe, to ſeeke me before, and he ſaid to me; You are admerall of the fleet that now goeth into Spaine. I anſwered Yea. Throckmorton ſaid, When will your ſhips be redie? I ſaid within ten daies. Throckmorton ſaid, I vnderſtand you are appointed to conduct and carrie the lord priuie ſeale into Spaine, and conſidering the danger of the Frenchmen, which you ſaie arme them to the ſea apace, me thinke it well doone, you put my ſaid lord and his traine on land in the weſt countrie to auoid all dangers. Throckmorton ſaid alſo, that Wiat changed his purpoſe for taking the tower of London. I ſaid I was glad of it, & as for the Frenchmen, I care not much for them, I will ſo handle the matter, that the queenes ſhips ſhall be (I warrant you) in ſafegard. Another time I met with maſter Throckmorton, when I came from the emperours ambaſſadors, vnto whome I declared, that the emperour had ſent me a faire chaine, and ſhewed it vnto Throckmorton, who ſaid; For this chaine you haue ſold your countrie. I ſaid it is neither French king nor emperour that can make me ſell my countrie, but I will be a true Engliſhman. Then they parted. This is the ſumme of the talke betwixt Throckmorton and Winter.

Stanford. Now my maſters of the iurie, you haue heard my ſaiengs confirmed with Winters confeſſion. How ſaie you Throckmorton, can you denie this, if you will, you ſhall haue Winter iuſtifie it to your face.

Throckmorton. My lords, ſhall it pleaſe you that I ſhall anſwer.

Bromleie. Yea, ſaie your mind.

Throckmorton. I may trulie denie ſome part of this confeſſion, but bicauſe there is nothing materiall greatlie, I ſuppoſe the whole be true, and what is herein depoſed, ſufficient to bring me within the compaſſe of the indictment?

Stanford. It appeareth that you were of counſell with Wiat, in as much as you ſent Winter downe to him, who vttered vnto him diuerſe traitorous deuiſes.

Throckmorton. This is but coniecturall, yet ſith you will conſtrue it ſo maliciouſlie, I will recompt how I ſent Winter to Wiat, and then I praie you of the iurie iudge better than maſter ſergeant doth. I met by chance a ſeruant of maſter Wiats, who demanded of me for Winter, and ſhewed me, that his maſter would gladlie ſpeake with him: and ſo without anie further declaration, deſired me if I met Winter to tell him maſter Wiats mind, and where he was. Thus much for the ſending downe of Winter.

Attourneie. Yea ſir, but how ſaie you to the taking of the tower of London, which is treaſon?

Throckmorton. I anſwer, though Wiat thought meet to attempt ſo dangerous an enterpriſe, and that Winter informed me of it, you cannot extend Wiats deuiſes to be mine, and to bring me within the compaſſe of treaſon. For what maner of reſoning or proofe is this, Wiat would haue taken the tower, Ergo Throckmorton is a traitor? Winter doth make my purgation in his owne confeſſion, euen now red as it was by maſter ſergeant, though I ſaie nothing: for Winter doth auow there, that I did much miſlike it. And bicauſe you ſhall the better vnderſtand that I did alwaies not alow theſe maſter Wiats deuiſes, I had theſe words to Winter, when he informed me of it; I thinke maſter Wiat would no Engliſhman hurt and this enterpriſe cannot be doone without the hurt and ſlaughter of both parties. For I know him that hath the charge of the peece, & his brother, both men of good ſeruice, the one had in charge a peece of great importance, Bullongne I meane, which was ſtoutlie aſſailed, & notwithſtanding he made a good accompt of it for his time: the like I am ſure he will doo by this his charge. Moreouer, to accompt the taking of the tower, is verie dangerous by the law. Theſe were my words to Winter. And beſides, it is verie vnlike that I of all men would confederate in ſuch a matter againſt the lieutenant of the tower, whoſe daughter my brother hath married, and his houſe and mine alied togither by mariage ſundrie times within theſe few yeares.

Hare. But how ſaie you to this, that Wiat and you had conference togither ſundrie times at Warners houſe, and in other places?

Throckmorton. This is a verie generall charge to haue conference, but whie was it not as lawfull for me to confer with Wiat as with you,or anie other man? I then knew no more by Wiat, than by anie other. And to prooue to talke with Wiat was lawfull and indifferent, the laſt daie that I did talke with Wiat, I ſaw my lord of Arundell,with other noble men and gentlemen, talke with him familiarlie in the chamber of preſence.

Hare. But they did not conſpire nor talke of anie ſturre againſt the Spaniards as you did pretend, & meant it againſt the quéene, for you, Crofts, Rogers, and Warner did oftentimes deuiſe in Warners houſe about your traitorous purpoſes, or elſe what did you ſo often there?

Throckmorton. I confeſſe I did miſlike the quéenes mariage with Spaine,and alſo the comming of the Spaniards hither,and then me thought I had reaſon to doo ſo: for I did learne the reaſons of my miſliking of you maſter Hare,maſter Southwell, and others in the parlement houſe,there I did ſée the whole conſent of the realme againſt it; and I a hearer, but no ſpeaker,did learne my miſliking of thoſe matters, confirmed by manie ſundrie reaſons amongſt you: but as concerning anie ſturre or vprore againſt the Spaniards, I neuer made anie, neither procured anie to be made; and for my much reſort to maſter Warners houſe,it was not to conferre with maſter Wiat,but to ſhew my fréendſhip to my verie good lord the marqueſſe of Northampton, who was lodged there when he was inlarged.

Stanford. Did not you Throckmorton tell Winter that Wiat had changed his mind for the taking of the tower, wherby it appeared euidentlie that you knew of his dooings?

Throckmorton. Truelie I did not tell him ſo,but I care not greatlie to giue you that wepon to plaie you withall,now let vs ſée what you can make of it.

Stanford. Yea ſir,that prooueth that you were priuie to Wiats mind in all his deuiſes and treaſons,& that there was ſending betwixt you and Wiat from time to time.

Throckmorton. What maſter ſergeant? Dooth this prooue againſt me,that I knew Wiat did repent him of an euill deuiſed enterpriſe? Is it to know Wiats repentance ſinne? No,it is but a veniall ſinne,if it be anie it is not deadlie. But where is the meſſenger or meſſage that Wiat ſent to me touching his alteration,and yet it was lawfull inough for me to heare from Wiat at that time,as from anie other man,for anie act that I knew he had doone.

Dier. And it may pleaſe you my lords, and you my maſters of the iurie,to prooue that Throckmorton is a principall dooer in this rebellion, there is yet manie other things to be declared : among other,there is Crofts confeſſion, who ſaith, that he and you,and your complices, did manie times deuiſe about the whole matters,and he made you priuie to all his determinations,and you ſhewed him that you would go into the weſt countrie with the earle of Deuon,to ſir Peter Caroe,accompanied with others.

Throckmorton. Maſter Crofts is yet liuing,and is héere this daie, how happeneth it he is not brought face to face to iuſtifie this matter, neither hath béene of all this time? Will you know the truth? Either he ſaid not ſo,or he will not abide by it, but honeſtlie hath reformed himſelfe. And as for knowing his deuiſes, I was ſo well acquainted with them,that I can name none of them, nor you neither as matter knowne to me.

Attourneie. But whie did you aduiſe Winter to land my lord priuie ſeale in the weſt countrie?

Throckmorton. He that told you that my mind was to land him there,dooth partlie tell you a reaſon whie I ſaid ſo, if you would remember as well the one as the other: but bicauſe you are ſo forgetfull,I will recite therefore. In communication betwixt Winter and me, as he declared to me that the Spaniards prouided to bring their prince hither,ſo the Frenchmen prepared to interrupt his arriuall: for they began to arme to the ſea,and had alreadie certeine ſhips on the weſt coaſt(as he hard.) Vnto whom I ſaid, that peraduenture not onelie the quéenes ſhips vnder his charge might be in ieopardie, but alſo my lord priuie ſeale, and all his traine; the Frenchmen being well prepared to méet with them,and therefore for all euents it were good you ſhould put my ſaid lord in the weſt countrie in caſe you eſpie anie ieopardie. But what dooth this prooue to the treaſons,if I were not able to giue conuenient reaſons to my talke?

Stanford. Marie ſir now commeth the proofes of your treaſons,you ſhall heare what Cutbert Vaughan ſaith againſt you.

Vaughans confeſſion was read by Stanford.

Then ſergeant Stanford did read Vaughans confeſſion, tending to this effect. That Vaughan comming out of Kent, met with Throckmorton at maſter Warners houſe,who after he had doone commendations from Wiat to him, deſired to know where Crofts was. Throckmorton anſwered,either at Arundell houſe where he lodgeth, or in Paules. Then Vaughan deſired to know how things went at London, ſaieng; Maſter Wiat & we of Kent doo much miſlike the marriage with Spaine, and the comming of the Spaniards for diuerſe reſpects: howbeit, if other countries miſlike them as Kent dooth,they ſhall be but hardlie welcome,and ſo they parted. Shortlie after Throckmorton met with Vaughan in Paules, vnto whome Throckmorton declared with ſundrie circumſtances, that the Weſterne men were in a readineſſe to come forwards, and that ſir Peter Caroe had ſent vnto him euen now, and that he had in order a good band of horſſemen, and an other of footmen. Then Vaughan demanded what the earle of Deuonſhire would doo? Throckmorton anſwered he will mar all,for he will not go hence, and yet ſir Peter Caroe would méet him with a band,both of horſſemen and footmen, by the waie at Andeuer for his ſafegard, and alſo he ſhould haue béene well accompanied from hence with other gentlemen, yet all this will not mooue him to depart hence. Moreouer, the ſaid erle hath(as is ſaid)diſcouered all the whole matter to the chancellor,or elſe it is come out by his tailor,about the trimming of a ſhirt of male,and the making of a cloke. At another time, Vaughan ſaith, Throckmorton ſhewed him that he had ſent a poſt to ſir Peter Caroe,to come forward with as much ſpéed as might be,and to bring his force with him. And alſo Throckmorton aduiſed Vaughan to will maſter Wiat to come forward with his power: for now was the time,in as much as the Londoners would take his part if the matter were preſented to them. Vaughan ſaid alſo,that Throckmorton & Warner ſhould haue ridden with the ſaid earle weſtward. Moreouer the ſaid Vaughan depoſed, that Throckmorton ſhewed him in talke of the earle of Penbroke, that the ſaid earle would not fight againſt them, though he would not take their parts. Alſo Vaughan ſaid, that Throckmorton ſhewed him that he would ride downe into Barkeſhire to ſir Francis Englefields houſe,there to méet his eldeſt brother, to mooue him to take his part. And this was the ſum of Cutbert Vaughans confeſſion.

Stanford. How ſaie you? Dooth not here appeare euident matter to prooue you a principall, who not onelie gaue order to ſir Peter Caroe and his adherents,for their rebellious acts in the weſt countrie, but alſo procured Wiat to make his rebellion, appointing him and the others alſo, when they ſhould attempt their enterpriſe,and how they ſhould order their dooings from time to time. Beſides all this euident matter, you were ſpeciallie appointed to go awaie with the earle of Deuon as one that would direct all things, and giue order to all men. And therefore Throckmorton ſith this matter is ſo manifeſt, and the euidence ſo apparant, I would aduiſe you to confeſſe your fault, & ſubmit your ſelfe to the quéenes mercie.

Bromleie. How ſaie you, will you confeſſe the matter, and it will be beſt for you?

Throckmorton. No, I will neuer accuſe my ſelfe vniuſtlie, but in as much as I am come hither to be tried, I praie ye let me haue the law fauourablie.

Attourneie. It is apparant that you laie at London as a factor, to giue intelligence as well to them in the weſt, as to Wiat in Kent.

Throckmorton. How proue you that, or who doth accuſe me but this condemned man?

Attourneie. Whie will you denie this matter? You ſhall haue Vaughan iuſtifie his whole confeſſion here before your face.

Throckmorton. It ſhall not néed, I know his vnſhamfaſtneſſe, he hath aduowed ſome of this vntrue talke before this time to my face, and it is not otherwiſe like, conſidering the price, but he will doo the ſame againe.

Attourneie. My lord and maſters, you ſhall haue Vaughan to iuſtifie this héere before you all, and confirme it with a booke oth.

Throckmorton. He that hath ſaid and lied, will not being in this caſe ſticke to ſweare and lie.

¶Then was Cutbert Vaughan brought into the open court.]

Sendall. How ſaie you Cutbert Vaughan, is this your owne confeſſion, and will you abide by all that is here written?

Vaughan. Let me ſée it and I will tell you.

¶Then his confeſſion was ſhewed him.]

Attourneie. Bicauſe you of the iurie the better may credit him, I praie you my lords let Vaughan be ſworne.

¶Then was Vaughan ſworne on a booke to ſaie nothing but the truth.]

Vaughan. It may pleaſe you my lords and maſters, I could haue béene well content to haue choſe ſeauen yeares impriſonment, though I had béene a frée man in the law, rather than I would this daie haue giuen euidence againſt ſir Nicholas Throckmorton; againſt whome I beare no diſpleaſure: but ſith I muſt néeds confeſſe my knowledge, I muſt confeſſe all that is there written is true. How ſaie you maſter Throckmorton, was there anie diſpleaſure betwéene you and me, to moue me to ſaie aught againſt you?

Throckmorton. None that I know. How ſaie you Vaughan, what acquaintance was there betwéene you and me, and what leters of credit or token did you bring me from Wiat, or anie other, to moue me to truſt you?

Vaughan. As for acquaintance, I knew you as I did other gentlemen: and as for letters, I brought you none other but commendations from maſter Wiat, as I did to diuerſe other of his acquaintance at London.

Throckmorton. You might as well forge the commendations as the reſt: but if you haue doone with Vaughan my lords, I praie you giue me leaue to anſwer.

Bromleie. Speake and be ſhort.

Throckmorton. I ſpeake generallie to all that be here preſent, but ſpeciallie to you of my iurie, touching the credit of Vaughans depoſitions againſt me, a condemned man, and after to the matter: and note I praie you the circumſtances, as ſomewhat materiall to induce the better. Firſt I praie you remember the ſmall familiaritie betwixt Vaughan and me, as he hath aduowed before you, and moreouer, to procure credit at my hand, brought neither letter nor token from Wiat, nor from anie other to me, which he alſo hath confeſſed here: and I will ſuppoſe Vaughan to be in as good condition as anie other man here, that is to ſaie, an vncondemned man: yet I referre it to your good iudgement, whether it were like that I, knowing onelie Vaughans perſon from an other man, and hauing none other acquaintance with him, would ſo frankelie diſcouer my mind to him in ſo dangerous a matter. How like (I ſaie) is this, when diuerſe of theſe gentlemen now in captiuitie, being my verie familiars, could not depoſe anie ſuch matter againſt me, and neuertheleſſe vpon their examinations haue ſaid what they could? And though I be no wiſe man, I am not ſo raſh as to vtter to an vnknowne man (for ſo I may call him in compariſon) a matter ſo dangerous for me to ſpeake, and him to heare. But bicauſe my truth and his falſhood ſhall the better appeare vnto you, I will declare his inconſtancie in vttering this his euidence. And for my better credit, it may pleaſe you maſter Southwell, I take you to witneſſe, when Vaughan firſt iuſtified this his vniuſt accuſation againſt me before the lord Paget, the lord Chamberleine, you maſter Southwell, and others, he referred the confirmation of this his ſurmiſed matter, to a letter ſent from him to ſir Thomas Wiat, which letter doth neither appeare, nor anie teſtimonie of the ſaid maſter Wiat againſt me touching the matter: for I doubt not ſir Thomas Wiat hath béen examined of me, and hath ſaid what he could directlie or indirectlie. Alſo Vaughan ſaith, that yoong Edward Wiat could confirme this matter, as one that knew this pretended diſcourſe betwixt Vaughan and me, and there vpon I made ſute that Edward Wiat might either be brought face to face to me, or otherwiſe be examined.

Southwell. Maſter Throckmorton you miſtake your matter, for Vaughan ſaid, that Edward Wiat did know ſome part of the matter, and alſo was priuie of the letter that Vaughan ſent ſir Thomas Wiat.

Throckmorton. Yea ſir, that was Vaughans laſt ſhift, when I charged him before the maſter of the horſſe and you, with his former allegations touching his witneſſe, whome when he eſpied would not doo ſo lewdlie as he thought, then he vſed this alteration. But where be Edward Wiats depoſitions of anie thing againſt me? Now it appeareth neither his firſt nor his laſt tale to be true. For you know maſter Bridges, and ſo doth my lord your brother, that I deſired twice or thrice Edward Wiat ſhould be examined, and I am ſure, and moſt aſſured he hath béene willed to ſaie what he could, and here is nothing depoſed by him againſt me, either touching anie letter or other conference. Or where is Vaughans letter ſent by ſir Thomas Wiat concerning my talke?

But now I will ſpeake of Vaughans preſent eſtate in that he is a condemned man, whoſe teſtimonie is nothing worth by anie law. And bicauſe falſe witneſſe is mentioned in the goſpell, treating of accuſation, hearke I praie you what S. Ierome ſaith, expounding that place. It is demanded whie Chriſts accuſers be called falſe witneſſes, which did report Chriſts words not as he ſpake them. They be falſe witneſſes ſaith S. Ierome, which doo ad, alter, wreſt, double, or doo ſpeake for hope to auoid death, or for malice to procure another mans death: for all men maie eaſilie gather he cannot ſpeake truelie of me, or in the caſe of another mans life, where he hath hope of his owne by accuſation. Thus much ſpeaketh S. Ierome of falſe witneſſe. By the ciuill law there be manie exceptions to be taken againſt ſuch teſtimonies: but bicauſe we be not gouerned by that law, neither haue I my triall by it, it ſhall be ſoperfluous to trouble you therewith, & therefore you ſhall heare what your owne law doth ſaie. There was a ſtatute made in my late ſoueraigne lord & maſter his time, touching accuſation, and theſe be the words.

Be it enacted, that no perſon nor perſons, &c. ſhalbe indicted,arreigned,condemned,or conuicted for anie offenſe of treaſon, petit treaſon,miſpriſion of treſon, for which the ſame offendor ſhall ſuffer anie pains of death,impriſonment,loſſe or forfeiture of his goods, lands,&c: vnleſſe the ſame offendor be accuſed by two ſufficient & lawfull witneſſes,or ſhall willinglie without violence confeſſe the ſame. And alſo in the ſixt yeare of his reigne,it is thus ratified as inſueth.

That no perſon nor perſons ſhall be indicted,arreigned, condemned, conuicted or attainted of the treaſons or offenſes aforeſaid, or for anie other treaſons that now be, or hereafter ſhall be; vnleſſe the ſame offendor or offendors be therof accuſed by two lawfull and ſufficient accuſers, which at the time of the arreignement of the parties ſo accuſed (if they be then liuing)ſhall be brought in perſon before the ſaid partie accuſed, and auow and mainteine that they haue to ſaie againſt the ſaid partie,to proue him giltie of the treaſons or offenſe conteined in the bill of indictment laid againſt the partie arreigned,vnleſſe the ſaid partie arreigned ſhall be willing without violence to confeſſe the ſame. Here note (I praie you) that our law dooth require two lawfull and ſufficient accuſers to be brought face to face, and Vaughan is but one, and the ſame moſt vnlawfull and inſufficient. For who can be more vnlawfull and inſufficient, than a condemned man, and ſuch one as knoweth to accuſe me is the meane to ſaue his owne life? Remember(I praie you)how long & how manie times Vaughans execution hath béene reſpited, and how often he hath béene coniured to accuſe (which by Gods grace he withſtood vntill the laſt houre) what time perceiuing there was no waie to liue, but to ſpeake againſt me or ſome other (his former grace being taken awaie)did redéeme his life moſt vniuſtlie and ſhamefullie, as you ſée.

Hare. Why ſhould he accuſe you more than anie other, ſéeing there was no diſpleaſure betwixt you, if the matter had not béene true?

Throckmorton. Bicauſe he muſt either ſpeake of ſome man, or ſuffer death,and then he did rather chooſe to hurt him whom he leaſt knew,& ſo loued leaſt, than anie other well knowen to him,whome he loued moſt. But to you of my iurie I ſpeake ſpeciallie, and therefore I praie you note what I ſaie. In a matter of leſſe weight than triall of life and land,a man maie by the law take exceptions to ſuch as be impaneled,to trie the controuerſies betwixt the parties: as for example. A man maie chalenge that the ſhiriffe is his enimie, and therfore hath made a parciall returne;or bicauſe one of the iurie is the ſhiriffe my aduerſaries ſeruant: and alſo in caſe my aduerſaries villen or bondman be impaneled, I may lawfullie chalenge him,bicauſe the aduerſarie part hath power ouer his villens lands and goods, and hath the vſe of his bodie for ſeruile office: much more I may of right take exception to Vaughans teſtimonie,my life and all that I haue depending thervpon,and the ſame Vaughan being more bound to the quéenes highneſſe my aduerſarie(that wo is me therefore)but ſo the law dooth here ſo terme hir maieſtie, than anie villen is to his lord: for hir highneſſe hath not onlie power ouer his bodie,lands,and goods,but ouer his life alſo.

Stanford. Yea,the exception are to be taken againſt the iurie in that caſe, but not againſt the witneſſe or accuſer,& therefore your argument ſerueth litle for you.

Throckmorton. That is not ſo, for the vſe of the iurie, and the witneſſe and the effect of their doings dooth ſerue me to my purpoſe, as the law ſhall diſcuſſe. And thus I make my compariſon: By the ciuill law the iudge dooth giue ſentence vpon the depoſitions of the witneſſe, & by your law the iudge dooth giue iudgement vpon the verdict of the iurie;ſo as the effect is both one to finiſh the matter, triall in law, as well by the depoſitions of the witneſſe, as by the iuries verdict, though they varie in forme and circumſtance: and ſo Vaughans teſtimonie being credited, may be the materiall cauſe of my condemnation,as the iurie to be induced by his depoſitions to ſpeake their verdict, and ſo finallie therevpon the iudge to giue ſentence. Therefore I may vſe the ſame exceptions againſt the iurie, or anie of them, as the principall meane that ſhall occaſion my condemnation.

Bromleie. Why doo you denie,that euerie part of Vaughans tale is vntrue?

Attournie. You may ſée he will denie all, and ſaie there was no ſuch communication betwixt them.

Throckmorton. I confeſſe ſome part of Vaughans confeſſion to be true, as the name, the places, the time, and ſome part of the matter.

Attournie. So you of the iurie may perceiue the priſoner dooth confeſſe ſome thing to be true.

Throckmorton. As touching my ſending to ſir Peter Caroe, or his ſending to me, or concerning my aduiſe to maiſter Wiat to ſtur or to repaire hither,or touching the earle of Deuonſhire parting hence, and my going with him, and alſo concerning the matter of the erle of Penbroke, I doo aduow and ſaie that Vaughan hath ſaid vntrulie.

Southwell. As for my lord of Penbroke, you néed not excuſe the matter,for he hath ſhewed himſelfe cléere in theſe matters like a noble man,and that we all know.

Hare. Why what was the talke betwixt Vaughan and you ſo long in Paules, if theſe were not ſo,and what meant your oft méetings?

Throckmorton. As for our often méetings, they were of no ſet purpoſe, but by chance, & yet no oftener than twiſe. But ſithence you would know what communication paſſed betwixt vs in Paules church, I will declare. We talked of the incommodities of the marriage of the quéene with the prince of Spaine, and how grieuous the Spaniards would be to vs here. Vaughan ſaid, that it ſhould be verie dangerous for anie man, that trulie profeſſed the goſpell to liue here, ſuch was the Spaniards crueltie, and eſpeciallie againſt chriſtian men. Wherevnto I anſwered it was the plague of God iuſtlie come vpon vs; and now almightie God dealt with vs as he did with the Iſraelites, taking from them for their vnthankefulneſſe their godlie kings, & did ſend tyrants to reigne ouer them. Euen ſo he handled vs Engliſhmen, which had a moſt godlie & vertuous prince to reigne ouer vs, my late ſouereigne lord and maiſter king Edward, vnder whome we might both ſafelie and lawfullie profeſſe Gods word, which with our lewd doings,demeanor,and liuing, we handled ſo irreuerentlie,that to whip vs for our faults he would ſend vs ſtrangers, yea ſuch verie tyrants to exerciſe great tyrannie ouer vs, and did take awaie the vertuous and faithfull king from amongſt vs: for euerie man of euerie eſtate did colour his naughtie affections with a pretenſe of religion, and made the goſpell a ſtalking horſſe to bring their euill deſires to effect. This was the ſumme of our talke in Paules ſomewhat more dilated.

Stanford. That it may appéere yet more euidentlie how Throckmorton was a principall dooer and counſellor in this matter, you ſhall heare his owne confeſſion of his owne hand writing. ¶ The clearke began to read, Throckmorton deſired maiſter Stanford to read it,and the iurie well to marke it. Then maiſter Stanford did read the priſoners owne confeſſion to this effect: that Throckmorton had conference with Wiat, Caroe, Croftes, Rogers, and Warner, as well of the quéenes marriage with the prince of Spaine,as alſo of religion,and did particularlie conferre with euerie the forenamed, of the matters aforeſaid. Moreouer, with ſir Thomas Wiat the priſoner ner talked of the brute that the Weſterne men ſhuld much miſlike the comming of the Spaniards into this realme, being reported alſo that they intended to interrupt their arriuall here. And alſo that it was ſaid, that they were in conſultation about the ſame at Exceſter. Wiat alſo did ſaie, that ſir Peter Caroe could not bring the ſame matter to good effect, nor that there was any man ſo meet to bring it to good effect, as the erle of Deuonſhire, & ſpeciallie in the weſt parts, inſomuch as they drew not all by one line.

Then Throckmorton aſked how the Kentiſhmen were affected to the Spaniards? Wiat ſaid; The people like them euill inough, and that appeered now at the comming of the countie of Egmount, for they were readie to ſtur againſt him and his traine, ſuppoſing it had bin the prince. But ſaid Wiat, ſir Robert Southwell, maiſter Baker, and maiſter Moile, and their affinitie, which be in good credit in ſome places of the ſhire, will for other malicious reſpects hinder the libertie of their countrie. Then Throckmorton ſhould ſaie; Though I know there hath beene an vnkindneſſe betwixt maiſter Southwell and you for a monie matter, wherein I trauelled to make you freends, I doubt not, but in ſo honeſt a matter as this is, he will for the ſafegard of his countrie ioine with you, and ſo you may be ſure of the lord Aburgauennie & his force. Then Wiat ſaid, It is for another matter than for monie that we diſagree, wherein he hath handled me and others verie doublie & vnneighborlie; howbeit, he can doo no other, neither to me, nor to anie other man, & therefore I forgiue him. Item, with ſir Peter Caroe, Throckmorton had conference touching the impeachment of the landing of the ſaid prince, and touching prouiſion of armour and munition as inſueth, that is to ſaie, that ſir Peter Caroe told Throckmorton that he truſted his countriemen would be true Engliſhmen, and would not agree to let the Spaniards to gouerne them. Item, the ſaid ſir Peter Caroe ſaid, the matter importing the French king, as it did, he thoght the French king would worke to hinder the Spaniards comming hither, with whome the ſaid ſir Peter did thinke good to practiſe for armour, munition, and monie.

Then Throckmorton did aduiſe him to beware that he brought anie Frenchmen into the realme forceablie, inaſmuch as he could as euill abide the Frenchmen after that ſort as the Spaniards. And alſo Throckmorton thought the French king vnable to giue aid to vs, by meanes of the great conſumption in their owne warres. Maiſter Caroe ſaid; As touching the bringing in of the Frenchmen, he meant it not, for he loued neither partie, but to ſerue his owne countrie, and to helpe his countrie from bondage: declaring further to Throckmorton, that he had a ſmall barke of his owne to worke his practiſe by, & ſo he ſaid, that ſhortlie he intended to depart to his owne countrie, to vnderſtand the deuotion of his countrimen. Item Throckmorton did ſaie, he would for his part hinder the cōming in of the Spaniards as much as he could by perſuaſion. Item to ſir Edward Warner, he had and did beemone his owne eſtate, and the tyrannie of the time extended vpon diuerſe honeſt perſons for religion, and wiſhed it were lawfull for all of ech religion to liue ſafelie acording to their conſcience; for the law (Ex officio) will be intollerable, & the clergies diſcipline now maie rather be reſembled to the Turks tyrannie, than to the teaching of chriſtian religion. ¶ This was the ſumme of the matter which was read in the foreſaid confeſſion, as maters moſt greeuous againſt the priſoner.] Then Throckmorton ſaid; Sithence maiſter ſergeant you haue read and gathered the place (as you thinke) that maketh moſt againſt me, I praie you take the pains, and read further, that hereafter whatſoeuer become of me, my words be not peruerted and abuſed to the hurt of ſome others, and eſpeciallie againſt the great perſonages, of whom I haue beene ſundrie times (as appeareth by my anſwers) examined, for I perceiue the net was not caſt onelie for little fiſhes, but for the great ones, Iuxta adagium.

Stanford.

It ſhall be but loſſe of time, and we haue other things to charge you withall, and this that you deſire dooth make nothing for you.

Dier.

And for the better confirmation of all the treaſons obiected againſt the priſoner, and therein to prooue him guiltie, you of the iurie ſhall heare the duke of Suffolks depoſitions againſt him, who was a principall, and hath ſuffered accordinglie. ¶ Then the ſaid ſergeant read the dukes confeſſion touching the priſoner, amounting to this effect, that the lord Thomas Greie did informe the ſaid duke, that ſir Nicholas Throckmorton was priuie to the whole deuiſes againſt the Spaniards, & was one that ſhould go into the weſt countrie with the earle of Deuonſhire.]

Throckmorton.

But what dooth the principall authour of this matter ſaie againſt me, I meane the lord Thomas Greie who is yet liuing? Why be not his depoſitions broght againſt me, for ſo it ought to be, if he can ſaie anie thing? Will you know the truth? Neither the lord Thomas Greie hath ſaid, can ſaie, or will ſaie anie thing againſt me, notwithſtanding the duke his brothers confeſſion and accuſation, who hath affirmed manie other things beſides the truth. I ſpeake not without certeine knowledge: for the lord Thomas Greie being my priſon-felow for a ſmall time, informed me, that the duke his brother had miſreported him in manie things, amongſt others in matters touching me, which he had declared to you maiſter Southwell, and other the examinors not long ago. I am ſure if the lord Thomas could, or would haue ſaid anie thing, it ſhould haue beene here now. And as to the dukes confeſſion, it is not materiall: for he dooth referre the matter to the lord Thomas report, who hath made my purgation.

The atturnie.

And it pleaſe you my lords, and you my maiſters of the iurie, beſides theſe matters touching Wiats rebellion, ſir Peter Caroes treaſons and confederating with the duke of Suffolke, and beſides the priſoners conſpiracie with the earle of Deuonſhire, with Crofts, Rogers, Warner, and ſundrie others in ſundrie places, it ſhall manifeſtlie appeare vnto you, that Throckmorton did conſpire the queenes maieſties death, with William Thomas, ſir Nicholas Arnold, and other traitors intending the ſame, which is the greateſt matter of all others, and moſt to be abhorred. And for proofe hereof, you ſhall heare what Arnold ſaith. ¶ Then was ſir Nicholas Arnolds confeſſion read, ſaieng that Throckmorton ſhewed to him, riding betwixt Hinam and Croſſe laund in Glouceſterſhire, that Iohn Fitz Williams was verie much diſpleaſed with William Thomas.

Attourneie.

William Thomas deuiſed, that Iohn Fitzwilliams ſhould kill the queene, and Throckmorton knew of it, as appeareth by Arnolds confeſſion.

Throckmorton.

Firſt I denie that I ſaid anie ſuch thing to maiſter Arnold, and though he be an honeſt man, he may either forget himſelfe, or deuiſe meanes how to vnburthen himſelfe of ſo weightie a matter as this is; for he is charged with the mater as principall. Which I did perceiue when he charged me with his tale, and therefore I doo blame him the leſſe, that he ſeeketh how to diſcharge himſelfe, vſing me as a witneſſe, if he could ſo transferre the deuiſe to William Thomas. But trulie I neuer ſpake anie ſuch words vnto him. And for my better declaration, I did ſee Iohn Fitzwilliams here euen now, who can teſtifie, that he neuer ſhewed me of any diſpleſure betwixt them, and as I know nothing of the diſpleaſure betwixt them, ſo I know nothing of the cauſe: I pray you my lords let him be called to depoſe in this matter what he can. Then Iohn Fitzwilliams drew to the barre, and preſented himſelfe to depoſe his knowledge in the matter in open court.

The atturnie. I praie you my lords ſuffer him not to be ſworne, neither to ſpeake, we haue nothing to doo with him.

Throckmorton. Why ſhould he not be ſuffered to tell truth? And why be ye not ſo well contented to heare truth for me as vntruth againſt me?

Hare. Who called you hither Fitzwilliams, or commanded you to ſpeake? You are a verie buſie officer.

Throckmorton. I called him, and doo humblie deſire that he maie ſpeake, and be heard as well as Vaughan; or elſe I am not indifferentlie vſed, eſpeciallie ſéeing maiſter attourneie dooth ſo preſſe this matter againſt me.

Southwell. Go your waies Fitzwilliams, the court hath nothing to doo with you: peraduenture you would not be ſo readie in a good cauſe. Then Iohn Fitzwilliams departed the court, and was not ſuffered to ſpeake.

Throckmorton. Sithence this gentlemans declaration may not be admitted, I truſt you of the iurie can perceiue, it was not for anie thing he had to ſaie againſt me, but contrariwiſe that it was feared he would ſpeake for me. And now to maiſter Arnolds depoſitions againſt me, I ſaie I did not tell him anie ſuch words, ſo as if it were materiall, there is but his yea and my naie. But bicauſe the words be not ſore ſtrained againſt me, I praie you maiſter atturneie why might not I haue told maiſter Arnold, that Iohn Fitzwilliams was angrie with William Thomas, and yet know no cauſe of the anger? It might be vnderſtand, to diſagrée oftentimes. Who dooth confeſſe that I know anie thing of William Thomas deuiſe touching the quéenes death? I will anſwer, No man. For maiſter Arnold dooth mention no word of that matter, but of the diſpleaſures betwixt them. And to ſpeake that, dooth neither proue treaſon, nor knowledge of treaſon. Is here all the euidence againſt me that you haue to bring me within the compaſſe of the indictment?

Stanford. We thinke the matters confeſſed by others againſt you, togither with your owne confeſſion, will weie ſhrewdlie. But how ſaie you to the riſing in Kent, and to Wiats attempt againſt the quéens roiall perſon at hir palace?

Bromleie. Why doo you not read Wiats accuſation to him, which dooth make him partener to his treaſons?

Southwell. Wiat hath gréeuouſlie accuſed you, and in manie things that others haue confirmed.

Throckmorton. Whatſoeuer Wiat hath ſaid of me in hope of his life, he vnſaid it at his death. For ſince I came into this hall, I heard one ſaie (but I know him not) that Wiat vpon the ſcaffold did not onelie purge my ladie Elizabeth hir grace, and the erle of Deuonſhire, but alſo all the gentlemen in the tower, ſaieng they were all ignorant of the ſturre and commotion. In which number I take my ſelfe.

Hare. Notwithſtanding he ſaid, all that he had written and confeſſed to the councell, was true.

Throckmorton. Naie ſir, by your patience, maiſter Wiat ſaid not ſo, that was maiſter doctors addition.

Southwell. It appeareth you haue had good intelligence.

Throckmorton. Almightie God prouided that reuelation for me this daie ſince I came hither: for I haue bin in cloſe priſon theſe eight and fiftie daies, where I heard nothing but what the birds told me, which did flie ouer my head. And now to you of my iurie I ſpeake ſpeciallie, whome I deſire to marke attentiuelie what ſhall be ſaid. I haue béene indicted, as it appeareth, and now am arreigned of compaſſing the quéenes maieſties death, of leuieng war againſt the quéene, of taking the tower of London, of depoſing and depriuing the quéene of hir roiall eſtate, and finallie to deſtroie hir, and of adherence to the quéenes enimies. Of all which treaſons, to proue me guiltie, the quéens learned councell hath giuen in euidence theſe points materiall; that is to ſaie: for the compaſſing or imagining the quéenes death, and the deſtruction of hir roiall perſon, ſir Nicholas Arnolds depoſitions, which is, that I ſhould ſaie to the ſaid ſir Nicholas in Gloceſterſhire, that maiſter Iohn Fitzwilliams was angrie with William Thomas.

Wherevnto I haue anſwered, as you haue heard, both denieng the matter: and for the proofe on my ſide, doo take exceptions, becauſe there is no witneſſe but one. And neuertheleſſe, though it were granted, the depoſitions proue nothing concerning the quéenes death. For leuieng of warre againſt the quéene, there is alleged my conference with ſir Thomas Wiat, ſir Iames Crofts, ſir Edward Rogers, ſir Edward Warner. Againſt the mariage with Spaine, and the comming of the Spaniards hither, which talke I doo not denie in ſort as I ſpake it, and ment it: and notwithſtanding the malicious gathering this daie of my conference, proueth yet no leuieng of warre. There is alſo alleged for proofe of the ſame article, ſir Iames Crofts confeſſion, which (as you remember) implieth no ſuch thing, but generall talke againſt the mariage with Spaine. And of my departing weſtward with the earle of Deuon, which the ſaid Iames dooth not auow, & therefore I praie you conſider it as not ſpoken. There is alſo for proofe of the ſaid article, the duke of Suffolks confeſſion, with whome I neuer had conference; and therefore he auouched the tale of his brothers mouth, who hath made my purgation in thoſe matters; and yet if the matter were proued, they be not greatlie materiall in law. There is alſo alleged for the further proofe of the ſame article, and for depoſing and depriuing the quéene of hir roiall eſtate, and for my adhering to the quéenes enimies, Cutbert Vaughans confeſſion, whoſe teſtimonie I haue ſufficientlie diſproued by ſundrie authorities and circumſtances, and principallie by your owne law, which dooth require two lawfull and ſufficient witneſſes to be brought face to face. Alſo for the taking of the tower of London, there is alleged Winters depoſitions, which vttereth my miſliking, when he vttered vnto me ſir Thomas Wiats reſolution and deuiſe for attempting of the ſaid péece. And laſt of all, to inforce theſe matters, mine owne confeſſion is ingréeued againſt me, wherein there dooth appeare neither treaſon, neither concelement of treaſon, neither whiſpering of treaſon, nor procurement of treaſon.

And forſomuch as I am come hither to be tried by the law, though my innocencie of all theſe points materiall obiected, be apparant to acquit me, whereto I doo principallie cleaue: yet I will for your better credit and ſatiſfactions, ſhew you euidentlie, that if you would beléeue all the depoſitions laid againſt me, which I truſt you will not doo, I ought not to be attainted of the treaſon compriſed within my indictment, conſidering the ſtatute of repeale the laſt parlement, of all treaſons, other than ſuch as be declared in the fiue and twentith yeare of king Edward the third, both which ſtatutes, I pray you my lords, maie be read here to the inqueſt.

Bromleie. No ſir, there ſhall be no bookes brought at your deſire, we doo all know the law ſufficientlie without booke.

Throckmorton. Doo you bring me hither to trie me by the law, & will not ſhew me the law? What is your knowlege of the law to theſe mens ſatiſfactions, which haue my triall in hand? I praie you my lords, and my lords all, let the ſtatutes be read, as well for the queene, as for me.

Stanford. My lord chiefe iuſtice can ſhew the law, and will, if the iurie doo doubt of anie point.

Throckmorton. You know it were indifferent that I ſhould know and heare the law whereby I am adiudged, and forasmuch as the ſtatute is in Engliſh, men of meaner learning than the iuſtices can vnderſtand it, or elſe how ſhould we know when we offend?

Hare. You know not what belongeth to your caſe, and therefore we muſt teach you: it apperteineth not to vs to prouide bookes for you, neither ſit we here to be taught of you, you ſhould haue taken better heed to the law before you had come hither.

Throckmorton. Becauſe I am ignorant, I would learne, and therefore I haue more need to ſee the law, and partlie as well for the inſtructions of the iurie, as for my own ſatiſfaction, which mee thinke were for the honor of this preſence. And now if it pleaſe you my lord chiefe iuſtice, I doo direct my ſpeech ſpeciallie to you. What time it pleaſed the queenes maieſtie, to call you to this honorable office, I did learne of a great perſonage of hir highneſſe priuie councell, that amongſt other good inſtructions, hir maieſtie charged and inioined you to miniſter the law and iuſtice indifferentlie without reſpect of perſons. And notwithſtanding the old error amongſt you, which did not admit anie witneſſe to ſpeake, or anie other matter to be heard in the fauor of the aduerſarie, hir maieſtie being partie; hir highneſſe pleaſure was, that whatſoeuer could be brought in the fauor of the ſubiect, ſhould be admitted to be heard. And moreouer, that you ſpeciallie, & likewiſe all other iuſtices, ſhould not perſuade themſelues to ſit in iudgement otherwiſe for hir highneſſe, than for hir ſubiect. Therefore this maner of indifferent proceeding being principallie inioined by Gods commandement, which I had thought partlie to haue remembred you & others here in commiſſion, in the beginning, if I might haue had leaue; and the ſame alſo being commanded you by the queens owne mouth: me thinke you ought of right to ſuffer me to haue the ſtatutes read openlie, and alſo to reiect nothing that could be ſpoken in my defenſe; and in thus dooing, you ſhall ſhew your ſelues worthie miniſters, and fit for ſo worthie a miſtreſſe.

Bromleie. You miſtake the matter, the queene ſpake thoſe words to maiſter Morgan chiefe iuſtice of the common plees: but you haue no cauſe to complaine, for you haue beene ſuffered to talke at your pleaſure.

Hare. What would you doo with the ſtatute booke? The iurie dooth not require it, they haue heard the euidence, and they muſt vpon their conſcience trie whether you be guiltie or no, ſo as the booke needeth not; if they will not credit the euidence ſo apparant, then they know not what they haue to doo.

Cholmleie. You ought not to haue anie bookes read here at your appointment, for where dooth ariſe anie doubt in the law, the iudges ſit here to informe the court, and now you doo but ſpend time.

The atturnie. I pray you my lord chiefe iuſtice repeat the euidence for the queene, and giue the iurie their charge, for the priſoner will keepe you here all daie.

Bromleie. How ſaie you? Haue you anie more to ſaie for your ſelfe?

Throckmorton. You ſeeme to giue and offer me the law, but in verie deed I haue onelie the forme and image of the law; neuertheleſſe, ſith I cannot be ſuffered to haue the ſtatutes red openlie in the booke, I will by your patience geſſe at them as I maie, and I praie you to helpe me if I miſtake, for it is long ſince I did ſee them. The ſtatute of repeale made the laſt parlement, hath theſe words: Be it enacted by the queene, that from henceforth none act, deed, or offenſe, being by act of parlement or ſtatute made treaſon, petit treaſon, or miſpriſion of treaſon, by words, writing, printing, ciphering, deeds, or otherwiſe whatſoeuer, ſhall be taken, had, deemed, or adiudged treaſon, petit treaſon: but onelie ſuch as be declared or expreſſed to be treaſon, in or by an act of parlement made in the fiue and twentith yeare of Edward the third, touching and concerning treaſons, and the declaration of treaſons, and none other. Here may you ſee, this ſtatute dooth referre all the offenſes aforeſaid, to the ſtatute of the fiue and twentith yeare of Edward the third, which ſtatute hath theſe words touching and concerning the treaſons that I am indicted and arreigned of, that is to ſaie: Whoſoeuer dooth compaſſe or imagine the death of the king, or leuie warre againſt the king in his realme, or being adherent to the kings enimies within this realme, or elſewhere, and be thereof probablie attainted by open deed by people of their condition; ſhall be adiudged a traitor. Now I praie you of my iurie which haue my life in triall, note well what things at this daie be treaſons, and how theſe treaſons muſt be tried and decerned; that is to ſay, by open deed, which the lawes dooth at ſome time terme (Ouert act.) And now I aske notwithſtanding my indictment, which is but matter alleged, where dooth appeare the open deed of anie compaſſing or imagining the queenes death? Or where dooth appeare anie open deed of being adherent to the queens enimies, giuing to them aid and comfort? Or where dooth appeare anie open deed of taking the tower of London?

Bromleie. Why doo not you of the queenes learned councell anſwer him? Me thinke, Throckmorton, you need not haue the ſtatutes, for you haue them meetlie perfectlie.

Stanford. You are deceiued to conclude all treaſons in the ſtatute of the fiue and twentith yeare of Edward the third; for that ſtatute is but a declaration of certeine treaſons, which were treaſons before at the common law. Euen ſo there dooth remaine diuerſe other treaſons at this daie at the common law, which be expreſſed by that ſtatute, as the iudges can declare. Neuertheleſſe, there is matter ſufficient alleged and proued againſt you, to bring you within the compaſſe of the ſame ſtatute.

Throckmorton. I praie you expreſſe thoſe matters that bring me within the compaſſe of the ſtatute of Edward the third. For the words be theſe: And be thereof attainted by open deed: By people of like condition.

Bromleie. Throckmorton you deceiue your ſelfe, and miſtake theſe words; By people of their condition. For thereby the law dooth vnderſtand the diſcouering of your treaſons. As for example: Wiat and the other rebels, attainted for their great treaſons, alreadie declare you to be his and their adherent, in as much as diuerſe & ſundrie times you had conference with him and them about the treaſon, ſo as Wiat is now one of your condition, who (as all the world knoweth) hath committed an open traitorous fact.

Throckmorton. By your leaue my lord, this is a verie ſtrange and ſingular vnderſtanding. For I ſuppoſe the meaning of the law-makers did vnderſtand theſe words: By people of their condition; of the ſtate and condition of thoſe perſons which ſhould be on the inqueſt to trie the partie arreigned, guiltie or not guiltie, and nothing to the bewraieng of the offenſe by another mans act, as you ſaie. For what haue I to doo with Wiats acts, that was not nigh him by one hundred miles?

The atturnie. Will you take vpon you to ſkill better of the law than the iudges? I doubt not but you of the iurie will credit as it becommeth you.

Cholmleie. Concerning the true vnderſtanding of theſe words: By people of their condition, my lord chiefe iuſtice here hath declared the truth, for Wiat was one of your condition, that is to ſaie, of your conſpiracie.

Hare. You doo not denie, Throckmorton, but that there hath béene conference and ſending betwéene Wiat and you: and he and Winter dooth confeſſe the ſame, with others, ſo as it is plaine; Wiat may be called one of your condition.

Throckmorton. Well, ſéeing you my iudges rule the vnderſtanding of theſe words in the ſtatute, by people of your condition, thus ſtrangelie againſt me: I will not ſtand longer vpon them. But where dooth appeare in me an open déed whereunto the treaſon is ſpeciallie referred?

Bromleie. If thrée or foure doo talke, deuiſe, and conſpire togither of a traitorous act to be doone, and afterwards one of them dooth commit treaſon, as Wiat did, then the law dooth repute them, and euerie of them as their acts, ſo as Wiats acts doo implie and argue of your open déed: and ſo the law dooth terme it and take it.

Throckmorton. Theſe be maruellous expoſitions and wonderfull implications, that another mans act whereof I was not priuie, ſhould be accounted mine: for Wiat did purge me that I knew nothing of his ſtirre.

Hare. Yea ſir, but you were a principall procurer and contriuer of Wiats rebellion, though you were not with him when he made the ſtirre. And as my lord here hath ſaid, the law alwaies dooth adiudge him a traitor, which was priuie, and dooth procure treaſon, or anie other man to commit treaſon, or a traitorous act, as you did Wiat and others: for ſo the Ouert act of thoſe which did it by your procurement, ſhall in this caſe be accounted your open déed. We haue a common caſe in the law, if one by procurement ſhould diſſeize you of your land, the law holdeth vs both wrong dooers, & giueth remedie as well againſt the one as the other.

Throckmorton. For Gods ſake applie not ſuch conſtructions againſt me, and though my preſent eſtate dooth not mooue you, yet it were well you ſhould conſider your office, and thinke what meaſure you giue to others, you your ſelues I ſaie ſhall aſſuredlie receiue the ſame againe. The ſtate of mortall life is ſuch, that men know full little what hangeth ouer them. I put on within theſe xij. moneths ſuch a mind, that I moſt wofull wight was as vnlike to ſtand here, as ſome of you that ſit there. As to your caſe laſt recited, wherby you would conclude; I haue remembred and learned of you maiſter Hare, and you maiſter Stanford in the parlement houſe, where you did ſit to make lawes, to expound and explane the ambiguities and doubts of law ſincerelie, and that without affections. There I ſaie I learned of you, and others my maiſters of the law, this difference betwixt ſuch caſes as you remembred one euen now, and the ſtatute whereby I am to be tried. There is a maxime or principle in the law, which ought not to be violated, that no penall ſtatute maie, ought, or ſhould be conſtrued, expounded, extended, or wreſted, otherwiſe than the ſimple words and nude letter of the ſame ſtatute dooth warrant and ſignifie. And amongeſt diuerſe good and notable reaſons by you there in the parlement houſe debated (maiſter ſergeant Stanford) I noted this one, whie the ſaid maxime ought to be inuiolable. You ſaid, conſidering the priuate affections manie times both of princes and miniſters within this realme, for that they were men, and would and could erre, it ſhould be no ſecuritie, but verie dangerous to the ſubiect, to refer the conſtruction and extending of penall ſtatutes to anie iudges equitie (as you termed it) which might either by feare of the higher powers be ſeduced, or by ignorance and follie abuſed: and that is an anſwer by procurement.

Bromleie. Notwithſtanding the principall (as you alledge it) and the preciſeneſſe of your ſticking to the bare words of the ſtatute, it dooth appéere and remaine of record in our learning, that diuerſe caſes haue béene adiudged treaſon, without the expreſſe words of the ſtatute, as the quéenes learned councell there can declare.

The attornie. It dooth appéere the priſoner did not onelie intiſe or procure Wiat, Caro, Rogers, and others, to commit their traitorous act, and there dooth his open facts appéere, which Vaughans confeſſion dooth witneſſe, but alſo he did mind ſhortlie after to aſſociat himſelfe with thoſe traitors; for he minded to haue departed with the earle of Deuonſhire weſtward.

Throckmorton. My innocencie concerning theſe matters I truſt ſufficientlie appéereth by my former anſwers, notwithſtanding the condemned mans vniuſt accuſation. But becauſe the true vnderſtanding of the ſtatute is in queſtion, I ſaie procurement, and ſpeciallie by words onelie, is without the compaſſe of it, and that I doo learne and prooue by the principle which I learned of maiſter Stanford.

Stanford. Maiſter Throckmorton, You and I maie not agrée this daie in the vnderſtanding of the law, for I am for the quéene, and you are for your ſelfe; the iudges muſt determine the matter.

Bromleie. He that dooth procure another man to commit a felonie or a murther, I am ſure you know well enough the law dooth adiudge the procurer there a felon or a murtherer; and in caſe of treaſon it hath béene alwaies ſo taken and reputed.

Throckmorton. I doo and muſt cleaue to my innocencie, for I procured no man to commit treſon: but yet for my learning I deſire to heare ſome caſe ſo ruled when the law was as it is now. I doo confeſſe it, that at ſuch time there were ſtatutes prouided for the procurer, counſellor, aider, abetter, and ſuch like, as there were in king Henrie the eights time; you might lawfullie make this cruell conſtruction, and bring the procurer within the compaſſe of the law. But theſe ſtatutes being repealed, you ought not now ſo to doo: and as to the principall procurer in felonie and murther, it is not like as in treaſon; for the principall and acceſſaries in felonie and murther be triable and puniſhable by the common law: and ſo in thoſe caſes the iudges maie vſe their equitie, extending the determination of the fault as they thinke good: but in treſon it is otherwiſe, the ſame being limited by ſtatute, which I ſaie and aduow is reſtreined from anie iudges conſtruction, by the maxime that I recited.

Happie for Throckmorton that thoſe ſtatutes ſtood then repealed.

Stanford. Your lordſhips doo know a caſe in Richard the thirds time, where the procurer, to counterfeit falſe monie, was iudged a traitor, and the law was as it is now.

Hare. Maiſter ſergeant dooth remember you Throckmorton of an experience before our time, that the law hath béene ſo taken: and yet the procurer was not expreſſed in the ſtatute, but the law hath béene alwaies ſo taken.

Throckmorton. I neuer ſtudied the law, whereof I doo much repent me: yet I remember, whileſt penall ſtatutes were talked of in the parlement houſe, you the learned men of the houſe remembred ſome caſes contrarie to this laſt ſpoken of. And if I miſreport them, I praie you helpe me. In the like caſe you ſpeake of concerning the procurer to counterfeit falſe monie; at one time the procurer was iudged a felon, and at another time neither felon nor traitor: ſo as ſome of your predeceſſors adiudged the procurer no traitor in the ſame caſe, but leaned to their principall, though ſome other extend their conſtructions too large. And here is two caſes with me, for one againſt me.

Bromleie. Becauſe you replie vpon the principall, I will remember where one taking the great ſeale of England from one writing, and putting it to another, was adiudged a traitor in Henrie the fourths time, and yet his act was not within the expreſſe words of the ſtatute of Edward the third. There be diuerſe other ſuch like caſes that maie be alledged and néed were.

Throckmorton. I praie you my lord chiefe iuſtice call to your good remembrance, that in the ſelfe ſame caſe of the ſeale, iuſtice Spilman, a graue & well learned man, ſince that time, would not condemne the offendor, but did reproue that former iudgement by you laſt remembred, as erronious.

Stanford. If I had thought you had béene ſo well furniſhed in booke caſes, I would haue béene better prouided for you.

Throckmorton. I haue nothing but I learned of you ſpeciallie maiſter ſergeant, and of others my maiſters of the law in the parlement houſe, & therefore I maie ſaie with the prophet (Salutem ex inimicis noſtris.)

Southwell. You haue a verie good memorie.

The attornie. If the priſoner maie auoid his treaſons after this maner, the quéenes ſuretie ſhall be in great ieopardie. For Iacke Cade the blacke ſmith, and diuerſe other traitors, ſometime alledging the law for them, ſometime they meant no harme to the king, but againſt his councell, as Wiat, the duke of Suffolke, and theſe did againſt the Spaniards, when there was no Spaniards within the realme. The duke and his brethren did miſtake the law, as you doo: yet at length did confeſſe their ignorance, and ſubmitted themſelues: and ſo were you beſt to doo.

Throckmorton. As to Cade and the blacke ſmith, I am not ſo well acquainted with their treaſons as you be: but I haue read in the chronicle, they were in the field with a force againſt the prince, whereby a manifeſt act did appéere. As to the duke of Suffolkes doings, they apperteine not to me. And though you would compare my ſpéech and talke againſt the Spaniards to the dukes acts, who aſſembled a force in armes, it is euident they differ much. I am ſorie to ingréeue anie other mans doings, but it ſerueth me for a péece of my defenſe, and therefore I wiſh that no man ſhould gather euill of it; God forbid that words and acts be thus confounded.

The attornie. Sir William Stanleie vſed this ſhift that the priſoner vſeth now; he ſaid he did not leuie warre againſt king Henrie the ſeauenth, but ſaid to the duke of Buckingham, that in a good quarrell he would aid him with fiue hundred men; and neuertheleſſe Stanleie was for thoſe words atteinted, who (as all the world knoweth) had before that time ſerued the king verie faithfullie and trulie.

Throckmorton. I praie you maiſter attorneie doo not conclude againſt me by blind contraries. Whether you alledge Stanlies caſe trulie or no, I know not. But admit it be as you ſaie, what doth this prooue againſt me? I promiſed no aid to maiſter Wiat nor to anie other. The duke of Buckingham leuied warre againſt the king, with whome Stanleie was confederat ſo to doo as you ſaie.

The attornie. I praie you my lords that be the quéens commiſſioners, ſuffer not the priſoner to vſe the quéenes learned councell thus, I was neuer interrupted thus in my life, nor I neuer knew anie thus ſuffered to talke, as this priſoner is ſuffered; ſome of vs will come no more at the barre & we be thus handled.

Bromleie. Throckmorton you muſt ſuffer the quéenes learned councell to ſpeake, or elſe we muſt take order with you, you haue had leaue to talke at your pleaſure.

Hare. It is prooued that you did talke with Wiat againſt the comming of the Spaniards, and deuiſed to interrupt their arriuall: and you promiſed to doo what you could againſt them: wherevpon Wiat being incoraged by you, did leuie a force, and attempted warre againſt the quéenes roiall perſon.

Throckmorton. It was no treaſon nor no procurement of treaſon, to talke againſt the comming hither of the Spaniards, neither was it treaſon for me to ſaie I would hinder their comming hither as much as I could (vnderſtanding me rightlie as I meane it) yea though you would extend it to the worſt, it was but words, it was not treaſon at this daie as the law ſtandeth. And as for Wiats doing, they touch me nothing; for at his death when, it was no time to report vntruelie, he purged me.

Bromleie. By ſundrie caſes remembred here by the quéenes learned councell (as you haue heard) that procurement which did appeare none otherwiſe but by words and thoſe you would make nothing, hath béene of long time, and by ſundrie well learned men in the lawes adiudged treaſon. And therefore, your procurement being ſo euident as it is, we maie lawfullie ſaie it was treaſon, bicauſe Wiat performed a traitorous act.

Throckmorton. As to the ſaid alleaged forepreſſedents againſt me, I haue recited as manie for me, and I would you my lord chiefe iuſtice ſhould incline your iudgments rather after the example of your honourable predeceſſors, iuſtice Markam, and others, which did eſchue corrupt iudgements, iudging directlie and ſincerelie, after the law & the principles in the ſame, than after ſuch men as ſwarning from the truth, the maxime, and the law, did iudge corruptlie, maliciouſlie, and affectionatlie.

Bromleie. Iuſtice Markam had reaſon to warrant his doings: for it did appeare, a merchant of London was arreigned and ſlanderouſlie accuſed of treaſon for compaſſing and imagining the kings death, he did ſaie he would make his ſonne heire of the crowne, and the merchant meant it of a houſe in Cheapſide at the ſigne of the crowne, but your caſe is not ſo.

Throckmorton. My caſe dooth differ I grant, but ſpeciallie bicauſe I haue not ſuch a iudge: yet there is an other cauſe to reſtreine theſe your ſtrange and extraordinarie conſtructions: that is to ſaie, a prouiſo in the latter end of the ſtatute of Edward the third, hauing theſe words: Prouided alwaies, if anie other caſe of ſuppoſed treaſon ſhall chance hereafter to come in queſtion or triall before anie iuſtice, other than is in the ſaid ſtatute expreſſed, that then the iuſtice ſhall forbeare to adiudge the ſaid caſe, vntill it be ſhewed to the parlement to trie whether it ſhould be treaſon or felonie. Here you are reſtreined by expreſſe words to adiudge anie caſe, that is not manifeſtlie mentioned before, and vntill it be ſhewed to the parlement.

Pirtman. That prouiſo is vnderſtood of caſes that maie come in triall which hath béene in vre, but the law hath alwaies taken the procurer to be a principall offendor.

Sanders. The law alwaies in caſes of treaſon dooth account all principals and no acceſſaries as in other offenſes, and therefore a man offending in treaſon, either by couert act or procurement, wherevpon an open déed hath inſued, as in this caſe, is adiudged by the law a principall traitor.

Throckmorton. You adiudge (me thinke) procurement verie hardlie, beſides the principall, and beſides the good prouiſo, and beſides the good example of your beſt and moſt godlie learned predeceſſors, the iudges of the realme, as I haue partlie declared, and notwithſtanding this grieuous racking & extending of this word procurement, I am not in the danger of it, for it dooth appeare by no depoſition that I procured neither one or other to attempt anie act.

Stanford. The iurie haue to trie whether it be ſo or no, let it weie as it will.

Hare. I know no meane ſo apparant to trie procurement as by words, & that meane is probable inough againſt you, as well by your owne confeſſion, as by other mens depoſitions.

Throckmorton. To talke of the quéenes marriage with the prince of Spaine, and alſo the comming hither of the Spaniards, is not to procure treſon to be doone: for then the whole parlement houſe, I meane the common houſe did procure treaſon. But ſith you will make no difference betwixt words and acts, I praie you remember a ſtatute made in my late ſouereigne lord and maſters time, king Edward the ſixt, which apparantlie expreſſed the difference. Theſe be the words: Whoſoeuer dooth compaſſe or imagine to depoſe the king of his roiall eſtate by open preaching, expreſſe words or ſaiengs, ſhall for the firſt offenſe looſe and forfet to the king all his and their goods and cattels, and alſo ſhall ſuffer impriſonment of their bodies at the kings will and pleaſure. Whoſoeuer, &c: for the ſecond offenſe ſhall looſe & forfet to the king the whole iſſues and profits of all his or their lands, tenements and other hereditaments, benefices, prebends, and other ſpirituall promotions. Whoſoeuer, &c: for the third offenſe, ſhall for tearme of life or liues of ſuch offendor or offendors, &c: and ſhall alſo forfet to the kings maieſtie, all his or their goods and cattels, and ſuffer during his or their liues perpetuall impriſonment of his or their bodies. But whoſoeuer, &c: by writing, ciphering, or act, &c: ſhall for the firſt offenſe be adiudged a traitor, and ſuffer the paines of death. Here you maie perceiue how the whole realme and all your iudgements hath before this vnderſtood words and acts diuerſelie and apparantlie. And therfore the iudgements of the parlement did aſſigne diuerſitie of puniſhments, bicauſe they would not confound the true vnderſtanding of words & déeds, appointing for compaſſing and imagining by word, impriſonment: and for compaſſing and imagining by open déed, paines of death.

Bromleie. It is agréed by the whole bench, that the procurer and the adherent be déemed alwaies traitors, when as a traitorous act was committed by anie one of the ſame conſpiracie: and there is apparant proofe of your adhering to Wiat, both by your owne confeſſion and other waies.

Throckmorton. Adhering and procuring be not all one, for the ſtatute of Edward the third dooth ſpeake of adhering, but not of procuring; & yet adhering ought not to be further extended, than to the quéenes enimies within hir realme, for ſo the ſtatute dooth limit the vnderſtanding. And Wiat was not the quéenes enimie, for he was not ſo reputed when I talked with him laſt, and our ſpéech implied no enimie, neither tended to anie treaſon, or procuring of treaſon: and therefore I praie you of the iurie note, though I argue the law, I alleage mine innocencie, as the beſt part of my defenſe.

Hare. Your adhering to the quéenes enimies within the realme, is euidentlie prooued: for Wiat was the quéenes enimie within the realme, as the whole realme knoweth it, and he hath confeſſed it both at his arreignement and at his death.

Throckmorton. By your leaue, neither Wiat at his arreignement nor at his death, did confeſſe that he was the quéenes enimie when I talked laſt with him; neither was he reputed nor taken in fouretéene daies after, vntill he aſſembled a force in armes, what time I was at your houſe maſter Englefield, where I learned the firſt intelligence of Wiats ſtirre. And I aſke you who dooth depoſe that there paſſed anie maner of aduertiſement betwixt Wiat and me, after he had diſcouered his doings, and ſhewed himſelfe an enimie? If I had béene ſo diſpoſed, who did let me that I did not repaire to Wiat, or to ſend to him, or to the duke of Suffolke either, who was in mine owne countrie, and thither I might haue gone and conueied my ſelfe with him, vnſuſpected for my departing homewards.

Englefield. It is true that you were there at my houſe, accompanied with others your brethren, and to my knowledge, ignorant of theſe matters.

Bromleie. Throckmorton, you confeſſed you talked with Wiat and others againſt the comming of the Spaniards, and of the taking of the tower of London, wherevpon Wiat leuied a force of men againſt the Spaniards he ſaid, and ſo you ſaie all: but in déed it was againſt the quéene, which he confeſſed at length: therefore Wiats acts doo prooue you counſellor and procurer, howſoeuer you would auoid ths matter.

Throckmorton. My thinke you would conclude againſt me with a miſhapen argument in logike, and you will giue me leaue, I will make an other.

Stanford. The iudges ſit not here to make diſputations, but to declare the law, which hath béene ſufficientlie doone, if you would conſider it.

Hare. You haue heard reaſon and the law, if you will conceiue it.

Throckmorton. Oh mercifull God, oh eternall father, which ſéeſt all things, what maner of procéedings are theſe? To what purpoſe ſerueth the ſtatute of repeale the laſt parlement, where I heard ſome of you here preſent, and diuerſe other of the quéenes learned councell, grieuouſlie inueie againſt the cruell & bloudie lawes of king Henrie the eight, and againſt ſome lawes made in my late ſouereigne lord and maſters time, king Edward the ſixt. Some termed them Dracos lawes, which were written in bloud: ſome ſaid they were more intollerable than anie laws that Dionyſius or anie other tyrant made. In concluſion, as manie men, ſo manie bitter tearmes and names thoſe lawes had. And moreouer, the preface of the ſame ſtatute dooth recite, that for words onelie, manie great perſonages, and others of good behauiour, haue béene moſt cruellie caſt awaie by theſe former ſanguinolent thirſtie lawes, with manie other ſuggeſtions for the repeale of the ſame. And now let vs put on indifferent eies, and throughlie conſider with our ſelues, as you the iudges handle the conſtructions of the ſtatute of Edward the third, with your equitie and extentions, whether we be not in much worſe caſe now than we were when thoſe cruell laws yoked vs. Theſe lawes albeit they were grieuous and captious, yet they had the verie propertie of a law after ſaint Paules deſcription. For thoſe lawes did admoniſh vs, and diſcouer our ſinnes plainelie vnto vs, & when a man is warned, he is halfe armed. Theſe lawes, as they be handled, be verie baits to catch vs, & onlie prepared for the ſame, and no laws: for at the firſt ſight they aſcerteine vs we be deliuered from our old bondage, and by the late repeale the laſt parlement, we liue in more ſecuritie. But when it pleaſeth the higher powers to call anie mans life and ſaiengs in queſtion, then there be conſtructions, interpretations, and extentions reſerued to the iuſtices and iudges equitie, that the partie triable, as I am now, ſhall find himſelfe in much worſe caſe than before when thoſe cruell lawes ſtood in force. Thus our amendment is from Gods bleſſing into the warme ſunne. But I require you honeſt men which are to trie my life, conſider theſe opinions of my life, iudges be rather agréeable to the time, than to the truth: for their iudgements be repugnant to their owne principle, repugnant to their godlie and beſt learned predeceſſors opinions, repugnant I ſaie to the prouiſo in the ſtatute of repeale made in the laſt parlement.

The atturnie. Maſter Throckmorton quiet your ſelfe, and it ſhall be the better for you.

Throckmorton. Maſter atturnie, I am not ſo vnquiet as you be, and yet our caſes are not alike: but bicauſe I am ſo tedious to you, and haue long troubled this preſence, it maie pleaſe my lord chiefe iuſtice to repeat the euidence wherewith I am charged, and my anſwers to all the obiections, if there be no other matter to laie againſt me.

¶ Then the chiefe iuſtice remembred particularlie all the depoſitions and euidences giuen againſt the priſoner, and either for want of good memorie, or good will, the priſoners anſwers were in part not recited: wherevpon the priſoner craued indifferencie, and did helpe the iudges old memorie with his owne recitall.]

Sendall. My maſters of the iurie, you haue to inquire whether ſir Nicholas Throckmorton knight, here priſoner at the barre, be giltie of theſe treaſons, or anie of them, whereof he hath beene indicted and this daie arreigned, yea or no. And if you find him giltie, you ſhall inquire what lands, tenements, goods, and cattels he had at the daie of his treaſons committed, or at anie time ſince: and whether he fled for the treaſons or no, if you find him not giltie.

Throckmorton. Haue you ſaid what is to be ſaid?

Sendall. Yea for this time.

Throckmorton. Then I praie you giue me leaue to ſpeake a few words to the iurie. The weight and grauitie of my cauſe hath greatlie occaſioned me to trouble you here long, and therfore I mind not to interteine you here long, with anie prolix oration: you perceiue notwithſtanding this daie great contention betwixt the iudges and the queenes learned councell on the one partie, and me the poore and wofull priſoner on the other partie. The triall of our whole controuerſie, the triall of my innocencie, the triall of my life, lands, and goods, and the deſtruction of my poſteritie for euer, dooth reſt in your good iudgements. And albeit manie this daie haue greatlie inueied againſt me, the finall determination thereof is transferred onelie to you. How grieuous & horrible the ſhedding of innocents bloud is in the ſight of almightie God, I truſt you doo remember. Therefore take heed (I ſaie) for Chriſts ſake, doo not defile your conſciences with ſuch heinous & notable crimes. They be grieuouſlie and terriblie puniſhed, as in this world and vale of miſerie vpon the childrens children to the third and fourth generation, and in the world to come with euerlaſting fire and damnation. Lift vp your minds to God, and care not too much for the world, looke not backe to the fleſhpots of Aegypt, which will allure you from heauenlie reſpects, to worldlie ſecuritie, and can thereof neither make you anie ſuertie. Beleeue I praie you, the queene and hir magiſtrats be more delighted with fauourable equitie, than with raſh crueltie. And in that you be all citizens, I will take my leaue of you with S. Paules farewell to the Epheſians, citizens alſo you be, whom he tooke to record that he was pure from ſheding anie bloud, a ſpeciall token & doctrine left for your inſtruction, that euerie of you maie waſh his hands of innocents bloud ſhed, when you ſhall take your leaue of this wretched world. The holie ghoſt be amongeſt you.

Sendall. Come hither ſergeant, take the iurie with you, and ſuffer no man to come at them, but to be ordered as the law appointeth, vntill they be agreed vpon their verdict.

Throckmorton. It may pleaſe you my lords and maiſters which be commiſſioners, to giue order that no perſon haue acceſſe or conference with the iurie, neither that any of the queenes learned councell be ſuffered to repaire to them, or to talke with anie of them, vntill they preſent themſelues here in open court, to publiſh their verdict.

¶ Vpon the priſoners ſute on this behalfe, the bench gaue order that two ſeargeants were ſworne to ſuffer no man to repaire to the iurie, vntill they were agreed according vnto order. Wherevpon then the priſoner was by commandement of the bench withdrawne from the barre, and the court adiourned vntill three of the clocke at afternoone, at which houre the cōmiſſioners returned to the Guildhall, and there did tarie vntill the iurie were agreed vpon the verdict. And about fiue of the clocke, their agreement being aduertiſed to the commiſſioners, the ſaid priſoner, ſir Nicholas Throckmorton was againe brought to the barre, where alſo the iurie did repaire; and being demanded whether they were agreed vpon their verdict, anſwered vniuerſallie with one voice, Yea. Then it was aſked who ſhould ſpeake for them: they anſwered, Whetſton the foreman.]

Sendall. Nicholas Throckmorton knight, hold vp thy hand.

Throckmorton. Then the priſoner did ſo vpon the ſummons.

Sendall. You that be of the iurie, looke vpon the priſoner.

Iurie. The iurie did as they were inioined.

Sendall. How ſaie you, is maiſter Throckmorton knight there priſoner at the bar, giltie of the treaſons whereof he hath bene indicted and arreigned in maner and forme, yea or no?

Whetſton. No.

Sendall. How ſaie you, did he flie vpon them?

Whetſton. No, we find no ſuch thing.

Throckmorton. I had forgotten to anſwer that queſtion before, but you haue found according to truth: and for the better warrantie of your doings, vnderſtand that I came to London, and ſo to the queenes councell vnbrought, when I vnderſtood they demanded for me: & yet I was almoſt an hundred miles hence, where if I had not preſumed vpon my truth, I could haue withdrawne my ſelfe from catching.

Bromleie. How ſaie you the reſt of you, is Whetſtons verdict all your verdicts?

Iurie. The whole inqueſt anſwered Yea.

Bromleie. Remember your ſelues better, haue you conſidered ſubſtantially the whole euidence in ſort as it was declared & recited; the matter dooth touch the queenes highneſſe, and your ſelues alſo, take good heed what you doo.

Whetſton. My lord, we haue throughlie conſidered the euidence laid againſt the priſoner, and his anſwers to all theſe matters, and accordinglie we haue found him not giltie agreeable to all our conſciences.

Bromleie. If you haue doone well, it is the better for you.

Throckmorton. It is better to be tried, than to liue ſuſpected. Bleſſed be the Lord God of Iſraell, for he hath viſited and redeemed his people, and hath raiſed vp a mightie ſaluation for vs in the houſe of his ſeruant Dauid. And it may pleaſe you my lord cheefe iuſtice, forſomuch as I haue bene indicted and arreigned of ſundrie treaſons, and haue according to the law put my triall to God and my countrie, that is to ſaie, to theſe honeſt men which haue found me not giltie, I humblie beſeech you to giue me ſuch benefit, acquitall and iudgement, as the law in this caſe dooth appoint.

¶ When the priſoner had ſaid theſe words the commiſſioners conſulted togither.]

Throckmorton. Maie it pleaſe you my lord cheefe iuſtice to pronounce ſentence for my diſcharge?

Bromleie. Whereas you doo aſke the benefit that the law in ſuch caſe dooth appoint, I will giue it you; to wit, that where you haue beene indicted of ſundrie high treaſons, & haue beene heere this daie before the queenes commiſſioners and iuſtices arreigned of the ſaid treaſons, wherevnto you haue pleaded not giltie, and haue for triall therein put your ſelfe on God & your countrie, and they haue found you not giltie, the court dooth award that you be cleerlie diſcharged, paieng your fees. Notwithſtanding maſter lieutenant take him with you againe, for there are other matters to charge him withall.

Throckmorton.

It maie pleaſe you my lords & maſters of the Q. highneſſe priuie councell, to be on my behalfe humble ſutors to hir maieſtie, that like as the law this daie (God be praiſed) hath purged me of the treaſons wherewith I was moſt dangerouſlie charged: ſo it might pleaſe hir excellent maieſtie to purge me in hir priuat iudgement, and both forgiue & forget my ouerraſh boldneſſe, that I vſed in talke of hir highnes marriage with the prince of Spaine, matters too far aboue my capacitie, and I verie vnable to conſider the grauitie thereof, a matter impertinent for me a priuat perſon to talke of, which did apperteine to hir highneſſe priuie councell to haue in deliberation. And if it ſhall pleaſe hir highneſſe of hir bountifull liberalitie, to remit my former ouerſights, I ſhall thinke my ſelfe happie for triall of the danger that I haue this daie eſcaped, and maie thereby admoniſh me to eſchue things aboue my reach, and alſo to inſtruct me to deale with matters agreeable to my vocation. And God ſaue the queens maieſtie, and grant the ſame long to reigne ouer vs. And the ſame Lord be praiſed for you the magiſtrats, before whome I haue had my triall this daie indifferentlie by the law, and you haue proceeded with me accordinglie; & the grace of God be amongſt you now and euer. ¶ There was no anſwer made by anie of the bench to the priſoners ſute, but the atturnie did ſpeake theſe words.]

The atturnie.

And it pleaſe you my lords, forſomuch as it ſeemeth theſe men of the iurie, which haue ſtrangelie acquited the priſoner of his treſons wherof he was indicted, will forthwith depart the court, I praie you for the queene, that they, and euerie of them maie bee bound in a recogniſance of fiue hundred pounds a peece, to anſwer to ſuch matters as they ſhall bee charged with in the queenes behalfe, whenſoeuer they ſhall be charged or called.

whetſton.

I praie you my lords be good to vs, and let vs not be moleſted for diſcharging our conſciences trulie. We be poore merchantmen, and haue great charge vpon our hands, & our liuings doo depend vpon our trauels, therefore it maie pleaſe you to appoint vs a certeine day for our appearance, for perhaps ſome of vs maie be in forren parties about our buſineſſe.

¶ Thus much for ſir Nicholas Throckmortons arreignement, wherein is to be conſidered, that the repealing of certeine ſtatutes in the laſt parlement, was the chiefe matter he had to alledge for his aduantage: whereas the repealing of the ſame ſtatutes was meant notwithſtanding for an other purpoſe (as before you haue partlie heard) which ſtatutes, or the effect of the chiefe branches of them haue beene ſince that time againe reuiued, as by the bookes of the ſtatutes it maie better appeare, to the which I referre the reader.] The eight and twentith of Aprill, the lord Thomas Greie, brother to the duke of Suffolke, was beheaded at the tower hill, a proper gentleman, and one that had ſerued right valiantlie both in France and Scotland, in the daies of the late kings Henrie and Edward.

The lord Tho. Greie beheaded.

Vpon ſaturdaie the eight and twentith of Aprill, ſir Iames Croſts and maiſter William Winter were brought from the tower to the Guildhall in London, where ſir Iames Croſts was arreigned: but bicauſe the daie was farre ſpent, maiſter Winter was not arreigned, but caried backe againe to the tower with the ſaid ſir Iames Croſts. William Thomas, of whome mention is made before in the hiſtorie of ſir Thomas Wiat, with certeine other, were arreigned and condemned for the conſpiring of the murther and killing of the queene vpon the ſudden: and for that offenſe, the ſaid William Thomas was the eighteenth daie of Maie, drawne, hanged, and quartered at Tiburne. The nineteenth daie of Maie next following, the ladie Eliſabeth ſiſter to queene Marie, was deliuered out of the tower, and committed to the cuſtodie of ſir Iohn Williams knight, afterward lord Williams of Tame, by whome hir grace was more courteouſlie intreated than ſome would haue wiſhed. Therefore ſhortlie after ſhe was committed to the manour of Woodſtocke, vnder the cuſtodie of ſir Henrie Beningfield of Oxenborough in the countie of Norffolke, knight, at whoſe hands ſhe found not the like courteſie, who (as it is well knowne) vſed his office more like a gailor than a gentleman, and with ſuch rigour as was not meet to be ſhewed to ſuch an eſtate, which extremitie of crueltie to a perſon of great dignitie notwithſtanding hir innocencie, is verie well noted by C. O. in Eirenarchia ſiue Eliſabetha, where he ſaith:

william Thomas arreigned & condemned.

But here is to be noted, not ſo much the vnciuill nature of the man, as the ſingular lenitie, and gratious clemencie of that gentle and vertuous princeſſe, who afterward (as ſhall appeare) comming to the poſſeſſion of the crowne as hir rightfull inheritance, was at that time ſo farre from reuenge of iniuries receiued, that whereas diuerſe princes haue requited much leſſe offenſes with loſſe of life, ſhe neuer touched him either with danger of life, or loſſe of lands or goods, nor neuer proceeded further than to diſcharge him of the court: which manie thought was the thing that pleaſed him beſt. At whoſe departing from hir preſence, ſhe vſed onelie theſe words, or the like in ſenſe: God forgiue you that is paſt, and we doo: and if we haue anie priſoner whome we would haue hardlie handled and ſtreictlie kept, then we will ſend for you.

Queene Eliſabeths words to Beningfield hir butcherlie keeper in the time of hir durance.

The fiue and twentith of Maie, the erle of Deuonſhire was brought out of the tower at three of the clocke in the morning, ſir Thomas Treſham knight, and maiſter Chamberlaine of Suffolke, with certeine of the gard, being appointed to attend on him to Fodringham caſtell in Northamptonſhire, where he was aſſigned to remaine vnder cuſtodie of the ſaid ſir Thomas Treſham and others. ¶ On the tenth of Iune, the foreſaid doctor Pendleton preached at Poules croſſe, at whome a gun was ſhot, the pellet wherof went verie neere him, and light on the church wall: but the ſhooter could not be found.] The eleuenth of Iune the lord Iohn Greie, brother to the late duke of Suffolke, was arreigned at Weſtminſter in the Kings bench, and there condemned: but yet through the painfull trauell and diligent ſute of the ladie Greie his wife, his pardon was obteined, and ſo he eſcaped with life, and was at length ſet at libertie, as after it ſhall appeare.

A gun ſhot at the preacher: See before pag. 1102.

The lord Iohn Greie arreigned, pardoned, and releaſed.

¶ The two and twentith of Iune was proclamation made, forbidding the ſhooting in handguns, and bearing of weapons. The fifteenth of Iulie, Eliſabeth Croſt, a wench about eighteene yeares old, ſtood vpon a ſcaffold at Pauls croſſe all the ſermon time, where ſhe confeſſed, that ſhe being moued by diuerſe lewd perſons therevnto, had vpon the fourteenth of March laſt before paſſed, counterfeited certeine ſpeaches in an houſe without Aldreſgate of London, through the which the people of the whole citie were wonderfullie moleſted, for that all men might heare the voice, but not ſée hir perſon. Some ſaid it was an angell, ſome a voice from heauen, ſome the Holie ghoſt, &c. This was called the ſpirit in the wall: ſhée had laine whiſtling in a ſtrange whiſtle made for that purpoſe, which was giuen hir by one Drakes: then were there diuerſe companions confederat with hir, which putting themſelues amongſt the preaſe, tooke vpon them to interpret what the ſpirit ſaid, expreſſing certeine ſeditious words againſt the quéene, the prince of Spaine, the maſſe, and confeſſion, &c.]

The prince of Spains preparation to come into England.

But now in this meane while that theſe things thus paſſed here in England, the prince of Spaine prepared for his hither comming, vnto whome had béene ſent the earle of Bedford lord priuie ſeale, and the lord Fitzwaters, accompanied with diuerſe noble men and gentlemen, who arriuing at the Corone in Galiſia, were receiued verie honorablie. And forſomuch as the prince was then at vale Dolido, diſtant from thence néere hand an hundred leagues, they were deſired to ſtaie there for their better eaſe, till he might haue conuenient oportunitie to repaire thither: which neuertheleſſe he could not doo ſo ſoone as he pretended to haue deſire thereto, as well by reaſon of the ſickeneſſe of his ſiſter, the princes Dowager of Portugall, as by other weightie affaires. But being at length rid of ſuch incumbers, & come into Galiſia, the Engliſh ambaſſadors met him at ſaint James de Compoſtella. And after he had in preſence of a great number of noble men and gentlemen there ratified the contract, and ſworne to obſerue the couenant, he departed towards Corone, where within a few daies after he imbarked, and accompanied with the number of an hundred and fiftie ſaile, directed his courſe toward England.

The Engliſh ambaſſadors met him at S. James of Cōpoſtella.

The lord admerall hauing continuallie béene abrode on the ſeas for the ſpace of thrée moneths or more, with a nauie of eight and twentie ſhips and other veſſels, accompanied alſo with the viceadmerall of the low countries, that had vnder his gouernance fourtéene ſhips of the emperours, met with the ſaid prince the ninetéenth of Julie, about the Néedles, and from thence accompanied him vnto Southampton, where he arriued the morrow after the twentith of Julie, the earle of Arundell lord ſteward of the quéens houſe being ſent from hir to preſent to him the George and the garter of the order (of the which fellowſhip he was at the laſt chapiter holden by the confréers choſen one of the companie) met him vpon the water, and at his comming to land, preſented the ſaid George and garter vnto him. At his landing he was receiued by the lord treaſuror, the biſhop of Lincolne, the lord Saint-John, and others, by whom he was firſt conueied to the church, and from thence to his lodging.

The arriuall of the prince of Spaine in Southamptō.

He is receiued of the nobilitie and lords.

After his landing, the lord chancellor accompanied with diuerſe gentlemen, was ſent from the quéene to bid him welcome on hir behalfe; & ſo was he viſited by diuerſe noble perſonages whileſt he remained at Southampton, ſent thither for that purpoſe. And he on the other part ſent diuerſe of his noble men to viſit hir maieſtie on his behalfe. Mondaie the thrée & twentith of Julie, he departed from Southampton towards Wincheſter, whither ſhée was the ſaturdaie before remoued from Biſhops Waltham. On the waie he was accompanied, beſide the noblemen & gentlemen of his owne traine, with the marques of Wincheſter, the earles of Arundell, Darbie, Worceter, Bedford, Rutland, Penbroke, Surrie: the lords Clinton, Cobham, Willoughbie, Darcie, Matrauers, Talbot, Strange, Fitzwaren, and North, with manie other noblemen and gentlemen, and their traines, to the number of two thouſand horſſes. At his comming to the church in Wincheſter, the lord chancellor accompanied with the biſhops of Durham, Elie, London, Lincolne, Chicheſter, and diuerſe other prelats, were readie to receiue him. After he had made his praiers, he was conueied to his lodging prepared for him in the deans houſe.

He commeth to Wincheſter where the quéene was reſident of purpoſe to interteine him.

The quéens lodging in the biſhops palace.

The quéene hir ſelfe was lodged in the biſhops palace, whither his highneſſe the next daie came, and was receiued by hir in the hall, in moſt courteous & louing maner. And after ſuch ſalutations & talke ended, as was thought conuenient for the time, he returned to his lodging, where he continued all that night: and the next daie being the fiue and twentith of Julie, the mariage was openlie ſolemnized. At the which were preſent, the ambaſſadors of the emperor, the king of Romans, the king of Bohem, of Venice, Florence, Ferrare, and Sauoie, with certeine agents of other ſtates in Italie. As for the ſhot of ordinance, the diuerſe kinds of muſicke, the ſumptuous and coſtlie apparell, trappers, and other furniture, readie prouided againſt the receiuing of him, with other ceremonies vſed aſwell about the mariage, as in other places where he was to be receiued, were ſuerlie ſuch, and euerie thing doone in ſuch good order, as better for ſuch a purpoſe might not lightlie be deuiſed. Nobles of Spaine were, the duke of Alua, the duke of Medina celi, the admerall of Caſtilla, the marques of Bergues, the marques of Piſcara, the marques of Saria, the marques of Valli, the marques of Aguillar, the earle of Egmund, the earle of Horne, the earle of Feria, the earle of Chinchon, the earle of Oliuares, the earle of Saldana, the earle of Modica, the earle of Fuenteſalida, the earle of Landriano, the earle of Caſtellar, Don Ruigomes, the biſhop of Cuenca, Don John de Benauides; and diuerſe others.

An abſtract of the conditions of this mariage betweene both the princes.

But now forſomuch as ſome would happilie be deſirous to know the conditions of this memorable mariage betwixt theſe two high princes, the conſequence wherof might haue proued of ſo great importance, although by the quéens deceaſe the effect was made void, I haue thought good to recite in briefe the chiefe articles thereof.

1 It was couenanted that he ſhould enioy the title and name of king, during the matrimonie, and ſhould aid hir highneſſe (being his wife) in the adminiſtration of hir realmes and dominions; but yet he ſhould permit and ſuffer hir to haue the whole diſpoſition of all benefices, offices, lands, reuenues, and fruits of the ſaid realmes and dominions, and that the ſame ſhould be beſtowed vpon ſuch as were hir naturall borne ſubiects, and that all matters of the ſaid realmes and dominions ſhould be treated and handled in the ſame tong, wherein of old they haue béene wont to be treated.

He to be intituled king during the matrimonie, &c.

2 That the quéene by vertue of the ſaid mariage ſhould be admitted into the ſocietie of the realmes and dominions of the ſaid prince of Spaine, as well ſuch as he now preſentlie hath, as ſuch other alſo as during the matrimonie may come to him.

She to be intituled to his dominions during the mariage.

3 And for hir dowrie, in caſe ſhe ouerliued him, ſhe was appointed to receiue yéerlie thrée ſcore thouſand pounds, after the value of fortie groats Flemmiſh monie the pound, to be allotted vpon all the realms, lands, and patrimoniall dominions of his father the emperor, that is to ſaie, fortie thouſand pounds to be aſſigned vpon the realms of Spaine, Caſtile, and Aragon,

Hir dowrie if ſhe ſuruiued him.

Aragon, according to the cuſtome of thoſe realms. The other twentie thouſand pounds were appointed vpon the dukedoms, earledoms, and dominions of Brabant, Flanders, Henalt, Holland, and other patrimoniall lands and inheritances of the ſaid emperor in the low countries of Germanie; in like maner as the ladie Margaret of England, ſometime wife and widow of the lord Charles, ſometime duke of Burgogne, had and receiued of the ſame. And if anie parcell or parcels thereof be alienated, then in lieu thereof, other lands ſhould be in due forme aſſigned forth for hir to enioy, lieng neere to the reſidue of hir dower.

Touching the iſſue of hir bodie male or female.

4 The iſſue that ſhould chance to come of this mariage, touching the right of the mothers inheritance in the realme of England, and the other realmes and dominions depending of the ſame, aſwell the males as females ſhould ſucceed in them, according to the laws, ſtatutes, and cuſtoms of the ſame.

Touching the prince of Spaines diſpoſing of his lands after his deceaſe.

5 And as touching the lands that the ſaid prince of Spaine ſhall leaue behind him, firſt there ſhould be reſerued vnto his eldeſt ſonne the lord Charles of Auſtrich, infant of Spaine, and to the children and heires of him deſcending, as well females as males all and ſingular their rights, which to the ſaid prince doo either then, or thereafter ſhould belong, or ſhould at anie time be deuolued to him in the realmes of Spaine, of both the Sicils, in the dukedome of Millaine, and other lands and dominions in Lumbardie and Italie, which neuertheleſſe ſhall be burdened and charged with the foreſaid dower of fortie thouſand pounds. And if it fortuned the ſaid lord Charles to die, and the iſſue of his bodie to faile, then the eldeſt ſon of this matrimonie ſhould ſucceed, and be admitted vnto the ſaid right, according to the nature, lawes, and cuſtoms of thoſe realmes and dominions. The ſame eldeſt ſon ſhould alſo ſucceed in all the dukedoms, earledoms, dominions, and patrimoniall lands belonging vnto the ſaid emperor father to the ſaid prince of Spaine, as well in Burgogne, as in the low countries, in the dukedoms of Brabant, Luxenburgh, Gelderland, Zutphane, Burgongne, Freeſeland, in the countries of Flanders, Arthois, Holland, Zeland, Namure, and the land beyond the Iſles, and all other whatſoeuer thereunto belonging.

Touching the lord Charles and his deſcendents if heire male came by this mariage.

6 But if the ſaid lord Charles, or they that ſhould come of him, remaine in life; and that there be anie male child by this matrimonie: the ſaid lord Charles and his deſcendents ſhould then be excluded from the ſaid lands and patrimoniall dominions of the low countries, and of Burgongne; and the ſame ſhould deſcend vnto the ſaid eldeſt ſon borne of this matrimonie. And to the other children borne thereof, as well males as females, a conuenient portion and dower ſhould be allotted in the realme of England, and dominions depending of the ſame, and in the ſaid lands & patrimoniall dominions of the low countries: and neither the eldeſt ſonne of this matrimonie, nor the ſons begotten in the ſame, ſhould pretend anie right in the realme of Spaine, or in the dominions of the ſame, and reſerued to the ſaid lord Charles the infant, otherwiſe than by their fathers and grandfathers diſpoſition.

What is to be doone if heire male faile, and there be none but iſſue female.

7 Moreouer, if it fortune no iſſue male to be borne of this matrimonie, but onelie females, in that caſe the eldeſt female ſhould with full right ſucceed in the ſaid lands and dominions of the low countries, ſo as neuertheleſſe ſhe being minded to chooſe to husband anie noble man not borne in England, or in the low countries, without the conſent of the ſaid lord Charles the infant, in that caſe the right of the ſucceſſion ſhould remaine to the ſaid lord Charles, in the ſaid dominions of the low countries, Burgongne, and their appurtenances. And yet neuertheleſſe in that caſe, both ſhe and the other daughters alſo deſcending of this matrimonie, ſhall be indowed of their fathers lands & poſſeſſions aſwell in Spaine, as in the low countries.

What for want of iſſue by the lord Charles.

8 And for want of the ſaid lord Charles, and iſſue of him, and none but daughters remaining of this mariage, the eldeſt daughter in that caſe ſhould ſucceed, not onelie in the lands of the low countries; but alſo in the realmes of Spaine, England, and the reſt, after the nature, the lawes, and cuſtoms of the ſame.

A prouiſo touching ſucceſſion.

9 Herewith was a prouiſo accorded, that whatſoeuer he or ſhe ſhould be that ſhould ſucceed in them, they ſhould leaue to euerie of the ſaid realms, lands, and dominions, whole and entire their priuileges, rites and cuſtoms, and gouerne the ſame by the naturall borne of the ſame realmes, dominions, and lands, &c.

Touching a perpetuall league or bond of fraternitie, &c.

10 Finallie, that betweene the ſaid emperor, the prince and his ſucceſſors, their realmes, and the ſaid queene, it was concluded, that from thenſeforth there ſhould be an entire & ſincere fraternitie, vnitie, and moſt ſtrict confederacie for euer, &c: ſo as they ſhuld mutuallie aid ech other in all things, according to the ſtrength, forme, & effect of the latter tretiſe of a ſtrict amitie, bearing date at Weſtminſter in the yeere 1542: the declaration of which treatie beareth date at Vtericht, the ſixteenth of Ianuarie, in the yeare 1546.

In another treatiſe were theſe articles following compriſed.

No ſtranger to be admitted to anie office, &c. in England.

FIrſt, that the prince of Spaine ſhould not promote, admit, or receiue vnto anie office, adminiſtration, or benefice in the realme of England, or dominions to the ſame belonging, anie ſtranger, or perſons not borne vnder the ſubiection of the ſaid queene.

Engliſhmen to attend at the court.

2 That he ſhould receiue into his houſhold and court, gentlemen and yeomen of the ſaid realme of England in a conuenient number, eſteeming, interteining, and nouriſhing them as his proper ſubiects, & bring none with him in his retinue that will doo anie wrong to the ſubiects of the ſaid realme; & if they doo, he to correct them with condigne puniſhment, and to ſee them expelled his court.

The ſtate in no point to be innouated.

3 That he ſhall doo nothing whereby anie thing be innouated in the ſtate and right either publike or priuat, or in the lawes and cuſtoms of the ſaid realme of England, or the dominions thereunto belonging; but ſhall keepe to all eſtates and orders their rights and priuileges.

The queene not to be conueied out of hir owne territories.

4 That he ſhall not leade awaie the queene out of the borders of hir graces realme, vnleſſe ſhe hir ſelfe deſire it; or carrie the children that may be borne of this matrimonie out of the ſame realme, vnleſſe it be otherwiſe thought good by the conſent and agreement of the nobilitie of England.

The prince of Spaines title to end with the queenes death.

5 And in caſe no children being left, the ſaid queene doo die before him, he ſhall not challenge anie right at all in the ſaid kingdome, but without impediment ſhall permit the ſucceſſion therof to come vnto them to whome it ſhall belong, by the right and lawes of the realme.

The iewels, &c. of the land not to be carried out, alienated, vſurped, &c.

6 Item that he ſhall not beare nor carrie ouer out of the ſaid realme, the iewels and pretious things of eſtimation. Neither ſhall he alienat or doo awaie anie whit of the appurtenances of the ſaid realme of England, or ſuffer anie part of them to be vſurped by his ſubiects, or anie other. But ſhall ſee that all and ſingular places of the realme, and ſpeciallie the forts and frontires of the ſame be faithfullie kept and preſerued to the vſe and profit of the ſaid realme, and by the naturall borne of the ſame.

No ſhips, guns, ordinance, &c: to be remoued, conueied, &c: out of the land.

7 He ſhall not ſuffer anie ſhip, guns, ordinance whatſoeuer of warre or defenſe, to be remóued or conueied out of the ſame realme: but ſhall contrariwiſe cauſe them diligentlie to be kept and viewed when néed requireth; and ſhall ſo prouide that the ſame maie be alwaies readie in their ſtrength and force for defenſe of the realme.

Peace to be mainteined in this realme without medling in other forren nations warres.

8 Item the realme of England by occaſion of this matrimonie, ſhall not directlie nor indirectlie be intangled with the warre that is betwéene the emperor father to the ſaid prince of Spaine, and Henrie the French king; but he the ſaid prince (as much as in him maie lie) on the behalfe of the ſaid realme of England, ſhall ſée the peace betwéene the ſaid realmes of France and England obſerued, and ſhall giue no cauſe of anie breach, by which couenant the latter treatiſe of a ſtrict amitie ſhould not be in anie point derogated, but the ſame ſtill to remaine in the former force, &c.

The emperors gift to the prince his ſonne.

But now to returne where we left. At the time of the ſolemnization of the foreſaid marriage holden at Wincheſter (as before ye haue heard) the emperors ambaſſadors being preſent, openlie pronounced, that in conſideration of that marriage, the emperor had giuen and granted to the ſaid prince his ſonne the kingdome of Naples and Ieruſalem, with diuerſe other ſeats and ſegniories. The ſolemnitie of that marriage ended, the king of heralds called Garter, openlie in the church in the preſence of the king, the quéene, & the lords as well of England as Spaine, all the people being preſent, ſolemnelie proclamed the title and ſtile of thoſe two princes, as followeth: Philip and Marie by the grace of God king and quéene of England, France, Naples, Ieruſalem, and Ireland, defendors of the faith, princes of Spaine and Sicilie, archdukes of Auſtrich, dukes of Millaine, Burgundie, and Brabant, counties of Haſpurge, Flanders, and Tiroll. The proclamation being ended, the trumpets blew, and the king with the quéene came forth of the church hand in hand and two ſwords borne before them, and ſo returned to their palace.

The title of eſtate belonging both to Philip and Marie proclamed by the herald.

¶By this time report had ſufficientlie ſounded abrode all that happened, ſpeciallie the ſolemnities executed about this roiall marriage; whereby ſome ſuppoſed that this land would haue become a golden world, and that ſuch amitie would haue inſued betwéene both nations, as nothing ſhould diſſolue. But others were of a contrarie opinion, ſuppoſing (as it came to paſſe indéed) that the peoples minds would be alienated and eſtranged from the diſpoſition whereto they were addicted in king Edwards daies, and that manie would become heauie hearted vpon heare-ſaie of this coniunction; much more penſiſe & grieued at the meditation of the miſeries which were like immediatlie to follow; as C. O. noteth in diſcourſing on this matter, ſaieng as here followeth:

Succedit regi defuncto, ſceptra capeſcens

Ex ſtirpe Henrici: quæ paucis nupta diebus

Of this marriage (ſaith maiſter Fox) as the papiſts chieflie ſéemed to be verie glad, ſo diuerſe of them after diuerſe ſtudies, did ſhew forth their inward affections: ſome made interludes and pageants, and ſome drew forth genealogies, deriuing his pedegrée from Edward the third, and Iohn of Gant; ſome made verſes. Amongſt all other maiſter White then biſhop of Lincolne in his poeticall veine, being dronken with ioie of the marriage, ſpued out certeine verſes; the copie whereof we haue here inſerted, to impart vnto common knowlege.

But to procéed. As ſóne as the feaſting & ſolemnitie of the ſaid marriage was ended, the king and quéene departed from Wincheſter, and by eaſie iournies came to Windſore caſtell, where the fift of Auguſt being ſundaie, he was ſtalled according to the order of the garter, and there kept S. Georges feaſt himſelfe in his roiall eſtate, and the earle of Suſſex was alſo the ſame time ſtalled in the order. At which time an herald tóke downe the armes of England at Windſore, and in the place of them would haue ſet the armes of Spaine, but he was commanded to ſet them vp againe by certeine lords. The ſeuenth of Auguſt was made a generall hunting with a toile raiſed of foure or fiue miles in length, ſo that manie a déere that day was brought to the quarrie. The eleuenth of Auguſt they remóued to Richmond, and from thence the 27 of the ſame moneth they came by water to London, landing at the biſhop of Wincheſters houſe, through which they paſſed both to Southworke parke, and ſo to Suffolke place, where they lodged that night: and the next daie being ſaturdaie and the ninetéenth of Auguſt, they being accompanied with a great number of nobles and gentlemen, rode from thence ouer the bridge, and paſſed through London vnto Weſtminſter.

¶Now as the king came to London bridge, & as he entred at the drawbridge, was a vaine great ſpectacle ſet vp, two images repreſenting two giants, one named Corineus, and the other Gogmagog holding betwéene them certeine Latine verſes, which for the vaine oſtentation of flatterie I ouerpaſſe. And as they paſſed ouer the bridge, there was a number of ordinance ſhot at the tower, ſuch as by old mens report the like hath not béene heard or ſéene theſe hundred yéeres. From London bridge they paſſed to the conduit in Grations ſtréet, which was finelie painted, and among other things, the nine worthies, whereof king Henrie the eight was one. He was painted in harneſſe hauing in one hand a ſword, and in the other hand a booke, whereupon was written Verbum Dei, deliuering the ſame booke (as it were) to his ſonne king Edward, who was painted in a corner by him. But herevpon was no ſmall matter made, for the biſhop of Wincheſter lord chancellor, ſent for the painter, and not onelie called him knaue for painting a booke in king Henries hand, and ſpeciallie for writing therevpon Verbum Dei: but alſo ranke traitor & villen, ſaieng to him that he ſhould rather haue put the booke into the quéenes hand (who was alſo painted there) for that ſhe had reformed the church and religion, with other things according to the pure and ſincere word of God indéed. The painter anſwered and ſaid, that if he had knowne that that had béene the matter wherefore his lordſhip ſent for him, he could haue remedied it, and not haue troubled his lordſhip.

Fiue Philips

The biſhop anſwered and ſaid, that it was the quéenes maieſties will and commandement, that he ſhould ſend for him; and ſo commanding him to wipe out the booke and Verbum Dei too: he ſent him home. So the painter departed, but fearing leaſt he ſhould leaue ſome part either of the booke, or of Verbum Dei, in king Henries hand: he wiped awaie a péece of his fingers withall. Here I paſſe ouer and cut off other gauds and pageants of paſtime ſhewed vnto him in paſſing through London, with the flattering verſes ſet vp in Latine, wherin were blazed out in one place the fiue Philips, as the fiue worthies of the world, Philip of Macedonia, Philip the emperor, Philippus Audax, Philippus Bonus, Philip prince of Spaine and king of England. In another poetrie king Philip was reſembled by an image repreſenting Orpheus, and all Engliſh people reſembled to brute and ſauage beaſts following after Orpheus harpe, and danſing after king Philips pipe. Not that I reprehend the art of the Latine verſes, which was fine and cunning; but that I paſſe ouer the matter, hauing other grauer things in hand, and therefore paſſe ouer alſo the ſight at Paules church ſide, of him that came downe vpon a rope tied to the batlements with his head before, neither ſtaieng himſelfe with hand or foot: which ſhortlie after coſt him his life.

The erecting vp of the rood at Paules.

Biſhop Boners god the rood of Pauls ſet vp with Te Deum.

But one thing by the waie I cannot let paſſe, touching the yoong floriſhing rood newlie ſet vp againſt this preſent time, to welcome king Philip into Paules church. The ſetting vp of which rood was this, and may make as good a pageant as the beſt. Anno 2. Mariæ Boner in his roialtie, and all his prebendaries about him in Paules quéere, the rood laid along vpon the pauement, and alſo all the doores of Paules being ſhut, the biſhop with other ſaid and ſoong diuers praiers by the rood: that being doone they annointed the rood with oile in diuers places, and after the annointing crept vnto it and kiſſed it. After that they tooke the ſaid rood and weied him vp and ſet him in his old accuſtomed place, and all the while they were dooing thereof, the whole queere ſang Te Deum, and when that was ended, they rang the bels, not onlie for ioy, but alſo for the notable and great fact they had doone therein.

Salutation to the rood of Paules.

Not long after this, a merrie fellow came into Paules, and ſpied the rood with Marie and Iohn new ſet vp, wherto (among a great ſort of people) he made low curtſie & ſaid: Sir, your maiſterſhip is welcome to towne, I had thought to haue talked further with your maiſterſhip, but that ye be héere clothed in the quéenes colours. I hope ye be but a ſommers bird, for that ye be dreſſed in white & gréene, &c. The prince thus being in the church of Paules, after doctor Harpeſfield had finiſhed his oration in Latine, ſet forward through Fléetſtréet, & ſo came to White hall, where he with the quéene remained foure daies after, and from thence remooued vnto Richmond. After this, all the lords had leaue to depart into their countries, with ſtrict commandement to bring all their harneſſe and artillerie into the tower of London with all ſpéed. Now remained there no Engliſh lord at the court but the biſhop of Wincheſter.

A proclamation for the auoiding of maiſterleſſe men out of the citie of London.

From Richmond they remooued to Hampton court, where the hall doore within the court was continuallie ſhut, ſo that no man might enter, vnleſſe his errand were firſt knowne: which ſéemed ſtrange to Engliſhmen that had not béene vſed thereto. The ſeuentéenth daie of September, was a proclamation in London, that all vagabonds and maiſterleſſe men, as well ſtrangers as Engliſhmen, ſhould depart the citie within fiue daies: and ſtrictlie charging all inholders, vittelers, tauerners, and alehouſekéepers, with all other that ſold vittels, that they (after the ſaid fiue daies) ſhould not ſell anie meat, drinke, or anie kind of vittels or reléefe to anie ſeruingman whatſoeuer, vnleſſe he brought a teſtimoniall from his maiſter to declare whoſe ſeruant he was, & were in continuall houſhold with his ſaid maiſter, vpon paine to runne in danger of the law if they offend herein.]

Death of the Duke of Norfolke

A Spaniard hanged. Iohn Stow.

Eight of maiſter Throckmortons were appéere in the Starchamber.

In September, the duke of Norffolke departed this life at Fremingham caſtell in Norffolke, and there was honorablie buried among his anceſtors. ¶The 26 of October, a Spaniard was hangd at Charingcroſſe for killing an Engliſhman, there was offered for his life by other ſtrangers 500 crownes, but all that would not ſtaie iuſtice.] On fridaie the ſame 26 of October, thoſe honeſt men that had béene of Throckmortons queſt, being in number eight (for the other foure were deliuered out of priſon, for that they ſubmitted themſelues, and ſaid they had offended like weakelings, not conſidering truth to be truth, but of force for feare ſaid ſo) theſe eight men I ſaie (whereof maiſter Emanuell Lucar and maiſter Whetſton were chéefe) were called before the councell in the Starrechamber, where they affirmed that they had doone all things in that matter according to their knowledge, and with good conſciences, euen as they ſhould anſwer before GOD at the daie of iudgement. Where maiſter Lucar ſaid openlie before all the lords that they had doone in the matter like honeſt men, and true and faithfull ſubiects: and therefore they humblie beſought my lord chancellor and the other lords, to be meanes to the king and quéenes maieſties, that they might be diſcharged and ſet at libertie: and ſaid that they were all contented to ſubmit themſelues to their maieſties, ſauing and reſeruing their truth, conſciences, and honeſties.

The hard iudgement of the lords againſt thoſe eight honeſt men.

The L. Iohn Greie ſet at libertie. Further extremitie againſt Throckmortons queſt.

The lords taking their words in maruellous euill part, iudged them worthie to paie exceſſiue fines. Some ſaid they were worthie to paie 1000 pounds a péece. Other ſaid that Lucar and Whetſton were worthie to paie a thouſand marks a péece, and the reſt fiue hundred pounds a péece. In concluſion, ſentence was giuen by the lord chancellor that they ſhould paie a thouſand marks a péece, he that paid leaſt; and that they ſhould go to priſon againe, and there remain till further order were taken for their puniſhment. The thirtith of October being tueſdaie, the lord Iohn Greie was deliuered out of the tower, and ſet at libertie. Vpon ſaturdaie the tenth of Nouember, the ſhiriffes of London had commandement to take an inuentarie of each one of their goods, which were of maiſter Throckmortons queſt, & to ſeale vp their dores, which was doone the ſame daie.

A parlement wherein the king & quéene are preſent.

Cardinall Poole arriueth at Douer

An act for the reſtitution in bloud of cardinall Poole.

Maiſter Whetſton, and maiſter Lucar, and maiſter Kightlie, were adiudged to paie two thouſand pounds a péece, and the reſt a thouſand marks a péece, to be paid within one fortnight after. From this paiment were exempted thoſe foure which confeſſed a fault, & thereupon had ſubmitted themſelues, whoſe names are theſe: maiſter Loe, maiſter Pointer, maiſter Beſwicke, and maiſter Cater. The 12 of Nouember being mondaie, the parlement began at Weſtminſter, to the beginning whereof both the king and quéene rode in their parlement robes, hauing two ſwords borne before them. The earle of Penbroke bare his ſword, and the earle of Weſtmerland bare the quéenes. They had two caps of maintenance likewiſe borne before them: whereof the earle of Arundell bare the one, and the earle of Shrewesburie the other. During this parlement, cardinall Poole landed at Douer vpon wedneſdaie, being the 21 of Nouember, who being receiued with much honor in all other countries through which hee had paſſed, was receiued here at the firſt, with no great ſhew, for the cauſes aboue mentioned. The ſame daie on the which he arriued, an act paſſed in the parlement houſe, for his reſtitution in bloud, vtterlie repealing (as falſe and moſt ſlanderous) that act made againſt him in K. Henrie the eights time. And on the next daie being thurſdaie and the 22 of Nouember, the king and quéene both came to the parlement houſe to giue their roiall aſſent, and to eſtabliſh this act againſt his comming. On ſaturdaie the foure and twentith of Nouember, he came to the court, and after went to Lambeth where his lodging was prepared.

Cardinall Poole cõmeth into the parlement houſe.

The words of the biſhop of winchester then lord chancellor.

Rich. Grafton.

On wedneſdaie following in the after noone, he came into the parlement houſe, being at that preſent kept in the great chamber of the court of the White hall, for that the quéene by reaſon of ſickneſſe was not able to go abrode (where the king and quéene ſitting vnder the cloth of eſtate, and the cardinall ſitting on the right hand, with all the other eſtates of the realme being preſent) and the knights and burgeſſes of the common houſe being alſo called thither, the biſhop of Winchester being lord chancellor, ſpake in this maner. My lords of the vpper houſe, and you my maiſters of the nether houſe, here is preſent the right reuerend father in God, my lord cardinall Poole, legat A Latere, come from the apoſtolike ſée of “Rome, as ambaſſador to the king and quéenes maieſties, vpon one of the weightieſt cauſes that euer happened in this realme, and which apperteineth to the glorie of God, and your vniuerſall benefit; the which ambaſſage, their maieſties pleaſure is to bée ſignified vnto you all by his owne mouth, truſting that you will receiue and accept it in as beneuolent and thankefull wiſe, as their highneſſe haue doone, and that you will giue attentiue and inclinable eare vnto his grace, who is now readie to declare the ſame. So ſoone as the lord chancellor had ended his tale, the cardinall began and made a long & ſolemne oration, the which for ſhortneſſe ſake I haue collected into theſe few articles, remitting the reader to maiſter Foxes Acts and Monuments, where they ſhall find the ſame wholie and entierlie as by him it was vttered.

The effect of the cardinals oration in the aſſemblie of parlement.

1 Firſt, he yéelded moſt heartie thanks to the king and quéene, and next vnto the whole parlement; that of a man exiled & baniſhed from this common weale, they had reſtored him againe to be a member of the ſame, and to the honour of his houſe and familie, and of a man hauing no place, neither here nor elſewhere within the realme, to haue admitted him into a place where to ſpeake, and to be heard.

He ſheweth the ſpeciall cauſe of his comming into England.

2 Secondlie, that his eſpeciall comming was for the reſtitution of this realme to the ancient eſtate, and to declare that the ſée apoſtolike hath a ſpeciall care of this realme aboue all other: and chieflie for that this Iland firſt of all other prouinces of Europe, receiued the light of Chriſts religion from the ſée of Rome.

He exhorteth to a generall returne into the boſome of the church.

3 Thirdlie, he exhorted that though the realme had ſwarued from the catholike vnitie, that yet being better informed, we ought to returne into the boſome of the church, moſt open to receiue all penitents. For the perſuaſion whereof he brought a number of old examples, what perill and hurt hath happened vnto them that haue ſwarued and gone from the church of Rome, namelie Græce and Germanie.

He declareth how wonderfullie god had preſerued Q. Marie.

4 Fourthlie, how much we are bound to God for the king and quéens maieſties, and how miraculouſlie God had ſaued and defended our quéene from hir enimies in moſt dangerous times: and alſo that hée hath prouided to ioine with hir in mariage, ſuch a noble prince as king Philip was, & one of hir owne religion.

He exhorteth to obedience and treateth of reſtoring this realme to the vnitie of the church.

5 Fiftlie, he exhorted them all to obedience of theſe two princes, and to call vpon God for iſſue to be had betwéene them, adding that king Philips father the emperour, had amongſt other princes trauelled moſt for the reſtitution of the peace and vnitie of the church. But as almightie God ſaid vnto Dauid, though he had a mind and will to build his temple: yet bicauſe he had ſhed bloud, he ſhould not build it. And ſo bicauſe the emperour hath had ſo manie warres, and ſhed ſo much bloud: therefore hée could not atteine to bring perfect peace to the church. But trulie (ſaid he) this gratious prince king Philip his ſonne, as I conceiue, is appointed of God to it, conſidering now the calling of him to be ioined with ſo catholike a princeſſe, as is the quéene of this realme, one without all doubt ſent likewiſe of God, for the reſtoring of the ſaid realme to the vnitie of the church, from whence it hath erred and gone aſtraie, as it dooth and maie manifeſtlie appeare.

He proteſteth that he ment the preiudice of no man, &c.

6 Sixtlie, he proteſted that his commiſſion was not to preiudice anie perſon, for he came not to deſtroie, but to build; he came to reconcile, and not to condemne; he came not to compell, but to call againe; he came not to call anie thing in queſtion alreadie doone: but his commiſſion was of grace and clemencie to all ſuch as would receiue it. For touching all matters paſt, and doone, they ſhould be caſt into the ſea of forgetfulneſſe, and neuer more to bée thought vpon.

He ſheweth the meanes of procuring the foreſaid reconciliation.

7 Finallie (ſaid he) the meane whereby to receiue this high benefit, is firſt to reuoke and repeale all ſuch lawes as are impediments, blocks and barres to this moſt gratious reconciliation. For like as he himſelfe had no place to ſpeake there, before ſuch lawes were abrogated and remooued as ſtood in his waie: euen ſo they could not receiue the grace offered from the ſée apoſtolike, vntill theſe like impediments of lawes made againſt the ſée of Rome, were vtterlie aboliſhed and repealed. And ſo in concluſion aduertiſed them, firſt for the glorie of God, and next for the conſeruation and ſuertie of the wealth and quietneſſe of the whole realme, that they ſhould earneſtlie trauell therein, and that then he would make them participants of the benefit of his commiſſion.

The next daie the whole court of parlement drew out the forme of a ſupplication, and the next daie following, when the king, the quéene, and the cardinall, with all the nobles and commons were aſſembled againe in the great chamber of the White hall aforeſaid, the biſhop of Winchester there ſhewed what the parlement had determined concerning the cardinals requeſt, and then offered to the king and quéene the ſaid ſupplication, to be by them pꝛeſented to the cardinall. Wherein would be noted the readineſſe of the aſſemblie to ſubmit themſelues to antichꝛiſtian ſlauerie: but omitting to giue iudgement, marke their ſupplication, the copie whereof followeth.

A ſupplication exhibited to cardinall Poole by the parlement.

WE the loꝛds ſpirituall and tempoꝛall, and commons in this pꝛeſent parlement aſſembled, repꝛeſenting the whole bodie of the realme of England and dominions of the ſame, in the name of our ſelues particularlie, and alſo of the ſaid bodie vniuerſallie, offer this our moſt humble ſupplication to your maieſties, to this end and effect; that the ſame by your gratious interceſſion and meane maie be exhibited to the moſt reuerend father in God the loꝛd cardinall Poole legat, ſent ſpeciallie hither from our moſt holie father pope Julie the third, and the ſee apoſtolike of Rome. Wherin we doo declare our ſelues verie ſoꝛie and repentant of the long ſchiſme and diſobedience happening in this realme, and the dominions of the ſame, againſt the ſee apoſtolike, either by making, agreeing, oꝛ executing of anie lawes, oꝛdinances oꝛ commandements againſt the pꝛimaſie of the ſame ſee, oꝛ otherwiſe dooing oꝛ ſpeaking that might impugne oꝛ pꝛeiudice the ſame. Offering our ſelues, and pꝛomiſing by this our ſupplication, that foꝛ a token & knowledge of our ſaid repentance, we be and ſhall be euer readie, vnder and with the authoꝛities of your maieſties, to the vttermoſt of our power, to doo that ſhall lie in vs, foꝛ the abꝛogation and repealing of all the ſaid lawes and oꝛdinances, made and enacted to the pꝛeiudice of the ſee apoſtolike, as well foꝛ our ſelues as foꝛ the whole bodie whome we repꝛeſent. Wherevpon we humblie beſeech your maieſties, as perſons vndefiled in offenſe of his bodie towards the ſaid ſee, which neuertheleſſe God by his pꝛouidence hath made ſubiect to you, ſo to ſet foꝛth this our humble ſute, as we the rather by your interceſſion maie obteine from the ſee apoſtolike, by the ſaid moſt reuerend father, as well particularlie as generallie, abſolution, releaſe, and diſcharge from all dangers of ſuch cenſures and ſentences as by the lawes of the church we be fallen into. And that we maie as childꝛen repentant, be receiued into the boſome and vnitie of Chꝛiſts church: ſo as this noble realme, with all the members thereof, maie in this vnitie & perfect obedience to the ſee apoſtolike, and popes foꝛ the time being, ſerue God and your maieſties to the furtherance and aduancement of his honour and gloꝛie, Amen.

This ſupplication was exhibited to the king and queene.

Pꝛomiſe in ſigne of repentance to make full amends by being recōciled to the catholike church

This ſupplication being firſt openlie read, the ſame was by the chancelloꝛ deliuered to the king and queene, with petition to them, to exhibit the ſame to the loꝛd cardinall. And the king and queene riſing out of their ſeats, and dooing reuerence to the cardinall, did deliuer the ſame vnto him. The cardinall perceiuing the effect thereof to anſwer to his expectation, did receiue it moſt gladlie at their maieſties hands. And then, after that hee had in few woꝛds giuen thanks vnto God, and declared what great cauſe hee had to reioiſe aboue all others, that his comming from Rome into England had taken ſuch moſt happie ſucceſſe; then he cauſed his commiſſion to bee read (wherby it might appeare he had authoꝛitie from the pope to abſolue them) which commiſſion was verie long and large. And that being doone, and all the parlement on their knees, this cardinall, by the popes authoꝛitie, gaue them abſolution in maner following.

The king and queene exhibit the ſupplicatiō to Poole the pꝛoud pꝛelat.

An abſolution pronounced by cardinall Poole to the parlement houſe.

OUr loꝛd Jeſus Chꝛiſt, which with his moſt pꝛetious bloud hath redeemed and waſhed vs from all our ſins and iniquities, that he might purchaſe vnto himſelfe a gloꝛious ſpouſe without ſpot oꝛ wꝛinkle, and whom the father hath appointed head ouer all his church; he by his mercie abſolue you. And we by the apoſtolike authoꝛitie giuen vnto vs by the moſt holie loꝛd pope Julius the third (his vicegerent in earth) doo abſolue and deliuer you, and euerie of you, with the whole realme, and the dominions thereof, from all hereſie and ſchiſme, and from all and euerie iudgements, cenſures and paines foꝛ that cauſe incurred. And alſo wee doo reſtoꝛe you againe to the vnitie of our mother the holie church, as in our letters of commiſſion moꝛe plainelie ſhall appeare.

Pope Julie the third gaue cardinall Poole his authoꝛitie apoſtolike.

After this generall abſolution receiued, the king and the queene, and all the loꝛds with the reſt, went into the kings chappell, and there ſang Te Deum with great ioy and gladneſſe, foꝛ this new reconciliation. The repoꝛt whereof with great ſpeed flew to Rome, as well by the French kings letters, as alſo by the cardinals. Wherevpon the pope cauſed ſolemne pꝛoceſſions to be made in Rome, namelie one, wherein he himſelfe with all his cardinals were pꝛeſent, paſſing with as great ſolemnitie and pompe as might be, giuing thanks to God with great ioy, foꝛ the conuerſion of England to his church. At what time alſo he not a little commended the diligence of cardinall Poole, and the deuotion of the king and queene. And on Chꝛiſtmas euen next following, he ſet foꝛth by his buls a generall pardon to all ſuch as did reioiſe in the ſame reconciliation.

Solemne pꝛoceſſion at Rome foꝛ the new reconcilement of England to the catholike church.

The eight and twentith of Nouember next following, it was commonlie repoꝛted, that the queene was quicke with child, & therefoꝛe commandement was giuen by Edmund Bonner then biſhop of London (and as it was ſaid not without the commandement of the councell) that there ſhould be made in moſt ſolemne manner one generall pꝛoceſſion in London, wherein the maioꝛ, and all the companies of the citie were in their liueries, at whoſe returne to the church of Pauls, there was ſong verie ſolemnlie Te Deum foꝛ ioy therof. The ſame daie at this pꝛoceſſion was pꝛeſent ten biſhops with all the pꝛebendaries of Paules. The copie of the councels letter implieng the afoꝛeſaid commandement touching the generall pꝛoceſſion here followeth, Ad perpetuam rei memoriam.

A repoꝛt that the queene was with child.

A copie of a letter ſent from the councell vnto Edmund Bonner biſhop of London, concerning queene Marie conceiued with child.

AFter our hartie commendations vnto your good loꝛdſhip. Whereas it hath pleaſed almightie God amongſt other his infinit benefits of late moſt gratiouſlie powꝛed vpon vs and this whole realme, to extend his benediction vpon the queens maieſtie in ſuch ſoꝛt, as ſhe is conceiued & quicke of child; wherby (hir maieſtie being our naturall liege ladie, queene and vndoubted inheritoꝛ of this imperiall crowne) good hope of certeine ſucceſſion in the crowne is giuen vnto vs, and conſequentlie, the great calamities, which (for want of ſuch ſucceſſion might otherwiſe haue fallen vpon vs & our poſteritie) ſhall by Gods grace be well auoided, if we thankefullie acknowledge this benefit of almightie God, indeuoring our ſelues with earneſt repentance to thanke, honor, & ſerue him as we be moſt bounden. Theſe be not onelie to aduertiſe you of theſe good news, to be by you publiſhed in all places within your dioces; but alſo to praie and require you, that both your ſelfe doo giue God thanks with vs for this his eſpeciall grace, and alſo giue order that thanks maie be openlie giuen by ſinging of Te Deum in all the churches within your ſaid dioces; and that likewiſe all prieſts and other eccleſiaſticall miniſters, in their maſſes and other diuine ſeruices, may continuallie praie to almightie God, ſo to extend his holie hand ouer his maieſtie, the kings highneſſe and this whole realme, as this thing being by his omnipotent power gratiouſlie thus begun, may by the ſame be well continued and brought to good effect, to the glorie of his name. Whereunto albeit we doubt not ye would of your ſelfe haue had ſpeciall regard without theſe our letters: yet for the earneſt deſire we haue to haue this thing doone out of hand, & diligentlie continued, we haue alſo written theſe our letters, to put you in remembrance: & ſo bid your lordſhip moſt hartilie well to fare. Upon this letter of the councels ſent to biſhop Bonner (ſignifieng the good news of quéene Marie to be not onelie conceiued, but alſo quicke with child, which was in the moneth of Nouember, the eight and twentith daie) it is out of count what great talke began at this time to riſe in euerie mans mouth, with buſie preparation and much adoo, eſpeciallie among ſuch as ſéemed in England to carrie Spaniſh hearts in Engliſh bodies. In number of whome here is not to be forgotten, nor defrauded of his condigne commendation for his woorthie affection toward his prince and hir iſſue, one ſir Richard Southwell, who being the ſame time in the parlement houſe, when as the lords were occupied in other affaires and matters of importance, ſuddenlie ſtarting vp for fulneſſe of ioy, burſt out in theſe words following: Tuſh my maiſters (quoth he) what talke ye of theſe matters? I would haue you take ſome order for our yoong maiſter that is now comming into the world apace, leaſt he find vs vnprouided, &c. By the which words both of him, and alſo by the foreſaid letters of the councell, and the common talke abroad, it may appeare what an aſſured opinion was then conceiued in mens heads of quéene Marie, to be conceiued and quicke with child. In ſomuch that at the ſame time, and in the ſame parlement, there was eftſoones a bill exhibited, and an act made vpon the ſame, the words whereof for the more euidence, I thought here to exemplificat.

The words of ſir Richard Southwell in the parlement houſe for his yoong maiſter.

The words of the act.

Albeit we the lords ſpirituall & temporall, & the commons in this preſent parlement aſſembled, haue firme hope & confidence in the goodnes of almightie God, that like as he hath hitherto miraculouſlie preſerued the quéenes maieſtie from manie great imminent perils and dangers; euen ſo he will of his infinit goodneſſe giue hir highneſſe ſtrength, the rather by our continuall praiers to paſſe well the danger of deliuerance of child, wherewith it hath pleaſed him (to all our great comforts) to bleſſe hir: yet for ſo much as all things of this world be vncerteine, and hauing before our eies the dolorous experience of this inconſtant gouernment during the time of the reigne of the late king Edward the ſixt, doo plainlie ſée the manifold inconueniences, great dangers and perils that maie inſue to this whole realme, if foreſight be not vſed to preuent all euill chances, if they ſhould happen. For the eſchewing hereof, we the lords ſpirituall and temporall, & the commons in this preſent parlement aſſembled; for and in conſideration of a moſt ſpeciall truſt and confidence that we haue and repoſe in the kings maieſtie, for and concerning the politike gouernment, order, and adminiſtration of this realme in the time of the yoong yéeres of the iſſue or iſſues of hir maieſties bodie to be borne, if it ſhould pleaſe God to call the quéenes highneſſe out of this preſent life, during the tender yeares of ſuch iſſue or iſſues (which God forbid) according to ſuch order & maner as hereafter in this preſent act his highneſſe moſt gratious pleaſure is, ſhould be declared and ſet forth, haue made our humble ſute by the aſſent of the quéens highneſſe, that his maieſtie would vouchſafe to accept & take vpon him the rule, order, education & gouernment of the ſaid iſſue or iſſues to be borne as is aforeſaid, vpon which our ſute being of his ſaid maieſtie moſt gratiouſlie accepted, it hath pleaſed his highnes, not onlie to declare, that like as for the moſt part his maieſtie verely truſteth that almightie God (who hath hitherto preſerued the quéens maieſtie) to giue this realme ſo good an hope of certeine ſucceſſion in the blood roiall of the ſame realm, will aſſiſt hir highnes with his graces and benedictions to ſée the fruit of hir bodie well brought forth, liue and able to gouerne (whereof neither all this realme, ne all the world beſides, ſhould or could receiue more comfort than his maieſtie ſhould & would) yet if ſuch chance ſhould happen, his maieſtie at our humble deſires is pleaſed & contented not onlie to accept & take vpon him the cure and charge of the education, rule, order, and gouernment of ſuch iſſues, as of this moſt happie mariage ſhall be borne betwéene the quéenes highnes and him: but alſo during the time of ſuch gouernment, would by all waies & meanes ſtudie, trauell and imploie himſelfe to aduance the weale, both publike & priuat, of this realme & dominions thereto belonging, according to the ſaid truſt in his maieſtie repoſed, with no leſſe good will & affection than if his highnes had béene naturallie borne among vs. In conſideration whereof, be it enacted by the king & the quéens moſt excellent maieſties, by aſſent of the lords ſpirituall and temporall, & the commons in this preſent parlement aſſembled, and by the authoritie of the ſame, &c: as it is to be ſéene in the act more at large ratified and confirmed at the ſame parlement, to the ſame intent and purpoſe.

Order taken by parlement for quéene Maries child.

Truſt diſappointed.

Thus much out of the act and ſtatute I thought to rehearſe, to the intent the reader maie vnderſtand, not ſo much how parlements maie ſometimes be deceiued (as by this child of quéene Marie may appéere) as rather what cauſe we Engliſhmen haue to render moſt earneſt thanks vnto almightie God, who ſo mercifullie againſt the opinion, expectation, and working of our aduerſaries, hath helped and deliuered vs in this caſe: which otherwiſe might haue opened ſuch a window to the Spaniards, to haue entred and repleniſhed this land, that peraduenture by this time Engliſhmen ſhould haue inioied no great quiet in their owne countrie. The Lord therefore make vs

Parlements maie be deceiued.

perpetuallie mindfull of his benefits, Amen.

The praiers of the papiſts of what litle effect they are with God.

Thus we ſée then how man doth purpoſe, but God diſpoſeth as pleaſeth him. For all this great labor, prouiſion, and order taken in the parlement houſe for their yoong maiſter long looked for, comming ſo ſurelie into the world; in the end appéered neither yoong maiſter nor yoong maiſtreſſe that anie man yet to this daie can heare of. Furthermore as the labor of the laie ſort was herein deluded, ſo no leſſe ridiculous it was to behold what little effect the praiers of the popes churchmen had with almightie God, who trauelled no leſſe with their proceſſions, maſſes, and collects, for the happie deliuerance of this yoong maiſter to come, as here followeth to be ſéene.

A praier made by doctor Weſton deane of Weſtminſter, dailie to be ſaid for the queenes deliuerance.

A praier for quéene Marie and hir child, turned out of Latine into Engliſh.

O Moſt righteous Lord God, which for the offenſe of the firſt woman, haſt threatned vnto all women a common, ſharpe, and ineuitable malediction, and haſt inioined them that they ſhould conceiue in ſinne; and being conceiued, ſhould be ſubiect to manie and gréeuous torments, and finallie be deliuered with the danger and ieopardie of their life: we beſéech thée for thine excéeding great goodneſſe and botomleſſe mercie, to mitigate the ſtrictnes of that law. Aſſwage thine anger for a while, and cheriſh in the boſome of thy fauor and mercie our moſt gratious quéene Marie, being now at the point of hir deliuerance. So helpe hir, that without danger of hir life, ſhe maie ouercome the ſorow, and in due ſeaſon bring forth a child, in bodie beautifull and comelie, in mind noble and valiant. So that afterward ſhe forgetting the trouble, maie with ioie, laud and praiſe the bountifulneſſe of thy mercie; and togither with vs, praiſe and bleſſe both thée and thy holie name world without end. This (O Lord) we deſire thée, we beſéech thée, and moſt hartilie craue of thée. Heare vs (O Lord) and grant vs our petition. Let not the enimies of thy faith and of thy church ſaie; Where is their God?

A ſolemne praier made for king Philip and queene Maries child, that it maie be a male child, welfauored and wittie, &c.

A deuout praier made by the catholikes for quéene Marie being great and quicke with child.

O Moſt mightie Lord God, which regardeſt the praier of the humble, and deſpiſeſt not their requeſt, bow downe from thine high habitation of the heauens, the eies of thy mercie vnto vs wretched ſinners, bowing the knées of our harts, and with manie and déepe ſighs bewailing our ſinnes and offenſes humblie with eies intent, and hands diſplaied, praieng and beſéeching thée, with the ſhield of thy protection, to defend Marie thy ſeruant and our quéene, who hath none other helper but thée, and whome through thy grace thou haſt willed to be conceiued with child; and at the time of hir trauell gratiouſlie with the helpe of thy right hand deliuer hir, and from all danger with the child in hir conceiued, mercifullie preſerue. It hath ſéemed good in thy ſight (mercifull father) by thy ſeruant Marie to worke theſe woonders, that is to ſaie; in hir hands to vanquiſh and ouerthrow the ſtout enimie, and to deliuer vs thy people out of the hands of * heretikes, infidels, enimies to thée, and to the croſſe of thy beloued ſonne Ieſus Chriſt, that of thy ſeruant thou mighteſt ſpeake in farre countries. Therefore for theſe woonderfull workes which thou dooeſt to thy ſeruants, thou art magnified Lord God for euer, & we thy people bleſſe thée the God of heauen, which haſt wrought vpon vs this great mercie, and haſt excluded from vs the heretike, the enimie of truth, and the perſecutor of thy church. We know, we know that we haue grieuouſlie (Lord) ſinned, that we haue béene deceiued by vanitie, and that we haue forſaken thée our God. Our iniquities be multiplied on our head, and our ſinnes be increaſed vp to heauen, and we our ſelues haue offended, and our princes and our prieſts: for theſe our ſinnes haue deſerued an hypocrit to our prince, our ſinnes haue deſerued a tyrant to our gouernor that ſhould bring our life vnto bitterneſſe. We be not worthie to haue ſo gentle and mercifull a quéene, ſo godlie a ruler, and finallie ſo vertuous a prince. At the verie beginning of whoſe reigne, a new light, as it were of Gods religion, ſéemed to vs for to ſpring and ariſe. The Iews did bleſſe the widow Iudith with one voice; ſaieng: Thou art the glorie of Ieruſalem, thou art the ioie of Iſraell, thou art the honor of our people, for that thou haſt loued chaſtitie, and thou ſhalt be bleſſed for euer.

* The papiſts call the proteſtants heretikes and enimies to the croſſe of Chriſt, euen as Achab called Elias the diſturber of Iſraell, when he was onelie the diſturber himſelfe.

Quéene Marie compared of the papiſts to quéene Iudith.

And we the Engliſh people with one agréeable conſent doo crie: Thou Marie art the glorie of England, our ioie, the honour of thy people, for that thou haſt imbraced chaſtitie: thine hart is ſtrengthened, for the hand of our Lord hath comforted thée, and therefore thou ſhalt be bleſſed for euer. But bow downe, O moſt mercifull father thine eare, and open thine eies, and behold our affliction, and our humble confeſſion. Thou knoweſt Lord, that againſt Philip, not by humane, but by thy ordinance our king, and againſt thy ſeruant Marie by thy prouidence our quéene, the reſtorers and mainteiners of thy teſtament, and of the faith and moſt conſtant defenders of thy church; thou knoweſt (I ſaie) that againſt theſe our two gouernors (the enimies of thy holie teſtament, and of the church thy ſpouſe) be moſt ranke rebels, and ſpitefull murmurers, walking after their luſts, whoſe mouth ſpeaketh words of pride, to the end they maie ſet vp the kingdome of heretikes and ſchiſmatikes. By the power of their hands they would change thy promiſes, and deſtroie thine inheritance, and ſtop and ſhut vp the mouths of them that praiſe thée, and extinguiſh the glorie of thy catholike church and altar.

Marke how forgetting his praier he falleth to the praiſing of quéen Marie.

The teſtament ſetteth vp onelie the glorie of Chriſt.

It is manifeſt and plaine, how manie contentions, how manie conſpiracies & ſeditions, how great warres, what tumults, how manie and how great troubleſome vexations, how manie hereſies and ſchiſmes (for theſe be the moſt readie deuiſes and euident tokens of heretikes) for our ſinnes doo hang ouer vs, if thy ſeruant be taken from this life: for we acknowledge that our Lord is omnipotent, who hath pitched his dwelling place in the middeſt of his people, to the intent to deliuer vs out of the hands of our enimies. Turne therefore thy countenance vnto vs, ſhew vnto vs, O Lord, thy face. Puniſh vs for our ſinnes according to thy will and pleaſure, onelie now deliuer vs. We bowing the knées of our heart, beſéech thée that thou wilt not reſerue vnto vs puniſhment for euer, and we ſhall praiſe thée, all the daies of our life. Heare our crie, and the praier of thy people, and open to them the treaſure of thy mercie, thy gratious fauour, the ſpring of liuelie water. Thou that haſt begun, make in the hand of thy ſeruant a perfect worke. Suffer not, we praie thée, the faithleſſe rebels to ſaie of thy ſeruant and hir councellors, that they haue deuiſed matters which they can not performe. And grant vnto thy ſeruant an happie and an eaſie trauell. For it is not impoſſible to thy power, nor indecent to thy iuſtice, nor vnwoonted vnto thy mercie.

If the changing of Gods promiſes, deſtroieng his inheritance, ſtopping the mouths of Gods people if contentiõs, warres, and ſchiſmes be tokens of heretikes, who ſo great heretikes as the papiſts be?

Crie vp lowder you prieſts peraduenture your god is a ſléepe.

It is well knowne vnto vs, how maruellouſlie thou

The Lord gaue a promiſe to Sara and Eliſabeth: ſo did he not to queene Marie.

thou diddeſt worke in Sara of the age of foureſcore and ten yeares, and in Eliſabeth the barren, and alſo farre ſtriken in age: for thy counſell is not in the power of men. Thou Lord that art the ſearcher of hearts and thoughts, thou knoweſt that thy ſeruant neuer luſted after man, neuer gaue hir ſelfe to wanton companie, nor made hir ſelfe partaker with them that walke in lightneſſe: but ſhe conſented to take an huſband with thy feare, and not with hir luſt. Thou knoweſt that thy ſeruant tooke an huſband, not for carnall pleaſure, but onelie for the deſire and loue of poſteritie, wherein thy name might be bleſſed for euer and euer. Giue therefore vnto thy ſeruants Philip our king, & Marie our queene, a male iſſue, which maie ſit in the ſeat of thy kingdome. Giue vnto our queene thy ſeruant, a little infant in faſhion and bodie comelie and beautifull, in pregnant wit notable and excellent.

It is not beſt ſuch one to be granted vnto you, for being like Abraham Ioſeph, Moſes, and Salomon, he maie chance ſmell out your corrupt doctrine, and to deteſt your bloudie tyrannie, &c.

Grant the ſame to be in obedience like Abraham, in hoſpitalitie like Lot, in chaſtitie and brotherlie loue like Ioſeph, in meekeneſſe and mildneſſe like Moſes, in ſtrength and valiantneſſe like Samſon. Let him be found faithfull as Dauid after thy heart. Let him be wiſe among kings as the moſt wiſe Salomon. Let him be like Iob, a ſimple and an vpright man, fearing God and eſchewing euill. Let him finallie be garniſhed with the comelineſſe of all vertuous conditions, and in the ſame let him wax old and liue, that he maie ſee his childrens children to the third and fourth generation. And giue to our ſouereigne lord and ladie, king Philip and queene Marie, thy bleſſing and long life vpon earth. And grant that of them maie come kings and queenes which maie ſtedfaſtlie continue in faith, loue, and holineſſe. And bleſſed be their ſeed of our God, that all nations maie know thou art onelie God in all the earth, which art bleſſed for euer and euer, Amen.

An other praier for queene Marie, and hir conceiued child.

An other praier for the ſame.

O Almightie father, which diddeſt ſanctifie the bleſſed virgine and mother of Marie in hir conception, & in the birth of Chriſt our ſauiour, thy onelie ſonne; alſo by thy omnipotent power diddeſt ſafelie deliuer the prophet Ionas out of the whales bellie: defend O Lord we beſeech thee, thy ſeruant Marie our queene, with child conceiued, and ſo viſit hir in and with thy godlie gift of health, that not onelie the child thy creature within hir conteined, maie ioifullie come from hir into this world, and receiue the bleſſed ſacraments of baptiſme and confirmation, inioieng therewith dailie increaſe of all princelie and gratious gifts both of bodie and ſoule; but that alſo ſhe, the mother, through thy ſpeciall grace and mercie, maie in time of hir trauell auoid all exceſſiue dolour and paine, and abide perfect and ſure from all perill and danger of death, with long and proſperous life, through Chriſt our Lord, Amen. ¶ And thus much ſhall ſuffice touching this great adoo about queene Marie and hir babe.]

Cardinall Poole commeth to Pauls croſſe with great pompe.

Certeine points of Stephã Gardiners ſermon.

The ſecond daie of December being ſundaie, cardinall Poole came to Pauls church in London with great pompe, hauing before him a croſſe, two pillers and two pollaxes of ſiluer, and was there ſolemnlie receiued by the biſhop of Wincheſter, chancellor of England, who met him with proceſſion. And ſhortlie after, king Philip came from Weſtminſter by land, being accompanied with a great number of his nobles. And the ſame daie, the biſhop of Wincheſter preached at Pauls croſſe, in the which ſermon he decl[illegible], that the king and queene had reſtored the pope to his right of primaſie; & that the three eſtates aſſembled in parlement, repreſenting the whole bodie of the realme, had ſubmitted themſelues to his holineſſe, and to his ſucceſſors for euer. And in the ſame alſo, he greatlie praiſed the cardinall, and ſet forth the paſſing high authoritie that he had from the ſee of Rome, with much other glorious matter, in the commendation of the church of Rome, which he called the ſee apoſtolike. This ſermon being ended, the king and the cardinall riding togither, returned to White hall, and the king had his ſword borne before him, and the cardinall had onelie his croſſe, and no more.

Prince of Piemount commeth into England.

The ſeauen and twentith daie of the ſaid moneth, Emanuell Philibert earle of Sauoie and prince of Piemount came into England, accompanied with diuerſe other lords and gentlemen ſtrangers, who were receiued at Graueſend by the earle of Bedford lord priuie ſeale, and conueied by water through London bridge to White hall, where the king and queene then laie. ¶ On the ninth of Ianuarie next following, the prince of Orange was in like maner receiued at Graueſend, and from thence conueied to the court, being at White hall. The twelfth of Ianuarie, the ſaid prince of Orange, with other lords, was conducted by the lord chamberlein to the tower of London, where was ſhewed vnto him the ordinance, artillerie, munitions, and armorie, with the mint, &c: and ſo was brought into the white tower, from whence, as he returned through the long gallerie, all the priſoners ſaluted him: vnto whome the prince ſaid, he was ſorie for their captiuitie, and truſted the king and queene would be good vnto them. At his departing from the tower, he gaue the gunners ten peeces of Flemmiſh gold at fiue ſhillings the peece, and the warders other ten peeces, as a reward.]

Fine of Throckmortons iurie releaſed.

Vpon wedneſdaie the 12 of December, fiue of the eight men which laie in the Fleet, that had paſſed vpon ſir Nicholas Throckmortons triall, were diſcharged and ſet at libertie vpon their fines paid, which was two hundred and twentie pounds a peece. The other three put vp a ſupplication, therein declaring their goods did not amount to the ſumme of that which they were appointed to paie: and ſo vpon that declaration, paieng three ſcore pounds a peece, they were deliuered out of priſon on ſaint Thomas daie before Chriſtmas, being the one & twentith of December. The two and twentith of the ſame moneth, the parlement (which began the two and twentith of Nouember before) was diſſolued, wherein among other acts paſſed there, the ſtatute Ex officio, and other lawes made for puniſhment of hereſies were reuiued. But chiefelie, the popes moſt liberall bull of diſpenſation of abbeie land was there confirmed, much to the contentation of manie, who not without cauſe ſuſpected by this new vnion, to loſe ſome peece of their late purchaſe. ¶ On new yeares daie at night was a great tumult betweene Spaniards and Engliſhmen at Weſtminſter, whereof was like to haue inſued great miſchiefe, through a Spaniſh frier which got into the church and roong alarum. The occaſion was about two whores which were in the cloiſter of Weſtminſter with a ſort of Spaniards, whereof whileſt ſome plaied the knaues with them, other ſome did keepe the entrie of the cloiſter with dags and harneſſe. In the meane time certeine of the deanes men came into the cloiſter, and the Spaniards diſcharged their dags at them, and hurt ſome of them. By and by the noiſe of this dooing came into the ſtreets, ſo that the whole towne was vp almoſt, but neuer a ſtroke was ſtricken. Notwithſtanding, the noise of this dooing with the deans men, and alſo the ringing of the alarum made much Upon fridaie the eightéenth of Ianuarie, all the councell, by name, the lord chancellor, the biſhop of Elie, the lord treaſuror, the earle of Shrewesburie, the comptrollor of the quéenes houſe, ſecretarie Bourne, and ſir Richard Southwell maſter of the ordinance and armorie, went to the tower, and there the ſame daie diſcharged and ſet at libertie all the priſoners of the tower, or the more part of them, namelie the archbiſhop of Yorke, the late duke of Northumberlands ſonnes, the lords Ambroſe, Robert, and Henrie; alſo, ſir Andrew Dudleie, ſir Iames Croftes, ſir Nicholas Throckmorton, ſir Iohn Rogers, ſir Nicholas Arnold, ſir George Harper, ſir Edward Warner, ſir William Sentlow, ſir Gawen Carew, William Gibbes eſquier, Cutbert Uaughan, and diuerſe others.

Trouble and perſecution for religion.

Moreouer, about this ſeaſon diuerſe learned men being apprehended, and in priſon for matters of religion, were brought before the biſhops of Wincheſter and London, and other the biſhops and commiſſioners appointed therefore: who vpon the conſtant ſtanding of the ſaid learned men in their opinions, which they had taken vpon them to mainteine, as grounded vpon the true word of God, as they proteſted, procéeded in iudgement againſt them, and ſo diuerſe of them were burned at London in Smithfield, and in diuerſe other places. Naie not onelie by fire but by other torments were the good chriſtians perſecuted, whoſe zeale was hot in religion and defiance of the pope: inſomuch that then he was counted Gods enimie, which tooke not the pope for the friend of Chriſt (whome he hateth with hoſtilitie) as C.O. noteth verie trulie in his Eliſabetha, ſaieng:

——— nam creditur hoſtis
Eſſe Dei, papam ſi quis pius aſſerit hoſtem
Eſſe Dei, veros Chriſti qui tollit honores.

Ambaſſadors out of England to Rome.

William Fetherſtone, alias Conſtable a boie, nameth himſelfe king Edward the ſixt.

In Februarie next following, doctor Thirlebie biſhop of Elie, and Anthonie lord Montacute, with a verie honorable traine of gentlemen and others, rode foorth of the citie of London towards Rome as ambaſſadors ſent from the king and quéene, to confirme this new reconciliation to the pope. A yoong ſtripling, whoſe name was William Fetherſtone, a millers ſonne, about the age of eightéene yeares, named and bruted himſelfe to be king Edward the ſixt, whereof when the quéene and the councell heard, they cauſed with all diligence inquirie to be made for him, ſo that he was apprehended in Southworke, or (as other haue) at Eltham in Kent the tenth of Maie, and brought before the councell at Hampton court, and there examined. And it was demanded of him why he ſo named himſelfe? To which he counterfetting a maner of ſimplicitie, or rather frenſie, would make no direct anſwer, but praid pardon; for he wiſt not what he ſaid: affirming further, that he was counſelled ſo to ſaie, and to take vpon him the name, whereof he accuſed certeine perſons: but his talke was not found true, wherefore he was committed to the Marſhalſeie, as a lunatike foole.

On the eight and twentith daie of Maie next following, the aforeſaid counterfet prince was brought in a cart from the Marſhalſeie thorough the citie of London, with a paper ouer his head, wherein was written, that he named himſelfe king Edward. And from thenſe was conueied to Weſtminſter, being led round about the hall, and ſhewed to all the people there: and afterward he was taken out of the cart and ſtripped, and then whipped round about the palace at the ſame carts taile, and then thorough Weſtminſter into Smithfield, and then baniſhed into the north, in which countrie he was borne, and had béene ſometime lackie to ſir Peter Mewtas, and without more puniſhment was diſcharged, and ſet at libertie. But the next yeare following, for that he had ſpred abroad that king Edward was aliue, and that he had ſpoken with him, he was againe apprehended, and arreigned of high treaſon, whereof being condemned, he ſhortlie after was drawne vnto Tiburne, and there hanged and quartered the thirtéenth of March. ¶ Here, as in a fit and conuenient place, the obſeruation of the daie and moneth offering no leſſe, it is not amiſſe to ſet downe the ſpéech of quéene Marie vttered to ſundrie of hir lords, touching a motion which no doubt certeine popiſh prelats had put into hir mind; the effect whereof followeth as I find it in maſter Fox.

Abr.Fl.ex Ioh. Foxi martyrologio.

Before I paſſe this moneth of March (ſaith he) I cannot but leaue a little memorandum of the words or conſultation of quéene Marie, vſed to certeine of the councell, the eight & twentith daie of the ſaid moneth of March, touching the reſtoring againe of the abbeie lands. Who after ſhe had called vnto hir preſence foure of hir priuie councell, the daie and moneth aforeſaid: the names of which councellors were theſe; William lord marqueſſe of Wincheſter high treaſuror of England, ſir Robert Rocheſter knight, the quéenes comptrollor, ſir William Peter knight, ſecretarie, ſir Francis Inglefield knight, maſter of wards; the ſaid quéene Marie inferred theſe words: the principall effect & ſumme whereof here followeth.

The names of the councellors called before quéene Marie.

The effect of quéene Maries words touching abbeie lands to be reſtored.

The quéene taketh a conſcience in keeping abbeie lands.

The quéene ſurrendreth from hir ſelfe the poſſeſſiõ of abbeie lands.

You are here of our councell, and we haue willed you to be called to vs, to the intent yée might heare of me my conſcience, and the reſolution of my mind, concerning the lands and poſſeſſions as well of monaſteries, as other churches whatſoeuer being now preſentlie in my poſſeſſion. Firſt, I doo conſider, that the ſaid lands were taken awaie from the churches aforeſaid, in time of ſchiſme, and that by vnlawfull means, ſuch as are contrarie both to the law of God and of the church. For the which cauſe my conſcience dooth not ſuffer me to deteine them: and therefore I here expreſſelie refuſe either to claime or to reteine the ſaid lands for mine: but with all my heart fréelie and willinglie without all paction or condition, here and before God I doo ſurrender and relinquiſh the ſaid lands and poſſeſſions or inheritances whatſoeuer, & doo renounce the ſame with this mind and purpoſe, that order and diſpoſition thereof may be taken as ſhall ſéeme beſt liking to our moſt holie lord the pope, or elſe his legat the lord cardinall, to the honour of God and wealth of this our realme.

Premiſſe for reſtitution of abbeie lands.

And albeit you may obiect to me againe, that conſidering the ſtate of my kingdome, the dignitie thereof, and my crowne imperiall cannot be honorablie mainteined and furniſhed without the poſſeſſions aforeſaid: yet notwithſtanding I ſet more by the ſaluation of my ſoule, than by ten kingdoms: and therefore the ſaid poſſeſſions I vtterlie refuſe here to hold after that ſort and title, and giue moſt hartie thanks to almightie God, which hath giuen me an huſband likewiſe minded, with no leſſe good affection in this behalfe, than I am my ſelfe. Wherefore I charge and command, that my chancellor (with whom I haue conferred my mind in this matter before) and you foure, to morrow together doo reſort to the moſt reuerend lord legat, and doo ſignifie to him the premiſſes in my name, & giue your attendance vpon him for the more full declaration of the ſtate of my kingdome, and of the foreſaid poſſeſſions accordinglie, as you your ſelues doo vnderſtand the matter, and can informe him in the ſame. This charge (as the ſequele gaue proofe) was followed with no leſſe diligence of the lords, than it was impoſed with willingnes vpon them by the quéene: inſomuch that ſhortlie after (as anon you ſhall heare) ſhe performed hir promiſe to the pith.

But to let this matter paſſe, till due time & place require a declaration of the concluſion thereof; I am héere (ſaith maſter Fox, as occaſion ſerueth) to intreat of pope Iulius death, for ſo much as he made his end about the latter end of this foreſaid moneth of March. Concerning the déeds and acts of which pope, to make a full declaration, it were not ſo much tedious to the reader, as horrible to all good eares. Vnder this Iulius floriſhed the archbiſhop of Beneuentanus, a Florentine, named Iohannes a Caſa, deane of the popes chamber, and chéefe legat to the Venetians: who well declaring the fruit of that filthie ſée, ſo farre forgat both honeſtie and nature, that he ſhamed not onelie to plaie the filthie Sodomite himſelfe, and to boaſt openlie of the ſame: but alſo tooke vpon him moſt impudentlie in Italian metre, to all mens eares, to ſet forth the praiſe and commendation of that beaſtlie iniquitie, ſaieng that he himſelfe neuer vſed other: and this booke was printed at Venice, by one Troianus Nauus. And yet the pope could ſuffer this ſo great iniquitie and ſhameleſſe beaſtlineſſe, euen vnder his noſe in his owne chamber, which could not abide the true doctrine of Chriſt in chriſtian bookes.

Note here what an holie catholike church this is Amongſt other pranks and déeds of this foreſaid pope, in his Iubilée, and in the ſynod of Trent, and in confirming of the idoll of Lauretane, this is alſo reported of him in his life, that he delighted greatlie in porke fleſh and peacocks. Vpon a time when he was admoniſhed of his phyſician to abſteine from all ſwines fleſh, for that it was noiſome for his gout, and yet would not follow his counſell: the phyſician afterward gaue warning to his ſteward or orderer of his diet, that he ſhould ſet no more porke fleſh before him. Wherevpon when the pope perceiued the ſaid porke fleſh to be lacking in his accuſtomed ſeruice; Where (ſaid he) is my porke? And when his ſteward had anſwered that his phyſician had forbidden anie porke to be ſerued: then the pope burſting out in great rage, ſaid in theſe words; Bring me, ſaid he, my porke fleſh Al diſpetto di Dio: that is to ſaie in Engliſh, In the deſpight of God.

A porkiſh pope.

Monſtrous blaſphemie in the pope.

At an other time, he ſitting at dinner, pointing to a peacocke vpon his table, which he had not touched; Kéepe (ſaid he) this cold peacocke for me againſt ſupper, and let me ſup in the garden, for I ſhall haue gheſts. So when ſupper came, and amongſt other hot peacocks, he ſaw not his cold peacocke brought to his table: the pope after his wonted manner, moſt horriblie blaſpheming God, fell into an extreame rage, &c. Wherevpon one of his cardinals ſitting by, deſired him ſaieng: Let not your holineſſe, I praie you, be ſo moued with a matter of ſo ſmall weight. Then this Iulius the pope anſwering againe; What (ſaid he) if God was ſo angrie for one apple, that he caſt our firſt parents out of paradiſe for the ſame, whie maie not I being his vicar, be angrie then for a peacocke, ſithens a peacocke is a greater matter than an apple? Behold here good reader, by this pope, the holineſſe of that blaſphemous ſée: and yet thou ſhalt ſée here, what affection was borne vnto this pope here in England, by the diriges, hearſes, and funerals commanded to be had and celebrated in all churches by the quéene and hir councell, as may appeare by the copie of their letters here following.

Pope Iulius blaſphemeth God for a peacocke.

A letter from the biſhop of Wincheſter (being lord chancellour) vnto Boner biſhop of London, touching the celebrating of the popes funerals.

Aprill 10. Wincheſters letter to Boner for the popes funerall.

After my hartie commendations to your good lordſhip. The king and quéenes maieſties hauing certeine knowledge of the death of the popes holineſſe, thought good there ſhould be as well ſolemne obſequies ſaid for him throughout the realme, as alſo theſe praiers (which I ſend you herein incloſed) vſed at maſſe times in all places at this time of vacation; and therefore willed me to ſignifie their pleaſures vnto you in this behalfe, that therevpon ye might procéed to the full accompliſhment therof, by putting the ſame in due execution within your owne dioceſſe, and ſending word to the reſt of the biſhops to doo the like in theirs. Thus doubting not but that your lordſhip will vſe ſuch diligence in this matter at this time, as ſhall be neceſſarie, I bid your lordſhip hartilie well to fare. From my houſe at Aſher, the tenth of Aprill. 1555.

Vpon this commandement, on wedneſdaie in Eaſter wéeke there were hearſes ſet vp, & diriges ſoong for the ſaid Iulius in diuerſe places. At which time it chanced a woman to come into S. Magnus church at the bridgefoot in London, & there ſéeing an hearſe and other preparation, aſked what it meant: and other that ſtood by, ſaid, that it was for the pope, and that ſhe muſt praie for him. Naie (quoth ſhe) that will I not, for he néedeth not my praier: and ſéeing he could forgiue vs all our ſinnes, I am ſure he is clean himſelfe: therefore I néed not to praie for him. She was heard ſpeake theſe words of certeine that ſtood by: which by and by caried hir vnto the cage at London bridge, and bad hir coole hir ſelfe there.

And héere (ſaith maſter Fox) commeth to be remembred the notable working of Gods hand vpon a certeine prieſt in Kent named Nightingall, parſon of Crondall beſides Canturburie: who vpon Shroueſundaie, which was about the third daie of the ſaid moneth of March, and yeare of our Lord aforeſaid, reioiſing belike not a little at this alteration of religion, began to make a ſermon to his pariſhioners, taking his theame out of the words of ſaint Iohn: He that ſaith, he hath no ſinne, is a lier, and the trueth is not in him, &c. And ſo vpon the ſame, verie impertinentlie, declared to them all ſuch articles as were ſet forth by the popes authoritie, and by the commandement of the biſhops of this realme; ſaieng moreouer vnto the people in this wiſe: Now maſters and neighbors reioiſe and be merrie, for the prodigall ſonne is come home. hearts well enough. And I ſhall tell you what hath happened in this wéeke paſt. I was before my lord cardinall Pooles grace, and he hath made me as cleane from ſinne, as I was at the font ſtone: and on thurſdaie laſt being before him, he hath appointed me to notifie (I thanke him for it) the ſame vnto you. And I will tell you what it is. And ſo reading the popes bull of pardon that was ſent into England, he ſaid, he thanked God that euer he had liued to ſée that daie: adding moreouer that he beléeued, that by the vertue of that bull he was as cleane from ſinne, as that night that he was borne: and immediatlie vpon the ſame fell ſuddenlie downe out of the pulpit, and neuer ſtirred hand nor foot, and ſo laie he. Teſtified by Robert Auſten of Cartham, which both heard and ſaw the ſame, and is witneſſed alſo by the whole countrie round about.]

The lord Courtneie goeth ouer into Italie.

About this time, Edward Courtneie, earle of Deuonſhire, of whom before yée haue heard, how he was appointed to remaine at Fodringheie vnder ſafe cuſtodie, at length was ſet at libertie, came to the court, and got licence to paſſe the ſeas, went into Italie, where ſhortlie after he ſickened, and died within fouretéene daies after his ſickneſſe firſt tooke him: he was honorablie buried in Padwaie. This Courtneie was the onelie ſonne and heire of Henrie, marqueſſe of Exceſter, couſine germane to king Henrie the eight, as is ſaid before. For the ſaid king and he were deſcended of two ſiſters, Elizabeth and Katharine, two of the daughters of king Edward the fourth, which propinquitie of bloud notwithſtanding the ſaid marqueſſe, for points of treaſon laid againſt him, ſuffered at the tower hill, the thirtith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the eight, to the great dolour of the moſt of the ſubiects of this realme, who for his ſundrie vertues bare him great fauour and goodwill.

The lord Courtneie deſcended of the bloud roiall.

After whoſe death, this yoong gentleman his ſonne, being yet a child, was committed priſoner to the tower, where he remained vntill the beginning of the reigne of this quéene Marie (as before you haue heard.) This gentleman (as it appeared) was borne to be a priſoner, for from twelue yeares of age vnto thirtie, he had ſcarſe two yeares libertie, within the which time he died, and obteined quiet, which in his life he could neuer haue. In the moneth of Maie next following, cardinall Poole, who had bin a great labourer for peace betwéene the French king and the emperour, being accompanied with Stephan Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter and chancellor of England, the erle of Arundell lord ſteward, and the lord Paget, were ſent by the king and quéene ouer the ſea to Calis, & from thence went to the towne of Marke where they met with the ambaſſadors of the emperor and the French king. From the emperour were ſent the biſhop of Arras with others. From the French king was ſent the cardinall of Loraine, and the conſtable of France. In this treatie, cardinall Poole ſat as preſident and vmpier in the name of the quéene of England. This peace was greatlie laboured, where at the firſt, there was much hope, but in the end nothing was concluded: wherefore the ſeauentéenth daie of Iune, this aſſemblie was diſſolued, and the Engliſh ambaſſadours returned againe into England.

¶ In this moneth of Auguſt, in Suffolke, at a place by the ſea ſide, all of hard ſtone and pibble, called in thoſe parts a ſhelfe, lieng betwéene the townes of Orford and Alborough, where neuer grew graſſe, nor any earth was euer ſéene, there chanced in this barren place ſuddenlie to ſpring vp without any tillage or ſowing, great abundance of peaſon, whereof the poore gathered (as men iudged) aboue an hundred quarters; yet remained ſome ripe, & ſome bloſſoming, as manie as euer there were before. To the which place rode the biſhop of Norwich, and the lord Willoughbie with others in great number, who found nothing but hard rockie ſtone for the ſpace of thrée yards vnder the roots of thoſe peaſon, which roots were great and long, and verie ſwéet in taſt to the mouth of the eater, &c.

On Bartholomew euen, after the Lord maior and aldermen of London had rid about Bartholomew faire, they came to Chriſtes hoſpitall within Newgate, where they heard a diſputation betwéene the ſcholers of Paules ſchoole, ſaint Anthonies ſchoole, and the ſcholers of the ſaid hoſpitall, for whome was prouided thrée games, which was thrée pennes: the beſt pen of ſiluer and gilt, valued at fiue ſhillings, woone by a ſcholer of ſaint Anthonies ſchoole, and the maiſter of that ſchoole had ſix ſhillings eight pence: the ſecond, a pen of ſiluer parcell gilt, valued at iiij. ſhillings, woone by a ſcholer of Paules ſchoole, & his maiſter had fiue ſhillings in monie: the third a pen of ſiluer, valued at thrée ſhillings, woone by a ſcholer of the ſaid hoſpitall, and his maiſter had foure ſhillings. And there were two préeſts maiſters of arts appointed for iudges, which had each of them a ſiluer rule for their paines, valued at ſix ſhillings eight pence the péece. The diſputation being ended, the maior and aldermen entred the hall, where the children of the hoſpitall vſe to dine, and had fruit & wine, and ſo departed.

King Philip went ouer ſeas, and landed at Calis on the fourth of September, where he was honorably receiued by the lord deputie, & the maior of the ſtaple of Calis, an alderman of London named ſir Andrew Iud, preſenting his maieſtie with a purſe & a thouſand marks of gold in it: that night the king was lodged in ſtaple inne: and on the morrow he departed from Calis towards Bruſſels in Brabant, to viſit the emperor his father: he gaue at his departing among the ſouldiors of the towne of Calis, a thouſand crownes of gold, and there accompanied him in his iournie of Engliſh lords, the earle of Arundell lord ſteward of the quéenes houſe, the earle of Penbroke, the earle of Huntington, and others. On Michaelmaſſe euen, the priſoners that laie in the counter in Bredſtréet, were remoued to a new counter made in Woodſtréet of the cities purchaſe & building, the which remoouing was confirmed by a common councell aſſembled at the Guildhall for that purpoſe.

King Philip went ouer into Flanders.

On the laſt of September, by occaſion of great wind and raine that had fallen, was ſuch great floods, that that morning the kings palace at Weſtminſter, and Weſtminſter hall was ouerflowne with water, vnto the ſtaire foot, going to the chancerie and kings bench: ſo that when the lord maior of London ſhould come to preſent the ſhiriffes to the barons of the exchecker, all Weſtminſter hall was full of water. And by report there, that morning, a whirriman rowed with his bote ouer Weſtminſter bridge, into the palace court, and ſo through the ſtaple gate: and all the wooll ſtaple into the kings ſtréet, and all the marſhes on Lambeth ſide, were ſo ouerflowne, that the people from Newington church could not paſſe on foot, but were caried by bote from the ſaid church to the pinfold, néere to ſaint Georges in Southworke.]

Anno Reg. 3.

About this time, the biſhop of Lincolne, Gloceſter, and Briſtow, were ſent in commiſſion to Oxford by the popes authoritie, to examine Ridleie and Latimer, vpon certeine articles by them preached, which if they would not recant, and conſent to the popes doctrine, then had they power to proceed in ſentence againſt them as heretikes, and to commit them ouer to the ſecular power. theles ſtood conſtantlie to that which they had taught, and would not reuoke: for which cauſe, they were condemned, and after burned in the towne ditch at Oxford, the ſixtéenth daie of October. In the time of whoſe examination, bicauſe the biſhops aforeſaid declared themſelues to be the popes commiſſioners, neither Ridleie nor Latimer would doo them any reuerence, but kept their caps on their heads: wherefore they were ſharplie rebuked by the biſhop of Lincolne, and one of the officers was commanded for to take of their caps. Of theſe men, and the maner of their death, ye may read at large in the booke of the monuments of the church.

A parlement wherein the things of the church are reſtored.

The one and twentith of October, a parlement was holden at Weſtminſter, in the which amongſt other things the quéene being perſuaded by the cardinall (and other of hir clergie) that ſhe could not proſper, ſo long as ſhe kept in hir hands any poſſeſſions of the church, did frankelie and fréelie reſigne and render vnto them all thoſe reuenues eccleſiaſticall, which by the authoritie of parlement, in the time of king Henrie, had béene annexed to the crowne, called the firſt fruits and tenths of all biſhopricks, benefices, and eccleſiaſticall promotions. The reſignation whereof was a great diminution of the reuenues of the crowne. ¶ In this parlement was granted to the king & quéene a ſubſidie of the laitie from fiue pounds to ten pounds eight pence of the pound, from ten pounds to twentie pounds twelue pence of the pound, & from twentie pounds vpward ſixtéene pence of the pound, and all ſtrangers double, and the cleargie granted ſix ſhillings of the pound.

The death of Stephan Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter.

Doctor Storie and other were appointed by the cardinall, to viſit euerie pariſh church in London and Middleſex, to ſée their relikes repared, and the images of the crucifix, with Marie and Iohn therevpon to be fixed.] During the time of this parlement, Stephan Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter, and chancellor of England died at his houſe called Wincheſter place, beſide ſaint Marie Oueries in Southworke, the ninth daie of Nouember, whoſe corps was ſhortlie after ſolemnly from thence conueied to his church of Wincheſter, & there buried. The maner of whoſe death why ſhould I bluſh to blaze as I find it by report? ¶ One miſtreſſe Mondaie, being the wife of one maiſter Mondaie ſecretarie ſometime to the old lord Thomas duke of Norffolke, a preſent witnes of this that is teſtified, thus openlie reported in the houſe of a worſhipfull citizen, bearing office in this citie, in words and effect as followeth. The ſame daie, when as biſhop Ridleie and maiſter Latimer ſuffered at Oxford, being about the ninetéenth daie of October, there came to the houſe of Stephan Gardiner, the old duke of Norffolke with the foreſaid Mondaie his ſecretarie aboue named, reporter héereof. The old aged duke, there waiting and tarieng for his dinner, the biſhop being not yet diſpoſed to dine, deferred the time till thrée or foure of the clocke at afternoone.

Abr. Fl. ex I. F. martyrologio.

The reporter of this addition a perſon of credit.

At length, about foure of the clocke commeth his ſeruant poſting in all poſſible ſpéed from Oxford, bringing intelligence to the biſhop what he had heard and ſéene: of whom the ſaid biſhop diligentlie inquiring the truth of the matter, & hearing by his man, that fire moſt certeinlie was ſet vnto them, commeth out reioiſing to the duke: Now ſaith he, let vs go to dinner. Wherevpon, they being ſet downe, meat immediatlie was brought, and the biſhop began merilie to eate: but what followed? The bloudie tyrant had not eaten a few bits, but the ſudden ſtroke of God his terrible hand fell vpon him in ſuch ſort, as immediatlie he was taken from the table, & ſo brought to his bed, where he continued the ſpace of fiftéene daies, in ſuch intollerable anguiſh and torments, that all that meane while, during thoſe fiftéene daies, he could not auoid by order of vrine, or otherwiſe, any thing that he receiued: whereby his bodie being miſerablie inflamed within (who had inflamed ſo manie good martyrs before) was brought to a wretched end. And thereof no doubt, as moſt like it is, came the thruſting out of his toong from his mouth ſo ſwolne & blacke, with the inflammation of his bodie. A ſpectacle worthie to be noted and beholden of all ſuch bloudie burning perſecutors.

Gardiner viſited with the ſudden ſtroke of God.

But whatſoeuer he was, ſéeing he is now gone, I referre him to his iudge, to whom he ſhall ſtand or fall. As concerning his death and maner thereof, I would they which were preſent thereat, would teſtifie to vs what they ſaw. This we haue all to thinke, that his death happened ſo opportunelie, that England hath a mightie cauſe to giue thanks to the Lord therefore: not ſo much for the great hurt he had doone in times paſt in peruerting his princeſſe, in bringing in the ſix articles, in murthering Gods ſaints, in defacing Chriſts ſincere religion, &c: as alſo eſpeciallie for that he had thought to haue brought to paſſe in murthering alſo our noble quéene that now is. For whatſoeuer danger it was of death that ſhe was in, it did (no doubt) procéed from that bloudie biſhop, who was the cauſe thereof. And if it be certeine which we haue heard, that hir highneſſe being in the tower, a writ came downe from certeine of the councell for hir execution, it is out of controuerſie, that wilie Wincheſter was the onelie Dedalus and framer of that engine. Who (no doubt) in that one daie had brought this whole realme into wofull ruine, had not the lords moſt gratious councell, through maiſter Bridges then the lieutenant, comming in haſt to the quéene, certified hir of the matter, and preuented Achitophels bloudie deuiſes. For the which, thanks be to the ſame our Lord and Sauiour, in the congregation of all Engliſh churches, Amen.]

Rockers and nurſes prouided for quéene Maries child.

¶ And now forſomuch as in the beginning of the moneth of Iune about Whitſuntide, the time was thought to be nie, that this yoong maiſter ſhould come into the world, and that midwiues, rockers, nurſes, with the cradle and all, were prepared and in a readineſſe, ſuddenlie vpon what cauſe or occaſion it is vncerteine, a certeine vaine rumor was blowne in London of the proſperous deliuerance of the quéene, and the birth of the child: inſomuch that bels were roong, bonefiers and proceſſions made, not onelie in the citie of London, and in moſt other parts of the realme, but alſo in Antwerpe guns were ſhot off vpon the riuer by the Engliſh ſhips, and the mariners thereof were rewarded with an hundred piſtolets or Italian crownes by the ladie regent, who was the quéene of Hungarie. Such great reioiſing and triumph was for the quéenes deliuerie, and that there was a prince borne. Yea, diuerſe preachers, namelie one the perſon of ſaint Anne within Alderſgate, after proceſſion and Te Deum ſoong, tooke vpon him to deſcribe the proportion of the child, how faire, how beautifull, and great a prince it was, as the like

Q. Maries child would not come.

What became of Q. Maries child no man can tell.

In the middeſt of this great adoo, there was a ſimple man (this I ſpeake but vpon information) dwelling within foure miles of Barwike, that neuer had beene before halfe waie to London, which ſaid concerning the bonefires made for queene Maries child; Here is a ioifull triumph, but at length all will not proue worth a meſſe of pottage, as in deed it came to paſſe: for in the end all proued cleane contrarie, and the ioy & expectations of men were much deceiued. For the people were certified, that the queene neither was as then deliuered, nor after was in hope to haue anie child. At this time manie talked diuerſlie. Some ſaid this rumour of the queenes conception was ſpread for a policie: ſome other affirmed that ſhe was deceiued by a timpanie or ſome other like diſeaſe, to thinke hirſelfe with child, and was not: ſome thought ſhee was with child, and that it did by ſome chance miſcarie, or elſe that ſhe was bewitched: but what was the truth therof, the Lord knoweth, to whome nothing is ſecret. One thing of mine owne hearing and ſeeing I cannot paſſe ouer vnwitneſſed.

There came to me, whome I did both heare and ſee, one Iſabell Malt, a woman dwelling in Alderſgate ſtreet in Horne allie, not farre from the houſe where this preſent booke was printed, who before witneſſe made this declaration vnto vs, that ſhe being deliuered of a man-child vpon Whitſundaie in the morning, which was the eleuenth daie of Iune Anno 1555, there came to hir the lord North, and another lord to hir vnknowne, dwelling then about old Fiſhſtreet, demanding of hir if ſhe would part with hir child, and would ſweare that ſhe neuer knew nor had no ſuch child. Which if ſhe would, hir ſonne (they ſaid) ſhould be well prouided for, ſhe ſhould take no care for it, with manie faire offers if ſhe would part with the child.

Ex teſtimonio eiuſdem puerperæ Londinenſis.

The yong princes cradle

After that came other women alſo, of whome one (ſhe ſaid) ſhould haue beene the rocker: but ſhe in no wiſe would let go hir ſonne, who at the writing hereof being aliue and called Timothie Malt, was of the age of thirteene yeares and vpward. Thus much (I ſaie) I heard of the woman hir ſelfe. What credit is to be giuen to hir relation, I deale not withall, but leaue it to the libertie of the reader, to beleeue it they that liſt: to them that liſt not, I haue no further warrant to aſſure them. Among manie other great preparations made for the queenes deliuerance of child, there was a cradle verie ſumptuouſlie and gorgeouſlie trimmed, on the which cradle for the child appointed, theſe verſes were written, both in Latine and in Engliſh, as they are ſet downe here in record:

Verſes vpon the cradle.

About this time there came ouer into England a certeine Engliſh booke, giuing warning to the Engliſhmen of the Spaniards, and diſcloſing certeine cloſe practiſes for recouerie of abbeie lands, which booke was called A warning for England. Whereof ye ſhall vnderſtand much more at large where* we ſpeake of the Spaniſh inquiſition. So that by the occaſion of this booke, vpon the thirteenth daie of this moneth came out a certeine proclamation, ſet forth in the name of the king and the queene, repealing and diſanulling all maner of bookes written or printed, whatſoeuer ſhould touch anie thing the impairing of the popes dignitie, wherby not onelie much godlie edification was hindered, but alſo great perill grew among the people. This proclamation is recorded at large with other appendents, in the Acts and Monuments, vnder the title of queene Marie.]

Brookes biſhop of Gloceſter appointed to examine Cranmer.

About this time, Brookes biſhop of Gloceſter was by the cardinall ſent downe as commiſſioner from the pope to Oxford, there to ſit vpon the examination of Thomas Cranmer archbiſhop of Canturburie, in ſuch things as ſhould be laid to his charge by Iohn Storie and Thomas Martin, doctors in the lawes, ſent ſpeciallie in commiſſion from the queene. At which time the ſaid archbiſhop making low obeiſance to them that ſate in the queenes name, ſhewed no token of reuerence to the biſhop that was the popes commiſſioner: who neuertheleſſe proceeded againſt him as iudge, and conuicted him of hereſie. According to the which ſentence, the one and twentith daie of March next following, he was diſgraded by Edmund Boner, and Thomas Thirlebie, biſhops of London and Elie, ſent downe for that purpoſe, and he was burned in the ſame place where Ridleie and Latimer before had ſuffered.

Th. Cranmer archbiſhop of Canturburie condemned.

He is burnt.

Before his death by the perſuaſion of a Spaniſh frier, named frier Iohn, a reader of diuinitie in Oxford, and by the counſell of certeine other that put him in hope of life and pardon, he ſubſcribed to a recantation, wherein he ſubmitted himſelfe wholie to the church of Rome, and continued in the ſame mind to outward appearance, vntill he was brought out of priſon, to go to the fire. Afore whoſe execution, a ſermon was made by doctor Cole deane of Paules, in ſaint Martins church in Oxford. And in the end of his ſermon, the ſaid doctor Cole praied the people to incline their eares to ſuch things as the ſaid Cranmer would declare vnto them by his owne mouth. For (ſaith he) he is a man verie repentant, and will here before you all reuoke his errors. Neuertheleſſe he did cleane contrarie. For when he came to the place where the holie biſhops and martyrs of God, Hugh Latimer and Ridleie were burnt before him, for the confeſſion of the truth, kneeling downe hee praied to God, & not tarieng long in his praiers, putting off his garments to his ſhirt, he prepared himſelfe to death. His ſhirt was made long downe to his feet: his feet were bare. Likewiſe his head, when both his caps were off, was ſo bare, that one heare could not be ſeene vpon it. His beard was long and thicke, couering his face with maruellous grauitie. Such a countenance of grauitie mooued the hearts both of his friends and of his enimies.

The archbiſhop brought to the place of execution.

The deſcription of his perſon.

And as for the recantation aforeſaid, with manie tears he proteſted, that he had ſubſcribed to the ſame againſt his conſcience, onelie for feare of death, and hope of life. Which ſeemed true: for when he came to the ſtake, & the fire kindled, he put his right hand into the fire, and held it there a good ſpace, saieng: that the ſame hand ſhould firſt burne, bicauſe it held the pen to ſubſcribe againſt his Lord God. Vpon the death of this Cranmer I find theſe reuerend verſes:

Infortunatè eſt fælix, qui numine læſo,
Cuiuſuis gaudet commoditate boni.

Infœlix

Infælix ille eſt verò fæliciter, orbi
Inuiſus quiſquis triſtia fata ſubit.

Dum quæris ſanctam diſsimulare fidem.
Et dum conſilijs tandem melioribus vſus,

Cardinall Poole made archbiſhop of Canturburie.

Immediatlie after the death of the ſaid biſhop Cranmer, cardinall Poole (a popiſh prelat, and a ſore enimie to the religion receiued & eſtabliſhed in king Henrie the eights time) was made archbiſhop of Canturburie, who (during the life of the other) would neuer be conſecrated archbiſhop. Who ſo deſireth to ſée more of this matter, maie ſée the ſame at large in the booke of the monuments of the church, where you ſhall alſo find, that about this time manie were in trouble for religion. A conſpiracie.

The Summer next following was a new conſpiracie brought to light, which was, to haue raiſed war in the realme againſt the quéene, for mainteinance whereof, their firſt enterpriſe was to haue robbed the treaſurie of the quéens excheker at Weſtminſter, called the receipt of the excheker, in the which there was of the quéens treaſure aboue fiftie thouſand pounds the ſame time, to the intent they might be able to mainteine warre againſt the quéene, as it fell out afterwards in proofe. The vtterer of which conſpiracie was one White, who at the beginning was made priuie to the ſame, whervpon diuerſe of the conſpiracie, namelie, Henrie Peckham, Daniell, Dethicke, Vdall, Throckmorton, and capteine Stanton, were apprehended, and diuerſe other fled into France. Moreouer, ſir Anthonie Kingſton knight was accuſed and apprehended for the ſame, and died in the waie comming to London. The eight and twentith of Aprill, Throckmorton and Richard Veale, were drawen to Tiborne, and there hanged & quartered. The ninetéenth of Maie Stanton was likewiſe executed. The eight of Iune, Roſſeie, Redike, and Bedell ſuffered at Tiborne for the ſame offenſe. The eightéenth of Iune, one Sands, yoonger ſon to the lord Sands, was executed at S. Thomas Waterings, for a robberie committed by him and others to the value of thrée thouſand pounds. The ſeuen and twentith of Iune, eleuen men & two women, were had out of Newgate, and in thrée carts conueied to Stratford the bow, where for religion they were burnt to aſhes.

Execution.

The eight of Iulie, in the beginning of this fourth yeare of the quéens reigne, Henrie Peckham and Iohn Daniell were executed, and after they were dead, were headed on the tower hill: their bodies were buried in Barking church. ¶ About this time one Clober, which ſometime kept a ſchoole at Dis in Norffolke, with thrée brethren, whoſe names were Lincolne, pretended an inſurrection, and would haue gathered the people at a mariage, vnto the which the brethren promiſed either of them to bring an hundred horſſe with men. At which time by them appointed, the ſaid Clober gaue charge to a ſeruant of his, to watch in a lane nigh to the church where they ſhould méet, and as ſoone as he ſaw anie horſſeman comming thitherward, to giue him warning with all ſpéed. So it chanced (by the will of God) that certeine men riding through that lane, to ſome other place about their buſineſſe, came about ſuch an houre as Clober had appointed. Vpon ſight of which men, his ſaid ſeruant returned to his maiſter, and told him that his friends were come: and immediatlie the ſaid Clober ſtood vp in the pariſh church of Parſleie, and read a traitorous proclamation of purpoſe prepared: which being ended, and ſéeing his part was too weake, for that his mates were not come, began to flée. But one maiſter Shireman purſued and tooke him at a towne called Eie in Suffolke, and was kept in priſon vntill the next ſeſſions at ſaint Edmundſburie, and his thrée mates being brought to him, were there all togither drawne, hanged, and quartered.]

Great death.

This yeare, the hot burning feuers and other ſtrange diſeaſes, which began the yeare before, conſumed much people in all parts of England; but namelie, of moſt ancient and graue men: ſo that in London, betwéene the twentith of October, and the laſt of December, there died ſeuen aldermen, whoſe names were Henrie Heardſon, ſir Richard Dobs late maior, ſir William Laxton late maior, ſir Henrie Hoblethorne late maior, ſir Iohn Champneis late maior, ſir Iohn Aileph late ſhiriffe, and ſir Iohn Greſham late maior. ¶ The one & twentith of Nouember, Iohn Fecknam late deane of Pauls in London, now made abbat of Weſtminſter, was ſtalled, and tooke poſſeſſion of the ſame: and fourtéene monks more receiued the habit with him that daie of the order of ſaint Benet. The ſaid one and twentith of Nouember, a man was brought from Weſtminſter hall riding with his face to the horſſe taile, and a paper on his head, to the ſtandard in Cheape, and there ſet on the pillorie, and then burned with an hot iron on both his chéekes, with two letters F. and A. for falſe accuſing one of the court of the common plées in Weſtminſter of treaſon.

At which time of his arreignement, hauing conueied a knife into his ſléeue, he thruſt it into the ſide of William Whitrents his fellow priſoner, who had giuen witneſſe againſt him, ſo that he was in great perill of death thereby. For the which fact he was immediatlie taken from the barre into the ſtréet before the iuſtice hall, where his hand being firſt ſtricken off, he was hanged on a gibbet ſet vp for that purpoſe. The kéeper of Newgate was arreigned & indicted, for that the ſaid priſoner had a weapon about him, and his hands looſe, which ſhould haue béene bound. An ambaſſador out of Muſcouia.

About this time came to London an ambaſſador to the quéene from the emperor of Cathaie, Muſcouia, and Ruſſeland, who was honorablie receiued at Totenham by the merchants of London, hauing trade in thoſe countries, riding in veluet coates and chaines of gold, who bare all his coſts and charges from the time of his entrie into England out of Scotland: for thither by tempeſt of weather he was driuen, and there forced to land. ¶ The lord Montacute with the quéens penſioners met him at Iſlington townes end; and at Smithfield barres the lord maior and aldermen in ſcarlet receiued him, and conueied him through the citie vnto maiſter Dimmocks houſe in Fanchurch ſtréet, where he lodged vntill the twelfe of Maie, all which time he wanted no reſort.] And after his meſſage and ambaſſage doone to the quéene, he departed againe with thrée faire ſhips from Grauesend into his countrie, when he had remained here by the ſpace of two moneths and more.

The lord Sturton committeth a ſhamefull murther.

Alſo about this time, the lord Sturton, for a verie ſhamefull and wretched murther committed by him vpon two gentlemen, the father and the ſon, of the ſurnames of Hargill, being his neere neighbors, whom he cauſed to be ſmitten downe with clubs, then their throtes to be cut, and after to be buried in his owne houſe fifteene foot deepe; for the which heinous offenſe he was apprehended and committed to the tower of London. And although the queene ſeemed to fauour him much, as one profeſſing the catholike religion: yet when ſhe vnderſtood the truth of his vile deed, ſhe abhorred him, & commanded that he ſhould be vſed according to iuſtice; wherefore ſhortlie after, he was brought to Weſtminſter, & there arreigned & found guiltie, & had iudgement as a murtherer to be hanged. And for the ſame fact were likewiſe condemned foure of his ſeruants. And the ſecond daie of March next following, the ſaid lord with his foure ſeruants were conueied by the queens gard from the tower of London through the citie, he hauing his armes pinioned at his backe, & his legs bound vnder the horſſe bellie, and ſo caried to Saliſburie, where the ſixt daie of March next, he was hanged in the market place, and his foure ſeruants were hanged in the countrie neere vnto the place where the murther was committed.

The returne of king Philip into England.

The foure and twentith of Aprill Thomas Stafford, ſecond ſonne to the lord Stafford, with other to the number of two and thirtie perſons, comming forth of France by ſea, arriued at Scarborough in Yorkeſhire, where they tooke the caſtell, and held the ſame two daies, and then were taken without effuſion of bloud by the earle of Weſtmerland. The ſaid Stafford and Richard Sanders, otherwiſe called capteine Sanders, with three or foure others, of the which one was a Frenchman, were ſent vp to London, & there committed to priſon in the tower. The ſaid Stafford and foure others were arreigned and condemned. Where vpon the eight and twentith of Maie, being fridaie, the ſaid Stafford was beheaded on the tower hill; and on the morrow three of his companie, as Strellie, Bradford, and Proctor, were drawen from the tower to Tiborne, and there executed. Their heads were ſet ouer the bridge, and their quarters ouer the gates about the ſame citie. Capteine Sanders had his pardon, and ſo eſcaped. The firſt of Maie Thomas Perſie was made knight, and after lord, and on the next daie he was created earle of Northumberland. Stafford and others committed to the tower, and after executed.

Thomas Perſie created earle of Northumberland.

In this ſeaſon, although the French king (as was ſaid) was verie loth to haue warres with England, yet the queene tangling hir ſelfe contrarie to promiſe in hir huſbands quarrell, ſent a defiance to the French king by Clarenceaux king of armes; who comming to the citie of Remes, where the ſaid king then laie, declared the ſame vnto him the ſeuenth of Iune, being the mondaie in Whitſunweeke. On the which daie, Garter and Norreie king of armes, accompanied with other heralds, and alſo with the lord maior and certeine of the aldermen of the citie of London, by ſound of three trumpets that rode before them, proclamed open war againſt the ſaid French king, firſt in Cheape ſide, and after in other parts of the citie, where cuſtomarilie ſuch proclamations are made: the ſhiriffes ſtill riding with the heralds, till they had made an end, although the lord maior brake off in Cheape ſide, and went to ſaint Peters to heare ſeruice, and after to Paules, where (according to the vſage then) he went on proceſſion. King Philip bicauſe of the warres towards, betwixt him and the French king, the ſixt of Iulie paſſed ouer to Calis, and ſo into Flanders, where on that ſide the ſeas he made prouiſion for thoſe warres: at which time there was great talke among the common people, muttering that the king making ſmall account of the queene, ſought occaſions to be abſent from hir.

Obſequie for the king of Portingale.

The eightéenth of Auguſt was a ſolemne obſequie celebrated in the church of S. Paule in London, for Iohn king of Portingale, who departed this life in Iulie laſt paſt. The lord treaſuror was chéefe mourner. The quéenes armie being tranſported ouer to Calis (as before ye haue heard) marched to ioine with king Philips power: the which alreadie being aſſembled, had inuaded the French confines, and being come before ſaint Quintins, planted a ſtrong ſiege before that tower. To the reſcue thereof, the French king ſent a great armie both of horſſemen and footmen, vnder the leading of the coneſtable of France: which armie conſiſted of about nine hundred men at armes, with as manie light horſſemen, ſeuen or eight hundred Roiſters, two & twentie enſignes of lancequenets, and ſixtéene enſignes of French footmen. They had alſo with them fiftéene péeces of great artillerie, to wit, ſix double canons, foure long culuerings, the reſt baſtard culuerings, and other péeces of ſmaller mould. The coneſtable thus garded vpon ſaint Laurence daie, which is the tenth of Auguſt, approched the towne, meaning to put into the ſame ſuccours of more ſoldiors, with Dandelot the admerals brother, that was within the towne not furniſhed with ſuch a garriſon as was thought expedient for the defenſe therof, againſt ſuch a power as king Philip had prepared againſt it.

Fiftéene or ſixtéene thouſand footmen, and a thrée or foure thouſand horſſemen.

The coneſtable of France duke Montmorencie generall of the French forces.

The duke of Sauoie and other capteins of the armie that laie at ſiege before the towne, aduertiſed of the coneſtables comming towards them, aſſembled the moſt part of their horſſemen togither, and with all ſpéed made towards a paſſage diſtant from the place where the French armie ſtood houering about a two Engliſh miles: and being got ouer, they diuided themſelues into eight troopes of horſſemen, led by the earles of Egmond, Horne, Mauſfield, the dukes of Brunſwike and others, being in all to the number of fiue thouſand men of armes, beſide the ſwart Rutters and light horſſemen. Which gaue ſuch a furious & cruell charge vpon the Frenchmen, that they not able to reſiſt the ſame, were altogither defeated, and their battels as well horſſemen as footmen put to flight. Wherof king Philip hauing knowlege, purſued them with all his force, in which purſute there were ſlaine of the Frenchmen a great number, the chiefe whereof were theſe that follow. Iohn of Burbon duke of Anghien the vicount of Turraine & eldeſt ſonne of Roch du Maine, the lord of Chandenier, with a great number of other gentlemen that bare armes in the field. There were taken theſe priſoners following; the duke of Montmorencie conſtable of France hurt with an harquebuz ſhot in the hanch, the duke of Montpenſer hurt in the head, the duke of Longueuille, the marſhall of ſaint Andrews, the lord Lewes brother to the duke of Mantoa, monſieur de Vaſſe, the baron of Curton, monſieur de la Roch du Maine, the Reingraue coronell of the Almans: moreouer the counte de Roch Foucault, monſieur d'Obignie, monſient de Meru, monſieur de Montbrun, monſieur de Biron, ſonnes to the coneſtable, monſieur de la chapelle de Biron, monſieur de ſaint Heran; beſide manie other gentlemen and capteins of good account and eſtimation. Yet there eſcaped the more part of the French horſſemen, and manie of their footmen, with certeine of their capteins of honor; as the duke of Neuers, the prince of Conde brother to the king of Nauarre, the earle of Montmorencie eldeſt ſonne to the coneſtable, the earle of Sancerre, monſieur de Burdillon, and other of the barons of France.

Priſoners of name.

Theſe nine were knights of the order.

The ſiege before ſaint Quintins, and the ſame taken and ſacked.

Within two or thrée daies after this ouerthrow, king Philip with the Engliſh armie, vnder the gouernement of the earle of Penbroke, and others, came to the ſiege afore ſaint Quintins, & ſo was the ſiege greatlie reinforced; and on the ſeuen and twentith of Auguſt by the ſpeciall aid & helpe of the Engliſhmen, the towne of ſaint Quintins was taken. For when the other ſoldiours, after diuerſe aſſaults were repelled and gaue ouer, the Engliſhmen of a ſtout conrage gaue a new onſet, by reaſon whereof the towne was taken. And in reward of their well dooing, king Philip granted them the ſaccage of the ſaid towne. But then the ſwart Rutters, which kéepe no rule when they be ſtrongeſt, ſet vpon the Engliſhmen, in taking of the ſpoile, and killed a great number of them. This grudge was with much difficultie appeaſed, & men thought that if the Engliſhmen being much fewer in number had not béene oppreſſed with the multitude of the other, that it would haue growne to a great ſlaughter on both parts. At the aſſault the lord Henrie Dudleie, yoongeſt ſonne to the duke of Northumberland was ſlaine with the ſhot of a great péece, as he ſtooped vpon his approch vnto the wall, and ſtaid to rip his hoſe ouer the knée, thereby to haue béene the more apt and nimble to the aſſault. This was his end, of whome one ſaith thus:

The lord Henrie Dudleie ſlaine with the ſhot of a gun.

——— Henricus Dudleius heros,
Ille annis generoſam animam iuuenilibus efflat,
Quem referunt ſocij flentes in caſtra peremptum,
Vt mos chriſticolæ eſt, velatum ſindone, gentu.

After the winning of this towne, newes in poſt were brought into England to the quéene, who cauſed generall proceſſions to be made, and Te Deum to be ſoong, giuing all laud and praiſe to almightie God for this great victorie. And in the ſtréets of euerie citie and towne of the realme were made bonefires with great reioiſing: which ſudden ſhort gladneſſe turned verie ſhortlie after to great & long ſorow. For if ought were woone by hauing of ſaint Quintins, England got nothing at all, for the gaine thereof came onelie to king Philip. But the loſſe of Calis, Hammes and Guiſnes, with all the countrie on that ſide the ſea (which followed ſoone after) was ſuch a buffet to England, as happened not in more than an hundred yeares before; and a diſhonor wherwith this realme ſhall be blotted, vntill God ſhall giue power to redub it with ſome like requitall to the French.

Doctor Weſton reſigneth the deanrie of Weſtminſter by compulſion and is recompenſed.

Doctor Weſton being (as you haue heard before) prolocutor of the conuocation houſe, was at this time in diſpleaſure with cardinall Poole, and other biſhops: bicauſe he was vnwilling to reſigne his deanrie of Weſtminſter vnto the quéene, whoſe purpoſe was to place there (as in old time before) the religion of moonks, whome in déed he fauoured not, although in all other things he ſtood with the church of Rome. Neuertheleſſe, by verie importunate ſute, or rather compulſion, he with his collegues reſigned the deanrie of Weſtminſter. In recompenſe wherof he was made deane of Windſor, where not long after he was taken in adulterie, and for that fact was by the cardinall depriued of all his ſpirituall liuings, from whoſe ſentence he appealed vnto the court of Rome. For the following of which appeale he ſought ſecretlie to depart the realme: but he was apprehended by the waie, and committed to the tower of London, where he remained priſoner, vntill (by the death of quéene Marie) quéene Elizabeth came vnto the crowne, by whome he was ſet at libertie, and forthwith fell ſicke and died.

The malice of cardinall Poole againſt king Henrie the eight.

The common talke was, that if he had not ſo ſuddenlie died, he would haue diſcloſed the purpoſe of the chiefe of the clergie, meaning the cardinall, which was to haue taken vp K. Henries bodie at Windſor, and to haue burned it, as manie thought. The thirtith of Nouember, being ſaint Andrews daie, in the forenoone, the quéene came from ſaint Iames to hir palace at Weſtminſter, where ſhe heard maſſe: at the which, ſir Thomas Treſham knight receiued

At this time, although there was open hoſtilitie and warre betwéen England & France: yet contrarie to the common cuſtome before vſed, the towne of Calis and the forts thereabouts were not ſupplied with anie new accrewes of ſoldiors, but rather withdrawne from thenſe, and diſcharged. The loſſe of ſaint Quintins nettleth the French king.

The duke of Guiſe with a great armie commeth toward Calis.

The French king therefore being ſharplie nettled with the late loſſe of ſaint Quintins, and a great péece of his countrie adioining, and deſirous of reuenge, thought it not méet to let ſlip this occaſion, but rather to aduance the ſame with all expedition, according vnto the plot laied by the coneſtable before hand. The king yet neuertheleſſe hauing an armie in a readineſſe (although the coneſtable were now priſoner, and therefore could not be preſent himſelfe) to imploie where moſt aduantage ſhould appeare, determined with all ſpéed to put in proofe the enterpriſe of Calis, which long and manie times before was purpoſed vpon, as it was well knowne. This practiſe was not ſecret, but that the deputies of Calis and Guiſnes had ſome intelligence thereof, and informed the quéene and hir councell accordinglie, as well by letters, as by ſufficient meſſengers: for not onelie John Hieſield maſter of the ordinance was ſent from thenſe to giue due aduertiſement of the French kings purpoſe, & to haue a ſupplie of things neceſſarie for mounting of the great artillerie wherof he had charge; but alſo ſir Raſe Chamberleine, capteine of the caſtell, was likewiſe ſent to giue the like aduertiſement, who returned not paſt two or thrée daies before the duke of Guiſe came thither with the armie. And ſo either by wilfull negligence, or lacke of credit by the quéenes councell here, this great caſe was ſo ſlenderlie regarded, that no prouiſion of defenſe was made, vntill it was ſomewhat too late.

Guiſe entreth the Engliſh frontier.

The duke of Guiſe being generall of the French armie, procéeded in this enterpriſe with maruellous ſpéed and no leſſe policie. For approching the Engliſh frontier vnder colour to vittell Bullongne and Ard, he entered the ſame vpon a ſudden on Newyeares daie, a ſorie little plot of ground, intrenched at Sandgate, and then diuided his armie into two parts, ſending one part with certeine péeces of great artillerie along the downes by the ſea ſide towards Ricebanke: and the other part furniſhed alſo with batterie péeces, marched ſtreight forth to Newnambridge, meaning to batter theſe two forts both at one time. Which thing he did with ſuch readie diſpatch, that comming thither verie late in the euening, he was maſter of both by the next morning: where at the firſt ſhot diſcharged at Newnambridge, the head of the maſter gunner of that péece, whoſe name was Horſlie was ſtriken off.

The maſter gunners head ſmitten cleane off with a gun.

The capteine hauing ſent vnto the lord deputie of Calis for ſome ſupplie of men, was anſwered that if he perceiued the enimies force to be ſuch, whereby his péece ſhould grow to be in anie danger: that then he ſhould choke vp the artillerie, and retire with his men vnto Calis for defenſe of the towne, where they ſtood in great want of men alſo, euen to the perill of loſing the whole, if the enimies came forwards to beſiege it. Herevpon the capteine within Newnambridge perceiuing he might haue no ſuccors, retired with his ſoldiors vnto Calis, in ſuch ſecret wiſe, that the Frenchmen perceiued it not of a pretie while; inſomuch that they ſhot ſtill at the fort, when there was not a man within it to make reſiſtance: and by that time that they were come to Calis, the other part of the French armie that went by the ſea ſide with their batterie, had wonne Ricebanke, being abandoned to their hands. The next daie the Frenchmen with fiue double canons and thrée culuerings began a batterie, from the Sandhils next Ricebanke againſt the curteine betwixt the watergate and the ſoldiors priſon on the wall, and continued the ſame by the ſpace of two or thrée daies, vntill they had made a little breach next vnto the watergate, which neuertheleſſe was not yet aſſaultable: for that which was broken in the daie, was by them within the towne made vp againe in the night ſtronger than before. But the batterie was not begun there by the French, for that they intended to enter in that place, but rather to abuſe the Engliſh, to haue the leſſe regard vnto the defenſe of the caſtell, which was the weakeſt part of the towne, and the place where they were aſcerteined by their eſpials to win eaſie entrie. So that while our people trauelled fondlie to defend that counterfet breach of the towne wall, the duke had in the meane ſeaſon planted fiftéene double canons againſt the caſtell. Which caſtell being conſidered by the rulers of the towne, to be of no ſuch force as might reſiſt the batterie of the canon (by reaſon it was old and without anie rampiers) it was deuiſed to make a traine with certeine barrels of powder to this pupoſe, that when the Frenchmen ſhould enter (as they well knew that there they would) to haue fired the ſaid traine, and blowne vp the kéepe, and for that purpoſe left neuer a man within to defend it.

The Engliſhmens fond defenſe.

But the French hauing paſſed through the dich full of water, & thereby with their cloths wringing wet as they paſſed ouer the traine, they moiſted ſo the powder, that it would not take fire when it was giuen. Herevpon the Frenchmen eſpieng the traine, auoided the ſame; ſo as that deuiſe came to no purpoſe, and without anie reſiſtance they entered the caſtell, and thought to haue entered the towne by that waie. But by the proweſſe and hardie courage of ſir Anthonie Ager knight, & marſhall of the towne, with his ſoldiors they were repelled, and driuen backe againe into the caſtell, and ſo hard followed, that our men forced them to cloſe and ſhut the caſtell gate for their ſuertie, leaſt it ſhould haue béene recouered againſt them, as it was once attempted by ſir Anthonie Ager; who there with his ſonne and heire, and a purſeuant at armes called Calis, with diuerſe others to the number of thrée or foure ſcore Engliſhmen loſt their liues.

The Frenchmen diſappoint the Engliſhmens deuiſe.

Sir Anthonie Ager and his ſonne ſlaine.

The ſame night after the recule of the Frenchmen, whoſe number ſo increaſed in the caſtell, that the towne was not able to reſiſt their force, the lord Wentworth being deputie of the towne, appointed Nicholas Fellow, aliàs Guiſnes, and Richard Turpine, aliàs Hammes, to go to the French within the caſtell, to demand parlée: wherevnto they aſſented, put forth of the poſterne two French gentlemen, and in pledge for them receiued into the caſtell John Hieſield maſter of the ordinance, and Edmund Hall one of the coneſtables of the ſtaple. Herevpon they falling in talke about a compoſition: at length after ſome long debating of the matter, they concluded in this ſort. Firſt that the towne, with all the great artillerie, vittels, and munitions, ſhould be fréelie yéelded to the French king, the liues of the inhabitants onelie ſaued, to whome ſafe conduct ſhould be granted to paſſe where they liſted: ſauing the lord deputie, with fiftie ſuch other as the duke ſhould appoint, to remaine priſoners, and be put to their ranſome. The next morning, the Frenchmen entered and poſſeſſed the towne: and forthwith all the men, women, and children, were commanded to leaue their houſes, and to go to certeine places appointed for them to remaine in, till order might be taken for their ſending awaie.

The lord Wentworth.

A parlée demanded of the French.

Calis deliuered to the French.

The places thus appointed for them to remaine in, were chieflie foure, the two churches of our ladie, and ſaint Nicholas, the deputies houſe, and the ſtaple, where they reſted a great part of that daie, and one whole night, and the next daie till thrée of the clocke at afternoone, without either meat or drinke. And while they were thus in the churches, and thoſe other places, the duke of Guiſe in the name of the French king, in their hearings made a proclamation, ſtrictlie charging all and euerie perſon that were inhabitants of the towne of Calis, hauing about them anie monie, plate, or iewels, to the value of one groat to bring the ſame forthwith, and laie it downe vpon the high altars of the ſaid churches vpon paine of death; bearing them in hand alſo, that they ſhould be ſearched. By reaſon of which proclamation, there was made a great & ſorowfull offertorie. And while they were at this offering within the churches, the Frenchmen entered into their houſes, and rifled the ſame, where was found ineſtimable riches and treaſure: but ſpeciallie of ordinance, armor, and other munitions.

The duke of Guiſes proclamation to bring in monie and plate, &c.

The French fall to ſpoiling and rifling.

¶ Thus dealt the French with the Engliſh in lieu and recompenſe of the like vſage to the French when the forces of king Philip preuailed at S. Quintins: where not content with the honour of victorie, the Engliſh in ſacking the towne ſought nothing more than the ſatiſfieng of their gréedie veine of couetouſneſſe, with an extreame neglect of all moderation. So likewiſe did the Spaniſh ſoldiors, and the reſt that could come to finger anie thing of value: inſomuch that neither monie nor plate, either of ſiluer or gold, rich hangings, bedding nor houſhold ſtuffe was ſpared: but what they could not carie awaie for cumberſomneſſe, they ſold dogcheape; were the ſame neceſſarie furniture ſeruiceable for the chamber, the kitchin, or anie other roome in a mans houſe. Pearls and pretious ſtones, iewels and owches, the rich ornaments of the French dames were then bought and ſold at a low price, which a long time had béene kept ſhut vp vnder locke and keie: all laie open now to the gréedie eie of the ſoldiors, who like landlords kept poſſeſſion of houſes, as C.O. noteth, of whom I haue borrowed the report of this reuell rowt, ſaieng:

Armatis muros firmiſſimáque occupat vrbis
Militibus victor, dominantur in ædibus altis
Iam vacuis veterum dominorum Marce phalanges
Conſpicuæ.]

About two of the clocke the next daie at after noone, being the ſeuenth of Ianuarie, a great number of the meaneſt ſort were ſuffered to paſſe out of the towne in ſafetie, being garded through the armie with a number of Scotiſh light horſſemen, who vſed the Engliſhmen verie well and friendlie: and after this euerie daie for the ſpace of thrée or foure daies togither, there were ſent awaie diuerſe companies of them till all were auoided, thoſe only excepted that were appointed to be reſerued for priſoners, as the lord Wentworth, & others. There were in the towne of Calis fiue hundred Engliſh ſouldiors ordinarie, and no more: and of the townesmen not fullie two hundred fighting men (a ſmall garriſon for the defenſe of ſuch a towne) and there were in the whole number of men, women, and children (as they were accounted when they went out of the gate) foure thouſand and two hundred perſons. But the Lord Wentworth deputie of Calis, ſir Raſe Chamberleine capteine of the caſtell, Iohn Harlſton capteine of Ricebanke, Nicholas Alexander capteine of Newnambridge, Edward Grimſtone the comptrollor, Iohn Rogers ſuruejor, with others, to the number of fiftie (as aforeſaid) ſuch as it pleaſed the duke of Guiſe to appoint, were ſent priſoners into France.

The poreſt & meaneſt ſort voided out of Calis.

Gariſon of ſoldiors that were in Calis

Thus haue ye heard the diſcourſe of the ouerthrow and loſſe of the towne of Calis, the which enterpriſe was begun and ended in leſſe than eight daies, to the great maruell of the world, that a towne of ſuch ſtrength, and ſo well furniſhed of all things as that was (ſufficient numbers of men of warre onlie excepted) ſhould ſo ſuddenlie be taken and conquered, but moſt ſpeciallie in the winter ſeaſon, what time all the countrie about (being mariſh ground) is commonly ouerflowne with water. The ſaid towne was woon from the French king by K. Edward the third, in the time of Philip de Valois then French king: and being in poſſeſſion of the kings of England two hundred and eleuen yeares, was in the time of Philip and Marie king & quéene of England loſt within leſſe than eight daies: being the moſt notable fort that England had. For the winning whereof, king Edward aforeſaid, in the 21 yeare of his reigne, was faine to continue a ſiege eleuen moneths and more. Wherefore it was iudged of all men, that it could not haue come ſo to paſſe, without ſome ſecret trecherie.

Calis conquered and loſt in leſſe than eight daies.

How long Calis was in poſſeſſion of the kings of England.

Here is alſo to be noted, that when quéene Marie and hir councell heard crediblie of the Frenchmens ſudden approch to that towne, ſhe with all ſpéed poſſible (but ſomewhat too late) raiſed a great power for the reſcue thereof; the which comming to Douer, ſtaied thereabouts till the towne was woone, either for that their whole number was not come togither, or for that there were not ſhips readie ſufficient to paſſe them ouer, although the wind and weather ſerued verie well to haue tranſported them thither, till the ſundaie at night after the towne was deliuered: for then began a maruellous ſore and rigorous tempeſt, continuing the ſpace of foure or fiue daies togither, that the like had not béene ſéene in the remembrance of man. Wherefore ſome ſaid that the ſame came to paſſe through necromancie, and that the diuell was raiſed vp and become French, the truth whereof is knowne (ſaith maiſter Grafton) to God. True it is that after the ſaid tempeſt began, for the time it laſted, no ſhip could well broke the ſeas, by reaſon of the outragious ſtorms. And ſuch of the quéenes ſhips as did then aduenture the paſſage, were ſo ſhaken and torne with the violence of the weather, that they were forced to returne in great danger, & not without loſſe of all their tackle and furniture: ſo that if this tempeſtuous weather had not chanced, it was thought that the armie ſhould haue paſſed to haue giuen ſome ſuccors to Guiſnes, and to haue attempted the recouerie of Calis.

As good neuer as too late.

A terrible tempeſt.

Rich. Grafton.

The quéenes ſhips ſore ſhaken with ſtorme and tempeſt.

But if the ſame armie might haue béene readie to haue tranſported ouer in time, before the loſſe of Calis, and whileſt the weather was moſt calme and ſwéet, as was poſſible for that time of the yeare, the towne might haue béene preſerued; and the other péeces which through want of timelie ſuccours came into the enimies poſſeſſion. And thus by negligence of the councell at home, conſpiracie of traitors elſewhere, force and falſe practiſe of enimies, holpen by the rage of moſt terrible tempeſts of contrarie winds and weather, this famous fort of Calis was brought againe and left in the hands and poſſeſſion of the French. ¶ Now were he worthie of a kingdome, that could ſenſiblie and ſignificantlie ſet forth the inſolent triumphs and immoderate reioiſing of the French for the recouerie of Calis ſo long poſſeſſed by the Engliſh, and now in forren tenure. In deſcribing whereof a man had néed of manie heads fraught with extraordinarie inuention, and of many hands readilie to deliuer in writing his rare conceipts in this caſe. For as they are a people depending wholie vpon extremities in their actions: ſo in this they vſed no meaſure, inſomuch that euen the learneder ſort among them, namelie Turnebus, Au-

Abr. Fl. ex opere hiſtorico Schardij collectio ratus, Bellaius, and others did both pen and publiſh pamphlets in Latine verſe, repleniſhed with ſcoffs and vnreuerend termes againſt the Engliſh, calling them Perfidos, and in flowting ſort Diuiſos orbe Britannos; but aduancing to the ſkies their Henrie, their Guiſe, and the reſt of the rowt that were actors in this conqueſt. A ſight of which verſes in ſome part I may not omit (for it requireth a booke to tranſcribe all) leaſt I might be thought to impoſe vpon them a falſe charge. This therefore in the forme of a dialog betweene a poſt and the people writeth Auratus the French kings publike reader in the Greeke tong:

And thus proceedeth he in his od veine of inuention, concluding with a queſtion, whether the king of France or the duke of Guiſe are the more happie and bleſſed perſon? The anſwer is made that they are both bleſſed, the king for the duke ſake, and the duke for the kings; and therefore his poſie muſt of force ſing and ſound to them both thriſe, that is, oftentimes Ter io triumphe, ter io triumphe. But I would to God the Engliſh had not beene ſo ſoon and ſo ſuddenlie turned out of their old poſſeſſion, nor the French fondlings obteined ſuch a iuſt cauſe of immoderate ioy and outragious triumph.]

The duke of Guiſe marcheth to the fort and town of Guiſnes.

The L. Greie capteine of Guiſnes.

But to leaue Calis in the preſent ſtate, you ſhall vnderſtand, that ſo ſoone as this duke of Guiſe (contrarie to all expectation) had in ſo few daies gained this ſtrong towne of Calis (afore thought impregnable) and had put the ſame in ſuch order as beſt ſeemed for his aduantage, proud of the ſpoile, and preſſing forward vpon his good fortune, without giuing anie long time to the reſidue of the guides or capteines of the forts there, to breath vpon their buſineſſe, the 13 daie of the ſaid moneth being thurſdaie, with all prouiſion requiſite for a ſiege, marched with his armie from Calis, vnto the towne and fort of Guiſnes, fiue miles diſtant from thence. Of which towne and caſtell at the ſame time there was capteine a valiant baron of England, called William lord Greie of Wilton, who not without cauſe ſuſpecting a ſiege at hand, and knowing the towne of Guiſnes to be of ſmall force, as being large in compaſſe, without walles or bulworks, cloſed onlie with a trench, before the Frenchmens arriuall had cauſed all the inhabitants of the towne to auoid, and ſo manie of them as were able to beare armes he cauſed to retire into the caſtell, which was a place well fortified with ſtrong and maſſie bulworks of bricke, hauing alſo an high and mightie tower, of great force and ſtrength, called the Keepe.

The L. Greie taketh the French at a ſleepie aduantage.

The towne being thus abandoned, the Frenchmen had the more eaſie approch to the caſtell, who thinking to find quiet lodging in thoſe vacant houſes, entred the ſame without any feare. And being that night at their reſt (as they thought) a choſen band of ſouldiors appointed by the lord Greie, iſſued out by a poſterne of the ſaid caſtell, and ſlue no ſmall number of their ſleepie gheſts, & the reſt they put out of their new lodgings, and maugre the duke and all the French power, conſumed all the houſes of the towne with fire. That notwithſtanding, the ſaid duke with all diligence began his trenches. And albeit the ſhot of the great artillerie from the caſtell was terrible, & gaue him great impeachment: yet did he continue his worke without intermiſſion, and for examples ſake wrought in his owne perſon as a common pioner or labourer. So that within leſſe than three daies, he brought to the number of fiue & thirtie batterie peeces, hard to the brim of the caſtell ditch, to batter the ſame on all ſides, as well forthright as acroſſe. But his principall batterie he planted againſt the ſtrongeſt bulworke of all, called Marie bulworke, thinking by gaining of the ſtronger to come more eaſilie by the weaker.

Rabutine.

Batteries laid to the Marie bulworke.

On mondaie morning therefore by breake of the daie, they had laid two batteries to the ſaid bulworke, thirteene canons in the one, and nine in the other, with which they plied it ſo well, as that by noone they had not onelie diſmounted their counter batterie within, but alſo cleane cut awaie the hope of bricke off the whole forefront of their bulworks, whereof the filling being but of late digged earth, did crimble awaie. Which the enimie finding about two of the clocke in the ſame afternoone, ſent fortie or fiftie forlorne boies with ſwords and targets to view and aſſaie the breach. The ditch at that place before the batterie was not foure and twentie foot broad, now aſſuredlie not a dozzen, nor in deapth aboue a mans knees, wherefore with ſmall adoo they came to the breach, and with as little paine came vp the ſame, the clime was ſo eaſie; from whence hauing diſcharged certeine piſtols vpon the Engliſhmen, and receiued a few puſhes of the pike, they retired. And making report of the eaſineſſe of the breach, ſtrait a band or two of Gaſcoigns (as it was thought) threw themſelues into the ditch, and vp they came. Then a little more earneſtly the Engliſhmen leaned to their tackling, their flankers walked, their pikes, their culuers, their pots of wild fire were lent them, the harquebuſh ſaluted them, ſo as iollie maiſter Gaſcoigne was ſet downe with more haſt than he came vp with good ſpeed: and ſo ended mondaies worke, ſauing that vpon the retire from the aſſalt, they gaue ſeuen or eight ſuch terrible tires of batterie, as tooke cleane away from them within the top of their vaumure and maunds, leauing them all open to the canons mouth. Wherby ſurelie but for night that came on, the Engliſhmen had beene forced to haue abandoned the place.

The Gaſcoignes put backe with more haſt than they came vp with good ſpeed.

The number ſlaine at this aſſault.

The lord Greie commendeth his ſouldiours.

At this aſſault was ſlaine of gentlemen, one capteine Bourne an Engliſhman, verie valiant, alſo a Spaniſh gentleman, and common ſouldiours to the number of fortie or fiftie. There was alſo ſore hurt at the ſame aſſault, one other Spaniſh capteine, with diuerſe others, whom for the auoiding of tediouſneſſe I let paſſe. At night the lord Greie came to the bulworke, and hauing rendred thanks to God for that daies good ſucceſſe, did greatlie commend them all for their manfull defenſe and valiant behauiour, exhorting them to continue therein, as the onelie thing wherein their ſafetie and good name did reſt. The batterie (as before is told) hauing laid the bulworks open, they within were inforced for winning of a new vaumure, to intrench within the bulworke ſix foot deepe, and nine in thickneſſe, which maruellouſlie did ſtrengthen the peece, the ſame being of no great largeneſſe before. By the next daie being tueſdaie, they had planted two batteries more; the one in the market place of the towne, to beate a curteine of the bodie of the caſtell, of ſix canons; the other vpon the rampire of the towne of three peeces, to beat the Cat and a flanker of the Barbican, which two garded one ſide of the Marie bulworke.

Battering at the flankers.

This morning they beſtowed moſt in battering at the flankers, which the daie before they had felt, and in deed wonne euerie one from them within, ſauing that of the Cat, which laie high and ſomwhat ſecret, and an other at the end of a braie by the gate on the other ſide of the bulworke; all the reſt, as thoſe of the Garden bulworke which chéeflie beheld the maine breach of the Barbican, and of the Kéepe, were quite béreued them. And beſides the enimie continuallie interteined the breach, with eight or nine tires the houre. In the afternoone, about the ſame houre that they made their attempt the daie afore, a regiment of Swiſſes, with certeine bands of Frenchmen approched the dich, as if preſentlie they would haue giuen the aſſault; but there they did ſtaie, ſending to the breach onelie a capteine or two, ſéeking thereby to haue diſcouered what flankers yet were left to them within: wherein they were preuented, the lord Graie hauing before warned the gunners not to diſcloſe them, but vpon extremitie. And thus after an houres plaie with the harquebuſh onelie, and a light offer or two of approach, this people retired them, and gaue the canon place againe, which by night had driuen them within anew to become moldwarps, and to intrench themſelues with all ſpéed poſſible.

Certeine Swiſſes and French approch the dich as if they would offer aſſault.

The morrow being wedneſdaie, by the péepe of daie, all the batteries began, and without intermiſſion held on till one of the clocke in the afternoone, and eſpeciallie that in the market place ſo preuailed, as hauing cleane ruined the old wall, did driue through the rampire, and a new countermure of earth raiſed vpon the ſame, where the lord Greie himſelfe ſitting vpon a forme, with ſir Henrie Palmer, and maſter Lewes Diue his lordſhips couſin and deputie, made a faire eſcape, the forme being ſtricken aſunder vnder them, without anie further harme to anie of them: though ſundrie other that daie and the next following loſt their liues on the ſame curteine by the foreſaid battrie, which full in flanke did beat it, wherein yet was his lordſhips onelie abode as his chéefeſt place, to view and regard the behauiour and néed of all the other lims, from which alſo a quoit might be throwne into Marie bulworke. The enimies canon (as is ſaid) hauing plaid thus all the morning, and well ſearched (as they thought) euerie corner that flankers might lurke in, about the foreſaid houre of one of the clocke, the Engliſhmen might deſcrie the trench before the breach to be ſtuffed with enſignes. The L. Greie ſtreight expecting that which followed, gaue word incontinentlie to euerie place to ſtand on their gard, incouraging euerie man to continue in their well begun endeuor. A tower that was called Webs tower, and yet ſtanding, which flanked one ſide of the beaten bulworke, he ſtuffed with twentie of the beſt ſhot with curriers. Theſe things no ſooner thus ordered, but that eight or nine enſignes of Swiſſes, and thrée of Gaſcoigns, did preſent themſelues vpon the counterſcarfe; and without ſtaie the Gaſcoignes flue into the ditch, run vp the breach, whome they within receiue with harquebuſh ſhot, but they requite the Engliſhmen againe with two for one. The top of the vaumure or rather trench, the enimie boldlie approcheth, the pike is offered, to handblowes it commeth. Then the Swiſſe with a ſtatelie leaſure ſteppeth into the dich, and cloſe togither marcheth vp the breach, the fight increaſeth, wareth verie hot, & the breach all couered with the enimies. The ſmall ſhot in Webs tower began now their parts, no bullet that went in vaine. On the other ſide againe 20 of the Spaniards on the inſide of the braies had laid themſelues cloſe till the heat of the aſſault: and then ſhewing themſelues, did no leſſe gall the enimies than the tower. Thus was it no luſtilier aſſailed than brauelie defended. At laſt after an houres fight and more, the gouernors without, finding the great ſlaughter that theirs went to, and ſmall auaile, and perceiuing the two little caſemates of the tower and braies to be the chéefeſt annoiances, did cauſe a retire to be ſounded: and withall thrée or foure of the canons in the market place, to be turned vpon Webs tower, the which at two tires brought cleane downe the ſame vpon the ſoldiors heads, wherein two or thrée were ſlaine outright, others hurt to death, and who eſcaped beſt, ſo maimed or bruſed, as they were no more able to ſerue.

The manhood of the Spaniards againſt the French.

The enimie this while hauing breathed, and a brace of an hundred ſhots put foorth onelie to attend on the few Spaniards that kept the corners of the braies the aſſault afreſh is begun, and their beaten bands with new companies relieued. The lord Greie alſo ſent into the bulworke two hundred freſh men. Now grew the fight heauie vpon the Engliſhmen, all their defenſe reſting in the pike and bill, their chéefeſt flankers being gone, their places to beſtow ſhot in taken from them, their fier-works in manner ſpent, the Spaniſh ſhot on the other ſide ſo ouerlaid, as not one of them but was either ſlaine or marred, yer a quarter of the aſſault was paſt. The eaſineſſe of the fight thus alluring the enimie, vnappointed companies flue to the breach, and courage was on euerie ſide with them, what hauocke they made it is not hard to geſſe. My lord Greie perceiuing the extremitie, ſent to the two forenamed flankers, that they ſhould no longer ſpare. They ſtreight went off, the diches and breach being couered with men. Theſe vnlooked for ghesſts made the enimie that was comming to pauſe, and the other alreadie come to repent their haſt. Thrée or foure bowts of theſe ſalutations began to cleare well the breach, though the dich grew the fuller at night. At laſt parted with no great triumph of others winnings (for as the Engliſhmen within went not ſcotfrée) ſo ſuerlie no ſmall number of their enimies carcaſſes tooke vp their lodgings in the ditch that night.

A freſh aſſault begun and the fight hot and heauie againſt the Engliſh.

Enimies ſlaine.

My lord Greie this night came into the bulworke, where after praiſe firſt to God, he gaue thanks and commendations to them all. The ſlaine men he cauſed to be buried, the hurt to be remooued and looked vnto, ſaw the breach repared, inquired of their lacks, and (as he might) ſupplied the ſame. They that were great could not be helped, as cornpowder, fierworks, yea and pikes began to faile vs. The moſt part of the night he here beſtowed, and longer as was thought had taried, had not a ſcaberdles ſword about one of the ſouldiors as he went in the throng & darke amongſt them, thruſt him almoſt through the foot: wherevpon he withdrew him to be dreſſed, vſing firſt vnto his ſouldiors an exhortation to acquite themſelues no leſſe valiantlie the next daie, aſſuring them that one or two more ſuch bankets as this laſt, giuen to the enimie, would coole their courages for anie more aſſaults.

My lord Greies worke after the skirmiſh ended.

My L. Greie hurt by miſchance.

This night now, great noiſe & working was heard in the dich, wherevpon the bulworke was once or twice on alarum. At the laſt with creſſets it was eſpied that they were making a bridge. The morning came, and then the ſame was ſéene to be finiſhed, emptie caſks with ropes faſtened togither, & ſawed boords laid thereon. This yet did but put them within, in a certeintie of that which before they accounted of, and ſtood prepared for. To be ſhort, the enimies ſpent all the daie till it was full two of the clocke in batterie, & beating at the two laſt flankers, which at length they woone from them within, & the gunners of either ſlaine. Wherevpon the lord Greie taking counſell of ſir Henrie Palmer, maſter Lewes Diue and Montdragon the leader of the Spaniards: it was reſolued, that there might be order to make a fucaſie within the bulworke, and preſentlie to withdraw all from thence, ſauing a certeine for a face and ſtale to toll in the enimie, and then to haue blowne it

Rich. Grafton.

The duke of Guiſe and mõſieur Dandelot with their powers.

In the meane time, the duke of Guiſe hauing giuen order to monſieur Dandelot coronell of the French footmen, that he with his bands ſhould be in a readineſſe to giue the aſſault when ſigne ſhould be giuen, did withdraw him to an higher ground, from whence he might plainlie diſcouer the behauiour as well of his ſouldiors in the aſſault giuing, as alſo of the defendants in anſwering the ſame. And perceiuing not ſo manie of the Engliſh part appearing for defenſe (as he douted there would) gaue order forthwith, that a regiment of his moſt forward lanceknights ſhould mount the brech, to open the firſt paſſage: and that monſieur Dandelot with his French footbands ſhould backe them, which order was followed, with ſuch haſt & deſperat hardines, that entring a deepe ditch full of water, from the bottome whereof to the top of the breach, in ſome places, was well neare fortie foot, without feare either of the water beneath, or the fire aboue, they mounted the breach.

Rabutine.

And whereas the duke had prepared (as ye haue heard) bridges made of planke bords, borne vp with caſks and emptie pipes, tied one to another, for his men to paſſe the ſaid ditch: manie of them now at this aſſault, without care of thoſe bridges, plunged into the water, and tooke the next waie to come to the aſſault. Which hot haſt notwithſtanding, the aſſailants were at the firſt ſo ſtoutlie repelled and put backe by the defendants, being furniſhed with great ſtore of wildfire, and other fucaſies for the purpoſe, that they were turned headlong one vpon another, much faſter than they came vp, not without great waſt and ſlaughter of their beſt and moſt forward ſouldiors, to the ſmall comfort of the ſtout duke, who (as is ſaid before) ſtood all this while vpon a little hill to behold this buſineſſe. Wherefore he not induring this ſight any longer, as a man inraged, ran among his men, ſo reprouing ſome, and incouraging other, that the aſſault was hot renewed, with much more vehemencie and furie than before, and with no leſſe ſturdie obſtinacie and deſperation receiued by the defendants, whereby all the breach beneath was filled with French carcaſes.

The deſperat aduenture of the French.

The duke of Guiſe in a rage with his ſoldiers.

This notwithſtanding, the duke ſtill redoubled his forces with freſh companies, and continued ſo manie aſſaults one vpon another, that at the laſt charge, being moſt vehement of all the other, the Engliſhmen being tired, and greatlie miniſhed in their numbers, by ſlaughter and bloudie wounds, were of fine force driuen to auoid, & ſo after halfe an hours fight, the enimie entered. Which when the lord Greie beheld, he leaped to the top of the rampire, wiſhing of God that ſome ſhot would take him. When one that ſtood next him, by the ſcarffe ſuddenlie pulled him downe, otherwiſe the effects had well declared the earneſtnes of the praier: for he was not yet vp againe, when a canon ſhot grated vpon the ſame place from whence he fell. And thus verie narrowlie hée ſcaped the danger of that ſhot, which if it had hit him would (no doubt) haue wrought his diſpatch. For what is the weake frame of a mans bodie to mightie forts and ſtrong caſtels, builded of tim[illegible]r and ſtone, beſide the iron worke therewith com[illegible]ct, oftentimes redoubling the ſtrength of the ſa[illegible] And yet theſe (we ſee by experience) ruinated, batte[illegible], and laid leuell manie times with the thundering ſhot of this dreadfull artillerie: an engine of no great antiquitie, and not vſed among ancient warriours in former ages, but a late deuiſe of a Franciſcan frier; pitie it is that euer he was borne to ſet abroch ſuch a peſtilent inuention, as the poet noteth, ſhewing alſo the vſe and the miſchéefous effect therof as followeth:

The Engliſh forced to auoid & the enimie entereth.

Tormenti genus eſt ex ferro aut ære coactum,
Quod Franciſcanus frater reperiſſe refertur,
Vt capias paucis validiſsima caſtra diebus,
Quæ vix cepiſſes armis toto prius anno, &c.

But to proceed. The fight within the bulworke yet laſted, to the great ſlaughter of them that defended it. Herevpon my lord Greie preſentlie called to maiſter Lewes Diue, and others that were about him, to follow him to the gate. The maze was ſuch, that beſides his ſonne maiſter Arthur Greie, and now lord Greie, maiſter Lewes Diue, capteine Bricke well, and halfe a dozen of armed corſlets, not a man elſe did follow him. By this means the Engliſhmen were cleane driuen out of the bulworke, the enimie yet not daring to paſſe the braies, gaue them that eſcaped good leiſure to recouer the gate, where my lord Greie holding the wicket himſelfe, receiued them in. Vpon the taking of this bulworke, the ſouldiors of Whiteleies bulworke and the baſe court in diſcomfiture abandoned their charges, flieng to the caſtell: ſo that more than the Kéepe and the bodie of the caſtell no part was frée from the enimie. My lord Greie hauing receiued all his, cauſed the gates to be rammed vp.

Arthur Greie now lord Greie.

The enimie is daſtardlie, all his victories notwithſtanding.

Thus were the chéefe bulworks and vtter lims of the caſtell of Guiſnes obteined by the French, on ſaint Sebaſtians daie, being the twentith of Ianuarie, but yet not without great expenſe of bloud on both ſides: for of the French part there were ſlaine in thoſe aſſaults aboue the number of eight or nine hundred, and of the Engliſh not manie fewer: amongſt whom the greateſt loſſe lighted vpon thoſe few Spaniards and Wallons that were come to aſſiſt the Engliſh at that preſent. It was now night: when a trumpetter came to the ditches ſide in the baſe court, & ſounded a ſummons: who being called vnto, & aſked what he would, told that he was ſent to my lord Greie by the duke of Guiſe, with offer of a parlée if it would be harkened vnto. The ſouldiors no ſooner heard theſe newes, but forſaking the walles came all in rowt togither, & confuſedlie ſpeaking to their chiefteine the ſaid lord Greie, praied him to harken to the meſſage, & to haue conſideration of their liues, which ſo long as anie hope remained, they willinglie had ventured. The lord Greies anſwer was, that he maruelled, either what cauſeleſſe miſtruſt of his caring for them was now come vpon them, or what ſudden vnwonted faintneſſe of mind had ſo aſſailed them, as to cauſe them in ſuch diſorder to forſake their places, and leaue the walles naked, and he willed them to returne to the ſame.

Ric. Grafton.

A trumpetter from the duke of Guiſe to the lord Greie.

My lord Greie hereof tooke counſell, and it was thought good not to reiect the offer, the extremitie on euerie ſide weied. The trumpetter receiuing anſwer, accordinglie departed, & without long abode returned againe, requiring in the dukes behalfe hoſtages for a truce during the parlée from vs, he minding to deliuer the like into the caſtell. From him in fine monſieur Deſtrées, and a gentleman of the kings chamber were ſent in: and maiſter Arthur Greie my lords ſonne, and maiſter Lewes Diue, were put out. Monſieur Dandelot in the braies receiued them, and caried them ouer the vnfortunate bulworke, being come vpon naked and new ſlaine carcaſes, ſome of them ſpralling yet and groning vnder their féet, were onelie the earth they trod on. So paſſing downe the breach ſomewhat to the eaſe of the former heauie ſight, they ſaw it, and the ditch little leſſe fraught with the enimies corpſes. Then to the campe they came, and were lodged in the ſaid Dandelots tent.

Hoſtages required on the dukes part from the lord Greie during the time of the parlée, &c.

The next daie in the morning, the lord Greie was to méet the duke abrode: betwéene them willinglie one houre was ſpent in talking without agréement, onelie vpon this point, that the lord Greie would haue his bands depart with their enſignes diſplaied,

The duke and the lord Greie haue communication an whole houre.

which would not be yeelded vnto: ſo he returned, & the hoſtages alſo thervpon were ſent in. Monſieur Deſtrees not being yet come foorth, my lord was no ſooner entered againe, but that the ſouldiers eftſoones forſaking the walles, willinglie & to the preſent cutting of all their owne throtes (if monſieur Deſtrees himſelfe had not beene, with a few capteins & gentlemen of the lord Greies owne retinue) came and met him, crieng vpon him to haue pitie vpon them. The lord Greie herewith ſtaied, and pauſing a while, had this ſpeach.

The lord Greis words to his ſoldiers being aſhamed of their timerouſneſſe, and yet pitieng their preſent diſtreſſe.

The onelie pitie (if fond I cannot ſaie) that I haue of you, hath cauſed me this daie to make ſuch offers of compoſition, as neither your honeſties, nor my honour, nor either of our duties in my thought maie well beare, which refuſed to take harder to the vtter defacing of our credits, ſith the beſt would blot it. If I would, ſouldiers, your ſelues (me thinketh) in vengeance thereof ſhould turne your weapons vpon me, and ſacrifice ſo hartleſſe a capteine, rather than to take it as a token of a pitifull capteine ouer you, and to yeeld thanks for the ſame. We haue begun, as becommed vs: we haue yet held on as dutie doth bind vs: let vs end then as honeſt dutie and fame doth will vs. Neither is there anie ſuch extremitie of deſpaire in our caſe, but that we maie yet dearelie inough ſell our skins yer we loſe them. Let vs then either march out vnder our enſignes diſplaied, or elſe herewith die vnder them diſplaied.

Ric. Grafton.

The ſoldiers herewith in a mutinie flatlie anſwered, that they for his vainglorie would not ſell their liues. The deſperatneſſe of their caſe was not vnknowne vnto them (ſaid they) and that their liues in other ſeruice might yet auaile their prince and countrie. In this now further to venture, was but like oxen to be thruſt to the butcher. That his lordſhip was not to expect anie one blow at their hands.

The lord Greies ſouldiers in a mutinie doo murmur againſt him, &c.

Herewith in haſt came one from monſieur Deſtrees that ſtood at the rampire, aduiſing him to ſend his ſouldiors to the wals, otherwiſe that the Swiſſes would aſſuredlie enter. So conſtreined, his lordſhip promiſed them to compound, and ſo he got them to the wals. Then my lord going to councell, at length agreed vpon theſe conditions. Firſt, that the caſtell with all the furniture therin as well vittels as great artillerie, powder, and all other munitions of warre, ſhould be wholie rendred without waſting, hiding, or miniſhment thereof. Secondarilie, that the lord Greie with all the capteins, officers and others, hauing charge there, ſhould remaine priſoners at the dukes pleaſure, to be ranſomed after the maner of warre. Thirdlie, that all the reſt, as well ſouldiors as others, ſhould depart with their armors, and baggage to what parties it ſeemed them beſt: neuertheleſſe to paſſe without ſound of drum or trumpet, or enſigne, and to leaue them behind. Theſe articles ſent by monſieur Deſtrees to the duke were accepted, & ſo in the after noone, the duke himſelfe came & receiued the keies of my lord Greie, who preſentlie went out, and was giuen to the marſhall Strozzie, and from him ſold to monſieur de Randan, by whom he came into his brother the counte de Rochefoucalt his hands, and there reſted, till he was redeemed for foure and twentie thouſand crownes.

Articles of agreement betweene the lord Greie and the enimie.

The daie following, that is ſaie the two and twentith of Ianuarie, all the ſouldiors of the ſaid fortreſſe of Guiſnes, as well Engliſh as ſtrangers, with all the reſt of the inhabitants, and other (excepted the lord Greie himſelfe, maiſter Arthur Greie his ſon, ſir Henrie Palmer knight, Montdragon capteine of the Spaniards, and other men of charge reſerued by the compoſition) departed with their bag and baggage from thenſe towards Flanders. At whoſe iſſuing foorth, there were eſteemed to the number of eight or nine hundred able men for the warre, part Engliſh & part Burgognians. Of Spaniards ſo few were left, as no account is to be made of them, in maner the whole number of them being ſlaine, and ſelling their liues right deerelie, according to the order of good & hardie ſouldiors. Thus endeth this ſiege, wherein for breuities ſake we haue left to ſaie anie thing of the prouiſions that the lord Greie made againſt the ſame, of the aduertiſements that from time to time he ſent to king Philip and queene Marie, and of their anſwers, of the ſundrie aduentures which they of Guiſnes had with the enimie during their being about Calis, and of the great and manie booties that were there taken. Onelie in a word or two will I ad what bands of ſtrangers were within the peece, becauſe thereof as in an other thing or two, I doo find maiſter Grafton in his chronicle ſpeake at rouers. Firſt came in Montdragon, with two Spaniards more, verie valiant men, whome did follow within a daie or two, about foure or fiue and thirtie other Spaniards, all ſhot, of which (as I haue heard) there went not fiue out of the caſtell.

The ſoldiors of Guiſnes depart thenſe with bag and baggage.

What bands of ſtrangers were within the fort.

There came one capteine Deſquie a Burgognian, with two hundred ſouldiors, pikes moſt. This band was appointed to the Marie bulworke, whoſe capteine being full of the gout, and an impotent man, would not yet be from his charge, but in his bed ended his life in the bulworke. And ſo of this enough. But now after the winning of this towne and caſtell, the duke aduiſing well vpon the place, and conſidering that if it ſhould happen to be regained by Engliſhmen, what a noiſome neighbor the ſame might be to Calis, now being French; and ſpeciallie what impeachment ſhould come thereby for the paſſage thither from France, conſidering alſo the neere ſtanding thereof to the French kings fortreſſe of Ard: ſo that to keepe two garriſons ſo nigh togither ſhould be but a double charge, and not onlie needleſſe, but alſo dangerous for the cauſe afore rehearſed. Vpon theſe conſiderations (as the Frenchmen write) he tooke order for all the great artillerie, vittels and other munition, to be taken foorth, and the caſtell with all the bulworkes and other fortifications there, with all ſpeed to be razed and throwne downe, and the ſtuffe to be caried awaie, and emploied in other more neceſſarie places.

Rich. Graſon.

Then reſted nothing within all the Engliſh pale on that ſide vnconquered, but the little caſtell or pile called Hammes, which though it were but of ſmall force, made by art and induſtrie of mans hand, and being altogither of old workemanſhip without rampiers or bulworks: yet neuertheleſſe, by the naturall ſituation thereof, being on all ſides inuironed with fens and mariſh grounds, it could not eaſilie be approched vnto, either with great ordinance for the batterie, or elſe with anie armie to incampe there for a ſiege: but hauing one ſtreict paſſage thereto by a narrow cauſeie, trauerſed and cut through in diuerſe places, with deepe ditches, alwaies full of water. Which thing being well foreſeene by Edward lord Dudleie then capteine there, hauing as good cauſe to ſuſpect a ſiege there, as his neighbors had afore the Frenchmens comming to Guiſnes, cauſed all the brigges of the ſaid cauſeie being of wood to be broken, to giue thereby the more impeachment to the French, if they ſhould attempt to approch the ſame, as ſhortlie after they did, and kept diuerſe of the paſſages.

Hammes caſtell could not be eaſilie approched vnto, and why.

The lord Edward Dudleie.

But to deliuer the duke and his ſouldiors from that care, there came to him glad newes from thoſe that had charge to watch the ſaid cauſeie, how the capteine hauing intelligence of the rendering of Guiſnes, ſecretlie the ſame night had conueied him-ſelfe, with his ſmall garriſon by a ſecret paſſage ouer the mariſh into Flanders. Wherby the duke being now paſt care of anie further ſiege to be laid in all the frontier, tooke order foorthwith to ſeize the ſaid little fort into his own hands, as it was eaſie to doo, when there was no reſiſtance. When this peece was once ſeized by the French, then remained there none other place of defenſe nor ſtrength of the Engliſh on all that ſide the ſea, for the ſafegard of the reſt of the countrie. Whereby the French king became wholie and throughlie lord & maiſter of all the Engliſh pale: for now (as ye haue heard) there was neither towne, caſtell, or other fortreſſe, more or leſſe on that ſide (ſauing Boots bulworke neere to Graueling, which after king Philip kept as his) but that it was either taken awaie by force, or elſe abandoned, and left open to the enimie. And (as the Frenchmen write) beſides the great riches of gold and ſiluer, coine, iewels, plate, wools, and other merchandize (which was ineſtimable) there were found thrée hundred peeces of braſſe mounted on wheeles, and as manie of iron, with ſuch furniture of powder, pellets, armour, vittels, and other munitions of war ſcarſelie credible.

This was a maruellous rich bootie for the enimie, and a great loſſe to the partie contrarie.

Thus haue you heard the whole diſcourſe of the conqueſt of the noble towne of Calis, with all the Engliſh fortreſſes and countrie adioining made by the duke of Guiſe. The news whereof when they came to the French king, no need to aſke how ioifullie they were receiued, not onelie of him and all his court, but alſo vniuerſallie through the whole realme of France. For the which victorie, there was (as the maner is) Te Deum ſung, and bonefiers made euerie where, as it is wont to be in caſes of common ioy and gladneſſe, for ſome rare benefit of God. In ſo much that ſhortlie vpon the conqueſt, there was a publike aſſemblie at Paris of all the eſtates of France, who franklie in recompenſe of the kings charges emploied in the winning of Calis, and the places aforeſaid, and for maintenance of his wars to be continued afterwards, granted vnto him thrée millians of French crowns: whereof the clergie of France contributed one millian, beſides their diſmes. And no maruell though the French did highlie reioiſe at the recouerie of Calis out of the Engliſhmens hands: for it is conſtantlie affirmed of manie, that be acquainted with the affaires of France, that euer ſince the ſame towne was firſt woone by Engliſhmen, in all ſolemne councels aſſembled to treat vpon the ſtate of France, there was a ſpeciall perſon appointed to put them in remembrance from time to time of Calis: as it were to be wiſhed that the like were vſed in England, vntill it were regained from the French.

Triumphs in France for the getting againe of Calis.

A. Fl. ex opere hiſtorico Schardi collectio. pag. 1970.

¶ And here becauſe thus much is ſaid of the French by waie of diſcourſe concerning their exulting, and immoderat ioyfulneſſe manie waies teſtified, ſomewhat being alredie written thereof before: it is noteworthie, either for the increaſe of wit in vs, if it were the fault of our follie; or the aggrauating of their impudencie, if they bluſh not to publiſh a moſt lowd and lewd lie; to remember what I haue read in verſes ſet forth by a Frenchman; wherein among manie words & terms vſed touching this conqueſt of Calis & Guiſnes (wherein alſo a propheſie of Merline (of which name there were two, and both prophets) is introduced, foretelling the reuolution of the ſame to be rather fatall to that nation, than recouerable by prowesse martiall (for thus he ſaith:)

D. Powell in hiſt. Camb. pag. 4, 5.

But this is not the matter that I meant (though it conteine ſomewhat whereat men may muſe) but a further reach to the rebuke of raſhneſſe in ſome, if it were their deed; and to the ſhame of others, if the report be falſe. For thus ſaith the ſame author, whoſe verſes euen now I rehearſed, ſpeaking of the Engliſhmen, whome former victories (ſaith he) made verie venterous, confident, and full of heart; and beſides that, ſo diſdainfull and ſcornefull towards the French, that they cauſed to be grauen in hard marbell aloft at the entrie of the caſtell or fortreſſe in legible letters (but he telleth not in what language, no more than which of the Merlins propheſie it was; howbeit (ſaith he) thus much in effect in Latine:

Tùm demùm Francus premet obſidione Caletum,
Cùm ferrum plumbúmue natabit ſuberis inſtar.
Then ſhall the Frenchmen Calis win,
When iron and lead like corke ſhall ſwim.

Thus report the French, but how trulie, let them ſaie that are able (vpon their owne knowledge) to iudge: and thus much ſhall ſuffice for that matter.]

Now ſeemed euerie daie a yeare to the French king vntill he perſonallie had viſited Calis, and his new conquered countrie. Wherefore about the end of Ianuarie he tooke his viage thither, accompanied with no ſmall number of his nobilitie: and immediatlie vpon his arriuall there, he peruſed the whole towne and euerie part thereof from place to place, deuiſing with the duke of Guiſe for the better fortification thereof, what ſhould be added vnto the old, and what ſhould be made new, and what ſhould be taken awaie. And after order taken for that buſineſſe, he placed there a noble man, & no leſſe valiant knight of the order, called monſieur de Thermes to be capteine of the towne, and ſo departed he againe into France.

The French king goeth to viſit and ſee Calis.

Monſieur de Thermes made capteine of Calis.

After the French kings departure from Calis, he made great haſt for the accompliſhment of the marriage, moued betweene Francis his eldeſt ſonne, called the Dolphin, and Marie Steward daughter & ſole heire of Iames the fift late king of Scotland: which princeſſe, if the Scots had bin faithfull of promiſe, as they ſeldome be) ſhould haue married king Edward the ſixt. For the breach of which promiſe began all the warre betweene England & Scotland, as you heard in the latter end of the life of king Henrie the eight, and in the beginning of king Edward the ſixt. This mariage (ſaith Grafton) though it be not of my matter, I thought not to omit, for that manie things were meant thereby, which thanks be to God neuer came to effect. But one ſpeciall point was not hidden to the world, that by meanes of the ſame, the realme of Scotland ſhould for euermore haue remained as vnited and incorporat to the crowne of France: and that as the ſonne and heire of euerie French king doth ſucceed to the inheritance and poſſeſſion of a countrie called the Dolphin, & is therfore called Dolphin; & like as the principalitie of Wales apperteineth to the eldeſt ſon of the king of England, who therefore is called the prince of Wales: euen ſo the Dolphin heire of France ſhould thereby haue béene king of Scotland for euermore: which name and title vpon this mariage was accordinglie giuen to Francis Dolphin and heire apparant of France, to be called king Dolphin. The meaning whereof was vtterlie to exclude for euermore anie to be king of Scotland, but onelie the eldeſt ſonne of France.

The mariage betweene the Dolphin and the princeſſe of Scots.

Why the ſon and heire of euerie French king is called the Dolphin.

This memorable marriage was ſolemnized in the citie of Paris the foure and twentith daie of Aprill, in the yeere of Chriſt 1558, with moſt magnificall pompe and triumph, and honored with the preſence of the moſt part of the princes, prelats, lords and barons of both the realmes, as it were for a confirmation of this new aliance. Which as it was much to the aduantage and benefit of France: ſo nothing could be more preiudice & derogation to the crowne of Scotland, as a deuiſe tending to the perpetuall aboliſhing and extinguiſhment of the name & ſtate of kings in that realme. In this meane time alſo the quéene Dowager of Scotland had doone what in hir laie, to procure the Scotiſh nobilitie to make warres againſt England: but they being not willing thereto, monſieur Doiſell coronell of certeine bands of Frenchmen came to Aimouth within ſix miles of Berwike, and fortified that place, making ſundrie rodes and inuaſions into England. In reuenge whereof the Engliſhmen made the like inrodes into Scotland, wherevpon the Scotiſhmen in their defenſe (as ſome pretend) were driuen to haue warres: and therevpon the earle of Huntleie was made lieutenant of the Scots borders, who remaining there by the helpe of the Frenchmen did manie diſpleaſures to the Engliſhmen. This warre was begun in the yéere laſt paſt, and ſo continued: during the which manie ſkirmiſhes and diuerſe proper feats of armes were put in practiſe betwixt the parties (as in the hiſtorie of Scotland more at large it doth appéeare) where we ſpeake of the doings in the yeares 1557 and 1558.

Alſo this yeare within a mile of Notingham, was a maruellous tempeſt of thunder, which as it came through two townes, beat downe all the houſes and churches, the bels were caſt to the ont ſide of the churchyards, and ſome webs of lead foure hundred foot into the field, writhen like a paire of gloues. Fiue or ſix men thereabout were ſlaine, and neither fleſh nor ſkinne periſhed; there fell ſome haileſtones that were fiftéene inches about, &c. This yeare in harueſt time the quartane agues continued in like maner, or more vebementlie, than they had doone the laſt yeare paſt, where through died manie old people, and ſpeciallie prieſts, ſo that a great number of pariſhes were vnſerued, and no curats to be gotten: and much corne was loſt in the field for lacke of workemen & laborers. Wherevpon inſued a great ſcarſitie; ſo that in the beginning of ſir Thomas Leighs maioraltie, corne roſe to fourtéene ſhillings the quarter, and wood waxed ſcant in London, and was ſold for thirtéene and fouretéene ſhillings the thouſand of billets, and coles at ten pence the ſacke, by reaſon of the great death and ſickneſſe the laſt ſummer for lacke of helpe and carriage.] ¶And here before we paſſe the yeare 1558, it were a fowle ouerſight, not to make mention of a memorable diſcourſe touching the ladie Katharine late dutcheſſe of Suffolke, a perſonage of honor, and worthie of commemoration in chronicles for hir godlineſſe to hir high praiſe: where manie a maleſactor is recorded for their outragious wickedneſſe to their immortall ſhame. Concerning the ſaid ladie therefore thus writeth maſter Fox.

Abr.Fl. ex I.S pag. 1106. A preſt to the quéene.

A wonderfull tempeſt of thunder wonderfull indéed.

A great death of old people through vehement quartane agues.

Ex Ioh. Foxi martyrologio. The old hatred of Stephan Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter againſt the dutcheſſe of Suffolke.

Stephan Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter, ſurmiſing the ladie Katharine baroneſſe of Willoughbie and Creſbie, and ducheſſe Dowager of Suffolke, to be one of his ancient enimies, becauſe he knew he had deſerued no better of hir, deuiſed in the holie time of the firſt Lent in quéen Maries reigne, a holie practiſe of reuenge, firſt by touching hir in the perſon of hir huſband maiſter Richard Bertie eſquier, for whome he ſent an attachment (hauing the great ſeale at his deuotion) to the ſhiriffe of Lincolnſhire, with a ſpeciall letter, commanding moſt ſtrictlie the ſame ſhiriffe to attach the ſaid Richard immediatlie, and without baile to bring him vp to London to his great lordſhip. Maiſter Bertie hir huſband being cleare in conſcience, and frée from offenſe towards the quéene, could not coniecture anie cauſe of this ſtrange proceſſe, vnleſſe it were ſome quarrell for religion, which he thought could not be ſo ſore as the proceſſe pretended.

Maiſter Richard Bertie huſband to the dutcheſſe, attached by the biſhop of Wincheſter.

The ſhiriffe, notwithſtanding the commandement, aduentured onelie to take the bond of maiſter Bertie, with two ſuerties in a thouſand pounds for his appéerance, to be made before the biſhop on good fridaie following: at which daie maiſter Bertie appéered, the biſhop then lieng at his houſe by ſaint Marie Oueries. Of whoſe preſence when the biſhop vnderſtood by a gentleman of his chamber, in a great rage he came out of his gallerie into his dining chamber, where he found a preaſe of ſuters, ſaieng he would not that daie heare anie: but came forth onelie to know of maiſter Bertie, how he being a ſubiect durſt ſo arrogantlie ſet at light two former proceſſes of the quéenes. Maiſter Bertie anſwered, that albeit my lords words might ſéeme to the reſt ſomewhat ſharpe towards him, yet he conceiued great comfort of them. For whereas he before thought it extremitie to be attached, hauing vſed no obſtinacie or contumacie: now he gathered of thoſe words, that my lord ment not otherwiſe but to haue vſed ſome ordinarie proceſſe; albeit indéed none came to his hands. Yea Marie, quoth the biſhop, I haue ſent you two Subpœnas, to appéere immediatlie, and I am ſure you receiued them: for I committed the truſt of them to no worſſe man but to maiſter ſolicitor, and I ſhall make you an example to all Lincolnſhire for your obſtinacie. Maiſter Bertie denieng the receipt of anie, humblie praied his lordſhip to ſuſpend his diſpleſure and the puniſhment, till he had good triall thereof: and then (if it pleaſed him) to double the paine for the fault, if anie were. Well (quoth the biſhop) I haue appointed my ſelfe this daie (according to the holineſſe of the ſame) for deuotion, and I will not further trouble me with you: but I inioine you in a thouſand pounds, not to depart without leaue, and to be here againe to morrow at ſeauen of the clocke.

Maſter Bertie appeareth before biſhop Gardiner.

Talke betwéene biſhop Gardiner and maiſter Bertie.

The deuotion of biſhop Gardiner to good fridaie.

Maiſter Bertie attached for debt of foure thouſand pounds due to the quéene.

Maiſter Bertie well obſerued the houre, and no tot failed. At the which time the biſhop had with him maiſter ſergeant Stamford, to whome he moued certeine queſtions of the ſaid maſter Bertie, bicauſe maſter ſergeant was towards the lord Wriotheſleie late earle of Southampton, & chancellor of England, with whom the ſaid maſter Bertie was brought vp. Maſter ſergeant made verie friendlie report of maſter Bertie of his owne knowledge for the time of their conuerſation togither. Wherevpon the biſhop cauſed maiſter Bertie to be brought in; and firſt making a falſe traine (as God would, without fire) before he would deſcend to the quarrell of religion, he aſſaulted him in this maner. The quéenes pleaſure is (quoth the biſhop) that you ſhall make preſent paiment of foure thouſand pounds due to hir father by duke Charles, late huſband to the dutcheſſe your wife, whoſe executor ſhe was. Pleaſeth it your lordſhip (quoth maiſter Bertie) that debt is eſtalled, and is according to that eſtallment trulie anſwered. Tuſh (quoth the biſhop) the quéene will not be bound to

to eſtallments, in the time of Kets gouernment, for ſo I eſteeme the late gouernment. The eſtallment (quoth maiſter Bertie) was appointed by king Henrie the eight; beſides, the ſame was by ſpeciall commiſſioners confirmed in king Edwards time, and the lord treaſuror being an executor alſo to the duke Charles ſolie and wholie, tooke vpon him before the ſaid commiſſioners to diſcharge the ſame.

A dog clothed in a rochet vnder the name of biſhop Gardiner.

It is merie with lambs when wolues be tied.

If it be true that you ſaie (quoth the biſhop) I will ſhew you fauor. But of an other thing maiſter Bertie, I will admoniſh you as mening you well. I heare euill of your religion; yet I hardlie can think euill of you, whoſe mother I know to be as godlie and catholike, as anie within this land, your ſelfe brought vp with a maiſter, whoſe education if I ſhould diſallow, I might be charged as author of his error. Beſides partlie I know you my ſelfe, and vnderſtand of my friends inough to make me your friend: wherefore I will not doubt of you, but I praie you if I maie aſke the queſtion of my ladie your wife; is ſhe now as readie to ſet vp the maſſe, as ſhe was latelie to pull it downe, when ſhe cauſed in hir progreſſe, a dog in a rochet to be caried & called by my name? Or doth ſhe thinke hir lambs now ſafe inough, which ſaid to me when I vailed my bonnet to hir out of my chamber window in the tower, that it was merie with the lambs now the wolfe was ſhut vp? Another time my lord hir huſband hauing inuited me and diuerſe ladies to dinner, deſired euerie ladie to choſe him whome ſhe loued beſt, and ſo place themſelues. My ladie your wife taking me by the hand, for that my lord would not haue hir to take himſelfe, ſaid, that for ſo much as ſhe could not ſit downe with my lord whome ſhe loued beſt, ſhe had choſen me whome ſhe loued worſt.

Purgation of the ladie ducheſſe for not comming to maſſe.

Of the deuiſe of the dog, quoth maſter Bertie, ſhe was neither the author nor the allower. The words, though in that ſeaſon they ſounded bitter to your lordſhip: yet if it ſhould pleaſe you without offenſe to know the cauſe, I am ſure the one will purge the other. As touching ſetting vp of maſſe, which ſhe learned not onelie by ſtrong perſuaſions of diuerſe excellent learned men, but by vniuerſall conſent and order whole ſix yeares paſt inwardlie to abhorre; if ſhe ſhould outwardlie allow, ſhe ſhould both to Chriſt ſhew hir ſelfe a falſe chriſtian, and vnto hir prince a maſking ſubiect. You know my lord, one by iudgement reformed, is more worth than a thouſand tranſformed temporizors. To force a confeſſion of religion by mouth, contrarie to that in the heart, worketh damnation where ſaluation is pretended. Yea marie (quoth the biſhop) that deliberation would doo well if ſhe neuer required to come from an old religion to a new. But now ſhe is to returne from a new to an ancient religion: wherein when ſhe made me hir goſſip, ſhe was as earneſt as anie.

Religion goeth not by age, but by truth.

Maſter Bertie releaſed from his band of appearing.

For that, my lord (ſaid M. Bertie) not long ſince, ſhe anſwered a friend of hirs vſing your lordſhips ſpeech, that religion went not by age but by truth: and therefore ſhe was to be turned by perſuaſion and not by commandement. I praie you (quoth the biſhop) thinke you it poſſible to perſuade hir? Yea verelie (ſaid maſter Bertie) with the truth: for ſhe is reaſonable inough. The biſhop thereunto replieng, ſaid: It will be a maruellous griefe to the prince of Spaine, and to all the nobilitie that ſhall come with him, when they ſhall find but two noble perſonages of the Spaniſh race within this land, the queene, and my ladie your wife, and one of them gone from the faith. Maſter Bertie anſwered, that he truſted they ſhould find no fruits of infidelitie in hir. So the biſhop perſuading maſter Bertie to trauell earneſtlie for the reformation of hir opinion, and offering large friendſhip, releaſed him of his band from further appearance.

Waies practiſed how to conueie the ducheſſe ouer the ſeas with the queenes licence.

Maſter Bertie deuiſeth cauſes to paſſe ouer into Flanders.

The ducheſſe and hir huſband, daſlie more and more, by their friends vnderſtanding that the biſhop meant to call hir to an account of hir faith, whereby extreamitie might follow, deuiſed waies how by the queenes licence they might paſſe the ſeas. Maſter Bertie had a redie meane: for there reſted great ſummes of monie due to the old duke of Suffolke (one of whoſe executors the ducheſſe was) beyond the ſeas, the emperour himſelfe being one of thoſe debtors. Maſter Bertie communicated this his purpoſed ſute for licence to paſſe the ſeas, and the cauſe, to the biſhop; adding, that he tooke this time moſt meet to deale with the emperour, by reaſon of likelihood of marriage betweene the queene and his ſonne. I like your deuiſe well (quoth the biſhop) but I thinke it better, that you tarrie the princes comming, and I will procure you his letters alſo to his father. Naie (quoth maſter Bertie) vnder your lordſhips correction & pardon of ſo liberall ſpeech, I ſuppoſe the time will then be leſſe conuenient: for when the marriage is conſummate, the emperour hath his deſire: but till then he will refuſe nothing to win credit with vs.

Maſter Bertie licenced by the queene to paſſe the ſeas.

Preparation made how to conueie the ducheſſe ouer the ſeas.

M. Cranwell a truſtie friend to maſter Bertie.

By ſaint Marie (quoth the biſhop, ſmiling) you geſſe ſhrewdlie. Well, proceed in your ſute vnto the queene, and it ſhall not lacke my helping hand. Maſter Bertie found ſo good ſucceſſe, that he in few daies obteined the queenes licence, not onlie to paſſe the ſeas, but to paſſe and repaſſe them ſo often as to him ſeemed good, till he had finiſhed all his buſineſſe and cauſes beyond the ſeas. So he paſſed the ſeas at Douer about the beginning of Iune in the firſt yeare of hir reigne, leauing the ducheſſe behind, who by agreement and conſent betwixt hir and hir huſband, followed, taking barge at Lion keie, verie earlie in the morning, on the firſt daie of Ianuarie next inſuing, not without ſome perill. There was none of thoſe that went with hir, made priuie to hir going till the inſtant, but an old gentleman called maſter Robert Cranwell, whome maſter Bertie had ſpeciallie prouided for that purpoſe. She tooke with hir hir daughter an infant of one yeare, and the meaneſt of hir ſeruants: for ſhe doubted the beſt would not aduenture that fortune with hir. They were in number foure men, one a Greeke borne, which was a rider of horſſes, an other a ioiner, the third a brewer, the fourth a foole one of the kitchin, one gentlewoman, and a landreſſe.

The ducheſſe with hir companie departed the realme.

The maner of the ducheſſe fleeng out of hir houſe.

As ſhe departed hir houſe called the Barbican, betwixt foure and fiue of the clocke in the morning, with hir companie and baggage, one Atkinſon an herald, keeper of hir houſe, hearing noiſe about the houſe, roſe and came forth with a torch in his hand as ſhe was yet iſſuing out of the gate: wherewith being amazed, ſhe was forced to leaue a male with neceſſaries for hir yong daughter, & a milkepot with milke in the ſame gatehouſe, commanding all hir ſeruants to ſpeed them before awaie to Lion keie: and taking with hir onelie the two women and hir child, ſo ſoone as ſhe was out of hir owne houſe, perceiuing the herald to follow, ſhe ſtept in at Garterhouſe hard by. The herald comming out of the ducheſſe houſe, and ſeeing no bodie ſtirring, not aſſured (though by the male ſuſpecting) that ſhe was departed, returned in: and while he ſtaied ranſacking parcels left in the male, the ducheſſe iſſued into the ſtreet, and proceeded in hir iournie, he knowing the place onelie by name where ſhe ſhould take hir boat, but not the waie thither, nor none with hir. Likewiſe hir ſeruants hauing diuided themſelues, none but one knew the waie to the ſaid keie.

So ſhe apparelled like a meane merchants wife, and the reſt like meane ſeruants, walking in the ſtreets vnknowne, ſhe tooke the way that led to Finſburie field, and the others walked the citie ſtréets as they laie open before them, till by chance more than diſcretion, they met all ſuddenlie together a litle within More gate, from whence they paſſed directlie to Lion keie, and there tooke barge in a morning ſo miſtie, that the ſteareſman was loth to lanch out, but that they vrged him. So ſoone as the daie permitted, the councell was informed of hir departure, and ſome of them came foorthwith to hir houſe to inquire of the maner thereof, and tooke an inuentarie of hir goods, beſides further order deuiſed for ſearch and watch to apprehend and ſtaie hir. The fame of hir departure reached to Leigh, a towne at the lands end, before hir approching thither. By Leigh dwelt one Goſling a merchant of London, an old acquaintance of Cranwels, whither the ſaid Cranwell brought the ducheſſe, naming hir miſtreſſe White, the daughter of maſter Goſling, for ſuch a daughter he had which neuer was in that countrie. There ſhe repoſed hir, and made new garments for hir daughter, hauing loſt hir owne in the male at Barbican.

The ducheſſe with hir companie taketh barge.

Purſute after the ducheſſe.

The ducheſſe reteined in M. Goſlings houſe by Leigh, vnder the name of his daughter.

When the time came that ſhe ſhould take ſhip, being conſtreind that night to lie at an inne in Leigh (where ſhe was againe almoſt bewraied) yet notwithſtanding by Gods good working ſhe eſcaping that hazzard, at length as the tide and wind did ſerue, they went abord, and being carried twiſe into the ſeas, almoſt into the coaſt of Zeland, by contrarie wind were driuen to the place from whence they came. And at the laſt recuile, certeine perſons came to the ſhore, ſuſpecting ſhe was within that ſhip: yet hauing examined one of hir companie that was one land for freſh Achates, and finding by the ſimplicitie of his tale, onelie the appearance of a meane merchants wife to be a ſhipbord, he ceaſed anie further ſearch. To be ſhort, ſo ſoone as the ducheſſe had landed in Brabant, ſhe and hir women were apparelled like the women of Netherland with hukes, and ſo ſhe and hir huſband tooke their iournie towards Cleueland, and being arriued at a towne therin called Santon, tooke a houſe there, vntill they might further deuiſe of ſome ſure place where to ſettle themſelues.

The hard aduenture of the ducheſſe vpon the ſeas.

The ducheſſe landed in Brabant. M. Bertie with the ducheſſe his wife arriued at Santon.

About fiue miles from Santon is a frée towne called Weſell, vnder the ſaid duke of Cleues dominion, and one of the Hauns townes, priuileged with the companie of the Stilliard in London, whither diuerſe Wallons were fled for religion, and had for their miniſter one Francis Peruſell, then called Francis de Riuers, who had receiued ſome courteſie in England at the ducheſſe hands. Maſter Bertie being yet at Santon, practiſed with him to obteine a protection from the magiſtrats for his abode and his wiues at Weſell: which was the ſooner procured bicauſe the ſtate of the ducheſſe was not diſcouered but onelie to the chéefe magiſtrate, earneſtlie bent to ſhew them pleaſure, whileſt this protection was in ſéeking.

The frée towne of Weſell in Cleueland.

A protection procured for the ducheſſe, of the magiſtrates of Weſell.

In the meane while, at the towne of Santon was a muttering, that the ducheſſe and hir huſband were greater perſonages than they gaue themſelues foorth, and the magiſtrats not verie well inclined to religion; the biſhop of Arras alſo being deane of the great minſter, order was taken, that the duches and hir huſband ſhould be examined of their condition and religion vpon the ſudden. Which practiſe diſcouered by a gentleman of that countrie to maſter Bertie, he without delaie taking no more than the duches hir daughter, and two other with them, as though he meant no more but to take the aire, about thrée of the clocke in the afternoone in Februarie, on foot, without hiering of horſſe or wagon for feare of diſcloſing his purpoſe, meant priuilie that night to get to Weſell, leauing his other familie ſtill at Santon.

Another eſcape of the ducheſſe and hir huſband.

After the duches and he were one Engliſh mile from the towne, there fell a mightie raine of continuance, whereby a long froſt and iſe before congealed was thawed, which doubled more the wearineſſe of thoſe new lackies. But being now on the waie, and ouertaken with the night, they ſent their two ſeruants (which onelie went with them) to villages, as they paſſed, to hire ſome car for their eaſe: but none could be hired. In the mene time maſter Bertie was forced to carrie the child, and the duches his cloke and rapier. At laſt betwixt ſix and ſeauen of the clocke in the darke night, they came to Weſell, and repairing to their innes for lodging and ſome repoſe after ſuch a painfull iourneie, found hard interteinment: for going from inne to inne, offering large monie for ſmall lodging, they were refuſed of all the inholders, ſuſpecting maſter Bertie to be a lanceknight, and the duches to be his woman. The child for cold and ſuſtenance cried pittifullie, the mother wept as faſt, and the heauens rained as faſt as the clouds could powre.

The hard diſtreſſe of the ducheſſe by euill wether.

The hard interteinment of M. Bertie & the ducheſſe at their entring into Weſell.

Maſter Bertie deſtitute of all other ſuccor of hoſpitalitie, reſolued to bring the ducheſſe to the porch of the great church in the towne, and ſo to buie coles, victuals and ſtraw for their miſerable repoſe there that night, or at leaſt till by Gods helpe he might prouide hir better lodging. Maſter Bertie at that time vnderſtood not much Dutch, and by reaſon of euill weather and late ſeaſon of the night, he could not happen vpon anie that could ſpeake Engliſh, French, Italian, or Latine; till at laſt going towards the church porch, he heard two ſtriplings talking Latine, to whome he approched and offered them two ſtiuers to bring him to ſome Wallons houſe. By theſe boies, and Gods good conduct, he chanced at the firſt vpon the houſe where maſter Peruſell ſupped that night, who had procured them the protection of the magiſtrats of that towne. At the firſt knocke, the goodman of the houſe himſelfe came to the doore, and opening it, aſked maſter Bertie what he was. Maſter Bertie ſaid, an Engliſhman, that ſought for one maſter Peruſels houſe. The Wallon willed maſter Bertie to ſtaie a while, who went backe and told maſter Peruſell that the ſame Engliſh gentleman, of whome they had talked the ſame ſupper, had ſent, by likelihood his ſeruant to ſpeake with him. Whervpon maſter Peruſell came to the doore, and beholding maſter Bertie, the ducheſſe, & their child, their faces, apparels, and bodies ſo farre from their old forme, deformed with durt, weather, and heauineſſe, could not ſpeake to them, nor they to him for teares. At length recouering themſelues, they ſaluted one another, & ſo togither entered the houſe, God knoweth full ioifullie: maſter Bertie changing of his apparell with the goodman, the ducheſſe with the good wife, and their child with the child of the houſe.

Gods prouidence in time of diſtreſſe.

The méeting of W. Peruſel & the ducheſſe at Weſell.

Within few daies after, by maſter Peruſels means, they hired a verie faire houſe in the towne, and did not let to ſhew themſelues what they were, in ſuch good ſort as their preſent condition permitted. It was by this time through the whole towne what diſcourteſie the inholders had ſhewed vnto them at their entrie, in ſo much as on the ſundaie following, a preacher in the pulpit openlie in ſharpe termes rebuked that great inciuilitie towards ſtrangers; by allegation of ſundrie places out of holie ſcriptures, diſcourſing how not onelie princes ſometime are receiued in the image of priuat perſons, but angels in the ſhape of men, and that God of his iuſtice would make the ſtrangers one day in an other land, to haue more ſenſe of the afflicted heart of a ſtranger. The time was paſſing foorth, as they thought themſelues thus happilie ſetled, ſuddenlie a watchword came from ſir John Maſon, then quéene Maries ambaſſadour in Netherland, that my lord Paget had fained an errant to the baths that waies: and whereas the duke of Brunſwicke was ſhortlie with ten enſignes to paſſe by Weſell for the ſeruice of the houſe of Auſtricke againſt the French king, the ſaid ducheſſe, and hir huſband ſhould be with the ſame charge and companie intercepted. Wherefore to preuent the crueltie of theſe enimies, maſter Bertie with his wife and child departed to a place called Winheim in high Dutchland vnder the Palſgraues dominion, where vnder his protection they continued till their neceſſaries began to faile them, and they almoſt fainting vnder ſo heauie a burthen, began to faile of hope.

Ioan. Alaſco a meanes to the king of Pole for the ducheſſe of Suffolke.

The dutcheſſe inuited into Poleland by the kings letters.

M. Barlow a meſſenger from the dutcheſſe to the king of Pole.

At what time, in the middeſt of their deſpaire, there came ſuddenlie letters to them from the Palatine of Vilna and the king of Pole, being inſtructed of their hard eſtate by a baron named Ioannes Alaſco, that was ſomtime in England, offring them large curteſie. This puruiſon vnlooked for greatlie reuiued their heauie ſpirits. Yet conſidering they ſhould remoue from manie their countriemen and acquaintance, to a place ſo farre diſtant, a countrie not haunted with the Engliſh, and perhaps vpon their arriuall not finding as they looked for, the end of their iornie ſhould be worſe than the beginning: they deuiſed therevpon with one maiſter Barlow, late biſhop of Chicheſter, that if he would vouchſafe to take ſome paines therin, they would make him a fellow of that iournie. So finding him prone, they ſent with him letters of great thanks to the king & Palatine, and alſo with a few principall iewels (which onlie they had left of manie) to ſolicit for them, that the king would vouchſafe vnder his ſeale, to aſſure them of the thing which he ſo honourablie by letters offered.

The Palatine of Vilna a great friend of the dutches.

The dutches taketh hir iournie toward Pole.

The troubles happening to the dutches in hir iournie to Poleland.

That ſute by the forwardnes of the Palatine was as ſoone granted as vttered. Vpon which aſſurance the ſaid dutcheſſe and hir huſband, with their familie, entred the iournie in Aprill 1557, from the caſtell of Winheim, where they before laie, towards Francford. In the which their iournie, it were long here to deſcribe what dangers fell by the waie vpon them, & their whole companie, by reaſon of the Lantgraues capteines, who vnder a quarrell pretenſed for a ſpaniell of maiſter Berties, ſet vpon them in the high waie, with his horſſemen, thruſting their boreſpears through the wagon where the children and women were, maiſter Bertie hauing but foure horſſemen with him. In the which brabble it happened the capteins horſſe to be ſlaine vnder him.

M. Bertie in great danger of his life.

Wherevpon a rumor was ſparſed immediatlie through townes and villages about, that the Lantgraues capteine ſhould be ſlaine by ſome Wallons, which incenſed the ire of the countriemen there more fiercelie againſt maiſter Bertie, as afterwards it prooued. For as he was motioned by his wife to ſaue himſelfe by the ſwiftnes of his horſſe, and to recouer ſome towne thereby for his reſcue, he ſo dooing was in worſe caſe than before: for the towneſmen and the capteines brother ſuppoſing no leſſe but that the capteine had béene ſlaine, preſſed ſo egerlie vpon him, that he had béene there taken and murthered among them, had not he (as God would) ſpieng a ladder leaning to a window, by the ſame got vp into the houſe, and ſo gone vp in to a garret in the top of the houſe, where he with his dag and rapier defended himſelfe for a ſpace: but at length the Burghmaiſter comming thither with another magiſtrate, which could ſpeake Latine, he was counſelled to ſubmit himſelfe vnto the order of the law. Maiſter Bertie knowing himſelfe cléere, and the capteine to be aliue, was the more bolder to ſubmit himſelfe to the iudgement of the law, vpon condition that the magiſtrate would receiue him vnder ſafe conduct, and defend him from the rage of the multitude. Which being promiſed, maiſter Bertie putteth himſelfe and his weapon in the magiſtrates hand, and ſo was committed to ſafe cuſtodie, while the truth of his cauſe ſhould be tried. Then maſter Bertie writing his letters to the Lantgraue and to the earle of Erbagh, the next daie erlie in the morning the earle of Erbagh dwelling within eight miles, came to the towne whither the dutcheſſe was brought with hir wagon, maiſter Bertie alſo being in the ſame towne vnder cuſtodie.

The earle, who had ſome intelligence of the dutches before, after he was come, & had ſhewed ſuch courteſie as he thought to hir eſtate was ſéemelie, the towneſmen perceiuing the earle to behaue himſelfe ſo humblie vnto hir, began to conſider more of the matter: and further vnderſtanding the capteine to be aliue, both they, and eſpecallie the authors of the ſtir ſhrunke awaie, and made all the friends they could to maiſter Bertie and his wife, not to report their dooings after the worſt ſort. And thus maiſter Bertie and his wife eſcaping that danger, procéeded in their iournie toward Poleland, where in concluſion they were quietlie interteined of the king, and placed honorablie in the earledome of the ſaid king of Poles in Sanogelia, called Crozan, where maiſter Bertie with the dutcheſſe hauing the kings abſolute power of gouernment ouer the ſaid earldome, continued both in great quietneſſe and honor, till the death of quéene Marie.] Whoſe troubleſome time (ſauoring altogither of bloudſhed & mercileſſe murthering of Gods ſaints, whereof the poet ſaith full trulie, being expired, and the peaceable reigne of gratious quéene Elizabeth eſtabliſhed, the ſaid dutcheſſe and hir huſband returned into England, where they liued in libertie both of bodie and mind; in which good ſtate we will leaue them. And bicauſe we are entred into a diſcourſe of troubles happening to perſonages of good account and name; it is neceſſarie that wée adde another narration of like argument vnto the former, concerning the troubles and happie deliuerance of the reuerend father in God doctor Sands, firſt biſhop of Worceſter, next of London, and now archbiſhop of Yorke, as I find it word for word in maiſter Fox, who beginneth and continueth the ſaid diſcourſe as followeth.

Abr.Fl. ex I.F. martyrologio.

D. Sands vicechancellor when the duke of Northumberland came down to Cambridge to proclame the ladie Jene quéene.

¶ King Edward died, the world being vnworthie of him, the duke of Northumberland came downe to Cambridge with an armie of men, hauing commiſſion to proclame ladie Iane quéene, and by power to ſuppreſſe ladie Marie, who tooke vpon hir that dignitie, and was proclamed quéene in Norffolke. The duke ſent for doctor Sands being vicechancellor, for doctor Parker, for doctor Bill, and maiſter Leauer, to ſup with him. Amongſt other ſpéeches he ſaid; Maiſters, praie for vs that we ſpéed well: if not, you ſhall be made biſhops, and we deacons. And euen ſo it came to paſſe: doctor Parker, and doctor Sands were made biſhops, and he and ſir Iohn Gates, who was then at the table, were made deacons yer it was long after on the tower hill. Doctor Sands being vicechancellor, was required to preach on the morrow. The warning was ſhort for ſuch an auditorie, and to ſpeake of ſuch a matter: yet he refuſed not the thing, but went to his chamber, and ſo to bed. He roſe at thrée of the clocke in the morning, tooke his bible in his hand, and after that he had praied a good ſpace, he ſhut his eies, and holding his bible before him, earneſtlie praied to God that it might fall open where a moſt fit text ſhould be for him to intreat of. The bible (as God would haue it) fell open vpon the firſt chapter of Ioſua, where he found ſo conuenient a péece of ſcripture for that time, that the like he could not haue choſen in all the bible. His text was thus: Reſponderúntque ad Ioſue, atque dixerunt, Omnia quæ præcepiſti nobis faciemus, & quocunque miſeris ibimus: ſicut obediuimus in cunctis Moſi ita obediemus & tibi, tantùm ſit Dominus Deus tuus tecum ſicut fuit cum Moſe, qui contradixerit ori tuo, & non obedierit cunctis ſermonibus quos præceperis ei, moriatur: tu tantùm confortare & viriliter age. Who ſhall conſider what was concluded by ſuch as named themſelues by the ſtate, and withall, the auditorie, the time, and other circumſtances, he ſhall eaſilie ſée that this text moſt fitlie ſerued for the purpoſe. And as God gaue the text, ſo gaue he him ſuch order and vtterance, as pulled manie teares out of the eies of the biggeſt of them.

The text of D. Sands wherevpon he made his ſermon.

In the time of his ſermon one of the gard lift vp to him into the pulpit a maſſe booke and a graile, which ſir George Howard with certeine of the gard had taken that night in maſter Hurleſtons houſe, where ladie Marie had béene a little before, & there had maſſe. The duke with the reſt of the nobilitie required doctor Sands to put his ſermon in writing; and appointed maiſter Leauer to go to London with it, and to put it in print. Doctor Sands required one daie and a halfe for writing of it. At the time appointed he had made it readie, and maiſter Leauer was readie booted to receiue it at his hands, & carie it to London. As he was deliuering of it, one of the bedels named maiſter Adams, came wéeping to him, & praied him to ſhift for himſelfe, for the duke was retired, and quéene Marie proclamed.

The duke & nobles deſire D. Sands to write his ſermon that it might be printed.

Doctor Sands was not troubled herewithall, but gaue the ſermon written to maſter Leifield; maſter Leauer departed home, and he went to dinner to one maſter Mores a bedell, his great friend. At the dinner, miſtreſſe More ſéeing him merrie and pleaſant (for he had euer a mans courage, and could not be terrified) dranke vnto him, ſaieng: Maſter vicechancellor, I drinke vnto you, for this is the laſt time that euer I ſhall ſée you. And ſo it was, for ſhée was dead before doctor Sands returned out of Germanie. The duke that night retired to Cambridge, and ſent for doctor Sands to go with him to the market place to proclame quéene Marie. The duke caſt vp his cap with others, and ſo laughed, that the tears ran downe his chéekes for gréefe. He told doctor Sands that quéene Marie was a mercifull woman, and that he doubted not thereof: declaring, that hée had ſent vnto hir to know hir pleaſure, and looked for a generall pardon. Doctor Sands anſwered; My life is not deare vnto me, neither haue I done or ſaid anie thing that vrgeth my conſcience. For that which I ſpake of the ſtate, I haue inſtructions warranted by the ſubſcription of ſixtéene councellors. Neither can ſpeach be treaſon, neither yet haue I ſpoken further than the word of God, and lawes of this realme doth warrant me, come of me what God will. But be you aſſured, you ſhall neuer eſcape death: for if ſhée would ſaue you, thoſe that now ſhall rule will kill you.

Miſtreſſe More ſpake truer than peraduenture ſhe thought.

D. Sands words to the duke touching his owne ſermon and the dukes action.

That night the gard apprehended the duke, and certeine groomes of the ſtable were as buſie with doctor Sands, as if they would take a priſoner. But ſir Iohn Gates who laie then in doctor Sands his houſe, ſharplie rebuked them, and draue them awaie. Doctor Sands, by the aduiſe of ſir Iohn Gates, walked into the fields. In the meane time the vniuerſitie (contrarie to all order) had met togither in conſultation, and ordered that doctor Mouſe and doctor Hatcher ſhould repaire to doctor Sands lodging, and fet awaie the ſtatute booke of the vniuerſitie, the keies, and ſuch other things that were in his kéeping, and ſo they did. For doctor Mouſe being an earneſt proteſtant the daie before, and one whome doctor Sands had doone much for, now was he become a papiſt, and his great enimie.

Euill intended againſt doctor Sands.

Certeine of the vniuerſitie had appointed a congregation at afternoone. As the bell rang to it, doctor Sands commeth out of the fields, and ſending for the bedels, asketh what the matter meaneth, and requireth them to wait vpon him to the ſchooles, according to their dutie. So they did. And ſo ſoone as doctor Sands, the bedels going before him, came into the regent houſe and tooke his chaire; one maſter Mitch with a rabble of vnlearned papiſts went into a byſchoole, and conſpired togither to pull him out of his chaire, and to vſe violence vnto him. Doctor Sands began his oration, expoſtulating with the vniuerſitie, charging them with great ingratitude, declaring that he had ſaid nothing in his ſermon, but that hée was readie to iuſtifie, and that there caſe was all one with his: for they had not onelie concealed, but conſented to that which he had ſpoken.

A conſpiracie of papiſts againſt doctor Sands, and their behauior towards him.

And thus while he remembred vnto them how beneficiall he had béene to the vniuerſitie, and their vnthankfulneſſe to him againe, in commeth maiſter Mitch with his conſpirators about twentie in number. One laieth hand vpon the chaire to pull it from him, another told him that that was not his place, and another called him traitor. Whereat he perceiuing how they vſed violence, and being of great courage, groped to his dagger, and had diſpatched ſome of them as Gods enimies; if doctor Bill and doctor Blith had not fallen vpon him, and praied him for Gods ſake to hold his hands and be quiet, and patientlie to beare that great offered wrong. He was perſuaded by them, and after that tumult was ceaſed, he ended his oration, and hauing ſome monie of the vniuerſities in his hands, he there deliuered the ſame euerie farthing. He gaue vp the books, reckonings & keies perteining to the vniuerſitie, & withall yéelded vp his office, praieng God to giue to the vniuerſitie a better officer, and to giue them better and more thankfull hearts, and ſo repaired home to his owne college.

D. Sands couragious heart and manhood.

D. Sands reſigneth vp his office of vicechancellorſhip

On the morrow after, there came vnto him one maſter Gerningham, and one maſter Thomas Mildmaie. Gerningham told him, that it was the quéens pleaſure that two of the gard ſhould attend on him, and that he muſt be caried priſoner to the tower of London with the duke. Maiſter Mildmaie ſaid he marueled that a learned man would ſpeake ſo vnaduiſedlie againſt ſo good a prince, and wilfullie run into ſuch danger. Doctor Sands anſwered, I ſhall not be aſhamed of bonds. But if I could doo as maſter Mildmaie can, I néeded not feare bonds: for he came downe in paiment againſt quéene Marie, and armed in the field, and now he returneth in paiment for quéene Marie: before a traitor and now a great friend. I can not with one mouth blow hot and cold after this ſort.

Maſter Mildmaies trecherie noted by doctor Sands to his obloquie

Vpon this, his ſtable was robbed of foure notable good geldings, the beſt of them maſter Hurleſtone tooke for his owne ſaddle, and rode on him to London in his ſight. An inuentarie was taken of all his goods by maſter More bedell for the vniuerſitie. Hée was ſet vpon a lame horſe that halted to the ground, which thing a friend of his perceiuing, praied that he might lend him a nag. The yeoman of the gard were content. As he departed out of the townes end, ſome papiſts reſorted thither to géere at him, ſome of his friends to mourne for him. He came into the ranke to London, the people being full of outcries. And as he came in at Biſhops gate, one like a milkewife hurled a ſtone at him, and hit him on the breaſt with ſuch a blow, that he was like to fall off his horſſe. To whome he mildlie ſaid: Woman, God forgiue it thée. Truth it is, that iourneieng & euill intreating

The miſuſage of certeine drabs againſt doctor Sands as he was brought priſoner to the tower.

ſo mortified him, that he was more readie to die than to liue.

As he came through tower hill ſtréet, one woman ſtanding in hir doore, cried: Fie on thée thou knaue, thou knaue, thou traitor, thou heretike. Whereat hée ſmiled. Looke; the deſperat heretike (ſaith ſhe) laugheth at this geare. A woman on the other ſide of the ſtréet anſwered, ſaieng: Fie on thée neighbour, thou art not worthie to be called a woman, railing vpon this gentleman whom thou knoweſt not, neither yet the cauſe whie he is thus intreated. Then ſhée ſaid, Good gentleman, God be thy comfort, and giue thée ſtrength to ſtand in Gods cauſe euen to the end. And thus he paſſed through fire and water into the tower, the firſt priſoner that entered in that daie, which was ſaint James daie. The yeoman of the gard tooke from him his borowed nag, and what elſe ſoeuer hée had. His man one Quintin Swainton brought after him a bible, and ſome ſhirts, and ſuch like things. The bible was ſent in to him, but the ſhirts and ſuch like ſerued the yeoman of the gard.

The gard offer him fowle wrong.

After he had béene in the tower thrée wéekes in a bad priſon, he was lift vp into Nunnes bower, a better priſon, where was put to him maſter John Bradford. At the daie of quéene Maries coronation, their priſon doore was ſet open, euer ſhut before. One maſter Michell his old acquaintance, who had béene priſoner before in the ſame place, came in to him and ſaid: Maſter Sands, there is ſuch a ſtur in the tower, that neither gates, doores, nor priſoners are looked to this daie. Take my cloake, my hat and my rapier, and get you gone; you maie go out of the gates without queſtioning; ſaue your ſelfe, and let me doo as I maie. A rare friendſhip: but he refuſed the offer, ſaieng: I know no iuſt cauſe why I ſhould be in priſon. And thus to doo were to make my ſelfe guiltie, I will expect Gods good will, yet muſt I thinke my ſelfe moſt bound vnto you: and ſo maſter Michell departed.

Maſter Michels counſell to D. Sands to make an eſcape.

While doctor Sands and maſter Bradford were thus in cloſe priſon togither nine and twentie wéeks, one John Bowler was their kéeper, a verie peruerſe papiſt, yet by often perſuading of him, for he would giue eare, and by the gentle vſing of him, at length he began to miſlike poperie, and to fauour the goſpell, and ſo perſuaded in true religion, that on a ſundaie when they had maſſe in the chappell, he bringeth vp a ſeruice booke, a manchet and a glaſſe of wine, and there doctor Sands miniſtred the communion to Bradford and to Bowler. Thus Bowler was their ſonne begotten in bonds when Wiat was in armes, & the old duke of Norffolke ſent forth with a power of men to apprehend him, that roome might be made in the tower for him and other his complices. Doctor Cranmer, doctor Ridleie, and maſter Bradford were caſt into one priſon, & doctor Sands with nine other preachers were ſent into the Marſhalſea.

Bowler of a peruerſe papiſt becommeth reformed in true religion.

D. Sands remoued to the Marſhalſea.

The kéeper of the Marſhalſea appointed to euerie preacher a man to lead him in the ſtréet, he cauſed them go farre before, and he and doctor Sands came behind, whome he would not lead, but walked familiarlie with him. Yet doctor Sands was knowne, and the people euerie where praied to God to comfort him, & to ſtrengthen him in the truth. By that time the peoples minds were altered, poperie began to be vnſauerie. After they paſſed the bridge, the kéeper Thomas Waie ſaid to doctor Sands: I perceiue the vaine people would ſet you forward to the fire, you are as vaine as they, if you being a yoong man will ſtand in your own conceit, & prefer your own knowledge before the iudgement of ſo manie worthie prelats, ancient, learned, and graue men, as be in this relme. If you ſo doo, you ſhal find me as ſtrict a kéeper as one that vtterlie miſliketh your religion. Doctor Sands anſwered; I know my yeares yoong, and my learning ſmall, it is inough to know Chriſt crucified, and he hath learned nothing that ſéeth not the great blaſphemie that is in poperie, I will yéeld vnto God and not vnto man: I haue read in the ſcriptures of manie godlie and courteous kéepers, God may make you one; if not, I truſt he will giue me ſtrength and patience to beare your hard dealing with me. Saith Thomas Waie; Doo you then mind to ſtand to your religion? Yea ſaith doctor Sands, by Gods grace. Trulie ſaith the kéeper, I loue you the better, I did but tempt you. What fauor I can ſhew you, you ſhall be ſure of, and I ſhall thinke my ſelfe happie if I may die at the ſtake with you. The ſaid kéeper ſhewed doctor Sands euer after all friendſhip: he truſted him to go into the fields alone, and there met with maiſter Bradford, who then was remoued into the Bench, and there found like fauor of his kéeper. He laid him in the beſt chamber in the houſe: he would not ſuffer the knight marſhals men to laie fetters on him, as others had. And at his requeſt, he put maiſter Sands in to him, to be his bedfellow, and ſundrie times ſuffered his wife, who was maiſter Sands daughter of Eſſex, a gentlewoman, beautifull both in bodie & ſoule to reſort to him. There was great reſort vnto doctor Sands, and maiſter Sanders: they had much monie offered them, but they would receiue none. They had the communion there thrée or foure times, and a great ſort of communicants. Doctor Sands gaue ſuch exhortation to the people, for at that time being yoong, he was thought verie eloquent, that he mooued manie tears and made the people abhorre the maſſe, and defie all poperie.

Thomas waie the kéeper pretendeth to perſuade doctor Sands to poperie.

The frendſhip that doctor Sands found at his kéepers hands.

When Wiat with his armie came into Southworke, he ſent two gentlemen into the Marſhalſea to doctor Sands: ſaieng, that maiſter Wiat would be glad of his companie and aduiſe, & that the gates ſhould be ſet open for all the priſoners. He anſwered: Tell maiſter Wiat, if this his riſing be of God it will take place: if not, it will fall. For my part I was committed hither by order, I will be diſcharged by like order, or I will neuer depart hence. So anſwered maiſter Sanders, and the reſt of the preachers being there priſoners. After that doctor Sands had béene nine wéekes priſoner in the Marſhalſea, by the mediation of ſir Thomas Holcroft then knight marſhall he was ſet at libertie. Sir Thomas ſued earneſtlie to the biſhop of Wincheſter, doctor Gardiner for his deliuerance after manie repulſes, except doctor Sands would be one of their ſect, and then he could want nothing. He wrong out of him, that if the quéene could like of his deliuerance, he would not be againſt it: for that was ſir Thomas his laſt requeſt. In the meane time he had procured two ladies of the priuie chamber to mooue the quéene in it: who was contented, if the biſhop of Wincheſter could like of it. The next time that the biſhop went into the priuie chamber to ſpeake with the quéene, maiſter Holcroft followed, and had his warrant for doctor Sands remiſſion readie, and praied the two ladies, when as the biſhop ſhould take his leaue, to put the quéene in mind of doctor Sands. So they did. And the quéene ſaid: Wincheſter, what thinke you by doctor Sands, is he not ſufficientlie puniſhed? As it pleaſe your maieſtie, ſaith Wincheſter. That he ſpake, remembring his former promiſe to maiſter Holcroft, that he would not be againſt Sands, if the quéene ſhould like to diſcharge him. Saith the quéene: Then trulie, we would that he were ſet at libertie. Immediatlie maiſter Holcroft offered the quéene the warrant, who ſubſcribed the ſame, and called Wincheſter to put to his hand, and ſo he did. The warrant was giuen to the knight knight marſhall againe, ſir Thomas Holcroft. As the biſhop went foorth of the priuie chamber doore, he called maiſter Holcroft to him: commanding him not to ſet doctor Sands at libertie, vntill he had taken ſuerties of two gentlemen of his countrie with him, euerie one bound in fiue hundred pounds, that doctor Sands ſhould not depart out of the realme without licence. Maiſter Holcroft immediatlie after met with two gentlemen of the north, friends & conſins to doctor Sands, who offered to be bound in bodie, goods and lands for him.

Communication betweene ſir Thomas Holcroft and doctor Sands about his departing out of England.

At after dinner the ſame daie, maiſter Holcroft ſent for doctor Sands to his lodging at Weſtminſter, requiring the keeper to accompanie with him. He came accordinglie, finding maiſter Holcroft alone, walking in his garden: maiſter Holcroft imparted his long ſute, with the whole proceeding, and what effect it had taken to doctor Sands: much reioiſing that it was his good hap to doo him good, & to procure his libertie, and that nothing remained, but that he would enter into bonds with his two ſuerties, for not departing out of the realme. Doctor Sands anſwered: I giue God thanks, who hath mooued your hart to mind me ſo well, & I thinke my ſelfe moſt bound vnto you, God ſhall requite, and I ſhall neuer be found vnthankfull. But as you haue dealt friendlie with me, I will alſo deale plainlie with you. I came a free man into priſon, I will not go foorth a bondman. As I cannot benefit my friends ſo will I not hurt them: and if I be ſet at libertie, I will not tarie ſix daies in this realme if I may get out. If therefore I may not go free foorth, ſend me to the Marſhalſea againe, and there you ſhall be ſure of me.

Sir Thomas Holcroft cannot perſuade doctor Sands to tarie in England, and therefore ſetteth him at large.

This anſwer much miſliked maiſter Holcroft, who told doctor Sands that the time would not long continue, a change would ſhortlie come: the ſtate was but a cloud, and would ſoone ſhake awaie; and that his couſine ſir Edward Braie would gladlie receiue him and his wife into his houſe, where he ſhould neuer need to come at church, and how the ladie Braie was a zealous gentlewoman, who hated poperie: adding that he would not ſo deale with him to looſe all his labor. When doctor Sands could not be remoued from his former ſaieng, maiſter Holcroft ſaid: Seeing you can not be altered, I will change my purpoſe, and yeeld vnto you, come of it what will, I will ſet you at libertie: and ſeeing you mind ouer ſea, get you gone ſo quicklie as you can. One thing I require of you, that while you are there, you write nothing to come hither, for ſo ye may vndoo me. He freendlie kiſſed doctor Sands, bad him farewell, and commanded the keeper to take no fees of him: ſaieng; Let me anſwer Wincheſter as I may. Doctor Sands returned with the keeper to the Marſhalſea and taried all night. There on the morrow gaue a dinner to all the priſoners, bad his bedfellow and ſworne ſtakefellow, if it had ſo pleaſed God, maiſter Saunders farewell, with manie teares and kiſſings, the one falling on the others necke, and ſo departed, clearelie deliuered without examination or bond. From thence he went to the Bench, and there talked with maiſter Bradford, and maiſter Farrar biſhop of S. Dauids, then priſoners. Then he comforted them, & they praiſed God for his happie deliuerance. He went by Wincheſters houſe, and there tooke boate, and came to a freends houſe in London called William Banks, and taried there one night. On the morrow at night he ſhifted to an other freends houſe, and there he learned that ſearch was made for him.

Search made for doctor Sands after his inlargement.

Doctor Watſon and maiſter Chriſtopherſon, comming to the biſhop of Wincheſter, told him that he had ſet at libertie the greateſt heretike in England, and one that had of all other moſt corrupted the vniuerſitie of Cambridge, doctor Sands. Whervpon the biſhop of Wincheſter, being chancellor of England, ſent for all the coneſtables of London, commanding them to watch for doctor Sands, who was then within the citie, and to apprehend him; and who ſo euer of them ſhould take him and bring him to him, he ſhould haue fiue pounds for his labor. Doctor Sands ſuſpecting the matter, conueied himſelfe by night to one maiſter Barties houſe a ſtranger, who was in the Marſhalſea with him priſoner a while, he was a good proteſtant and dwelt in Marke lane. There he was ſix daies, and had one or two of his freends that repaired to him. Then he repaired to an acquaintance of his, one Hurleſtone a ſkinner, dwelling in Cornehill, he cauſed his man Quintin to prouide two geldings for him, minding on the morrow to ride into Eſſex to maiſter Sands his father in law, where his wife was.

Gardiners commandement to watch and ward for doctor Sands and to apprehend him, with a reward promiſed to the taker of him.

Note Gods prouidence in giuing a way to doctor Sands for his ſafe eſcaping out of danger.

At his going to bed in Hurleſtons houſe, he had a paire of hoſe newlie made that were too long for him. For while he was in the tower, a tailor was admitted him to make him a paire of hoſe. One came vnto him whoſe name was Beniamin, a good proteſtant, dwelling in Birchin lane: he might not ſpeake to him, or come vnto him, to take meaſure of him, but onelie looke vpon his leg, he made the hoſe, and they were two inches too long. Theſe hoſe he praied the good wife of the houſe to ſend to ſome tailor to cut his hoſe two inches ſhorter. The wife required the boy of the houſe to carie them to the next tailor to cut. The boy chanced (or rather God ſo prouided) to go to the next tailor, which was Beniamin that made them, which alſo was a coneſtable, and acquainted with the lord chancellors commandement. The boy required him to cut the hoſe. He ſaid I am not thy maiſters tailor. Saith the boy, Becauſe ye are our next neighbor, and my maiſters tailor dwelleth far off, I come to you, for it is far nights, and he muſt occupie them timelie in the morning. Beniamin tooke the hoſe and looked vpon them, he tooke his handie worke in hand, and ſaid: Theſe are not thy maiſters hoſe, but doctor Sands, them I made in the tower. The boy yeelded, and ſaid it was ſo. Saith he, Go to thy miſtreſſe, praie hir to ſit vp till twelue of the clocke, then I will bring the hoſe and ſpeake with doctor Sands to his good.

All the miſchiefes intended againſt doctor Sands diſcloſed by a conſtable, who telleth him how to eſcape.

At midnight the goodwife of the houſe, and Beniamin the tailor, commeth into doctor Sands chamber. The wife praieth him not to be afraid of their comming. He anſwereth: Nothing can be amiſſe, what God will, that ſhall be doone. Then Beniamin telleth him that he made his hoſe, and by what good chance they now came to his hands, God vſed the meane that he might foretell him of his perill, & aduiſe him how to eſcape it, telling him that all the conſtables of London, whereof he was one, watched for him, & ſome were ſo greedilie ſet, that they praied him (if he tooke him) to let them haue the carriage of him to the biſhop of Wincheſter, and he ſhould haue the fiue pounds. Saith Beniamin, It is knowen that your man hath prouided two geldings, and that you mind to ride out at Algate to morrow, and there then yee are ſure to be taken. Follow mine aduiſe, and by Gods grace yee ſhall eſcape their hands. Let your man walke all the daie to morrow in the ſtreet where your horſſes ſtand, booted and readie to ride. The goodmans ſeruant of the houſe ſhall take the horſſes and carrie them to Bednoll greene. The goodman ſhall be booted, and follow after as if he would ride. I will be here with you to morrow about eight of the clocke; it is both terme and parlement time, here we will breake our faſt, and when the ſtreet is full we will go foorth. Looke wildlie, and
